Ho Chi Minh was in China with Mao Tse-tung when the Vichy French administration reached agreement with Japan for the stationing of 30,000 troops in Indochina, and the use of all major Vietnamese airports made Indochina the most important staging area for all Japanese military operations in Southeast Asia. In view of that agreement the French administration was allowed to remain in office under Japanese suzerainty. In May 1941, six months before Pearl Harbour, at Ho Chi Minh’s urging, the Communist Party formed a broad nationalist alliance, the League for the Independence of Vietnam, which later became known as the Viet Minh. Then, after a short period in gaol by courtesy of Chiang Kai-shek, Ho Chi Minh began to collaborate with the US Office of Strategic Services and provided information on Japanese troop movements in Indochina. At the same time, he sought recognition of the Viet Minh as the legitimate representative of Vietnamese nationalist aspirations. When the Vichy French were disarmed and interned, with some executions, in March 1945, because of Japanese fears that French forces might turn against them, the last French-appointed emperor of Vietnam, was allowed to proclaim the independence of his country and to appoint a Vietnamese national government at Hue, with the real power remaining in the hands of the Japanese military command. Then, following the Japanese surrendered in August, the communist-led Viet Minh ordered a general uprising, and, with no one organized to oppose them, they were able to seize power in Hanoi. Emperor Bao Dai abdicated and declared his fealty to the newly proclaimed Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

However the French were determined to restore their own colonial presence in Indochina and, with the aid of British occupation forces, seized control of Cochinchina. Thus, at the beginning of 1946, there were two Vietnams: a communist north and a non-communist south. Negotiations between France and Ho Chi Minh led to an agreement in March that the Viet Minh government would be recognized as a free state within the French Union and that French troops would be withdrawn progressively over five years. But because their policy difference were great, France reneged on that agreement in June and proclaimed Cochinchina (South Vietnam) an autonomous republic. In an effort to resolve their differences Ho Chi Minh went to Paris and a second agreement was reached in September, but the peace was soon broken when a French cruiser opened fire on Haiphong in November after a clash between French and Vietnamese soldiers, and nearly 6,000 Vietnamese, mainly civilians, were killed. Ho Chi Minh bowed to demands for retaliation and the First Indochina War began in December, 1946. Further negotiations were fruitless and the war dragged on.

As in Vietnam, so in Laos, the Japanese interned the Vichy French administration in March 1945 and proclaimed the nation independent a month later. But upon Japan's defeat two opposing groups fought for control and the situation was not resolved until the French returned in 1946, expelled one group, recognized the other – but sought to reimpose control from Paris. In due course it moved towards negotiations for limited self-government. And in Cambodia the Japanese pressed Prince Norodom Sihanouk to declare independence also. He did, and appointed a prime minister, but on their return in October 1945 the French re-imposed their direct control, calling the country an autonomous state within the French Union, but being unwilling to give the National Assembly any real power. That situation was also untenable, deep divisions opened up, turmoil set in and Cambodia was on course for civil war. France's Indochinese Union was no more, but the French were determined to hang on.

THE DUTCH EAST INDIES SAGA¹⁷¹

While Japan was being reconstructed in the American version of the Christian image, and India was breaking loose from its colonial bondage, the Dutch were trying to reimpose their authority over the great complex of island states and territories which they had ruled as the Dutch East Indies. But the four years after the war proved to be a time of transition to Indonesian independence. Urged on by the departing Japanese, there was a prompt resurgence of independence movements which had begun to develop before the first world war as a reaction to the heavy-handed and all-pervading imperialism of the Dutch – and been firmly suppressed.

The origins of the movement actually lie in a 1908 attempt by an elitist group, Budi Utomo, to find an accommodation between Javanese traditional culture and aspirations and the 'modern' culture of the imperial Netherlands. That provided the stimulus for the establishment of two groups in 1912, an Islamic Association, (Sarekat Islam), and a Eurasian Indies Party, (Indische Partij), and the Indies Social Democratic Association in 1914. It adopted a Communist platform in 1920, encouraged by the success of the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, then changed its name to PKI, (Partai Komunis Indonesia), in 1924. In the meantime the Dutch government had sought to harness, or subvert, the influence of these new organizations by a policy much akin to Britain's divide and rule tactics in India. It established a consultative body known as the People's Council, (Volksraad), with some appointed members drawn from the existing organizations and others elected on the basis of three racial divisions: Dutch, Indonesian, and "foreign Asiatics." The People's Council was not intended to greatly influence government. That was an imperial Dutch prerogative. It was little more than a debating society to enable the local population to let off steam and to prevent the organization of a cohesive power base on which the independence movement could build. The quite predictable outcome was the development of inter-racial and inter-faith tension and discord which would only worsen over time. When groups within Sarekat Islam and the PKI tried to flex their muscles during the 1920's they were easily crushed, but the Dutch policy of repression stimulated the establishment of another group in 1926, a Bandung-based 'general study club' with a young graduate engineer, Sukarno, as its general secretary. Under his leadership 'nationalism' took on new meaning. He shifted the emphasis in the independence movement away from parties seeking change within a framework of Islam or communism towards a broadly-based struggle for independence and, in collaboration with a radical student-based Indonesian Union, (Perhimpunan Indonesia), set up the Indonesian Nationalist Party, (Partai Nasional Indonesia or PNI).

For his efforts Sukarno was gaoled for four years in 1929 but released after only two. By then the PNI, under government harassment, had fallen apart and two new groups had formed: Partindo and New PNI, led by Mohammad Hatta and Sutan Sjahrir. Constantly hounded by the government, some groups, including Partindo, cooperated and accepted People's Council membership, but others resisted and Sukarno was exiled to the outer islands in 1933. A more radical group was established in 1937, Gerindo, but when the situation in Europe worsened and Holland was threatened it took the view that support of Holland against Nazi Germany was more important than immediate independence.

Following the Japanese occupation in 1942 the situation changed radically. The Dutch, who occupied all administrative positions, were interned and this provided opportunities for career paths and professional positions which had never before been available to Indonesians. Sukarno and Hatta both accepted positions in the military administration and although, in view of the wartime circumstances, all power still rested with foreigners, the Japanese made political concessions to accommodate nationalist aspirations and received support from the nationalists in return. Sukarno was appointed chairman of Putera, the Centre of the People's Power, but among his roles was to organize compulsory labour programs which were seen as a backward step. However any antagonism towards that and the restructuring of Putera faded in October 1943 when a volunteer defence force was established, equipped and trained by the Japanese, and several youth organizations were formed, and in September 1944 the Japanese announced preparations for the Indies administration to undertake self-government. Little had actually been done between then and when it became apparent that Japan's defeat was imminent, but in August 1945 Sukarno and Hatta were summoned to Japanese regional headquarters Saigon and promised the immediate transfer of power and independence.

On returning to Jakarta Sukarno and Hatta came under strong local pressure to proclaim independence without waiting for a Japanese announcement, but they declined to do so until the British forces accepted the surrender of the Japanese garrison on August 17. They then proclaimed the establishment of a republican presidential government with a Central Indonesian National Committee which formed an ad hoc parliament to which Sukarno's appointed cabinet members were answerable. In fact the British forces which accepted the surrender on behalf of the Dutch were in effective control of the capital, but spontaneous revolution and guerrilla warfare against their occupation swept the Indonesian islands and it took several months and major battles at Bandung and Surabaya before they could claim the country was secure. The returning Dutch were forced to negotiate an agreement with republican representatives for the transfer of sovereignty 'in due course.' But the agreement was vague and virtually valueless. The Dutch, determined so stay, decide to put down all opposition by force. They desperately needed the resources and financial returns from their East Indies empire to enable reconstruction programs to proceed in the Netherlands. Guerrilla warfare continued but the Dutch were determined not to let go. However the nature of a 'police action' in July 1947, prompted the United Nations to intervene. An agreement was reached between the Dutch and the nationalists in January 1948.

It would be appropriate to pause at this point and turn to the Middle East where the trouble in the triangle was entering a new phase, but for the sake of continuity we will stay with Indonesia for one more step. In spite of that agreement, the authority of the Dutch was always under challenge and they resorted to another police action in December, 1948. That action strengthened the resolve of the diverse nationalist groups ranged against them; led to greater coordination between those groups; made it impossible to recover full military control of the country; cost Holland the sympathy of the US; and led to a round table conference in The Hague. The outcome: an agreement was reached in August 1949 to transfer sovereignty over the entire colony to an independent United States of Indonesia. But the haggling took some time because the prize was big. The Dutch were not just about to walk away, and they achieved an agreement which was loaded in their favour. A treaty was signed in November and took effect at the end of December that year. It provided for a federal government in which the republic, based on Java, sat with fifteen autonomous states which were set up by the Dutch and which retained much of the power. Sitting across that structure was a Netherlands-Indonesian Union which further diluted the authority of the federal government.

But: the territory of West Irian was excluded from the transfer. Legitimate reasons would have been geographic separation and ethnicity. The people of West Irian are almost entirely Melanesian Papuans and their country is only the western portion of the major land mass which includes Papua New Guinea. The real reason was the regions' resource wealth including the largest concentration of copper in the world; petroleum, gold, uranium and nickel; plus some of the world's most valuable tropical rain forests with ebony, sandalwood and cedar, together with a host of 'lesser' species including sago, breadfruit, coconut, nipa palm and rubber. The fate of West Irian was to be decided at another conference the following year.

In addition the treaty contained guarantees for Dutch investors which had the effect of allowing the bulk of income to continue flowing to Holland and not Indonesia, and the new nation accepted a debt to the Netherlands of 4,300,000,000 guilders! Great trials and tribulations lay ahead, but at least, officially, Indonesian was independent.

So: during the first two or three years of "peace" following the surrender of Japan the world was left to recover from its war of Gog and Magog and to establish new relationships under the dominant leadership, or influence, of the United States which was drugged by its own self-understanding. The only power in a position to moderate that influence was the Soviet Union, and it was being very deliberately isolated by the Western powers who were increasingly adopting a 'cold war' stance. Or was it the only power? Islam was waiting in the wings.

IN COMPETITION WITH ISLAM

Actually the mainstream churches didn't talk much about Islam. Ordinary clergy were uncomfortable and on the defensive when they were queried by their parishioners. All one needed to know was that Islam didn't have 'it', which meant 'personal Salvation, to which there was access only through Christ, the Son of God.' They said it was a religion for the backward people of the Middle Eastern deserts and the tropics of Africa and parts of Asia and it would never spread to the 'educated areas' where there was European influence. They were probably not aware that Islam was the religion of the majority of the population in 43 countries. They said it was a subject that was better left to the missionary societies and the churches who were in immediate contact with Islam. The trouble is, a great deal of missionary activity has been conducted on that basis and when evangelism has been coupled with the provision of schools, hospitals, faith healing and, in some regions, commercial ventures – all backed up with foreign or colonial government support – it has been inevitable that the communities involved have had difficulty distinguishing between competing or conflicting concepts. What is 'Christian religion,' what is 'Christian civilization,' and what is Western culture and commercial or political practice? When is a facility or a service which has been provided by the missionaries (or by an authority in association with the presence of the missionaries) a service which has been provided for the community out of a commitment to Christian teaching? When is that same facility or service a benefit provided as a consequence of accepting (or as an inducement to accept) Western enculturation and economic and political encroachment? Can you have one without the others? Is the acceptance of the presence of the missionaries (or the church) a price to be paid for accepting Western encroachment or intervention? Asked a different way: is the church riding in on the coat tails of Western commercial or political intervention?

In many regions of Africa and Asia the competing faiths of Christianity and Islam have been introduced concurrently but by different means. Until quite recent years Christianity has generally been introduced by foreigners of totally different racial origin, arriving as trained professional preacher/teachers, ordained or 'set apart' for their task, with new technology, new methods, and seldom staying for more than a few years or long enough to establish a 'cause.'

They have been seen as introducing a new 'Christian civilization' which had two components: a religion and a socio-economic cum political system which were in a symbiotic relationship, mutually dependent but not fully integrated. The introduction and imposition of 'Christian names', the nature of Christian liturgy and the concept of personal salvation sealed through baptism and communion also led to the ready identification of people as 'Christian' or 'non-Christian' and therefore tended to be divisive because of an assumption, sometimes implied and sometimes expressed, of 'superiority' or 'difference': "You, too, can enjoy the benefits and privileges of Christianity if you join us!" That attitude was so widespread that in many parts of Africa "any man who wished to be regarded as civilized was almost bound to become a Christian."¹⁷² On the other hand, Islam has generally been introduced by lay people, traders or travellers, either returning from contact with Islam in an established Muslim region, or foreigners of racial origin and culture not totally dissimilar to the locals. They may not have had the professional presentation of their Christian counterparts when they talked about theology, but they enjoyed a natural rapport and there was no basis on which they could be accused of 'white missionary paternalism.' They were also seen as introducing a new 'Islamic civilization' but in a quite different context. Islam was seen as a fully integrated system of beliefs and practices encompassing worship and the whole of personal and community life in a 'brotherhood' and in a manner which did not involve a radical change from the existing culture and sense of community. This was especially the case in urban areas and there was seldom an implied opposition to, or rejection of, the African or Asian cultural background as being in some sense inferior.¹⁷³ Neither were they seen to be backed by foreign financial resources (at least not until the mid 1970s).

This competition and differentiation between peoples on the basis of their faiths naturally leads to tensions within a mixed community or between adjacent communities, but these remain latent or submerged when social, political and economic circumstances are stable or when one group has the authority to impose and maintain law and order, even if it is discriminating against the other group. However when stability is lost, or when the dominant group loses its authority, the consequences can be serious. And yet, either from ignorance of the possible consequences or a total disregard for them which has been induced by the church's self-understanding, evangelical and missionary groups in some regions have continued flaunting their Christianity and taunting Muslims with it. For example, in Nigeria in the late 1970s and early 1980s Christian fundamentalists in the north of the country caused considerable tension with aggressive missionizing and propaganda. Confident and assertive, they "paraded in front of Muslims in predominantly Muslim towns such as Zaria (with) the slogan, 'I've found it' – 'it' being Jesus or the truth – thereby provoking the Muslim response 'Islam only.'"¹⁷⁴

When the war ended and the great white Christian powers sought to reimpose their authority in Africa and Asia they had quite a bit of catching up to do. Even though it lacked an organized missionary endeavour and the financial backing of the Christian missions had suffered because of a European-induced mind-set against it, Islam was in the middle of a thirty-year growth period which saw the number of its adherents in Africa double between 1928 and 1958. Over the same period Protestant Christian numbers rose by about 27% and Roman Catholic by about 54%.¹⁷⁵ One factor which appears to have acted in its favour in a southward penetration from North Africa was Islam's association with nationalism and the fact that its adherents had survived deliberate second class status under French administration. This aspect of its nationalism did not spring directly from the links between Arab Nationalism and the Prophet Muhammad's call for submission to God's Will which led to the establishment of Islam. It related to the way in which various protectorates in countries such as Egypt, Tunisia and Morocco had developed from the protection of European nationals in those countries on the basis of a modus vivendi between Muslims and non-Muslims. It is illustrated by the situation in Algeria, conquered and colonized by France, in which adherence to Islam was adopted by the authorities as the criteria to discriminate between the colon and the indigene in matters of civil and political rights. The indigene was defined as a Muslim and became a second-class subject, deprived of citizenship and inflicted with the Code de l'indigenat under a definition by the Senatus Consulte in 1865. The deprivations became even more apparent after the anomaly of the native Jewish community was abolished with naturalization under a special decree in 1870.¹⁷⁶ That method of discrimination clearly implies that no European would adopt Islam.

But there was another anomaly introduced at the end of the second world war as there had been after the first. When the churches wanted to reassert their influence and restrict that of Islam and looked for the support of their states in that endeavour they were often thwarted. It was the turn of the United States to decide that religious tolerance was a new factor to be taken into account – when it suited its purpose. As the British Defender of the Faith had been required to sacrifice the interests of that faith to secure Britain's position in Palestine, so the US, the 'New Israel,' found it necessary to be more circumspect in dealing with both Muslims and Jews when it declared Saudi Arabia (or at least the oil hidden beneath its sands) to be of 'vital interest.' (Chapter 25) At one point Secretary for the Navy James Forrestall feared the consequences of angering Ibn Saud so much that he advised Truman to "ditch Israel" in order to guarantee the Saudi king's loyalty and his oil,¹⁷⁷ advice which Truman ignored, and other advisers would later maintain that to promote Islam was a dangerous long term solution. However Truman could be confident that he had made the right decision because when his predecessor, Roosevelt, and Ibn Saud reached agreement for an American air base at Dhahran in 1945 the king had penned a note in the margin of the agreement: "I urge my descendants to maintain the friendship of our American brothers and to renew this agreement."¹⁷⁸ The American administration therefore appears to have taken little notice when the first Muslim Brotherhood group was established in Jerusalem in 1946 but, with the support of the Palestinian leadership, there were five additional groups operating by the end of that year.¹⁷⁹

Without realizing it, the United States was building and manipulating a set of complex relationships such that within a generation it would have made its own security no less dependent on the stability of the Middle East than Britain had a generation earlier through its equally self-interest based Balfour Declaration and the manipulation which was associated with it. The lessons of its religious heritage were lost on its decision makers – commercial and political – and they demonstrated no more insight into the implications of the trouble in the triangle than the other participants as they sought to control the decolonization process which had been set in train and the reconstruction of the world economic and political systems.

POPULATION PATTERNS, PARENTHOOD ...

All of those developments appeared to be taking place in a dynamically evolving environment quite different from that which the world had known before Gog and Magog went to war. To start with, the world population was growing at a rate and in a manner which had not been generally understood before the war. Between 1939 and 1945 the population had risen from about 2,200 million to about 2,400 million – an increase of nine percent. That increase was in spite of the fact that up to 112 million persons, over five percent of the 1939 world population, had been enlisted and away from home for several years; that deaths and missing persons, presumed dead, totalled 58 million or 2.6 percent of the world population; that a further 35 million persons or 1.6 percent had been incapacitated or wounded, and that this trauma had sharply depressed the birth rate during the war.¹⁸⁰

Actually the world war had caused little more than a blip on the long term pattern of human evolution and population growth, but the leaders of the world's dominant Western powers had not been inclined to view the world from a long term perspective. Their sights were fixed almost exclusively on gaining maximum benefit from the short term situation as they saw it. That meant a continuation of uninhibited exploitation of everything and everyone over whom they could gain control, taking full advantage of the rapid acceleration of scientific and technological developments stimulated by the war, with absolutely no regard for conservation of resources with the future of humanity in mind. This was justified by the need to feed, clothe, house, transport, and provide employment for the returning ex-servicemen without undermining the employment of the masses of women who had been drafted into the workforce to help the war effort, and at the same time build or rebuild neglected or destroyed infrastructure while converting munitions production capacity into consumer production capacity and expanding it to meet the demands of the expected population growth. That was some task. The future could look after itself.

The return of the ex-service personnel and the sudden relief from the trauma of the war soon led to the expected dramatic rise in the birth rate and a “baby boom” which dramatically offset the depressed birth rate of the war years. Demography soon became a study of great importance as economists, sociologists, financiers, industrialists and politicians all realized the enormous complications, challenges – and opportunities – which the new situation involved.¹⁸¹ Supply and demand levels for food, consumer goods, housing, finance, education and health services, and employment all had to be assessed against a dynamically fluid pattern of circumstances. First there were the changing relationships between the proportions of pre-school children, youths, adults of both reproductive and post-reproductive age, retired persons and the infirm aged in war ravaged countries and the impact of the baby boom.

A few figures serve to illustrate the situation. In the United States the birth rate rocketed to 26 per thousand persons per year and stayed above 24 for fifteen years before falling gradually to the prewar rate of 18 per thousand. The ages at first marriage and first births fell at the same time, as did the death rate per thousand, making the net impact on population growth even greater.¹⁸² In Taiwan, where the pre-war birth rate had been 40 per thousand, the birth rate fell at first to 38 per thousand in 1947 but then rose to 50 by 1951 – among the world's highest rates – before falling to 36 in 1963. However the death rate fell even more dramatically from 18 per thousand in 1947 to five per thousand in 1968. The result was that by 1968, 90 percent of the population was in the nominally 'productive ages' from 15 to 64 compared with 68 percent in the United States.¹⁸³ In Japan, which the Western World was generally unable to comprehend because of the attitudes and policies which had been generated and sustained over the long period which we have traced, the population leapt from 72 million in 1945 to 80 million in 1948, under the impact of demobilization of its overseas armed forces, repatriation of overseas citizens and the post war baby boom. Its birthrate peaked at 34.3 births per thousand persons in 1947 and stayed at 33.5 in 1948 after which, under the influence of crisis management by the government, it fell to 28.1 in 1950 and only 17.2 by 1957.¹⁸⁴ That was seven births per thousand persons or 30 percent lower than the birthrate in the United States at that time.

... AND POSTWAR SOCIAL CHANGE

But parallel with the new awareness of population dynamics there was an urgent need for a new understanding of human gender relationships. In the industrialized countries, especially those torn by war, and in other countries which had also been ravaged, women had been expected, required and willing to play much more prominent and demanding roles than had been their lot pre-war when they were expected to remain submissive in a male dominated society. In fact the systems of government and commerce had become increasingly dependent on their participation in the manual labour work force, light industry, clerical work, non-combat service roles, community support and service organizations, and in professional roles, notably nursing, para-medical services and school teaching. This required higher levels of education, training and skill development than had been the case before the war, but it also transformed them into an income earning class which gave them independent demand capacity that had not previously been the case. Women therefore generated new market potential in their own right and became the subject of marketing campaigns quite separately from the established patterns of domestic markets.

All of these factors had the effect of raising the expectations of both mature aged and young women. The mature aged were not prepared to revert to their pre-war status and the young were not prepared to accept it as a starting point. The ground swell of the Women's Liberation Movement was slow in starting but progressively Feminist writers built on the work of prewar activists such as the Pankhursts and demanded greater recognition, the removal of restrictions on employment and education, and equality with men in all aspects of community and political life. Their struggle would have been much more difficult if it were not for the social and economic consequences of the war and if it were not exploited by commercial interests. But change is a never ending process and over the next few years new concepts and social and political considerations became apparent. These required reconsideration of religious attitudes, not only for the Christian church but also for other major religious communities, notably Muslims and Hindus, among whom the role, personal conduct and attire of women had been influenced by a blend of regional or national culture and religious understanding to a more conspicuous extent than in other faith communities.

Western Christian urbanized peoples first had to become accustomed to the idea of 'working mothers.' It was hardly a new concept for rural communities, especially in countries lacking in technological development, but urbanized Western Christians were accustomed to the ideas that the family unit was based on one male breadwinner supporting the family from paid employment, and that the only proper role for a woman (other than in religious service) was as a mother at home nurturing children and attending to the needs of her husband. This was reinforced by the teachings of the church. Assumptions about close-knit three-generation extended families gave way to acceptance of mobile, independent two-generation nuclear family units, very self-centred and with greatly weakened family and cultural ties. The issues of residential care for the aged and infirm, single parent families, 'latch-key kids', child day care, 'street kids', juvenile delinquency, 'junkies', birth control, abortion, communal living, civil marriage and simplified divorce followed in quick succession.

Then a host of other new words began to creep into everyday language: jet engines, rockets, missiles and satellites; television and facsimiles; hovercraft and hydrofoils, catamarans and containers; computers, commuters and credit cards; contraceptives, genetic engineering, electron microscopes, clones, cat scans and transplants; plus plastic, tourists and terrorists. These things were all associated with, and complicated by, the flood of new technology which was about to engulf the world – the Western World first – which would change business opportunities and the way people lived and worked. Each of these things required new approaches by the controllers of commerce and industry, and the broader community, to the provision and funding of services and infrastructure. Should governments be responsible for them and, if not, who should be? Each issue in turn had major implications for the role and structure of government, how governments raised their revenue, and relationships between governments, how they fought wars – and how they justified them. Together these and similar issues, unfolding progressively over a generation, served to refocus attention on the two major alternative approaches to economic, social and political management which were in vogue – Capitalism and Communism. The manner of that refocusing was just as dramatic as the economic collapse between the two world wars, and the extent and intensity of debate, especially at academic level was remarkable. However the controllers of finance, economies and the means of production in the Western World managed to confine the debate to essentially power-block political terms, strongly supported by the Catholic Church which was running its parallel agenda.

But the circumstances had changed dramatically. Just one hundred years earlier, when the world's messages, passengers and goods and chattels were still carried by sailing ships and horse drawn carriages it took not less than two months for a message to reach Sydney from London on the big, fast, specially built clippers. And that was very fast compared with the travel time of eight months and one week for the first fleet in 1787–88, or the normal sailing time of four months during the first half century of settlement. Wars were fought and won or lost in Europe before people in Australia or New Zealand even knew they had been declared. Change came very dramatically in 1871 when a submarine cable was laid from Darwin to Java, enabling Australian messages to be retransmitted through cables which already connected Asia and Europe. Transmission delay for urgent messages virtually disappeared overnight: from two months to a mere few hours. Beam wireless was introduced in 1927, providing more or less instant communication, followed by the first telephone link which provided for normal conversation in 1930, just as Hitler's Nazi Party stormed into contention as an alternative government for Germany, and Pius XI released Casti Connubii.

For a short time there was a prompt flow of well informed information around the world and the news-reading public benefited from it, but only until the informal systems of censorship or press self-regulation began to take hold, followed by formal government censorship. (chapter 20, 'The conspiracy of silence.') It was some time into the war before the general public realized that it was being fed 'sanitized' versions of what the authorities believed was appropriate for them to know in order to ensure the response the government wanted. However when government censorship was no longer in effect and the world tried to return to normality after World War II, leaders in the world's capitals – and their voting public – knew within minutes when an insensitive action had been taken which was likely to lead to tension between nations. This had a remarkably salutary influence on most politicians who knew that their every move and decision was under scrutiny. But at the same time it meant that action and reaction were also remarkably swift, decisions were often taken in haste and without adequate consultation or information in an effort to preempt opposition or intervention and to retain the initiative, and there was a widespread sense of frustration and disillusionment because many members of the public believed their information was being manipulated as much as ever. Consciously or unconsciously religion was being swept into the background and the Western World was being 'de-Christianized' at an accelerating rate.

If they had studied history a little more closely, world and church leaders would have realized that the world population of about 2,400 million at the end of the war was more than five times the population when the papal standard bearers had set sail, and almost ten times the population when Christ was conducting his ministry. Put another way, about one in ten of all the humans who had lived anywhere since the time of Christ were alive at the end of World War II and this gave the church a wonderful opportunity to think more closely about the role of systematic religion and the role of the church in particular. In some areas, notably among the churches who were forging ahead with plans to establish the World Council of Churches, there was vigorous debate about the direction the church should take. There were new initiatives taken in social action and the refugee resettlement programs of the churches were very important indeed. But the major emphasis was placed on rehabilitation of their domestic organizations, recruitment and training for the ministry, assistance with church reconstruction in war devastated countries, a bid to return to countries from which they had been evicted during the war and, yet again, to ride into Japan and China on the chariots of the victorious armies.

While the Christian reconstruction of Japan was going ahead and people in the West were happy to read about the Japanese war crimes trials with a certain degree of smug self-satisfaction, they were so pre-occupied with settling back into their own changing socio-economic backyard that they gave little thought to what was happening elsewhere. They did, of course, know that their own leaders were jockeying for position as relations between West and East deteriorated, and they also knew that the Jews and the Arabs were getting all hot and bothered about the little piece of disputed land called Palestine. Most people probably thought: "Pity they can't settle it a bit more quietly."

FOCUS ON THE MIDDLE EAST

So, with the world's political and industrial leaders jockeying for position and trying to focus on a number of major issues all at once in a bid to resolve them to their own advantage, we can pick up the threads of action in the Middle East again, beginning with a related matter in the Soviet Union. In mid-April 1943 the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (JAC, chapter 25), under great pressure to raise funds for both the Soviet Army and civilian support programs, sent a delegation led by its chairman Solomon Mikhoels, to Britain and North America. Their program required them to talk to a range of Jewish organizations and business people, and naturally they talked with Zionist organizations and were briefed on the campaign for the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine and on the latest reports of gas chamber atrocities by the Nazis.

When they returned to Moscow late in 1943 they found great enthusiasm for the Biltmore Program and for a continuing campaign to force the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. However, encouraged by their discussions in the United States, and knowing that the Soviet Armies were expected to recover the Ukraine and the Crimea within a few months, Mikhoels promoted a plan for the settlement of Jews in the Crimea with the idea that it would eventually be designated as a Jewish Republic within the USSR. On February 21, 1944, a four-page proposal to that effect was addressed by the JAC to Molotov, who had already been consulted on the draft and whose wife, Mm. Zhemchuzhina was also a member of the committee, appears to have drawn the Foreign Minister into 'the affair' in something of a conspiratorial atmosphere. The JAC noted that Jews who were scattered throughout the Nazi occupied areas of Russia and Eastern Europe were unlikely to be able to resettle in their original homes after the war, that they would have to be settled somewhere, and that as the Crimea would be available soon after the Germans were expelled, it was an ideal region in which to settle the Jews. Mikhoels apparently had insider's knowledge that the Soviet authorities were already planning the forcible deportation of the resident Crimean Tartars. The committee noted, in effect, that the BiraBidzhan scheme had failed because Jews did not wish to settle there in view of the distance, geography and harsh climate. It said the proposed Crimean Jewish settlement would be a highly productive complement to the national economic plan; that it would be in the national interest, and in conformity with the spirit of the Lenin-Stalin national policy. It was not proposed as an alternative to Palestine but in addition to it or to complement it. In the circumstances it was indeed a naïve proposal. The Jewish question was at the heart of the war; Jews had been alternately oppressed and favoured over a long period and especially during the German-Soviet tug-of-war over Poland; and many people were convinced that even an oppressed religious community should not be favoured with an autonomous state or a republic in preference to some of the Union's oldest ethnic groups.

However the JAC proposed the immediate establishment of a commission to develop and implement the scheme as soon as the region had been relieved, and it made no attempt to keep the proposal confidential within the government. Perhaps that was part of a strategy to build a base of popular support. The proposal was soon widely known and drew opposition from many prominent Jews, not only because it might undermine the case for Palestine but also because they feared an adverse reaction from non-Jews and the Soviet authorities at the rather irrational (or presumptuous) proposal. In spite of that, without waiting for approval from Stalin or any relevant authority, a member of the JAC visited the Crimea in May, immediately after it was recovered from the Germans by Soviet troops, to conduct an economic study. However it was a dead issue. It was never officially rejected. It simply was not approved and an investigation into the JAC was ordered. Stalin was very conscious of the strategic and economic importance of the Crimea and he was very bitter at the manner in which Zionists had undermined the prospects for BiraBidzhan. He saw members of the JAC as having infiltrated the Soviet Information Bureau as agents of American Zionism and in an attempt to establish an outpost of American Imperialism on the shores of the Black Sea in a manner which would pose a direct threat to the security of the Soviet Union. Its chief, Lozovsky, its chairman, Mikhoels, and Mm. Zhemchuzhina were all arrested. Lozovsky was shot, Zhemchuzhina was exiled, and working relations between Stalin and Molotov were undermined.¹⁸⁵

With the war clearly drawing towards its final stages, Churchill was able to devote more thought to the future of Palestine. This was the problem which had resulted from Britain's political manipulation of the interfaith question to gain an advantage during the First World War and which had made it almost impossible for Britain to juggle its Far East and European theatres of interest as the threat of another war built up. It had also made necessary the conspiracy of silence which further complicated its problems precisely because neither Churchill nor the government as a body understood what the problem was. He now planned to replace the rejected Peel Plan with an alternative scheme of partition more favourable to the proposed Jewish state which would include the Negev and have the right to arrange migration without restriction, and in which the United States would be involved. In November, 1944, he discussed his plan with Dr. Weizmann and suggested that Weizmann discuss it further with Lord Moyne, the British Minister of State in the Middle East. Two days later, before that meeting could take place, Moyne was assassinated in Cairo by two young members of the extreme Zionist Stern Gang in a bid to put pressure on Britain to quit Palestine and abandon the Arabs. Churchill's reaction was to advise parliament that if the Zionists tolerated such crimes he and others who supported it would have to reconsider their attitudes.¹⁸⁶ However as shocked as the world was, it was distracted by the pace of other events and a potentially precipitous crime had less impact on international relations than it might otherwise have had. A few weeks of critical distractions included the German V-2 rocket bombing of London, the re-election of Roosevelt, the commencement of the US aerial bombardment of Japan, the British liberation of Athens, the beginning of the US liberation of the Philippines, the Russian liberation of Riga, and the crushing of the Warsaw uprising by the Germans.

For a time the crisis in Palestine seemed to settle down. The mainstream Zionist leadership were badly shaken by Moyne's assassination. They clamped down on the more extreme elements within their ranks, largely because Churchill and Moyne were close personal friends and they feared a reversal of the British prime minister's position. At the same time the Jews of Palestine welcomed Weizmann's first visit to the territory since 1939 and his wise and moderate counsel also helped to settle the tensions. They also welcomed the new policies on Palestine which British Labor leader Clement Attlee steered through the party conference in December, 1944, only weeks after Churchill's conversation with Weizmann. Those policies were deliberately planned to be favourable to the Zionist cause in an effort to out-bid the Conservative Government in the campaign for national elections which were only a few months away. Attlee espoused the reasoning that the concept of a Jewish National Home made no sense unless Jews were permitted to enter Palestine in sufficient numbers to become the majority. This, he said, required schemes to encourage Arabs to leave, well compensated, and it may require the deliberate transfer of population to other Arab-held territories. He also said Britain should examine the possibility of extending the boundaries of Palestine in agreement with Egypt, Syria and Transjordan. This was even more favourable to the Zionist cause than the scheme its leaders had demanded in the Biltmore resolution of 1942.¹⁸⁷ Even though he came from a completely different social and philosophical background to the Conservatives who had been involved previously, Attlee's reasoning was still anchored in the days of colonial empires trading other people's land. He had hardly progressed from the Berlin Conferences of the 1880s, Britain's carve-up of the Middle East between the world wars, the cabinet proposals for trading pieces of Africa in return for Hitler's favours in January 1938, or the ignominious Munich Agreement of September '38. (Chapter 21) So, in anticipation of easy negotiations ahead regardless of which party would be in power after the elections, the situation remained surprisingly stable during the early months of 1945.

A NEW MAN IN THE WHITE HOUSE

Then, in April '45 Roosevelt died and was succeeded by Harry Truman. The new president was fair game for a bit more pressure, especially in view of the fact that he had acceded to the office through the death of his predecessor, he had not been actively involved in foreign affairs and he did not have a strong personal electoral mandate. He would be regarded as a caretaker president until he won a presidential election in his own right or until he consolidated his position by virtue of strength of personality or a dominant approach to decision making. The Zionist lobbyists, in common with other pressure groups, recognized this. At the same time they recognized the constantly shifting relationship between global, regional and domestic considerations in US strategic policy making and the way in which the nature of conflict in the Middle East impinged on each of these. They also recognized that in spite of the fact that colonial or imperial authority and responsibility rested in Europe at that time, United States policy could have a major influence on both the nature of the conflict in the Middle East and the nature of foreign-power-presence in the region. With a British general election imminent they determined to exploit the potential for US influence to the full.

At that time America's global strategy was the major factor determining its Palestine policy, more or less as it had at the time of its agreement to the Balfour Declaration, except that religious sentiment was having less impact and realpolitik was having more. It was not apparent that within one generation the pattern would be reversed: that the consequences of its relationship with Israel and Palestine would become a major factor determining its global strategy. And it was not conceivable that within two generations the United States would be in the same position as Britain had been in 1939: that its dependence on stability in the Middle East would weaken its grip on its 'empire' – the network of threads controlling the world economic system and its own political integrity.

So. When Truman assumed office it soon became apparent to those interested that the new untested president had a loose decision making style, lacked confidence in foreign affairs and was therefore heavily reliant on his professional advisers, especially in the issue of Palestine in which he had no direct interest, but he was also responsive to friends outside the formal structures of government. He was surrounded by a team of national security, State Department and White House advisers among whom – for a variety of reasons – none supported the idea of establishing a Jewish State except two pro-Zionist staff in the White House. They were the Special Assistant for Minority Affairs, David Niles, and the Special Counsel, Clark Clifford. Three years later they were to be pivotal in the president's decision making on the question of a Jewish State but in the meantime the Zionist lobbyists had many barriers to overcome and they concentrated their efforts on members of Congress, the press, the two major political parties and the exploitation of personal access to the president. They played on the Democrat's fear that the Administration's anti-Zionist position would undermine the party at the 1946 congressional and 1948 presidential elections, noting that 80 percent of the American Jewish community supported the proposal for a Jewish State even though two major Jewish organizations, the American Council for Judaism and the American Jewish Committee, were either opposed or neutral in the debate.¹⁸⁸

Within weeks of Truman assuming office, while the Allies debated the reconstruction and future administration of a devastated Germany, and while Churchill led a caretaker government pending the British general election, Niles persuaded Truman to send an investigator, Earl G. Harrison, to Europe to report on the condition of the refugees and displaced persons. Then on July 24, 1945, at the Potsdam Conference Truman handed Churchill a memorandum. In it he stated that the US was interested in the British "finding it possible without delay to take steps to lift the restrictions of the White Paper on Jewish immigration into Palestine" and asked Churchill to send him his views on the settlement of the Palestine question.¹⁸⁹ That was the last day but one of Churchill's term in office, in the context of critical negotiations between Truman, Churchill and Stalin over the redrawing of the Polish map and the movement of several million people backwards and forwards across new Polish, German and Russian borders.¹⁹⁰ It was also the very day that Churchill met Polish leaders to discuss the border questions – and the day that Truman confided in Stalin what the Soviet leader already knew, that the US had exploded an atomic bomb. At that time Harrison was still pursuing his investigations into the question of Jewish refugee resettlement.

When Truman received Harrison's report in August, 1945, the Attlee Labor Government had taken office in Britain but was still finding its feet. Truman backed Harrison's recommendation for the immediate admission of 100,000 Jewish refugees to Palestine – against the wishes of the new British PM – and unleashed a political storm. Ben Gurion demanded that the refugees be admitted immediately and that the Labor government honour its election undertaking and declare Palestine a Jewish State. Truman then confirmed his support for the demand for the admission of the refugees but the British Government, realizing very quickly that it was not feasible to honour its election pledge, told Truman that such an action would amount to the abandonment of the White Paper and alienate the whole Arab world. It would make the administration of Palestine impossible and prejudice both British and American interests in the region.

The British view coincided with an assessment by Ambassador Henderson for the US Secretary of State on August 24. Henderson discussed four options for Palestine: an independent Jewish commonwealth; an independent Arab state; partition under the Trusteeship system; and a proposed trusteeship agreement for a unified Palestine. He ruled out the establishment of a Jewish commonwealth as dangerous to the interests of the US, a violation of the wishes of a large majority of the current inhabitants, placing in jeopardy American economic interests including its oil interests in Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries, and introducing the possibility that the Arab countries might impose an oil embargo in support of demands for Arab sovereignty in Palestine. Henderson's preferred option was a trusteeship agreement reached by (and presumably therefore guaranteed by) Britain, the US, the Soviet Union and France under which Palestine would have special status as an international territory administered by Britain.¹⁹¹

A BRITISH-AMERICAN ENQUIRY

Britain suggested a joint British/American enquiry in order to find a compromise. Angered by the delays in refugee migration, extremist Zionists in Palestine seemed determined to show that Britain would not be able to govern Palestine whatever course it pursued. It could not govern, by its own admission, if it admitted the 100,000 refugees. It would certainly not be able to govern if it did not admit them. In September/October coordinated terrorist attacks were launched against the Palestine railway system, naval vessels and the Haifa oil refinery. In early November, about the time that the Arab Higher Command was re-established by the former Mufti, Husseini, and Jews in Tripoli were assaulted with about one hundred deaths, Truman agreed to a joint enquiry. He accepted Attlee's contention that the US could not dictate terms to Britain if it was not prepared to become involved and take some responsibility. The setting up of a twelve-person Anglo-American Committee was announced on November 13, 1945, and it promptly began extensive investigations in Europe and the Middle East.

In December, while the committee's investigations were proceeding, Truman gave orders for the admission of Jewish refugees into the United States to be speeded up but, because it would have weakened their claims to Palestine, the Zionists gave the order only lip-service support, stonewalling occurred in various places, the necessary legislation was delayed and virtually nothing was done. An Arab representative made it clear to the committee that European Zionist Jewry was pursuing "alien imperialist, materialist or revolutionary ideas" and, "like the colonists of old, they were seeking to dominate, and claiming to civilize an 'unprogressive' area, relying on help from the imperialist powers including the United States."¹⁹² At the same time, while the committee was actually conducting investigations in the Middle East, several streams of power politicking were apparent. The British endeavoured to divide and rule by favouring the adjacent Arab states in order to reduce their support for their kin in Palestine and make it easier for Britain to negotiate with the Zionists. The British also applied pressure on the French to quit the Middle East; and the Zionists applied more pressure on Britain to quit Palestine. In December 1945 Britain and France agreed (with marked reluctance on the part of France) to withdraw their forces from both Syria and Lebanon to enable them to achieve the full independence which was implicit in their being admitted as founder members of the United Nations. This was confirmed in March 1946 and the withdrawals began. Similarly, Britain announced that Transjordan would be elevated to the status of a sovereign kingdom and this was confirmed in a treaty signed by Abdullah with Britain on March 22, 1946.

When the Anglo-American Committee submitted its report on April 20, 1946, its decision to adopt Harrison's proposal for the prompt admission to Palestine of 100,000 refugees exposed the hypocrisy and motives of those in America who had blocked Truman's relaxation of refugee entry requirements. It is noteworthy that a mere five thousand refugees were admitted into the United States under Truman's plan within six months of the release of the report.¹⁹³ The committee also adopted the 1939 White Paper proposal for the easing of land ownership restrictions, but its key proposal was the establishment of a UN trusteeship with the longer term aim of a binational state with Arabs and Jews together.

When Truman greeted the report warmly and pressed Britain to act on the refugee target the Zionists accepted it, but without much enthusiasm; the Arabs were outraged and demanded that Palestine be proclaimed an independent Arab state; the British government reacted with anger, saying the report had to be considered as a whole, not piecemeal; and the Secretary General of the Arab League announced that even though Palestine was an essential part of the Arab homeland, the Arabs would accept the existing Jewish community and give all Palestinians, of whatever religion or community, full rights of citizenship in a Palestinian State. He also highlighted the fundamental cause of the whole crisis for world Jewry, saying that it resulted from European anti-Semitism and that it was in no way the responsibility of the Arabs. However he said that although Palestine had already accepted more Jewish immigrants than most people considered reasonable, if the UN devised a scheme under which its member states would each accept a quota of Jewish immigrants the Arab states would each take part or contribute funds. Zionist agitation for more migration to Palestine was, he said, inspired mainly by political motives, not humanitarian, and the Zionists were determined to discourage displaced Jews from settling anywhere other than in Palestine.¹⁹⁴

In May 1946 the British Government formally rejected the Anglo-American Committee's migration proposals and this virtually ended the prospect that any agreement for settlement could be reached between the Jewish Agency and the British authorities in Palestine which would be acceptable to the Arabs.¹⁹⁵ In June the British authorities in Palestine arrested key leaders of the Jewish Agency (except Ben Gurion who was overseas at the time) in order to coerce them into a workable agreement and two weeks later, in retaliation, the Irgun blew up the British military headquarters in the King David Hotel, killing almost one hundred people. With relations already at rock bottom the British commander forbade his troops to have any dealings with Jews. In this atmosphere, fearing increased Russian influence in the Muslim world if the Palestine Question was not resolved, Truman agreed to a cabinet committee of British and US members, the Morrison-Grady Committee, to 'evaluate' the work of the Anglo-American Committee of Enquiry.

THE MORRISON-GRADY ATTEMPT

The Morrison-Grady Committee was forced to wallow in an ever-more confused sea of conceptions and misconceptions about the competing faith and ethnic communities, vested interests, and information and misinformation. The proposal it produced in July 1946 provided for semi-autonomous provinces in a scheme which would have entrenched British authority and curtailed the authority which the Jewish community already had for its own affairs. Amid claims that the committee had exceeded its authority in formulating a completely new proposal, and with hostility on all sides Truman was under pressure to reject the Morrison-Grady plan.¹⁹⁶ He floundered gradually towards acceptance of partition and, with the British Government continuing to press the Morrison-Grady plan, he progressively became the focal point of negotiations and politicking, and the United States was increasingly committed to a major share of the responsibility for the ultimate settlement. This was especially so after Truman, in his bid to derail the Morrison-Grady plan, proposed that the US would finance much of the cost of transporting refugees for resettlement in Palestine and sent a mission to London to work out the details.

The situation for the Zionists was approaching crisis point and on August 2, 1946, the rump of the Jewish Agency Executive met in Paris for a crucial meeting knowing that in the US they were being regarded as a nuisance and the public and politicians were tiring of hearing 'Palestine.' Ben Gurion was present but Weizmann declined to attend for health reasons. Knowing that Truman's support was vital, spurred on by Niles who warned them in a phone call that Truman would "wash his hands" of Palestine unless they produced a reasonable, realistic plan, and being very conscious of the additional pressure on Britain because of the situation in Iran and Turkey they eventually modified their territorial ambit claim. They explicitly rejected the Morrison-Grady plan as a basis for negotiation and accepted the principle of the partition of Palestine into two states, one Jewish and one Arab, saying the Jewish Agency was prepared to discuss a proposal for the establishment of a Jewish state "in an adequate area of Palestine" provided that there was agreement to the immediate admission of 100,000 refugees, administrative autonomy and relaxation of immigration controls in the area designated for the Jewish state. This broke the stalemate and encouraged Britain to appoint a pro-Zionist Colonial Secretary, to resume talks with Dr. Weizmann and to propose another London Conference with both the Jewish Agency and a delegation from the Arab countries.

But the effort required for the Jewish Agency executive to find a compromise position was not without trauma. It was split. One group, the moderates, led by Goldmann with Rabbi Wise and the absent Weizmann, favoured negotiating on the basis of the Morrison-Grady plan with a view to eventual partition. Rabbi Wise admitted to a "harrowing sense of guilt" over his 1937 decision to oppose partition because a Jewish state may have saved many lives during World War II. And Rabbi Fishman, another opponent of partition, maintained that adhering to the Biltmore Program at that point would mean abandoning those Jews who were in the process of fleeing Eastern Europe. The hardliners, led by Ben Gurion, regarded the Morrison-Grady plan as a sell-out and pressed for partition as a basis for negotiation, and subsequently, ten days after that debate, Rabbi Silver resigned from the executive.¹⁹⁷

The situation was regarded as so critical that Goldmann flew from Paris to Washington on August 5, 1946, and met Acheson, the person then heading Anglo-American negotiations, to present the new Jewish Agency proposals.¹⁹⁸ Truman gave them his nod of approval three days later and advised Attlee by telegram that he could not support the Morrison-Grady plan. Attlee promptly asked him to reconsider the matter but on August 12 he reiterated his decision, telling Attlee he hoped the pending London Conference might produce something he could support along the lines of "certain suggestions which have been made to us." Attlee's response was that the Morrison-Grady plan would be the basis for talks in London and while the Jews and Arabs were free to suggest counter proposals the outcome had to be one which the British could effect within their own resources. The joint Anglo-American initiative was effectively dead.¹⁹⁹

ANOTHER LONDON CONFERENCE

The pace of politicking in the US quickened but the British Colonial Secretary Hall was not aware of that when he issued invitations on August 15 for the London Conference. When it opened on September 10 both delegations were makeshift affairs because the British refused to release gaoled Zionist leaders to attend and the Arab Higher Command did not take part because Britain refused an invitation to the Mufti. The Arab delegation (Egypt, Iraq, The Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Transjordan and Yemen plus the General Secretary of the Arab League) presented a united front, demanding that the mandate be terminated and that a unitary state of Palestine be established under which the Jews would enjoy guaranteed minority rights. Immigration should be stopped and future immigration policy should be a matter for the 'successor government', they said. They rejected the Morrison-Grady plan because the establishment of an autonomous Jewish province within Palestine would give the Zionists an irreversible demographic, economic and political advantage which would lead inevitably to the demand for, and the establishment of, a Jewish state. They believed that this would become a bridgehead for further Jewish expansion in the rest of Palestine and subsequently into Transjordan, Syria and the rest of the Arab world. The British, while they rejected the Arab demands on immigration and continued parallel talks with the Zionists, agreed to a sub-committee continuing work on the constitutional aspects of the Arab proposal. The sub-committee worked until October 2 when the work of the conference was adjourned to December 16.²⁰⁰

Truman's constant shifting ground while the London Conference was in progress, his contradictory statements and his tendency to move in and out of the arena of bureaucratic policy formulation made Britain's position more difficult. With each change of attitude he gave one side or the other, usually the Zionists, a new negotiating ploy and a chance to raise the pressure on Britain. He was becoming increasingly concerned about strains within the Western Alliance which was moving steadily into a cold war confrontation with Russia, and there was an election in the offing, too. Britain's talks with Weizmann had already been complicated – almost sidelined – by the parlous state of Britain's economy, its inability to finance its defence commitments in Greece and Turkey in the eastern Mediterranean region without prejudicing domestic programs, and its urgent need to avoid antagonising Muslim communities in three other related regions.

In Region one, India, the country over which it had struggled to maintain its imperial grip for so long. Britain was struggling to avoid chaos because of conflict between Muslims and Hindus which was largely a consequence of firstly, its policies which had been designed to enable it to divide-and-rule during the colonial era and, secondly, its policies during World War II. Britain's war time offer of dominion status after the war in return for support during the war was a dead issue. India demanded nothing less than full independence and civil disobedience surged at the end of the war. A strong sense of nationalism fuelled events such as a mutiny of Indian naval ratings in February, 1946 and persuaded the Attlee Government that it was time to withdraw. General elections were held in April to establish an Interim Government with a view to eventual independence. But it was not able to reconcile the conflicting demands of Muslim and Hindu leaders. In August 1946 a convention of Muslim League parliamentarians confirmed the demand for the partition of India to provide for a separate Muslim State of Pakistan. Anything which Britain did in Palestine which antagonised the Muslims could make it impossible for Britain to exit the Indian sub-continent with any semblance of honour.

Region two centred on Egypt which was eager to be recognized as the leader of the Arab world. Negotiations for a new treaty had broken down over the question of control of the Sudan, occupied by Britain since 1936 under an Anglo-Egyptian Treaty. Britain had promised it independence. But the situation was complicated by colonial policies followed since an Anglo-Egyptian Condominium was established in 1898 in a bid to keep the French out. One major effect of those policies was to isolate the southern regions of the Sudan which had been dominated by Christian missions from the Muslim dominated northern region which adjoined Muslim dominated Egypt. Similarly, anything which Britain did in Palestine which antagonised the Muslims could generate deep enmity in Egypt and prejudice the future of the Sudan.

Region three was centred on Iran, another Muslim country bordering the Soviet Union and which generated great benefit for Britain. It had been jointly occupied by Britain and Russia in 1941 in a bid to destroy its "neutrality" or what was regarded by the Allies as a German-Iranian alliance, the Shah abdicated, and the new Shah (his son, Mohammed Reza Khan) ruled under tutelage to the Allies until the end of the war. Then, with the cold war between the former allies becoming more intense, Russia had again sent tanks into northern Iran. It already exerted influence through the Tudeh Party which it had placed in control of autonomous regions in the north western provinces of Azarbaijan and Kurdistan, sandwiched between the Soviet Republic of Azerbaijan and Turkey; and in August it applied pressure on Turkey to agree to a new regime in the straits from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean. British and US interests were again under threat. The American assessment, handed to Truman on August 15, 1946, was that the immediate Soviet aim was control of Turkey and that if that was achieved it would be difficult for the US to prevent Soviet control of the whole of the Near and Middle East. US diplomatic intervention followed on August 19 and the Soviet proposal to Turkey was withdrawn.

Greece and Turkey were clearly of increasing strategic importance to planners in each of Moscow, Washington and London. As a result of the Iranian crisis, continuing strained relations with the Soviet Union, and the increasing cost of subsidising the corrupt and financially inept Greek elite, Attlee was persuaded that it was time for Britain to withdraw from Greece and to agree to the United States being a partner in the Eastern Mediterranean but, in addition, the British Ambassador in Turkey suggested that the US should also be brought into that country.²⁰¹ At the same time, in a memo on August 23, the US Joint Chiefs of Staff had proposed to the President that the US should assist Turkey with technical aid and permit it to buy military equipment.²⁰² Talks between British and US military commands began on September 10, 1946, the same day as the London Conferences between Britain, the Arabs and the Zionists. The US confirmed that it regarded Middle East oil as vital and it was agreed that a strategy should be prepared for implementation in the event of the outbreak of a third world war.²⁰³ On September 21 Bevin and Byrnes agreed that it was Britain's responsibility to supply military equipment directly to Turkey, Greece and Iran, but if Britain failed to do so the United States would. The pace of action and reaction was accelerating! The US State Department immediately requested policy papers covering political and economic as well as military assistance, but on September 24, 1946, Special Counsel Clifford delivered a major report to Truman which had already been in preparation.

Based on consultations with the Secretaries for War, State and Navy, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the CIA and other specialists this Clifford/Elsey paper argued that the Soviet Union's long term aims were the economic, military and political domination of the entire Middle East, that there were limits to possible (working) relations with the USSR, and that military power was the only language its leaders understood. Compromises and concessions would be taken as a sign of weakness and encourage new and greater demands. Clifford and Elsey concluded that the main deterrent to Soviet attacks on areas vital to the security of the US would be military power; the US should support and assist all democratic countries endangered by the Soviet Union but military support in the event of an attack should be the last resort; economic support was a more effective barrier to communism, and this required the American public to be fully informed about US-Soviet relations. After reading that report Truman was concerned that it was so hot that if it became known it would blow the roof right off the White House. He ordered that the 20 copies which had been made were to be collected and placed in a safe!²⁰⁴ In the meantime the USSR was placing more competitive pressure on both Turkey and Iran for bilateral cooperation and the crisis in Iran was deepening and on October 1 the United States formally established a Mediterranean naval force for the first time which, within two months would include an aircraft carrier, three cruisers and eight destroyers, making the US the biggest naval power in the Mediterranean.

'MEN OF GOODWILL.' IN POLITICS?

On the same day, after much vacillating over who should participate in the adjourned London Conference and whether the Jewish Agency would continue to demand partition as the basis for discussions, Weizmann and Goldmann met Bevin in a final effort to have a Jewish Agency delegation formally involved in the conference, to have the detainees released and to have those being held as illegal immigrants on Cyprus released and admitted into Palestine under the existing quota scheme. Bevin warned them that Britain was prepared to turn the issue over to the United Nations rather than risk the lives of its young soldiers, but that the last point could be discussed further in the context of an agreement on law and order in Palestine. Subsequently the release of the detainees on Cyprus was agreed.²⁰⁵ But then on October 4, Yom Kippur, in spite of Britain's urgent request that he not do so, Truman gave tacit endorsement to Ben Gurion's partition plan in an election campaign move designed specifically to outbid his Republican opponent, Governor Dewey.²⁰⁶

Truman issued a statement in which he referred to both the Morrison-Grady plan for provincial autonomy and the Jewish Agency's counter proposal for partition and the immediate entry of 100,000 refugees, and then noted: "From the discussion which has ensued it is my belief that a solution along these lines would command the support of public opinion in the United States. I cannot believe that the gap between the proposals which have been put forward is too great to be bridged by men of reason and goodwill. To such a solution our government could give its support."²⁰⁷ Seething with fury, Attlee immediately sent a telegram in terms which have been described as "one of the most scalding communications a British Prime Minister has ever sent to a President of the United States."²⁰⁸ The opportunity for direct participation of the Jewish Agency in the adjourned conference was lost, and the emphasis in Zionist lobbying and negotiations thereupon lurched heavily towards the United States.

On October 18 and 21 the State Department received strategic reports it had ordered in September on each of Iran, Turkey and Greece.

The report on Iran emphasised the need for the US to provide positive encouragement and assistance if Iran were to be prevented from falling completely under Soviet domination and rescued from its existing state of partial subservience. In their submission the Joint Chiefs of Staff had said that Iran was of major strategic interest not only for its oil but also because it was a 'cushion' against Soviet advances in the Middle East and one of the few favourable areas for 'counter offensive action' (or containment) against the USSR. They were precisely the reasons why Stalin wanted it under Soviet influence. The Iranian Prime Minister's concessionary attitude to Soviet interests in Azerbaijan, Soviet requests for the establishment of a joint Irano-Soviet airline to service northern Iran, and requests for elections to test a proposed Irano-Soviet oil agreement (the price for Soviet withdrawal) in the Majlis had already been the trigger for uprisings in the south and demands for the expulsion of Tudeh supporters from cabinet. With the naval fleet behind him, US Ambassador Allen now applied pressure through the Shah for the prime minister to either dismiss the Tudeh supporters or resign. They were dismissed. But for a short time there was still strong Soviet influence in the north until the Shah appealed for direct military aid. Byrnes approved an offer to sell arms worth $10 million to Iran on October 28; the State Department endorsed other measures on Iran which were included in the reports; and by mid December the two Soviet-sponsored autonomous regions in the north had collapsed.

The report on Turkey described it as the most important strategic factor in the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East. If the Soviets were to achieve their objectives in Turkey, both Greece and Iran would be dangerously exposed. The military advisers believed that in spite of its unity and its effective military force, Turkey could not stand alone in the face of the Soviet war of nerves which required it to maintain large military forces which were a drain on its economy. Greece was also seen as a deciding factor in the future orientation of the Near East and Middle East. It was the only Balkans country which was not then subject to Soviet hegemony and, with Turkey, it formed the only obstacle to Soviet domination in the Mediterranean. If Greece were to fall under Soviet influence first (through Albania, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria) the USSR would be able to exert irresistible pressure on Turkey and the role of the United States as the defender of United Nations principles (as it interpreted them) would be seriously damaged. Greece needed external support and if the British were to withdraw it would be seriously weakened. On October 30, British officials in Washington were advised that the United States would be happy to provide whatever military assistance for Turkey and Greece that Britain was not able to provide.²⁰⁹

In one sense that advice was very comforting for Britain. It was a clear indication that Britain's immediate security was not at risk if it was unable to maintain its presence in the Near East. On the other hand it was very disturbing. It was an equally clear indication that if it made a decision to withdraw it would forfeit the bulk of its influence both in that region and in the United Nations – and the benefits which flowed from that influence – to the United States for the foreseeable future.

In another sense that advice illustrated that the rules of the war game were exactly the same as before World War I and World War II. He (or they) who controlled the Balkans held the key to the Middle East and all its resources. The players were simply changing roles. Case I: the changing Entente, dominated by Britain, versus the Central Powers. Case II: the Allies, including the Soviet Union, versus the Axis Powers. Case III: the Western Alliance, dominated by the United States, versus the Soviet Union. And the Jewish Question (or the Christian Question) was still at the centre of the board.

In the circumstances Britain simply could not contemplate any settlement of the Palestinian question which would alienate any Arabs, either Muslim or Christian, or Muslims in any non-Arab countries. On October 25, 1946, Bevin tabled three options for cabinet to consider if the negotiations with the Jewish Agency and the Arabs failed: to impose a solution acceptable to one of the parties (meaning, in the circumstances, the Arabs); to surrender the mandate and withdraw; to propose a scheme of partition in which part of Palestine would be joined to Transjordan. Then on October 31, in spite of the Jewish Agency's denunciation of terrorism, the Irgun Zvai Leumi blew up the British embassy in Rome and there were panic press predictions of assassination attempts in Britain itself.

During November Bevin visited the USA and noted hostility towards his policy. But he also noted that the US was 'drifting' even though it tended to favour partition.²¹⁰ During December as debate raged within Whitehall he seriously contemplated referring the Palestine mandate to the United Nations. Britain did not have the resources to impose a solution which offended both the Arabs and the Jewish Agency. Partition would offend the Arabs, but anything less would be unacceptable to the Zionists and would be unlikely to command support from the United States. Any change which varied the terms of the mandate required a two-thirds majority in the UN General Assembly, and any lesser result would require reference to the Security Council where either the US or the USSR were likely to exercise their veto. The Colonial Office, having lost the case for provincial autonomy, advocated partition but the top priority for the Foreign Office was to maintain the goodwill of the Arabs. So, under strong pressure from the Foreign Office and the Chiefs of Staff, cabinet opted to arrange a three-way conference – Britain, the Zionist Organization and the Arab Higher Command – but there was widespread despondency about the outcome and a growing expectation that it would be necessary to refer the problem to the United Nations.²¹¹

Cabinet would have been conscious that Greece had referred incursions from Albania, Bulgaria and Yugoslavia which were fuelling civil war and increasing the threat of Soviet domination to the United Nations on December 3. In fact there were concurrent destabilizing developments in each the four sets of regional conflicts outlined above, and a number of mandates, trusteeships and independence proposals were also before the United Nations and several of them involved Britain. On December 13 the General Assembly adopted agreements relating to New Guinea (Australia), Ruanda-Urundi (Belgium), Cameroons (part, French), Togoland (French), Western Samoa (New Zealand), Tanganyika (British), Cameroons (part, British) and Togoland (British). These countries and others in South East Asia and elsewhere which were involved in struggles to throw off one colonial yoke or another were watching the negotiations over Palestine very closely. They were looking for any action or any decision which might provide a precedent.

A PALESTINE PRECEDENT?

Palestine encapsulated and epitomised all of the struggles and aspirations of oppressed or subject peoples throughout the world in a unique set of circumstances. It involved two disadvantaged peoples, one of which was trying to re-colonize the territory of the other and in doing so was committing further oppression in an effort to overcome the oppression which it had suffered. There would therefore have been a greater than usual international interest in the affairs of the 22nd World Zionist Congress in Basle from December 9–24. Lobbying for executive positions which were the key to negotiations with Britain was just as intense as lobbying over the policy to be adopted in those negotiations. Weizmann denounced the terrorists and American extremists, and opposed Ben Gurion's policy of conflict and confrontation. Ben Gurion emphasised that he would not serve on an executive which was not prepared to wage an armed struggle against the British. Major groups which were pressing for partition sought to replace Weizmann as President by a collective leadership of Weizmann as Honorary President, Ben Gurion as chairman of the executive and Silver and Fishman as joint vice-chairmen. This failed. But the hard-line delegates pushed through resolutions reaffirming the Biltmore Program and opposing Jewish Agency participation in the London Conference. Weizmann thereupon resigned and the position of President was left vacant. Silver was made chairman of the US section of the Jewish Agency and Wise was eliminated from the official leadership. Clearly, negotiations with Britain were headed for a rocky road.²¹²

To complicate matters, on December 19, while the congress was still in session, the UN General Assembly approved a US proposal that a Commission be established to investigate the situation in Greece, beginning its on-the-spot investigations on January 30, 1947. By then the US was providing military assistance to the Greek government but, unknown to the US or Britain, Russia was trying to limit Yugoslavia in its ambitions to seize Salonika even though such an outcome would weaken the position of the Western Alliance and assist the Soviet Union. Stalin later told Tito's representatives that the venture had no prospects of success, asking: "What? Do you think that Great Britain and the United States, the most powerful state in the world, will permit you to break their line of communication in the Mediterranean? Nonsense!"²¹³ The waters of the Near East and the Middle East were becoming rapidly more and more murky.

At the beginning of January 1947 the British cabinet Defence Committee accepted recommendations from the Chief of the Imperial General Staff, Field Marshall Montgomery, that a tougher policy in Palestine was required. He proposed a new strategy of mobile troop columns, all in radio contact, able to move into the scene of a terrorist attack at once and comb it thoroughly. Searches would be permitted at any time, with or without notice, with the aim of causing such disturbance that the Yishuv would turn against the terrorists and confidence in the administration would be restored. In fact Britain's talks with Weizmann broke down completely, and at the end of January about 2,000 non-essential personnel were evacuated and all remaining civilians were housed in special security compounds.²¹⁴

When the reactivated London Conference opened on January 27 it was against the immediate background of that evacuation of non-essential personnel from Palestine and growing chaos in the whole region. The very next day the government released a white paper announcing that Britain was withdrawing from Burma and many observers took that as an indication that more such decisions were imminent. However cabinet approached the conference with a degree of flexibility. It had decided to discuss future independence for a single binational state, but it had also decided that if the conference failed the matter would then be referred to the UN. An Arab delegation attended but it was weakened by the absence of the Mufti (whose presence was still rejected by Britain) and the Secretary General of the Arab League (who excused himself on the grounds of ill health). They refused to compromise, reiterating their 'inflexible demand' that Jewish immigration should be halted and that partition should not be discussed. The Zionists refused to attend the formal conference but proposed parallel discussions with cabinet ministers (to which Britain agreed) saying they would not define their territorial aims for a separate Jewish State if their immigration demands were met and restrictions on land purchases were lifted.²¹⁵ These attitudes soon confirmed that there was no basis for agreement.

In a last desperate bid to find a solution a few weeks later, Britain proposed the establishment of two locally self-governing provinces, one Arab and one Jewish, under British mandatory control for five years. Jewish migration would be set at 4,000 persons per month for two years (192,000), with any subsequent migration to be agreed to by Britain, the Arabs and the United Nations.²¹⁶ There was still no basis for agreement. The Arabs were apparently comfortable with the matter being referred to the United Nations, but the Zionists, whose delegation included Ben-Gurion and Goldmann, sought to avoid reference to the UN with a tactical retreat to a pre-1939 policy which Britain rejected. The conference and parallel discussions closed on February 13.²¹⁷ Cabinet met next day to decide on action and some ministers expressed support for partition but the majority view was that any pro-Zionist policy would provoke an Arab uprising in Palestine with hostility in the Arab world and possibly throughout the Muslim world. They also recognized that a policy of full support for the Zionist claim was unlikely to be acceptable to either public opinion or the British forces in Palestine and, although the Chief of Staff again opposed that course, cabinet opted to refer the matter to the United Nations on the basis that if the UN proposed a settlement which was acceptable to Britain it would be at liberty to surrender the mandate.²¹⁸ The collapse of Anglo-Egyptian negotiations, the decision to withdraw aid from Greece and Turkey, and the impending withdrawal from India showed that Britain no longer had the "will, ability [or] rationale" to uphold such strategic ambitions in the Middle East and rendered the Chiefs of Staff strategic arguments obsolete.²¹⁹

ECONOMIC END-GAME: QUIT PALESTINE

This was confirmed on February 18 when the government made two dramatic announcements. The first related to a severe economic plan for the coming year which was set out in another White Paper: 'Economic Survey for 1947.' The second was that Britain was referring the Palestine question to the United Nations. The dour prediction in the economic White Paper was that failure of the plan might mean that the foundations of Britain's national life might never be restored. In such a dire predicament cabinet had decided, on Dalton's advice, to "put an end to our endless dribble of British taxpayers' money to the Greeks."²²⁰ Concerning Palestine, Bevin told the Commons: "We shall explain (to the UN) that the mandate has proved to be unworkable in practice and that the obligations undertaken to the two communities in Palestine have been shown to be irreconcilable. We shall describe the various proposals which have been put forward for dealing with the situation ... We shall then ask the United Nations to consider our report, and to recommend a settlement of the problem. We do not intend ourselves to recommend any particular solution." Then only two days later, on February 20, the government also announced that Britain would withdraw from India not later than June 1948 and that Lord Louis Mountbatten was appointed Governor General to oversee the process.

But the British government had also decided to put the matter of support for Greece to the US administration in such a manner as to incite it to assume responsibility for propping up the Greek government – and to leave it with no acceptable option. On February 21 Britain's ambassador delivered two notes to the State Department. In one, it advised that it could only maintain Greece's armed forces until March 31. In the other it advised that Turkey required military and economic assistance which Britain could not provide. They were dated exactly five months after Bevin and Byrnes had agreed that it was Britain's responsibility to supply military equipment directly to Turkey, Greece and Iran, but that if Britain failed to do so the United States would. Out of despair at its own parlous situation as a consequence of World War II and fearing further loss of status, Britain, the country which formerly wore the mantle of the most powerful imperial nation the world had known, was trying to coerce the United States into sharing the costs of restoring some semblance of international stability. It was also as a consequence of that war that the United States now found itself wearing the mantle of the world's most powerful nation ever which had been stripped from Britain. And a few months later it would become apparent that the British decision to force the US to pick up the Greek financial burden had infused complications into the Anglo-American relationship.

But the United States did not pick up the mantle spontaneously out of the kindness of its heart. The State Department was already well briefed on developments in the Eastern Mediterranean. It knew from its own diplomatic and military sources that the Greek government was perilously near breaking point, that its popular support was being eroded by corruption, inefficiency and economic chaos, and that there had been a resurgence of guerilla activity. The Soviet Union was held mainly responsible for that situation and it was expected to be a major beneficiary from it. The State Department went into action. It prepared a general program of assistance which was endorsed by Truman who immediately invited Congressional leaders to meet him and key members of his administration on February 27. That meeting was a bid to gain the support of the newly-elected Republican-dominated congress for a program which it was expected to reject on the basis that it was determined to reduce government spending. Acheson stunned the group by telling them that: "Like apples in a barrel infected by one rotten one, the corruption of Greece would infect Iran and all to the east, and to Europe through Italy and France, already threatened by the strongest Communist parties in Western Europe. ...Not since Rome and Carthage had there been such a polarisation of power on this earth." Truman was thereupon urged to make his appeal to Congress in similar fashion.²²¹

THE TRUMAN DOCTRINE

On the same day that Truman met Congressional leaders, and in view of the American response and sharp criticism and ridicule from Churchill, the British government briefly reopened negotiations with the Zionists in the forlorn hope that the threat of referral to the United Nations would prove sufficient incentive for them to take a more flexible attitude. It was to no avail. ²²² Then on March 12, as he leap-frogged from consideration of one related crisis to another, Truman took his major step towards securing congressional approval for the Greek support program. He defined the principle upon which United States foreign policy would henceforth be based: the Truman Doctrine. It must be the policy of the United States, he said, to support free peoples who are resisting subjection by armed minorities or outside pressures. He asked Congress to approve $400 million to help Greece and Turkey. It did. His 'doctrine' was said to mark a distinct break from the long-standing policy under which the US would not make commitments to support the government of another country during peace time. It was, in fact, merely a formal break with past policy because it had been breached in-the-honouring prior to the United States entering both world wars and quite specifically only a few months before in the provision of assistance to the Shah of Iran in October 1946.

The Truman Doctrine certainly legitimised United States participation in collective security agreements and so-called 'forward defence strategies' with military bases in other countries. This was a strategy which otherwise was only available in peace time when two countries were in an imperial or colonial relationship. Thus the Truman Doctrine also legitimised the 'imperial reach' ambitions of the United States without it having to attempt formal imperial expansion in a world setting in which it had played a major part in the dismantling of other powers' empires. It has subsequently enabled the US to exert political and economic pressure in circumstances in which it would otherwise have clearly been seen as 'the big bully' and to justify United States intervention in numerous situations around the world whether a government, or the freedom of its people, have been seriously at risk or whether it has been the commercial interests of United States enterprises which have been at risk. But in March 1947 it was the vehicle which enabled Truman's US to pre-empt the power vacuum in the Eastern Mediterranean which would have resulted from Britain's decision to withdraw and to accept that its international influence was on the decline.

The United States administration had been kept constantly informed of the progress of Britain's talks with the Arabs and the Zionists and on every aspect of the situation in Palestine but, even in view of such critical circumstances in the region, getting US agreement to the formal procedure to hand back the mandate was not an easy task. It required a decision by the General Assembly which was only likely to be made after thorough investigation. The Assembly was not due to sit until September and the US was opposed to it being convened at an earlier date to appoint an ad hoc commission on the grounds that the Soviet Union could use the occasion to embarrass the US and Britain over their involvement and political manoeuvring in Greece and Turkey.

A UN SPECIAL SESSION ...

In spite of that opposition the British government asked, in a formal letter of reference dated April 2, that in view of "the desirability of an early settlement in Palestine" a Special Session of the General Assembly be convened to appoint a Special Committee "to make recommendations under article 10 of the Charter, concerning the future government of Palestine."²²³ As mandatory power it was admitting that it could no longer administer the mandate which it had politicked so hard and long to gain. It could not hand Palestine to either the Jews or the Arabs, and it could neither impose nor negotiate the redrawing of the map of the Middle East, as it had been accustomed to doing, to secure a territorial settlement to the crisis which its ultimate dual manipulation of religious interest and belief had triggered.

It was just thirty years after a key British adviser, Sir Mark Sykes, had met Zionist representatives on February 7, 1917, to discuss a proposed sovereign Jewish State in Palestine in return for maximum Zionist cooperation during World War I which was to include pressure to bring the United States into the war and to keep Russia in it. But none of the key players, Britain, the Western Powers, the Soviet Union, the church, Jewish religious authorities or Muslim religious authorities fully understood the significance of the events in which they were involved. The British Government ought have been chastened by the realization that the capacity of the Jewish community to apply political pressure, developed under duress over hundreds of years, which it had sought to direct at the United States government for Britain's ends in 1917 was again being directed at that government, but to Britain's disadvantage. It would admit that "the obligations undertaken to the two communities in Palestine have been shown to be irreconcilable." But only that. It would admit no fault, blame or responsibility. Neither would the church. They were all piled onto Hitler, 'the Jews' or 'the Arabs' – except to the extent that Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin tried to deflect some blame onto the United States. In an address to the Commons a week after making his formal announcement he accused Truman of "causing an impasse in solving the Palestine question by playing domestic politics with the issue."²²⁴ ²²⁵

It was another case of a remarkably short memory for history. Bevin must have been aware that by the end of World War II the Jewish population in the US numbered some five million persons; revelations of the death camps and the plight of the refugees had effectively transformed Zionism into the dominant mood of this strategically placed minority; fund raising drives on behalf of the European survivors and the Palestine sanctuary were raising $100 million a year by 1947 (far surpassing the philanthropic efforts of any other American charity or of any other American ethnic group); and that the importance which American political leaders placed on the Jewish vote in New York, Illinois, Pennsylvania and other states with sizeable urban Jewish populations exerted a markedly pro-Zionist influence on the White House and Congress.²²⁶ Or was Bevin saying it was alright for Britain to play politics with religion but not for the United States? In any case, Britain's announcement that it was surrendering or reneging on its mandate did nothing to quell the disturbances.

Unfortunately, but quite naturally, it was difficult for most people to focus clearly on Palestine because a lot of other maps were being re-drawn at the same time. The Paris Peace Treaties which were finalized in February, 1947, resulted in territorial changes for Finland, Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria and Trieste, but much bigger changes were imminent on the Indian sub-continent. It was within days of the conclusion of the Paris Peace Treaties, and under enormous pressure, that Britain had announced that it would withdraw from India not later than June 1948 and Lord Louis Mountbatten was appointed Governor General to oversee the process. Mountbatten very quickly concluded that the partition of India into separate Muslim and Hindu states was the only policy which could bring peace or stability and he therefore worked to persuade Congress to accept that policy. It did so reluctantly. The principle of partition of a nation on the basis of religion was thus recognized internationally – although the church had long since sought to force it upon the world by default through its policy of ghettoization which was expanded and reflected in Tsarist Russia's establishment of the Pale of Settlement – and the Zionist case for the same policy to be applied in Palestine was strengthened enormously.

Upon receiving Britain's request for a special meeting of the General Assembly the Acting Secretary General sent telegrams to all 54 other members asking them to notify him if they concurred in the summoning of a special session for the purpose. Thirty nine replied 'yes', Ethiopia replied 'no' and 14 did not reply. When the Special Session opened on April 28 three matters proved divisive: the purpose of the appointment of a UN Special Committee, its composition, and whether the persons appointed to it should be directed by their governments or work as a committee of experts on the basis of conscience. But in addition, the AZEC, acting independently of the Jewish Agency, stepped up pressure on the US government to link its aid plans under the new Truman Doctrine to a solution in Palestine. It bombarded Truman and Marshall with telegrams and blanketed the religious and secular media in order to raise the profile of the Zionist cause. On May 1, Arab states tried to introduce a resolution calling for the termination of the mandate and a declaration of Palestinian independence, but they were defeated by 24 votes to 15, with 10 abstentions. Several working committees were appointed to consider Britain's request and how to proceed. Then, the day after the formation of the committee was approved, the Soviet delegate, Andrei Gromyko, amazed everyone, perplexed the United States and raised the expectations and morale of the Zionists when he confounded the universal assumption that the Soviet Union was virulently opposed to Zionism. He acknowledged the historical roots of both Arabs and Jews in Palestine and argued that no solution which ignored the lawful rights of either people could be ignored and argued that no solution which ignored the lawful right of either people could be justified. He said that a binational state was the solution "most deserving of attention" but concluded that if such a state was found impracticable, the alternative of partition would have to be considered.²²⁷

... AND THE BIRTH OF UNSCOP

On May 15, three months after the dramatic British announcement, an eleven member United Nations Special Committee on Palestine, (UNSCOP), was appointed. It was comprised of representatives of Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, India, Iran, The Netherlands, Peru, Sweden, Uruguay and Yugoslavia. However, in spite of strong opposition from Arab countries, its terms of reference did not correspond with Britain's letter of request. The matter on which it was required to report to the Assembly was changed from "recommendations, under article 10 of the Charter, concerning the future government of Palestine" to the much more general "the question of Palestine." It was directed to investigate "all questions and issues relevant to the problem of Palestine", to give "most careful consideration to the religious interests in Palestine of Islam, Judaism and Christianity" and to make "such proposals as it may consider appropriate for the solution of the problem of Palestine." The representative of Lebanon reflected the views of most Arab countries when, in reserving his country's position on the matter, he complained about the changes, referred to the "essential (and) dangerous indefiniteness which permeates this entire document,” and noted that all references to Palestinian independence had been “severely suppressed from the terms of reference.” ²²⁸

UNSCOP met for the first time in New York on May 26. Three days later, May 29, the UN General Secretary circulated a letter from Britain asking all countries to do all in their power to discourage illegal immigration into Palestine while the matter remained sub judice. That letter was provoked by information which had reached the British authorities on May 1 that a ship was being prepared for a special illegal immigrant voyage to Palestine. The plan for the voyage had been hatched in New York months earlier. The 5,000 ton President Warfield which had been used as a Chesapeake Bay ferry had been purchased and refitted by the Sonneborn Institute to take up to 5,000 passengers. A Methodist minister from Massachusetts, John Grauel, formerly a correspondent for the Protestant Episcopal Press publication The Churchman was recruited as the vessel's publicist and it sailed for Port-de-Bouc to prepare for its critical voyage.

RAPID ACTION: RELIGIOUS PARTITION AND EUROPEAN RECOVERY

Then there were a couple more major distractions on the world scene.

The first was the announcement on June 3, after intensive investigations and negotiations by Mountbatten, of firm proposals for the plan for partition of India, on the basis of religion, into two independent states of India and Pakistan. The proposals were promptly accepted by both the Muslim League and Hindu dominated Congress, and establishment of the principle of partition on the basis of religion was fait accompli. (See above: ‘The Indian Saga’)

The second was a speech on June 5 by the US Secretary of State, General George Marshall, at Harvard University. Marshall outlined a plan for a Program of European Economic Recovery involving the progressive economic integration of the nations of Europe in a free market economy, with financial assistance from the United States. The Marshall Plan had been launched.

Both of those matters require discussion before we can follow UNSCOP further, because they were about to have considerable impact on the UN's consideration of the future of Palestine.

THE MARSHALL PLAN: NOT PHILANTHROPY, DEFENCE OF US CAPITALISM

The ‘plan’, or more correctly a loose framework for a plan which could form the basis for negotiations, was the outcome of initiatives and discussions within the State Department and among other authorities over some months which had, in due course, been coordinated by Dean Acheson and brought to a presentable form at a meeting between Marshall and key staff on May 28. It was a response to the fact that recovery from the war in Europe was taking much longer than expected and to a number of ‘triggers’ which all occurred in March 1947, including Britain's precipitate withdrawal from Greece following the release of its economic crisis White Paper; the termination of UNRRA's operations; a report on Germany's recovery submitted by former President Hoover which “touched off a mighty debate within the Truman Administration” over the way in which German recovery should be managed and related to the economic and security requirements of its neighbours, and the endorsement by the UN General Assembly of a proposal to establish an Economic Commission for Europe.²²⁹ It was presented as a vision for the future, a break with America’s isolationist past, and its assumption of world leadership in a bid to help save Europe. It was vigorously promoted and much-vaunted as ‘The Marshall Plan’ and it led, in due course, to the formation of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC) and the American Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA) as channels for massive American financial assistance, mainly for countries in Western Europe – some $13.3 billion over four years.

But the Marshall Plan in fact “rested squarely on an American conviction that European economic recovery was essential to the long term-interests of the United States”²³⁰ and “an effective European Recovery Program is essential to American security.”²³¹ There were two main aspects to that conviction. One was that the United States required Europe as a major trading partner to sustain its own export-oriented economy, otherwise its own economy would collapse. Europe’s agricultural production was only 83 per cent of 1938 levels, its industrial production was 88 percent, and its exports were only 59 percent.²³² At such levels Europe could not purchase US exports at a level to sustain the US economy and it could not trade its way to recovery by financing its capital requirements as well as foodstuffs from its exports. The other was the twin threat from Communism. There was no doubt that the rising popularity of the communist economic philosophy would flow from Europe to the US if its own economy was not sufficiently buoyant to satisfy its people and its own political economy would therefore be under threat. But similarly, the establishment of a number of strong centrally planned economies in Europe, with trade concentrated in reciprocal arrangements, would have tended to exclude trade with the US, delay its recovery and make it more susceptible to pressure for the establishment of similar central controls at the expense of the private capitalist operations. From the US perspective Communism could not be permitted to succeed in Europe. The Marshall Plan was thus essentially a plan to protect the United States from another economic collapse such as it suffered following World War I and to offset the growing influence of Communism, but it required the European nations to take initiatives in cooperative planning and economic policies within a free market system.

And that – cooperative planning and economic policies within a free market system – was another related major issue which was on the table at the time and which was not going according to the wishes of the United States. As already noted, although the US was quite capable of operating its own system of trade barriers, it had complained repeatedly that it was at a disadvantage because of Britain’s Imperial preference trade system, and it had insisted – to the point of making its support for Britain in the war, the Atlantic Charter, and the Lend Lease program dependent upon it – that the system be dismantled and that so-called free trade prevail. In association with the establishment of the Bretton Woods Institutions it had pursued trade discussions aimed at reaching agreement to the concept of world free trade or, more correctly, setting up a system of international trade regulation with the first aim of eliminating tariffs. It was proposed that a specialized agency to be known as the International Trade Organization (ITO) should provide international control over trade restrictions for the purpose of expanding world trade and contributing to higher living standards. However it was apparent that what was acceptable to Europe was not acceptable to the United States, and vice versa. Therefore while haggling continued towards a draft agreement, eventually called the Havana Charter, a provisional agreement for the phased reduction of tariffs was reached and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade took effect in 1947, (officially, on January 1, 1948). During that year a total of 53 countries then signed the laboriously-negotiated Havana Charter, but it was eventually abandoned. The United States Congress refused to ratify it.²³³

So: in the middle of haggling over the fate of world trade and how quickly a package could be put into effect to prevent the United States from sliding into a state of depression, Allen W. Dulles, one of the key figures involved in the campaign for the United States to adopt the Marshall Plan, wrote in a book which was intended to strengthen the campaign and overcome resistance from the conservative business sector that:

*"It is not a philanthropic exercise. It is far more than that. ... It is an integral part of American policy. It is based on our view of the requirements of American security and it is a logical development of the trends of our foreign policy over more than a century. ... we have little choice but to proceed vigorously with the Marshall Plan ... (and) ... this is the only peaceful course now open to us which may answer the communist challenge to our way of life and our national security."*²³⁴

There was fear that the power vacuum left in central and western Europe by the defeat of Germany might be filled by an expanding Soviet Union unless the United States assembled the components of a viable balancing power. The vacuum had to be filled – in terms of the view from Washington – by rebuilding economic and political systems strong enough to forestall aggression and defeat Communist parties whose rise to power seemed the most likely way for the Soviets to extend their influence. This was a tacit admission that Soviet expansion by armed aggression was not expected, but that the US alliance with the Vatican would assume even greater importance in the battle for the minds of people to prevent the establishment of governments aligned with Marxist economic policies through normal democratic electoral processes. The anti-Communist bogey was alive and well, being fed on a mixed diet of Capitalist self-interest and Vatican fear of a theological challenge.

As Michael Hogan describes the situation: "American interests dictated an active role in rebuilding Europe ... (its) ambition subsumed economic, political and strategic interests in a larger design much like the one that had guided Republican policy makers in the 1920s. The Marshall Planners would replace the old European state system with what they saw as a more viable framework for achieving their policy objectives on the Continent. They would do so by applying the American principle of federalism and using it to create an integrated European economy similar to the one that existed in the United States." The idea of an economic United States of Europe was not new, having already been the aim of a number of unification movements in Europe, but influential American planners believed it would not only bring benefits to the US and meet its goals on the Continent but also provide a framework to control the Germans, contain the Soviets, limit Communist inroads, dissolve class tensions and set the continental countries on the path to a multilateral system of world trade. This would all be within a framework of liberal capitalism, free trade and democracy, and those who pursued totalitarian policies or who were regarded as 'enemies of the market place' could not also be 'friends at the council table.' It was a deliberate effort by America to remake the Old World in the image of the New.²³⁵

But even though most policy makers within the administration saw the development of the new policy on Europe as a means of bolstering Western Europe against Communist subversion and Soviet aggression, the group of relatively junior State Department officials who actually initiated the whole policy planning debate took a broader view. They saw the possibility that it might prepare the ground for a great-power accommodation on the Continent. They were alarmed by the trend at that time towards the division of Germany and Europe into exclusive blocs, an outcome which they thought would sow the seeds of future conflict, and they hoped to fashion an all-European political settlement from which would emerge an integrated economic and political order. They believed that this approach, if it was organized through supranational institutions of regional coordination, could harness Germany's power, allay French and Soviet security concerns, and prevent the division of Europe into rival economic and political blocs. At the same time the introduction of more liberal intra-European trade arrangements and currency convertibility could, they believed, "unleash the latent productive power of European enterprise and bring the continental countries into line with American plans for a multilateral system of world trade. This was the way to a "creative peace" rather than "an uneconomic self-sufficiency that would raise the spectre of autarchy, prevent recovery, and foster the kind of political instability that benefited the Communists." ²³⁶

Everyone agreed that the mechanism for control and utilization of the resources of the Ruhr was an important aspect of any plan for European recovery. It had been an important consideration in two world wars. However debate raged on both sides of the Atlantic over whether it should be a region of Germany operated under a system of nationalized enterprises; a region under international supervision used to encourage integration of the French and German economies as a bridge to wider economic union in Central Europe; a region of Germany operated under international supervision so that Germany's neighbours would each have access to its resources with disputes resolved by an international authority on a Europe-wide basis; or a region jointly controlled by the four 'powers' – Germany, France, Britain and Russia. At a conference of Foreign Ministers in Moscow the American delegation supported a proposal under which the Ruhr would remain part of Germany with a supra-national agency set up to prevent Germany from using the resources of the region as an 'economic club' with which to dominate Europe. ²³⁷ But quite clearly such a plan would have meant economic benefit to Soviet Russia and consolidated its influence through the Communist parties of Central and Western Europe, and such an outcome was contrary to the wishes of powerful figures including Marshall and the Dulles brothers, Allen and John Foster.

Allen Dulles was in a particularly strong position to influence policy consideration. At the time of President Roosevelt's death on April 12, 1945, he was head of the Office of Strategic Services unit in Switzerland and negotiating the surrender of German forces in Italy, known as 'Operation Sunrise.' In spite of orders from the new Truman administration that he should cease contact with the Germans the surrender took place on the basis of those negotiations on April 28. Subsequently when Germany finally surrendered in May 1945 he was appointed head of OSS operations in Germany and he was there through the period of negotiations over the Allied occupation and division of Germany. Then, while holding a number of influential civil offices, he was involved in the establishment of the United Nations headquarters in New York and in November 1946 he was elected president of the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations and became chairman of its Security and Armaments Group (SAG).

THE DULLES POLICY: 'INSULATION' AGAINST COMMUNISM

Allen Dulles' astute assessment was that Germany was vitally important to any European economic recovery, that Europe could not return to normality or prosperity with Germany disorganized, that it would be the site where the future predominance of the Soviet or American economic and political systems in Europe would be determined, and that clashes between the US and the USSR were almost inevitable. But his conclusion from that was that the 'insulating' of the two systems offered the only prospect for a lasting peace. According to Wala, discussion at a SAG meeting on May 28, 1946, at which Dulles advocated the unification of the three western zones of Germany, became in effect a nucleus for future American policy in Europe. The clear implication was that the Soviet Union would have to reject a proposal for the reunification of Germany and that if it were offered it would provide the trigger for the 'insulation' of the two systems. And the State Department edged towards the formulation of an American plan for recovery in Europe, changing to top gear after Marshall and his delegation – including Dulles – returned from the conference of Foreign Ministers in Moscow in late April 1947.²³⁸

When the Marshall plan-in-outline was announced on June 5 there was no spontaneous outpouring of support within the United States where, according to Dulles, "the significance of Marshall's speech was not grasped immediately." The immediate and somewhat cynical Soviet response was one of antagonism to the US interfering in European affairs and resistance to "interference in the domestic affairs of small nations by the big powers." There was no doubt that the US, Britain and France were dabbling in the affairs of small nations in Europe, the Middle East and Asia, but the Soviet Union was equally guilty of direct intervention in the affairs of small nations such as Yugoslavia, Hungary and other Eastern European and Central Asian nations in its bid to secure its grip on the region. However the British and French governments also reacted quickly and somewhat more favourably, and there was an exchange of diplomatic communication across the channel. They each saw that the new direction in US policy could be “a milestone” in European history, depending on how the policy related to the Soviet Union and the consequent impact on European politics, and an opportunity for them to recover some of their lost economic and political strength.

Anglo-US relations had been disrupted by a number of disagreements including whether Britain should be treated as a separate economic power or an integrated unit of Europe, especially as a large “piecemeal” Anglo-American loan agreed to in 1946 was regarded as a failure.²³⁹ The French government's response was largely determined by its struggle to suppress rapidly growing domestic support for Communism. However their response was portrayed for US consumption as somewhat enthusiastic. Although Britain's response, along with France, had been prompt it was made in the context of an unresolved debate over the question of an Anglo-Western European customs union which had been in progress for two years. Bevin was convinced that Britain's security depended on close cooperation with the United States as well as with Western Europe and the government grasped at an opportunity to recover some of its dwindling authority and dissipated economic power by participating in the process which Marshall had initiated, rather than by standing aloof from it. It hoped to persuade the US that there were special grounds for it to receive assistance without being ‘lumped’ together with Europe and being reduced to “a mere appendage” of the US with a relationship with it comparable to the one ‘between the USSR and Yugoslavia.’ It also hoped to reconcile its ties to the Commonwealth and the Sterling area with its membership of a Western European group.²⁴⁰

Both governments, of Britain and France, therefore consulted the State Department and in doing so triggered a flurry of politicking in the US administration. On June 12 Marshall announced that his proposal was intended to encompass the European portion of the Soviet Union. Three days later former President Hoover (whose major report in March had argued that German economic restoration was necessary for European rehabilitation) wrote to the Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee to point out that there would be great danger if the US were to drain its own economy and impair productivity. He said that unless “this one Gibraltar of economic strength is maintained chaos will be inevitable over the whole world” and “as the result of our rate of giving and lending we are over-exporting goods and cannot continue at such a rate with our present production and consumption without further evil consequences to our stability.”²⁴¹ On June 17 Bevin flew to Paris for discussions with the French government, and on June 22 Truman appointed a series of three committees to study US resources and capabilities in relation to the Marshall Plan. While intense discussions continued between the US, Britain and France an invitation was extended for Molotov to join in further talks in Paris. By the time he arrived on June 26 some of the ‘smaller nations’ of Eastern Europe, including Poland and Yugoslavia, had shown tentative interest in cooperating in the Marshall Plan while Britain and the US, unable to reconcile some of their major differences, had turned to the preparation of a paper which summarised their areas of agreement and therefore provided a basis for further negotiations.

Molotov had good reason to suspect that Britain and France had conspired with the US to devise a plan which would disadvantage the Soviet Union. When it desperately needed a strong Soviet war effort against Germany, the US had agreed to include the USSR in the Lend-Lease plan. (Chapter 24) The first loan, approved by Roosevelt on October 30, 1941, was for $US1billion with no interest and no repayments to be made until five years after the end of the war,²⁴² and loans in cash and kind had reached $US10billion (compared with $US16billion²⁴³ for Britain and total US war expenditure of $US349billion²⁴⁴) about the time of the German surrender, after which, on August 17, 1945, aid to the USSR was terminated “abruptly and not very diplomatically.” Subsequently, between the end of the war and the approval of the Marshall Plan, the US expended or appropriated a further $US15billion to relief and reconstruction ²⁴⁵, but when the Soviet government, whose need for reconstruction funds was certainly at least as great as the Western Allies, requested a further $US6billion in loans on the same terms as the Lend-Lease loans the request was rejected. Late in 1945 the Soviet government indicated that in the circumstances it regarded the troop losses which it had suffered in the fight against Germany and Japan as recompense for its Lend-Lease debt and the whole matter ‘stalled.’ ²⁴⁶

Against that background, and with the general understanding that if an aid program were to benefit the whole of Europe the Soviet Union would be entitled to a substantial share of the aid, the talks quickly became “mired in differences over the American demands.” Of major concern were five issues: America’s demands for European integration; German re-integration; German participation in the recovery plan prior to the four powers reaching an agreement on a German Peace Treaty; whether France was prepared to forego reparations in order to raise the level of German industry and encourage European recovery; and whether Russia was prepared to make concessions to enable the countries which Bidault termed its ‘hungry satellites’ to take part in the plan.

With none of these issues resolved, with the US not prepared to announce its conditions or its guarantees under the plan, and with the Soviet Union unwilling to relinquish control of the economies of its Eastern bloc ‘satellites’ there was a stalemate. Molotov’s counter proposal was that the Europeans should draft their own recovery programs, that the US should announce its conditions and guarantees and that negotiation of US aid should then proceed. When this was rejected he announced on July 2 that the Soviet Union would not collaborate in the integrated plan for the revival of the economies of Europe because it would mean that smaller countries would lose their former economic and national independence at the dictates of the United States. He withdrew from the conference and warned that American policy would divide rather than unify the Continent.²⁴⁷

DIVISION! WHERE DOES THE BLAME LIE?

The political and propaganda battle by the Western Powers of the USA, Britain and France “to heap all the blame on the Soviets” for the division of Europe began in earnest.²⁴⁸ Within hours of Molotov's announcement, invitations to a conference in Paris on July 12 were sent on behalf of France and Britain (as a joint initiative with the US) to 22 of Europe's 27 sovereign countries. The invitations had obviously been prepared in advance in anticipation of the Soviet withdrawal – which Bevin and Bidault had both hoped for ²⁴⁹– because they set out a proposal for a European Committee with six sub-committees to be set up in a self-help framework with assistance from the United States and in consultation with the United Nations. The sub-committees were to deal with food supplies and agriculture, power, transport, raw materials, equipment, and iron and steel. The countries excluded were the fascist-leaning Franco's Spain; Germany, because it was under divided administration; and the Soviet Union because it had withdrawn. After much dissension within the Eastern bloc over whether to participate, fourteen countries accepted their invitations (although the Scandinavian countries attached the conditions that the conference would not bypass the United Nations, interfere with their trade in Eastern Europe or compromise their neutrality), making the total of European participants sixteen, and nine declined. The “insulation” of the two political and economic systems which Dulles was so eager to see was beginning to take effect. In quick succession, between July 3 and 29, trade pacts based on a barter system were signed between the Soviet Union and six of the countries which the West soon labelled as ‘satellites.’

In the meantime, although the British and French secured support for the establishment of the Committee on European Economic Cooperation (CEEC), the Paris Conference and a subsequent tripartite US-British-French conference in London were marked by acrimonious debate over the nature and purposes of the Recovery Program. In particular France pressed for its security and independence to be protected and made a major issue of the impact of Germany's preferential industrial redevelopment on reparations transfers – the very issue which Bidault had refused to discuss with Molotov. Britain and the US remained at loggerheads over the recovery of Britain's position as the main benefactor in a linked Commonwealth economic bloc; there was no consensus on the relationship of Britain, France and Germany within the proposed structure; and the US aim of Soviet containment hung like a pall over every discussion.

At the same time the political response within the United States was such that legislative approval for a large scale foreign aid program to finance the Marshall Plan seemed unlikely. When the administration had reached broad agreement that the plan and the necessary finance budget should be pushed through Congress a campaign with multiple prongs, some aimed at each of the conservative Republican business community, the broad voter base, and Congress itself was agreed to. However little had been done until a House Select Committee on Foreign Aid was established on July 15, three days after the convening of the sixteen-nation conference in Paris which went on to constitute the CEEC. Then on September 22 the US administration received a jolt to its confidence when the CEEC report was received with an estimate for the extent of US aid required: $US29billion. Under-secretary of State Clayton was immediately directed to negotiate a reduction in the estimate and, with growing concern that the plan would be thrown out by Congress, a Committee for the Marshall Plan to Aid European Recovery was established with a former Secretary for War (Henry L. Stimson) as chairman and on October 1 another former Secretary for War (Robert P. Patterson) was approached to form a Citizens' Committee for the Marshall Plan. The formation of that committee was still a matter of correspondence between senior political figures when the manifesto of the Cominform – the nine Communist-governed countries of eastern Europe – was announced on October 5 as a Soviet response to the establishment of the CEEC. It's claim that the Truman-Marshall Plan was only a farce and “a European branch of the general world plan of political expansion being realized by the United States of America in all parts of the world”²⁵⁰ made it all the more necessary for the promoters of the Marshall Plan to defend and conceal the motives of self-interest on which the plan was actually based. But their task was made somewhat easier because Yugoslavia and Poland, two of the countries which had shown interest in the Marshall Plan, were among the eight which had been co-opted into the Comintern by the Soviet Union. Their inclusion offered an excellent opportunity for divisive manipulation. The others were Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, plus the Communist Parties of France and Italy.

Accordingly, on December 10, a vigorous effort was initiated to recruit “four or five top-level business executives as ... aggressive witnesses” to appear before the Senate Select Committee on Foreign Relations. Dulles was one of them. By the time Truman submitted an executive report to Congress on December 19 the CEEC estimate had been pared down to $US22billion over a four year period. Then, according to Wala: “Energetically, persuasively, and intelligently, using lobbying, advertisements, and business strategies ... Dulles and the other members of the Committee [for the Marshall Plan] accomplished their envisioned goal and induced Congress to believe that the American people overwhelmingly supported Marshall's initiative.”²⁵¹ Thus an American initiative – the Marshall Plan – which had national self-preservation and aggrandisement as its primary purpose well-camouflaged under a veneer of humanitarian aid, became a major factor in the division of the world. And, also in Wala's words: “The Committee for the Marshall Plan, created to sell the Marshall Plan to a reluctant public and a skeptical Congress, represented the most explicit attempt to shape public opinion during the beginning of the Cold War.”²⁵² [Emphasis added.]

AN OBSTACLE TO DECOLONIZATION, NEW WORLD SHAPE

The importance and success of the Marshall Plan have generally been debated and disputed in economic terms and it has been said that although it was aimed at remaking Europe in an American mode “the participating countries were not clay in the hands of American potters” and “in the end America was made the European way.”²⁵³ However to consider it in that limited context is not enough. Its long term impact on world social and political relationships was enormous and it disrupted the reshaping of the world community which was already under way. World history is littered with attempts by nations to expand their power, to exploit other people and their resources, and to build empires with which to gain pre-eminence. It is also marked – or marred – by the efforts of the church to develop such universal power and influence that it could become the sole determinant of the world's morals and ethics and its social, economic and political systems. Now, at a critical stage in world development, when the trouble in the triangle was reaching its dramatic pivotal point, the self-defensive interests of the United States and the church coincided. The actions which they would take during the next generation either in collusion, in collaboration or simply coincidentally would compound the world's problems and make it increasingly difficult to disentangle the trouble in the triangle but, at the same time, even more urgent that it should be disentangled.

Dulles began drafting his book The Marshall Plan during December 47, intending it to be a campaign centrepiece, and it was completed and ready for the publisher some time in January 1948. However the committee so skilfully exploited Congressional fears of the rising influence of communism in Europe, including the cabinet crisis in Czechoslovakia which led to Communists gaining control in February, while the Aid Bills were before Congress, that the Bills were given an unexpectedly easy passage through Congress in March. It was therefore deemed unnecessary to proceed with publication of the Dulles book. While the Bills were before Congress the Commander-in-Chief, European Command, General Lucius Clay, "reached for the panic button" when he read an intelligence report on the rising influence of the Communists, and triggered a 'war scare' in Washington so that "near hysteria gripped the US Government." Contrary to all other advice, including that of Allen Dulles who was one of those who reviewed the intelligence reports, Clay wrote that: "... I have felt a subtle change in the Soviet attitude which I cannot define but which now gives me a feeling that it [war] may come with dramatic suddenness. ..." ²⁵⁴ Although the CIA didn't fully agree with him, it was happy to take full advantage of his report and the panic in Congress and the campaign for the Italian elections in April (see above, 'A touch of foreign aid') was one result.

The eventual publication of The Marshall Plan in 1993 as a contribution to historical study ²⁵⁵ was of enormous importance. It exposes, for all the world to see, the motives behind the self-interest plan and the manipulation which not only enabled the United States to avoid a national economic and socio-political catastrophe but also enabled it to consolidate and extend its economic and political influence. In addition the plan precipitated the restructuring of Europe to a pattern which was unlikely to have been implemented otherwise and entrenched the gulf between two competing economic and political systems instead of encouraging diversity and development. And as we shall see, some other consequences of the United States' dominance of world affairs and its determination to retain a position of dominance, was that the first stage of the decolonization process which had already commenced was distorted; the process of globalization was accelerated; self-determination and independence movements were suppressed (contrary to the intentions of the United Nations); and an era of ethnic tensions on a scale which was not anticipated was unleashed.

In chapter one of The Marshall Plan Dulles set out an explanation of the rise of the European powers, concentrating on the value of their empires, especially Britain's, and said a healthy and prosperous Europe was essential if there was to be peace in the world. He then discussed the factors which, he said, would limit Europe's influence in relation to the Soviet Union and the rest of the world, and set out the pattern of US economic intervention which was required from both America's and Europe's point of view. Some extracts illustrate the dominant philosophy on which the US has planned and worked since the end of the Second World War, and the reasons why the push for decolonization faltered and then took a new direction. Self-determination came into play much more quickly than the Western world expected when the UN trusteeship arrangements were agreed to, but political colonialism was succeeded by foreign economic domination in a manner which has led progressively to political turmoil in the decolonized world. This has made the people of the economically developing non-western world and their leaders appear incompetent in the eyes of the Western world and has led to massive indebtedness with economic and social crises for which the Western world's medicine has been more of the same.

Dulles noted that:

*The British had had the good fortune to start off in the modern era with an empire, a sea-going tradition, a steam engine and great supplies of coal and iron. The Americans had had the good luck to start with an enormous country, plenty of resources and little interference.*²⁵⁶

*Since 1750 Europe's population has nearly quadrupled. Foreign sources of raw materials were being developed as populations to process them in Western Europe grew. Tariffs for the most part were low.²⁵⁷ ... England, as the great manufacturing, industrial and financial centre of the Empire, got raw materials from everywhere and sold the product everywhere.²⁵⁸ ... On the surface it seemed as though the Empire was unshakable – but under the surface a great revolution was taking place. ... Britain exported not only goods for use but also machinery and process, as well as the know-how. It was certain to follow, as night follows day, that the very countries which took machines and processes from Britain must presently begin to manufacture for themselves.*²⁵⁹

Then, after some discussion on the First and Second World Wars and the US contribution to production patterns:

An effort was made between World War I and II to restore the old Europe, but it was a Europe gerrymandered by a rigid application of the rule of self-determination and characterized by extreme nationalism, untempered by economic good sense.

*The principle of self-determination, high and noble in itself, has dangerous implications in the economic field. There is good reason to believe that Woodrow Wilson himself appreciated this. The Fourteen Points, the basis for the peace, did not advocate any broad principle of self-determination. The people of Austria-Hungary and of Turkey were to be assured "autonomous" development. It was only later, as nationalism got out of hand, that autonomy came to signify independence. And with this came the idea that all peoples everywhere should be entitled to transform themselves into nationally sovereign states despite the economic and the human wreckage that this principle carried with it in many parts of the world. Self-government implies self-restraint and must be imbedded in traditions of tolerance. When we start out to give this principle worldwide application overnight, we are subjecting the economy of the world to a grievous strain, as we found in the days between the two wars and as we find today.*²⁶⁰ [Emphasis added.]

Dulles was illustrating with great clarity the dominant self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel that the rest of the world existed for its benefit and that anything which rocked its boat was bad. He was saying, in effect: 'We can go and grab their resources, but we must not share our technology with others. We might lose our advantage. It's OK for us to steal other people's technology under the guise of reparations or as the trophies of war (chapters 17, 26) but don't share it around. The others might catch up.' He then put it quite plainly, saying of Europe:

It will need to pool its resources, reduce its cost of production, develop a large measure of free trade within the European area, reduce its population by emigration, and redouble its efforts to develop in those areas of the world where it still has overseas and colonial possessions, particularly Africa, new sources of raw materials, commodities, and wherever possible, foodstuffs. The spirit of enterprise which built up the British Empire needs to be rekindled. There are still economic worlds open to peaceful conquest.²⁶¹ [Emphasis added.]

The parody of Mein Kampf was still unfolding. Dulles seemed oblivious to the fact that he had spelled out exactly the policies which Hitler had sought to put into effect and for which the world had supposedly gone to war. The only difference was, as already mentioned, (chapters 18, 19), that Hitler did not want to do it in Africa. He wanted his source of resources and his space for emigrants, his Lebensraum, on his doorstep in Eastern Europe. Dulles really warmed to his subject later in the book.

... Western Europe does not produce metals and minerals in sufficient quantity to satisfy its own requirements and is to some extent competing with the United States for the exportable surpluses of Latin America and the British Dominions. Consequently, the homelands of the sixteen nations would not be able to assist us directly in this respect.

However the colonial territories of these countries have important underdeveloped resources. Here production might be expanded so that the normal world markets would not be affected. The critical materials in the Herter committee's²⁶² estimation include tin from the Far East; nickel, copper, lead and zinc from Canada; manganese, chrome ore and asbestos from South Africa; manganese and mica from India; cobalt and tin from Belgian Congo; and manganese from the Gold Coast ...

That we have a national need for these strategic materials is already recognized. We don't propose to be caught again in another emergency where we are dependant on the maintenance of long sea lanes to reach supplies essential to our protection. The United States is already committed to a large scale program for the stockpiling of strategic materials. ... [but] ... As the Herter committee ... states, "large stockpiles can be accumulated only by expanding total world production."

*We should not take a defeatist attitude about the resources of the world. The great era of exploration and development which preceded World War I ... is not necessarily at an end. Africa holds out great opportunities. Over the years, through exploration, development, reclamation, and the use of modern techniques in turning deserts into gardens, Africa may yet prove to be the salvation of a Europe that is starving for new sources of raw materials. America's skill and technique, its engineering and organizational genius, might well be linked with that of Europe. In this way we can help Europe to develop new resources for its own recovery, and Europe can help us by developing materials in short supply in the United States.*²⁶³

Without realizing the significance of his remark, and showing a lack of understanding of human and international relations, an assumption that armed might must always prevail, and the same pathetic US-Euro-centricity of thinking which characterizes the amorphous Christian gel, he had already written:

*As to petroleum products, the need for the conservation of our own diminishing oil resources points to the desirability of building up these imports at least to balance any exports we may send to Europe.*²⁶⁴

Then finally, dealing specifically with US foreign policy, Dulles wrote:

*Fortunately there is no reason to believe that Russia contemplates overt military aggression. ... If Russia moves it will be far more subtly. By bringing about the internal disintegration of the states which she wishes to incorporate, she hopes to absorb them into her direct sphere of influence without resorting to open warfare. Today Russia's major effort is directed against West Europe for today it is vulnerable. This then becomes the area for the employment of strategic American economic power. We must recognize, however, that tomorrow Russia might shift the pressure from Europe to the Middle or Far East. Our announced policy ... is to help towards building up the economic life and defensive power of threatened states to a point where these subtler Soviet methods will be ineffective. Our help is to be primarily through economic and financial aid. It is to be given to support free people who are attempting to resist subjugation. ... we do not propose, if we can help it, to permit a great power, with a system incompatible with ours, to overrun Europe or Asia.*²⁶⁵

Self-interest reigned supreme. And having already confirmed, without realizing it, that his policy for the US was hand in hand with Hitler's, he also confirmed the validity of Japan's bid to eject the European colonial powers from Asia. He wrote:

Looking back, historically, our first major objective in foreign policy was to get Europe out of the North American continent so as to have no unpleasantly strong neighbours right here in our midst. ... The second great objective was to get and keep Europe out of this hemisphere; hence the Monroe Doctrine, and later the war with Spain.

If it was justified for the young Europe, the New Israel of the United States, with exactly the same racial, ethnic and cultural heritage as old Europe, to want the European powers out of its region, how much more justified was it for Japan, with a distinctly different racial, ethnic and cultural heritage to want to eject the overbearing European intruders from its region? As if to undo the implicit admission which he had just made, Dulles went on to write:

*The Open Door in China was in some respects the counterpart in Asia of the Monroe Doctrine in South America. But here it took a somewhat different turn. The Open Door was not an exclusion act, but a Sherman Anti-Trust Law in foreign relations. We wanted no one to have a monopoly, but everyone to have reasonable equality of opportunity within a framework which protected the integrity and sovereignty of China. It was emphasis on this latter development of the Open Door policy, the insistence on Chinese national integrity, which was the forerunner of the Hull policy, and eventually brought us into conflict with Japan.*²⁶⁶

Pathetic perpetuation of a myth. Dulles may not have had an intimate personal knowledge of the processes which Roosevelt had overseen in his bid to take the United States into the war by courtesy of an attack by Japan, but he was certainly well informed. He had served much of the war years as head of the Office of Strategic Studies and at the time that he wrote that book he was one of a team of three lawyers jointly drafting the legislation for the establishment of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).²⁶⁷ Unfortunately such tactics work because people can only retain a certain amount of historical detail, and the success of policies of selective reporting, misinformation and conspiracies of silence, underpinned by the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel, had been well demonstrated during the previous ten years. In addition he was writing for an audience whose immediate interest was exactly the same as his: propping up and building on a position of privilege.

THE ORIGINS OF THE ARMS RACE

That pattern of events which unfolded progressively from 1947–48 could not have occurred in the manner it did if the United States had not been, for a crucial period, the only power armed with nuclear weapons. It must therefore be noted again that the development of nuclear weapons at the time and in the circumstances that it occurred was a direct outcome of the trouble in the triangle. (Chapter 22) While no American leaders, either political or religious, were prepared to recognize the nature of the trouble in the triangle or its theological significance they were very quick to use selective religious belief to justify the secretive and exclusive control of nuclear weapons. It was argued or implied that the technology had been entrusted to the New Israel – the leading Christian nation which was rapidly becoming Judeo-Christian – under some Divine imperative and therefore only the United States could be trusted with nuclear weapons. This, according to its self-understanding, confirmed or justified America's 'right' to make the rules for the rest of the world and to act as both its policeman and its judge as well as its director of operations. It was God's own country. But as we have seen (chapter 14) the development of Communism was a very direct challenge to the Christian church and its amorphous Christian gel, and a significant factor in the trouble in the triangle, the development of the American work ethic and the economic systems linked with it occurred under the umbrella of the American self-understanding as the New Israel, and the confrontation between the US-led Western Christian World and the Communist Soviet Union was therefore also an aspect or an extension of that trouble in the triangle.

The United States could not have maintained its arrogant stand towards the Soviet Union if there had been military parity and the whole pattern of relationships and developments would have been different. And the manipulation of information and public opinion which the administration found necessary to ensure the passage of the Marshall Plan was just as blatant, just as serious, and driven by much the same motives, as the British government's manipulation of information and the media during the years immediately prior to the Second World War. At one level the plan was promoted as self-sacrifice in the interests of humanitarian aid, while at another level it was promoted as a counter to the Soviet threat – in spite of the fact that Dulles and the US government acknowledged that “there is no reason to believe that Russia contemplates overt military aggression.”²⁶⁸ American planners were so pre-occupied with self interest that no key officials seriously considered the threat that a comprehensive and transnational European recovery program might pose for Soviet security.²⁶⁹ But, after Molotov had withdrawn from (or been manoeuvred out of) the Paris conference, Dulles acknowledged that as a participant in any plan for European reconstruction Russia could have claimed a substantial share of any credits or new lend-lease aid and admitted that the decision Russia had to make was difficult and dangerous.²⁷⁰ He wrote that Russians were afraid of military encirclement, determined to expand their territory and influence, and arrogant in their doctrinaire conviction that in Marx they had a full set of answers for the future. ²⁷¹ When the United States forced the Soviet Union into a decision for ‘insulated’ development, confident that it could restrain its rival by virtue of its exclusive nuclear capacity, it left the Soviet Union with no option but to develop its own military capacity as a counter balance and ensured that a nuclear arms race would result. At the same time there were other countries which, regardless of whether they had any expansionist ambitions of their own, were not prepared to be dictated to by the US as the sole nuclear power. The United States had already undermined any moral claim which it could have made to be the international policeman.

However the depth of antagonism which the US demonstrated towards Russia, the economic division of Europe, US efforts to prevent normal relations between Russia and its Asian neighbours and to prevent ‘Communist infiltration’ into other Asian countries (especially considering that the bulk of the Soviet Union was in fact Asian) and America's blatant propaganda use of a threat from Russia, had a snow-balling effect. The perceived need to avoid a threat became the argument and the justification for the development of increased nuclear arms capacity and more advanced nuclear technology. Thus the Soviet Union could only attain nuclear weapons capacity and military and political parity and security in a mad scramble which became economically debilitating and led to much irresponsible technical corner-cutting. This in turn led to a series of crises for Europe and the whole world some years later, notably the degradation of the Chernobyl nuclear reactors and the Russian fleet of nuclear submarines, which helped to focus world attention on the follies of over-exploitation of nuclear technology.

However in apportioning the blame for that situation the Western World's politicians have focussed very narrowly and with great glee on the apparent failures of Marxist theory and Communist practice rather than on the origins of the crisis.

It has been argued that the origins of the arms race and the Cold War lie in Russia's decision in 1943 to place agents in the West to obtain American nuclear research secrets by buying them, by espionage or by blackmail. In one sense that is correct, and once negotiations towards atomic arms control broke down in 1946, relations between the US and the USSR deteriorated steadily and a technological and arms race was inevitable. But responsibility for the breakdown in negotiations did not rest solely with the USSR. The US Congress, military authorities and the White House could not agree over the sharing of nuclear research or, as the hard liners put it, 'giving away nuclear secrets.' The 'Fortress America' mentality was taking hold and influential figures, including politicians, could not see that a policy of bluff and secrecy was unsustainable. They were moving towards an air offence strategy which was designed to hold the world to ransom and in submission by exploiting the destructive and psychological power of atomic weapons. Peace, or the absence of war anyway, would be maintained because the United States would hold the balance of terror.

When a committee was appointed to draft proposals for the international control of atomic energy, it produced the Acheson-Lilienthal Report which called for a UN authority to survey and control all uranium deposits and ensure that atomic research was conducted for peaceful purposes only. It proposed that when controls were in place, the US would relinquish its arsenal and make its scientific information available to the world community. But Truman's security adviser, Baruch, insisted that no member of the Security Council should be able to veto a UN decision on an issue of atomic use or weapons. His insistence that the UN had to accept the US plan without change was unacceptable. The Soviet Union called for the immediate prohibition of all manufacture and use of atomic weapons and measures to ensure compliance, but without a change to the Security Council veto system. This meant that the United States would have to give up its monopoly and make public all of its data in return for a promise of compliance. Gromyko, for the Soviet Union, insisted that what the United States was asking for was that all other countries reveal the state of their own research before it would give up its arsenal. The cause of international control of atomic energy was set back a long way and the world was heading for a long period of sustained fear of atomic war on an un-grand scale.

Other factors which contributed to the arms race and the cold war included Russians insistence on total control of Poland; the decision by the Western Powers to integrate the British and American zones of occupation in Germany into one economic zone, announced in May 1947; and the subsequent unilateral decision announced by the United States in July 1947 to end punitive measures against Germany and to make West Germany economically self-sufficient. Affairs in Europe were becoming a game of 'tit for tat' between the USA and the USSR. When the Communist Party seized power in Czechoslovakia, backed by the Soviet Union, in February 1948, to prevent the Benes government from participating in the Marshall Plan, the Western Powers hit the panic button.

Britain's Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin had been pressing the idea of an organization of Western European states since December, and he now told his colleagues that the situation was so critical that the next six to eight weeks (to the end of March or mid April) would decide the future of Europe. He said that resolute action was necessary to prevent the slide from crisis to crisis which had characterized the 1930's and prevent the sovietization of Europe. Talks began in Paris on March 4. A week later Bevin told the US and Canada that a Western European alliance was not the real answer and that they, plus all of the Atlantic coast countries of Europe should establish a formal alliance. However, six days later, March 17, the more limited Treaty of Brussels was signed. An agreement between the nations of Belgium, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom, it provided for collective defense, cooperation in social, cultural and economic matters, the establishment of a West German government and the introduction of a West Germany currency. The Russians thereupon walked out of the Allied Control Council and the situation became more tense. Secret talks began in Washington on March 22 and, on April 1, US, British and Canadian delegates endorsed a Pentagon proposal for a North Atlantic Pact with US participation.²⁷²

However, getting a United States' commitment to military involvement in Europe was a different matter to accepting its assistance and intervention under the Marshall Plan. Serious reservations began to surface in Washington and on April 6 Bevin told Attlee:

We shall be lucky if the President and the American Senatorial leaders pronounce in favour of a treaty binding the US for the first time in history to accept positive obligations in the way of the defence of her natural associates and friends. ²⁷³

Some hard bargaining was about to begin. It was election year again and Truman could not afford to have the issue of funding for the European Recovery Program confused by possible American involvement in a military alliance in Europe. Then during June reports reached London and Washington about tensions in the Comintern which might weaken the Soviet Union's position and reduce the pressure from Communists in the Western countries. Russia was trying to draw Poland and Yugoslavia back into line after their flirtation with the US and the West over the Marshall Plan. It was having difficulties. Yugoslavia had mixed motives for wanting to follow a more independent path. Tito did not like the idea of being totally subject to Russian policy; he saw the possibility of his country being the focal point for a group of Socialist or Communist countries in South Eastern Europe; and he wanted to be free to mix his economy and to relate to any other country. He could not. Or so he was told. Yugoslavia was expelled from the Comintern, its headquarters were moved from Belgrade to Bucharest, Romania; and in a bid to undermine Tito's personal position, Yugoslavia was placed under a Soviet embargo. Stalin determined to tighten his grip on the other satellite or suzerain states.

On June 24, he retaliated against the Western powers for their action in merging the western zones of Germany. It was announced that as a consequence of their action the four-power administration of Berlin was null and void, and the Western Allies no longer had any rights in the city. An immediate military blockade was imposed on all roads and rail routes from the western occupied sectors to Berlin. A military build up began so that during the months which followed, Soviet forces in East Germany were increased to 40 divisions compared with eight Allied divisions in West Germany. It was immediately apparent that the treaty partners could do little to break the blockade on their own, short of a war which would do them no good at all, and the Soviet Union had complete control of the German capital. The US response was prompt. Next day, the 25th, Britain was advised that talks towards a NATO Pact could begin in Washington on the 29th, only three days later, involving Britain, Canada and the Brussels Pact powers,²⁷⁴ and on the 26th it began an airlift of food, fuel, machinery and other supplies into West Berlin, in cooperation with Britain. The airlift would continue for eleven months and deliver 2.3 million tonnes of supplies at a cost of $US224,000,000. It would take nearly that long for the twelve countries concerned to agree to the structure, politics, costs and operational responsibilities of a pact, but NATO came into existence on April 4, 1949. That was not the reason for the lifting of the Soviet blockade. Nor was the adoption of a constitution for the Federal Republic of Germany on May 8. The Western powers had imposed a counter blockade, cutting all communications with East Germany and placing an embargo on all strategic exports from the Soviet Eastern bloc. The economic impact of that counter-blockade was greater than the political benefits which the Soviet Union might gain by keeping its Berlin Blockade going.

But those issues do not identify the origins of the arms race crisis and the Cold War. They exacerbated the arms race and were part of the Cold War. The origins of the crisis lie in a series of decisions by the United States. The first was its decision not to disclose the development of the first atomic bomb to Soviet leaders. The second was to use the bomb, twice, against Japan when it was totally unnecessary. That decision exposed US motives and intentions to use its 'secret' weapon to achieve an unassailable position of privilege in world affairs. The steps which it had taken to prevent other nations from having access to fissionable materials then confirmed that intention. Then the systematic exploitation of the economic and technical benefits which had fallen into its lap as a consequence of the Second World War – to enhance its nuclear capacity in a bid to entrench its position as the world's leading post or neo-colonial power – and the subsequent callous manipulation of the European Recovery Program (the Marshall Plan) to avoid the collapse of its own economic system, simply confirmed Soviet determination that it would not be subjugated. And a glance further back shows that the real origin of the crisis – the issue which provided the opportunities for the United States to take advantage of – was the failure of the church and the associated powers of the white amorphous Christian gel, Britain in particular, to recognize the trouble in the triangle and the parody of Mein Kampf. The longer they remained unrecognized, and the more strident the efforts of the United States to take advantages of their unrecognized consequences, the more complex and critical the consequences became, and the more difficult to unravel them.

There is little doubt that human history and world development would have taken a substantially different direction if the United States had decided to share the mass of nuclear technology which had become available to it as a consequence of Hitler's rise to power and his unrelenting pressure on the Jewish community in Germany prior to the outbreak of the Second World War as a vital piece in the jigsaw puzzle of the trouble in the triangle. Such a decision would have fostered the use of nuclear physics preferentially for peaceful purposes. However, the United States chose to promote and exploit an image of itself as the pinnacle of Western Judeo-Christian culture, understanding and commitment, and the idea that its pre-eminence was a prerequisite to world security and peace. Its propagandists ruthlessly misrepresented or ignored the history of international relations, the factors which determined the evolution of Marxism and Communism, the United Nations' commitment to decolonization and self-determination, and the pattern of exploitation of foreign resources. It found ready disciples among those countries which aspired to similar wealth in the shadow of the pinnacle through political and economic alliances, as well as reluctant collaborators such as Britain.

In the Western World few people were inclined or able to refute the American position and those in the United States who tried to do so were denigrated as 'Commies', ostracised and often hounded out of office or business. The Cold War and the arms race were becoming a total distraction and the justification – or the excuse – for the West to tighten its grip on the countries of the degraded colonial empires while the crisis in the Middle East rolled on and also became entangled in the web of East-West intrigue. So: back to UNSCOP and Palestine.

UNSCOP, STERN AND THE EXODUS AFFAIR

About the time that the Marshall Plan received its first airing at Harvard, after some days of meetings in New York, and in a bid to pacify Arab feelings by distancing UNSCOP from the hub of Zionist advertising, the decision was taken that the committee should make on-the-spot investigations in Palestine. When members arrived on June 15 they found deepening chaos. The extremist Zionist Irgun and Stern terrorist groups were targeting the British, without much discrimination; the British military forces were responding; and militant Arab groups were targeting the Jews. UNSCOP knew that the efforts of extremist Zionist organizations to disrupt British administration in Palestine and to increase the flow of illegal immigrants had deeply divided the Jewish community in the United States as well as antagonising Britain; public sentiment in Britain was turning against the Zionist cause and the government's attitude had hardened.

Then in the early hours of the morning on July 12, the President Warfield sailed from the port of Sete where it had taken on board 4,500 refugees from camps in Poland and Germany whose only 'payment' for the voyage was an undertaking that they would fight.²⁷⁵ The vessel sailed without a pilot but the French authorities had given Britain an assurance that it would not be permitted to sail. So much for international cooperation in discouraging illegal immigration. Bevin protested and French Foreign Minister Georges Bidault agreed that France would cooperate if the British obliged the ship to return to France. It was sighted by British aircraft and a Royal Navy vessel shadowed it, demanding on July 16 that it surrender. It made contact with Hagana by radio, was renamed Exodus 1947 and sailed on, being boarded by marines from two of four destroyers which were sent to intercept it in the early hours of July 18 in international waters off Haifa. The hand-to-hand battle which followed was broadcast live to the world by Hagana's transmitters for two hours until, just when the navy commander was about to report failure, retreat, and advise the British army in Palestine to be ready to arrest the crew and passengers when the vessel beached, the senior Hagana officer ordered the captain to place the vessel under British command. He believed it was achieving its primary purpose of demonstrating to the world how helpless the Jews were in the face of British cruelty and he did not wish to risk the passengers' lives. As it was three died, 28 were hospitalized and about 200 needed first aid.

Every drop of propaganda value was squeezed from the grizzly episode by the Revd. John Grauel as the UNSCOP chairman and two members, plus numerous reporters and cameramen witnessed the arrival of the vessel in Haifa under escort and the transshipment of the battered refugees onto British ships for their voyage back to France. As a result of that incident the UNSCOP chairman, Emil Sandstrom, decided that the committee should visit refugee camps in Europe before submitting its final report to the United Nations.

A provisional report had already been provided to the governments directly concerned, and the British cabinet was due to meet two days later, July 20, to consider it. When it met, the majority report, favouring partition, was regarded as "manifestly unjust to the Arabs" and the minority report, favouring a two-state federation, as "fundamentally marred" because it called for a high level of cooperation which was not considered achievable.²⁷⁶ The Colonial Office had estimated the cost of maintaining order under the mandate at 30 million pounds per annum,²⁷⁷ and the Chiefs of Staff were still against withdrawal unless the Arabs could be convinced that it was dictated by Britain's refusal to implement a solution which was unjust to them, in which case "there is some hope of recovering a part of our strategic position and requirements." The result: the decision to withdraw was approved "with an air of anti-climax ... automatic and virtually uncontested."²⁷⁸

Then when the refugees reached Port-de-Bouc on July 29 the French would only accept those who disembarked voluntarily and all but a handful of them refused to do so. After two more days of horrific press reports of "a floating Auschwitz" and British naval brutality (aggravated by the gruesome murder of two British army sergeants in Palestine following the hanging of two Irgun guerillas for their part in the mass escape of Jewish and Arab prisoners) the British government made an error of political judgement which it had been very carefully manoeuvred into. It decided that the refugees who refused to disembark in France would be sailed on to Hamburg, Germany, and forced to return to displaced persons' camps.²⁷⁹ The long-running adverse publicity for Britain was given a further boost when the refugees were forcefully disembarked on September 8. It is said to have "sealed public support for partition in America."²⁸⁰ But their immediate experience of the Exodus 1947 incident had a more significant influence on some members of the UNSCOP team, notably the Swedish chairman, Sandstrom, Garcia-Granados of Guatemala, and Simic of Yugoslavia, who are said to have been convinced that an extension of the British mandate was not an option.²⁸¹ To add to Britain's woes, it was during that long-running Exodus 1947 episode, on August 14-15, and while the UNSCOP was completing its investigations, that Britain formally handed independence to India and the partition of that country into Hindu India and Muslim Pakistan proceeded. The process and the consequences of that partition were certainly traumatic. But it was fait accompli, which was what the Zionists had hoped to see, and it also had a substantial impact on world opinion.

However the members of UNSCOP were not unanimous in their recommendations when the committee's three-part report was published on August 31, 1947. It was hardly to be expected that they would be. But the way in which they divided is significant. Part A of the report contained eleven recommendations of a general nature which all eleven members supported, plus one recommendation from which two members (Uruguay and Guatemala) dissented and one member did not record an opinion. The contentious recommendation was that "(the proposition) be accepted as incontrovertible that any solution for Palestine cannot be considered as a solution of the Jewish problem in general." Regardless of the fact that 'the Jewish problem' was not defined, it was a remarkable acknowledgment that after almost two thousand years of Christian anti-Semitism the 'problem' which Hitler had failed to solve through his version of a 'final solution' was not going to be solved by whatever decisions the United Nations reached on the future of Palestine – Jewish State or no Jewish State.

AN INDEPENDENT PALESTINE, BUT IN WHAT FORM?

In essence the recommendations on which all eleven members were unanimous were: that the mandate be terminated and that Palestine be granted independence at the earliest practicable date; that the United Nations should administer the territory during a brief transitional period; that a system for preserving and securing the sacred nature of the recognized Holy Places should be established; that steps be taken to resolve the problem of distressed European Jews; that there be guarantees for fundamental freedoms, human rights and the settlement of disputes by peaceful means under a basically democratic constitution; and, that the economic unity of Palestine should be preserved and foreign powers should renounce all rights and immunities for their nationals which were obtained under 'capitulations' of the Ottoman Empire.

The principal recommendations or the 'majority report' was set out in Part B. The majority report was supported by the representatives of seven countries: Canada, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, Netherlands, Peru, Sweden and Uruguay. The alternative recommendations or the 'minority report' was set out in Part C, supported by India, Iran and Yugoslavia. The eleventh member, Australia, declined to support either proposal. The majority report proposed a highly complicated form of partition and economic union with an Arab state, a Jewish state and the City of Jerusalem under international trusteeship. The two states were to remain under British administration (under UN auspices) with elected constituent assemblies for a transitional period of two years beginning on September 1, 1947. After the transitional period they would each become independent with their own elected governments, provided they had met complicated constitutional requirements and agreed to a treaty of economic union and pre-determined patterns of Jewish immigration, citizenship, religious, minority and human rights, and the protection of Holy Places. Under the Treaty of the Economic Union of Palestine a Joint Economic Board would be established consisting of representatives of the two states and members appointed by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations. The City of Jerusalem would be, in effect, the common capital for both states. After the transitional period it would be administered under international trusteeship by the United Nations.²⁸²

Under this proposal each state was to be comprised of three segments devised so that the majority of Jews in the existing population would be within the boundaries of the three Jewish state segments and, likewise, the majority of Arabs in the existing population would be within the boundaries of the three Arab segments. The boundaries of the segments intersected at two points which would provide crossing points and enable continuity of travel from one segment to another within either Jewish or Arab territory. However the Jewish segments accounted for 56 per cent of the land area of Palestine although the Jewish population at that time was approximately one third of the total. About 100,000 Jews would be resident in the Arab segments. The Arabs segments accounted for only 43 percent of the land area although the Arab population was approximately two thirds of the total in Palestine. About 500,000 Arabs would be resident in the Jewish segments, making up nearly half their population. [Jerusalem, the international trusteeship zone, was about one percent of the total area.] Based on the existing patterns of productivity and the anticipated patterns of development it was expected that under the Economic Union the Jewish state would subsidise the Arab state for at least ten years.²⁸³ Clearly, the complexity of the majority plan ensured such a sociological and security nightmare that the representatives of India, Iran and Yugoslavia were so concerned that they prepared the alternative plan, part C, and although the Australian delegation shared their concerns, Australia abstained from voting with them.

The minority report proposed that after a transitional period of not more than three years an Independent Federal State of Palestine would be established with Jerusalem as its capital and two states, one Arab and one Jewish. Administration during the transitional period would be the responsibility of an authority appointed by the United Nations General Assembly and during that period a constituent assembly would be elected by popular vote on a broad electoral basis. Its role would be to devise a constitution for the federal state, providing for a head of state, a federal parliament with two chambers, an executive government, governments for the Arab and Jewish states, and a federal court. The division of powers between the federal and state governments would be similar to that of other federated nations, with the federal government's responsibilities including defence, foreign relations, immigration, currency, taxation for federal purposes, transport, waterways and communications. State government responsibilities would include health, education, housing, police, agriculture, taxation for state purposes, commerce, industry and land permits. The electoral system would provide for members of one house to be elected on the basis of proportional representation with a common roll for the whole population, and for the other, for equal representation of Arab and Jewish citizens of Palestine. Legislation would require the approval of both houses, with provision for breaking constitutional deadlocks. There would be a single Palestinian nationality and citizenship. An international commission would determine the rate of migration into the Jewish state during the transitional period and a permanent international commission would supervise the Holy Places.²⁸⁴ The boundaries of the two states were totally different to those proposed in the majority report. Each state had two segments instead of three; there was no direct access from one segment to the other, but such access was probably not regarded as necessary in a federal system as opposed to a partition plan; and the area of land in each state was more closely related to the ethnic proportions of the population.²⁸⁵

THE MINORITY EXPERIENCE

It is significant that the three countries whose representatives favoured a federation of two states instead of partition, were each currently embroiled in traumatic domestic struggles or negotiations involving ethnic division or attempts by outside powers to impose condominium government. They were saying very clearly, from the immediacy of their own horrific experience, that partition was not the best way to go. There had to be a better way forward. But the attitude of the majority of UNSCOP members and the subsequent vote of the General Assembly made it clear that the most influential powers were looking for a quick fix which complemented their own interests.

One of the three, India, was in chaos with pitiful rivers of refugees flooding from one part of the sub-continent to another and virtual civil war in the border provinces which had been partitioned between India and Pakistan while UNSCOP was actually at work. Ultimately there were half a million deaths and about 10 million people were converted into refugees. In the second, Iran, the young shah and its government were struggling to unify the country again after several years of tutelage under the Anglo-Russian wartime condominium, during which the Communist Tudah Party had formed an autonomous region in Azarbaijan and Kurdistan with Russian support. Now, while the UN debated the partition of Palestine, the Russians were again protecting the Tudah Party. But the situation in the third, Yugoslavia, one of the Balkans states which forms a bridge between Europe and the East, was the most complex.

Yugoslavia, carried the evidence of being swept by countless waves of armies, immigrants and refugees as empires rose and fell, as the great invaders from the East sought to colonize Europe and European monarchs and marauding crusaders sought to retaliate. Its earliest settlers were the Illyrians and the Thracians, but Celts, Greeks, Romans, Huns, Bulgars, Avars, Slavs, Byzantines, Croats, Serbs, Nemajids and Ottoman Turks all left their marks – or their scars. The Ottoman Empire was actually approaching its peak in the Balkans at the time that the Reformers were trying to make the Vatican see sense and, as already noted (chapter 10) the Muslim challenge was so strong that when they sacked Belgrade in 1521 and went on to defeat the Hungarians in 1526 the need for cohesion against them was a factor in the pope's alliance negotiations with the Christian princes and Martin Luther's survival. The history of the region during the next four hundred years was just as complicated, and the two Balkans Wars of 1912 and 1913 were a prelude to World War I in the sense that they gave the major powers of Europe the justification they needed to try to extend their own interests by military means. During the next eighty years integration and disintegration of ethnic communities and nations in the Balkans would follow like marbles tumbling in a lottery barrel.

When World War I finally ground to a halt, Serbia, Montenegro and the territories of Slovenia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Bosnia, Herzegovina and Vojvodina (formerly part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire) were united under a democratic constitution as the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes. However, in response to Croatian demands for the formation of a federation in 1929 the king, Alexander I, renamed the kingdom Yugoslavia (Land of the South Slavs) and assumed dictatorial powers. Hostility between its various ethnic communities was aggravated, Croatian separatist movements developed out of resistance to Serbian domination and Alexander was assassinated. The instability encouraged competitive intervention by both Hitler and the Soviet Union and, on the initiative of the new pro-Axis king, Yugoslavia signed the Axis Pact in 1941. Two days later the government was overthrown and ten days later Germany occupied the country. An independent state of Croatia, incorporating much of Bosnia-Herzegovina, was set up under a puppet fascist government which enjoyed the intimate support of both Italy and the Vatican – and committed some of the worst atrocities of the war up to that time against its Jewish community (Chapter 24) The balance of the Yugoslavia was partitioned between Germany, Italy, Hungary and Bulgaria. A complex resistance movement evolved, dominated by two rival groups. The monarchist 'Chetniks' were based in Serbia. The 'Partisans' were communist-led but included many non-communist Croats, Serbs and Muslim anti-fascists. They were led by Marshal Tito.

Very soon the whole of what had been (for only thirteen years) Yugoslavia was racked by civil war as well as guerilla war against the German forces of occupation. Croatian Ustashe units pursued a policy of genocide against the Serbs and the Chetniks responded. During the later stages of the war both Russia and Britain supported Tito who occupied Belgrade in October 1944 and set up the Anti-Fascist National Liberation Council as a provisional government. In late November 1945 Tito, having won an election which had been boycotted by the monarchists, abolished the monarchy and established a multinational state consisting of six countries and two autonomous regions on a Soviet model under the name The Federative People's Republic of Yugoslavia. Opposition was crushed, but to prevent Serbian domination of the federation Tito gave both Kosovo and Vojvodina the status of semi-autonomous provinces within Serbia. Then, with the support of the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia annexed much of Italy's Istria under the Paris Peace Treaties of February 1947, already referred to above.²⁸⁶ The world watched in awe of Tito. The West was critical of his ruthless methods but it admired the way in which he was moulding such disparate ethnic communities into a nation. It also admired that way in which he had been prepared to explore participation in the Marshall Plan even though he was firmly committed to the notion of Socialist planning and controls and headed a Communist government. For Tito, partition was not on the agenda on the basis of either economic interests or ethnic lines. Neither was it on the agenda of the Arabs.

A PLAN TO REJECT, OR ACCEPT?

Immediately the UNSCOP report was published the Arab delegations rejected both proposals. They maintained their consistent position that Palestine was an integral part of the Arab world; that Jews were welcome as citizens but the imposition of a Jewish state was not; that the United Nations, as an instrument set up and controlled by the United States and Europe had no right to grant the Zionists any portion of their territory; and that "the Western World was seeking to salve its conscience for the atrocities of the war and was paying its own debt to the Jewish people with someone else's land."²⁸⁷ Saudi Arabia and Iraq lodged proposals with the General Secretary for the termination of the mandate and the recognition of Palestine as one independent state. Zionist organizations which had also opposed both plans at first soon realized that they could not gain sovereignty over Palestine in one step and that their best option was to accept the majority proposal for partition, in principle, and to work from there. They intensified their lobbying to gain United States support for terms which were even more favourable, especially in relation to their claim to Jerusalem. The White House was inundated with telegrams and petitions.

Debate within the State Department also intensified. Its research and intelligence unit objected to the majority plan because the Jews had been favoured by a jerrymander of the fertile areas and the Arabs would have neither a seaport nor a capital city. In addition the plan would establish two theocratic states in which the majorities would appear to have special privileges. The unit expected that under the Islamic system the Jewish and Christian minorities in the Arab state would be better off than the Muslim and Christian communities in the Jewish state. It also expected that Zionist opposition to the minority plan would be less menacing to world peace than Arab resistance to the majority plan, and the danger to US interests would be less. William Eddy, Special Assistant to the Secretary of State, agreed that the implications of a theocratic racial Zionist state were important and that the majority plan was not viable, partly because of the lack of an Arab port. But he went further. He said that under the majority plan the Zionist state would not be able to defend itself, it would therefore intensify its efforts for expansion and it was only in this sense that immigration was an issue. Acceptance of the majority plan would be "an endorsement of a theocratic sovereign state characteristic of the Dark Ages" and contrary to the US philosophy of a "non-clerical political democracy without prejudice to race or creed." The loss of good will within the Arab and Muslim world could reach to Indonesia and Pakistan, he said; the Arab League would be aligned with the Soviet Union for survival as the US had found expedient from 1942 to 1945; and the US would be involved in police operations in a hostile area.²⁸⁸

However, even considering such advice, the State Department felt that it could not actively oppose the majority plan. To do so would be seen as a reversal of the Truman's apparent endorsement of partition in his Yom Kippur statement and it might also damage the UN's prestige which the US administration was keen to support as a tool for collective leadership and as a means of enhancing post-war US leadership. But in addition it was assumed that in spite of the change in Soviet attitude which Gromyko had expressed in May, the Soviet Union would still oppose partition and the plan would not receive the required two thirds majority.²⁸⁹ In other words the US could 'have its cake and eat it, too.' The president would earn kudos for having supported the partition plan and the country would avoid the consequences of partition by default! On September 4 the Postmaster General, Hannagan, pressed Truman to call for the admission of 150,000 Jews into Palestine on the grounds that it would help fund raising for the Democratic National Committee²⁹⁰; and on September 10 the president appointed a pro-Zionist, General Hilldring, to the US delegation to the United Nations on the advice of Niles that it would balance the views of the State Department with at least one "vigorous and well informed individual in whom you ... and American Jewry have complete confidence."²⁹¹ One presumes that Hilldring was present on September 15 when Marshall briefed the US delegation on the State Department's position, acknowledged that a non-committal position would draw criticism and instructed them not to show their hand until it became absolutely necessary. He said that the British would not implement partition and that any initiative by the US to do so would mean sending in its own troops to.²⁹²

AN AD HOC COMMITTEE, AND BRITAIN'S DECISION

Then on September 17, the day the General Assembly resolved to set up an ad hoc committee on Palestine because UNSCOP did not provide a single clear cut recommendation which the Assembly could consider and accept, reject or modify, and because of the alternative formally proposed by Saudi Arabia and Iraq, Marshall commended UNSCOP on its report. He went further than he had advised the delegates to go, saying that while the decision of the Assembly must properly await the detailed consideration of the ad hoc committee report, the government of the United States gave great weight not only to the recommendations which met with unanimous approval of UNSCOP "but also those which have been approved by the majority of that committee."²⁹³ The British were not pleased and the Arabs took it to mean full American support for partition.

Six days later, on September 23, the General Assembly formally appointed a cumbersome ad hoc committee of the whole assembly (one representative from each member country) to enable exhaustive concurrent debate on all of the relevant matters: the original reference by Britain, the UNSCOP report, and the alternative proposed by the Arab countries. It would also provide a clear indication of the likely result of a formal vote in the General Assembly. It therefore facilitated lobbying and the use of pressure tactics by the Zionists in a bid to influence the result. That lobbying reached an unprecedented scale after September 26 when the British cabinet decision was conveyed to the General Assembly (in ad hoc committee) by the Colonial Secretary, Creech-Jones. "In order that there be no misunderstanding of the attitude and policy of Britain I have been instructed by His Majesty's Government to announce, with all solemnity, that they have ... decided that in the absence of a settlement they must plan for an early withdrawal of British forces and of the British Administration from Palestine." He could not have been more direct, but he also warned the Assembly that it must define clearly the means by which its recommendations were to be implemented ²⁹⁴ because Britain was not prepared to impose by force of arms a settlement which was not acceptable to both the Arabs and the Jews of Palestine. ²⁹⁵ The Zionists knew that the US was in a strong position to influence the decisions of a number of countries, and they were well aware of the conflicting advice which was swirling fiercely around Truman.

The arguments of those opposing partition have been summarised thus. ²⁹⁶First: the enforced establishment of a Jewish state would seriously damage America's relations with Arabs and Muslims throughout the world, perhaps permanently. There were already signs of a cooling of America's friendship with the Arab states which was being blamed on the Zionists. Second: the US could not afford to alienate the Arabs because Europe depended on their oil which was essential for the Marshall Plan; because US oil firms and others operating in the area would be hurt; the US needed military access to the area and the base at Dhahran in Saudi Arabia; an energy crisis could be precipitated in the US. Third: Arab opposition made partition unworkable and if it were instituted the Palestine problem would become a permanent feature of international politics, with the US required to contribute militarily and financially. Fourth: the idea of a Jewish state was contradictory to the United Nations Charter and American principles of self-determination, and it would increase tension between Jews and Gentiles in the US. Fifth: partition would lead to extremism in the Arab world. Sixth: the chaos in Palestine which was certain to result would assist the Soviet Union with two alternative scenarios; either the Arabs pushed towards alliance with Russia, or the Jewish state becoming a Soviet ally. The way ahead, according to opponents of partition, was to give the moderate Arabs and the Jews time to find common ground, possibly within the framework of a trusteeship of some form.

The basis of the pro-Zionist arguments was that partition was equitable. It offered each side a state; it would ensure protection for the Holy Places of Jerusalem for members of all religions; and it would provide a haven for the refugees in Europe. It was implicit in the third clause that there was no alternative 'haven' and that opposition to Jewish refugee settlement elsewhere would be sustained. It was also claimed that with US support a Jewish state would become a bastion of democracy in the region; this would enhance America's new role in the world; and, for the position of the young United Nations to be enhanced as a neutral body, the report of its independent special committees had to be taken seriously. ²⁹⁷

On October 6, although he was under acute pressure, Truman refused a direct request from Hannagan that he authorise an official statement of intent on partition, but three days later, October 9, when he was advised that the Arab League Council had instructed its member states to despatch troops to the borders of Palestine, he hardened his attitude in favour the Zionist cause. He instructed the State Department to support the partition plan. Marshall was forced to reluctantly abandon his efforts to find an alternative, and on October 11 the US representative on the Palestine committee of the UN ad hoc committee announced that it was the president's decision to endorse the basic principles of partition, subject to certain amendments. The Zionists rejoiced, but it was a moment of bitter disappointment for the Arabs. ²⁹⁸

A RUSSIAN VOLTE-FACE

Then, quite unexpectedly, on October 13, everyone's established reasoning on the outcome of both the impending vote and partition was thrown into disarray when Soviet delegate Tzarapkin endorsed the majority proposal. A two thirds majority for partition suddenly appeared more probable. In spite of Gromyko's statement in May everyone was taken by surprise. What were the Soviet Union's motives? According to another Soviet delegate the new approach was to obtain United Nations recognition of the right of minority peoples to set up their own states. It would be a precedent for Russian support for independence movements of Near East minorities such as the Kurds.

Everyone had a view. A Saudi Arabian delegate said Soviet support for partition was prompted by a desire to establish a precedent for an Armenian state at the expense of Turkey, and probably other splinter states under Russian domination. Many observers, including the Syrian Minister to Moscow, saw it in a more sinister light. It was an attempt by the Soviet Union to cause chaos in the Middle East, to ensure the destruction of US influence in the area, to hasten the withdrawal of British troops and establish a Soviet bridgehead in their place, and to establish a precedent for similar action in Kurdistan, Azerbaijan and even Macedonia.²⁹⁹ Britain and America arrived at similar optional interpretations. It could be that the Soviets regarded the Middle East as a low priority relative to Asia and Europe because it was "unshaken politically or economically by war and enemy occupation, shielded by the firm US stand in Greece, Turkey and Iran, bolstered by strong US and British interests ... and controlled by a feudal anti-communist class." On the other hand it could be that the Soviets saw partition as an opportunity for its troops to help implement the program; the Jews might be considered as "the only immediately useful tool to 'soften up' the area for eventual straight Communist cultivation"; and partition might best serve Soviet interest by securing British withdrawal and ensuring that no other troops replaced them, at the same time launching an unsettling dispute calculated to create difficulties for both the British and the US.³⁰⁰ In the words of historian Steven Spiegel: "Suddenly, the two superpowers seemed to be competing for the Zionists' favour. The demands of the Jewish-Arab conflict in Palestine diverged from the administration's other global and regional exigencies."³⁰¹ In any case the Soviet announcement helped to diminish the credibility and effectiveness of the State Department's line of resistance – its wish to see partition defeated in the General Assembly and replaced by a scheme of trusteeship.³⁰²

Lobbying increased strongly as the date of the ad hoc committee vote, November 25, approached, not only to secure the necessary votes, but to ensure that the division of territory if the plan was adopted would favour the Zionist cause. A proposal was under consideration for the Negev, a narrow wedge of land sparsely populated by Bedouin, to be transferred to the Arab territory. The wedge included the small port of Eilat at the head of the gulf of Aqaba, and the route of an oil pipeline from the refinery port of Haifa, via Jaffa, to Eilat, and it would provide a land bridge between the territory allocated for a Palestinian State and the Arab states of North Africa, Jordan and thus Saudi Arabia. It had been agreed that the US would sponsor the change.

The Zionists were opposed to it, because without that wedge of territory they would not have a port which provided access to the Indian Ocean via the Red Sea and independent of the Suez Canal which, although it was controlled by Britain, was a part of Arab territory. In promoting their case they talked only of their plans for the agricultural and industrial development of the area, but that was a minor consideration. Security was the real issue. Truman was therefore persuaded to meet Chaim Weizmann secretly on November 19 and to 'discuss' the instructions which had already been given by the State Department to the US delegation at the UN. He did not countermand the State Department instructions. He simply bypassed the State Department and 'suggested' to the delegates that if it appeared that the US was alone in supporting the proposal, which was due to be tabled next day, it should not be submitted for consideration. A presidential 'suggestion' was as good as an order. The delegates got the message. The proposal was dropped.³⁰³

A DIFFERENT KIND OF 'GENTLE PERSUASION'

Then, when the ad hoc committee report was put to the vote, the result was one short of the two thirds majority necessary. An unprecedented avalanche of lobbying with bribery, extreme political pressure and blackmail such as has not otherwise occurred, burst upon the United Nations. There were four days to the final vote. To be sure of securing the vote the Zionists set out to persuade delegates to change from 'No' to 'Abstain' or from 'Abstain' to 'Yes.' As part of the process United States officials and businessmen and even two Supreme Court justices were pressured into threatening trade or diplomatic disadvantage to a country which did not change its vote. Truman was totally opposed to such tactics, but he was powerless to prevent it. He was effectively locked out of the process.³⁰⁴ Six countries were subject to "special pressure" – Haiti, Liberia, the Philippines, China, Ethiopia and Greece – all of whom were heavily dependent upon US economic support or commercial investment.³⁰⁵ Direct bribes of up to $US75,000 were offered to two delegates; others from Latin America were told that a vote in favour of partition would greatly increase the chances of a Pan-American road project; and others were threatened with the withdrawal of investment funds for commercial developments; and French and Chinese diplomats were told that the outcome could affect interim support under the Marshall Plan.³⁰⁶

However the most blatant cases involved the blackmailing of Nelson Rockefeller to force him to apply pressure on several Latin American countries. Rockefeller, who later secured election as governor of New York (1959–73) and vice-president of the United States (1974–77), was a grandson of the founder of the Standard Oil conglomerate and no stranger to power politics and corruption in the oil industry. From 1935 he was director of Creole Petroleum, a Standard Oil affiliate with large holdings in Venezuela, and from 1936 he was associated with both the Chase National Bank and a Rockefeller family partnership with the Schroder Bank of New York which has been described as a Nazi front and a key institution in the Fascist economic "miracle." Chase National secured $US25 million for Nazi Germany in 1939, and provided information on thousands of Nazi sympathisers in the United States for the use of Berlin's propaganda machine. In 1940 Rockefeller was appointed coordinator of inter-American affairs at the State Department, and in 1944 he was elevated to assistant secretary of state for the American republics.³⁰⁷

During the whole of that time, except for a few months, the Rockefeller-controlled Standard of New Jersey shipped oil to the Nazis through Spain; and operated in partnership with I.G. Farben of Germany in the development of synthetic gas and rubber, and Rockefeller promoted the idea that whichever side won the war the United States had to safeguard its international position by the use of "economic measures that are competitively effective against totalitarian [meaning Communist] techniques." In 1942 Truman, then a senator, described the behaviour of the Rockefeller companies as "treasonous" and in August 1945, after Rockefeller had defied Truman and engineered membership of the United Nations for the Fascist state, Argentina, he was dismissed from his State Department posts. His political and corporate strategy has been described as: "to use his bloc of Fascist nations to 'buy' the majority vote at the UN to favour US-sponsored resolutions" on the basis that the Latin American block represented nineteen votes to Europe's nine at that stage. He made no apologies for using strong-arm tactics, insisting that unless the United States "operated with a solid group in this hemisphere, we could not do what we wanted in the world front."³⁰⁸

Then on September 22, immediately after the UN had resolved to operate as an ad hoc committee on Palestine and the British government had announced its decision to return the mandate, a US Federal Judge, Charles Clark, issued a legal opinion concerning Standard Oil in a civil action then before the court. He said: "Standard Oil can be considered an enemy national in view of its relationship with I.G. Farben after the United States and Germany had become active enemies." The Zionist lobbyists were quick to take advantage of the situation. While the critical vote was pending, a delegation called at his office with proof that he personally had committed treason against the United States. Not only had he allowed Standard to ship oil from South America to Hitler's Germany while he was in charge of Latin American intelligence operations and had a seat on the Proclaimed List Committee, but he had been implicated with Allen Dulles in the smuggling of Nazi war criminals and money via the Vatican to Argentina. The Zionist delegation had documentary evidence including bank records with his signature and transcripts of conversations with Nazi agents. Their proposition was simple. Silence in return for votes in favour of partition by the Latin American bloc. But Rockefeller was an experienced negotiator. Aarons and Loftus cite Western and Israeli sources for their report of the exchange which followed.

Rockefeller skimmed through the dossier and coolly began to bargain. In return for the votes of the Latin American bloc, he wanted guarantees that the Jews would keep their mouths shut about the flow of Nazi money and fugitives to South America. There would be no Zionist Nazi-hunting unit, no testimony at Nuremberg about the bankers or anyone else, not a single leak to the press about where the Nazis were living in South America or which Nazis were working for Dulles. The subject of the Nazis was closed. Period. Forever.

The choice was simple, Rockefeller explained. "You can have vengeance, or you can have a country, but you cannot have both." His choice of the word "vengeance," not justice, left the Jews in no doubt where he stood. ... Ben-Gurion's representative was heartsick. Counter-blackmail had not been in the game plan. He made a telephone call to try to obtain guidance. It took several hours before the reply came back: "Yes." There was really no choice to give Rockefeller whatever he wanted. On behalf of the still-unborn state of Israel, the promise was formally given to let the Nazis go free.³⁰⁹

After Rockefeller made phone calls to "every dictator, caudillo, and businessman he had in his hip pocket and told them the facts of life" Brazil and Haiti switched from 'No' to 'Yes'; Nicaragua, Bolivia and Ecuador switched from 'Abstain' to 'Yes'; and Argentina, Colombia and El Salvador switched from 'Against' to 'Abstain.'³¹⁰ The final vote was thirty three in favour, thirteen against, with ten abstentions and one vote declared invalid. The Zionists were overjoyed. The Arabs were dumbfounded.

The resolution as carried provided for Britain's mandate to terminate as soon as possible, but not later than August 1, 1948, and for British forces to withdraw progressively. A UN Commission was to be set up to administer the territory during a transitional period until the establishment of provisional governments for each of the two states, one Arab and one Jewish, plus a Special International Regime for Jerusalem. These were to come into existence two months after the withdrawal of the British forces. There was provision for cooperation between the states in certain matters and for the establishment of an economic union, and each was to make a declaration guaranteeing freedom of religion and association, and protection for the holy places of all religions. It all looked very good ... on paper. Britain announced that it would withdraw and hand authority to the commission on May 14, 1948.

THE BITTER REALITY: THE NIGHT JOURNEY AND MAIMONIDES

Britain's fears were soon realized. Only days after the vote for partition was carried, pogroms occurred in Aden (Yemen) and Aleppo (Syria). There were 82 deaths and hundreds of homes and communal facilities destroyed in Aden, while in Aleppo twelve synagogues, 150 houses, 50 shops and five Jewish schools were destroyed.³¹¹ Within a week the Arab League met in Cairo and resolved to prevent partition by force and its members agreed to contribute arms and volunteers for an Arab Liberation Army to be raised in Damascus under the command of a general seconded by Iraq, Ismail Safwat Pasha. Subsequent disagreements lead to that force being fragmented into three guerilla units and the eventual failure of the plan.

The period of five and a half months of ill-disciplined warfare, preliminary skirmishing for territory and politicking for funds and armaments after the UN vote and before Britain's departure were marked by bitterness, hatred and terrorism which reached levels not even known in Palestine during the Second World War and at that critical time Britain totally abrogated its responsibility for the welfare and security of the peoples of the mandated territory. To most people in the Western World from whom the reality of history had been well hidden, it appeared that the people of the Middle East were simply disorganized malcontents who were squabbling over faiths of no consequence in desert regions which would do nobody any good, and Britain would be well rid of the whole problem. However the fundamental problems of the region, the number and nature of independent states, the structure of their governments, the conflicts of interests between them and the way in which the trouble in the triangle of messianic faiths had focussed on Palestine were all basically a consequence of Britain's use of the Balfour Declaration in a bid for control of resources and political advantage.

Britain did not realize that by its actions it had brought together the Qur'anic Night Journey and Maimonides' expectations of the establishment of the State of Israel and that it had been a main player in the parody of Mein Kampf. It did not even recognize any of them. Its church said they were of no consequence anyway. So, in 1947–48, after its bid at interfaith manipulation had back-fired so dramatically it had no more resolve than to minimize its losses, evacuate its own citizens with as little trauma as possible, and to leave the Arabs and the Jews to resolve their problems as best they could. The basic policy guidelines given to its last High Commissioner for Palestine, Sir Alan Cunningham, by a British government which was convinced that partition would not work and that the Arabs would gain the upper hand, were “to keep the situation as calm as possible consistent with a minimum involvement physically,” to “have nothing to do with partition in any way, shape or form,” to align Britain's interests in the Middle East as closely as possible with the Arabs, to implement existing restrictions on Jewish migration, and to leave law and order to the partitioning parties except in the pursuit of Britain's interests.³¹² The consequence of the British withdrawal from the bulk of normal policing duties from December 1947 was an unending blood bath as Arab and Jewish terrorist groups committed horrendous atrocities against each other's communities.

Britain was washing its hands of the crisis which it had caused in pursuing the role of a protective umbrella for Zionism, but the United States, urged on by people with the philosophy exhibited by Nelson Rockefeller and Allen Dulles, was floundering into precisely the same situation for precisely the same reason. Put simply, the reason was greed and the want to exploit and control the region and its resources without regard to national, corporate or personal responsibilities, and in total disregard of religious teachings, the history of interfaith relations and the religious self-understandings of the three partners in the troubled triangle of Abrahamic messianic faiths. The self-proclaimed New Israel had lost the plot of its own self-understanding. Instead of looking for the fundamental reasons for the crisis and then seeking to work through them logically, it had eagerly grasped the umbrella role as Britain cast it aside.

DISRUPTION AND CONFLICT: THE RIPPLE EFFECT

Truman and his advisers were well aware that the war between the Palestinian Arabs and the Jewish Agency in Palestine was not going to be resolved easily and that it was likely to explode into full-scale warfare and through sparks or flares in all directions at any moment. They simply followed the well established big-power practice of trying to put the fires out one at a time. The US administration had received conflicting advice on the question of whether American partisan involvement in the Middle East would involve a threat to national security ever since it began to compete with Britain for petroleum concessions. Then, by declaring the defence of Saudi Arabia to be vital to the security of the United States so that Congress could authorise direct Lend Lease funds for that country and thus secure oil concessions for its commercial operators, the administration had made itself vulnerable to pressure in such matters. Therefore in view of its strong support for the plan to provide a Jewish homeland by the partition of Palestine it should have been no surprise that Arab interests sought to disrupt American oil interests in the region.

On January 6 1948 the president of the Socony Vacuum Company advised Defence Secretary Forrestal that his company and other oil interests were discontinuing work on a pipeline in Saudi Arabia because of the unrest over US support for the Zionist cause. Six weeks later his concerns were given more substance by a tentative decision by the Arab League to deny American companies pipeline rights until the United States altered its policy on Palestine, and the announcement that the Syrian prime minister planned to visit Riyadh to seek Ibn Saud's cooperation in punitive action against Aramco. The State Department adjusted its Middle East policy accordingly. On February 24, with the support of the Secretary of State, Ambassador Warren Austin asked the UN Security Council to consider whether there existed in Palestine a threat to international peace and security. He said the US was ready, in principle, to consider the use of force to restore peace but not to enforce partition. This brought such a strong response from the Zionist lobby that President Truman issued instructions that he did not want to be approached by any more spokesmen for the extreme Zionist cause. However in response to a personal approach from a former business partner he agreed to meet Chaim Weizmann at the White House on March 18.

In circumstances bordering on intrigue, without the State Department being advised of their meeting, Weizmann pleaded for the lifting of the embargo on arms supplies to the Jewish Agency and for continued support for the UNSCOP partition plan. The two men reached a personal understanding based on the need for justice without bloodshed, the full implications of which are unclear, and Truman agreed that the US would continue to support partition.^{313 314} In fact this was not the first occasion that Weizmann had made urgent personal contact with Truman at short notice. As already noted, he had intervened four months earlier, in November 1947, to prevent the transfer of the Negev from the Jewish sector to the Arab sector in the UNSCOP partition plan.³¹⁵ However on this second occasion Truman did not act quickly enough.

PROMPT RESPONSES TO A BID TO CHANGE COURSE

On March 19, with the prior approval of Marshall and the prior knowledge of the president, but without knowing of Truman's private conversation with Weizmann, Ambassador Austin recommended to the Security Council that it suspend the partition plan and convene a special session of the General Assembly to consider a temporary trusteeship over Palestine without prejudice to the character of the eventual settlement.³¹⁶ The Zionist response was immediate: a deluge of wires and petitions to Truman, parades of Jewish war veterans, and advice from the Jewish Agency that it would oppose with all its strength any postponement of "Jewish independence." That term, as already noted, was not consistent with either the spirit of UN deliberations on the partition plan or the history of territorial occupation when viewed in the context of other independence movements, but it was given credibility by the injection of the trusteeship question into the debate. The response of other members of the Security Council was a mixture of confusion, disbelief and hostility, with Britain suspicious that it may lead to an extension of the mandate and fearful of an upsurge in anti-British violence.³¹⁷

On March 25 Truman issued a statement to clarify – or modifying – the position. He said that the US "vigorously supported the plan for partition with economic union recommended by UNSCOP and by the General Assembly." He went on to say: "Unfortunately, it has become clear that the partition plan cannot be carried out at this time by peaceful means. ... If the UN agrees to [United States] trusteeship, peaceful settlement is yet possible; without it, open warfare is just over the horizon."³¹⁸ He also said that as a matter of national policy US troops were not to be used.³¹⁹ Then on April 1, with only six weeks of the mandate to run and with Britain determined not to extend it, the council agreed to convene the General Assembly for mid-April. And on the same day, with the Palestinians gaining more ground as the British forces withdrew and the Jewish military position weakened, Ben Gurion, acting on the advice of the Haganah operations commander, persuaded the Jewish Agency cabinet to support his decision and ordered an all-out offensive to capture all high country and all Arab towns which controlled vital roads or communications facilities.³²⁰

A CAUSE + ARMS = STRENGTH

Then, as the date for his declaration drew close Ben Gurion was supremely confident that the forces available to the Zionist Jewish Agency could survive any offensive which the Arabs were able to mount against them and that they would be able to gain territory additional to that allocated to the Jewish State by the United Nations. This was in spite of the fact that while the Arab states were able to negotiate for arms quite openly, the Jewish Agency had to circumvent the British and US arms embargoes. It did this quite effectively. Within days of Truman refusing to lift the US arms embargo the first shipment of arms purchased by the Hagana from Czechoslovakia (which had come under Communist control only weeks earlier) sailed from the Yugoslav port of Sibenik and arrived in Palestine on April 3, concealed beneath a cargo of onions. About the same time a vessel carrying arms purchased from the same source by Syria was intercepted by Jewish frogmen and sunk. Its cargo was salvaged by Hagana and transhipped to Palestine. A DC3 aircraft chartered privately in the US carried 107 tons of arms from Czechoslovakia to Beit Daras in Southern Palestine in the following seven weeks. And under a contract also signed in April the Czech government agreed to supply ten Messerschmitt

109 fighter aircraft and to provide training facilities so that between 50 and 75 Israeli pilots could be trained by American volunteer instructors during the following five months.³²¹

Perhaps the most obvious factor in the Jewish Agency's favour was the fanatical fervour of its troops who were highly motivated by the intense determination to see a Jewish Homeland, or state, established in a manner which would relieve their community of the oppression of life under the heel of Christian Europe and preserve their race or their faith, according to their particular perspective, for time immemorial. Added to that were the agency's fund raising capacity, especially in the United States; the high level of training and experience which its forces had already achieved; the advantage of defending relatively small, compact zones; and its experience of, and readiness to use, psychological warfare against exposed civilian populations.

ARAB COHESION UNDERMINED

But the most important factor was the lack of cohesion among the Arab states with uncertainty about the primary reason for opposing the establishment of a Jewish State which resulted directly from their colonial history. Were they going to war to maintain the territorial integrity of the Arab world? Was it to come to the aid of the Palestinian people? Was it to defend Islam against Western Christian arrogance? Was it to suppress political Zionism as an aberration of Judaism? Was it to gain territorial advantage out of the collapse of the British mandate without regard to the promise of independence for the small Palestinian population? Or was it to establish or strengthen a position of leadership within the Arab world?

The young Arab League was dogged by all of those considerations as its members debated the approach to take to the war with 'the Zionist entity' – the State of Israel in course of establishment. In fact none of the countries bordering the new state had the same systems of government which they had at the time of the mandate negotiations and in some cases their boundaries had also been radically altered by colonial or international intervention. The mandate over Palestine which the League of Nations granted to Britain in the post-World War One carve up of the Ottoman Empire covered territory from Mount Hermon in the north to the headwaters of the Gulf Of Aqaba in the south, and from the Mediterranean coast to points about 420 kilometres north east of Jaffa (half way to the Euphrates) and about 360 kilometres south east. While the bulk of the population and productive areas were to the west of the River Jordan and the Dead Sea, which formed the spine of the mandate, the area to the east was three times as large. The British Government, having to juggle its conflicting promises, found it necessary to frustrate Zionist ambitions to occupy the East Bank as well as the territory from the Jordan to the Mediterranean and, by that means, reduce the potential for friction with the Arabs. It therefore took steps to ensure that the mandate included authority (in Article 25) for it to administer the eastern region differently from the western region. The regions thereafter became known as "Palestine" and "Transjordan" even though, for purposes of the mandate, they were fully integrated as "Palestine." In 1921, even while negotiations continued, Britain closed the eastern region to Jewish settlement and recognized Abdullah Ibn Husayn, a son of the Sharif of Mecca, as Emir of Transjordan. Then in May 1923, before the mandate officially came into operation in September that year Britain reorganized Transjordan as an autonomous state with all powers except foreign affairs and defence. But the term "Transjordan" does not occur in the mandate documents. The expression used was "the territories lying between the Jordan and the eastern boundary of Palestine as ultimately determined."

The immediate consequence of this was that when the question of partition arose after the Second World War, the Mufti of Jerusalem and Abdullah both saw themselves as the rightful protectors of the Palestinian people and the rightful claimants of the territory allocated by the United Nations for an Arab state. The Mufti, who had escaped in June 1946 from a prison in France where he had been held pending a war crimes trial, saw himself as the appropriate person to lead a Palestinian state, while Abdullah was eager to re-unite the peoples separated by Britain's action. The Mufti did not want the armies of the neighbouring countries to conduct his war for him, knowing that armies of occupation directed politically from outside, and having enormous authority of their own, are very hard to send home. Thus he wanted the Arab countries to help finance and provide volunteers for an army which he would have under his ultimate control. He had re-established the Arab Higher Command in Cairo for this purpose and the Arab League decisions of December 1947 were exactly as he wished, except that he wanted to name the commander and not have in charge of it an Iraqi general responsible to the Arab League.

In February, 1948, the Mufti moved the Arab Higher Command to Beirut and sought support from Arab governments to convert it into a Palestine Provisional Government equal in status to the Jewish Agency. He announced that the Arabs considered the partition resolution null and void and sent his cousin, Abdul Khader Husseini (Abou Moussa) to Palestine to establish the Palestinian Guerilla Army with the plan to isolate Jewish villages, blockade the road from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem and to lay siege to Jerusalem. It has been claimed that he also said that the Jews would be pushed into the sea,³²² but this does not appear to have been established beyond reasonable doubt and it is denied by those close to him at the time. But Britain found the idea of a Palestine led by the Mufti, with or without a Jewish state, totally intolerable because of his collaboration with Hitler during the war and set out to encourage any pro-Palestinian action by the Arab countries which would exclude the Mufti.

Abdullah had not been prepared to support the Mufti's plans in any case and he had approached the British Government, through its High Commissioners in Transjordan and Palestine, seeking its support for his annexation of the West Bank portions of Palestine which had been allocated for an Arab state. The assumption was – and this gained support from some other governments concerned – that Egypt would add the Gaza Strip to its territory and Lebanon would similarly claim the region of West Galilee. Britain supported the plan because the interests of the Palestinian Arabs would be looked after by Arab governments but there would be no Palestinian government in conflict with the Jewish State. So did Iraq, largely because it was ruled by a relative of Abdullah as a result of appointments made by the British when they were trying to consolidate their influence by placing friendly Hashemites in charge of small countries across the Arabian Peninsula. But the proposal also raised fears in Egypt that Abdullah was seeking to usurp the leadership role within the Arab world which Egypt was assuming, especially as the care of the spiritually important Mosque of the Dome on the Rock would become his responsibility. This led to concerns that he should be stopped and that the Mufti should be supported in his bid to lead the Palestinians, or, failing this, Egypt should strengthen its own position by absorbing the Gaza Strip into its territory.

Just at the same time, the UN Committee on Jerusalem published a proposal that the Internationalized zone should be administered in three boroughs – Jewish, Arab and demilitarized – with the old walled city constituting the demilitarized borough and being administered by a UN appointed governor assisted by an elected council. This brought some changes in attitudes towards the internationalization of Jerusalem within the opposing camps. The Arabs remained opposed to the general proposal, but the Jews, prompted by the fact that the city was virtually under Arab siege, agreed to it as the lesser of two evils, subject to the condition that the Christian powers provided an international security force to police the scheme. Such a condition was consistent with other actions of the Jewish Agency which appeared contrived to drive a wedge between Christian and Muslim communities and authorities and to blur the distinction between ‘Arab’ and ‘Muslim.’ It was widely thought to be in the Jewish interest to generate the misunderstanding that all Arabs were Muslim and that the few Christians present did not take part in movements for Arab or Palestinian nationalism, thus discouraging foreign Christian support for the Arab cause. When that condition was greeted with a notable lack of enthusiasm in all quarters the Jewish Agency asked for a force of five thousand United States marines, but the US administration found this unacceptable in an election year. The British High Commissioner to Palestine, Sir Alan Cunningham, then responded to the Jewish Agency’s tactic by writing personally to a number of Christian Archbishops seeking their support for a force of three thousand troops. The Anglican Archbishop of Canterbury tried unsuccessfully to generate public debate by writing to the London Times, but the Roman Catholic Archbishop of New York, Cardinal Spellman, was among those who did not respond at all.³²³

Also at that time the Jewish Agency’s intelligence infiltration of the British army and the offices of the Arab League was such that it knew every detail of Britain’s attitude and actions in the crisis, its support for Abdullah’s bid for the Arab territory, and the plans of the Arab League.³²⁴ This was quite apart from the fact that Abdullah had held a secret personal meeting with Golda Meyerson and a Zionist delegation in November, shortly before the UN partition vote, at which they had discussed their “common enemy”, the Mufti, and the Zionists believed they could rely on his support for the establishment of the Jewish State.^{325 326} They knew, for example, that on January 9 Britain had approved arms contracts to enable Iraq to discharge its responsibilities to the Arab League in relation to Palestine.³²⁷ They also knew of strained relations between Britain and both Egypt and Iraq as they renegotiated treaty arrangements in the knowledge that an independent state of Palestine would no longer be subject to British-imposed conditions which still applied to both existing nations.

In Iraq's case the rejection in Baghdad of a revised treaty which had been agreed in London in February – within a few weeks of the approval of the arms agreement – brought the fall of the Iraqi government and the invalidation of arrangements for the supply of further arms. In Egypt's case, a draft treaty which had been signed two years earlier, in 1946, provided for the progressive withdrawal of British forces to be completed by September 1949 but this now appeared very tardy in view of Britain's total withdrawal from Palestine in a matter of a few months. In addition, at the United Nations in August 1947, Egypt had unsuccessfully challenged Britain's right to change Condominium arrangements for the administration of the Sudan which Britain had governed for some time as a dependency. Egypt wanted, and Britain had previously supported, the union of Egypt and the Sudan into one nation of the Nile Valley. But with changing circumstances Britain now favoured curtailing Egypt's influence and sponsored independence for the Sudan. To reduce the tension somewhat Britain agreed to withdraw its troops from the Nile Delta and to restrict them to the Suez Canal Zone.³²⁸

In the circumstances, with the Zionists feeling the need for a secure umbrella, the pressure on Truman continued to increase. Weizmann wrote to him on April 8, three weeks after their second private meeting, warning of the consequences of not implementing partition and declaring that "the choice of our people is between statehood and extermination." Throughout Palestine, but especially in Jerusalem, violence, sabotage and terrorism had been rising progressively during the early months of 1948, and the Arab Liberation Army had severed the water supply to West Jerusalem. Busses, private houses, public buildings, hotels and the offices of the Palestine Post were all bombed, quite apart from known military targets.

BIRTH PANGS OF A REFUGEE CRISIS

However, at the same time that the Arabs seemed to be securing some strategic advantage, Arab emigration out of the areas allocated to the Jewish State began to increase. It was led by the propertied classes out of fear of the loss of assets and personal rights but ordinary working people soon followed their example. Then, on April 9, just as Truman was reflecting on Weizmann's letters, the first of two of the bloodiest and most dastardly massacres of the period rocked the region. It triggered a flood of Arab emigration which resulted in the near-legendary Palestinian refugee crisis. It reinforced the hatred on both sides, and it strengthened the resolve of many Arab authorities to prevent the establishment of the Jewish State. It was the Deir Yassin Massacre.

The villagers of Deir Yassin, about five miles west of Jerusalem, had stood aloof from the struggles over partition, refused to support the Arab Liberation Army in its attacks on Jewish targets, and signed a non-aggression pact with neighbouring Jewish settlements. But on that day, forces of the Irgun and the Stern Group entered the village and massacred 254 defenceless civilians including about one hundred women and children. Many of the bodies were then mutilated and thrown into a well.³²⁹ Many factors have been suggested in a bid to explain or to justify the action, including the suggestion that the village had been harbouring members of the Arab Liberation Army. But it is well established that there was great jubilation among the hard line Zionist terrorist forces about the way in which that action struck fear into the entire civilian Palestinian population and accelerated the exodus of refugees.

In the circumstances, and considering an enormous weight of evidence from many reputable authorities plus the nature of the Hagana's Tochnit Dalet (Plan D, providing for the annexation of captured Arab territory),³³⁰ it is reasonable to conclude that there was a deliberate systematic and calculated campaign in certain Zionist quarters to drive Palestinians not only from areas which were allocated to a Jewish State but also from West Galilee, the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv corridor and certain other areas which could subsequently be annexed. The campaign was based on intimidation, psychological warfare and the fear that such incidents as Deir Yassin would be repeated, and the expectation that depopulated areas could quickly be repopulated with Jewish settlers. Despite all the later Israeli protestations to the contrary, there is little room left for doubt in view of a letter from Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Shertok (Sharett) to then President Weizmann in August 1948. He expressed his determination to "explore all possibilities of getting rid, once and for all, of the huge Arab minority which originally threatened us. ... What can be achieved during this period of storm and stress will be unattainable once conditions stabilize." He then noted that a group of senior officers was already working on the study of resettlement possibilities for the refugees in other lands.³³¹

Retaliation followed swiftly. Only three days after Deir Yassin, Arab forces ambushed a Jewish convoy travelling under Red Cross colours to Hadassah Hospital and the Hebrew University on the outskirts of Jerusalem. Seventy seven Jewish doctors, nurses, teachers and students were killed.³³² The policy of the British authorities to make no preparations for the transfer of power to their successors – the Jewish Agency and the Palestinians or to the UN-appointed Committee of Five – and of not intervening in civil disturbances unless British personnel or facilities were at risk contributed to the deepening crisis. Those policies were already a matter of national disgrace and Britain came under renewed attack because in the Hadassah Hospital incident a nearby British military post did nothing until it was too late.³³³

With only four weeks to the end of the British mandate the Council of Thirteen, the Jewish Agency and the Hagana were desperately preparing for the assault which they knew would come from several countries, and those countries had to cope with a flood of refugees from Palestine. Estimates vary greatly for the number of refugees who fled Palestine between the decision for partition and the end of the mandate, but it was certainly several hundred thousand.³³⁴ Britain complicated the diplomatic and military situation even further by demanding that Abdullah withdraw the Arab Legion from the West Bank territory which it had already occupied, without requiring the six or seven thousand foreign recruits in the Mufti's Arab Liberation Army to be repatriated. It's decision was apparently linked to its efforts to smooth its own relations with Egypt which did not wish Abdullah to gain an advantage from the ending of the mandate.³³⁵

The countdown continued. The Jewish forces gradually got the upper hand in their struggle with the Arab Liberation Army, broke the blockade of the Tel Aviv-Jerusalem road, regained control of several major towns, defeated the Arabs in parts of West Galilee, and really only had to worry about the siege of Jerusalem. The leaders of several Arab countries, Iraq, Lebanon, Egypt and Saudi Arabia, are said to have moved to a non-interventionist position and there was an expectation in some quarters that the UN would intervene when the mandate expired, separate the belligerents and force the Jewish State to adhere to the agreed partition plan. But the recapture of Haifa and Tiberias and a real threat to the Arab community at Jaffa galvanized the Arab League into action. It summoned a meeting of military commanders to prepare a plan for intervention by regular Arab armies but it was only a week or so before the end of the mandate that there was any certainty that the much-talked-about Arab invasion of the Jewish State would actually take place.

A strategy was prepared which would have had Transjordan's Arab Legion invade alongside the Iraqi forces, south of Lake Galilee, to move westward towards Haifa, but Abdullah would have nothing to do with it, insisting that the Arab Legion would re-occupy the regions of the West Bank which Britain had just forced it to vacate. In any case that plan became redundant when the Jewish forces occupied the balance of West Galilee. A loose understanding was therefore reached that Lebanese forces would invade West Galilee, the Syrians would invade to the north and south of Lake Galilee, the Iraqis would invade north central Palestine on the northern flank of Transjordan's Arab Legion which was targeting Jerusalem and the West Bank, and the Egyptians would invade through the Gaza Strip and Beersheba. In view of the fact that he directed the best equipped and trained army – and in spite of the fact that there was no effective strategy in place – Abdullah reluctantly accepted the role of Commander in Chief and only days before the British withdrawal the Arab League promised him a war chest of up to three million pounds Sterling in deference to his role.³³⁶

DOMESTIC IMPACT

Coinciding with Weizmann's plea to Truman and the massacre at Deir Yassin which triggered the refugee crisis, the president's special counsel, Clark Clifford, assessed the future of Palestine as having a big impact in ensuring the 'stunning victory' of an American Labor Party candidate, Leo Isacson, over the Democratic Party candidate in a district election in which 55 percent of the constituency was Jewish. Henry Wallace had spoken in support of Isacson and claimed that "Truman still talks Jewish, but acts Arab." Clifford, became alarmed that the president's re-election campaign was in jeopardy because of the change in policy from immediate partition to trusteeship, especially with the strength of the public awareness campaign organized by the Zionists with rallies against 'oil politics' and a barrage of protests to congressmen.³³⁷ His fears were compounded by a series of memos which he received from Max Lowenthal, a consultant to the White House and a close associate of the Jewish Agency, the first on May 7. Lowenthal bluntly called for recognition of the Jewish State even before May 15, saying that this would “free the administration of a serious and unfair disadvantage” in the November elections.³³⁸

The administration was, as usual, receiving very pointed advice from other quarters as well. On May 1, Pope Pius XII issued the encyclical Auspicia quaedam in which he referred to the holy places in Palestine which, he said, had long been disturbed, adding: “Indeed if there exists any place that ought to be most dear to every cultured person, surely it is Palestine where, from the dawn of antiquity, such great light of truth shone for all men ... We desire, therefore, Venerable Brethren, that supplications be poured forth to the most Holy Virgin for this request: that the situation in Palestine be at long last settled justly, and thereby concord and peace be also happily restored.”^{339 340} It is possible that in invoking petitions to the Holy Virgin the pope was simply pursuing the progressive expansion of Mariology as he had since his enthronement. However he could hardly have used an expression or called for a practice which would drawn attention more effectively to the fact that the Zionists were confronting a mixed population with people of two faiths in tension. Further division could only strengthen the Zionist case, not weaken it. In fact the pope played directly into the hands of the Zionists who were seeking to drive a wedge between the Muslim and Christian Arabs and to exploit the gap. The pope's intervention in that manner was confirmation that the Vatican had not given up its 1920's bid to secure a preferential position, or even control of Jerusalem in spite of the previous pope having denigrated it in loudly proclaiming the Lateran Treaty in 1929. In any case, Clifford need not have worried about outside interference. According to Richard Allen, Truman had already decided to push through a Palestinian policy in line with his personal views and sympathies. Eight days earlier he had secretly arranged for a message to be conveyed to Weizmann to the effect that he favoured a reversion to American support for the UNSCOP partition plan and that “if this led to the proclamation of a Jewish State, he would recognize it immediately.”³⁴¹

A DESPERATE BID FOR PEACE

Not everyone wanted to rush headlong into war. In a bid to broker a last minute peace deal or, some say, to strengthen his position in the Arab world, Abdullah held another secret meeting with Golda Meyerson and a fellow representative of the enemy, Ezra Danin, on May 11 in Amman. All three took a great risk in holding the meeting, but especially Mrs Meyerson who travelled disguised as a peasant woman. Abdullah pleaded with the Zionists to postpone the declaration of the Jewish State and to accept instead an undivided Palestine with autonomous Jewish areas. When Mrs Meyerson rejected the proposal Abdullah, in a most direct warning of what lay ahead, said that he had intended to honour his original agreement not to invade Jewish territory, but in the circumstances, being “one among five” he had no alternative and “I cannot act otherwise.” In an apparent bid to counter that argument Mrs Meyerson told the king that the Jews were his only friends, and, acknowledging that, he said he had “no illusions on that score” and he knew the other Arabs and their “good intentions.” He added that he firmly believed that Divine Providence has restored the Jews “... a Semite people who were banished to Europe and have benefited by its progress, to the Semite East, which needs your knowledge and initiative. ... But the situation is grave and we must not err through hasty action. Consequently I beg of you to be patient." When Mrs Meyerson again rejected the plea for a delay in the declaration of Jewish statehood the king said he deplored the coming bloodshed and destruction and invited her to come and see him again – during the fighting if need be.³⁴²

While Mrs Meyerson returned to Tel Aviv for a meeting of the Zionist Council of Thirteen next day, the Arabs continued their preparations for battle; Truman and his advisers finalized the text of his statement recognizing the sovereignty of the State of Israel; and the armies of Egypt, Jordan, Iraq and Syria massed on their borders with the proposed State of Israel, poised to invade immediately the British mandate ended and Jewish sovereignty was declared.

Actually two critical meetings were held next day, May 12, in time zones six hours apart. The first was the meeting of the Council of Thirteen in Tel Aviv which ran on late "through the night." Immediately the council had decided to proclaim the establishment of the State of Israel a phone call was made to Weizmann in New York who is said to have endorsed the decision with the words: "Proclaim the state, no matter what happens."³⁴³ In view of the secret message from Truman his confidence and insistence is not surprising.

The second meeting, which began in the White House, Washington, at 4 p.m., (10 p.m. Tel Aviv time), and at which Truman consulted his key advisers on whether to recognize the State of Israel immediately it was proclaimed – surely somewhat tongue-in-cheek – was marked by bitter clashes between Marshall and Clifford. Marshall objected to Clifford being present, saying that the subject was a serious matter of foreign policy and not one of domestic politics.³⁴⁴ Clifford, responding to the pressure from Lowenthal, tabled a draft presidential statement for immediate release which actually drew on some of the words from Lowenthal's latest memo to his assistant, George Elsey. It was to the effect that the US would recognize the Jewish State immediately it was proclaimed. His aim was basically to steal a march on the president's Republican opponents with a gesture which "would be amply repaid by Jewish votes and contributions," but he also believed it would outmanoeuvre the Soviet Union.³⁴⁵ The possibility that he was aware of Truman's secret message to Weizmann cannot be ignored.

However the Undersecretary of State, Lovett, who was certainly not aware of the message, objected. He said that such a statement would be "highly injurious" to the United Nations in view of the fact that it was still considering American sponsored alternatives for the government of Palestine. It was like buying a pig in a poke because it was not known what kind of Jewish state would be set up, and the president's prestige would suffer because it was "a very transparent attempt to win the Jewish vote." ³⁴⁶ Marshall's feelings were so strong that he told Truman that if he followed Clifford's advice, he (Marshall) would vote against him if he were to vote in the presidential elections. ³⁴⁷ Truman, who was known to be increasingly favouring Clifford rather than Marshall as a source of advice, apparently closed the meeting with the comment that he was inclined to agree with Marshall and that he would "sleep on it", but he then confided in Clifford that after a short cooling off period he would return to his suggestion.

348

Next morning, May 13, Truman did not use Clifford's statement at his regular press briefing but the cooling off period did not last long. That morning he received another personal letter from Weizmann, written within hours of the phone call from the Council of Thirteen in Tel Aviv, in which Weizmann asked him to "promptly recognize the Provisional Government of the new Jewish State."³⁴⁹ He was certainly briefed on the Council's intention to proclaim the new state from the time that the British mandate expired, but it appears that he may not have been briefed on the plan to issue the proclamation eight hours early, and certainly not on the name for the state or its claimed boundaries. In fact although there was collaboration between the White House and the Zionist authorities there was also confusion. Truman met the president of B'nai B'rith, Frank Goldman, on the morning of the 14th, and then ordered that a statement be prepared for issue immediately the proclamation took effect. Clifford worked on it from about 11.30 a.m., asking the representative of the Jewish Agency, Eliahu Epstein, to provide a formal letter of request for recognition, and consulting him on vital details to be included in the statement.³⁵⁰

THE VATICAN'S INTEREST IN JERUSALEM

Another message was also in circulation that morning. A Vatican 'opinion' on the subject had been published in Rome that morning in Osservatore Romano. It read in part: "Modern Zionism is not the true heir of Biblical Israel, but a secular state ... therefore the Holy Land and its sacred sites belong to Christianity, the True Israel."³⁵¹ [Emphasis added.] The pope had not been satisfied with the response to his encyclical of a fortnight earlier. In view of the close working relationship between the Vatican and the White House it is impossible that at least one or more of the three people concerned with the drafting of the president's message – Truman, Clifford and Epstein – were not aware of that 'opinion' when the drafting of the president's message began. We know from archival material relating to other situations which has been released that, on occasions, draft versions of messages which were about to be published were passed between Rome and the White House before they were published, sometimes even with an invitation to comment on them.³⁵²

Read in isolation that preposterous claim may appear to be either a simple flight of theological fancy or a heavy handed bid by the Vatican to secure more direct control of a host of holy places based on an extravagant misreading of history while the political situation was so fluid. However a closer reading suggests that it was a deliberate extension of the thrust of the encyclical Auspicia quaedam which had been issued only two weeks earlier and that it was a serious bid to justify a claim to Jerusalem and substantial surrounding territory to enable the re-establishment of the headquarters of the Catholic Church in the event that the Curia was forced to vacate the Vatican. In a lecture at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem in 1966 the Rev. Dr. Carl Hermann Voss said that if Italy had gone Communist after World War II the Pope had intended to establish a new Vatican City in Jerusalem and that this was one aspect of the Catholic Church's negative attitude to the establishment of Israel in 1948.³⁵³ At the Italian national elections in April 1948, while the future of Palestine still hung in the balance, the Communist-Socialist alliance gained 182 seats in the Italian Assembly compared with the ruling Christian Democrats 307 in spite of a vigorous anti-Communist crusade by the church and the massive intervention by the United States discussed above. (See: 'A touch of foreign aid') At the time that Auspicia quaedam was issued the Communists were still gaining influence and the prospect that both the Lateran Treaty and the Italian Concordat could be annulled by a future government was very real.

INDECENT HASTE ... AND A PRECEDENT TO REMEMBER

In any case during their hurried consultation on May 14 Epstein very astutely told Clifford that although he was prepared to take responsibility for issuing a request for recognition, he could not do so until the state had been proclaimed and had a provisional government.³⁵⁴ His letter of request was actually issued without the knowledge of the Council of Thirteen and without its authority; it referred to the boundaries as proposed in the UN partition resolution and was therefore in conflict with the council's intention; and, as drafted, it included the term "the Jewish State." This had to be changed by hand as the letter was being rushed to the White House because Epstein's secretary heard a radio news report that the name "the State of Israel" had been announced in the 4 p.m. Tel Aviv proclamation, (10 a.m. Washington time).³⁵⁵

Truman ordered that the statement be ready for issue a few minutes after 6 p.m., Washington time, when the British mandate was to expire. However the Secretary of State was not advised of this until between 3 p.m. and 4 p.m. and the undersecretary was not authorised to tell Ambassador Austin at the United Nations until 5.40 p.m., (2.40 pm in San Francisco).³⁵⁶ Truman's press secretary read the statement to media representatives at 6.11 p.m. Half an hour later, Austin, having retired to his room in disgust, left a member of the US delegation to read the statement to the UN General Assembly while it was actually debating the internationalization of Jerusalem and the future government of Palestine in the terms of the US sponsored trusteeship resolution.³⁵⁷ No foreign governments, not even Britain, had been advised. They were not trusted to hold the information confidential until the presidential statement was released to the world. Members of the UN General Assembly were stunned. The Cuban ambassador had to be restrained from going to the podium to announce his country's withdrawal from the UN, and US delegates were so embarrassed that it was feared by the White House that they might resign en masse.³⁵⁸

The situation bore an uncanny resemblance to that in London on October 31, 1917, when Chaim Weizmann, having played a major part in negotiating the Balfour Declaration, waited outside the British Cabinet room while the government actually ratified the declaration. On that earlier occasion the British government had seen 'a window of opportunity' in the desperate situation of the Jewish community and had sought to manipulate that community for its own imperial benefit. It had established a relationship of interdependence between Britain and the Zionist Movement; it had become the protector of that Movement; and it had tied the future of its imperial interests – and the interests of the world – to the decisions which it would subsequently make as a consequence of that relationship. On the later occasion, responding to the domestic political interests of its incumbent president, the United States had assumed the role of protector of Zionism which Britain had formally and finally rejected, and it had unwittingly adopted a posture of interdependence with Zionism in exactly the same manner as Britain forty years earlier. Its power brokers believed that they could control the nature and the outcomes of that relationship but they had actually demonstrated very clearly that the Zionist Movement could influence the outcome of any presidential election in which its interests were at stake and, as a corollary, that it could ultimately determine the policy of the US government in all matters relating to the State of Israel and events in the Middle East.

By issuing his statement of recognition of Israel in such indecent haste, Truman had enabled the Zionists to establish their state without having to formulate answers to a number of questions, the two most fundamental of which bore an uncanny resemblance to questions with which the Vatican was confronted in imposing its policy of Ultramontanism. (Chapter 15) It is only a case of substituting one name for the other. Firstly, what is the relationship between the State of Israel [or the Papal State], and Jews [or Catholics] who are citizens of countries throughout the World? Secondly, what is the relationship between the State of Israel [or the Papal State] and other states in which Jews [or Catholics] reside? But in addition, by issuing his statement of recognition of Israel in such indecent haste, Truman had shown that the United States would usurp the responsibility and the authority of the United Nations – the victors' club for which it had been a prime sponsor and architect, almost without a second thought. It was determined to play director, policeman and judge of the world's affairs. The US had imposed acceptance of the legitimacy of a state, the form of which had not even been announced, on not just the United Nations but the whole world, and in doing so it had ignored the wishes and the feelings of a substantial proportion of the world's people. This was not the first occasion on which the United States had acted in that manner and it was certainly not to be the last. But, because of the circumstances, this was the critical occasion on which the US served notice to the whole world more clearly than on any other occasion that it had to play to rules which the US would determine until it lost its grip or, in other words, until such time that world relationships would be changed by a major upheaval. And it was smugly confident that as long as it retained control of the nuclear arsenal there could be no such change in world relationships nor a challenge to its position.

By his action, Truman had strengthened the position of the World Zionist Organization and the provisional government of the State of Israel enormously. But in doing so at the expense of the Palestinians and in disregard of the interests of those peoples who claimed a special attachment to the city of Jerusalem, he had also ensured that the barrier between Israel and its neighbours would be strengthened progressively so that it would take a massive amount of politicking and a series of 'bought peaces' to keep it in place, or either enormous good will or enormous force to break it down. One of his successors – or a leader of Israel – may eventually decide, like Britain, that the benefits from maintaining that barrier no longer justify the cost, but that point has not yet been reached and the indications are that when it is, the trauma for the United States will be far greater than in Britain's case. However, Truman and his administration had hit the self-destruct button just as surely as David Lloyd-George and his administration had by negotiating the Balfour Declaration. The consequences of manipulating the Jewish community for third party self-interest is just as firmly built into its role as the principle instrument through which Divine Will shall prevail is as definite and as decisive as the consequences for that community when it breached its covenant and triggered the 'penal clause' of the Qur'anic prophecy of the Night Journey. This was referred to in chapter six, and it will be discussed again in 'Reflections in a wine glass.' Basically it is a matter of relationships undermined and strategic decisions made which play into the hands of those affected by the broken relationships.

In retrospect the secret Abdullah-Meyerson meeting, and the critical meeting of the Council of Thirteen next day in Tel Aviv to which Mrs Meyerson returned and reported,³⁵⁹ assume the same importance in confirming and demonstrating the Zionist decision to transgress against the people of Palestine, in breach of the Covenant of Sinai, as did the Seventh Congress of the Zionist Organization in Basle in 1905. It was at that congress that the decision was taken to proceed with settlement in Palestine without waiting for the agreement of the authorities concerned and in total disregard of the Qur'anic prophecy of the Night Journey. The meeting of the Council of Thirteen was the last chance to avoid another war over the issue. But it was only confirmation. It was not the trigger for the action of the Night Journey. Gog and Magog had already had their war. It simply helped to reinforce the validity of Maimonides' expectation of the return to Israel. Stage one was all but complete. It was shown to be at dawn on May 15, within hours of Ben Gurion's declaration and Truman's statement of recognition, when the Arab armies crossed the new borders and were at war with the State of Israel. There were 10,000 Egyptian troops, 4,500 Arab Legionnaires, 7,000 Syrians, 8,000 Iraqis and 3,000 Lebanese – a total of 32,500 troops – confronting 30,000 troops of the Jewish Hagana.³⁶⁰ Stage two, the progressive movement towards the Messianic Age still seemed a long way in the future. But at least the Jewish community could say: "We've made it ... thanks to Hitler's gentle persuasion."

However there were other people who could say the same thing. The acting out of the parody of Mein Kampf had resulted in the people of India and Pakistan gaining their independence and even membership of the United Nations. It had been a long and bitter struggle, and dreadfully tragic in the home run, but they had made it. So had the people of Yemen. And the people of Myanmar (Burma). And there were many other colonies and territories of the European powers which would soon be able to say the same. It was inevitable. The colonial era was in its last throes. That had not been Hitler's intention, and the people of those countries may not have been conscious of the way the situation had unfolded, but it was an integral part of the parody. It was an integral part of Maimonides' vision that in due course the world would live at peace in harmony. Harmony required an end to master and slave-nation relationships. An end to exploitation of one people by another. It was not apparent to the world at that time but, by unwittingly being caught up in the fulfilment of the Qur'anic prophecy of the Night Journey, the Jewish community was, equally unwittingly, the catalyst for the ending of the imperial phase of colonialism. The economic phase still has another stage to run.

Then there was another country whose people should also have been saying: "We've made it ... thanks to Hitler's gentle persuasion." The United States of America. But its people expressed it slightly differently.

Britain had gone to war in a desperate bid to preserve its empire. But because it could not understand the basis or the origins of its crisis, the harder it tried to hang on, the greater the task became. It could have preserved much of its empire intact if it had been prepared to treat with Hitler and with the Japanese at any of a number of points as the war progressed, as we have seen. But it was caught in a tightening spiral of its own making and, as we have also seen, short of recognizing and unraveling the trouble in the triangle it could not reverse the spiral and preserve its empire. In any case, if it had reversed the spiral, the processes of doing so would have required an end to the long established colonial policies of the amorphous Christian gel. It was now the empire which was unraveling instead. Not the trouble in the triangle. The empire had already lost some pieces and it was about to lose the lot over a period of another thirteen years.

It was America, the ally which had reluctantly agreed to support Britain in its war – out of pure self-interest – that was the big winner. The longer the war continued and the more precarious Britain's position became, the stronger America's position became. The United States had not only helped to ease the European powers out of Asia: it had taken firm suzerainty over Japan. As a result it did not have to pursue a continuing contest with Japan for dominant influence in Asia. It was assured of the dominant role itself, and because of the economic policies which it had succeeded in putting in place, first through the Atlantic Charter and the Lend Lease program for Britain, then its back-door entry into the Middle East's oil estates, next the Bretton Woods institutions and finally the Marshall Plan, it was in an unassailable position – provided it played its cards to best effect and prevented the Soviet Union from getting under its guard. The world was both its source of supply and its market place. Virtually its footstool. And its exclusive hold on atomic weapons meant that no one could resist it or compete with it. The 'New Israel' had indeed been richly blessed and everyone knew that it was because of its devotion to Christianity. It was getting its just rewards. Apart from that dastardly attack on its little annexed island territory of Hawaii by Japan it had come through the war without a scratch. America was God's own country and the opportunity to assume world leadership had been entrusted to it. Britain had thought that, when its far flung empire circled the globe. But it lost the plot. The Germans had also thought that when they went to war with the Kaiser in 1914. They had been imbued with the German Protestant belief that German history was a unique and most significant part of revelation.(Chapter 16) They were wrong. They received a rude shock. But America definitely was. By the Grace of God, or by courtesy of the trouble in the triangle, it now had the A Bomb which had been proposed and built with the aim of knocking out the scourge before he could complete his 'Final Solution.' Unprecedented power and authority lay within its hands. It was the New Israel which had been blessed with the opportunity to reach for the pinnacle of world authority. It had done so, and the world was expected to recognize that: "We've made it!" The trouble was, it was already hell-bent on misusing that authority.

Volume III

Part 6

FIFTY WASTED YEARS: TWIN PARODIES POINT THE WAY AHEAD

CHAPTER 28

Here comes the Messianic Age !

“One of the greatest duties of the Jewish people is the attempt to enter the promised land, not by means of the conquest of Joshua, but through peaceful and cultural means.” With that statement in a speech at the Hebrew University in 1929 Judah Magnes reflected the passionately held belief of many ordinary Jews throughout the world, both religious and non-religious. Similarly, he reflected their personal aspirations when he wrote about immigration, settlement on the land and Hebrew life and culture. “If you can guarantee these for me, [he wrote] I should be willing to yield the Jewish ‘state’ and the Jewish ‘majority...’ Palestine can help this [Jewish] People perform its great ethical mission as a national-international entity. But this eternal and far flung People does not need a Jewish State for the purpose of maintaining its very existence. ... Much of the theory of Zionism has been concerned with making the Jews into a ‘normal’ nation in Palestine.”¹

And yet much that the Zionist community, world wide, had done to bring about the establishment of their Jewish State was anything but ‘peaceful and cultural’. An easy transition from an environment of rabid anti-Semitism and carefully orchestrated oppression, with constant fear, pain and sorrow in Europe, to a bountiful and self governing utopia in the Promised Land which Theodor Herzl had portrayed in The Jewish State had proved to be an illusion. There had been bitter resistance from the greater proportion of the Christian church, a total breakdown in relations with the Arab world, increased anti-Semitism culminating in the Holocaust, the collapse of the British mandate in very acrimonious circumstances, and the use of terrorist tactics by some units of the Zionist defence forces as violent as those to which the Jews of Europe had been accustomed. Finally there was an enormous struggle to raise sufficient support in the United Nations to force through a vote to partition Palestine in order to establish the State of Israel. That struggle had required the support of the United States in a systematic program of political and economic coercion against the smaller member states of the United Nations which has already been discussed. (Chapter 27: A different kind of gentle persuasion) This led progressively to a relationship of interdependence between Israel and the United States which is unique in world history, which can be characterized as ‘the US-Israel Alliance.’ It continues to play a determining role in world affairs. Subsequently the politics of survival, consolidation and expansion have involved Israel in policies and programs just as harsh and oppressive as those under which the Jewish community suffered prior to the Holocaust. The conduct of the State of Israel has become a parody on Herzl’s The Jewish State in much the same way that Mein Kampf was a parody on the amorphous gel of Western Christianity, and this serves to illustrate further the nature of the trouble in the triangle.

However much of that still lay ahead at four o'clock on the afternoon of Friday, May 14, 1948, when David Ben Gurion rose to address two hundred specially invited guests in the Tel Aviv Museum eight hours before the British mandate was officially due to end. He could not wait until midnight to proclaim the establishment of the State of Israel because Orthodox Jewish religious law forbade any activity or functions on the Sabbath, and he feared the consequences of deferring the declaration to a later date. From the point of view of on-site practicalities, bringing the declaration forward a few hours probably didn't make much difference. There was already a power vacuum in Palestine because the British High Commissioner, Sir Alan Cunningham, his staff and the remaining British forces had begun vacating their quarters – begun their evacuation might be more appropriate – before sunrise that morning only a few hours after Sir Alan had broadcast a farewell speech at 9 pm on the 13th.²

One of the last pre-departure actions of one British staff officer was to ceremonially deliver a key to the Zion Gate into the Old City of Jerusalem to Rabbi Weingarten, the senior Jewish citizen in the Jewish Quarter. It was a symbolic gesture of good will, probably prompted by the pro-Israeli sympathies of the High Commissioner, which the officer is said to have marked with the statement: "From the year AD 70 until today a key to the gates of Jerusalem has never been in Jewish hands. This is the first time in eighteen centuries that your people have been so privileged."³ It is doubtful whether the officer realized the irony in his action and his remark. He may have intended his action to be what many Jews were looking for: a symbolic gesture of Divine Deliverance. On the other hand he may have been giving the departure ceremony political overtones, implying that Britain had made good its Balfour Declaration. But as a representative of the Defender of the (English version of the Christian) Faith he was placing a key to the city of profound importance to the people of each of the three Abrahamic messianic faiths in the hands of a person of one of the competing faiths which Britain had sought to manipulate for its own ends through the Balfour Declaration. It was the city which Pope Pius XI had denigrated when he announced the Lateran Treaty and his sovereignty over Vatican City in 1929. (Chapter 17) It was also the city which his successor, Pius XII, had been considering as an alternative base for the Vatican when there was a distinct possibility that a Communist government may be elected in Italy and revoke the Lateran Treaty. (Chapter 27: The Vatican's interest in Jerusalem) Britain was not officially, or in fact, handing the city into the control of the Jewish community and to have done so would have been quite contradictory of the policy of the government at that time. By decision of the United Nations, and in a bid to make an unworkable situation workable, the city was not to be controlled by the people of any one religious or ethnic community. It was to be an international zone administered, provisionally, by a UN Commissioner. The key ought therefore have been handed to that body. But when war determined the fate of the old city it actually came under Jordanian control and the Zion Gate did not provide access directly to and from Israel but through the demilitarized zone, commonly called 'No man's land'. As the little ceremony took place bitter battles were being fought between the Jewish and Palestinian Arab communities for control of Jerusalem and the city had been under siege for some time, Arab armies were poised around the borders of Palestine ready to begin an invasion next morning, Golda Meyerson (Meir) had conducted an astonishingly successful fund raising tour of the United States, and other emissaries of the Jewish Agency were in Europe and the US pressing for the best bargains they could achieve in arms purchases which they hoped would make the ceremony of the key a prelude to reality.⁴

However politicking and disagreement about if and when the Zionists should declare the establishment of a Jewish State or whether they should accept an American sponsored truce to allow more time for negotiation on the future of Palestine had delayed their decision until a mere two days before the declaration was issued. The function was therefore organized at very short notice and Ben Gurion read the declaration from a typed sheet stapled to the parchment scroll which was being prepared as the official document. A meeting of the Council of Thirteen, the supreme body which had been constituted to succeed the Jewish Agency Executive and to act as a provisional government in the event that a state was proclaimed, had been held in Tel Aviv on May 12. The basic question to be decided was whether to accept the US-sponsored proposal for a truce which was then being debated in the UN General Assembly or to proceed with the proclamation of a state. There was a real prospect that if a truce was accepted Palestine would simply fall under US trusteeship in place of the British mandate and that a Jewish state might never be proclaimed. But against that there were the alternative prospects of either a breakthrough in negotiations towards peace and a better level of understanding, or a pause which would enable the Zionists to import more arms and thus have a better chance of success in a war with the Arabs. With only ten of the thirteen members of the council present the motion to accept the truce proposal was lost when only four members supported it.⁵ The consequential questions of whether to proclaim boundaries to the new state, what it should be named, and when to make the proclamation were then dealt with.

Some members favoured recognizing and proclaiming the borders contained in the United Nations resolution, but Ben Gurion opposed this. He said that while the Jews had been prepared to accept those proposed borders, with many reservations, the Arabs had not and therefore, in his view, they had forfeited the right to a partition plan. He was confident of victory in the war which lay ahead and he wanted 'practical' borders based on either the territory which the Jews then controlled or those which might be gained from war. His view prevailed. On the choice of the name for the new state – Zion, Israel, the State of the Jews or The Jewish State ⁶ – Ben Gurion's view again prevailed. But on the timing of the proclamation it did not. An Orthodox participant insisted that as the time for the end of the British mandate, midnight Friday/Saturday, fell in the middle of the Sabbath the latest time at which the proclamation ceremony could begin – if it were to take effect immediately the British mandate was terminated – would be 4 pm on Friday afternoon. That was agreed.⁷

Orthodox Jewish religious belief had determined the time for the proclamation of the Jewish State and it would have a dominant and dramatic influence on the laws of the nation as time passed, but it was Zionist philosophy rather than the tenets of Judaism which had powered the juggernaut towards immediate recognition of the new state and which would determine its attitude to international affairs and the politics and actions of survival. This is illustrated by Collins and Lapierre's description of the guests invited to the ceremony. "The backgrounds of those men were as diverse as the race they represented. ... They were bound together by a common faith, Zionism, a common heritage, Jewish history, and a common curse, persecution."

⁸ It is noteworthy that Zionism came first and was elevated to the status of their faith. Judaism came second as an aspect of their common heritage, and the diverse supporters of both were, together, identified as a race, regardless of the fact that the racial connection between Judaism and its adherents had been eliminated by two factors, proselytizing in North Africa, the Near East and Europe, and the adoption of Judaism in kingdoms of totally dissimilar backgrounds by the personal choice of rulers. (Chapters 5 & 8.)

ISRAEL: THE CENTRAL FACT OF THE CHRISTIAN ERA

That description by Collins and Lapierre is well justified in view of the declaration drafted and read by Ben Gurion in Tel Aviv that afternoon. It contained a minimum of references to religion either as the basis of the new state or to indicate the religious significance of the event which it marked. This is remarkable considering that the event – the establishment of the State of Israel – was the central fact of the Christian Era. It was, and is, the central fact of the Christian Era for several reasons. It elevated Judaism, from which Christianity arose, and the Jewish State to centre stage in world affairs and in doing so established the circumstances which would, in due course, require the church to reassess its fundamental theology and its self understanding in collaboration with Jews and Muslims whether it wishes to or not. The church cannot avoid that reassessment.

As we have seen, the establishment of the State of Israel happened as a consequence of policies adopted and actions taken by the Western Christian nations which were linked to their long-standing Christian self-understanding and in which they took full advantage of that self-understanding in pursuing their own and the church's loudly proclaimed divine obligations. In addition, while the Christian church had maintained that by divine decision the event simply could not and would not happen, and while the Jewish community at large saw it as a matter of divine prerogative and an indication of the impending arrival of the Messianic Age, it represented the convergence of prophetic expectations generated within both Judaism and Islam (the validity of both of which the church disputed) and in so doing it clearly implied divine influence, intervention or authority on the path towards a foreshadowed outcome. To argue that the establishment of the State of Israel is purely a matter of earthly coincidence or human effort and that it therefore had nothing to do with divine intervention is, at best, to admit that the church did not know what it was talking about and that it could not influence the outcome anyway. At worst it is a denial of its long held belief and vigorously pressed claim that the fate of Israel (never to be restored) and the fate of the Jews (to remain in abject dispersion) were matters of divine decision. To illustrate this we have only to recall the pronouncement by Osservatore Romano in support of Pope Benedict's bid to gain international support for the disallowance of Britain's plans for Palestine at the time of the Peace Conferences, in 1919. [See above, chapter 17, p. 31R.] Osservatore Romano stated that the Jews had been dispersed by divine decree and would return to Palestine only after they had converted to Christianity. It continued: "The salvation of Israel will arrive when all the nations open their souls to the hope of the Kingdom of God. ... (But) even when East and West fully join the Catholic Church and the Jews accept Christianity, there will still be no assurance that the Jewish nation will rise again."⁹ If the church denies the validity of such pronouncements over a very long period, or admits that it was wrong and says that it merely made a mistake, then it has admitted to losing, or to never having had, the divine authority and absolute knowledge on which it has based its claims – both theological and political. In that case its entire doctrinal basis is undermined, beginning with the Doctrine of the Trinity, so that it must start all over again and admit that its claims have no more validity than those of any of the faiths which it has so strenuously denigrated.

However, of even greater significance, the establishment of the State of Israel is consistent with two things, both of which, according to the church, had no validity. The first was the Covenant of Sinai. The second was the Qur'anic prophecy of the Night Journey. As already noted (chapter 6) the New Covenant proclaimed through the life of Jesus of Nazareth did not in any way invalidate the permanence of the Covenant of Sinai. Christ simply conveyed an additional covenant to the same community which had been party to the Covenant of Sinai. That covenant was a complex of appointment or status, by virtue of being chosen; responsibility within a special role; protection; judgement and subjection to penalty; permanence; and recovery or rehabilitation. Permanence, coupled with a penal aspect which did not mean the end of the covenant, clearly points to recovery or rehabilitation. The church had long denied both the permanence and the possibility of rehabilitation – except that it saw a permanent status of rejection and degradation. And, as also noted in that chapter, while the Qur'anic prophesy of the Night Journey carried a penal aspect in the event of transgression, that was only one aspect of Israel's relationship with God and it in no way affected the permanence of the covenant relationship.

The multiple aspects of the covenant relationship indicated by the Night Journey can be summarised in these points.

First: humanity is still in a stage of social or communal evolution, and the Jewish community was predestined to act as the focus – or a 'lightning conductor' – for divine intervention in the event that the dominant power or powers of the time – at any future point – would act in a manner which justified such divine intervention.

Such acts by the dominant powers would be contrary to the spirit of the Gospels and, basically, that means oppressing or exploiting other peoples. The intervention would have two basis aspects. One would be judgement and discipline or retribution. The other would be to protect, establish or re-establish the human rights of the oppressed or exploited peoples. Such interaction would progressively lead humanity towards stable, harmonious relations in such a manner that all humanity is enabled to understand, and to act according to its relationship with God. Human rights, in the context of this interaction, means the relationships, support and interpersonal conduct, including access to the basic requirements of life, which are illustrated by either the Hebrew (or Mosaic) law, the Gospels, or the Qur'an, all of which are in the same spirit and are essential vehicles for, or components of, the revelation of Divine Will. Jesus, and those whose work contributed to the New Testament, built on the Hebrew Bible in its entirety. Muhammad, and those whose work contributed to the Qur'an, built on both the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament. None stands on its own. They were never intended to. They are progressive and interlocking. They cannot be adequately understood in isolation.

Second: as a community of faith they were to be – and are still to be – a body or an instrument, or a trigger, through which the continuity and the nature of Divine Law could be demonstrated for all humanity to see and to understand, without there being rigid rules of conduct or restrictions imposed on humanity which would contradict the God-given human capacity and opportunity to make value judgements and decisions, and to act in total free will.

Third: the Jewish community may, in due course, lose its patience with the consequences of being the focal point or the target for other people's misconduct – the suffering and distress caused by it – or lose its confidence in God to protect them. In that event it may respond to the oppressive pressure of the dominant community in self-defence or out of self-interest. In doing so, it may, itself, transgress against its neighbours.

If such transgression occurs, but only if it occurs, the fourth aspect or 'penal clause' of the prophecy would come into effect.

Fifth : the penal clause is an integral aspect of the Covenant, not an end in itself, and, as the words which Moses attributed to God indicate, divine punishment is a phase which does not affect the permanence of the Covenant of Sinai. The Jewish community is still bound in its special relationship with God in the terms of the Covenant as the community through which humanity will be enabled to better understand its relationship with God and to experience the Messianic Age in terms of Maimonides' understanding.

The expression 'through which' is vital to an understanding of this aspect of the covenant. Not every enabling action has been, or necessarily will be, a positive action on the part of the Jewish community. Any such action, or combination of actions, taken within the totality of the Abrahamic community is, in effect, an action flowing through the same community because of the integrated nature of the triangle and the origins of both Christianity and Islam within the context of Judaism. All three are streams of the same faith: Yahwism.

The events leading up to the return of the Jewish community to Palestine illustrate each of those aspects of the Covenant relationship.

The 'lightning conductor' role of the community is illustrated by the way in which the misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel which was directed at it built towards a peak concurrently with the European Colonial Era.

The Dreyfus Affair (chapter 15) was the aspect of misconduct by the amorphous Christian gel which finally caused the community to lose its patience and its confidence in God and to establish the World Zionist Organization which became the instrument of transgression against its Arab neighbours in Palestine. (Chapters 16 ff.)

The 'penal clause' following transgression is illustrated by Hitler's attempted 'Final Solution.' That was the climax of the parody which was Mein Kampf: the parody the church's self-understanding and the conduct of the amorphous Christian gel. Hitler had said repeatedly that he would put into effect the program which the church talked a lot about but failed to put into effect. In doing so he acted out the role of the Scourge of the prophecy of the Night Journey, but the church was unable to recognize it because of its arrogant self-misunderstanding and the constraints of the web of doctrine and dogma which it had woven around itself.

The 'trigger' for the demonstration of Divine intervention and for movements towards the realization of Divine Will is illustrated by two things. The first is the way in which the Jewish community became the focal point for the Second World War which, due to reaction against the conduct of the Western powers, brought the imperial phase of the colonial era to an end. The second is the way in which it was also the trigger for a resurgence of Muslim self-understanding, self-esteem and cohesion which had taken a battering under the impact of the amorphous Christian gel during the Colonial Era. As we have already seen, the Muslim community and its faith had already been written off by the church-at-large, especially after the successful elimination of the Ottoman Empire as a consequence of the First World War and the subsequent dissolution of the Sultanate by Ataturk. The proclamation of the State of Israel triggered a renaissance in both Hebrew scholarship and Islamic scholarship and a recovery in Muslim business enterprise. This means that, overall, it triggered a reshaping of the triangle in such a manner that the church can no longer deny its reality and its importance. As with other influences which have been noted, and especially the fact that the 'penal clause' was not the be-all-and-end-all of the covenant relationship, the renaissance in Islam was not an end in itself either. It is simply one more phase in a never-ending process.

The permanence of the covenant relationship is illustrated by the way in which the Jewish community, represented by the State of Israel, continues to be the focal point of crises and for crises which will determine the future course of world relationships and events.

However we are still waiting to see the full flowering of the final aspect: leadership in the move towards a better understanding of humanity's relationship with God. By its corporate conduct the State of Israel has become a parody of Herzl's Der Judenstaat in the same way in which Mein Kampf was a parody of the church.

ROUGH ROAD TO THE MESSIANIC AGE

Fortunately there are clear indications that we can anticipate a continuing renaissance of Jewish scholarship and faith, and that (in the same way that it became a lighting conductor for the effects of the misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel) in responding to renewed awareness of the Covenant and divine inspiration, the Jewish community will become a catalyst to enable humanity to move towards a better understanding of its relationship with God and its responsibilities. That being the case, in due course humanity will experience the Messianic Age in terms of Maimonides' understanding. However there are also ample signs of a rough road ahead before we reach that point. That is why the people of all three faiths must move quickly to understand the nature of the trouble in the triangle, even though, because of the issues involved in the development of its self-understanding and the conduct of the amorphous Christian gel, the greatest responsibility rests on the church. There is no point in sitting back and waiting for illustrations of divine intervention accompanied by fearsome supernatural phenomena such as Moses' experience of the burning bush and his call to bring the sons of Israel out of Egypt. (Exodus 3) Nor the experience of divine proclamation of the Covenant on Mount Sinai (Exodus 19); the Disciples' experience of the Transfiguration (Matthew 17); Pentecost (Acts 2); Muhammad's Night Journey, or Thomas Aquinas' experience on the journey to Lyons which he was never to complete. (Chapter 8) It can be recognized in the affairs of humanity through the trauma, the tragedy and the triumph of human relations as the trouble in the triangle moves inexorably towards a climax.

The proclamation of the Jewish State was therefore even more central to the Christian Era than the life and ministry of the Prophet Muhammad through whom Islam was established and the triangle of Abrahamic Messianic faiths was complete. The proclamation of the Jewish State brought the three faiths into a relationship which they had never before experienced. It was therefore a remarkable opportunity for theologians or historians of religion to make a considered statement about the relationships between the three Semitic Messianic faiths and about how the world had stumbled into the complex situation which resulted in the establishment of the State of Israel. Such a statement could have changed the course of the trouble in the triangle, precipitated the reassessment of messianic theology and interfaith relationships which continues to become more urgent, and ushered in a new self-understanding on the part of the institutional church instead of a long period of defensiveness and the steady decline in its influence. Regrettably that opportunity was lost. Certainly there was another opportunity pending, because 351 delegates who would represent 147 independent churches from forty four countries at the formative assembly of the World Council of Churches were preparing for debates which would determine the course of the ecumenical movement – and define the self-understanding of the world's Protestant churches – in Amsterdam just three months later.

Those 351 people were struggling with a mass of papers based on the theme "Man's Disorder and God's Design". Their starting point was the statement that the church is "to place the efforts at world reconstruction in a totally different perspective by announcing the stupendous fact that God Himself is at work rebuilding His own order amid the disorder of man." They had been bluntly reminded by the Provisional Committee of the Council some months earlier that "the Churches of Christ have failed in preventing man's disorder" and that therefore "our first and deepest need is not new organization, but the renewal, or rather the rebirth, of the actual churches.”¹⁰ [Emphasis added.] It was a remarkable honest, self-deprecating and insightful appreciation of the situation, even prescient, and it demonstrated humility which was quite rare in the history of the church. It was uplifting. It was pregnant with possibilities and it augured well for a new understanding of the role of the church. But, as was to be expected, there were those who saw it as being way out in front. Too far in front. Out of touch with the mainstream church. Distinctly revolutionary. Influenced by the trauma of the war and reacting in much the same manner as the International Missionary Council when it met in Jerusalem – among a lot of Muslims and Jews – twenty years earlier. (Chapter 17) They would try to rein it in, in due course. Restrain the dynamics. Put the emphasis on personal salvation. ‘The church’ should not try to reshape the world. Not the Reformed churches, anyway. They should leave that to the Vatican. It was doing very well since the pope embraced Western Democratic Capitalism. (Chapter 25, Another change of heart, and chapter 27, Temporal Authority, the Lateran Treaty and civil government.)

ONE RETURN: MANY UNDERSTANDINGS

For reasons which we shall consider shortly, every group involved in the crises leading to the establishment of the State of Israel was compromised by its role in the crises, or deeply divided, or both, and no one who really cared could shout loud enough to be heard. It has been said that the use of a few religious expressions in the Israeli declaration of the establishment of a modern, democratic and secular state was a sop to the feelings of religious Jews. But on the other hand it has also been seen as “a sincere declaration of religious faith, whether or not a faith subscribed to by all the signatories.”¹¹ However when we use English language translations to consider the meaning or intention of the declaration we have just as great a problem as when we consider the meaning of passages from the Qur’an, such as the Night Journey, discussed in chapter six, or the New Testament Revelation of John. Three translations of the declaration consulted for this book show significant differences in the use of terms and therefore in the meaning of key passages. They even use different titles for the same document.

In the first translation, used by Laqueur and Rubin in the Israel-Arab Reader ¹² under the title ‘State of Israel Proclamation of Independence’ the proclamation opens with the words: “The Land of Israel was the birthplace of the Jewish people. Here their spiritual, religious and national identity was formed. Here they achieved independence and created a culture of national and universal significance. Here they wrote and gave the Bible to the world.” There is no reference to God, or divine will, or to a Jewish understanding of a universal role for the State of Israel. Indeed there is no reference to the constitution having any basis in religious faith. The only reference to faith as such is that the Jewish people, “Exiled from the Land of Israel ... remained faithful to it in all the countries of their dispersion, never ceasing to pray and hope for their return and the restoration of their national freedom.” It refers to Jews striving through the centuries “to go back to the land of their fathers and regain their statehood”; to Herzl and the First Zionist Congress; the Balfour Declaration; the Holocaust and efforts by survivors to reach Erezt-Yisrael; and the United Nations resolution “requiring the establishment of a Jewish State in Palestine” which it described as an “unassailable” right. It then formally proclaims “the establishment of the Jewish State in Palestine, to be called Medinath Yisrael (The State of Israel)”, sets out the principles of equality on which the state will be based, appeals for the support of the United Nations and admission “into the family of nations”, invites Arab cooperation for the common good, and calls for the Jewish people all over the world “to rally to our side in the task of immigration and development, and to stand by us in the great struggle for the fulfilment of the dream of generations for the redemption of Israel.”

The use of the very ambiguous expression ‘the redemption of Israel’ is a transparent bid to woo people of many persuasions, because it can be interpreted in several ways. It can be read as a reference to the saving of the Jewish people from exile and oppression; the salvation of the people with the coming of the Messiah and the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth; the advance of modern society towards greater freedom, tolerance and social justice; or as the return of the Jewish people to its homeland.¹³ The proclamation closes with the statement that: “With trust in the Rock of Israel, we set our hands to this Declaration, at this Session of the Provisional State Council, on the soil of the Homeland ...”

The second translation, in Critical Documents of Jewish History by Isaacs and Olitzky uses the title ‘The Declaration of the Establishment of the State of Israel 1948’¹⁴ and in the same vein there is no reference to God, or divine will, or to a Jewish understanding of a universal role for the State of Israel, or to the constitution having any basis in religious faith. The reference to the faith and hope of the Jewish people includes the notion of their being exiled by force, and has a changed emphasis in that they “kept faith with their Land in all the countries of their dispersion, steadfast in their prayer and hope to return and here revive their political freedom.” However both translations bear a close resemblance to the terminology used in various pre-messianic cultures or so-called ‘primitive’ religions such as that of the Australian Aborigines which have become the focus of controversy between occupying western governments acting on behalf of resource extractive corporations, and indigenous peoples struggling to gain recognition for their legitimate rights. In the circumstances of 1948 it was a reversion of convenience for those supporting the establishment of the State of Israel in spite of the rights of other people. We shall come to it again, in due course.

Similarly, the only reference to a religious basis for the establishment of the State of Israel in both translations is the clause that the State of Israel “will be based on [rest upon] the foundations of liberty, justice and peace as conceived [envisioned] by the Prophets of Israel ...” Even the way in which the term ‘Prophets of Israel’ is used is ambiguous so that it could be read to either include or exclude Maimonides and later Jewish writers of the Christian Era of, say, the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, according to the reader’s perspective. Again, in the second translation the preparation of the Holy Scriptures is attributed to human effort with no suggestion of Divine Inspiration, but there is a change in emphasis: “In the Land of Israel the Jewish people came into being. In this land was shaped their spiritual, religious and national character. Here they lived in sovereign independence. Here they created a culture of national and universal import, and gave to the world the eternal Book of Books.” The declaration then concluded with a similar statement calling on “Jewish people throughout the Diaspora ... to be at our right hand in the great endeavour to fulfill the age-old longing for the redemption of Israel”, and the clause “With Trust in the Rock of Israel, we set our hands [in witness] to this Proclamation, at this session of the Provisional Council of State, on the soil of the homeland ...”

However in the third translation, quoted by Jacobs in The Jewish Religion under the title ‘The Declaration of Independence of the State of Israel’,¹⁵ some distinctly different terms are used which have the effect of increasing the religiosity of the declaration and the universality of Jewish influence, and which impute a reference to God as well. The key difference is that the expression “Placing our trust in the Almighty ...” is used in the conclusion in place of “With Trust in the Rock of Israel ...” But in addition the term “Eretz-Israel” is used in the reference to the birthplace of the Jewish people and in some other instances. In particular it is used in a reference to the UN resolution on the partition of Palestine, thus: “On 29 November 1947, the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution calling for the establishment of a Jewish State in Eretz-Israel; the General Assembly required the inhabitants of Eretz-Israel to take such steps as were necessary on their part for the implementation of that resolution.” The use of the term ‘Eretz-Israel’ (and to a lesser extent the use of the term ‘Land of Israel’ in the second translation) is in clear conflict with the UN resolution as set out by Laqueur and Rubin¹⁶ in which the term ‘Palestine’ is used consistently, coinciding with both the terminology and the boundaries of the mandate.

Furthermore the use of the term ‘Eretz-Israel’, although it has Biblical and therefore religious connotations, is quite inappropriate and quite misleading because it refers to a concept for which there is no consistent, formally or generally agreed definition. It also implies historical possession of the land in a sense in which any other people are present only under sufferance and with no legal rights. It has been used in a variety of circumstances to refer to either the entire region occupied by Israelites at some time during the pre-Christian era, the restricted area of the Biblical Northern Kingdom, or the territory nominated in the Biblical promise to the people of Israel.¹⁷ Since the rise of Zionism the term has also been used in the manner of an ambit claim for territory for the State of Israel, the most notable of which were Herzl’s idea of Altneuland, and the term has also been loosely applied to the proposal made by the Zionist Organization for a Jewish National Home in Palestine during League of Nations mandate negotiations in 1919. Herzl’s Altneuland incorporated territory bounded on the west by the Mediterranean, from Beirut to the Euphrates, Palestine, the Transjordan and Sinai, thus taking in parts of modern day Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, Jordan and Egypt.¹⁸

Herzl took as the basis of his proposal the concept recorded in both the Abrahamic Covenant and the Covenant of Sinai which came into effect during the reign of King Solomon. Genesis 15:18–21 reads;

HERE COMES THE MESSIANIC AGE !

That day Yahweh made a Covenant with Abram [the patriarch's original name] in these terms: 'To your descendants I give this land, from the Wadi of Egypt to the Great River, the river Euphrates, the Kenites, the Kenizzites, the Kadmonites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Rephaim, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Girgashites, and the Jebusites.'

That promise was followed, as we have seen, by a comprehensive set of conditions and qualifications, notably, Genesis 17:9; "God said to Abraham, [his name having been changed by divine decree] 'You on your part shall maintain my Covenant, yourself and your descendants after you, generation after generation.'

Exodus 23:31–33 reads;

"For your frontiers I shall fix the Sea of Reeds and the Philistine Sea, the desert and the river; yes I shall deliver the inhabitants of the country into your hands, and you will drive them out before you. You must make no pact with them or with their gods. They must not live in your country or they will make you sin against me; you would come to worship their gods, and that would be a snare from you indeed."

However those verses are preceded, in verses 23:27–30, by:

"I shall spread panic ahead of you; I shall throw into confusion all the people you encounter; I shall make all your enemies turn and run from you. I shall send hornets in front of you to drive Hivite and Canaanite and Hittite from your presence. I shall not drive them out before you in a single year, or the land would become a desert where, to your cost, the wild beasts would multiply. Little by little I will drive them out before you until your numbers grow and you come into possession of the land."

There was no suggestion that they were to occupy that territory by warfare. The worshippers of idols would vacate it circumstantially so that it would become a base for the establishment of the community through whom all of humanity would progressively be enabled to understand their relationship with God. In due course, as recorded in Kings 5:1; "Solomon extended his power over all the kingdoms from the river to the land of the Philistines and the Egyptian border. They brought tribute and served him all his life long." That tribute-paying relationship indicates that while Abraham's successors did exercise control over – even if not govern – the whole region for a time, that control was contrary to the Covenant which required that they not make pacts with pagans. In due course a proportion of the community did revert to, or take up, idol worship and defiantly flaunt the Covenant during the period which led up to the Babylonian exile in the eighth century BCE. But it is not necessary, here, to explore the implications of a totally exclusive covenant area, or the manner in which the Jewish community might have progressively extended its influence and fulfilled its role (of enabling all humanity to better understand its relationship with God) if a different approach had been taken to the expansion and consolidation of the kingdom.

However, the circumstances during that era, covering the thirteenth to the tenth centuries BCE, were quite different to those in which the Zionist Organization was planning to "return" to it or to occupy it by coercion in the twentieth century CE. The people who were then settled there were, virtually totally, from one or other of the monotheist faiths, and mainly Muslim's whose belief in the unity and absolute authority of God is beyond question. The Zionist Organization's proposal was either less ambitious than the 'ambit claim' of its founder, Herzl, or it was restrained by contemporary political, and diplomatic considerations. However it still included territory to the north of the eventual mandate boundary, as far as Sidon in Lebanon, and the land known as the East Bank, between the River Jordan and the Hejaz railway from Damascus through Amman to Maan.¹⁹ It does not appear to have been influenced by the fact that monotheists from Judaism's daughter faiths were settled in place of idol worshippers. Thus the use of the term Eretz-Israel implied a continuing Zionist intention to achieve territorial expansion and it aggravated fears among the Palestinians and Arabs in countries adjoining Palestine that they were in danger of another round of imperialism and subjugation.

ONE PROCLAMATION: A RANGE OF INTERPRETATIONS

The selective and at times ambiguous use of words in some translations of the proclamation by the Council of Thirteen suggest that there was a definite attempt by both the drafters – that means, essentially, David Ben Gurion – and the translators to represent the declaration as one of religious significance without weakening its impact as an overwhelmingly political statement. The formation of Jewish nationalism and nationhood, the "creation" of its culture and the writing of the Bible was quite deliberately credited to human effort without any recognition of Divine intervention or inspiration, and any reference to religious faith as the basis of the constitution of the new nation was studiously avoided. This appears to have been done to avoid exposing and aggravating the deep divisions within the Jewish religious community over the question of the desirability of Jews returning to Palestine and their right to re-establish a state of Israel except by divine intervention, as they perceived it, and whether the course of events leading to the establishment of the State of Israel could be construed as the result of such divine intervention. Similarly it concealed the conflict between the wings or streams of the Zionist movement over basically the same issue – whether restoration or redemption could be orchestrated by man or should be left to divine determination.

The declaration was drafted with heavy emphasis on political rights, self determination and independence for the oppressed Jewish minority in language calculated to appeal to the emotions of Americans. In fact the expression a 'Proclamation of Independence' which implies breaking away from an existing sovereign power in the manner of the Americans was not especially appropriate in the circumstances because the United Nations had already agreed to the establishment of a Jewish State, there was no unanimity within the worldwide Jewish community on the need for an independent Jewish state, and the real dispute was between the Zionists and their neighbours, not the international authority. But the term 'independence' was exploited with skill, building on Herzl's vision of a Jewish State and the right to national restoration on the land which their forebears had previously occupied, taking full advantage of the American proposals to either establish a trusteeship as a temporary measure to defuse the crisis or to appoint a UN Commissioner for Palestine to mediate between the parties and to “promote agreement on the future government of Palestine”.²⁰ And more pressure was applied to the world community to accept the declaration by the reference to the notorious Balfour Declaration. In spite of the fact that sections of the Zionist Movement had mounted a “hate Britain” campaign between 1945 and 1948 in order to gain cohesion among Jewish organizations in America²¹, Britain was reminded that it had initiated the move to establish a Jewish national homeland and that it therefore had a responsibility to support the event now that it was occurring.

However the rest of the world was expected to take note of it as if that 1917 action by Britain, the bastion of Western Christian civilization, had been the pinnacle of selfless intervention, providing the ultimate seal of respectability – instead of being the classic case of international political manipulation. That was the sentiment implicit in the statement by the British officer who handed a key to the Zion gate to Rabbi Weingarten. Two could play the same game. That reference was supposed to acknowledge the right of national restoration – a term which was not used in the Balfour Declaration – which was then confirmed by the League of Nations in its mandate decision which “accorded international validity to the historical connection between the Jewish people and the land of Israel, and to their right to re-establish their National Home.”²² (The clause “...recognition has thereby been given to the historical connexion of the Jewish people with Palestine and to the grounds for reconstituting their national home in that country; ...” was actually used in the preamble to the articles of the mandate. ²³)

There was also heavy emphasis on race as a major issue in the establishment of the state, with the term ‘race’ juggled and used in two ways: to define Jewishness as a racial and not a religious factor, while acknowledging the diversity of races within the religious community. Clearly, if the guilt complexes of the Christian West were to be harnessed most effectively and if its consequent sympathy was to be maintained, the Holocaust had to be portrayed as a matter of racial and not religious prejudice. The Holocaust was also said to “prove beyond doubt” or “to prove anew” the compelling need to solve the problem of Jewish ‘homelessness’. This was a distinct shift in emphasis from the Zionist response to Arab charges only nine months earlier when the UNSCOP recommendations were published and, having decided to accept the majority recommendation as the minimum basis on which they would surrender their claims to the balance of Palestine, they lobbied with great vigour for its adoption. At that time they said that their movement and its program neither began with the war, nor derived their legitimacy from the Holocaust.²⁴

In any case, the “proof” of their claim was not sustainable because the environment had become progressively more favourable for the remnant Jewish population of 226,000 (about 27 per cent of the 826,000 displaced persons rescued from the Nazi concentration and death camps) to be re-settled either in the countries which had been their homes before their incarceration, or elsewhere.²⁵ The Zionist Movement had strenuously resisted British proposals to facilitate re-settlement in Europe, branding them “a fresh betrayal” to which they would never submit.²⁶ It also exerted strong pressure on the displaced persons for them to apply to go to Palestine, and resisted the opportunity for greatly expanded admission of displaced persons into the United States until after the State of Israel had come into being.²⁷ After that aim had been achieved people were more free to make their own choice. In the same vein, references to the role of the Jewish community, and especially its armed forces during the Second World War were designed to exploit the Allies' inability to debate their motives and war aims, and to establish that the Jewish community had championed freedom and peace against the forces of Nazi evil, rather than being the focal point of that evil.

But neither was there any mention of "the Jewish Question" or Jewish-Christian relations and Christian self-understanding which had been the root cause of the evil of the Holocaust and the 'homelessness'. Any direct or implied criticism of the Christian church would have been very counterproductive. In fact the statement of ethical and moral principles of liberty, justice and peace on which the new state was to be run, with a guarantee of social and political freedom and equality for people of all religions within the new state, and an undertaking to safeguard the holy places of all religions, appears to have been drafted primarily with the church in mind, and with a dual purpose. Firstly, it was a bid to placate the church and show that it need not worry about the safety of its people or the security of any of its secondary assets. But secondly, consistent with Zionist efforts to deprecate and reject Muslim claims to Jerusalem on religious grounds, it was also a bid to minimize Christian support for the Arab cause which might flow from international acceptance of the special Muslim interest in Jerusalem by indicating that Islam's holy places would be protected as well as those of the church. Zionist leaders were very conscious of the impact of the Muslim presence on the meeting of the International Missionary Conference in Jerusalem in 1928, but they would have been equally conscious of the fact that impetus for the establishment of the International Committee on the Christian Approach to the Jews also came from that conference.²⁸ With the World Council of Churches in the process of formation they were eager to avoid any discussion of religious or human rights issues which might encourage closer relations between Christians and Muslims or undermine sympathy for the Jewish cause within the WCC.

So the declaration was read to a carefully selected audience in Tel Aviv and broadcast to the world while President Truman sought to extract maximum political advantage from it and the 32,500 Arab troops arraigned along the borders of the new state prepared to move at dawn. As we have seen, enormous and very successful pressure had been brought to bear on Truman and his administration during the final days of the British mandate in order to tie the United States to the Zionist cause and to ensure that it became Israel's protector, and shock waves reverberated across the United States and through the United Nations at the indecent haste with which the United States bowed to that pressure and prematurely recognized the new state. The members of the United Nations – together with the bulk of the world which had not been party to the decision making – waited anxiously to see what the consequences would be.

WORLD SUPPORT?

Immediately battle was joined, the world, and especially the Western World, was flooded with media reports purporting to show that the Arabs, with overwhelming forces, were defying a rightful decision of the United Nations which had the backing of an equally overwhelming majority of its members. According to those reports, and on the basis of such strong world wide support for the new-born State of Israel, the United Nations had a responsibility not only to intervene but to restrain the Arabs and to force them to recognize Israel. Politicians were subjected to enormous pressure to ensure that they supported that line. In fact the 'strong world support' was illusory. The composition and imbalance of the United Nations at the date of its formation has already been discussed. (Chapter 27, The changing world scene and note #163.) Between the founding of the UN and the vote to determine the future of Palestine three years later only an additional seven countries had been admitted as members, but one, Siam (Thailand), was ruled ineligible to vote because certain formalities had not been completed correctly, and the other six, raising the total number members to 57, did not greatly change the balance. Four of the new member countries were Asian while only two were European. Twenty years after the Palestine vote, membership had more than doubled, increasing by 66, to 123. During the next 31 years membership increased by a further 65, to the present (year 2000) total of 188.

However an analysis of the voting pattern puts the matter in perspective. The 33 votes cast in favour of partition satisfied the constitutional requirement of two thirds of the votes cast, certainly. But those 33 votes represented only 28 per cent of the population of United Nations member countries (the United Nations community), or only 20 per cent of the total world population. In contrast, the 13 votes cast against partition represented 33 per cent of the UN community, or 24 per cent of the world population. To those must be added the 10 members which abstained and the one member whose vote was not counted. They represented 38 per cent of the UN community or 27 per cent of the world population. Added together, the delegates who did not vote in favour of partition represented 72 per cent of the UN community or 52 per cent of the world population. This means that, in broad terms, the people whose delegates did not vote for partition, plus those who were not represented in the vote at all, outnumbered those whose delegates actually voted in favour of partition by about four to one. [For further details of the voting pattern see note ²⁹]

But that is far from the full story. If the well-supported reports which were cited in chapter 27, A different kind of 'gentle persuasion,' are correct, then two groups of countries were subjected to enormous pressure to change their voting intention from that indicated by their votes in the preliminary (ad hoc committee) vote. The first group included eight countries, said to have been approached by Nelson Rockefeller under pressure from the Zionist Organization or the Council of Thirteen. Of those, five, representing more than four per cent of the UN community, changed to 'Yes' from either 'No' or 'abstain.' They were Brazil, Bolivia, Ecuador, Haiti and Nicaragua. The other three, Argentina, Colombia and El Salvador changed from 'No' to 'Abstain.' If those countries had not changed, the result would have been: 'Yes' 28, 'No' 15, 'abstain' 13, excluded 1. The second group included six countries, said to have been approached by United States civil servants, diplomats or business people. Of those countries, one, Haiti, was approached by both groups, so it cannot be counted twice. Another, Greece, refused to change and voted 'No.' Of the other four countries, two, the Philippines and Liberia which, together, represented less than two per cent of the UN community, voted 'Yes,' while the other two, China and Liberia which, together, represented more than 31 per cent of the UN community, abstained. If those countries had not changed either, the result would have been: 'Yes' 26, 'No' 17, 'abstain' 13 and excluded 1. The vote would have been lost. Partition would not have taken place at that point, and negotiations could have continued under United Nations direction. There would not have been a spontaneous outbreak of harmony but, at least, there would have been a breathing space to allow passions to cool and a bit of reflection.

And still there was another factor. The Cold War and US-Soviet relations. The fact which had brought the Zionist Movement within striking distance of a vote in favour of partition was the unexpected change of attitude by the Soviet Union. That change was attributed to the onset of the Cold War, the Soviet Union's reaction to the Marshall Plan, and its want to harass the United States by re-shaping relations with the countries of the Middle East – especially after what Stalin perceived as US interference in Soviet affairs through the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (JAC) by encouraging moves for a second Jewish State in the Crimea. (Chapter 27, Focus on the Middle East. The JAC was dissolved in November 1948, six months after the proclamation of the State of Israel) The Soviet decision to change its vote on the partition question was already a direct consequence of the trouble in the triangle, so it is appropriate to note both the direct and indirect impact which that decision had on the vote. The direct impact was the transfer of three votes from 'No' to 'Yes.' Without that change the result would have been 'Yes' 23, 'No' 20, 'Abstain' 13, making the gap between that vote and the achievement of a two thirds majority of votes cast quite unbridgeable in the few days between the two votes. Therefore the indirect impact of the Soviet Union's decision was that it closed the gap to the point at which the Council of Thirteen and the Zionist Movement considered an all-or-nothing effort was worthwhile.

It is reasonable to assume that if the Soviet Union had not changed its voting intention, the Zionist Movement would not have mounted the campaign which it did. The trauma for the two groups of countries would have been avoided and the atmosphere for future negotiations would have been much less poisoned. There were 13 countries involved, and all were non-Western except Greece. They were all in situations of dire need, and it was their needs, their positions of insecurity and their dependence on help from the international community which made them so susceptible to coercion. It was that susceptibility which was exploited by the Zionist Movement and the United States in order to satisfy two things: the Zionist ambition to set up its Jewish homeland at the expense of the Arabs, and the US' want to consolidate its position of political dominance, and to strengthen its grip on worldwide resources. The transgression already discussed at length was being extended and pursued with vigour, and the United States was not only party to it, it was the facilitator with hidden agendas from which various groups expected to benefit. Furthermore, it had taken a firm grip on the handle of the Jewish community's umbrella which Britain had cast aside. It's politicians were beginning to enjoy the role – actively competing for it – and they would soon find that they were bound to it. They would be unable to let it go or to quit. Addiction to opium would seem easy to quit in comparison. It has been reported, quite widely, that Truman was very unhappy with the tactics which were going to be employed to coerce countries into supporting the partition resolution, and that he instructed that members of the administration were not to be involved. But he had helped to prepare the ground work. Perhaps in the early stages he was just swept along by his political advisers and those who wanted to take full advantage of the resources and strategic potential in what they saw as US political interests and 'security.' That would be consistent with a personal diary entry noted below. But he was soon fully committed to the process, dependent on it for his political survival, and quite incapable of quitting.

NO. A WESTERN CHRISTIAN PHENOMENON?

Looking at people-on-the-ground and not votes in assemblies, it is apparent that without the Soviet change of heart and without the subsequent United States coercion for changes, the population split would have been: 'Yes' 14 per cent of the UN community (10 per cent of the world); 'No' 77 per cent (55 per cent); 'Abstain' 7 per cent (5 per cent); excluded 1 per cent (1 per cent) plus the 29 per cent who were not part of the UN community.³⁰ That raises the question: what was the "strong world wide base of support for partition?" The answer is now quite apparent. It lies in the basis of founding membership of the United Nations and the political clout and motives of those who planned it that way: the dominant powers of the white Christian Western world of the amorphous Christian gel. The reluctance of the colonial powers to take decolonization seriously until it was forced upon them, their equal reluctance to admit new members to the United Nations, and their resistance to major economic and social changes which the non-Western world has sought to introduce only serve to reinforce the belief that the United Nations Organization and the organs associated with it – the Bretton Woods Institutions and the World Trade Organization – were proposed and established as instruments to maintain the privileges and dominance of the white Western amorphous Christian gel.

That political philosophy is reflected in the pattern of votes for the partition of Palestine, also. There simply is no evidence for the much-touted "strong world wide support" for partition. It simply did not exist. Even the country which had precipitated the entire crisis by its Balfour Declaration, Britain, abstained from voting. Only twenty years earlier, while he was Colonial Secretary, Churchill had boasted about striding through the Middle East setting up states and kingdoms and redrawing boundaries to suit Britain's convenience. Now Truman was aping him. Going down exactly the same path. Manipulating and exploiting other people and their national interests in the apparent interests of the United States. During the previous few years both Roosevelt and Truman had demonstrated very clearly that the United States intended to make all the major decisions for the world and act concurrently as its director, policeman and judge. (Chapter 26) Now, in the most critical situation possible, Truman was imposing the State of Israel on the world – the central fact of the Christian Era – against the wishes of the vast majority. He was doing it for basically the same motives as Lloyd George had pursued the Balfour Declaration, and he had no more idea of the implications and the consequences for his country and the world than Lloyd George had thirty years earlier.

The concept of trouble in the triangle was totally foreign to Truman as it had been for Lloyd George. Whatever his level of personal faith and religious commitment, Truman was against flamboyant shows of religiosity, but he was in the middle of a presidential election campaign which he was not expected to win, and he was proving just as susceptible to religious pressure and just as ready to take advantage of religious interests for political purposes as any of his colleagues or predecessors. He, and the Zionists, were very happy to take advantage of the Western Christian guilt complex over the Holocaust to push along the partition program, to serve their own ends and to salve the communal Christian conscience at the same time, and allow the Arabs to pay the bill. But the rest of the world did not see that it was appropriate to impose another wrong on a different community as a simple way to solve the Christian problem. That is reflected in the voting pattern also. Only six countries outside of the recognized Christian bloc supported partition and all of those had a Christian heritage. Five were the countries of Eastern Europe which were then under Atheistic Communist governments, and three of which were still counted in the Christian world communion despite their having come under Communist governments in the post war period. The sixth country was Liberia which, although its dominant religious life was still Animist or tribal, had strong Christian influence in its political and economic life. Furthermore, seven of the 27 Christian countries which voted in favour of partition only did so under duress: six, the Nelson Rockefeller factor, and the other, the Philippines, the Washington diplomatic and administration sledge hammer. Not one country, anywhere, which did not have a Christian heritage voted to partition Palestine. The other 24 UN member countries which included, nine Muslim, two Buddhist or Confucian, one Hindu, and one Communist country, plus another eleven Christian countries, either voted against partition or abstained. The ten members who abstained instead of voting against the resolution included five of the other six countries which had been subjected to coercion. There is therefore no way to describe the partition of Palestine other than as a phenomenon of the twentieth century amorphous Christian gel. Instead of confronting and helping to resolve the trouble in the triangle, the reaction of the Western world's Christian community in the wake of the parody of Mein Kampf served only to exacerbate the trouble considerably. [The voting pattern on the basis of religion is set out as a table in note ³¹]

A personal diary note for February 8, 1948, at a time when Truman was under enormous pressure, is very illuminating.

I go for a walk and go to church. The preacher always treats me as a church member and not as the head of a circus. That's the reason I go to the 1st Baptist Church. One time I went to the Foundry Methodist Church, next door to the 1st Baptist, because Rev. Harris was Chaplain for the Senate when I was VP He made a real show of the occasion. I'll never go back. I don't go to church for show. I hate headline hunters and showmen as a class and individually. It's too bad I'm not a showman. My predecessor was, and I suppose profited politically by it. Fate put me here, and fate can keep me here or put me out – and out would suit me better.³²

A mere three months after penning that diary note, Truman had committed himself, the United States, the Arab Palestinians and the world to that massive transgression with one eye fixed firmly on the campaign for the presidential election which was due six months later, and the other equally firmly fixed on what his advisers saw as the national interest. It was of little consequence, as far as he was concerned, that in the same way that Britain had been in league with the Zionist Movement in initiating a transgression against the Arab neighbours of Jewish settlers in Palestine, he was then in league with the Zionist Movement in confirming, reinforcing and extending that transgression into a full blown engagement. That transgression was fuelled by “the national interest” which, simply translated, means the greed of the United States for the resources of the world which far exceeds anything which the imperialists of Britain ever contemplated. It was about to trigger a series of progressively deepening crises which would focus the world's attention on the State of Israel as the pivot point in a crisis in relations between the people of the three parallel streams of Yahwism.

That crisis has risen and fallen in a series of waves since 1948 and it will inevitably continue to do so, for the reasons we have traced – relating to the Jewish community's somewhat unwelcome covenantal role – in exactly the same manner that Britain's crisis spiralled out of its control between the two world wars. It is within the capacity of the United States to break the cycle – if it has the will – just as it was within Britain's capacity to do so if it was prepared to surrender imperial privilege, but there is no indication at present that the United States has such a will. Its self-understanding as the power rightly sitting atop the pinnacle of economic imperialism, is even more deeply embedded than was Britain's as the principal colonial imperial power. The answer is to disentangle the trouble in the triangle, but the realization will soon dawn that in doing so the privileges of economic imperialism will be dismantled, too. Which comes first? Disbelief that this could possibly be the fate of the New Israel? Or deep-seated resistance to surrendering a position of privilege in the interests of world peace? In fact that resistance has been around for quite a long time already. That raises the next question. Is there any greater hope that the church will recognize the crisis for what it is and then move to disentangle the web of ill-founded doctrine and dogma which, having provided the basis for each of the church's self-understanding, the self-understanding and misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel, and the trouble in the triangle?

That is jumping ahead again. There is still a lot of history to consider. We are only at the point at which the embryonic State of Israel was attempting to take control of the centrepiece of the triangle: the City of Jerusalem.

AN UNEQUAL BATTLE?

On the basis of the approximate equality of numbers of troops engaged in the full scale war which burst immediately after the proclamation of the State of Israel, the advantage would normally have been strongly in favour of the Jewish – by then officially Israeli – defenders. However this war was not a series of set piece battles fought across well-established defensive lines and positions. Although the Arab forces had been gathered in the haphazard manner already described, and although they had the problems of colonial baggage and long arduous supply lines, they had a very material advantage in arms and the availability of aircraft. Thus, while the Israelis waited for the unloading of pre-negotiated shipments of arms immediately the British blockade ceased to have effect, Transjordan's Arab Legion and the Egyptian army soon had Israel in a very precarious position. However they failed to press home their advantage and force an Israeli surrender because, according to the standpoint of various observers, they either lacked the will for the task in hand, or the competence, or they were prevented by superior strategies coupled with lack of coordination and support from their allies.

The Lebanese forces were directed by a government which was deeply divided because of the religion-based structures for political independence negotiated by France in November 1943 in its efforts to divide and rule. Under the agreement reached, the post of President was to be held by a Christian and the Prime Minister and Speaker were to be Muslim. As a consequence of tension between the Muslim and Christian parties over their attitudes to Israel the Lebanese forces made a push into the portion of Galilee allocated to the Jewish State, captured, lost and recaptured the frontier post of Malkiyah, and then, from June 5, adopted a holding posture until the eventual cease fire. Similarly, after moving swiftly through a series of settlements on both sides of the Jordan River the mechanized Syrian brigade reached the oldest kibbutz in Palestine, Degania, south west of Lake Galilee and the action appeared to be flowing in its favour. But after a virtual one-shot battle in which an 1870's vintage howitzer scored a direct hit on the leading Syrian tank the brigade withdrew and Syria thereafter concentrated on securing disputed territory and access to the water supplies of the Jordan River in far northern Galilee. The Iraqis succeeded in driving a wedge three quarters of the way to the Mediterranean through Beisan and Jenin and could have cut the northern Israeli territory in half but, after a series of skirmishes, they also opted for a holding action until the cease fire. Thus the Transjordanians and the Egyptians were saddled with the main load of the war effort.

The Egyptians, whose government apparently believed that the UN would intervene and that little real fighting would be required, were organized in two brigades. One brigade drove inland through Beersheba and Hebron to reach Bethlehem on May 22 where they relieved the Arab Legion (which had already occupied the town) for other action and advanced to the suburban fringe of Jerusalem where they dominated the other roads to the Negev which was thus totally isolated. The other brigade drove through Gaza to within artillery range of Tel Aviv, by far the largest Israeli city, the loss of which would have resulted in a prompt Israeli surrender. Then, by a clever night time flanking operation which caused confusion within the Egyptian brigade and by the release of misinformation which caused consternation in Cairo, the Israeli commander coerced the Egyptian government into ordering another holding operation and Tel Aviv was no longer in danger.³³ In the meantime some units of the Arab Legion entered the Old City of Jerusalem on May 19 while other units moved on the totally besieged city from both the north and the south, almost breaking through into the New City through both Mea Shearim and Ramat Rachel which was the scene of the bloodiest battles of the whole war. In four days the kibbutz changed hands five times and in hand-to-hand bayonet charges troops had to climb over piles of bodies to press their attacks, but when Ramat Rachel finally remained in Israeli hands it ended the immediate prospect of Arab forces capturing the New City. Then the heroic construction of a truck route around Latrun, the site of an almost equally bloody battle to break the blockade of the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv road, enabled the first supplies to reach the city by road on June 9, two days before the agreed truce took effect. Both of those incidents were in keeping with the tradition of valiant single-minded defence of Jerusalem built on two thousand years of bitter battles. However, in a decision which sent shock waves through not only the Jewish population of Palestine but also the Diaspora, the Jewish quarter of the Old City and the greatly venerated focal point of Jewish worship, the Western Wall of the ancient Hebrew Temple, had been surrendered to Arab forces on May 28 by its Hagana defenders.³⁴

While the fighting was in progress the utter confusion which had gripped the UN as a result of Truman's announcement of recognition of the State of Israel gradually gave way to some sort of understanding that the conflict had to be resolved by mediation or negotiation. Britain had declined to support a cease fire order – the UN had no means of enforcing such a thing even if there had been agreement – and suggested the appointment of a mediator with power to recommend a settlement.³⁵

On May 20, the day after the Arab Legion entered the Old City of Jerusalem, the Security Council adopted Britain's mediation proposal and appointed Count Folke Bernadotte, a nephew of the Swedish king and president of its Red Cross organization, as mediator. When Count Bernadotte arrived in the Middle East a few days later he immediately proposed a month-long truce for negotiation. While the Arabs were receptive to the idea, the Israelis – whom Bernadotte saw as ignoring UN authority and with whom he had sharp disagreements – were not prepared to accept limitations on immigration during a truce period. After some days it was agreed that a truce would take effect on June 11 (by which time the Israelis hoped to have recovered some ground from the exhausted Arab forces) with two conditions, neither of which could be enforced even if the countries which provided truce supervisors (the US, France and Belgium) were serious about them. One was that no additional weapons would be brought into the fighting zone. The other, that immigrants of military age on both sides would be housed in camps under UN supervision.

When the truce took effect the situation was somewhat confused, but of territory allocated to the Jews the Egyptians controlled the Negev with a lot of desert and few people; the Lebanese held the Malkiyah border post; the Syrians controlled small areas in North Galilee; and the Iraqis held the strategically important wedge through Beisan and Jenin towards the Mediterranean which straddled proposed Jewish and Arab territory. In addition the Transjordanians held the Old City in the proposed international zone as well as the Palestinian West Bank. But the Israelis had gained a firm hold on the New City of Jerusalem in the proposed international zone and a wedge along the Tel Aviv-Jerusalem road as well as a patchwork of other territory in the zone allocated to an Arab state. Ignoring the conditions of the truce, Israel pressed ahead to strengthen its army and Ben Gurion succeeded in imposing a substantial army reorganization. Production from its own munitions factory was increased, it received arms and planes from supporters in Britain and the United States as well as other countries, and it purchased supplies from both France and Czechoslovakia which also made available an airport for the freighting of supplies.³⁶ This supply pattern made a mockery of the work of the UN Truce Commission which consisted of representatives of the US, France and Belgium.

In response to that situation the Arab League greatly strengthened the anti-Zionist trading policy which it had adopted in December 1945. Under the policy as originally drafted, members boycotted the purchase of goods produced by Zionist firms in Palestine but under the modified policy they boycotted the supply of goods and services to Israel and the establishment of business ventures in that country. Their intention was that in addition to severing trade between Israel and its immediate neighbours the tougher boycott would discourage any countries from supplying Israel with weapons, industrial and consumer goods by virtue of the threat of loss of trade with the much larger block of Arab countries. However it was inevitable that it would be some time before Western countries would take the boycott seriously, that it would therefore take some time for the boycott to have any significant impact on supplies reaching Israel, and that Israel would respond quickly and establish an Anti-Boycott Office.³⁷ In their tit-for-tat boycott-anti-boycott manoeuvring both the Arabs and the Israelis had the example of an excellent tutor to follow: the United States. After it entered World War II the US established a Board of Economic Warfare for 'the mobilization of foreign trade'. In addition to engaging in 'preclusive buying' of critical resources such as mercury, chromium and wolfram and stockpiling them to keep them out of German and Japanese hands it coerced neutral countries into freezing Axis assets; it took steps to ensure that all Brazilian and Bolivian rubber was reserved exclusively for the US, and it applied economic and political pressure to ensure that German companies, including airlines, were required to 'retire' from Peru, Ecuador, Bolivia and Brazil.³⁸

TRUCE, INTRIGUE, CLOAKS ... AND DAGGERS

During the truce Iraq, Syria and Egypt each increased their troop numbers in Palestine – by a total of about 13,000 – but they did not greatly strengthen their armaments, and while Iraq pressed the Arab League to prepare for further war when the truce expired, both Transjordan and Egypt argued against any further hostilities, being confident that the UN mediator would provide an acceptable solution.³⁹ At that time international sympathy and media reports were generally favourable to Israel, but the Vatican press maintained a pro-Arab stance. On June 8 the Director General of Israel's Foreign Ministry, Walter Eytan, reported: "The Catholic Church is opposed to the custody of the holy places being vested in the Jews, the Protestants, the Greek Orthodox, and the Moslems (sic) – in this order; i.e. the Moslems, although not exactly desirable, would be in the eyes of the Church the least objectionable custodians."⁴⁰ Stories similar to those which had circulated at the time of the Black Death in the fourteenth century began to appear, linking Zionists with measures which have since become known as biological or germ warfare. On June 19 Civiltà Cattolica reported that two Zionist emissaries had been arrested in Gaza, charged with poisoning the city's wells. "According to written evidence", it said, "they have also thrown typhoid and dysentery germs into several watering places. Rumour has it, in fact, that the Jews rely for their victory upon the sanitary havoc of the Arab states. Such facts would certainly not enhance their good name."⁴¹

On June 27, almost three weeks into the truce period, Bernadotte tabled proposals which bore little resemblance to the partition plan which the UN had sought to implement. He proposed a union of Palestine and Jordan – in fact a return to the original League of Nations mandate territory – in which two autonomous regions, one Arab and one Jewish, would each have full control over their own affairs including immigration and foreign relations, subject to the right of the union authorities "to promote common economic interests, to operate and maintain common services, including customs and excise, to undertake development projects and to coordinate foreign policy and measures for common defence." Jerusalem was to become part of the Arab state with "municipal autonomy" for the Jewish community. The Vatican raised no objections and appeared comfortable with the proposal, apparently anticipating that the Mufti would establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican as one of his first actions following victory.⁴² The Negev which had been allocated to the Jewish State under the UN plan as a result of the pressure applied through Truman was also to be included (in whole or in part) in the Arab region. Perhaps in return, West Galilee was to go not to the Arabs but to the Jews. The port of Haifa in the Jewish territory and the airport of Lydda in the Arab territory were both to become free ports.

However the Israelis and the Arab League both rejected the proposal. The Jews were especially disturbed by the inclusion of Jerusalem in the Arab region. They were no longer prepared to accept either the internationalization of Jerusalem or the limits of the boundaries laid down by the UN.⁴³ To demonstrate that, and to put a seal on it with the legal niceties of sovereign government accepted by dominant international usage, only three days later, June 30, the Provisional Government issued its first Abandoned Areas Ordinance. It defined any place conquered by the Israeli armed forces, or deserted by all or part of its inhabitants, as an 'abandoned area' appropriated to the state of Israel, no matter where it lay in relation to any of the border proposals. That was a mere six weeks after the proclamation of the State of Israel in such questionable circumstances and flying in the face of the United Nations and its truce negotiators.

As there was no realistic basis for a peace settlement in sight it was no surprise that hostilities recommenced on July 8. The breaching of the truce was initiated by Egypt whose forces attempted to break through the Israeli defences towards Tel Aviv. However it was no surprise to foreign observers that as the boycott had been totally ineffective to that stage, the initiative swung heavily in favour of Israel with its strengthened defences and increased offensive capacity on all fronts. By the time Bernadotte was able to arrange a second truce on July 18 Israel had recovered or occupied all of the area allocated to a Jewish State in the UNSCOP plan except for part of the Negev and a small pocket on the Syrian border, and in addition it had occupied almost all of West Galilee, broken the siege and reinforced East Jerusalem and occupied a substantial corridor between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem which had been allocated to an Arab state. A week later, confident that they had the upper hand in the war and broad Western World sympathy (if not support) for what they were about, the Israelis thumbed their nose to the UN, announced that the New City of Jerusalem was occupied Jewish territory and that there would be no internationalization, and appointed a military governor. Naturally Transjordan followed suit and incorporated the Old City into its territory.

Although Israel rejected the authority of the UN over its affairs, it was perfectly happy to take advantage of the opportunities which it provided, and early in August it asked Bernadotte to convey an invitation to the Arab governments for peace negotiations. However any prospect of a lasting peace settlement through a union or a commonwealth had been squandered, and the Arab League rejected the approach, saying that its members could not recognize the existence of a Jewish state in Palestine. But Bernadotte persevered. He said that the establishment of Israel was a reality which could not be reversed but its boundaries should not be rigidly controlled by the UN partition resolution. He restated the territorial basis of his own earlier proposal except for the key point that Jerusalem would be internationalized instead of being part of the Arab region, and he pressed for the return of all Arab refugees to their homes in Israeli-controlled territory with a guarantee of the political, economic, social and religious rights of both Jew and Arab in the territory of the other. In spite of the fact that the chief power broker, the United States, had by then given its support to the proposal, all parties to the conflict rejected it.

Bernadotte then returned home to Stockholm to fulfill commitments at the International Red Cross Conference from August 13. While he was there he was in daily contact with UN secretariat staff on Rhodes and the truce monitoring head quarters in Haifa. He took a brief break to spend some time reflecting on the situation, refined his proposals to solve the crisis, and began drafting a major 73-page report which he apparently worked on from September 1 while he shuttled between various capitals of Europe and the Middle East in his hunt for peace. The very shaky truce in Israel and Palestine was holding. The Israeli Government and the Arab governments were also doing some reflecting and planning. And so were the delegates of the 147 churches represented at the First Assembly of the World Council of Churches which met in Amsterdam from August 22 to September 4.

A SHIFT IN FOCUS TO THEOLOGY – AT LAST!

That assembly was one of three events which took place while the uneasy truce held in and around Israel which had potential to refocus the world's attention directly on the question of the church's self-understanding and Messianic theology. The first was the discovery of a few ancient manuscripts which became known as the Dead Sea Scrolls. The second was the imposition of Apartheid by the Malan government in South Africa which had been elected on the basis of a platform of separation of communities by race – supposedly on the basis of Christ's teaching. The third was that long-delayed assembly to confirm the establishment of the World Council of Churches and to chart its course. There was also a fourth event which directly challenged the claim of the Vatican wing of the church to paramount teaching authority on matters of ethics and morals and therefore also indirectly challenged the basis on which it made that claim: its self-understanding. That was the publication of the book Sexual Behavior in the Human Male, better known as 'The Kinsey Report'.

FIRST, THE DEAD SEA SCROLLS

In late 1946 or early-1947, while the UN Special Committee on Palestine was visiting the country for discussions with opposing groups and preparing alternative plans for its future, a group of Muslim Bedouin goatherd youths discovered a cave fourteen miles east of Jerusalem, in the rugged mountain country along the western shore of the Dead Sea, in which a number of very old scrolls had been placed for safe keeping. They held a number for some time before handing some of them in March 1947 to an Assyrian Christian cobbler in Bethlehem which was then under Arab Legion control as a result of the collapse of British administration and security the town. From there they were taken to the Syrian Orthodox Monastery of St. Mark in the Old City of Jerusalem. After some discussions the Metropolitan bought some of the scrolls and consulted Professor Eleazar Sukenik at the Hebrew University. Unknown to the churchmen Sukenik visited Bethlehem and obtained additional scrolls from the same source. By coincidence it was November 29, 1947, the very day that the United Nations voted to establish a Jewish State by partition of Palestine. Sukenik recognized the antiquity of the scrolls and concluded that they were probably connected with a sect of Essene Jews who were known from the work of Roman geographer Pliny (23–79 CE) to have lived in the area at the time of the Apostles. By February 1948 discussions had been widened to include senior figures at the Syrian Church, the Hebrew University, the American School of Oriental Research and Professor Albright at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, USA, to whom some scroll material was smuggled instead of being handed to the Jordanian Archaeological authorities who were officially responsible for the area. However it is reasonable to assume that the confused political situation and the dangerous military situation (with open warfare between Jewish and Arab forces as the British wound down their operations) made archaeological field work hazardous and cooperation very difficult, and that this was a factor in that course of events. Like Sukenik,

Albright immediately recognized the importance of the discovery, describing it as “the greatest manuscript discovery of modern times.” ⁴⁴

Several references to the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls were then published in quick succession. The first appeared in The Times of London, April 12, 1948, and was based on a press release by the American School of Oriental Research. It said that the scrolls had been dated “about the first century BC” and suggested that one of them was “a manual of discipline of some comparatively little-known sect or monastic order, possibly the Essenes.” On April 25 the New York Times identified the discoveries as being made by Bedouins in a hillside cave near En-Geddi, halfway down the western shore of the Dead Sea, and referred to material which was held by both the American School and the Hebrew University. Next day Sukenik sought to correct inaccuracies in the American reports by announcing his purchase of some of the scrolls. Then, virtually on the eve of the proclamation of the State of Israel and only months before the first assembly of the World Council of Churches, the finds were formally announced in the April issue of the Bulletin of the American School of Oriental Research with a comment by Albright that: “It is easy to surmise that the new discovery will revolutionize intertestamental studies, and that it will soon antiquate all present handbooks on the background of the New Testament and on the textual criticism and interpretation of the Old Testament.” ⁴⁵

Although there was no great public discussion of the matter at that time it triggered great excitement among Biblical scholars at the prospects of what may be disclosed by documents from the immediate area of the founding of the faith and from the immediate era of its founding. But it also triggered consternation among the churches at the prospect that it might be construed as a providential boost to the status of Judaism, cast doubt on the heritage and divinity of Jesus of Nazareth and therefore undermine the basis of the church’s Trinitarian doctrine and self-understanding.

Seven scrolls were found in the first cave, further large finds made progressively from 1949 and some material was located as late as 1958. Some preliminary transcriptions and photographs were actually published in 1948. The complete contents of several scrolls were published in 1950–51 and by 1954–55 most of the material had been transcribed and published. The list of books and articles on the Dead Sea Scrolls is now about 2,000. However it has been said that “too many of the popular works were simply rather naïve attempts on the part of Christian apologists to counter what they feared were attempts to undermine the faith of believers,” and there have been hotly debated claims that “there is still a partial boycott on the Dead Sea Scrolls on the part of New Testament scholars ...” ⁴⁶ However, although the discoveries had sent shock waves through the church, insufficient translation had been completed before the first WCC assembly for the content or implications of the scrolls to be studied widely or in depth.

NEXT, THE KINSEY REPORT

It has been said that “the Kinsey Report has done for sex what Columbus did for geography.”⁴⁷ It was published May 1, 1948, the same day that the encyclical Auspicia quaedam, on the holy places in Palestine, was published as part of the competitive politicking by the Vatican and the Zionists to influence Truman’s decision on recognition of the State of Israel. (Chapter 27) Professor Kinsey’s report earned rapturous acclaim from many scientific authorities and social scientists, but waves of indignation, shock and horror from those who either supported the church’s rigidly imposed teachings on sexuality and personal conduct or feared the consequences of questioning the recognized patterns of social conduct. America is said to have “roared with outrage” and “energetic attempts were made to discredit Kinsey’s methods and motives, and the House Committee on Un-American Activities accused him of espousing the Communist doctrine of free love.”⁴⁸

The Kinsey Report was a social beacon of such enormous importance that some appreciation of it enables us to better understand the drama of changing attitudes towards the church, and its rapid decline in status in the West, during the critical third and fourth generations of the twentieth century. It presented the results of extremely carefully planned research in the United States over nine years, from mid 1938 to 1947. That research was undertaken as a result of students at Indiana University raising questions with Professor Kinsey concerning the norms of conduct which were in vogue during the 1930s in the wake of the series of social encyclicals. (Chapter 18, Casti Connubii.) It was the first comprehensive study of human sexuality ever undertaken, and it showed that the sexual activity, responses and conduct of white males in the United States, and the consequences of that conduct, bore little relationship to the cultural norms which were influenced most directly by the church’s teaching and canon law. The fact that it was undertaken – that it had to be undertaken – was a direct consequence of the church’s self-understanding and the impact of its straight-jacket mentality. After the initial debate subsided other researchers in the United States and elsewhere were able to undertake additional studies and within a few years these enabled law makers and social scientists to make changes which, on one hand, freed people of many neuroses but, on the other hand, facilitated exploitation of human sexuality by commercial interests which is contributing to social and community dysfunction and antagonism towards the West wherever the commercial excesses of the amorphous Christian gel impact. We shall come to that in due course, having in mind that the publication of the Kinsey report also came in the wake of Pius XII’s reluctant accommodation with democratic Capitalism, and coincided with the celebrations which followed the Italian elections in which he and the Vatican had, quite happily taken full advantage of the excesses of American commercial largesse in order to beat off a direct electoral challenge from atheistic Communism. (Chapter 27, Temporal Authority, the Lateran Treaty and civil government, and A touch of foreign aid.)

Among the basic findings of the report were that maximum sexual activity among white American males occurs between the ages of 16 and 20, after which it falls progressively. This contradicted the established assumption and teaching in America and the rest of the Western World during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries that maximum capacity and activity were reached in the 20s and maintained through the 30s and that only the sinful engaged in any sexual activity, including masturbation, prior to marriage, at whatever age. That was shock enough, but it showed that the six primary forms of sexual outlet among males which were already recognized, (masturbation, nocturnal emissions, heterosexual petting, heterosexual intercourse, homosexual relations, and intercourse with animals other than humans), were practiced by males in all age, social and education groups and by both single and married persons. The stereotype white Christian male was no longer. It had to be admitted – with much distress – that the pervasive cultural environment entrapped most men in a pattern of dishonesty and deceit, and that the prohibition on sex education and open, frank discussion, and the dominant systems of moral teaching forced almost all youths into that situation. To varying degrees they then experienced fear, guilt complexes and psychological disorders, with difficulty in adjusting to contact with females and married life. With a thorough analysis of the data collected, it identified the factors which influenced the level of activity in each of those forms of sexual release. They included social and occupational status, years and level of education, marital status, urban and rural environment, age and circumstances at the onset of adolescence, confinement to a single-sex environment, cultural background, religion and superstition.

Data for each type of sexual activity by males was set out in the report on the basis of which of three levels of education they reached: grade school only, high school, or university. It showed that there were differences between groups for each type of practice. Overall, 92 percent of males practiced masturbation, but the groups were, in order; those who had attended grade school 89%, high school 95%, university 96%. With intercourse before marriage the pattern was quite different: those who had attended grade school 98%, high school 84%, university 67%. In the case of same-sex activity the researchers went to great length to explain that the practice of homosexuality is not a matter of “all or nothing” and that a person’s physiology is not the only factor involved. A number of stimuli and psychological considerations are also involved and while a small proportion of men, about four percent, practice sex only with other males, there is a significant proportion of men who may engage in homosexual practices at some time in their lives and for varying proportions of their total sexual activity. Of all the data provided on the subject, the most straightforward is that for males who remain single from age 15 to 30. Of those, the percentages who have some sexual experience with another male are: those who attended grade school 45%, high school 55%, university 40%. In each group the number who engaged in same-sex contact and the frequency of such contact falls somewhat between age 21 and 25, and the researchers concluded that some persons in these groups make a deliberate effort to adjust to heterosexual activity during those years.

In discussing the role of religious belief and teaching on attitudes to sex and patterns of sexual behaviour Kinsey notes that “Talmudic references ... make masturbation a greater sin than non-marital intercourse (and) there were excuses for pre-marital intercourse and for extra-marital intercourse with certain persons under the Jewish code, but no extenuation for masturbation.” He contends that the very severe condemnation of masturbation in the Talmud, on which the teachings of both Judaism and Christianity are based, reflected “the reproductive motive in the sexual philosophy of the Jews” at that point in their history. In other words what was being condemned was masturbation practiced as an alternative to intercourse, because it offered no possibility of a resulting conception, and not masturbation as a natural or intrinsic factor in human sexuality.⁴⁹ However Catholic teaching has consistently portrayed masturbation as a carnal sin, sometimes specifically declared to be more sinful than fornication.⁵⁰

Figures are provided to compare the sexual activity of Catholics, Protestants (all together) and Jews, but not other faiths because their numbers were not sufficient to provide reliable data. Persons in each of the three faiths were recorded as ‘devout’ or ‘inactive’ according to the regularity of their attendance at worship. The pattern of sexual activity for each of these groups was not significantly different from the pattern for the total population, but the frequency of activity differed in two ways. Within each faith those recorded as devout engaged in sex significantly less often than those recorded as inactive. The research did not provide a definite explanation for this, but Kinsey refers to some evidence that “some portion of the devoutly religious individuals have repressed rather than sublimated sex histories.”⁵¹ Between the faiths the frequency of sexual activity by unmarried males varied within an identifiable and changing pattern which reflected the level and nature of parental guidance and understanding of sexual responsibility. Three age ranges were assessed: adolescence to age 15; 16 to 20; and 21–25. Within each age group, those males who were inactive in their faith community engaged in sex more frequently than those who were devoutly religious. But the pattern of activity did not remain constant for males of each faith community as they moved from one age range to the next. During adolescence to age 15, Jewish youths engaged in sex least frequently, and Protestants most frequently. But by the time they reached the age range 21 to 25 the trend was reversed and Jewish men who were not active in their faith community engaged in sex more frequently than either Protestants or Catholics. [See note ⁵² for a summary by age and faith community.]

About three quarters of Catholic youths in one large survey reported having had no discussions about sex with their parents at all.⁵³ This figure is probably indicative of the situation in the Protestant churches as well and is consistent with a finding that there was “abysmal ignorance” among most young couples embarking on marriage who had been left to discover sex for themselves from school yard and street talk and were very hesitant about broaching the subject with their children.⁵⁴ Their hesitation was reinforced by the general prohibition on sex education which was a statutory offence in some states, although some states had very progressive sex education programs. An extra-curricula program of life education was introduced in all schools in Pittsburgh in 1940 and by 1944 the number of pregnancies occurring among girls in both public and parochial high schools had been cut in half.⁵⁵ However the church was still the primary source of their sexual philosophy and understanding for most students, especially in church-run schools.

Kinsey notes that as a result of the severe condemnation of homosexuality in the Talmud there has also been a history of condemnation of homosexuality in the Christian church. But there has been more discussion in Christian religious literature about the sinfulness of masturbation and intercourse before marriage than about homosexuality. He says: "Consequently, it is not unusual to find even devoutly religious persons who become involved in the homosexual without any clear understanding of the church's attitude on the subject." While the Jewish community maintains its position on the basis of Biblical and Talmudic interpretation, "the Catholic church more often bases its interpretations on a natural philosophy which may be re-interpreted from time to time but which has always emphasized the abnormality or the perverseness of sexual behaviour which occurs outside marriage." Kinsey continues: "These restraints on sexual activities are well recognized among devout Catholics, and often have major effects on the personalities of these individuals."⁵⁶ He notes that Jewish groups discuss sexual matters publicly with less restraint than most other groups and that the freedom with which they were happy to record and to discuss their personal details for his research "has surprisingly little relation to the extent of the overt activity in their individual sexual histories."⁵⁷ In this connection we can note the importance which devout Jews place on training their sons for the celebration of their Bar Mitzvah and the openness of discussion at that time about the responsibilities which come with adolescence and sexual maturity. From that it can be concluded that the relative sexual restraint shown by devout adolescent Jewish youth is a result of the sense of responsibility which they are encouraged to develop. This is in sharp contrast to a similar level of restraint linked to sexual repression resulting from dogmatic indoctrination and fear of sin in the case of the devout Catholic adolescent youth.

Earlier in their report the Kinsey researchers contrasted their findings in America with the ease of sexual adjustment for youths in so-called primitive societies which have not acquired Western sex taboos and said: "The problem of sexual adjustment for the younger male is one which has become especially aggravated during the last hundred years, and then primarily in England and America, under an increasing moral suppression which has coincided with an increasing delay in the age of marriage."⁵⁸ But it was especially galling for the church to be told that: "Boys who live in private boarding schools, and even boys who attend public or private day schools that are restricted to the single sex, face some of the same sexual problems as the boys in a penal institution." And: if adolescent years are spent in an institution where there is little opportunity for a boy to develop his individuality, where there is virtually no privacy and where all his companions are male his sexual life is very likely to become permanently stamped with the institutional pattern. The report discusses sexual behaviour which is proscribed in the criminal codes of America (and other countries such as Australia) and notes that at least 95 percent of youths could be convicted as sex offenders if the law were enforced.^{59 60}

Kinsey noted that most of the population refuses to recognize the jurisdiction of religious courts which, in previous periods, were very powerful and the influence of the church is therefore more indirect. However it continues to exert a wide influence on the whole community because its teachings and attitudes have been written into long-standing criminal law. Its teaching, and therefore the laws formulated on that basis, are clearly out of touch with reality. For example, the US Naval Academy Regulations, June 1940, made evidence of masturbation sufficient grounds for refusing a candidate admission to the academy at Annapolis and yet the people who would be required to make such decisions would almost certainly come from the group which, on the basis of data for both occupation and education, regularly practice masturbation. The people who most often formulate laws and sit in judgement on crimes committed under them are likely to be drawn from the section of the community which is still most committed to the moral codes of the church. But they will also be members of the higher educated section of society in which the pattern of sexual practices is somewhat different from that of the middle educated section from which the majority of police are drawn. They are the people who are called on to enforce the laws within the great bulk of society which is the least educated section and which has a still different pattern of sexual practices and attitudes.

In discussing the problems of 'managing' human sexuality of troops in war, Kinsey raised several issues which were relevant to the controversy over Japan's Comfort Women program, the level of venereal disease infections among allied forces, the conduct of servicemen in action, and the decisions of military governments. They were relevant to the conduct of military courts and the actions and policies of armed services chaplains as well. The Japanese War Crimes Trials were still in full swing while he was compiling his report. The last words of the defence case had been uttered a mere fortnight earlier, on April 16, 1948, and it would be another six and a half months before the judgements would be handed down on November 4. The military leaders, he said, did not understand the differing patterns of sexual conduct within the enormous populations of troops they were commanding, (but neither did anyone else), and they either worked on the basis of class mythology or on the assumption that everyone could be made to conform to their particular pattern of conduct. That meant greater reliance on masturbation and less inclination to seek intercourse. They were, he said, "startled to discover the realities of human behaviour," and the data which came from his research indicated that "very few of the men in the armed forces (were) as active sexually as they would have been at home in time of peace." Considerable pressure had been applied to military officials to establish and enforce rules, and upon Congress to enact laws "which were designed to force all of the heterogeneous group which constitutes a draft army into an upper level pattern of sexual behaviour." That pressure hinged around the dangers of venereal disease "but it is certain that many of the persons who discuss disease are more concerned over the morals of the men for whom the government has suddenly become responsible. Such an issue could be grasped more intelligently if more people understood the origins of the sexual patterns of the men in uniform." He also noted that "American armies have found themselves in cultures which are different from our own in their attitudes on matters of sex. The upper level officer who establishes the law for the country he is temporarily ruling may try to impose 'moral standards' which reflect the mores of only a limited portion of our American population, upon the whole of a foreign people who have none of the sexual patterns of any of our social levels."⁶¹

Kinsey also discussed the widely publicized claims that there had been a deterioration in moral standards and major changes in the pattern of sexual conduct during the previous generation or two. Data for the pattern and frequency of sexual activity of men who were in their youth between 1910 and 1925 was compared directly with data for those who were in their youth between 1930 and 1947. This showed that there had been no major changes. The patterns for the two groups were almost identical and the small changes which had occurred involved only the lower education/occupation group. Youths in that group were reaching adolescence about a year earlier and this was reflected in the commencement of each type of activity about a year earlier. The frequency of their activity had also increased materially. These changes, Kinsey said, were probably the product of the better sanitation, better medical care, and better standards of nutrition which had brought improvements in the general health of that group during the previous thirty years. The higher education/occupation groups did not show those changes because they had not been affected by the deficiencies which had retarded adolescence and health in the lower group. The only change in pattern which the data indicated was somewhat greater acceptance of the practices of masturbation and petting in the lower group also. These practices were already common to the upper level groups but had been rejected until recent years by the lower level groups. This 'infiltration' was apparently due to greater exposure in the media (cinema and press) of the social ideas, attitudes and practices of the upper level groups.⁶² There was also some transfer of pre-marital intercourse from prostitutes to girls who were not prostitutes.⁶³

The church, by and large, tried to hide behind a wall of silence, leaving the defence of its policies and teachings to its dedicated laity, make-believing that the Kinsey Report was a scandalous bit of titillating investigation which would soon pass by and had little to do with ordinary clergy and members of religious orders. Perhaps the church hierarchies were misguided, but it is more likely that they were bracing for the storm, especially the Roman Catholic Church with its total commitment to a celibate clergy. The calm would not last long. The outrageous conduct by some clergy and people in religious orders – no doubt a very small minority – which would swamp the church in a flood of paedophilia and other sexual abuse litigation thirty years later, and question its dual standards, was already taking place in orphanages, schools and other institutions around the world. When people overcame their reluctance to discuss matters of sexual abuse and were no longer shamed into concealing situations in which they had personally been involved, some of the major exposures related to the abuse of war-orphaned youths who were in the care of the church in overseas resettlement programs right at the time that the Kinsey Report was published.

In fact, while Kinsey's research showed remarkable stability in the pattern of sexual conduct among white males in the United States over the previous forty years, in spite of two world wars and a major economic depression, the changes which he reported were the leading edge of changes which were about to accelerate. Research carried out in Britain in 1990–1991 and published in 1994 showed that major changes in the pattern of sexual activity did occur during the forty years immediately following the publication of the Kinsey Report. These were accompanied by similar changes in public understanding of, and attitudes towards, human sexual conduct. Notably, the median age at first intercourse fell, in Britain, by four years in women, from 21 to 17, and by three years in men, from 19 to 16. At the same time contraception and abortion became widely practiced; homosexual conduct was widely recognized, accepted and exploited; a major disease associated with homosexual activity was identified and became rampant world wide; and controversy over all of these and related issues rocked the church. Publication of the Kinsey Report had coincided with developments in contraception technology, education and communication technology; an apparent upsurge in the sexual abuse of minors in their care by members of the clergy and others in religious, educational, penal and care institutions; and this became the leading edge of a tidal wave of disenchantment with the church, its teaching, its theology and its authority. But these issues did not each sit in grand isolation. They were interlinked and will be discussed progressively.

So, the Kinsey Report was a social beacon of enormous importance. It stimulated the debate on each of the related issues and gave people the information needed to press for change, especially education. For example, against the opposition of church spokesmen and some delegates who maintained that “parents are the only proper sex instructors”, a conference of the Women’s Central Organizing Committee of the Australian Labor Party in Sydney, May 1st, 1949, urged the New South Wales state government to introduce sex education in schools as an integral part of general education.⁶⁴ The report exposed the consequences of many centuries of repressive church teaching on sexual matters; the suppression of personality development through attempts to impose abstinence; the development of complex sex and morality laws; the encouragement of clandestine activity and the generation of psychological conflicts, guilt complexes and deceit; and the debilitating effects which these things had on family and community life, and on relations with people of other cultures. It was therefore a challenge to the church to review its teaching and social policies. But the church could not review these things without also reviewing the basis on which they had been developed and its claims to authority in such matters as an integral part of the process. Such a review had to take account of its self-understanding, the basis of that self-understanding and its relationship to other institutions of religious faith. Its implications for the church and its teaching, especially in the Vatican wing, and for community relations, and both civil and criminal law were very far reaching. It was a major challenge indeed.

The Kinsey Report had not been in circulation long enough for the sections or committees of the first Assembly of the WCC to take it into account when they met in Amsterdam in August, but its significance as a challenge to the church was akin to that of Darwin’s Origin of Species. The next event, South Africa’s formalization of Apartheid, was even more directly related to that Darwinian challenge.

RACIAL DIVISION BECOMES RESPECTABLE – AGAIN

The division of communities or countries on racial and religious grounds was gathering momentum – again. The Vatican and various European monarchies had made an art form of it with the establishment of ghettos for Jews in major cities. (Chapter 10) The Russian czars had shown that it could be done on a massive scale with the Pale of Settlement. (Chapter 12) The Americans showed how it could be adapted for the management of indigenous peoples through their system of reservations, and other countries, including Australia, followed suit. Britain's divide and rule policies, especially in India, had shown that it could be a useful tool in imperial or colonial management. Turkey put it into exaggerated effect in Armenia and temporarily incurred the wrath of the Western powers. (Chapter 16) But their memories were short, and Britain and France had then been happy to encourage Hitler to use it in the carve-up of Czechoslovakia. (Chapter 20) However, the policy then backfired when he refined it even further and made a mockery of the puny efforts of the amorphous Christian gel in his treatment of Europe's Jews – in league with the Vatican-backed Ustashe – and it suddenly fell into disrepute. (Chapter 24) It even became fashionable to use it as a propaganda tool against Hitler.

But Hitler was now out of the way. The European powers and their colonial offspring wanted to play by their own rules again. The question of Palestine was under consideration in the United Nations right at the time that Britain lost control of affairs in India completely and left the sub-continent in chaos as it divided on religious lines. That situation greatly influenced the environment in which the UN decision was to be taken, and the advice of the three countries which had experienced similar situations themselves was ignored. The situation in India made it much easier for the Western powers to decide in favor of the partition of Palestine, and now that decision and Calvinist theology was about to be used to help justify and to mute any criticism of a major division on racial lines. The crisis resulting from the enforced separation and 'separate development' of communities on racial grounds was taking on a new dimension with the rise to power of Dr Daniel Malan in South Africa, coincidental with the establishment of the State of Israel. Malan, an intensely nationalistic Boer who had trained and served as a preacher in the Dutch Reformed Church, became Prime Minister of South Africa on June 3, 1948, when the invasion of Israel was at its most critical point. His swearing in followed an election in the last week of May for which the National Party had campaigned vigorously on a platform of Apartheid. That campaign had received less international attention than it may have if the establishment of the State of Israel and the crisis in the Middle East had not dominated the media at the time, but in any case it was most unlikely to provoke much of an adverse reaction from the media in the United States. In a sense it was a re-run of the publication of Mein Kampf. The people on whose laws and social policies the "new Apartheid policy" was largely modelled could not be expected to acknowledge the evil in it even if they had come to recognize it.

In the land of Truman, Abraham Lincoln and his propositions that 'all men are created equal' and there shall be 'government of the people, by the people, for the people' ... 'with malice towards none, with charity for all' which was enshrined in the 1863 Proclamation of Emancipation, the isolation and ghettoization of freed Negro slaves in the Southern States started within a year of Lincoln's assassination. Two basic issues were involved: exclusion from the electoral system and segregation. In 1866 South Carolina introduced the first of the 'Black Codes' which effectively established two classes based on race by imposing segregation and severely restricting the civil liberties of Negroes. They included the requirement for Negroes to carry identification passes, and prohibition from holding public office, assembling in a public place, serving on juries in cases involving whites, serving in military forces, and going on strike. The following year Congress passed the Reconstruction Act to prevent the operation of such codes, divided the south into five occupied military districts, and required states to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment in order to be readmitted to the Union. But the states found ways to circumvent the Act. Some immediately excluded former slaves from the vote – and the notorious Ku Klux Klan was established. Over the next eight years various challenges to discriminatory laws were mounted in state supreme courts but they were inevitably rejected. Pennsylvania's Supreme Court ruled railway segregation was constitutional; Ohio's upheld school segregation so long as 'equal' facilities were also provided for Negroes, and Indiana's did likewise.

Eventually, in 1875 Congress passed the Civil Rights Act requiring that people of all races be admitted equally to hotels, waiting rooms, trains, ships, theatres and other public facilities, but progressive leaders in both the north and the south were gradually losing the will to enforce social reconstruction across the Union and dominant whites in the south regrouped. They were determined to find ways to exclude all Negroes from the electoral and legislative systems, not only former slaves, and to isolate them from the life of mainstream white America without contravening the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the constitution of the United States. Thus they brought legal actions which resulted in the Supreme Court declaring invalid a statute which forbade segregation on steamboats (1878) and then the Civil Rights Act was declared unconstitutional in 1883 on the grounds that the Fourteenth Amendment applied only to the States and that segregation by private individuals or companies was legal under the constitution.⁶⁵ Within a few years more state legislation was in place to take full advantage of that decision and in 1896 the Supreme Court upheld one such act, segregation on railways in Louisiana. But opposition among Negroes and white activists to enforced segregation was growing. The National Association for the Advancement of Coloured Peoples (NAACP) was founded in 1910 following initiatives taken by Professor W.E.B. Du Bois of Atlanta five years earlier, and the National Urban League was founded a year later. In those early years their existence proved little more than an irritation to the white supremacists and in 1913 in Georgia Negroes were dismissed from the post office and banned from government employment, and in 1915, in a bid to prevent them from profiting from the growth of employment as United States industry expanded to service the war in Europe, South Carolina banned the employment of blacks with whites except in roles such as janitors.

During the same period of forty years various moves had been taken to disenfranchise Negroes and many theories had been developed and published to show that they were inherently inferior and why they were not fit to vote alongside whites. Intimidation was sufficient to stop the majority from voting in the first few years after the Civil War but Mississippi made the first formal move, adopting discriminatory regulations in 1890 which required a poll tax and the ability to read or to understand an oral presentation of the constitution. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge promptly championed the Force Bill to outlaw such regulations and to ensure voting rights for Negroes and it was passed by the House of representatives but rejected by the Senate. However the clauses of the Mississippi regulations could be used to stop poor or uneducated whites from voting as well as Negroes and this led to some concern among conservatives. Their concern was not that the poor and uneducated should be guaranteed the vote. It was that the loopholes might lead to the regulations being annulled. Therefore, fearing further moves to outlaw such regulations the state of Louisiana sought to eliminate the loopholes with its 'grandfather laws'. (Chapter 18) These provided that if a man could not meet the literacy or property-owning qualifications he could still vote if he was the son or grandson of a person who had voted on January 1, 1867 – at the time that slaves were not entitled to vote. The effect was a near-complete disenfranchisement of Negroes.⁶⁶

Few people would have noticed that these new laws coincided with other extreme abuses of human rights in colonies around the world; the degradation of the Jewish community in Europe; the Dreyfus controversy and the convening of the First Zionist Congress in 1897; and the coercive transport of migrant or indentured labour into countries such as Malaya, Fiji and Australia, with different social, economic and even political status between the new and old populations. In Malaya's case Indians were brought in to work the foreign-controlled rubber plantations, and Chinese to work the tin mines. By 1931 the Chinese population had risen to 39 per cent of the population compared with 45 per cent Malays, with Indians accounting for most of the remainder. In Fiji's case Indians were brought in to work the foreign-controlled sugar plantations. In both cases the countries were being left with the basis for semi-regional communal development and conflict on a racial and religious basis which was not of their making, but which they would later have to cope with. Other countries could be cited, too, of course. But Australia, where Pacific Islanders were 'introduced' as indentured labour to work the Queensland sugar plantations, solved its potential problem (or so it thought) by legislating for their repatriation after federation under the White Australia Policy. And few people who were involved in such exercises would have been conscious of the significance of the coincidence and these events and the fact that circumstances were being set in train which would eventually invert a number of long-standing international relationships. Those in power were confident that they would retain it and remain 'top dogs' and resolve any conflicts which might arise.

Communal lawlessness in the southern states, characterized as 'Lynch-Law', had gathered momentum and became an instrument for the suppression of Negro rights and the elimination of not only Negroes who questioned the superior status of whites but also whites who tried to support them. A peak was reached in 1892 when 69 whites and 162 Negroes were lynched. For the next twelve years the lynchings averaged 29 whites and more than one hundred Negroes, a ratio of about four to one. But then the ratio changed. Between 1906 and 1915 lynchings totalled 620 Negroes and 61 whites: a ratio of ten to one. Apparently the lynching bigots did not consider death sufficient penalty for those opposing racial segregation and many victims were subjected to horrendous treatment so that as Gossett expresses it: "To read the details of lynching is to be reminded of the torture of the Middle Ages. Indeed the lynchers could sometimes have taught the torturers of that era some lessons."⁶⁷ But even those figures do not tell the full story. They do not include the thousands of Negroes who were simply slaughtered during the period of Social Reconstruction to avoid a flood of Negroes into the post-slavery employment pool.

Various legal challenges were mounted against the discriminatory regulations but the politically appointed Supreme Court "invariably disposed of cases designed to test the constitutionality of such laws on technical grounds"⁶⁸ and it was not until 1915 that the court declared the 'grandfather clauses' unconstitutional. However its decision was meaningless in terms of ensuring racial equality because other devices based on voter qualification were left untouched. Poor and uneducated whites were simply caught in the net of discrimination as well as Negroes. In any case, six years later, in 1921, the court found that white's-only 'primary elections' for the selection of candidates were not constrained by laws covering the election of members of Congress. In the meantime the experience of Negroes from the Northern States who served in Europe during the Great War fuelled the agitation against discrimination and from 1919 Civil Rights riots occurred in Chicago which white racists sought to link to Communism, thus making it a political rather than a socio-economic issue. Texas promptly took the lead with further repressive measures, banning Negroes from Democratic primaries in 1923 and by 1932 all former Confederacy States had either whites-only primaries or restrictions on Negro voting rights. In that context it was a mere side show that indicated the direction that America was taking when Atlanta legislated against hairdressers serving both white and black customers in 1930, but people in other countries took note of every new initiative taken in the great United States.

NOW, THE APARTHEID GOVERNMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Among the people who took careful note of the development of race laws in the United States during the 1920s and 1930s was a South African preacher, Dr. Daniel Malan. Hitler's senior by fifteen years, Malan saw himself as committed by Divine Will to the separation of peoples based on their colour and the absolute supremacy of white Afrikaners. Whereas Hitler had been mainly influenced by Catholicism and its anti-Semitism, Malan had been "hardened by Calvinist convictions of being among the Elect of God." From 1924 to 1933, while the former Confederate States were winding the stocks of segregation, economic dis-empowerment and disenfranchisement of Negroes ever tighter; while the British and Zionist authorities and the Muslim Supreme Council were increasingly in conflict in Palestine; and while Hitler was formulating his political philosophy and writing Mein Kampf, Malan was a minister in the Hertzog coalition government. During those years Hertzog directed the government to pursue policies aimed at the economic defence of White South Africa. In a circular to all departments in October 1924 he instructed that “uncivilized labour” was to be replaced by “civilized labour.” Uncivilized labour was defined as “the labour rendered by persons whose aim is restricted to the bare requirements of the necessities of life as understood among barbarous and undeveloped peoples”. Civilized labour was defined as that “rendered by persons whose standard of living conforms to the standard generally recognized as tolerable from a European standpoint.”

A year later, November 1925, he proposed a solution to what he called “the Native-Coloured Question.” He advocated segregation for the blacks and integration for the coloureds. The dividing line between black and white, he said, should be based on three factors: territory, with separate residential areas; economic, with job reservation; and political, with separate voter lists. He listed action on the political front as most important because he regarded the Cape Native franchise as the thin edge of the wedge. He said: “It is clear to me that granting the franchise to the natives of the Union on the same basis as the Cape franchise, or rather on the basis of a member of parliament being elected by whites and blacks together, must lead to the downfall of the white population group, and of European civilization in the Union.” Concerning the coloured, he said: “... the question is whether some form of segregation should also be applied in his case, or whether he should be treated on a different footing ... We must not lose sight of the fact that the Cape Coloured is a person who in many respects resembles the European, and, in almost every respect except colour, differs fundamentally from the native. He originated from us, and exists in our midst; he knows no civilization other than the European one, even though he often falls short of its standards; his outlook on life is essentially that of a European, not of a native; and he speaks the European’s language as his mother tongue. There can be no thought of segregation in his case ... the Cape Coloured ... deserves assimilation with the European.”⁶⁹

Four bills which provided the basis of his solution were passed in July 1926. Cape Blacks were removed from the common electoral roll and placed with all other blacks on a separate roll for the election of seven white representatives who would not have the right to vote on a motion of no confidence in the government. A separate Union Native Council with 50 black members was set up with advisory and limited legislative capacity, subject to government approval. Some additional areas were set aside in which blacks could compete with whites for land. Limited franchise, to take effect over a period of years, was extended to coloureds in selected other provinces on a basis similar to the Cape Coloured Franchise. Swift action followed. White employment in South Africa’s railway and harbour systems increased by 9,815 from 5,301 to 15,116 between June 1926 and February 1928, while Indian, black native and convict employment dropped by exactly the same number. Simple substitution. Restrictive legislation and practices in both the government and commercial sectors followed for several years.⁷⁰

Malan was eager to oblige his prime minister. He introduced measures making Afrikaans an official language and seeking to repatriate South Africa’s Indian minority. In this regard he was not aping the United States, but repaying, in kind, a compliment by Australia. The parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia had given him a lead by including in its first package of bills immediately after federation, in 1901, an act to repatriate all of the Pacific Islands Kanakas who had been seized, often at gun point, and transported to the cane fields of Queensland. It had an assortment of reasons which included fear of labour market dependence on cheap semi-slave or disguised slave labour and shame at the conduct of the murderous kidnappers, or ‘black-birders,’ as well as straightforward racism. It followed almost immediately with a series of bills which were designed to make sure they did not return as free immigrants and that, under its notorious White Australia Policy, no more like them, or Chinese or Japanese, would come in either. It drew on laws already operating in Natal which required an intending immigrant to pass a language test – in any European language an official might prescribe!⁷¹ Subsequently, as Opposition Leader during the Second World War, Malan was hostile to South Africa’s participation in the Western Alliance against Hitler.⁷²

It should therefore have been no surprise that immediately his party was elected on a platform of separate racial development and he took office on as Prime Minister on June 3rd, 1948, he moved to guarantee the supremacy which white Afrikaners already enjoyed in Transvaal to the entire white population. South Africa was divided into zones for whites, coloureds and blacks, and the non-whites became refugees in their own land as they were forced to move from one zone to another and the whites gained control of the vast bulk of the nation’s productive and attractive land. Then over the next few years he and his successors adopted – with refined precision – each of the strategies and measures which the American Confederate States had demonstrated so well.

But 1948 was early days in the road to full blown Apartheid and the whole world took note when the government used biblical quotations and Christian precedents to justify every facet of that program and it was vigorously supported by statements and resolutions of the Dutch Reformed Church of which Malan was a member. The world’s non-Christian communities were aghast but White South Africans expected churches and politicians around the world to either support the government on the basis of its interpretation of Christian theology, or to say nothing. In some cases, especially among the conservative churches, they succeeded and opposition was generally muted or suppressed. But gradually, as more people became aware of the way in which Christian teaching was being distorted and misused, division and polarization set in. The church was indeed confronted by another challenge to its self-understanding. In due course the World Council of Churches did take up the challenge and, as we shall see, the Dutch Reformed Church and the Council parted company in acrimonious circumstances, but at the time of the first assembly meeting it was still early days. Cooperation and unity among the churches was a prime consideration.

FINALLY, THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

At the time that the Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered and the Apartheid government was elected, the staff and committees of the World Council of Churches in process of formation were fully committed in organizing the first assembly (which had to ratify the establishment of the Council) and in charting a course for the future. They had to work with a very broad canvas and avoid being sidetracked by particular issues. After half a century of consultation, campaigning, opposition and trauma its supporters had reached the point at which they could convert a fragmented interim organization into a cohesive force which they hoped and prayed could confront the challenges which nearly two thousand years of church history, communal evolution, diverse discoveries, imperial oppression and exploitation, and broken human relationships had generated. They were determined, confident, and as well organized and prepared as the circumstances of two world wars would permit – but they were also hesitant, reluctant to claim more than they could justify, and uncertain about the identity and role of the new institution. They had to cope with such a range of major issues and tensions that most mere mortals would have baulked at the task.

Those tensions arose from a very wide range of self-understandings and theology from one unit of the church to another; reluctance to surrender deeply entrenched denominational mores and privileges in the interests of Christian unity; reluctance on the part of the major Orthodox churches to embrace the ecumenical movement for both theological and historical political reasons; trenchant opposition to the ecumenical movement from its ‘big brother’, the Vatican. And, yes, they were vaguely conscious that the establishment of the State of Israel represented a challenge of some kind. But they were deeply concerned with the impact of the Second World War on the world’s understanding of the church and the undermining of its teaching, and almost totally engrossed in the need to consolidate the ecumenical movement and to determine the Council’s identity. Thus they were not prepared to look at the possibility that there was a challenge from ‘outside’ – resulting from the changed status of its parent faith – when there was no consensus that such a challenge either existed or was possible. To give that possibility any real credibility would have been highly divisive indeed. The prevailing view was that the establishment of the State of Israel was a humanitarian and political issue rather than a religious issue, and that the major matter of concern or ‘outside challenge’ – if such a thing existed – was the confrontation between the Christian West and the Communist East. The Vatican and the United States had cooperated – perhaps ‘contrived’ is more accurate – to set that agenda, but the fact that it had been accepted by the Reformed churches is shown by the fact that ‘the Christian approach to the Jews’ was made one matter of concern for an assembly working committee which also had to deal with the life and work of women in the church, the significance of the laity in the church, and Christian reconstruction and inter-church aid.

However there is little doubt that as the 351 delegates from 147 churches in 44 countries assembled for the opening act of worship in Amsterdam’s Nieuwe Kerk on August 22, 1948, (together with alternate, youth and fraternal delegates, consultants, observers and accredited visitors who raised the total number of participants to 1,100 persons) most of them were aware that they were taking part in the most important event in the life of the Christian Church since the Reformation. It therefore follows that as committed Christians they were equally well aware of their responsibility to seek to recognize and to respond to the will of God, and that they believed they were doing so. There is no reason to believe otherwise, unless, as individuals, they were being totally hypocritical and (or) represented a Constantinian mind set which held that the purpose of religion was to ensure political stability through conformity, and that the rights of conventional Trinitarian Christians took precedence over the rights of all others.

TWO DEFINING MOMENTS – BUT LITTLE RECOGNITION

The question must therefore be asked: why were they not conscious that the establishment of the World Council of Churches was actually one of the defining moments in the history of the church and that it bore a critical relationship to the establishment of the State of Israel – the central fact of the Christian Era – with which it coincided? Similarly, why did almost none of the world's religious or political leaders recognize, or want to recognize, the coincidence of the prophecy of the Qur'anic Night Journey and Maimonides' understanding of the re-establishment of the state of Israel?

First: the churches. In spite of the Reformation and all of the challenges which had unfolded progressively, none of the mainstream Christian churches recognized Judaism and the Jewish community as having any role as a continuing instrument of God's Will except in the sense that their continued existence was to confirm the finality of Christ and the role of the Christian Church. In the case of the Roman Catholic Church the term 'role' has to be extended to encompass 'authority' and, as we have already noted, fear of a revival in Judaism and Jewish influence was a major concern of the Vatican in its bid to prevent both the British mandate in Palestine and the subsequent partition of Palestine to enable the establishment of the State of Israel. Similarly none of the churches recognized Muhammad as a divinely inspired prophet or Islam as an instrument of God's Will. Therefore those who did give serious thought or credibility to the prophecy of the Night Journey, and to any relationship between that and the 'myth' of Maimonides' thinking, were reluctant to give any public indication of it. The only people apart from the Jews and Muslims themselves who chose to recognize writings originating within Judaism after the rise of Christianity or within Islam were the Baha'is, the Theosophists and one or two other fringe groups, and in the mainstream Christian view they didn't count anyway. In any case, what was all this talk about the coming of the Messianic Age? It was already here and now: by courtesy of the Messiah, Son of God and an equal person of the Triune God who had delegated the running of it to his church.

There were other concerns, too. During the years since the end of the Second World War the church had again come under scrutiny, although not to the same extent as after the First World War. That was because of the depravity of the Nazi regime which was well recognized, and there were contradictory tendencies apparent throughout the predominantly Christian countries. On one hand some people in the countries of the Western Alliance turned towards the church out of a sense of relief and thanksgiving, from a need for support, or in the belief that their alliance had won because of its superior Christian religion and ethics. God had pulled it through and scuttled "the others". In contrast with that, some people in the Axis Alliance turned to the church out of repentance for their involvement with the tyranny – or the failure – of the powers of which they were part; out of a sense of gratitude for survival; or in humility for guidance for the future. On the other hand some people deserted the church because its social teachings no longer seemed in step with peoples' aspirations. People were looking for guidance rather than strait-jackets in a world which was hell-bent on enjoying relief from the chaos of war; release from propaganda and indoctrination; personal freedoms; and the benefits of technological developments which had taken place during the war and which had been largely stimulated by it. They expected recognition for their sacrifices during the war, full employment and the benefits which came from it, and they expected to enjoy life to the full. The concept of the permissive society was still some years away and the subversive influence of advertising and the mass media had not yet become apparent, but the student generation was influenced by the freedoms gained by returned servicemen and women who were only a few years their senior. They began to strain at the leash.

While those contradictory influences either encouraged or discouraged religious observance there were other factors which also put the churches under pressure. Many people, especially returned service personnel, saw grave faults in the societies on both sides of the battle lines and questioned the idea of an omnipotent God who used divine influence to control the flow of history. If such divine power is a fact, why, they asked, does God allow humanity to tear itself apart? Why is humanity able to, or permitted to, abuse the created world and develop weapons so powerful that the world could be laid waste by human decision? How could the church relate the inhuman carnage of recent years to the concepts of a loving God, supreme judgement and salvation, or to the conduct and authority of the church which claimed to be the appointed representative of God on earth? And what of the idea of predestination? The lack of acceptable answers to such questions encouraged a drift away from the church. It simply was not able to demonstrate a compelling reason why people should maintain the tradition or the convention of regular attendance at church services. The one exception to that pattern was the United States where, as we have seen, church membership and attendance was continuing to rise on the wave of self-congratulation that the people of God's-own country had been rewarded with victory and the right to exercise world-wide authority because of their faithfulness and diligence.

But elsewhere, in addition to those factors, servicemen and women who had served in other countries had become aware of religious movements other than Christianity and they were eager to explore them. The church's attitude towards the non-Christian world was being seriously questioned for the first time. So the churches all had more than enough to cope with in restoring the life of their congregations and their influence in the community, recruiting and training clergy, in church reconstruction programs and in providing inter-church aid for those in more parlous circumstances. The last thing they needed was the distraction of theological debate over Christianity's relationship with its partners in the triangle – or with faiths not in the triangle.

Next, Islam. Muslim leaders varied greatly in their understanding of, and interpretation of, the Qur'anic Night Journey and its relevance to the Second World War. But they were unanimous in their belief that the Jews were transgressing against their neighbours in Palestine. The Grand Mufti had been telling the world that for a long time, but few people outside the Muslim world were interested in hearing it, and the great Christian powers did all they could to avoid Muslims in non-Arab countries becoming concerned and too closely aligned with the Arab cause. Muslims accepted both Jews and Christians as 'People of the Book' with a role to play in God's divine plan. But while Muslim leaders were quite well aware of Maimonides because most of his work and writing had been done in intimate association with Islam in the Middle East, there were few among them who could see anything which resembled his understanding of the Messianic Age flowing from the Jewish transgression and oppression in Palestine. Many Muslim countries had been devastated and traumatised by Europe's war sweeping across them in the same manner as their colonial master countries in Europe and they were in the middle of struggles to throw off their colonial yokes. However one Muslim leader who did understand Maimonides' vision was King Abdullah. As already noted, he told Mrs Meyerson of the benefits which he anticipated for all of the Semite East as a consequence of Divine Providence restoring the Jews to the Holy Land.

In any case, Muslims do not look for a Messianic Age in the terms of either Jews or Christians. The title Messiah is applied to Jesus in the sense of the one through whom the Gospels were delivered, who was the exemplification of God's Will, and who had been lifted in glory to be in the presence of God. Therefore if a Messianic Age is ever to be recognized it will be that age in which humanity understands its relationship with God, acknowledges God's absolute authority, and responds by living according to divine precepts and the example set by Jesus and confirmed and reinforced by the Prophet Muhammad. Perhaps that is close to what Maimonides anticipated anyway. But the Muslims believed passionately that the Will of God would prevail, that as servants of God they and the Jews both were required to obey and respond to the Will of God, and that everything will be determined on the Day of Judgement. There is nothing in that belief which contradicts a belief that if it is God's Will that the Messianic Age will follow the return of the Jews to the Holy Land they, the Muslims, will have a role to play in that process as neighbours together with the Jews.

In other words the outcome of the Messianic Age, or the age of obedience to God's Will, would not be something to be determined or enjoyed exclusively by the Jews at the expense of their neighbours. They may be predestined, in Qur'anic understanding, for a particular role in history, but that predestination does not preclude their God-given capacity to decide to act contrary to God's Will as they have at times in the past. In that sense they are no different to everyone else who, regardless of faith or the absence of it, have minds of their own and free will to make and to exercise their own decisions. The consequences of such a decision on their part to act contrary to God's Will would only confirm their predestined or covenant role. In other words they may be disobedient and face the Day of Judgement on that basis. Similarly, that belief does not over-ride the equally strong belief that obedience to God's Will may require war to be waged against infidels in retribution for their disobedience or rejection of God's Will. Such acts of disobedience may include coveting one's neighbour's land and transgression against a neighbouring community. So, generally speaking, in the circumstances of the time Muslims did not perceive the relationship between the Qur'anic Night Journey and Maimonides' expectation that the Messianic Age would follow the Jewish return to the Holy Land. They were simply too involved in the action as victims of transgression.

SILENCE FROM THE GREAT POWERS ...

Among the great powers it was Britain which could be expected to understand the situation more easily than others. It had waved its flag as Defender of the Faith more conspicuously than any other colonial power in the Reformed group – at least until the US occupation of Japan – and it had taken up its shared obligation to carry the Christian message to the non-European world with great enthusiasm. Therefore, because its empire included countries and people of all faiths it had a core of clergy and senior government officials who had the opportunity, if they wished, to be well briefed on the theology, self-understanding, culture and expectations of those faiths. Although it had sustained a long drawn out struggle to keep Jews in their trading houses and prevent them from holding public office, except when it pleased it, such as in its bid to stifle the establishment of a Bolshevik regime in Russia, it had eventually acquiesced in reasonably good humour and since the mid to late nineteenth century many Jews had graced its parliament, its cabinet table and even its prime minister's residence. But no Muslims. Its special claim to recognition for interfaith 'understanding' was that it had been prepared to undertake to secure a homeland for Jews in Palestine. At that time, in 1917, it had caused both its own national church and the Vatican a great deal of heart ache when it invited both the Jews and the Muslims to take positions of privilege in Jerusalem, the jewel in the religious crown, where church and state had cooperated in an effort to achieve a position of dominance over a long period. Subsequently it became host to the world headquarters of the Zionist Movement as that body sought to convert the offer of a national homeland for Jews into the promise of a Jewish State. It also bore the brunt of the anger of both Zionists and Muslims as they traded insults and terrorist attacks in a bid to sway Britain's decisions in their favour. On that basis it should have been the first to recognize and proclaim the relationship between the Qur'anic Night Journey and Maimonides' expectations about the return of the Jews to the Holy Land. It should also have been in the forefront of efforts to enable the world to experience the Messianic Age. But it could not.

If it admitted the relevance of the Night Journey it admitted as a corollary that Muhammad was a divinely inspired prophet and in doing so it directly contradicted the clearly defined self-understanding and teaching of its national church. It would also have been an admission that it had aided and abetted the Zionist Organization in its transgression against the Palestinians; that it had exploited people of Islam for its own ends; and that it was therefore morally responsible to redress the wrongs committed. It could not do that because it had just admitted abject failure and renounced, rejected and reneged upon the responsibility which it had fought so hard against the Vatican to claim, and had then foisted it upon the ill-prepared fledgling United Nations Organization. Similarly, if it admitted the relevance of Maimonides' writings it would have also contradicted the teachings of its church on the role of Judaism and the Jews, the nature of the Messianic Age, and the role and self-understanding of the church.

Britain had succeeded fairly well in concealing the motives behind its dealings with the Zionist Organization up to that time, but as an alternative to contradicting its church, or in addition to doing so, it would have had to admit, at last, to gross exploitation of the Jewish community as well as the Muslims of Palestine. And it would have had to accept exposure of its role as a leader of the alliance of Gog (or was it Magog?) in the Second World War. There was no knowing where the debate which that would have generated would lead: the nature of the world's powers of evil; the consequences of their colonial policies; the horrific extension of the war as a consequence of its determination to hang on to its colonies; and Britain's possible contribution to the fate of Europe's Jews all would have come under the spotlight. It certainly would have led to increased demands for Britain to play a bigger role in solving the crisis in the Middle East and in resettling displaced persons of all persuasions, and it had just demonstrated by its own actions and decisions, including especially its acceptance of the Marshall Plan and withdrawal from India in such pathetic circumstances that its own political, economic and social fabric was so weakened that it was in no position to honour such demands.

Germany was still in a state of shock, politically divided and under military occupation, but it was making a dramatic economic recovery – stimulated by international competition and financial assistance – and the majority of its people found little difficulty in admitting that it had fallen under the government of a power of evil. In the western portion of the nation they were about to confirm this by accepting their government's decision to provide massive financial aid to the State of Israel at the same time that they accepted massive aid from the United States under the Marshall Plan. The Nazi experiment had generated great anguish among German theologians and their writings were having considerable impact across the Christian world. But to recognize that they and their country had been involved on the losing end of some sort of divinely inspired plan with overtones of national predestination would have been even more demoralizing than the First World War collapse of their understanding that Germany had a special living role in Reformation Revelation. (Chapter 16, Germany: a living revelation.) In view of the national campaign of anti-Semitism which had followed Bismarck's anti-Catholic Kulturkampf (chapter 15) any discussion about national responsibility for reshaping the triangle of faiths – placing Judaism squarely in the centre of the world stage – was another matter altogether. To admit that their leader, a man who had gained messianic notoriety and had claimed that he was fulfilling an aim in which the church had failed, had actually fulfilled the prophecy of the Qur'anic Night Journey by acting out the role of the scourge would have been unthinkable. It would have been an admission on the part of Germany, as in the case of Britain, that its churches had been wrong about the major questions of whether Judaism and Islam were on-going instruments of God's Will and about the church's relationship with both of those faiths. And if they were wrong on those questions what else were they wrong on? Precisely the same questions arose if they were to recognize that they were an integral component of Magog (or was it Gog?) in Maimonides' understanding of the return of the Jews to the Holy Land. What would be their role in ushering in the Messianic Age if it was not already here and now? What was to be the nature of the Messianic Age? What of the Messiah himself? And what of the role and status of the church?

In any case those theologians were only talking for one half of the German people. The other half were under the control of the Soviet Union and it was resolving those questions according to its own understanding. After suppressing religion for twenty five years Stalin and his Communist colleagues had found it to their advantage to restore, in part, the role of religious organizations in Russia at a critical stage of the war. (Chapter 24) The reinstated Russian Orthodox Church was highly centralized and very conservative. It was under rigid state control and it was required to support Stalin's foreign policy, but it provided viable centres for Christian worship. It was in a phase of recovery so that by 1953 there would be 73 dioceses, (the same number as before the war), each with a bishop. There were 67 monasteries, 10 schools of theology and about 20,000 parish clergy compared with only a few hundred at the beginning of the war.⁷³ Islam had suffered suppression in much the same manner as Christianity, except that it had never accumulated massive institutions and land holdings in the manner of the church so that it did not suffer to the same extent from property expropriation, and its adherents were less dependent upon the clergy, the mystique and the trappings of religion to underpin their faith. Its four pre-revolution Spiritual Directorates were reinstated, several hundred mosques were reopened (there were never very many compared with the number of churches, either pre-revolution or after reinstatement), two religious schools were re-established, selected groups were permitted to make the pilgrimage of the hajj, students were permitted to enrol at international Islamic universities and the conduct of international Islamic conferences in the Soviet Union was permitted.⁷⁴

But that did not alter the fact that the government of the Soviet Union was basically atheistic, anti-religious and struggling to manage religious diversity in a highly complex nation. Its state church was not comfortable with either the Vatican or the Reformed wing of the western church. In spite of Stalin's mid-1930's purges, his campaign to reduce the influence of Jews in the Soviet Union, and the scale of shocking atrocities carried out against the Jewish community when it was sandwiched between the Nazi onslaught and the Soviet defence, it was still home to nearly a quarter of the entire world Jewish population. It had planned and supported, in very contentious circumstances, an autonomous Jewish region of Birobidzhan, but its opposition to Zionism meant that its Jewish community was fractious and largely antagonistic after rejecting the government's vigorous efforts to establish that autonomous Jewish region. In addition its very large Muslim population, with approximately the same total numbers as the Christian church, was strategically placed with its strength in the southern and central republics.⁷⁵

When the British mandate failed the Soviet Union had supported the partition of Palestine to provide for the establishment of the State of Israel, officially on the essentially humanitarian grounds that it "met the legitimate demands of the Jewish people," but in fact to undermine the position of the United States in the Middle East. And that support was in spite of the opposition of the Zionist Movement to the BiraBidzhan settlement scheme which had, at the time of partition, more Jewish residents than ever before (still a mere 30,000) ⁷⁶ and the allegations of US interference in Soviet affairs through the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee. It was certainly not favouring one religious group in its population in preference to the others. In any case, on the basis that it recognized only philosophy and ethics, that it did not recognize the validity of the holy books of any of those religions, and that its decisions were made on the basis of pragmatic assessment of current circumstances, the Soviet Union could not be expected to show any interest in either the Night Journey or Maimonides' writings. Nor could it be expected to get excited about the idea of a Messianic Age following the return of the Jews to the Holy Land.

... ESPECIALLY THE UNITED STATES ...

On the other hand the United States was in a completely different situation. The basis of its heritage was settlement by communities avoiding the oppressive religious environment of Europe. Its republican constitution had been launched to loud applause for its guarantees of religious freedom; it had provided a pattern for civil rights in Europe as its people struggled to move into a new era; it spawned the modern-day Protestant Work Ethic; and its leaders had embraced the concept that it was 'The New Israel' – the epitome of the God-fearing society and the guide for all humanity. It was not strong in Islam but it was strong in both Christianity and Judaism. Its Protestant churches had provided many of the leaders of the Ecumenical Movement; the government had developed strong and mutually advantageous links with the Vatican, and its Catholic Church had developed considerable social and political influence; and its Jewish community which, by 1948, was one half of the total world Jewish community, had led the way in Reform in Judaism. In addition its universities and centres of higher learning, including its halls of theology, were regarded as among the best in the world. The United States was therefore in an excellent position to recognize the relationship between the Qur'anic Night Journey and Maimonides' writings. But there was not a whisper. Not a hint of leadership in bringing the theological implications of the crisis in the Middle East to world attention.

The United States government had just assumed the role of chief protector and provider of a 'security umbrella' for the Jewish State and if it had acknowledged the validity of the Qur'anic Night Journey it would also have acknowledged, by default, that through its support of Israel it was ensuring the continuation of the transgression which was the focal point of the Night Journey and which was taking place against the Palestinian people. The US was, in fact, riding roughshod over the human rights of one people and justifying that policy on the basis that it was offsetting abuses against the human rights of another people. It was doing this to protect the president's political position; the commercial interests of its major petroleum companies, industry generally and investment houses in particular; and, in doing so, it was establishing new parameters for its strategic interests. These were to lead it very quickly to the abuse of the human rights of many other peoples. With its unaccustomed role of policeman to the world underpinned by its exclusive control of nuclear weapons it soon lost the ability, if it ever had it, to distinguish between using its control of nuclear weapons to preserve world peace and protect the human rights of smaller nations, on one hand, and to pursue its own interests on the other hand. And while the new-born World Council of Churches was trying to come to grips with its role and self-understanding, the United States was in the middle of a presidential election campaign in which not only the result was greatly influenced by Truman's favourable response to Zionist demands, but also the evolution of US domestic and foreign policy.

After sixteen years of Democrat presidents pushing a New Deal for those with a social 'cause' the Republican Party was greatly frustrated at having to face another four years out of power. It could not expose and oppose Truman's dependence on the Zionist lobby. It knew that the Jewish vote had gone heavily in favour of Truman – an estimated 75 percent – while 15 percent supported the breakaway Democrat George Wallace and only ten percent voted for the Republican candidate, Thomas Dewey.⁷⁷ The strength of that vote had been assured when, in spite of his government being the first to grant de jure recognition of the State of Israel, Stalin began an anti-Zionist campaign in October 1948, almost immediately after the arrival of Mrs Golda Meir as Israel's first ambassador. It began with a purge of Soviet officials friendly to Israel and the closure of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee which Stalin claimed was a centre of subversion. Some writers have portrayed Stalin's change of heart as a reversion to long standing anti-Semitism. He resented the influence of some Jewish advisers and friends of people in high places around him, his family and ministers, and the extent to which pro-Zionist sentiment was displayed in the "tremendous spontaneous welcome from Moscow's 500,000 Jews"⁷⁸ for Mrs Meir in a demonstration outside a Moscow synagogue. He was apparently convinced that anyone with Zionist sympathies must be a traitor to the Soviet Union.⁷⁹

However after the religious authorities of all faiths had served their purpose during the war against Hitler, Stalin had reverted to his overall antireligious position and not only to anti-Semitism. A purge against dissident Christian clergy had started in April 1946, and in 1947 the bishop in charge of the Orenburg Diocese of the Sakharovites in the southern Urals, Bishop Manuil, was gaoled for eight years. In 1949 the program of forced closure of churches accelerated with 53 of the 55 churches in the diocese of Crimea being closed.⁸⁰ It has also been suggested that having achieved his aim of weakening Britain's position in the Middle East Stalin sought to strengthen his own by a closer relationship with the Arab governments in the wake of the refugee crisis generated by the new State of Israel. His support for the Arabs certainly increased following the Dier Yassin massacre and the subsequent forced evacuation of large areas of Palestine at the same time that Zionist organizations in Russia were still working against the BiraBidzhan scheme and pressing for approval for Jews to emigrate to Israel. In fact the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee had been supported and encouraged while it was a rallying point for left wing Jews and encouraged Jews both within and beyond the Soviet Union to look favourably on the new socialist order and away from Fascist policies. But when it published a statement that the State of Israel was not the concern of Zionists alone but of the entire Jewish people, claiming a role for Soviet Jewry in shaping the future character of Israel, Stalin decided it had outlived its usefulness.⁸¹ In addition it has also been suggested that Ben Gurion had blackmailed Stalin into supporting the partition of Palestine by agreeing not to disclose Russia's role in manipulating the US-German trafficking and spy network 'Max' after its head, Richard Kauder, had defected to the Zionist Organization or the Jewish Agency, and that as there was no further need to maintain secrecy on that issue he took his wrath out on the Zionist movement in Russia.⁸² The similarity between that situation and Zionist efforts to blackmail Nelson Rockefeller are remarkable. The situation was thus very complex.

In any case the strength of the vote in Truman's favour had not been reduced by Dewey's last minute statement that the Republicans supported the awarding of the Negev to Israel and his bid to portray Truman as 'vacillating' on the issue of Palestine. It had cost the Republicans victory in what commentators had said early in the campaign was one that they could not lose,⁸³ but if they complained it would have alienated the Jewish community even more firmly. The nation was therefore firmly tied to a policy of supporting Israel. Neither could the Republican Party successfully confront the social policies of the New Deal which have been characterised as 'the great socialist revolution' because it was committed to policies of social and economic reconstruction in Europe through the $5.3 billion Marshall Aid Plan, and to social, economic and defence cooperation with Latin America through the Organization of American States. Both matters had been signed into law at a pre-election session of Congress only shortly before Truman's announcement of the recognition of Israel and only two months before the Soviet Union imposed the blockade of all land traffic between West Berlin and West Germany, in June, which led to the massive Berlin airlift program by the US and its allies. In addition, the Soviet Union had also rejected the Marshall Plan and when the Organization for European Cooperation was established in April 1948 it stood aloof.

... WITH AN ELECTION, HISS, MCCARTHY AND MIXED RELIGION

The Republican Party therefore had to find a cause of its own to pursue. It took up the only one which it thought offered a way to fight back. Anti-Communism and a crusade against the employment of Communists in the American administration which Dewey had been reluctant to campaign on.⁸⁴ Ways were sought to link the Truman administration with the policies of the Yalta Conference which had provided the basis of Soviet Russia's strength in Eastern Europe and the influence of Communism elsewhere. A middle-ranking public servant named Hiss was hounded through a series of enquiries to establish his links with the Communist Party and he became a symbol of the 'betrayal' at Yalta and the perceived lack of resolve within the Roosevelt-Truman administration to protect American interests.⁸⁵ The Republican cause then received a big boost with the announcement of the first Russian nuclear test in September 1949, and within a few months the McCarthy Era of anti-Communist witch hunting had begun. The Republican Party was well on its way to winning control of the White House, but at the cost of fractured international relations, a deepening of the Cold War and a deepening of the trouble in the triangle.

Unlike Britain, the United States did not have its own ‘established’ or national church to be overly concerned about destabilizing it. From that point of view the domestic impact of acknowledging a relationship between the Qur’anic Night Journey and Maimonides’ writings; of accepting Muhammad, Islam and Judaism as on-going instruments of God’s Will; of accepting changed relationships between the world’s religious faiths; and of acknowledging that there was a divine plan or influence involved in the establishment of the State of Israel ought to have been of less importance. The country’s constitutional guarantee of the freedom of religion was already a defacto acknowledgment of their validity. However a reasonably sudden or profound move in that direction would certainly have had major implications for the self-understanding of the nation and for its foreign relations. It was imbued with the idea that it was ‘The New Israel’ or the nation which was “living theology” in a way that no other nation did; that it was specially empowered to demonstrate to the rest of the world an understanding of Divine Will; and that it was living in accordance with that empowerment. Thus whatever talk there was about fulfilment of some Divine Plan in the return of the Jews to the Holy Land and the establishment of the State of Israel was accommodated with a rarely-expressed understanding that for the United States to help in the process of return was consistent with both its role in living theology and the fact that the US was already home to half of the world Jewish community. Quite apart from the politics of the situation this subtle understanding helped to strengthen Christian-Zionist groups, and the description of the US as ‘The New Israel’ gradually fell into disuse and was superseded by the use of the term a “Judeo-Christian society” to describe the nation. That expression also helped to avoid any crisis of self-understanding which the loss of the status of “The New Israel” might have tended to generate, and to strengthen the relationship between the United States and its young protégé state.

At the level of its foreign relations, any sudden or profound shift in the official attitude of the United States to Islam and Judaism could have had significant consequences. It would have immediately undermined the credibility and influence of the Vatican to some extent and called into question its authority and its claim to an exclusive divine mission – the very thing which the Vatican feared. If the church was wrong on such issues it was probably also wrong in its trenchant opposition to Marx and Communism and in that case the United States was wrong, too, in the direction in which its Capitalists and its political opposition were about to drag it. Such an admission would have prompted domestic political pressures in the US which neither the Truman administration nor the Republican Party would have welcomed, especially in view of the fact that officials of the Vatican and US Counter Intelligence Corps had begun collaborating in the rescue of Nazis who were under war crimes investigation. The motive of the US was to tap into established intelligence networks and to gather technical experts, plus all their patented and unpatented developments, for the benefit of its commercial and research institutions in exactly the same manner as after World War One. The motive of the Vatican was consolidation of its position, euphemistically called ‘propagation of the faith’, by rescuing Catholic Nazis and undermining Communism which was the most visible challenge to both the Vatican and Capitalism.⁸⁶ The risk of political destabilization from the exposure of this liaison of convenience would have been unacceptable to advisers of both presidential candidates and could have more than offset the electoral advantage gained through the support and recognition of Israel.

At the same time heightened self-esteem among Muslims as a result of such recognition of their Prophet and their religion (especially where they lived as a minority in Christian-dominated communities or countries) and a new confidence within Islamic countries would have strengthened their resolve to get out from under the heel of Western Christian imperialism and oppression. This would have led initially to increased tension between Christian and Muslim groups in mixed societies, demands for a bigger say in domestic and national affairs, a much more vigorous approach to trade and other negotiations, and a trend towards greater cooperation with the Soviet block. It certainly would have led progressively to more unified international pressure in two directions. Firstly, on the young State of Israel to negotiate a settlement of the Palestine and Jerusalem questions. Secondly, on the Western Christian powers to agree to more equitable policies in international trade and financial arrangements. None of the Western Christian powers were interested in going in either of those directions – except for some of the poverty-stricken countries of the brand new Organization of (Latin) American States which had no political or economic clout with which to threaten the US and Europe. The only countries which would have been interested were the non-Christian countries of Asia, and the West had just fought and won a war to suppress their aspirations and it was still fighting a rearguard action to reimpose as much colonial or neo-colonial control over them as it could.

If the Christian West had been prepared to openly recognize the situation and if it had been prepared to agree to realistic changes at that time, a number of subsequent international trade and military alliances would have been pre-empted. Those two factors together might have been the beginning of Maimonides' vision. Unfortunately those who led the United States and the West, including the churches, could only think in terms of consolidating their positions and disseminating their particular brands of socio-religious philosophies, and the opportunity to convert the vision-splendid to reality was missed. It would be twenty five years – a full generation – before circumstances would combine to precipitate another major challenge and another opportunity for a rethink. In the meantime the vision would become more and more distant and the amorphous Western Christian gel would become more firmly set.

ISRAEL, THE DIASPORA AND CONFUSION

But what of Israel, the Diaspora and Jewish religious leaders? There was, as we have noted, much confusion and tension between the various streams of Judaism over the status of Maimonides' writings and the interpretation of his expectations about a war of Gog and Magog in association with the re-establishment of a state of Israel. That confusion began to develop with moves for the establishment of a Jewish homeland or state in Palestine during the nineteenth century, it increased from the time of the establishment of the Zionist Movement at the turn of the century and continued until the Holocaust and, to some extent, even until the UN vote in support of the partition of Palestine. It then dissipated because of the urgent need for support of the survivors of the Holocaust and protection of the state once its establishment had been approved by the world body and it became apparent that there would be war between the adjacent Arab nations and the Jewish State. That is understandable but, in view of the fact that Maimonides declared that there was a role for the people of all three Abrahamic faiths in the divine plan for humanity, why could there not be widespread or official recognition of the relationship between his expectations and the Qur'anic Night Journey?

In the prophecy of the Night Journey divine retribution against the Jewish people is conditional upon their future transgressions against their neighbours. To admit that they had suffered divine retribution would therefore be to admit that they had transgressed against their neighbours; that the Palestinians had every right to live in the land which was their home; that a claim to an exclusive Jewish State in that land was not valid; and that they had an immanent responsibility to help guide humanity into the Messianic Era rather than cause further unrest by pursuing their own interests. To agree to such admissions in the circumstances would have been unthinkable for the secular leadership in view of the fact that they and their people had sacrificed so much to gain their Jewish state which they saw as their right in the light of Christian Western misconduct and abuse over a long period.

Similarly, for the Jewish authorities to recognize Maimonides' expectations of a war of Gog and Magog in association with their return to their Holy Land would have required unwelcome reassessment of their own conduct. Maimonides had said that the order of events or the exact circumstances of the return to the Holy Land could not be known until the time of the events and this can logically be understood to mean that the war of Gog and Magog could occur prior to, at the time of, or following the return to Palestine. This means that there were three possible scenarios for the Jewish community, its theologians and its secular authorities to consider.

Option one: if the war of Gog and Magog was the world war which had already occurred prior to their return to Palestine, they would have to recognize that they had engineered an alliance with the powers of Gog (or was it Magog?) which they had exploited and upon which they had become dependent to achieve their own ends. If they recognized that, they would also have to recognize that in doing so they had transgressed against their neighbours and that (because they had adopted the view that the dawning of the Messianic Age would be achieved through corporate messianism or the actions of the whole community) they had a responsibility to bring about that Messianic Age. That would require the dismantling of their relationship with, and dependence upon, the United States and other Western powers, and a deliberate and concerted effort to support countries and people outside of the amorphous Christian gel in their bid for a fair deal and a set of relationships based on goodwill and equality rather than exploitation.

Option two: if the conflict which coincided with their return to Palestine was the war of Gog and Magog, who was Gog and who was Magog? The answer is of no consequence because the conflict only directly involved two camps: in the first were the Israelis and their allies; and in the second were their Arab neighbours and their allies. Thus one camp was Gog and the other was Magog. The conclusion of a meaningful, permanent peace based on justice and reconciliation was therefore a prerequisite for the dawning of the Messianic Age. Clearly then, the Messianic Age could not dawn until the conclusion of that war at which time the nature or circumstances of the Messianic Age would have become apparent. Equally clearly, to end that war and to conclude peace would have required recognition that they had transgressed against their neighbours, and measures to offset or to compensate for that transgression. The longer they remained dependent upon outside help for their defence or to maintain their imposed position of privilege at the expense of those against whom they had transgressed, the greater would become the combined force required to defeat them or to secure a negotiated settlement. Thus the longer a settlement was delayed the more likely a catastrophic war became, the greater the delay before the Messianic Age could dawn and the greater the trauma involved in that process.

Option three: they could recognize that a war of Gog and Magog was to be anticipated following their return to the Holy Land and as a precursor to the Messianic Age. In the circumstances, and considering both human nature and Biblical prophesy, that war would be a consequence of their conflict with their neighbours. It follows that if that war was not to involve catastrophic consequences prior to the dawning of the Messianic Age they would have to either accommodate their Palestinian neighbours or secure powerful and permanent allies for their defence.

The secular leaders of the new State of Israel clearly rejected the validity of the thinking behind all three options but, in doing so, they developed policies and acted as if they were recognizing the third option, second alternative. That was to build a powerful alliance to offset the possibility of a catastrophic war while the Jewish community built a Messianic Age exclusively for itself from the rubble of the former Palestinian homeland. While Israel's Zionist leadership pursued those policies and actions some fundamentalist Jews, Christians and Jehovah's Witnesses, drawn together by their particular interpretations of Scripture, anticipated a war of apocalyptic proportions in the Middle East which would involve the United States and the Soviet Union in a pre-Messianic Age explosion of the cold war. The Jews were influenced by their particular interpretation of Maimonides, while the Christians and Jehovah's Witnesses were influenced and drawn together by their interpretations of the Book of Revelation rather than an understanding of the Qur'an and Maimonides. When the cold war became dormant and that anticipation tended to fade into the background they concealed their embarrassment as best they could, and the most lasting consequence of all the speculation was a further weakening of regard for religion in the Western World.

THE WCC'S CONUNDRUMS

In the meantime the World Council of Churches had struggled to determine its self-understanding and to chart a course for the future. Given the dynamic, fluid circumstances of the immediate post war period and the tremendous struggles which its founders and supporters had faced during the period from 1908 to 1948, it is hardly surprising that they were not eager to prolong the debate over what and who should constitute the World Council of Churches and what its role should be. In spite of the Balfour Declaration, the British Mandate in Palestine and the manipulation of faiths and interfaith relations by each of the major powers, they could not see the establishment of the World Council of Churches as fundamentally important to the reassessment of relations between the three Abrahamic faiths and that one of its fundamental roles must be to reassess the church's theology as an ongoing aspect of the failed Reformation: the one that got away! And in spite of those circumstances impelling them towards – and into – such a reassessment their primary aim was to establish an organization which could patch up the divisions between those wings of the church which were not then in communion with Rome. In this sense their mind set, or self-understanding, was no different to that of the Roman Catholic Church. The Christian Church was the only route to Salvation, and they could not be persuaded otherwise. They hoped that having reached the point of resolving differences among the Reformed churches they could progress into such discussions that communion with Rome might follow, with the prospect that ultimately the people of the world wide church, might become one people in Christ. They knew that the divisions within the church were an impediment to its task, and therefore the basic aim of the Ecumenical Movement was to achieve Christian unity to enable the church to fulfil its perceived role as the Body of Christ on Earth and to be able to evangelize the whole world. The concept of evangelization had not changed through the centuries. It left no room for cooperation with other faiths. At best it allowed for acceptance of their continuing domination of 'other countries' or toleration of their presence within Christian countries, but even that was stretching the understanding at times. Pressure groups in some countries – and some churches – were pressing for the introduction of a religion test in migration admission procedures and the exclusion of non-Christians from organized migration programs. The salvation of the people of other faiths as the sole objective of evangelization was to take place where they were – not in the home territories of the great white Christian colonizing powers.

WHAT DEFINES A CHRISTIAN?

A significant requirement raised by that whole pattern of reasoning was a definition of what constituted a Christian and who, or what organizations, could be members of the World Council of Churches. Such a definition had to be acceptable to the mainstream churches of the Reformation (both Calvinist and 'Evangelical' of the Lutheran mould) and the Orthodox Churches (both Ecumenical and Autocephalous, or those which did not recognize the authority of the Patriarchate) but, if Christian Unity was eventually to have real meaning, then the definition also had to be acceptable to the Roman Catholic Church as well. Clearly such a definition was not going to be acceptable to many of the 'minor' or fringe churches which had formed because of disagreement with one or other of the mainstream churches, and this meant that they were automatically excluded from both the process of determining the definition and from membership of the new council. This group included some of the most vigorously evangelical communities in the entire church and they thus became even more isolated, estranged from the mainstream churches and denigrated. They were not denigrated by the Council which was intent on reconciliation, but by writers and groups associated with some of its member churches. A rash of books and tracts appeared on topics such as ‘the errors of such-and-such a faith’ or ‘how to deal with such-and-such a sect.’ So in due course the council and its members went about the task of drafting a definition.

It was bound to be a Eurocentric definition, paying little heed to the expectations of churches in the Asian and African regions who actually had to live with and work out their theology, their self-understanding and their response to human need in intimate contact with, and in competition with, people of other faiths. White-dominated churches of Europe, North America, Australia & New Zealand, and South Africa outnumbered the non-white-European churches of Africa, Asia, the Caribbean, the Pacific and Latin America which attended the council’s first assembly by three to one, 102 to 33.^{87 88} The prevailing view was encapsulated by the comment of a prominent European theologian to the writer in Geneva twenty seven years later: “Europe is Christianity: Christianity is Europe”. Even by that time, 1975, the ratio of white-dominated to non-white churches in the WCC had slipped below one to one, being 129 to 139, but that patronizing attitude persisted in the cloistered halls of theology in Western Europe and North America which basically determined – on both sides of the Reformation divide – what Christians were supposed to think and believe.

The basis on which invitations to the opening assembly of the WCC had been sent to churches was that “The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour.” That rigidly Trinitarian basis was debated and adopted by the assembly but not without a lot of prior soul-searching and questioning of the basis, the definition behind it, and the role of the council. According to Dr. Visser ‘T Hooft the council stated clearly that it was not based on any one concept of the church. “... it exists in order that the churches may face their differences and the various conceptions of unity may enter into dynamic relations with each other. ... it was affirmed that the main convictions underlying the World Council are that Christ is the Divine Head of the Body, that the Church of Christ is one, and that each Church should do its utmost for the manifestation of the Church in its oneness. The role of the Council itself is merely instrumental.” The fact that there had to be a council of churches and the plurality which that indicated drew attention to our weakness and our shame before God and the need to move forward towards the manifestation of One Holy Church, he said.⁸⁹ There was great concern that while the Vatican had boycotted the Ecumenical Movement and banned participation by Catholics, some churches had not attended the assembly because of pressure from governments in the Soviet bloc, and others had stayed away of their own free will. This included most of the Eastern Orthodox Churches.

IS POLITICS A MATTER OF FAITH?

The influential Russian Orthodox Church had adopted a resolution that the Ecumenical Movement was “a body which is not really concerned with the unity of the Church but rather with the gaining of political and social influence” and that Orthodox Churches were not able to participate in it “in its present form.”⁹⁰ The Cold War was impacting on the ecumenical movement and the whole church, and not only on the Roman Catholic wing which was helping to manipulate the cold war. It would impact more directly, on the third day of that first assembly when delegates debated the general disorder of modern society. In an address prepared to set the tone for discussion, Mrs Kathleen Bliss of the Christian News-Letter raised questions about the threatened collapse of social structures, the impact of science and technology, the growth of power and the need to control its abuse. She called on the people of the divided churches to become united “people of God in the world ...ready to die for the sins of our present society, and quietly but courageously work in market-place and council-chamber for its deep transformation.”⁹¹ Similarly, referring to the “rupture of personal relations, tending to complete depersonalization, and preoccupation with technics divorced from values and purposes,” Professor Jacques Ellul, France, urged the church not to stand off like a judge or a physician of such disorder but to acknowledge that it had responsibility for it. It should approach disorder as one who has need to be forgiven and healed of the same disorder. This could not be done by conservatism, “established disorder”, but by building a bridge between the old and new orders.

92

But John Foster Dulles, the senior US adviser on the establishment of the United Nations, saw the World Council of Churches as a bulwark of the defence of Western civilization and sought to align it with anti-Communism. Dulles was a man of considerable influence and high international public profile, and his brother, Alan, whose involvement in the Marshall Plan and the evolution of the Cold War has already been discussed (chapter 27) was of barely less influence. Only a few weeks earlier he had been appointed chairman of ‘The Dulles Commission’ – a presidential appointment – to investigate the affairs of the US Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) in the politically murky wake of allegations of Communist influence in the State Department and collusion between Jews and Communists.^{93 94} The allegations, made before the Congressional Un-American Activities Committee, had been a major political embarrassment for the president.

In view of their positions, the brothers Dulles were supposed to be at the pinnacle of understanding of what was best for the “free world” and the name ‘Dulles’ was rarely out of the news. It actually gathered even more influence during the Eisenhower administration, peaking four years after the WCC assembly when the newly installed President appointed John Foster Dulles as Secretary of State and Alan as Director of the CIA. But even in 1948, John Foster Dulles was listened to very attentively when he told the delegates at the First Assembly of the WCC that the Western Democracies had revered the principles of the supremacy of moral law over man-made law, and the sanctity of every human individual. He told delegates that in contrast: “Marxian Communism denies them both in theory and practice, and necessarily concludes that violence is inevitable.” When Communist Parties “rule nearly one quarter of the earth’s population” it is, he said, exceedingly hard to organize the world for peace. Christians have a special responsibility for restoring the faith of the West, and bringing political realities into harmony with it; but they need better world organization, “remembering that God gave His son because He loved the World, not merely the West.”⁹⁵ It was as if Dulles was trying to confirm the fears of the Orthodox Churches which were living under the authority of the Soviet block. He totally ignored the historical fact that Marxist Communism had evolved as a reaction against the excesses of the Christian West and that, as an evolutionary development, it was a major challenge to the self-understanding and the theology of the churches and their leaders such as himself.

In following Dulles, Professor Hromadka, Prague, acknowledged the futility of a new war which would leave the West (if victorious) “unable to cope with the area now under the Soviet Government” and the need to turn the richness of the Christian heritage of the West into a revolutionary dynamic by which a new order can be established and sustained. However he believed the West had squandered its opportunity, that it cannot now regain the supremacy in world affairs which it had for centuries, and that it must share world responsibility with the East and get over its “almost metaphysical horror” of the new world trends and their Eastern leader, Soviet Russia. He referred to some of the dangers in dialectic materialism and the presence of Czarist imperialism in the Soviet regime but insisted that Communism represents “much of the social impetus of the living Church, from the Apostolic age down through the days of the monastic orders to the Reformation and liberal humanism ...” He said: “... many Barbarians are, through the Communist movement, coming of age and aspiring to a place in the sun” and the church “must not only hope to rejuvenate the demoralized West, it must lend its sympathy to these new Barbarians. It must not allow itself to become identified with any Western bloc.”⁹⁶ Professor Hromadka’s address was given additional poignancy by recognition that his country, Czechoslovakia, had fallen under Soviet influence though a coup in February 1948, six months prior to the assembly, and that his church, the Evangelical Church of Czech Brethren, was then under the supervision of the new regime.

In its final report the assembly noted that:

Christians should ask why Communism in its modern totalitarian form makes so strong an appeal to great masses of people in many parts of the world. They should recognize the hand of God in the revolt of multitudes against injustice which gives Communism much of its strength. They should seek to recapture for the church the original Christian solidarity with the world’s distressed people, not to curb their aspirations towards justice, but, on the contrary to go beyond them and to direct them towards the only road that does not lead to a blank wall, obedience to God’s will and His justice. Christians should realise that for many, especially for many young men and women, Communism seems to stand for a vision of human equality and universal brotherhood for which they were prepared by Christian influence. ... All should understand that the proclamation of racial equality by Communists and their support of the cause of colonial peoples makes a strong appeal to the populations of Asia and Africa and to racial minorities elsewhere. ... [Then: reference to Communism engendering new forms of injustice and oppression.] ... Christians should recognize with contrition that many churches are involved in the forms of economic injustice and racial discrimination which have created the conditions favourable to the growth of Communism, and that the atheism and anti-religious teaching of Communism are in part a reaction to the chequered record of a professedly Christian society. ... [Then: points of conflict between Christianity and atheistic Marxian Communism.] ... The Christian churches should reject the ideologies of both Communism and laissez-faire capitalism, and should seek to draw men away from the false assumption that these extremes are the only alternatives."

Try as it might to encourage its member churches to adopt responsible, dynamic programs of evangelism coupled with responsible social policies and support for refugee resettlement and church rehabilitation in all war torn countries, free of proselytizing and political rhetoric, it was inevitable that the new World Council of Churches would face enormous barriers from both East and West in its efforts to develop an awareness within the churches of the basis of international tensions and close working relations with the Orthodox Churches in the East. Many times the WCC was warned by critics in the West that it should remain silent (that meant non-critical of the West) on "the burning issues of international relations (or) it would surely endanger its own life," ⁹⁷ and statements by the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs on matters such as the war in Korea, the Hungarian crisis, the Suez war and the Cuban crisis caused considerable controversy in the West.

The passage of time had not changed the attitudes of those who hold power. Religious conformity, or compliance, was still to be a tool towards political stability, or control. Professor Prenter, Denmark, had actually drawn the attention of the first assembly to the historical struggle for political stability through religious conformity when he told delegates that it was part of the shame of the church that differences, instead of enriching the whole Body of Christ through mutual service are feared and artificially suppressed. "Unbelief always thinks that the exclusion of difference, namely uniformity, is the veritable strength of the community," he said. ⁹⁸ And the assembly later agreed that there was no agreed interpretation of the doctrine of the church. Eventually, in 1958, as a consequence of the attitude in the West towards the Soviet bloc the Christian Peace Conference was established in Prague as a Soviet bloc counterpart to the World Council of Churches to bring together the churches of the Soviet bloc and to work with, and to influence, as many of the young churches in the non-Western regions of Africa, Asia and Latin America as possible. However that did not prevent churches of Russia, Rumania and Bulgaria from joining the World Council by the time of its third assembly in 1961. More of that later.

GRAND ISOLATION: NO PARTNERS, NO TRIANGLE

As its first assembly progressed the Council had many matters to deal with in addition to that dominant aspect of international affairs. It reviewed the nature and the role of the church and its witness to God's design with great care and admirable frankness, noting in its final report that the world sees a church that is divided; that has lost touch with the dominant realities of modern life; failed to speak effectively on the subject of war, and appeared impotent to deal with the realities of the human situation. And in a stinging self-rebuke it noted that the church was seen by many as having sided with the vested interests of society and state, as having used its missionary enterprise to further the foreign policies of states and the imperialistic designs of the powers of the West, and as having been “blind to the movement of God in history.” Unfortunately it then confirmed that blindness by noting that “God is pleased to use human obedience in the fulfilment of His purpose” without adding a note reflecting the understanding of the Hebrew prophet Habakkuk that God also uses powers of evil to punish believers who fail – a concept which is totally consistent with the circumstances and the coincidence of the Qur’anic Night Journey and Maimonides’ vision which spawned the birth of the State of Israel. It then confirmed it further by repeating the understanding of the church which was common to each of the Vatican, Martin Luther and John Calvin, that: “... the Church is still the Church of God, in which, and in which alone He is pleased to reveal Himself and His redemptive purpose in Jesus Christ, in Whom and in Whom alone the renewal of man’s life is possible.” ⁹⁹ [Emphasis added.]

In view of that dogmatic exclusion of both Judaism and Islam from any role in God’s purpose and the assembly’s failure to acknowledge Habakkuk, it is apparent that there could not have been any real understanding of either the Qur’anic Night Journey or Maimonides’ vision and, therefore, little or no understanding within the assembly of the significance of the establishment of the State of Israel or the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls. Unless we acknowledge the possibility that there was significant unease at the theological implications of the major political crisis which was then firmly centred on the State of Israel and that there could have been some unspoken accord that the subject should be avoided, this dogmatic stand and lack of understanding must account for the assembly’s minimal discussion of the crisis in the Middle East.

DON’T DISCUSS ISRAEL ...

There were five ‘areas’ of the assembly’s agenda under which discussion on the crisis in Palestine, the establishment of the State of Israel, and Christian-Jewish or wider interfaith relations could have been debated. They were each of the main ‘Sections’ which were to deal with philosophy and policy: Section I, The Universal Church in God’s Design; Section II, The Church’s Witness to God’s Design; Section III, The Church and the Disorder of Society; Section IV, The Church and the International Disorder; plus one of four ‘committees’ which were to deal with practical matters; Committee IV, dealing with Concerns of the Churches. The references already made to the final report of the council are to the work of sections II and III. The nearest that Section I came to reporting on those matters was its statement that: “God’s redeeming activity in the world has been carried out through His calling a People to be His own chosen People. The Old Covenant was fulfilled in the New when Jesus Christ, the Son of God incarnate, died and was raised from the dead, ascended into heaven and gave the Holy Ghost to dwell in His Body, the Church." [Emphasis added.] In that rigid restatement or perpetuation of the Doctrine of the Trinity the Jewish people and their faith, either Yahwism or Judaism, were not even mentioned by name. So much for recognition of a crisis or a challenge for theological reassessment.

But then, in Section IV the matter was deliberately avoided. When the section's report was presented to the assembly in plenary session its spokesperson noted that some people would ask why there was no mention of Palestine. The section had, he said, "come to the conclusion that if such mention had been made, it would have been necessary also to mention Korea, the Baltic States, or the racial situation in the United States or in South Africa. The section had, therefore, decided to take its stand on the general ground of those principles to which they desired to direct the Assembly's attention. The question of the conflict between the USA and the USSR had been dealt with, at the specific desire of the Section, in broad general terms."

That was a quite remarkable – almost unbelievable – stand for the committee to take considering the enormity of the crisis in Palestine right at that time and that the second truce was barely holding while the UN Negotiator, Count Bernadotte, agonized over the Jewish decision to reject the internationalization of Jerusalem and struggled to find an alternative peace plan. It is quite apparent that some influential delegates from the United States wanted the conflict between the USA and the Soviet Union given 'appropriate' coverage but they did not want any discussion about the crisis in the Middle East. John Foster Dulles was one of the accredited consultants to this committee. The pressure which the committee was clearly under is consistent with the veiled criticism which Bernadotte made of the US in his report to the UN General Secretary only two weeks later, that it was avoiding having the matter placed on the agenda for the UN General Assembly meeting which was then only a further one week away. He had said: "I have decided to present the report at this time precisely because the General Assembly will be convening in its third session on September 21st." [Emphasis added]¹⁰⁰ At the same time the delegates from the US, and delegates from South Africa, did not want their countries' policies on race exposed to public debate. This provided a simple rationale for avoiding any substantial discussion on the Middle East. Such discussion could have only been a serious political embarrassment to each of the United States, Britain and the Vatican which had pressed the internationalization issue so hard, and it would have been such a deeply divisive issue for either Section IV or the full Council to attempt to unravel that, in the circumstances, it would have aggravated relations between the Council, the USA and the Vatican even more. It simply did not know where to begin. Try as it might to keep its mind on theology and on the practical application of Gospel theology in a manner which would not involve it in destructive politics, the young council was learning very quickly that the web of politics enmeshes all!

This is illustrated by Leonard Mosley in his biography of the Dulles family network. Describing disagreements between John Foster and Allen over relations with Germany just prior to the Second World War he wrote:

HERE COMES THE MESSIANIC AGE !

... in these heated discussions, it was Allen who displayed deep emotion and concern over what was happening in Germany and his heartfelt belief that no man could stand aside in the face of Adolf Hitler's persecution of his minorities and threats against his neighbours. And it was Foster, the proud Christian churchman, who preached caution, impartiality, and a careful policy of wait-and-see. Everything would settle down so long as people stayed calm and reasonable.

Infuriated by such complacency, Allen angrily shouted at his brother: "How can you call yourself a Christian and ignore what is happening in Germany? Why don't you go over and see what is happening there? It is terrible."

In fact, Foster Dulles had long been intrigued by Hitler ... He had begun giving lectures and speeches on subjects other than law, edging further and further into the realms of international politics, the fight to keep the peace. He had found a platform in the World Council of Churches and had spoken at several conferences sponsored by this organization ... He saw in Hitler the example of a person who could capture the enthusiasm of the people as a demagogue ...

... Foster sailed for Europe in 1937 ... to preside over a seminar in Paris on "Peaceful Change" at which a number of politicians, economists, and intellectuals had come together to discuss how grievances in Europe, specially those of Germany and Italy, might be resolved without resort to conflict. The proceedings bogged down into a series of denunciations of National Socialism and fascism which, Foster believed, were irrelevant to the discussion ...

He went across the Channel to a meeting of the World Council of Churches at Oxford, where, he found, passions were more muted and a readiness to seek solutions rather than pronounce denunciations was the keynote of the proceedings. He was much impressed both by the sincerity of his fellow Christians and by the effectiveness of the World Council as a platform for international pronouncements which secured considerable attention at home. From that time onward his interest in and participation in the Council's work never flagged.

[Foster's son, Avery, later said of his father ...] He took things from the Sermon on the Mount like 'seek first the Kingdom of God,' and he interpreted the texts in a pragmatic way, saying that if you are devoted to the moral law you will succeed, your efforts will be crowned with temporal success ..."

It was maddening for Allen to be told by Foster that he was selfish in being so concerned about Nazism and the fate of the Jews, which was only a passing phase. [Emphasis added.]

101

John Foster Dulles appears to have exercised his considerable influence when the agenda was being determined for the World Council of Churches – his carefully chosen "platform for international pronouncements" – at this critical stage in its life and work. It is only in the work of Committee IV, in which one of its four subcommittees was given the task of considering 'The Christian Approach to the Jews' that there is any direct reference to either the Jewish community or to Palestine. That subcommittee was comprised of 22 voting members of the assembly, all except one (an Indian) being of European extraction, and 17 non-voting consultants, four of whom were from the US and every one of whom was of European extraction.¹⁰² It represented a meagre six percent of the 351 members plus 12 percent of the 145 consultants, making eight percent of the total official participants. Its report recognized that: “A concern for the Christian approach to the Jewish people confronts us inescapably, as we meet together to look with open and penitent eyes on man’s disorder and to rediscover together God’s eternal purpose for His Church.” It took a great stride forward from the long held view that Jews only continue to exist to confirm the truth of Christianity with the statement that: “To the Jews our God has bound us in a special solidarity linking our destinies together in His design.” [Emphasis added.] Even allowing for that, there is little to suggest that there was substantial realization of the significance of the unfolding situation and the committee did not raise the need to rediscover God’s eternal purpose for His Jewish people. That purpose was simply stated in one telling clause.

“The special meaning of the Jewish people for Christian faith.

In the design of God, Israel has a unique position. It was Israel with whom God made His covenant by the call of Abraham. It was Israel to whom God revealed His name and gave His law. It was to Israel that He sent His Prophets with their message of judgement and of grace. It was to Israel to whom He promised the coming of His Messiah. By the history of Israel God prepared the manger in which in the fullness of time He put the Redeemer of all mankind, Jesus Christ. The Church has received this spiritual heritage from Israel and is therefore in honour bound to render it back in the light of the Cross. We have, therefore, in humble conviction to proclaim to the Jews, “The Messiah for Whom you wait has come.” The promise has been fulfilled by the coming of Jesus Christ.

For many the continued existence of a Jewish people which does not acknowledge Christ is a divine mystery which finds its only sufficient explanation in the purpose of God’s unchanging faithfulness and mercy (Romans xi, 25–29).¹⁰³

... BUT STUDY CHRISTIAN-JEWISH RELATIONS ...

However the report did recognize that the churches had failed to fight anti-Semitism as strongly as they should have and that in the past they had helped to foster an image of the Jews as the sole enemies of Christ that had contributed to anti-Semitism in the secular world. It noted that: “The establishment of the state ‘Israel’ adds a political dimension to the Christian approach to the Jews and threatens to complicate anti-Semitism with political fears and enmities.” It refrained from expressing a judgement on the complex conflict of “rights” involved in the establishment of the state and ‘appealed to the nations’ to “deal with the problem not as one of expediency – political, strategic or economic – but as a moral and spiritual question that touches a nerve centre of the world’s religious life.” It recommended that the churches consider the responsibility for missions to the Jews as a normal part of parish work, especially in those countries where Jews are members of the general community, and it asked them to “scrupulously avoid all unworthy pressures or inducements” and to “give thought to the preparation of ministers well fitted to interpret the Gospel to Jewish people.” It then recommended that the World Council of Churches and the International Missionary Council share responsibility for the Christian approach to the Jews and that the WCC recognize the need for more detailed study of problems in Christian-Jewish relations, especially factors contributing to anti-Semitism, the most effective means of combating the evil, the need to develop cooperation between Christians and Jews in civic and social affairs, and the problems caused by the establishment of the State of Israel in Palestine.¹⁰⁴

... AND PLAN FOR THE FUTURE

The World Council of Churches was finally properly established and it was about to begin work in earnest. Without people actually analyzing their situation and their reaction in such terms, the parody of Mein Kampf was beginning to stimulate a rethink. The council had taken a surprisingly frank look at 'the church' and had made admissions and reached conclusions and decisions with which many traditional Christians were not at all comfortable. They were not accustomed to such openness and self criticism. They were being led along social and economic paths which they had not expected; they were reluctant to endorse them all and to surrender any of their denominational pride and independence; and they wondered what on earth might happen next. The council had encouraged not only a greater role for lay people in all aspects of the church's life¹⁰⁵ and work, it had noted that some churches already admitted women to "all offices of the church" and encouraged all churches to take a fresh look at the role of women and whether the ordained ministry should be open to them. It even noted that "those who desire the admission of women to the full ministry believe that until this is achieved the church will not come to full health and power." But, faced with strong opposition from some churches which "for theological reasons are not prepared to consider the question of such ordination," it refrained from making a firm recommendation on the matter.¹⁰⁶

However the Council defied history with a declaration of religious liberty in which it declared that every person has the right to determine his own faith and creed; to express his religious beliefs in worship, teaching and practice; to proclaim the implications of his beliefs for relationships in a social or political community; to associate with others and to form organizations with the right to determine policies and practices for the accomplishment of their purposes.¹⁰⁷ It gave high priority and strong support to work for the material and spiritual welfare of refugees through both the International Refugee Organization and its own Refugee Commission,¹⁰⁸ and it also asked its member churches to press for the adoption of an International Bill of Human Rights to ensure the recognition and enforcement of all of the essential freedoms of man, whether personal, political or social.¹⁰⁹

The demands for Church reconstruction, training and rehabilitation, and mission extension were enormous and naturally these had to consume much of the new council's effort. But it was determined to help the world resolve the turmoil all around it and the possibility existed that it would grasp the nettle, pursue its task with energy and determination and, in doing so, recognize the opportunity and the imperative that a fundamental reassessment of interfaith relations and Messianic theology should flow from that turmoil. That possibility was kept alive by the fact that the first assembly had taken such a progressive approach to freedom of religious expression and to Christian-Jewish relations, and it was reinforced by decisions taken regarding the basis on which the council was established. The assembly had decided that the basis as adopted was “adequate for the present purposes” but it recognized that “several delegates had expressed, either for themselves or their churches, the desire for clarification or amplification of the affirmation of the Christian faith set forth in the Basis.” It therefore invited “any churches that may desire change in the basis” to make written submissions which would be considered at the next assembly. However it dampened that invitation by instructing the Central Committee to “keep its study of possible changes within the Christological principle set forth in the present basis.”¹¹⁰

THE MESSIANIC AGE: HERE ALREADY, COMING OR DEFERRED?

So the delegates left Amsterdam for their home countries, to infuse and enthuse their churches with the sense of excitement and dedication to a new era in the life of the church-at-large, and to pursue the high ideals, the principles of human rights and the practical programs to which the council was committed. They covered renewal, evangelism and social action, and a commitment to continue God’s work in the Messianic Era which was already upon us – here and now – and to reflect on how they might clarify and amplify their affirmation of that Christian belief. An important aspect of that commitment was to re-establish relations with people of different faiths which had been battered by the events of past generations. A lot depended upon it. For their part, the Jewish communities did not accept that the Messianic Age was already here and now, but they believed it would be ushered in once their new home base in the State of Israel was firmly established and secure.

As the WCC delegates began to make their way home from September 5, Bernadotte continued work on his report on Palestine, then flew to Rhodes and completed it after his arrival there on September 9.¹¹¹ It was transmitted to the UN Security Council a week later, on the day he returned to Israel.

He began the report with a thinly veiled criticism of the United States, as the power which had the greatest influence on what was placed on the agenda of the UN General Assembly and what was not, saying: “I would be less than frank if I did not express my personal view that it will be a mistake of tragic consequences if, at this critical period in the history of Palestine and in the intensive effort to achieve a personal solution, the question were not to be considered and the necessary decisions taken by the General Assembly. ... a crucial stage has been reached in the mediation effort. ... I do not conclude however that the problem of Palestine is insoluble by peaceful means, or that a basis for agreement cannot ultimately be found. But the conclusion is inescapable that at some juncture vital decisions will have to be taken by the General Assembly if a peaceful settlement is to be achieved. I am firmly convinced, after the most careful appraisal, that this juncture has now been reached.”

He listed “the fundamental issues in Palestine today” as “partition, the Jewish State, Jewish immigration and Arab refugees” and wrote that it was “unquestionable” that since the adoption of the partition resolution “there have been changes in the Palestine scene which are so decisively significant as to make some of the prevalent attitudes quite unrealistic.” In a very careful review of the period since the UN’s partition resolution he noted that “The Jewish State, established under the cloak of United Nations authority, can be eliminated only by force,” which the UN had decreed should not be used, and the Arab States “must resign themselves to the presence of the Jewish State or pursue the reckless course of defying the United Nations...” He also noted that it could not be questioned that “the Arab States made a tragic mistake in employing force in Palestine ... but the very fact that they resorted to this extreme action and were willing to run the risk of thus offending the international community is in itself a measure of the intensity of their feeling on the question.”¹¹² He quoted at length from correspondence between himself, as UN Negotiator, and Israeli and Arab authorities, including the following paragraph from his letter to the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Provisional Government of Israel, dated July 6.

*“Jerusalem stands in the heart of what must be Arab territory in any partition of Palestine. To attempt to isolate this area politically and otherwise from surrounding territory presents enormous difficulties. The special condition of Jerusalem – its large Jewish population and its religious associations – needs special consideration, and the way for discussion of these questions was left open. Arab domination of legitimate Jewish and other non-Arab interests in Jerusalem was never intended or implied in the suggestions. Moreover, while I fully appreciate that the question of Jerusalem is of very great concern, for historical and other reasons, to the Jewish community of Palestine, Jerusalem was never intended to be part of the Jewish State. In this sense, the position of the Jewish State is unaffected and the question of Jerusalem has no relationship to its status. The status of Jerusalem, therefore, is separate from the question of the constitution and boundaries of the Jewish State. My suggestions fully safeguard the historical and world-wide religious interests in Jerusalem.”*¹¹³

Next day, September 17, while discussions were actively in progress, Bernadotte was assassinated by members of the Stern Group. They claimed that all UN observers were members of foreign occupation forces who had no right on their territory.¹¹⁴ Their real concern was that Jerusalem might be included within the Arab state if Bernadotte’s proposal was adopted under mediation. Any memory of the Covenant of Sinai and obligations to neighbours was very dim indeed, but the Stern Group, which had been responsible for the worst of Zionist terrorism for many years, was then officially outlawed by the interim Israeli Government. The reason was not that it had murdered a UN official: it had done far worse than that over the years. Nor was the reason that the government, or even the population at large, disagreed with its policies or its philosophy. One of its former leaders, Yitzhak Shamir, was subsequently elected a member of the Knesset, then Speaker, Foreign Minister, Deputy Prime Minister and, ultimately, Prime Minister. Nor were its members in disgrace. When it was disbanded a number of the units of the Stern Gang were integrated into the Israeli Defence Forces alongside members of the Irgun Zvai Leumi, the body which had bombed the King David Hotel in 1946 and slaughtered all 254 inhabitants of Dier Yasin in 1947. The Irgun had been disbanded and absorbed into the defence forces on September 1, while Bernadotte was working on his proposals. The reasons that the Stern Gang was outlawed were two: that the interim government wanted full control over the activities of all para-military or guerilla groups which had been fighting to dislodge Britain so that they could be more effectively employed against the new common enemy, the Arabs; and that the government feared that the Stern Gang's latest action had damaged Israel's international relations and, as a result, the prospects for a peace settlement favourable to Israel had suffered a major set back.

It was quite correct. Negotiations were set back with a jolt, but, "despite several months of additional discussion, Bernadotte's plan was deposited in the crowded archives of failed diplomatic efforts to find a solution to the problem of Palestine."¹¹⁵ It was exactly what Bernadotte had feared. He knew the methods of the dominant UN players very well. The Messianic Age was not on their agenda: only the establishment of the State of Israel in such a manner that would serve their immediate interests. Judah Magnes' insight that "one of the greatest duties of the Jewish people is the attempt to enter the promised land, not by means of the conquest of Joshua, but through peaceful and cultural means" had been lost on almost everyone.

CHAPTER 29

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO THE MESSIANIC AGE?

In the wake of Count Bernadotte's assassination and the abrupt interruption of negotiations there was widespread fear that the truce in Palestine/Israel would collapse and that all hell would be let loose in renewed warfare. One outcome of the assassination was renewed strain on the relationship between the Soviet Union and Israel. The unexpected change of heart by Stalin, whatever his reasons had been, which had given the Zionists the opportunity to fight for and achieve a vote in favor of partition in shameful and highly regressive circumstances (chapter 27, A different kind of gentle persuasion), was quickly reversed. The person held responsible by Stalin for US interference in Soviet affairs through the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (JAC), Mikhoels, had already been liquidated in typical Stalinist fashion on January 12, 1948, midway between the partition vote and the proclamation of the State of Israel,¹ but the JAC was still functioning even though it was under continuing investigation, and in other respects the new policy and the new relationship with the Zionists had held. The Soviet Union, in line with its prompt recognition of the new state, had approved an exchange of diplomatic representatives and Mrs. Golda Meir (Meyerson) arrived in Moscow as Israel's first ambassador, together with other members of the mission, on September 3. It was widely known that she had led the Jewish Agency's fund raising and arms sourcing campaign in the United States, but that had not been regarded as an impediment to her appointment.

However, on September 21, only four days after Bernadotte's assassination, Pravda published an article which clearly indicated concern at the turn of events in the Middle East and the role which Israel would play. It noted that: "The Soviet government was the first to recognize the new state [and] it energetically protested against the aggressors, and when Israel's army was defending its lands from the Arab legions commanded by British officers, the sympathy of the Soviet people was on the side of the victims, not the side of the offenders." [Emphasis added.] It continued: "The resolution of the 'Jewish question' depends on the victory of Socialism over Capitalism. All free Jews consider the Soviet land their homeland and they are proud that they are citizens of the country where there is no more exploitation of man by man. Citizens of a socialist society regard people in any bourgeois country, including the people of the State of Israel, as travelers who have not yet found their way out of the deep forest.

Citizens of a socialist society could never be attracted to the fate of people carrying the yoke of capitalist exploitation.” It purported to be the response of a government spokesperson to a letter of enquiry from a Jew in Germany but it was patently the work of Stalin.²

On October 16, 1948, more than three weeks after the publication of that statement in Pravda and just three weeks before the US presidential election, Mrs. Meir and other members of her legation attended a Jewish New Year service at Moscow’s central synagogue where they were received with “unprecedented enthusiasm by tens of thousands of fervent worshippers; crowds accompanied them on the return walk to the hotel, shouting ‘Am Yisroel Hai’ (‘the Jewish People Lives’).³ That visit was subsequently exaggerated greatly for the foreign press, with one report claiming that central Moscow had been blocked off and that traffic was stopped for several hours by a gigantic parade down Gorky Street.⁴ Such reports gave credibility to suggestions that Stalin reversed his attitude because of the welcome which Mrs. Meir received and raised the tension level accordingly. Everything was downhill in Soviet-Israeli relations from that point as the Soviet government ‘energetically protested against the aggressors’ and showed its ‘sympathy’ for the Arabs who were the new ‘victims.’ The JAC was dissolved two months later.

There was real potential for Israel to become the trigger for a major confrontation between the Cold War protagonists. If the situation was allowed to get out of hand, the outbreak of a third world war was even possible. Possible: but not likely. However the United States was in presidential election mode and the Republicans were eager to exploit any opportunity to strengthen the wave of support which was expected to carry their man into the White House. Tension between the United States and its Communist rival was a wonderful opportunity. No one seemed bothered by the fact that exaggerated reports of international tension have the effect of increasing the real level of tension. Why let that get in the way of a good election victory? The US was in full control of the situation. Wasn’t it?

A HOUSE DIVIDED ...

Also in the wake of Bernadotte’s assassination, and in view of the territorial ambitions of the Zionists, the Arab League supported a move by the Mufti’s Palestine Higher Command to form a government based in Egyptian occupied Gaza and claiming sovereignty over the whole country. But this brought tensions between Transjordan and Egypt to the surface because Abdullah interpreted it as a move by Egypt to impose a puppet government over territory which he saw as his security zone and which would deprive him of all authority in the area. It also provoked a prompt reaction from Israel. On October 14, eight days of fighting erupted in the south, and Israel further strengthened its position. By the time the parties responded to another UN truce bid on October 22, it had captured Beersheba, recovered its grip on the bulk of the Negev and cut supply routes from the south to the Arab Legion and to Egyptian forces in the Jerusalem area. Next day, the 23rd, the Arab leaders met in Amman, reviewed their strategy, and found they were not able to effectively reinforce their overall position. This left the Arab Legion to hold its position in Hebron and to try to relieve the pressure on the Egyptians in the south at the same time.

... AND ANOTHER ENCYCLICAL

It also gave the Vatican another opening. On October 24 Pope Pius XII issued another encyclical, In Multiplicibus Curis, in which he said: "It would be expedient, as a better guarantee for the safety of the sanctuaries under the present circumstances, to give an international character to Jerusalem and its vicinity, where so many and so precious reminders of the life and death of our Saviour are to be found. ... It is also necessary to assure, with international guarantees, both the right of free access to the holy places scattered throughout Palestine, and the freedom of religion and the respect for customs and religious traditions."⁵ Until Hitler's vision for Germany took hold, the concept of freedom of religion had not been one which the pope had been at all eager to lend his support to, but now, in view of the Vatican's direct interest in Jerusalem, it assumed even more importance. Then both the Arab League and the Pope had to watch while the Arab Liberation Army was defeated decisively a few days later near the Lebanese border, and Israel occupied a few villages in southern Lebanon. The truce counted for little. Israel expelled UN observers from its forces and sporadic lunges were attempted by both sides.

A DEFINING AMERICAN ELECTION UPSET ...

There was a lot of international news during the last week of October and the first few days of November as the electors of America sought to make sense of the hype of another presidential election campaign which was confused by domestic issues and the presence an 'outsider' candidate, but which the pollsters said Dewey could not lose. He ran a vigorously anti-Communist Republican campaign which received a boost with news that the remaining regions of Manchuria had come under Chinese Communist control, but in other respects he ran a low-key campaign which was designed not to lose any of the support which he was already enjoying rather than gaining at Truman's expense.⁶ The outcome of the Japanese War Crimes trials could have made his task more difficult by showing what the American public wanted to hear: that the Truman-MacArthur hard line approach to subduing the dastardly Japanese and blocking Communists was being effective. But the judgements of sentences of death for seven of Japan's key wartime leaders, life imprisonment for sixteen, and lighter sentences for two others were only announced on the day of the election when it was too late to have any impact. But Governor Dewey was expected to pick up a few more 'Brownie points' for his last minute support for the proposal to allocate the Negev to Israel and not to the Arabs in the resolution of the Palestine crisis which would strengthen his position further. However any support he received from that proved quite inadequate to offset the 'thank you' vote from the Jewish community for Truman's decisive action in May. It is estimated that 75 per cent of Jewish voters, supported Truman, while 15 per cent voted for Henry Wallace and only 10 per cent for

Dewey.⁷ Dewey lost the ‘unlosable election’ and Truman continued in office, being greeted on his arrival back in the capital by a banner across the front of the Washington Post newspaper building which read: *MR. PRESIDENT, WE ARE READY TO EAT CROW WHENEVER YOU ARE READY TO SERVE IT.*⁸

That election result was an integral factor in the unfolding trouble in the triangle. It established a pattern of mutual dependence which ensured that the relationship between the United States and Israel – the US-Israeli Alliance – would dominate international affairs for the remainder of the twentieth century and at least the early years of the twenty first century CE. Truman had unwittingly locked the United States, and the world community, into a situation which neither he nor his key associates in the administration understood. It was certainly not all his doing. Many people were involved in decisions and actions which took advantage of previous decisions and actions so that they appeared to lead logically from one to another and the world has been expected to accept them in that light. Fundamentally they arose from the political philosophy adopted and the decisions taken during the period between Munich and the entry of the United States into the Second World War. The United States entered that war on the basis that it would secure its own position by supporting Britain in its war of imperial survival and then fill the Asian economic power vacuum as the influence of the European powers waned. A host of consequential decisions and events have been discussed, including the key ones which led up to Truman’s re-election. They were: the declaration that Saudi Arabia was vital to US security as it politicked to gain dominance of the country’s oil resources; the eagerness with which it picked up the role of umbrella for Zionism out of economic and political self-interest when Britain cast it off; the very unhealthy pressure which it responded to and then exerted in order to secure the vote for the partition of Palestine; the indecent haste with which Truman recognized the proclamation of the State of Israel for essentially his own domestic political purposes; and the burying of Bernadotte’s proposals in September in order to curry further electoral favour with America’s influential Jewish community – or to avoid an electoral backlash.

For reasons already discussed (chapter 28, Two defining moments – but little recognition) the coincidence of the Qur’anic Night Journey and Maimonides’ expectations of the re-establishment of the State of Israel had occurred unrecognized – or at least unheralded – by world political and religious leaders, so no body of people was seeking the reasons why, or what it meant, and therefore they were not looking for ways to disentangle the web of attitudes, policies and practices which had brought it about. If they had been, world leaders might have changed those attitudes and policies immediately. As they were not, those leaders carried on regardless. Truman included.

... BEACONS IN THE GLOOM ...

Truman’s re-election in those circumstances tied not only him but successive presidents into a relationship of electoral dependence from which it was going to be increasingly difficult to break loose. During the early years of the relationship it could have been broken, but successive presidents and their administrations took decisions which made the break increasingly difficult. One critical decision which concerned oil supplies and was made on the basis of sheer exploitation, was taken in 1970. It was disputed by some advisers at the time and the consequences of that decision, which they had predicted, became apparent in 1973. The neighbours of Israel imposed an oil embargo against the United States in retaliation for its support of Israel during the Yom Kippur War. That action, one generation after the establishment of the State of Israel, became a beacon warning that the trouble in the triangle was entering a new phase, but it was ignored.

Since that time the strings which bind the US-Israeli Alliance have been drawn progressively tighter and tighter so that now the United States cannot readily loosen them. To do so it must unravel the trouble in the triangle and it cannot do that on its own. Israel can loosen the strings if it chooses. The United States cannot. By taking advantage of the Zionist enterprise in exactly the same manner that Britain did in 1917 (with its Balfour Declaration) in order to exploit the people and resources of other countries, the United States has tied itself to whatever will be the outcome of the trouble in the triangle and whatever are the consequences of the Jewish transgression against its neighbours in terms of the Night Journey.

But by its actions the United States has become as much a party to that transgression as were the Zionist leaders who eventually succeeded in their objective. Its conduct – or misconduct – as the key contemporary player in the amorphous Christian gel has locked it firmly into the trouble in the triangle and ensures that the focus stays on the establishment of the State of Israel as the central fact of the Christian Era. It bears repeating: it was the conduct of that amorphous Christian gel which precipitated the establishment of the World Zionist Organization (chapter 15); which precipitated the rise of National Socialism in Germany (chapter 17); which provided the ingredients for Hitler's remarkable parody, Mein Kampf (chapter 18); which ensured the trauma of the Second World War and the Cold War; and it was the conduct of the amorphous Christian gel which, in doing so, ensured the establishment of the State of Israel as the central fact of the Christian Era. (Chapters 21 to 25) As a consequence of those factors the United States has worked itself into the situation in which its 'fate' – in the sense of the 'works by which it will be judged' bound around its corporate neck as indicated by the Qur'anic Night Journey (chapter 6) – is irrevocably enmeshed in the trouble in the triangle and the measures required to resolve it.

... AND A SAFETY VALVE

The two generations since that central fact have been an era pockmarked with a series of crises involving the exploitation of people and their resources in a neo-colonial manner no less traumatic than was perpetrated under imperial colonialism. That exploitation has been associated with the abuse or manipulation of interfaith relations in a manner broadly continuing the pattern of the colonial era prior to the experience of Hitler's parody, Mein Kampf. That continuity has aggravated relations between the amorphous Christian gel and other peoples and the consequences are now apparent in interfaith conflict in many regions. The series of crises have been beacons which should have alerted the key players to the consequences of their actions. They have been ignored because of the same self-understanding and arrogance which has marked the course of the trouble in the triangle until this stage. If the leaders of the great powers of the amorphous Christian gel would pause for long enough they would see that the damaged relationships can only continue to worsen until the trouble in the triangle is dismantled through collaboration between Christians, Muslims and Jews. The process must start – and must be seen to start – with the fundamental reassessment of Christian self-understanding which has been based upon, and is anchored to, the church’s Messianic theology. The repudiation of the Doctrine of the Trinity, the development of a new Christian self-understanding, and the development and acceptance of a new understanding of the relationships between the three faiths, and their common role as streams of one faith, which must flow from that fundamental reassessment is the next step towards Maimonides’ expectation of the Messianic Age.

That raises the question: “What happens if that dismantling process does not take place?” Will we just bounce from one war to another with the United States sitting astride the pinnacle of human endeavour? Or will we be flung to the depths of Armageddon as some people expected during the height of the Cold War? To reflect on these questions we have to turn again to Israel, the Qur’anic Night Journey and the Covenant of Sinai. As already noted, the misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel pushed the Jewish community into the situation in which it transgressed against its neighbours, the Qur’anic prophesy of the Night Journey was invoked, Hitler fulfilled the role of the Scourge and the outcome confirmed Maimonides’ understanding of the circumstances of the return of a Jewish community to Palestine and the establishment of the State of Israel. Both of those matters confirm the continuing validity of the Covenant of Sinai. But there was another matter which we have not yet noted: that the acting out of the parody of Mein Kampf, also illustrated the role of the Covenant people as a catalyst or a safety valve in the dismantling of imperial colonialism. That role was not immediately apparent during the conflict leading to the establishment of the State of Israel. The world was too distracted by that conflict to realize that if it looked closely it could catch the first glimmer of Maimonides’ Messianic Age just around the corner of the colonial fence. It soon became more apparent as the process of decolonization took hold. It was traumatic. But that was because of the reluctance of the amorphous Christian gel to recognize what was happening and its determination to hang on to the privileges of colonialism even if it let got the trappings.

The situation was really quite straight forward. The conduct of the war which the British government went into in order to preserve its colonial privileges made it absolutely impossible for it, or any of the other European colonial powers, to maintain them. The harder it tried; and the more determined Churchill was to extend the war – to involve other countries in it – in order to do so, the more inevitable and the more traumatic the dismantling became. It was a vital strand of the parody that Hitler did not wish to deprive Britain of its empire. He simply wanted one for Germany as well: his Lebensraum or his land-contiguous colonial realm. He spelled it out very clearly when he told his close colleagues at the time of Barbarossa of his plans for Eastern Europe and the near Soviet republics. Some regions were to be annexed to Germany. Some were to be administered as colonies. Some were to be simply suzerain or tribute paying states. (Chapter 24) It was the classic colonial imperial pattern. All of the European colonial powers knew it very well. Let there be no mistake: the colonial system would not have been dismantled except for the Second World War. The people of the Covenant were at the centre of it. They were the catalyst or the trigger for the dismantling.

However the dismantling was only partial. The Western World in general and the United States in particular set out to preserve their grip and to continue the exploitation of the resources of the former colonies by what ever means were available. These included, at a formal level, the instruments of Bretton Woods; the revision of national constitutions and fiscal, monetary and land tenure systems where possible (or by 'advising' where revision was not possible); and by the exclusion of smaller powers from major decision making bodies. At a market level it included the simple matter of investment power and the promise of the fruits of foreign investment, and in the case of the United States, the exercise of its capacity to negotiate linked trade and defence treaties and agreements by virtue of its near-legendary nuclear military power, and by exploiting the fear of Communist infiltration or incursion during the Cold War. But the most insidious mechanism has been market price manipulation and competition to force countries into bidding wars for major resource projects, and the threat of either the substitution of alternative supplies or the withdrawal of established enterprises. Globalization and the exploitation of consumer market technology has aggravated the situation. This all means that colonialism is back in vogue, alive and well, just under another name – or a camouflage.

That brings us back to Israel and the Covenant. Like it or not, recognize it or not, the people Israel, or World Jewry, are unwittingly and reluctantly the catalyst or the safety valve in the next stage of 'decolonization' or relief from exploitation. But they are not on their own. Standing atop Mount Moriah, in the shadow of the Dome of the Rock, they are linked this time with the people of Islam. The people of the amorphous Christian gel can cooperate if they wish, but the process can go on without them. There was very clear warning of this situation in 1973, at the time of the Yom Kippur War when a selective oil embargo was imposed against certain allies of Israel. The Western Powers were able to manoeuvre around it and in the generation since have actually tightened their grip still further. The need for a safety valve has never been greater.

So it is only a matter of time before we, or our descendants, will be able to experience the Messianic Age as Maimonides understood it, but we have lost too much time already. The situation is running in parallel with that before the Second World War. The major difference is that the United States is the key player instead of Britain. The greater its determination to resist change and to maintain its position of privilege, and the longer the delay before it responds to the circumstances, the greater the level of trauma for those involved must be. An analysis of all of the pockmarks along the way – the beacons – since the State of Israel was established is not feasible, and to provide a basis on which to consider the way ahead it is necessary to leapfrog from one event, or development, to another, merely clipping the peaks in a brief review of the fifty wasted years since the establishment of both the State of Israel and the World Council of Churches. Those peaks include the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; the development of the Palestinian refugee crisis; the Cold War and the Arms Race, and the use of the Central Intelligence Agency in undeclared wars against friendly countries; the Suez Crisis and the Eisenhower Doctrine, the series of wars in Asia including the Chinese Communist victory over the Nationalists, and Korea; South Africa's Apartheid and the related matters of Civil liberties for Black Americans. In the next chapter we sight the Six Days War of June 1967, the Yom Kippur War of 1973 with which was associated the OAPEC oil embargo and the push for a New International Economic Order; the Balkans and the Kosovo crisis; the Second Vatican Council and further doctrinal developments in Roman Catholicism; regional cooperation; globalization, resource exploitation and capital flow. Some quick-reference diary notes on other events and developments provide a means to jump from one peak to another.

As factors in the overall trouble in the triangle, each of these peaks or beacons have either been influenced by it, or have exacerbated it. And from each peak we catch a glimpse of the Middle East. Jerusalem, with the Dome of the Rock on Mount Moriah as its centre piece, stands as the clearest beacon of them all. That is our starting point. On December 1, 1948, just a year after the United Nations adopted the UNSCOP partition plan, the situation there was complicated enormously when key Palestinian leaders met in Jericho and, breaking with the Mufti, passed a resolution advocating the incorporation of what remained of their territory into Jordan. King Abdullah naturally approved the union which he had long been working towards, but Egypt, Syria and Saudi Arabia opposed it and the Arab League refused to recognize it. The Mufti's Government for all Palestine moved from Gaza to Cairo and rejected Abdullah's authority. The Arab house was divided, and with a would-be-government in exile disputing control of territory with a more-or-less friendly foreign government which was in partial occupation of that territory, and able to claim substantial local support, the hand of the Israeli Provisional Council of State was strengthened considerably.

GOOD NEWS! HUMAN RIGHTS FOR ALL!

Then, as Arabs in Israel and Palestine prepared to face a period without many rights at all, most of the Christian world prepared for Christmas comfortable in the knowledge that the United Nations had adopted the Declaration of Human Rights on December 10. It was a remarkable document. Drafted with great care to recognize the aspirations of people world wide. It was a direct rebuttal of many of the policies of the colonial era and it was therefore a challenge to every country which had just been granted trusteeship over one or more countries of the Third World, but it also repudiated many of the restrictive employment and civil codes of the industrialized countries. It declared that a number of rights, set out in 30 articles, belonged to all people irrespective of distinctions such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status. The rights covered matters of slave labour and other restrictive or exploitative labour practices; torture and rights at law; nationality, privacy, movement and asylum; marriage; property; thought, religion, culture and assembly; dignity and recreation, payment for labour, access to health and education services; and, above all, recognition that all humans are born free and equal in dignity and rights.

The Declaration was known to be a challenge to those countries which did not practice universal suffrage; those, such as India with its cultural tradition of male dominance in a rigid caste system with arranged marriages; and those which operated intrusive security and police systems such as the Soviet Union. To a large extent it reflected the values of the Gospel and the Mosaic Law and some of its backers promoted it as another means of Christianizing the unevangelized world, but these values were generally consistent with the teachings of other faiths as well, and the established principles – even if not practices – of the Western Christian countries. Others saw it in more sinister terms: either imposing the standards of the amorphous Christian gel on the rest of the world, or, using the employment code provisions, as a means of reducing market competition from cheap-labour-base countries. It was on such a basis that it was therefore publicized in the West as something of a challenge for the Communist and other non-Christian countries which were supposed to lag behind the West. The Jewish community in the Diaspora welcomed it. In fact the World Union of Progressive Judaism was influential in having the clause relating to freedom of religion included in Article 18.⁹ They knew more about the abuse of human rights from first hand experience than most people. But no one, except UNSCOP, bothered much about the Palestinians, and even though the partition plan approved by the United Nations contained comprehensive assurances for the protection of the rights of both Jews and Arabs in the others' territory, the Provisional government in Israel was not interested in any rights for Palestinians at all. It only wanted them gone.

It was no real surprise when, in a vote with 48 'Yes', nil 'Against' and eight 'Abstain', all except one Western member, South Africa, supported the declaration, while the Soviet bloc of six abstained. But there was mild surprise, or cynicism, in the West when all of the non-Christian member countries except one of the nine Muslim members also voted in favor. Only Saudi Arabia joined South Africa and the Communist bloc in abstaining. South Africa's position had become quite apparent with the election of the Apartheid government earlier in the year. It was intent on removing the rights of blacks and restricting the rights of other non-whites, not in enshrining them and guaranteeing their development. Saudi Arabia had good reason to believe that there was a deliberate effort to discredit some of the religious values of Islam and, in particular, the integration of civil and religious law. The non-Western countries which voted in favor were not claiming to be above reproach, but they were saying, in effect, "we recognize those rights and we will work to meet the challenge which they present." The countries which were less open included those which were administering trust territories and colonies and which were not eager to enshrine such a list of rights because to do so meant taking the first steps in decolonization. But there were a number of European-settler dominated countries in which there was plenty of lip service but a distinct effort to sweep the challenge under the carpet because of its implications for their policies towards indigenous peoples. They included several Latin American countries and two English-speaking countries in particular, in addition to South Africa: the United States and Australia.

The United States administration knew that it had a problem in domestic race relations and the infringement of the rights of African Americans, especially in southern states, and its non-reaction to the election of South Africa's Apartheid government has already been noted. Its problem was about to reach crisis proportions, but when it endorsed the Declaration of Human Rights it had no organized plans in place to do anything about it.

BRINGING THEM HOME

Australia, likewise, only reluctantly admitted that it had an indigenous Aboriginal population, but it was going full steam ahead to do something about it. The wrong way, and with very mixed motives. The nation's early colonial record was among the worst in the world but its people, generally, were very reluctant to talk about it or to recognize it. Aborigines, descendants of people who are thought to have come to Australia from Asia 40,000 years ago. It is now known that by 30,000 years ago scattered populations had occupied the whole of the arid regions of the continent as well as the fertile coastal strip and Tasmania. Their number at the date of European settlement, 1788, is difficult to estimate, but some authorities accept a figure of more than one million. Genocide, disease and starvation resulting from forced displacement had cut the population to about 180,000 in 1861, then to 95,000 at the date of federation (1901), and to a low of 74,000 in 1933.¹⁰ They were not recognized for census purposes and most people wished 'the problem' would simply go away. Extracts from a 1997 report to the Commonwealth government by its Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission, Bringing them home, indicate the gravity of the overall situation.

Within months of the 'First Fleet' arrival at Sydney Cove in 1788 there was 'open animosity' as indigenous people protested against 'the Europeans cutting down trees, taking their food and game, and driving them back into others' territories.' Bitter conflict followed as Aboriginal people engaged in 'guerrilla warfare – plundering crops, burning huts, and driving away stock' to be met by 'punitive expeditions of great ferocity in which bands of Aborigines encountered were indiscriminately killed' ...¹¹

In the 1870s the destitution and vulnerability of the Aboriginal people moved the missionaries to renewed efforts. They successfully lobbied the government to reserve lands for their use and appealed for public support resulting in the establishment of missions at Maloga and Warangesda. In 1881 a Protector of Aborigines was appointed. He recommended that reserves be set aside throughout the State to which Aboriginal people should be encouraged to move ... In 1883 the Aborigines Protection Board was established to manage the reserves and control the lives of the estimated 9,000 Aboriginal people in NSW [the state of New South Wales] at that time ...¹²

After the Australian Capital Territory was established in 1911 the Board compelled all Aboriginal people in the Territory (including those who had been granted land for farming) to move to the Egerton Mission Station at Yass. When that mission closed two years later the residents became fringe-dwellers on the outskirts of Yass until another forced move to Hollywood Mission in 1934 ... By 1939 there were over 180 reserves in NSW. 'In most cases they were small with housing consisting of humpies made from iron roofing.' They were of two kinds. 'Managed reserves' ... usually staffed by a teacher-manager and education of a sort, rations and housing were provided. Unmanaged reserves provided rations but no housing or education and were under the control of the police.¹³

From 1905 the Board [had come] under pressure to relinquish reserved land in eastern NSW for non-indigenous settlement. This pressure became 'irresistible' in 1917 with the Returned Servicemen's Settlement Scheme whereby returned soldiers could select a block of agricultural land. At the same time changes in the pastoral industry were forcing Indigenous communities off pastoral stations as the stations were broken up into smaller family-based operations.¹⁴

In 1937 Aboriginal affairs were discussed for the first time at the national level when a Commonwealth-State Native Welfare Conference was convened. The Brisbane Telegraph reported that:

Mr. Neville [The Chief Protector of WA] holds the view that within one hundred years the pure black will be extinct. But the half-caste problem was increasing every year. Therefore their idea was to keep the pure blacks segregated and absorb the half-castes into the white population. Sixty years ago, he said, there were over 60,000 full-blooded natives in Western Australia. Today there are only 20,000. In time there would be none. Perhaps it would take one hundred years, perhaps longer, but the race was dying. The pure blooded Aboriginal was not a quick breeder. On the other hand the half-caste was. In Western Australia there were half-caste families of twenty and upwards. That showed the magnitude of the problem.¹⁵

In some states half-castes with more than a specified proportion of white 'blood' were already being prevented, by law from living with their families on reserves in order to force them to 'assimilate' and there had previously been some debate about whether it was better to remove babies at birth or at the age of two years. In the circumstances, and in the belief that there was nothing of value in the indigenous culture, that "the policy for them must be one of welfare" to overcome social and cultural deprivation, and that under a policy of forced removal "the break-up of such groups will be rapid,"¹⁶ it was resolved that:

... this conference believes that the destiny of the natives of Aboriginal origin, but not of the full blood, lies in their ultimate absorption by the people of the Commonwealth, and it therefore recommends that all efforts be directed to that end ... [and] ... efforts of all state authorities should be directed towards the education of children of mixed Aboriginal blood at white standards, and their subsequent employment under the same conditions as whites with a view to their taking their place in the white community on an equal footing with the whites.¹⁷

It was three years, 1940, before the first state, NSW, reshaped its indigenous child welfare system and adopted a welfare-oriented policy and it was not until the late 1940s that other states followed suit, so that in 1948 while the United Nations deliberated on the proposal for a Universal Declaration of Human Rights the Commonwealth and the state governments, the ones which still had the constitutional responsibility for Aboriginal affairs, were deliberately and doggedly pursuing a policy of forced child removal and “assimilation.” For the churches which were cooperating with the government authorities and the police in the placement of forcibly removed children either in orphanages or for adoption into white urban homes, there was only one motive: the welfare of the children. On the other hand, for some influential political lobby groups the real purpose behind the program was to breed Aborigines out of existence as a culturally identifiable community so that they would not attract foreign attention and “become a problem” through land rights claims and competition for resources, or by stimulating interest in mass coloured migration, and their lack of interest in welfare equity was palpable. The distinction between Australia’s policies towards its indigenous and non-indigenous populations was also palpable in 1951 when a World Health Organization report stressed that child welfare services should be focussed on assisting families to keep their children with them.¹⁸ The newly appointed Minister for Territories, Paul Hasluck, was moved to note that Australia’s treatment of its indigenous people made a mockery of its promotion of human rights at the international level, but he did not move to change the basic policy of assimilation, just to make it equitable. The third national Native Welfare Conference therefore agreed that:

- Assimilation means, in practical terms, that, in the course of time, it is expected that all persons of aboriginal blood or mixed blood in Australia will live like other white Australians do. [Emphasis added.]¹⁹

However, Australia’s isolationism was gradually being broken. Five years later Aborigines were included in the population census for the first time, and in 1967 responsibility for Aboriginal Affairs was transferred by referendum to the Commonwealth. In 1972 the Australian Labour Party, led by Gough Whitlam, campaigned for office with self-determination for Aborigines as a major plank in its platform. The policy of forced removals was phased out very quickly, and the next year the National Aboriginal Consultative Committee was established. A number of welfare agencies controlled by indigenous communities on a state or regional basis were also established; a series of enquiries were held; a system to determine Aboriginal land rights was introduced; a Commonwealth-funded Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Commission was established in the late 1980’s; and in 1995 the Commonwealth government instructed the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission to conduct the National Inquiry into the separation of the children of Indigenous Peoples from their families, from which extracts have been quoted above. It had been a long time coming, but progress was being made. Many of the Commission’s recommendations remain to be implemented, including three key ones: that a national apology be made, formally, by the Commonwealth Parliament to the children of the post-war “Stolen Generation,” that reparation be made to them; and that the Commonwealth legislate to implement the UN Genocide Convention with full domestic effect.

In fact there was another supra-national power which was trying not to recognize the challenge of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as well as the nations referred to. The Roman Catholic Church. The church's Code of Canon Law was not, and is still not, consistent with the declaration in certain respects. Its regulations concerning marriage are contrary to Article 16 (1): Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution. Then Article 18: Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance. In addition the impact of some of the canon laws concerning marriage is also contrary to the intention of Article 26 (3) Parents have a prior right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children.

A CHALLENGE OF ASTRONOMICAL PROPORTIONS ...

So: an uneasy truce was in place in Israel and Palestine as the amorphous Christian gel set about celebrating Christmas in 1948, the year of the central fact of the Christian Era – the establishment of that State of Israel. And it was inundated with a series of challenges to its self-understanding and its Messianic theology which it was reluctant to recognize and at a loss to know how to respond as the world lurched from one crisis to another. In addition to the establishment of the State of Israel they were atheistic Communism, now more manifest than previously because of the deepening Cold War; the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls; Apartheid in South Africa; the Kinsey Report, the coming of age of the Ecumenical Movement through the establishment of the World Council of Churches, and the UN's Universal Declaration of Human Rights. But another challenge from the world of science was just breaking around it which was much more basic than any of those. Creation was back on the agenda. This time, unlike the challenge of Darwinian evolutionary theory which was largely a matter of the church's authority, teaching and self-understanding, the new challenge went to the basis of creation and the existence of God.

Earlier in the year three eminent astronomers and mathematicians, Hermann Bondi, Fred Hoyle and Thomas Gold, had cooperated in the publication of a paper in which they advanced the theory that the universe was in a "steady state." They believed that although the universe was expanding in terms of the volume of the cosmos, the density of the universe was being maintained by the constant creation of new matter. Their theory tended to be supported by the work of an astrophysicist, Viktor Ambartsumian, who had shown, only the year before, that new stellar systems were forming within the Milky Way, apparently from changing systems of group of stars. That concept extended the Darwinian challenge and persuaded most people that Darwin was right. If creation was an ongoing process then it was highly unlikely that one little segment of it had been created complete and unalterable, and the church therefore did not know what it was talking about. The basis of its claim to teaching authority – and any other kind of authority – was further undermined. But those scientists did not offer a view on the origin of the universe, how the material in the existing part of the steady state came into being, or how old it was. It was just there, originating by some phenomenon or other. That concept was mind boggling for most people, but it did not directly challenge the church's teaching that the universe was created by God.

There had been so many major discoveries in astro-physics and astronomy in the three or four generations since Darwin that people had become accustomed to the fact that the earth was not the centre of the universe, that not even the sun was the centre, and that time and distances beyond the comprehension of most human minds were involved. Scientists such as Aleksandr Friedmann, Edwin Hubble and Georges LeMaitre had advanced the theory that the cosmos was actually expanding and this had raised questions about whether the amount of matter in it was constant or increasing, and distances to other units of the universe had been measured in terms of millions of light years. But the scientific community was not unanimous in accepting such theories and while there was room for doubt hard core, very vocal sections of the church insisted on Biblical inerrancy and on the creation of the universe complete and unalterable only a few thousand years ago. They were insistent that creation science should be taught in schools alongside, or in competition with evolutionary science, and even though they were increasingly regarded by the mainstream church as an embarrassment, the population at large did not know who to believe.

... A 'BIG BANG'

However, later in the year, George Gamow and Ralph Alpher published another paper, The Origin of Chemical Elements, in which they built on all the evidence gathered by those before them that the universe was expanding, contradicted the steady state theory, and presented an alternative theory that the universe had come into being through a primeval thermonuclear explosion of fantastic proportions which they termed the "big bang." If they were right, then it raised totally new questions about the cause of the big bang; how life was generated from totally lifeless material produced by a thermonuclear reaction; whether it occurred spontaneously together with the re-composition of all cosmic matter; whether, in that case, science could now reproduce such an occurrence in the laboratory; and, if so, what did this suggest about creation and the involvement of an external supreme being, or a god? If the universe was so big and so old, why should the earth be regarded as the only inhabited planet, and how many other 'colonized' planets were there 'out there?' If a god had caused the big bang and created such a universe why should he be the only one causing such an event in the cosmos and why should he send a 'son' who had to leave a succession of deputies to run his affairs for him? Furthermore, if the universe had a starting point in time and was still being flung outwards into a void without boundaries it would have to eventually dissipate, go out of existence, have an end, or at least have some predictable fate.

That offered quite a challenge to the thinkers of astronomy and other sciences. They began to explore beyond the question of the origin of the universe to the question of its fate. Within a few years, alternative theories had been published and were being debated about what will happen to the universe when it has cooled to a critical point. Will cosmic expansion continue, unbound, so that galaxies and stars simply go cold, ‘die’ and continue as projectiles in an ever increasing cosmic semi-void?. Or will it reach the extent of expansion, and, bound by natural forces, begin to contract to a common point, to be reformed into one or more fiery masses in a ‘big squeeze’ – the reverse of a ‘big bang’ – perhaps even triggering another big bang and starting the process all over again? On that, there is no agreed scientific position, but new calculations, based on some of Hubble’s earlier work on the speed and direction of separation of the units of the universe, soon indicated that the occurrence of a big bang was plausible and that if it did occur it was in the time range between one thousand million years ago and one thousand five hundred million years ago. That has become the most widely accepted theory for the origin of the universe as we know it, and also for its age. It is slightly longer than the vice-chancellor of Cambridge University determined as the date and time of creation calculated (in the wake of the Reformation) based on Biblical sources: nine o’clock in the morning on October 23rd 4004 BCE, with all species created complete, of course! (Chapter 14)²⁰

The church – or the churches – did not know how to respond. It was only the Christian church which had sought to pontificate on the question of creation. It did not have to do so. There was never any real need for it to do so. It had only done so as an aspect of its confused bid to maintain its special status in tertiary education and as the exclusive source of any information relating to the divine. Such intervention in humanity’s search for answers to the ‘how’ and ‘why’ questions of life and natural science – and its intimately related search for means of utilizing the resources of creation and an understanding of humanity’s relationship to other units of creation – was totally inappropriate. It was a product of the same self-understanding and mindset which led to the papal decree of 1907, Lamentabili, the encyclical Pascendi, and the subsequent Oath Against the Errors of Modernism which was imposed in 1910 when scientists and teachers ignored the decree. (Chapter 16)

The church could have simply said, concerning creation, “We have no idea. All we know is that ‘the heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament proclaims His handiwork.’” (Psalm 19:1 RSV) Neither of its partners in the triangle got hung up over the issue. They were content to take the Biblical creation stories as only indicative of a Supreme Being, knowable only through divine revelation, whose creative power humanity may explore, seek to understand, and utilize but never fully understand or emulate. It matters not one jot or tittle how vast or how small the products of creation are proven to be – if humanity ever finds out. It is of no consequence at all. We can not possibly utilize the totality of creation. Nor do we need to. The only purpose in knowing more about creation is to be better able to understand the Creator and our relationship to both the Creator and all other aspects of creation. God’s creativity is God’s creativity whether we understand the totality of it or not; and regardless of the extent to which we can learn to measure it, and to understand the laws by which it functions and by means of which we may utilize the resources divinely made available to us. The more we learn about creation, the better we understand how limited is our knowledge about creation, and the greater should be our wonder at the glory which the heavens declare.

In some of the non-Abrahamic traditions which arose either in the Mediterranean or the East there were skeptics who debated at length, and in circles, about the relationship of an external or internal creator – or the absence of one – to creation. In some other traditions there was an unquestioning acceptance of a cosmic presence with responsibility for all that was, that is and that will be.

The existence of a belief in a supreme being among primitive peoples (a notion discovered by Andrew Lang) has been proven and attested to over and over again by investigators of numerous cultures. This belief has been found among the cultures of Africa, the Ainu of the northern Japanese islands, Amerindians, south central Australians, the Fuegians of South America, and in almost all parts of the globe. Though the precise nature and characteristics of the supreme creator deity may differ from culture to culture, a specific and persuasive structure of this type of deity can be discerned. The following characteristics tend to be common: (1) he is all wise and all powerful. The world comes into being because of his wisdom, and he is able to actualize the world because of his power. (2) The deity exists alone prior to the creation of the world. There is no being or thing prior to his existence. No explanation can therefore be given of his existence, before which one confronts the ultimate mystery. (3) The mode of creation is conscious, deliberate and orderly. This again is an aspect of the creator's wisdom and power. The creation comes about because the deity seems to have a definite plan in mind and does not create on a trial-and-error basis.²¹

The church had always denigrated the beliefs of such 'primitive peoples' and, in the early phase of the church's expansion through northern Europe and during the early phase of the colonial era, it found it sufficient reason to use the might of the powers associated with it to ruthlessly oppress them because they could not name, nor accept, Christ as one part of that cosmic presence. (Chapters 7, 11.) And Siddhartha Gautama, the Buddha, (chapter 5) had never attempted to confront the issue. He declared questions of whether the world and the universe were finite and definable or infinite, eternal or subject to a beginning and an ending as unanswerable. He did not suggest they were irrelevant. He just got on with the issues which mattered: ethics and the philosophy of living together.

The mainstream churches, having bought into the argument when they had no basis on which to do so, had to, in effect, sit on their hands and hope the questions would go away. The Garnow-Alpher theory was not immediately widely accepted, and for a few years the steady state theory held sway. It was not until 13 years later, 1961, after Robert Dicke proposed that if microwave radiation emanating from outer space were to be detected it would establish the validity of the big bang theory, that support for that theory began to build. Then from 1965, when two scientists working on the development of commercial microwave technology in the United States, Arno Penzias and Robert Wilson, confirmed the presence of such radiation the big bang theory became generally accepted and the steady state theory was discredited. The questions had not gone away. They were getting thicker, and the credibility and influence of the churches, already beginning to slide, continued to slide progressively. Their thoughts turned to how to maintain their position and to present their case, their current theology and their self-understanding in a convincing manner, not to whether they should reassess their theology in the light of the trouble in the triangle and the developments occurring all around them. A passage by systematic theologian Ted Peters reflects the situation very well:

One of the unpredicted and astounding intellectual trends of our time is the re-asking of the God question within the orbit of scientific discussion about the natural world. ... Since the Enlightenment we have pretty much assumed that these two [what we know about the natural world through science and what religious thinkers say about the transcendent world] represent separate domains of human knowing. We have erected a high wall of separation between church and laboratory. Yet this is increasingly recognized as most unfortunate, because we are all aware that there is but one reality, so sooner or later we will become dissatisfied with consigning our differences to separate ghettos of knowledge. The quiet revolutionaries since the 1960s have been looking for parallels, points of contact, consonance, crossovers, and conflations. The emerging new discipline ... is studying developments in natural science – especially physics and the life sciences – and is engaging in serious reflection on various loci of Christian doctrine. [Emphasis added.]²²

Two years after Penzias and Wilson confirmed that there was microwave radiation emanating from outer space, in 1967, the papal Oath Against the Errors of Modernism was quietly dropped from the Vatican's armoury. However that was all in the future at Christmas, 1948, when the world was more concerned with the action in the Middle East.

CEASE FIRE ... ANGLO-ISRAELI STAND-OFF ... ARMISTICE ...

A few days after New Year, 1949, January 5, Israel announced that it had penetrated Egyptian territory. Two days later, being satisfied that it was in a very strong negotiating position, it was happy for another cease fire to take effect. But on the same day it demonstrated quite decisively that it was not to be trifled with. It was prepared to confront the major powers. It shot down five British aircraft, based in the Suez Canal Zone, while they were on reconnaissance patrols in the absence of the expelled UN observers, to assess the nature and depth of the claimed Israeli penetration into Egypt. Britain protested but Israel refused to recognize the protest on the grounds that Britain had not yet recognized Israel. Israel lodged a counter protest at Britain's decision to send a naval force, at Transjordan's request, to the head of the Gulf of Aqaba where the territories of Saudi Arabia, Transjordan, Egypt and the Negev, to which Israel laid claim, all abutted and relations between Israel and Britain soured further. Quite apart from its opposition to the UNSCOP partition plan, Britain's position was that it had declined to jump on the American bandwagon and recognize Israel until, in accordance with traditional international practice, it had a functioning administration, known frontiers and the ability to carry out international obligations.²³ It also accused Israel of being responsible for the threat to peace and stability in the Middle East through its policy of aggression and failing to comply with the UN Security Council call for a cease fire and a return to previous truce positions.

With tension running very high Weizmann, then President of the Provisional Council of State of Israel by virtue of his election by that body two days after the declaration of the establishment of the state, sought to defend his country's actions on January 12 by declaring at a press conference that Israel "had no designs on the territory of others, but needed the land awarded to it by the United Nations in order to settle the tragic survivors of Nazi persecution." It was in no sense a puppet of either Communist Russia or the West, he said, strict neutrality was its life blood and, in time, Jew and Arab could learn to live together in peace.²⁴ It is significant that he perpetuated the argument that there was no where else for the remnant of Europe's Jews to settle, which, in post Second World War conditions was no longer sustainable but which Zionists had pressed relentlessly in their bid for the establishment of a Jewish State in Palestine.

Six weeks later, on February 24, after negotiations nurtured by Count Bernadotte's successor, Dr. Bunche, Israel signed its first armistice, with Egypt, and this was followed by similar agreements with Lebanon (March 23), Transjordan (April 3), Iraq (also April), and finally Syria (July 20) after it had resolved domestic crises including an army revolution. But each agreement was provisional in nature, named no final political or territorial boundaries, and was signed without prejudice to "the rights, claims and positions" of the parties concerned in connection with "the ultimate peaceful settlement of the Palestine question."²⁵ Israel had insisted on negotiating with each country separately – a procedure it has insisted on at all times – so that it could grind every territorial advantage possible from each round of negotiations without having to put all of its cards on the table at one time. In effect it changed the rules each time. For example, in the case of Transjordan, it broke the cease fire on the eve of armistice negotiations to expel a small force of the Arab Legion which was occupying a triangle of territory at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba and sought to justify its action on the grounds that it was an area allocated to a Jewish State under the UNSCOP plan. In contrast, when it suited it, Israel argued that territory which it was occupying but which had been allocated to an Arab state under the same plan was lawfully its by virtue of conquest.²⁶ It would not have been able to use such tactics if the armistice negotiations were concurrent, and – of far greater importance – the nature of "the Palestinian question" would certainly have been much different and possibly less complex because the future of the territory allocated for an Arab state would have been dealt with as a whole, as the UN intended.

By adopting the approach which it did, Israel showed very clearly that it was not interested in coexisting with a state of Palestine. In the circumstances King Abdullah, having accepted an armistice agreement, proceeded to administer the territory of the West Bank for which Transjordan accepted responsibility as if it was a part of his kingdom, changed its name to Jordan, granted automatic citizenship to refugees settled in that area and, in doing so, increased the population of his country by one third. However some of the wider implications of that decision which were not immediately apparent have had serious consequences for Jordan and the world as the years have passed. Jordan became a principal host for Palestinian refugee camps and, by virtue of its position adjacent to Israel, the headquarters of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The Palestinian community virtually became a state within a state and great friction developed while the more educated Palestinians also provided a substantial proportion of the staff of the Jordanian public service. This led to Jordan's bloody war against the PLO, its expulsion from the territory which it sought to make its national homeland, and its successive moves from Jordan to Lebanon, Libya, Egypt and back to the West Bank as the United States applied enormous pressure in a bid to bring about its demise, and as alliances changed.

... AND UN MEMBERSHIP

During the course of the war and those armistice negotiations Israel's Provisional Council of State had been busy indeed. It had determined the date for elections for a Constituent Assembly, January 25, 1949, and it proceeded with that election. The Assembly (Knesset) met for the first time on February 14, Weizmann named Ben-Gurion to try to form a government, and after weeks of political negotiation he was able to announce the formation of a coalition government which was confirmed by a vote of the Knesset and took office on March 10. In spite of its stormy relations with the United Nations as a body and with individual members, and in spite of "the reluctance (it) had shown on various occasions to observe the rules that body had laid down"²⁷ the Provisional Council had already submitted an application for membership of the world body. Its application was approved by the Security Council on March 11, immediately after the government formally took office. The statutes of the United Nations stipulate that an application for membership submitted by a peace-loving country which is able and willing to carry out the obligations of the charter shall, if recommended by the Security Council, be referred to the General Assembly and shall become effective when it is accepted by a two thirds majority. At the time that the Security Council recommendation was made Israel had signed an armistice agreement with only one country, Egypt.

JEWISH ACTION ... VATICAN REACTION

In the meantime the Israeli Provisional State Council had also "transformed" the departments of the mandatory authority into departments of the government of Israel together with organs of the Jewish Agency and the Va'ad Le'umi, (the executive of the National Assembly which was set up in October 1920 by Palestinian Jewry to administer the National Home in the light of the Balfour Declaration and decisions taken by the San Remo Peace Conference in April that year).²⁸ But the transformation was carried out without taking account of how the mandated territories which were not to be part of Israel would be administered after the split, or consultations with the UN or potential Arab authorities.

The Vatican was very uneasy indeed, and on April 15, while the Security Council's recommendation of Israel's UN membership application was before the General Assembly but had not yet been considered, and in the middle of the series of armistice negotiations, the pope issued yet another encyclical, In Redemptoris Nostri. It bears the hallmarks of a measure designed to incite popular political pressure against Israel. It read, in part: “We cannot help repeating here the same declaration, encouraged by the thought that it may also serve as an inspiration to Our children. ... Let them wherever they are living, use every legitimate means to persuade the rulers of nations, and those whose duty it is to settle this important question, to accord to Jerusalem and its surroundings a juridical status. ... Nor can we omit to point out that all rights to the holy places which Catholics, during many centuries have acquired and time and again defended valiantly, and which our predecessors have solemnly and effectively vindicated, should be preserved inviolate.”²⁹

The thrust of the encyclical was taken even further in an article in ³⁰

Pius XII’s two encyclicals on the crisis in Palestine, Multiplicibus Curis in October 1948 and now Redemptoris Nostri, and his formal call for the full territorial internationalization of Jerusalem, followed his earlier contributions to the theological debate and were entirely consistent with the thrust of them. Those earlier contributions included the banning of works by Jewish authors Fleg and Bergson – in the last edition of the Papal Index librorum prohibitorum – and his prayer to Blessed Virgin Mary for Peace, Auspicia Quaedam, in May 1948. The prevailing Vatican view (and the view of many non-Catholics as well) had not changed. It was still that the Jews were a people guilty of the crime of deicide and an accursed people whose exile is clear proof of God’s punishment. They must therefore suffer but they must not be exterminated lest they be unable to fulfill their role as witnesses to the truth.³¹

That view had been reflected in a very measured statement by Ernesto Buonaiuti, a priest, professor of philosophy at the Pontifical University and personal confidante of Vatican Secretary of State Cardinal Gasparri, in an interview with a Jewish journalist in Rome in December 1921 when the mandate negotiations were at a critical stage. In response to a question about the value of Zionism he said: “I consider the idea of creating in Palestine a place of refuge for the Jews persecuted by blind, inhuman anti-Semitism as beyond reproach; on the other hand, however, I believe that the Jews have to carry out a higher mission in forming throughout their dispersion a nucleus of constant rejuvenation and social progress, which role they have always played by their dissatisfaction and restlessness.” Then, on Catholic-Zionist relations he said three motives governed Catholic attitudes: “(First) ... Catholicism shares the fears and apprehensions with which existing society views the programme of the reconstitution of the Jewish race, in view of the invincible revolutionary spirit with which the latter appears to be imbued. (Second) Catholicism maintains in its tradition ... Christ’s curse against Jerusalem: ‘No stone shall remain on your stones.’ Any attempt to restore Jerusalem to a position of real political value, ... is regarded as an insult. (Third) Catholic circles are alarmed by the fact that the Zionist movement has placed itself under the protection of England, which is promoting with all means Protestant propaganda in the Near East, and which appears today as the most anti-Catholic people among all European nations.” ³² (Emphasis added.)

In line with those views the Vatican had vigorously opposed Jews being granted “a privileged and preponderant position in Palestine” and actually canvassed the prospect of support from the European powers for papal territorial rights over the key area of central Palestine which would include Jerusalem, Acre, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Jericho and Bethsaida.³³ At times it drew heavily on the messianic prophecies of Isaiah – when it suited its purposes – but it made no mention of passages dealing with the glorious resurrection of Jerusalem such as:

Foreigners will rebuild your walls_and their kings will be your servants._For though I struck you in anger,_in mercy I have pitied you. ...

The sons of your oppressors will come to you bowing,_at your feet shall fall all who despised you._They will call you ‘City of Yahweh’,_‘Zion of the Holy One of Israel.’ ...

Violence will no longer be heard in your country,_nor devastation and ruin within your frontiers._You will call your walls ‘Salvation’_and your gates ‘Praise.’ ...

Your sun will set no more_nor your moon wane,_but Yahweh will be your everlasting light_and your days of mourning will be ended....

‘For as the earth makes fresh things grow,_as a garden makes seeds spring up,_so will the Lord Yahweh make both integrity and praise_spring up in the sight of nations.’ ...

This Yahweh proclaims_to the ends of the earth:_Say to the daughter of Zion, ‘Look,_your saviour comes, the prize of his victory with him,_his trophies before him.’_They shall be called ‘The Holy People’,_‘Yahweh’s Redeemed.’_And you shall be called ‘The sought-after’,_‘City-not-forsaken.’_Isaiah 60:10,14,18,20; 61:11; 62:11-12. [The Jerusalem Bible]

Such passages were not consistent with the fate of the Jewish people and the City of Jerusalem, nor of the image of the church, which the Vatican sought to perpetuate. They were, in its view, intended only for the people of the Babylonian Exile, not for the people of the twentieth century of the Christian Era.

The fear of the Jewish State gaining world recognition and influence had actually been the major factor behind the Vatican’s politicking in a bid to prevent the British mandate from being confirmed, but that politicking had been focussed on the unfairness of a Protestant-Orthodox alliance undermining the position of Catholics in Palestine and the question of who should participate in control of the Holy Places. (Chapter 17)³⁴. Cardinal Gasparri made this clear when he said on one occasion “the danger we fear most is the establishment of a Jewish State in Palestine,”³⁵ and on another occasion in 1922, to Weizmann, “It is your university I fear.”³⁶ He was, in effect, acknowledging that while the Protestant churches posed an on-going theological and material challenge, the establishment of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem posed, and would progressively strengthen, a new ideological and theological challenge. Similarly, Baron Carlo Monti wrote to the Italian Foreign Minister that: “... the Holy See regards [the establishment of a Jewish State] as a most serious danger not only to the Church but also to all of Christianity.”³⁷ With little consideration for the impact of the Vatican’s concurrent and bitter opposition to the ecumenical movement, he was lobbying for an alliance of the Vatican and the Protestant churches in opposition to a Jewish state. Britain had proposed a Commission for the Holy Places consisting of representatives of all three Abrahamic religions, but the Vatican, in a bid to avoid Jewish representation, sought to substitute a commission of consuls who represented members of the League of Nations in Palestine. Catholic countries were to be in the majority and religious representatives were to be present only in a consultative capacity.³⁸

The same fear and the same views, had permeated the Vatican's actions during the Second World War and were a factor in Pius XII's decision to issue Redemptoris Nostri, calling for the internationalization of Jerusalem, at the time that the General Assembly was deliberating over Israel's application for UN membership and competing proposals for the future administration of the Holy City. The Vatican's fear of being superseded was well founded, but it was sparring with shadows. The real threat came from the accumulated consequences of nearly two thousand years of misconduct which had resulted from the church's self-misunderstanding. The Pope need not have worried about the Jewish State promoting a competing claim. The Israeli Government was still essentially secular in its approach even though it had to concede so much to the Religious Front which was intent on engineering a Jewish national home which was governed by orthodox Jewish law, and it, with the support of the majority of its citizens, was firmly against a theocratic form of government. It was not about to share its authority with the religious leadership through a Great Sanhedrin even if it was in sympathy with the idea expressed by Mizrahi world leader Rabbi Meir Bar-Ilan in 1926 that: "The State of Israel is something celestial, it is the divine world, our eternal destiny."³⁹ The Provisional Government had received a proposal that the Sanhedrin be revived for the purposes of introducing new legislation but it was doomed by disagreement over what its role would be in a modern legislative setting.⁴⁰ If the government had proceeded with that proposal there would have been major disputes between the Orthodox, the Conservative and the Reformed wings of Judaism over the way in which that authority would be exercised. And in any case, the concept of an earthly representative of God, other than in the Messianic sense, is totally abhorrent to Jews. It is not a description, a title or a role they would aspire to.

On May 9 – only two days before the final vote on Israel's application for membership of the United Nations – FIDES again followed the lead of the papal encyclical and gave space to the view that Zionism might have been spiritually inspired by a 2,000-year-old want for revenge against Christianity and several Catholic-dominated countries joined the debate in Vatican-inspired opposition to the admission of the Zionist state.⁴¹ The use of the words 'revenge against Christianity' was tantamount to a belated and pathetic admission that the Jewish community had reason to seek revenge, and although the use of the term does not reflect the motives of the majority of Jews it was an equally pathetic admission that the motive which inspired Zionism was a justified response to the excesses of Christianity. In any case, what Christian had a right to gainsay them if some of their number did seek revenge? What right did an instrument of the Catholic Church have to talk about tolerance in such terms? And who, in human terms, could deny a community the right to build secure barricades around its borders when the body which claimed to be the guardian of the world's morals and the guide to its political conduct talked of binding the lunatic in his rage?

Israel's membership of the United Nations formally took effect on May 11, 1949 when it was ratified by the General Assembly. That final UN decision in Israel's favor, and the muted response to the papal encyclicals, appears to have brought an understanding within the Vatican that its claims to Jerusalem and a slab of Palestine would never be accepted internationally. This is reflected in a further hardening of its attitude to Communism in a bid to reduce the threat to its temporal authority in the mini-city-state of the Vatican through a review of 'the Roman question.' On the authority of Pius XII a decree was issued by the Congregation of the Holy Office on June 13 forbidding Catholics to join the Communist Party or to read or work for its newspapers, and excommunicating those who "knowingly and willingly profess the doctrines of Communism, or defend its principles, or spread its errors." However those who joined the Communist Party in Iron Curtain countries for the sake of work needed to support their families were not to be excommunicated.⁴² They were expected to white-ant it from within. Even so, the Vatican tried to keep the issue of the internationalization of Jerusalem alive by having Belgium raise it again at the UN in 1950.

A RENASCENT JUDAISM

The Vatican's long-held fear of the consequences of a serious challenge to its claims to both temporal and religious authority as the sole representative of the divine Messiah-God on earth, and its manoeuvring around the issue of the Papal States and Catholic lay involvement in politics had been an important factor in the conduct of both the First and Second World Wars. Pope Benedict XV is said to have "dreamed of a papal presidency of a universal state" – an updated version of the Holy Roman Empire – and in 1920 in his encyclical Pacem Dei in the wake of the Balfour Declaration he totally disregarded the existence of the League of Nations when he called for the establishment of 'a league of nations based on Christian law.'⁴³ The Vatican had equally feared the challenge to its self-understanding and authority which the establishment of a Jewish State could generate. Such a state would automatically be recognized as having temporal authority and it could also gain strong religious authority in the name of resurgent Judaism with the strength and influence of a revitalized Jewish community.

In the circumstances of its near-miraculous recovery from oppression and near-oblivion it could be widely acknowledged as the Chosen People of God and it could even supersede the church, in a world view, as chief spokesperson for God – especially if it had a rebuilt temple as its focal point.⁴⁴ That was absolutely unthinkable and the Vatican did all it could to perpetuate the myth that Judaism only continued to exist as witness to the truth of Christianity which had superseded it. Now its worst fears of a Jewish religious resurgence were being confirmed by the statutes of the State of Israel. Worse still, it was now not only a recognized state but a full member of the world body, while the Vatican had only observer status. And its resurgence was further confirmed by a glorious flood of religious literature coming from Jewish writers in both Israel and the Diaspora. The Jewish contribution to literature, science and the arts had always been substantial and well above the level suggested by the Jewish population as a proportion of the total population (chapter 15, discussion on Nobel Prizes; chapter 18, contribution to German life) but this flood was quite different. It reflected the stimulus to Jewish theological thinking and self-understanding which the establishment of the State of Israel provided.

The visible flood began in late 1947 and coincided with the establishment of the Brandeis University in the US, the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel, Carmel College in Britain and Mount Scopus in Australia, the merging of two seminaries in the US and a big surge in the opening of new synagogues, especially in America. The first sign of it was Wolfson's Philo: Foundations of Religious Philosophy in Judaism, Christianity and Islam, followed in quick succession by Jules Isaac's Jesus and Israel, Jacob Epstein's "most authoritative" Introduction to the Original Text of the Mishnah,⁴⁵ Martin Buber's The Prophetic Faith, Arthur Koestler's Promise and Fulfilment: Palestine 1917-1949, and the publication of the first volume of a Jewish and Israeli encyclopaedia Ha-Entsiqlopedya. It continued with a rash of novels, plays, works of theology on an enormous scale, works on the Holocaust, anti-Semitism, prejudice and psychology, the establishment of new newspapers and journals, and a new dynamism in the presentation of Jewish culture and theatre. The Vatican's contribution to the theological debate was the banning of works by Jewish authors Fleg and Bergson in the last edition of the Papal Index librorum prohibitorum, and Pope Pius XII's Prayer to Blessed Virgin Mary for Peace, Auspicia Quaedam, in May 1948.

But the visible flood was the result of the stimulus provided by the trauma of the war years and a recovery in Jewish worship, both Orthodox and Reformed, was well under way before the general public became aware of it. The efforts of the World Union for Progressive Judaism (WUPJ, chapter 18) to revitalize Jewish religious life in Europe during the 1930s had been stymied as the world lurched towards war, but, under the leadership of Rabbi Louis-Germain who emerged from hiding in Lyons and returned to Paris immediately hostilities ended in 1945, it then tackled its most ambitious European project: the rebuilding of the severely damaged synagogue on rue Copernic. By 1948 it had recovered to about 300 members. It attracted a number of intellectuals and established a Hillel Centre for Jewish students in the Latin Quarter. It abandoned Sunday services and allowed a reversion to a more traditional liturgy with the use of more Hebrew.

The destruction of German Jewry made an early recovery there almost impossible, but the WUPJ arranged the appointment of a German-born American rabbi in Berlin, and was able to re-established a Liberal congregation in Amsterdam and locate a rabbi of Dutch origin to lead it. In addition it gained consultative status with the United Nations Economic and Social Council, UNESCO, and UNICEF, where, as noted, it used its influence to ensure that reference to freedom of religion was included in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.⁴⁶ The Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) moved its headquarters from Cincinnati to an impressive new building in New York with the poignant call to 'LOVE THY NEIGHBOR AS THYSELF' emblazoned across its full width. This greatly facilitated its growth from 300 to 656 congregations, and from 60,000 members to 200,000, in 21 years from 1943 to 1964. That dynamism was reflected in strong growth in Australia and South Africa as well.⁴⁷

And although the trauma of Jewish settlement and statehood imposed in Palestine showed clearly that Zionist leaders had disregarded their community's Covenant obligations and had not recognized the coincidence of the Qur'anic Night Journey and Maimonides' expectations of the return to Israel, some Jewish theologians began to take a renewed interest in covenant theology. Some, but not all.

Jews, having experienced their own special tragedy, emerged from World War II "filled with a mood of defeat rather than victory." Not only had the atomic destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki raised immense anxieties about the human future, but the death of their own 6 million and the plight of Jewish refugees barred from entry into Palestine cast a pall of deep despair. By the early fifties some Reform rabbis were seriously examining the somber theologies of religious existentialism. A layman not associated with Reform, Will Herberg, elaborated Nieburhr's dark view of human potential in the absence of transcendent faith. [Reinhold Nieburhr, teaching at the Christian Union Theological Seminary in New York, said that history had demonstrated the pervasiveness of human sinfulness and the inability of human beings to achieve moral progress on their own.] Man's existential predicament, he maintained, required a "leap of faith." Few Jewish thinkers, however, were ready to adopt the Pauline deprecation of human reason that had become popular among some Christian theologians. Much discussed and widely criticized as un-Jewish, Herberg's work represented an extreme reaction.⁴⁸

Michael Meyer notes that:

By the mid-fifties a circle of at least a dozen Reform rabbis had coalesced around the common goal of creating a new theology for Reform Judaism. ... They were united in their rejection of earlier Reform theology, which they found superficial, removed from the classical sources, and deaf to the voice of a personal God. Under the influence of Christian existentialism, they rediscovered more somber assessments of human nature within Jewish tradition and were willing to dwell on concepts like sin and the fear of God that liberal Jewish theology had relegated mostly to the Day of Atonement.

One traditional concept, they soon realized, better represented their position than any other. Berit, covenant, is one of the most crucial ideas of the Bible. It is particular to Israel; and it both sets the Jewish people apart and binds it together as a "covenant community." For Reform Jews berit was a far more conducive concept than matan torah, the giving of the law or teaching on Mount Sinai. The latter implied receipt rather than partnership, unquestioning obligation, and a fixed tradition. But covenant could be understood as an ongoing relationship. It was not limited to a single generation that might or might not have literally stood at Sinai. Every Jew in every age was obligated to renew and to uphold the covenant. As liberals, Jews were also free – on the basis of their own serious confrontation with the texts – to re-negotiate its terms. The covenant, in short, was the basis for the historical but also open-ended dialogue between God and Israel. [Emphasis added.]⁴⁹

That was only a start. There was a long way to go. There still is. Especially to re-work that expression “to re-negotiate” the terms of the Covenant of Sinai. That was set to lead Jewish theologians into a maze of contradictory positions during the next generation.

There had been some limited attention to the religious significance of the Holocaust in the immediate postwar years. As early as 1946 Rabbi David Polish of Evanston, Illinois had urged that Reform Judaism revive observance of the fast day of Tish'ah Be-Av, on which both ancient temples were destroyed, adapting it to commemorate “our twentieth-century disaster.” It was also Polish who told his colleagues in 1953:

If our sensitivity to revelation were not blunted (and perhaps it will be restored in the souls of our descendants), then a revelation, the full impact of which must yet be made manifest to us, occurred at the Iriya [municipal council chamber] of Tel-Aviv on the fifth of Iyar 1948 [when the independence of the State of Israel was declared] and, yes, in Treblinka, even as Pitom and Raamses were imitations of Sinai.⁵⁰

Polish was absolutely right. The fact of the establishment of the State of Israel was revelation in itself. He had come very close indeed to picking up the threads, and the coincidence, of the Qur’anic Night Journey and Maimonides’ expectations of the return to Israel. The centres which he referred to, Pitom and Raamses, were centres of trauma for the early Israelis during a period of slavery prior to the Exodus from Egypt to Sinai. Some three or four hundred years earlier, Joseph, one of the sons of the patriarch, Jacob, had been sold into slavery (transgressed against) by his brothers out of jealousy. He was recognized for his ability by pharaoh, appointed governor and, in that position of authority, was able and prepared to protect his father and his extended family from famine, in spite of his brothers’ efforts to dispose of him. He arranged the opportunity for them to settle in that foreign land. Subsequently, as foreign migrants, they became an embarrassment through population growth and success, and the reigning pharaoh took steps to suppress them. They were forced into virtual slave labour camps at Pitom and Raamses to build two store cities. It was at Raamses that the Passover, as related in Exodus, occurred and from there that Moses led that community of Israel in the Exodus to Sinai where the Covenant was revealed. (Chapter 6) Treblinka, the third of the Nazi extermination centres to be built, was officially described as a ‘transit camp’ for people en route to labour camps further east, but many of its victims simply served time as slave labour there before being ‘processed’ on site. Between 700,000 and one million Jews were gassed there between July 1942 and August 1943.⁵¹

Polish was therefore saying that in the same manner that Pitom and Raamses were transit labour camps on the long haul to Sinai, the revelations to Moses and the Covenant, Treblinka was a transit labour camp on the long haul to (or as a precursor of) the State of Israel and further revelation, presumably involving a new covenant, which was not, at that time, manifest. No Jewish scholar would dispute the immutability of the Torah, so here was an inconsistency or even a contradiction: neither Polish nor his colleagues seemed able, or prepared, to recognize that the Covenant of Sinai was still in effect: permanent, irrevocable and not subject to re- negotiation. All that was necessary was renewed commitment, a concerted effort to focus on it again, and the will to interpret and act on their obligations under it in contemporary circumstances. But Meyer tells us that Jewish Reform theologians drew no causal connection between the Holocaust and the establishment of the Jewish State.⁵² They became involved in the struggle for Black civil rights and related race issues, and they sought to prevent the intrusion of religion into public affairs and state education in the manner which was being pursued by Evangelical Christian groups, but neither Polish's liturgical suggestion nor his striking theological statement brought any response in the 1950s, and it was not until the following decades that the failure, up until then, to deal explicitly with the Holocaust came to be regarded by them as a critical theological omission.⁵³ Polish and his colleagues were certainly not receiving any encouragement from their Christian counterparts to think in those terms.

One half of the church, led by Pius XII, was telling them to quit Jerusalem and make way for the Roman Catholic Church so that it could care for the holy sites (and perhaps move into it as an alternative to the Vatican) and, in the terms used by Documentation Catholique, (quoted above) awaken from their delirium, permit the establishment of tolerant mutual relations and respond to firm and determined opposition so that Christian charity might bind them in their lunatic rage. The other half, led by the World Council of Churches, had at least recognized that it was Israel with whom God made His covenant by the call of Abraham, to whom God revealed His name and gave His law, sent His Prophets with their message of judgement and of grace, and promised the coming of His Messiah. The council had asked churches to consider missions to the Jews as a normal part of parish work and to "scrupulously avoid all unworthy pressures or inducements" and to "give thought to the preparation of ministers well fitted to interpret the Gospel to Jewish people." It had also recognized the need for more detailed study of problems in Christian-Jewish relations, especially factors contributing to anti-Semitism, the most effective means of combating the evil, the need to develop cooperation between Christians and Jews in civic and social affairs, and problems caused by the establishment of the State of Israel. (Chapter 28)

A SPRINGBOARD TO CHRISTIAN REFLECTION ...

It was not long before Councils of Christians and Jews were established in a number of major centres, linked mainly to Protestant theological institutions in which serious study began of the issues raised by the World Council of Churches. It was not an easy task. Vatican intransigence towards the Ecumenical Movement and to every attempt to modify long standing Catholic theology meant that attitudes on both sides of the Reformation divide had tended to be set in concrete. Karl Barth had certainly loosened the stonework a bit (chapter 17) and cracks began to appear in the walls during the war years, but the Holocaust and the establishment of the State of Israel required substantial reflection on how to proceed. Karl Barth's thinking became both a part of the process and a part of the problem. He had forced the church to think of the Jews in a new light during the late 1920s and 1930s, but his Church Dogmatics, in which he placed such overriding importance on the Doctrine of the Trinity as the starting point for Christian theology means that his work has become the centre of quite vigorous debate and criticism.

According to Peter Ochs, Barth's theology "provides the most productive basis for fruitful and ingenuous theological exchange between Judaism and Christianity" because he opens up sources and insights which support both Christian love of the people Israel and the idea that Christianity has superseded Judaism. For some theologians the Holocaust "culminates a 1900-year history of Christian anti-Semitism, calling Christians not only to refashion their relation to Jews and Judaism, but also to make radical reforms in the basic tenets of their faith. To them "the anti-Jewish side of Barth's theology represents the ineradicable core of the Gospel witness itself,"⁵⁴ and this may mean that "anti-Judaism is inseparable from central doctrines of the New Testament read in its plain sense, that the horrible events of this century are among the fruits of that anti-Judaism, and that Christians can therefore no longer afford to perpetuate those doctrines without serious revision."⁵⁵

On the other hand, while some other theologians are also shocked by the Holocaust they are not prompted to try to rewrite the scriptural basis of their faith but simply reinterpret it, on the basis that "neither God, nor Christ, nor Jesus, nor Paul is the problem [which] rests instead in the way in which the Gospel witness is received and transmitted."⁵⁶ However it prompted one theologian, Hans Frei, to touch on two critical and related issues. One is the nature and consequences of the amorphous Christian gel. The other is the philosophy that religious conformity is a prerequisite to political stability. That was the root cause of early doctrinal development and heresy hunting. (Chapters 2 & 3) Frei wrote:

*[T]he most fateful issue for Christian self-description is that of regaining its autonomous vocation as a religion, after its defeat in its secondary vocation of providing ideological cohesion, foundation, and stability to Western culture. Beyond that, however, the example of Judaism in the modern Western world might be a beacon to a reconstituted Christian community.*⁵⁷

And another, George Lindbeck, has raised the issue of isolation or irrelevance if the church continues on its current theological course.

*[I]t may not be too far-fetched to suggest that, in order to survive mainstream Christianity will become more concerned about developing distinctive and encompassing forms of minority communal life than it has been since Constantine.*⁵⁸

...AND A SHORT TERM URGE TO PRESS REFORM

However one consequence of the near-coincidental establishment of the State of Israel and the World Council of Churches was renewed reforming zeal in Holland and the close collaboration between the Reformed churches and the Roman Catholic Church during the German occupation was exposed for what it was: a circumstantial response to the excesses of Nazism. Karl Barth had been accused of writing "crisis theology" during the 1920s and 1930s but the churches had, in fact, been forced into “crisis cooperation” during World War II. In the light of Hitler’s inspired parody of the church the enforced collaboration between all three great divisions of Christendom should have lead smoothly into in-depth reassessment of Christian doctrinal theology and to the ultimate aim of the ecumenical movement: that the entire church, world wide, would be united in “one body of Christ.” United in understanding, rather than in organization or institution. In March 1950, two years after the formal establishment of the World Council of Churches, the reforming zeal of the Netherlands Reformed Church resulted in its general synod adopting a concise ninety-page statement of the beliefs and practices which separated it from the Roman Catholic Church. The decision to prepare that statement was, in effect, a clarion call for the completion of the theological reassessment which had started and stalled more than four hundred years earlier.

The synod’s statement had taken more than a year of study by its theological commission. Preparation began in October 1948, immediately following the First Assembly of the WCC in Amsterdam, and was completed in December 1949. Following adoption by the General Synod it was published as a small book which included a carefully phrased memorandum which explained the Netherlands’ Reformed Church’s position on the need for reconciliation. It was distributed throughout the church in Holland, to churches involved in the ecumenical movement, to other churches with which it had some association in many countries, and to the Roman Catholic Church.⁵⁹ It covered Mariology, revelation, the Scriptures, justification, grace, the sacraments, the position and function of the clergy, the place of Peter and the authority of the Pope as his alleged successor, apostolic succession, works, relation to social questions, and the Roman Catholic Church’s attitude to the Reformation. It recognized and showed appreciation for some aspects of reform and renewal in Catholicism including its greater emphasis on the Gospel, the Liturgical Movement and the deep devotion of many Catholics, but it was an uncompromising document. It noted that some of the Popes had condemned the Protestant Bible Societies and it saw no possibility of Christian unity on contemporary Roman Catholic premises.⁶⁰

Unfortunately the Vatican’s position was even more uncompromising. It was devastating. Pope Pius XII seems to have regarded it as a gauntlet thrown at his feet. Five months later, on August 12, 1950, he issued the encyclical Humani Generis as his response to “false opinions threatening to undermine the foundations of Catholic Doctrine.” He said: “The truths that have to do with God and the relations between God and men, completely surpass the sensible order and demand self-surrender and self-abnegation in order to put into practice and to influence practical life.” He noted that “human intelligence sometimes experiences difficulties in forming a judgement about the credibility of the Catholic faith” and in the context of ‘fictitious tenets’ and ‘confusion’ he said “those who disagree with the true Church complain openly of their disagreement in matters of dogma and thus unwillingly bear witness to the necessity of a living Teaching Authority.” He noted that Catholic teachers generally avoid the errors of philosophers and theologians who sought to profit from “careful examination of these doctrines”, but turned on those who “as in apostolic times, desirous of novelty, and fearing to be considered ignorant of recent scientific findings try to withdraw themselves from the sacred Teaching Authority and are accordingly in danger of gradually departing from revealed truth and of drawing others along with them into error.” He criticized those who: “in theology ... want to reduce to a minimum the meaning of dogmas; and to free dogma itself from terminology long established in the Church and from philosophical concepts held by Catholic teachers, to bring about a return in the explanation of Catholic doctrine to the way of speaking used in Holy Scripture and by the Fathers of the Church.” Those people “hope that when dogma is stripped of the elements which they hold to be extrinsic to divine revelation, it will compare advantageously with the dogmatic opinions of those who are separated from the unity of the Church and that in this way they will gradually arrive at a mutual assimilation of Catholic dogma with the tenets of the dissidents.”⁶¹

Some commentators have viewed Humani Generis as essentially an attack on Gabriel Marcel, some of whose ideas were directly referred to in the encyclical, and other writers such as Michael Schmaus. Marcel, the son of an agnostic, who adopted Catholicism at the age of 39 as the Depression was breaking, sought to make Christianity relevant to people of that time through Christian existentialism. Schmaus, a highly regarded theologian, did not gain prominence until the end of the war, but his effort was also directed at interpreting church doctrine, decisions of Vatican authorities and the teachings of the early Church Fathers in a manner which people could understand and which they could relate to their own reading of the Bible.⁶² Their writings, and those of some of their European contemporaries, encouraged readers to pick up many of the issues raised in the Netherlands Reformed Church statement and therefore they became a threat in their own right. Pius XII’s attack on them was therefore a way of confronting the Netherlands statement without having to refer to it. He could hit two targets at once, but put simply, he was telling the Reformers “Get lost. I’m not going to budge!”

Pius XII followed Humani Generis, only three months later, with the promulgation of the dogma of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin which built yet another barrier between Roman Catholics and other Christians. After the initial shock the reaction in the ecumenical movement was that cooperation in things practical had to be pursued so that the church would gradually come to be seen as ‘one body of Christ.’ The idea that theological differences could be overlooked and that Biblical revelation, developed doctrine (and dogma) and ‘tradition’ were all valid components of Christian faith was widely promoted. The use of the term ‘tradition’ in that manner meant that two thousand years of syncretism and enculturation were being recognized and validated. The walls between Christians and people of the other faiths in the triangle were being reinforced relentlessly but this did not seem to matter because Christianity, or at least the amorphous Christian gel, was dominant in civil affairs and that was the way it had to be. It was the challenges of renascent Judaism which had taken on new significance through the establishment of the State of Israel, and the challenge of atheism which was reinforced by the Cold War, which had to be put down. No one gave any thought to the fact that the more you reinforce a wall the harder it is to break it down. Theological reassessment could be further deferred until the level of cooperation between Rome and the Reformed and Orthodox wings of the church reached the point at which it could be done in quiet collaboration – or until even bigger battering rams became available to knock down the wall. It did occur to some leaders of the Reformed churches that a consequence of the 'unity or cooperation and acceptance first' approach, would be a tendency to reversion to pre-Reformation practices, but their views were, overall, disregarded. They were told that the church had to move forward and overcome the bigotry which had blighted the world in the wake of the Reformation. People did not have to believe the extravagant claims of the Vatican, but they were not to challenge them and aggravate the tension or have open disputes which would rock the unity boat. In contrast, as a matter of course, the recognition of tradition was not to be applied to those 'other faiths.' They were to be judged on the basis of the 'provability' of their popular beliefs. Just another set of double standards.

A step towards developing uniformity in worship was the proposal that those Reformed churches which had never used a lectionary (a systematic and standardized table of scriptural readings to facilitate a uniform approach to preaching throughout the church) should adopt the practice. This led progressively to the cooperative standardization of lectionaries and in due course, in 1969, the Vatican adopted the practice of publishing its lectionary separate from the Missal and some of the readings which related to the more contentious Catholic doctrinal and dogmatic statements were omitted.

REFUGEES: PALESTINE REFLECTS THE PRECEDENT OF THE 'FINAL SOLUTION'

Prior to the Second World War, if a refugee crisis occurred there was generally a lack of interest from the world community. Governments were expected to take steps to resolve any which occurred in their territories, even if they were a party to the cause of the problem, and this resulted in crises such as the Armenian Genocide. (Chapter 16) But Hitler's treatment of the Jewish Question, having raised the enforcement of refugee status to something of a scientific procedure or an art form, meant that the procedures established to provide assistance for Europe's surviving Jewish refugees, beginning with the establishment of a War Refugee Board (chapter 25) became a precedent. Refugees were no longer to be left to the mercy of governments in the country in which they were dispossessed or to which they were forced to flee.

As a consequence, one of the matters which had been discussed with the United Nations during 1948 was the fate of the Palestinians who had become refugees in the process of the establishment of the State of Israel. Most of them were living in deplorable conditions in tent settlements in what remained of the proposed Arab state and in neighbouring Arab countries and relying for survival on aid from the International Red Cross, the American Society of Friends, and the League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies working in cooperation with the UN Children's Fund, the World Health Organization and their host countries.

Late in 1948 the UN General Assembly voted funds for the UN Relief of Palestine Refugees Organization for food and emergency supplies which were channelled through the aid agencies. Then in April 1949 the UN Conciliation Commission, which had been established while the Israeli-Egyptian armistice negotiations were in progress, held a meeting in Lausanne with representatives of Israel, Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria. The future of the refugees was high in the agenda, together with the internationalization of Jerusalem and the determination of definite frontiers. The UN aid budget had been prepared on the basis that those refugees who wished to return to their homes in Israel would be repatriated and those who did not would receive individual compensation. The Arab states were satisfied with that arrangement, believing that the refugee problem had to be dealt with before any general political settlement was possible. However the talks broke down when Israel insisted that the possibility of the return of Arab refugees to Israel had to be part of a general peace settlement.

UNITED STATES' SUPPORT FOR ISRAEL 'LOCKED IN'

On May 28 Truman sent an angry, strongly worded note to Israel, demanding that it withdraw from territories occupied during the war and that it take back a certain number of Palestinian refugees.⁶³ The note ended with the warning that if Israel continued with its attitude at the Lausanne Conference "the US Government will regretfully be forced to the conclusion that a revision of its attitude towards Israel has become unavoidable."⁶⁴ When Israel totally rejected the US demands in a note dated June 8th, Deputy Undersecretary of State Dean Rusk analyzed its response and advised Truman that there was no reason for the US to abandon the firm position which it had taken.⁶⁵ The State Department then recommended that the US administration immediately adopt a negative attitude towards Israeli officials and organizations supporting Israel, withdraw support for Israel in international organizations, hold up loan funds earmarked for Israel, and remove tax exempt status of Jewish organizations in America.⁶⁶ However a bitter Israeli response to Truman's note, relayed through the US Ambassador to Israel, brought a US retreat, the abandonment of reproach and demands for Israeli concessions, and the development of a situation in which "more and more it was Tel Aviv that seemed to be laying down the law to Washington."⁶⁷ The Israeli government and the Zionist lobby in the US were well aware of Truman's position and took every advantage they could of a weakness in the United States electoral system. They were taking full advantage of a statement which Truman had made to a group of diplomats called home in 1946 to report to the State Department on the deteriorating position of the United States in the Middle East: "I am sorry, gentlemen, but I have to answer to hundreds of thousands who are anxious for the success of Zionism. I do not have hundreds of thousands of Arabs among my constituents."⁶⁸

Just one year after the event, this incident confirmed very clearly what the president's conduct at the time of the declaration of the establishment of the State of Israel had demonstrated: because the Zionist Movement could influence the outcome of any presidential election in which its interests were at stake it could ultimately influence the policy of the United States government in all matters relating to the State of Israel and events in the Middle East. But there were very sensitive domestic and foreign policy issues being deliberately manipulated and suppressed by the US government at that time: civil liberties or what have become known as ‘human rights.’ If the US government stood on its dignity and pressed Israel to recognize the civil liberties of the Palestinians who had been converted into refugees because of its actions, to be consistent and to avoid trenchant international criticism it also had to intervene in the deepening crisis of Apartheid in South Africa. But if it did so it had to anticipate both a strong political backlash from the right wing of American investment politics and be prepared to implement far reaching civil rights legislation at home. If it did not do so it faced the worsening of its own crisis of black or Afro-American oppression but, possibly, the eruption in race-related violence which it faced a few years later would have come earlier and been less violent.

When he succeeded the late President Roosevelt in 1945, Truman proposed legislation for a new ‘fair deal.’ However, in spite of the fact that the US Supreme Court made rulings such as one in 1948 which declared that race-based covenants could not be enforced, a hostile Congress prevented the passage of most of his program. He then campaigned for election in 1948 on a strong platform of civil rights for all minorities, corresponding with the negotiations for a Declaration of Human Rights, but on most fronts his program was again brushed aside. At that time he had the support of such people as the lawyer, opera singer and civil rights activist Paul Robeson who was doing all he could to put some muscle into the civil rights movement. But it was well known that Robeson supported the overall objectives of international socialism and was sympathetic to Soviet Russia and Communist China, so the white supremacists had no difficulty pinning the ‘red ragger’ tag to him, and trade union and civil rights leaders shunned him from fear of being labelled in the same way by association. This inhibited the civil rights movement very effectively and undermined whatever support it was generating within mainstream white America. Thus, having gained the overwhelming support of the Jewish minority, (which most commentators agree was a major factor in his unexpected election), because of both his Palestine policy and his human rights policy, and knowing that the McCarthyist-style Hiss perjury trial and the anti-Robeson campaign was damaging his administration, Truman then chose the politically easier course of responding to pressure from Israel, and ignoring the simmering issues of international civil rights and refugees, except to encourage the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights a few weeks after the election. It was a face-saver.

FROM ONE REFUGEE CRISIS TO ANOTHER

Thus, when the infant State of Israel was locked in debate with the United States, Britain and the United Nations over the fate of refugees from the former mandated territory of Palestine, the United States had neither the will nor the moral authority to bring about a change in Israel’s policy because of its own domestic situation. In view of the traumatic experience of Jews wherever they had settled as a minority in a Christian environment up to the Second World War, it would have been reasonable to anticipate that the new Jewish State would be sympathetic to the plight of refugees regardless of their ethnic or religious background. However, the efforts which were being made to expel the balance of the Palestinians show that the young State of Israel was no different to any other country, at that stage, in its attitude to the issue of refugees and their treatment when they were in its own or neighbouring territory. The tension between theology and politics was such that contemporary considerations flowing from the Covenant of Sinai were being disregarded: the focus was very heavily on the historical aspect of Jewish rights, rather than responsibilities. The policies of the Provisional Israeli State Council and the actions of the authorities coincided with the extract from Meyer, (A renascent Judaism, above):

As liberals, Jews were also free – on the basis of their own serious confrontation with the texts – to re-negotiate its terms. The covenant, in short, was the basis for the historical but also open-ended dialogue between God and Israel. [And] ... Jewish Reform theologians drew no causal connection between the Holocaust and the establishment of the Jewish State.⁶⁹

An Israeli representative at the Lausanne negotiations expressed the view that the best solution would be to resettle the refugees in the neighbouring Arab countries “in view of the fact that the Arab population of Israel was only about 70,000.” That such a figure could be suggested was hardly surprising in view of UN estimates for refugee numbers which were available at that time. They show that the number of Palestinian refugees in care had risen dramatically from the vague figure of probably between 300,000 and 400,000 at the time of the declaration of the state on May 14th, 1948, to 750,000 by January 1st, 1949; 770,000 by mid February; and 875,000 by April 1st. The exodus actually continued – as the Israelis intended – and by June the number of persons in care had risen to 940,000.⁷⁰ That figure is of enormous significance considering that the Zionist Movement and the President of Israel personally,⁷¹ justified their territorial policy by the need to resettle the surviving remnant of Europe’s Jewish population. The size of that remnant must therefore be explored.

The number of Jewish refugees accommodated in Displaced Persons (DP) Camps at the end of the war, after those who could be repatriated had been repatriated was, according to the figure already noted, 226,000 or barely one quarter of the number of Palestinian Arabs who had by then been forced into refugee status. On the basis of figures used by Barnavi it appears that the countries of occupied Europe were home to 8,929,000 Jews prior to the outbreak of the Second World War.⁷² Of those, 5,949,000 were slaughtered and 2,980,000 survived. But in a second passage of the same work reference is made to “the scant remnants of European Jewry – over 1,200,000 emaciated, homeless, uprooted persons – (who) began a mass movement of migration across Europe.” It is not clear whether this figure includes or excludes those in DP camps “whose problem could not be simply solved by repatriation.” (The figure used is “approximately 250,000”) ⁷³ These figures appear to confirm that all except about 250,000 were initially resettled, but they also appear to show that the difference between the number of survivors and the number of those uprooted, (either 1,780,000 or 1,530,000), either migrated prior to German occupation of their countries or had not been uprooted. In addition 135,500 survivors are reported to have emigrated in the years 1945-1947. Of those, 83,000 went to Palestine, 40,000 to the US and 12,500 to other countries including Latin America, Canada, South Africa and Australia.⁷⁴ But, because many of those who went to Palestine travelled via the informal (or illegal) escape routes set up to circumvent the rigid British migration quotas, it is similarly unclear whether these people are included in the DP figure of about 250,000 or the total survivors figure of 1,200,000. If a proportion of them are included in the DP figure, then the number remaining to be settled following the end of the British mandate was that much lower. However, as both Zionist and non-Zionist writers have said, one thing is clear: the need for European refugee resettlement was not the primary motive behind Israel's territorial policy and its efforts to 'encourage' the Palestinians to flee. It was the wider interests of Zionism and the desire in influential Zionist quarters to achieve an exclusively Jewish community in Israel and for all Jews to settle there.

Some authorities have sought to justify Israel's refusal to accept the repatriation of Palestinian refugees on the grounds that Arab governments were responsible for the initiatives which caused the problem, that the onus to solve it therefore rested with them and that they had the capacity to solve it.⁷⁵ The details of the Deir Yassin massacre are disputed and claims are made that Arab authorities provoked the refugee exodus for their own propaganda purposes, expecting the evacuees to be able to return to their homes in a short time. The 'fact' that mass refugee movements are seldom reversed and that host countries are usually able to absorb large numbers of refugees, whether of the same ethnic background or not, is used to justify Israel's refusal to take the Palestinians back, and some emphasis is given to the fact that in this instance the refugees and the host countries spoke a common language and had common ethnic roots. In addition the claim is made that the growing oil wealth of the Arab countries and the international aid available made it easier for them to absorb refugees than for Israel which also had to absorb large numbers of disadvantaged Jews who were being 'forced' to leave those same countries dispossessed of their assets.⁷⁶ Israel's decision is thus portrayed as one taken in the light of new circumstances resulting from the politics of the Arab world and not as another aspect of an ongoing crisis centred on Zionism.

However, as we have seen, Zionism evolved as a consequence of Christian self-understanding and anti-Semitism over a very long period, and for those Jews who embraced Zionism there seemed little reason to consider any aspect of the Covenant of Sinai and the Mosaic Law which was an integral part of it other than the promise of protection. The church gave them no encouragement to think along such lines. It was intent on convincing them that their covenant was null and void and that the only way to salvation was to adopt Christianity. Hitler's Final Solution programs, the ultimate phase of the parody of Main Kampf, had evolved as a consequence of the same factors and only served to induce deeper amnesia. By 1948, because the flow of causes and effects had not been recognized, it was the Palestinian Arabs – both Muslim and Christian – who were being forced to pay the price for the establishment of the State of Israel, not the Christian West. The Palestinian refugee crisis and the future of Jerusalem had thus been linked as key factors in a deepening crisis which the Christian West still thought it could sidestep, perhaps by throwing a bit of money at it or by coercing other people, like the wider Arab community, into accepting the burden.

In fact the Zionist desire to concentrate the Jewish population in Israel and the vigorous effort which was made to encourage European Jews to settle in Palestine had two effects which were not fully appreciated at the time. The first was that a partial Jewish vacuum was left in Europe and “a thousand years of European dominance in Jewish life had come to an end.”⁷⁷ That vacuum had enormous sociological consequences. It reduced the potential for Jewish input into community affairs, reduced contact and interaction between Christians and Jews in the region which was still the bastion of Christianity and therefore made interfaith reconciliation more difficult; it thus inhibited formal dialogue, and delayed the vital and inevitable process of theological reassessment. The second was that the Jewish population became even more concentrated into just two countries: the United States and Israel. This has had continuing grave political and economic consequences for the whole world as the interdependence between the two countries became greater and greater, and, as we shall see, the US-Israeli Alliance became a dominant factor in world affairs – so much so that it must now concentrate our attention on the trouble in the triangle.

The change in the pattern of Jewish domicile was both dynamic and dramatic. In 1939 Europe was home to just under 60 per cent of the world Jewish community. By 1948 the figure had fallen to 32 per cent, of whom two thirds (23 per cent) were in the Soviet Union. During that period the rise in the percentage living in Palestine had only risen from 2.8 per cent to 5.7 per cent under the rigid British restrictions, but in the United States and Canada the Jewish community had risen from 29 per cent to 46 per cent of the world total. Further details are set out in the chart in note ⁷⁸ which will be referred to again shortly in connection with Israel’s immigration policy.

At the time of the Lausanne conference the estimated breakdown of the Palestinian refugee population was: 425,000 in Arab Palestine (most of which had been absorbed by Jordan); 225,000 in the Gaza strip; 130,000 in Lebanon; 85,000 in Jordan east of the river; 85,000 in Syria; 11,000 in Egypt; and 4,000 in Iraq. When the UN moved to step up its refugee relief program the United States contributed $16,000,000 and other governments contributed in proportion to their resources. ⁷⁹ Each of the Arab countries adjoining Palestine cooperated with the UN authorities in trying to cope with the crisis which very quickly became a bonding mechanism and strengthened their resolve to resist accepting Israel as a state imposed in their midst. But there were some special situations to be understood and dealt with.

First: Jordan, recognizing its special relationship with the refugees because of the original mandate arrangements and being eager to build on that relationship, made a special effort to integrate them in spite of the strains placed on its limited resources by having to cope with a near-instant population increase of fifty percent. Second: Lebanon had difficulty relocating the disproportionate number of Muslims who sought refuge there because of the institutionalized relationship between its Muslim and Christian communities. It soon became apparent that there would be tensions between the large communities of refugees and the Lebanese authorities and that, being difficult to contain, the tensions would spill over and affect relations between the two major faith-based political groupings. Third: the people of the Gaza Strip, strongly influenced by the Mufti's regime but under Egyptian military control and totally isolated from the Jordanian West Bank by twenty miles of Israeli controlled territory, had to cope with a tripling of their population. The provision of normal services and integration of the traumatized communities was simply not possible. And superimposed over those factors was a fourth: educational status.

During the British mandate greater emphasis had been placed on education in Palestine than in the surrounding countries and among the refugees a much larger proportion of people had the benefit of higher or tertiary education than among the population they were joining. This was especially so with Christian refugees who had naturally taken greater advantage of the mission school systems than the Muslims who had tended to avoid them. There was thus a natural tendency for recruitment to favour the Palestinian refugees and for Palestinians to be disproportionately represented in the public service and senior commercial positions. This displacement of locals from positions of influence and the downward pressure on their employment prospects – even though it was circumstantial rather than deliberate – tended to generate social tensions and unrest and meant that the need for a solution to the refugee crisis was always high on the political agenda. It also made it inevitable that Jewish residents in many countries would become the scapegoats for both the humiliation of the Arab countries at the hands of Israel and the Palestinian refugee crisis.

FROM ONE OPPRESSION TO ANOTHER

Because of the way in which it was implemented, the Zionist dream had substituted the oppression of one minority at the hands of the ruling power (Palestinian Arabs at the hands of the Jewish State of Israel) for the oppression of another (Jews at the hands of the Christian states of Europe). But at the same time it shifted the focus of anti-Semitism away from Christian Europe where a massive communal guilt complex had prompted a flood of sympathy, and onto the Muslim countries of the Middle East and North Africa where shock and bitterness at the treatment of the Palestinians had fostered exactly the same phenomenon.

It had always been the intention of the majority of Zionist leaders, but certainly not all, that the Jewish National Homeland would be more than the focal point of faith for the world wide Jewish community and a safe haven to which oppressed Jews in the Diaspora could retreat. For them it was to be a re-established independent state to which all Jews throughout the Diaspora would choose to return to help build and to experience the Messianic Age. This was indicated quite strongly in the Declaration of the Establishment of May 14th, 1948 with a number of clauses: "Jewish people ... never ceasing to pray and hope for their return and the restoration of their national freedom ... strove throughout the centuries to go back to the land of their fathers and regain their statehood ... (and) the State of Israel will be open to the immigration of Jews from all countries of their Dispersion ..."⁸⁰ Now, in the second half of 1949, with the State of Israel firmly established and recognized by the majority of countries with influence, the government undertook to implement programs which would ensure maximum immigration of Jews from around the world and enable it to wring every skerrick of economic and political advantage out of the rising tide of anti-Semitism around it which Christian sympathy might make possible.

Actually that rising tide of anti-Semitism around it was only one factor in its decision. Anti-Semitism in Europe had not evaporated completely following the progressive disclosure of what had happened in Europe during the war. Given the basis and the depth of anti-Semitism it was really to be expected that there would be sporadic outbursts. Among the worst were the pogroms in Poland in 1946 which resulted in about two thirds of the Jews who had returned there from exile in Russia either fleeing to Palestine through the illegal escape routes or to the 'half way houses' of the DP camps.⁸¹ That dramatic exodus of Jews from Poland provided an enormous pool of recruits ready to defend the Jewish 'homeland-in-the-making' while they also contributed to its economic and political growth. Therein lies the major reason for the push to bolster the Jewish population of Palestine as quickly as possible. Both the Jewish Agency, during the final years of the mandate, and the government of the fledgling State of Israel recognized the need for an 'instant population.' They had to strengthen the country's reservoir of men and women for military and emergency service; to fortify its frontiers with its neighbours; to garrison or provide security for the kibbutzim or agricultural colonies which were being established; to pre-empt Arab occupation of extensive areas of open land; and to develop a modern western-style economy with high standards of living, education and professional services, industries with export potential, and a strong capital base which, together, would ensure that it could take its place among the developed countries of the world.

Without the population to achieve these things – and the security of a military umbrella provided by one or more powerful allies – Israel would be viewed as a Third World refuge for oppressed, dispossessed, embittered and disgruntled survivors of a superseded religion. It would be in no position to usher in or to influence the Messianic Age, regardless of whether that was viewed as a singularly Jewish phenomenon or a matter of universal significance. Sachar describes the situation very well: "Although never stressed in public, it was essentially this military and economic factor that persuaded Israel's leaders to run the risks of virtually uncontrolled mass immigration."⁸² Their reasoning was very similar to the fear which fuelled opposition within the Zionist Movement to Russia's BiraBidzhan project and plans to resettle Jewish refugees in Poland and elsewhere: fear of dividing the Jewish population, of fragmenting its allegiance to a reconstituted 'national homeland' and of undermining the potential military, economic and political strength of the future Jewish State which they were working to establish.

While the mandate with its rigorously imposed immigration controls was still in place the Zionist Movement found the masses of DPs "an effective political weapon, particularly against the policy of the recently elected Labour Government in Britain which had renewed the restrictions on immigration to Palestine on the basis of the 1939 White Paper."⁸³ The Jewish Agency concentrated on channeling the maximum number of refugees direct from Eastern Europe to Palestine through the illegal 'escape' channels to circumvent the British restrictions. These efforts led to several major international incidents, notable involving the voyages of the Eliyahu Golomb, Dov Hos and the Exodus 1947, which provided the opportunity for more pressure on Britain through the United States to modify its immigration restrictions, influenced the UNSCOP decision to recommend partition and, ultimately, influenced Britain's decision to relinquish the mandate altogether. However once the mandate was at an end "the first priority of the Israeli Government and the Jewish Agency was to empty the displaced persons' camps in Germany, Austria and Italy."⁸⁴

Between September 1948 and August 1949 fifty-two refugee centres in Europe were closed as their residents were transported to Israel. During about the same time 25,000 persons who had been intercepted as illegal migrants and interned on Cyprus by the British were released and finally reached Israel, together with large numbers of 'free' Jewish immigrants from Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Turkey, Poland and Rumania. It was then that the government came face to face with "the risks of virtually uncontrolled mass immigration." The majority of its new citizens had survived great trauma and were looking for peace and security rather than more trauma through conflict with another enemy, the rigour of frontier agricultural outposts, or bureaucratic obstacles in transit camps. They had been admitted to Israel – or coerced into making the decision to go there – with little screening so that the demands on health services for the aged and the infirm were enormous, their understanding of Zionism and their attitudes toward the various concepts it involved covered the full spectrum, and large numbers faced disillusionment and psychological adjustment problems.⁸⁵

At that point, during the second phase of the Lausanne Conference, in July, Israel, under pressure from the United States, agreed to repatriate 100,000 Palestinians provided that they were not expected to return to their previous homes, (many of which had been bulldozed or occupied by Jews), that they could be placed where and in what circumstances suited Israel's economic plans, and that the program was part of an overall peace settlement in which all Arab states formally recognized Israel.⁸⁶ However the program was never carried out, and in view of all the circumstantial evidence, the bitter opposition in government to any repatriation, and the continuing stream of disputes which were used to justify the inaction it is reasonable to conclude that the government never had any intention of implementing the agreement.

CONFUSION + EVACUATION = MORE CONFUSION

At that time the flood of about 340,000 European refugees and immigrants was subsiding but another flood had begun. By October 1949 the pattern of migrant arrivals had changed dramatically and about seventy percent of those arriving were coming from Asia and Africa. The Zionist campaign to expel Palestinians to make way for refugees from the Holocaust had brought a backlash which the Jewish Agency and the Israeli Government had certainly anticipated in view of the long-running inter-communal bitterness and conflict. The Jews of North Africa and West Asia who had lost their special relationship with the former European colonizing powers – Britain, France and Italy – had developed a closer affinity with Israel. There was therefore a tendency for them to become scapegoats for the humiliation of the Arab forces and the Palestinians at the hands of “the Zionist entity.” Some intimidation began and therefore some sought immigrant admission to Israel. In turn Israel was eager to encourage them and the numbers making the journey steadily increased. But their circumstances and their attitudes were quite different to those of the European Jews. The majority had enjoyed a long period of religious toleration and normal community relations under Islamic rule instead of the oppression which Europe’s Jews had been subjected to under Christian rule. The two strong and often competing streams which had flowed through European and North American Judaism concurrently for about a hundred years – Zionism and Reform – had passed them by. As a result they were regarded as old fashioned but pious, and they believed in an eventual Messianic Return to the Holy Land. They did not expect to be coerced or forced to ‘return’ to a modern Jewish state engineered by man and they were bewildered when they were placed in communities or transit camps with people of quite different racial origins to themselves, with secular European leadership and with quite different material demands.⁸⁷ But they were not the only ones who were bewildered. Many of those with whom they mixed, worked, worshipped and lived were equally bewildered and became ‘infected’ by the apparent lack of commitment to a progressive, dynamic form of Zionism among their Eastern or Oriental co-religionists.⁸⁸

Thus began the systematic evacuation to Israel of about one million persons out of the total Jewish population of about 1,700,000 – about eleven percent of the total world Jewish population – who had been living in Islamic countries at the start of the Second World War. Subsequent emigration reduced the number of Jews living under Islamic rule to a few tens of thousands by 1991, but not all of those went to Israel.^{89 90}

To complicate matters as the evacuation began, the Oriental migrants were from diverse circumstances and some, notably those from the Yemen who traced the origins of their 50,000-strong community to the Roman Dispersion, had not enjoyed the generally high level of Muslim tolerance. [The Roman Dispersion was certainly not the only base for its growth. See above, chapters 5, 6, 8] They had been restricted to ghetto-like areas, provided artisan services for the Arab peasantry, suffered much personal deprivation, and were eager to make their way to Zion at the behest of the Messiah whom they expected to lead God’s People back to the land of Israel. The flow had actually started in the 1880s, some years before the formal establishment of the Zionist Organization, prompted by reports of early European Jewish agricultural settlements in the Holy Land. (See above, chapter 15) By 1914 about 7,400 settlers had reached Palestine and by the time the mandate was due to end they and their descendants numbered about 40,000. Then the outbreak of the Jewish-Arab war brought an urgency to the repatriation of the Yemen Jews which had not been anticipated and the Jewish Agency, together with the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), reached agreements with the Yemen, the sheikdoms directly involved, and Britain on the terms for mass repatriation by land to Aden and by ship through the Red Sea and Suez to Palestine. But two factors made that program untenable: first, the trauma of a trek over rugged arid mountains, and second, the Egyptian blockade of the Suez Canal and Gulf of Aqaba routes to ships bound for Israel. The JDC thereupon negotiated a massive airlift using chartered American DC-4s in 'Operation Magic Carpet' and by September 1950 about 47,000 Jews from Yemen and 3,000 from Aden had been ferried to Israel.^{90 91}

While the Yemen and some other countries were prepared to cooperate in the evacuation plan almost from the start, in return for economic benefit such as the forfeiture of property by the migrants, some, such as Iraq and Jordan, were not, especially after Israel pre-empted UN proposals for the internationalization of Jerusalem by declaring it the capital of Israel. There was widespread condemnation of that move and Jordan responded by formally annexing the West Bank and East Jerusalem. The Arab countries were trying to achieve the repatriation of refugee Muslim and Christian Palestinians who had been forced from their land to make way for a Jewish State. They believed it would have been a contradiction of practical migration policy, population dynamics and land rights if they were to accede to, and to assist, the immigration and settlement of Jews in the state which they had gone to war to prevent being set up on the land of the refugees they were trying to help. Even without such an overwhelming reason to oppose emigration, the relations between Iraq and the Jewish Agency had been strained to breaking point by the manipulation of the Palestinian and Iraqi mandates and the events of the Second World War so that it required a flight of fancy to think that cooperation on the issue would be spontaneous. It defied the reality of the political and religious circumstances.

The Jewish community of about 130,000 in Iraq in 1948 was the largest of those in the East and it was the oldest and most distinguished, tracing its roots to settlements in Babylon even before the exile. It had been a key centre of Jewish religious life and culture, and it had known periods of influence and wealth under Islam. But after the Mongol invasions it fell on hard times until the later days of the Ottoman Empire when it experienced a partial recovery which was undermined by the impact of the First World War. Then, after Britain relinquished the League of Nations mandate over Iraq in 1930 and sponsored its independence under King Feisal, the Jewish community received a level of recognition it had not known since the later days of the Ottoman Empire. Jewish participation in large scale business, the government service and all aspects of community life was encouraged. But with the approach of the Second World War, Britain's Middle East balancing acts, and Hitler's support for Arab independence and opposition to the establishment of a Jewish State in Palestine, relations between the Iraqi Government and the Jewish community began to sour. Then, in 1941 when the pro-British government was overthrown in a pro-German coup which the British were soon able to reverse, anti-Jewish rioting resulted in much property damage and hundreds of casualties, and it became apparent that the community's future was linked to the outcome of the Jewish-Arab struggle for control of Palestine. This was confirmed after the outbreak of the Israeli-Arab War by the introduction of martial law regulations in Iraq which were reminiscent of those in Hitler's Germany. On the basis that Jews who were citizens of Iraq were working to support the interests of a foreign power against the interests of their own country, restrictions were placed on Jewish business and professional activity. Jewish banks were closed, many Jews were dismissed from government service, there was widespread harassment of the community and hundreds of Jews were arrested on charges of treason. Immigration to Israel was declared a capital offence but that did little to stem the flow of people leaving the country by one means or another, and social stability was undermined.

However in March 1950 Iraq unexpectedly reversed its policy and relaxed its emigration restrictions on Jews. This was said to be on the basis that after the Israeli-Arab War and its internal revolt had both subsided, after the Israel-Iraq Armistice Agreement had been signed and when the establishment of the State of Israel was fait accompli it was eager to achieve social stability. The Iraqi parliament sanctioned the emigration of Jews, provided they applied for exit permits within one year and relinquished Iraqi nationality in doing so. This was not a case of a government expelling its Jewish minority and, as already noted, Israel had much to gain from this arrangement while Iraq's major potential benefits were social stability, an easing of military tension and some opportunities for employment substitution for its non-Jewish population. The cost to Iraq was both economic and political: the loss of the business, professional and administrative capacity of a significant segment of its population and the potential for strained relations with the Palestinians and other Arab governments because the immigration of the Jews further undermined whatever hope the Palestinians had of repatriation. The Iraqi government had given an assurance when the program was agreed that properties, businesses and bank accounts which emigrants left behind would be disposed of legally and that the proceeds would be available to them. Arrangements had also been agreed between Israeli agents and Iraqi officials for sea transport from Basra to Eilat at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba but, as in the case of Yemen, these could not be implemented because of Egypt's closure of the gulf to vessels bound for Israel. The Iraqi government therefore agreed to an airlift of the type carried out in Yemen – 'Operation Ali Baba' – on condition that the aircraft flew via a neutral port (Cyprus) and not direct to Israel and this began in May 1950. By the time it ended in December 1951, 113,000 persons had been flown to Israel out of a total of 121,000 Iraqi Jews who emigrated. But in the meantime three important decisions had been reached: one at the United Nations, one in Israel, and one in Iraq.

THE NEED FOR UNRWA

The United Nations decision had actually been taken in December 1949, several months after the abortive Lausanne Conference and at the same time that the UN had resolved that Jerusalem should be administered as an international city. It was the decision to establish the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA). But the new agency was only ready to begin operations with its headquarters in Beirut, Lebanon, in May 1950 about the same time that Israel began Operation Ali Baba and its agreement in July to repatriate 100,000 Palestinians was exposed to charges of hypocrisy. UNRWA replaced the UN Relief for Palestine Refugees Committee (UNPRC) which had been set up a year earlier, and it absorbed the relief operations which had been operated by the series of international voluntary agencies. It was intended to be a temporary body, providing welfare relief without prejudice to the rights of the refugees to repatriation or compensation which the UN had also decreed a year earlier.

However, the fact that it had to be set up was a reflection of two things. First, the Israeli government's determination to reject refugee rehabilitation and to pursue its own program of ingathering 'exiles.' Second, the Western World's guilt-based reluctance – or inability – to apply pressure to Israel to conform to the wishes of the world body to which it had so recently been admitted. Similarly, the fact that Operation Ali Baba began concurrently with the operations of UNRWA reflects the arrogance with which Israel approached the United Nations and the confidence with which it took for granted the overpowering support of the United States.

That confidence was well founded. South Africa, two years after announcing its intention to annex South West Africa (Namibia), had refused to recognize the UN's authority over the territory; the United States was preoccupied with relations with the Soviet Union following the blockade of Berlin (imposed in June 1948 and lifted in May 1949); it had guaranteed the security of Nationalist China following the proclamation of the People's Republic of China in September 1949 in order to isolate the Communist Government and as a result the flow of refugees from mainland China to both Hong Kong and Formosa had become a torrent of several millions; McCarthyism had reached its new phase in February 1950 with allegations of Reds in the State Department just at the time that it was desperately trying to prevent Communist sympathizers from accelerating the Human Rights Movement; the outbreak of the Korean War in June had resulted in the displacement of several million refugees; and the Turkish population was being expelled from both Bulgaria and Greece. In the circumstances Israel could argue that the Palestinian refugee crisis was relatively minor and that unless the US put its own human rights house in order and unless it insisted on similar action on all refugee fronts it could not tell Israel to resettle its Palestinian refugees.

THE LAW OF RETURN

The next decision, that of the Israeli Knesset to enact the Law of Return on July 5 1950, only a few weeks after Operation Ali Baba began, simply confirmed Israel's hard-line attitude towards the United Nations and the refugee question. The Law of Return provides that every Jew, from any country, has the automatic right to go to Israel to settle as an immigrant and to be granted the rights of citizenship provided that he or she has not acted against the Jewish nation (or people) and is not a threat to public health or security. The law is quite definite and does not even allow for ministerial discretion beyond the circumstances specified: "Immigrant visas shall be issued to any Jew expressing a desire to settle in Israel, except ..." ⁹³ This has had some serious consequences. A criminal record in another country was not to be an impediment to that 'right of return' and this provided the means for criminals of Jewish heritage, if they wished, to avoid apprehension in their own country. At times, coupled with the Law of Extradition, it enabled persons accused of crimes to avoid extradition to their own country.⁹⁴ A Jew who contemplates settling in Israel is not even required to obtain a visa prior to arrival. The law states: "A Jew who comes to Israel and after his arrival expresses a desire to settle there may, while in Israel, obtain an immigrant certificate." ⁹⁵ It also states: "Every Jew who migrated to the country before this law goes into effect, and every Jew who was born in the country either before or after the law is effective enjoys the same status as any person who migrated on the basis of this law.”⁹⁶

However the Law of Return had other more far-reaching consequences. Although other laws provide for non-Jews to be granted Israeli citizenship⁹⁷ the enactment of the Law of Return reinforced the view that non-Jews would be regarded as second class citizens. Those Palestinians who had stayed and weathered the storm of the establishment of the State of Israel but declined to adopt Israeli citizenship (on the basis that by UN resolution they had the right to a Palestinian State and Palestinian citizenship) were unable to travel outside the country because they feared being refused re-entry and joining the ranks of stateless refugees. Thus the State of Israel, now well and truly established, confirmed, as did the Council of Thirteen two years earlier, that it had no more concern for the blatant transgression against its neighbours which had been foreshadowed in the Qur’anic Night Journey than the Zionist Organization when it made its decision to proceed with organized settlement without the agreement of recognized authorities in 1905.

The Palestinians, the Arab states, the UN and the world were served notice, yet again, that they would have to solve the Palestinian refugee crisis. In committing the nation to a massive program to ‘ingather’ all Jews who could be persuaded to come in order to strengthen its political, military and economic position, whether they were religious believers or not, the government had also effectively committed the nation to a policy of withdrawal from – or isolation from – many of the countries with which its people had enjoyed a secure and somewhat special relationship as ‘people of the Book’ prior to European Christian intervention and the rise of Zionism. But by its continued transgression against the Palestinian Arabs it had converted many of those countries from friends to enemies at the same time and, by arranging mass evacuations when confronted with an oppressive backlash, it spelled out an unmistakable message: “this situation is permanent and cannot be settled by negotiation.” Thus the isolation which Israel had engineered required it to build even stronger defences and made it even more dependent upon the country in which half the world’s Jews then lived: the United States.

AN ECONOMIC OFF-SET

From the point of view of the neighbouring Arab countries the immediate importance of the Law of Return was that it confirmed that Israel’s dominant interest was in strengthening its position by means of the ingathering. Clearly it had no real prospect of absorbing very large numbers of both Jewish migrants and Palestinian refugees and therefore further negotiation over the repatriation of Palestinians was virtually a waste of effort. That raised a question about how much concern the Arab countries should show for their departing Jewish citizens and brings us to the third decision, announced by the Iraqi Government on March 10, 1951, the day after the deadline for exit registrations. Henceforth the property and bank accounts of emigrating Jews were forfeited to the government. That decision is represented in some quarters as a simple case of one partner to a bilateral agreement double-crossing the other and it was treated by Israel as a justification to renege on its agreement to repatriate 100,000 Palestinians.

However in a situation as complex as the trouble in the triangle there is no such thing as an agreement which can be treated in isolation from all the other cause-and-effect events and each antagonistic response simply becomes a justification for another. Iraq had been subjected to intense pressure by the US to 'encourage' it to permit Jewish emigration and there is circumstantial evidence to indicate that the Israeli agents resorted to bribery to gain the agreement of Iraqi officials for the proceeds of property and business sales to be released to the settlers in Israel.⁹⁸ In the circumstances that cannot be discounted because the agreement placed Iraq at a severe economic disadvantage. In addition, the Jewish Agency had already paid sheikhs in the Yemen to permit emigrants passage through their domains⁹⁹ and those emigrants left with nothing. All their property reverted to the Yemen. Thus the change of heart by Iraq still left Israel better off in the case of Operation Ali Baba than in the case of Operation Magic Carpet.

In addition, to put the matter in perspective, the change of heart by Iraq must be considered against the enormous economic and social benefits which Israel gained from the flight of the Palestinian refugees. Virtually the entire cities of Jaffa, Acre, Lydda, Ramle, Beisan and Majdal, plus 388 towns and villages and large parts of 94 others, containing 100,000 dwellings, 10,000 shops, businesses and stores – amounting to nearly one quarter of all the buildings in Israel – were left vacant. These were claimed under the Abandoned Areas Ordinances, the first of which was promulgated by the Provisional Israeli State Council on June 30, 1948, only six weeks after the proclamation of the state (chapter 28) in which it defined any place conquered by the Israeli armed forces or deserted by all or part of its inhabitants as an 'abandoned area' appropriated to the state. To all of that must be added an area of cultivable land about four times the area which Jews legally possessed at the time of the declaration of the state.

IGNORE THE COVENANT: PLAN TRANSGRESSION

In fact Jewish settlers moved in and occupied much of those areas even before the Israeli authorities were able to formally list them and decide what to do with them, and in September 1951, at which time the 'abandoned areas' were valued at 120 million Israeli pounds (at 1947 values), the Knesset passed a further bill to legalize such pre-emptive occupation of Arab holdings. Of the 370 Jewish settlements established during the first five years of statehood all except 20 were on absentee property, and by 1954 more than one third of Israel's Jewish population lived on absentee property. Similarly, nearly one third of the million-plus new Jewish immigrants were settled in towns and villages abandoned by the Palestinians.

This situation demonstrates that the strategy conceived by the founder of the Zionist Organization and spelled out later by the head of the Jewish National Land Fund was being pursued relentlessly. The former, Theodor Herzl, wrote in his diary in 1895:

We shall have to spirit the penniless population across the border by procuring employment for it in the transit countries, while denying it any employment in our own country. Both the expropriation and the removal of the poor must be carried out discreetly and circumspectly.

100

The latter, Joseph Weitz, writing in the context of how to Judaize and de-Arabize Palestine, noted in December 1940, while Gog and Magog were paused to regroup:

... after the war the question of the land of Israel and the question of the Jews would be raised beyond the framework of 'development'; amongst ourselves. It must be clear that there is no room for both peoples in this country. No 'development' will bring us closer to our aim, to be an independent people in this small country. If the Arabs leave the country, it will be broad and wide-open for us. And if the Arabs stay, the country will remain narrow and miserable. When the War is over and the English have won, and when the judges sit on the throne of law, our people must bring their petitions and their claim before them; and the only solution is Eretz Israel, or at least Western Eretz Israel, without Arabs. There is no room for compromise on this point. The Zionist enterprise so far, in terms of preparing the ground and paving the way for the creation of the Hebrew State in the land of Israel, has been fine and good in its own time, and could do with 'land-buying' – but this will not bring about the State of Israel; that must come all at once, in the manner of a Salvation (this is the secret of the Messianic idea); and there is no way besides transferring the Arabs from here to the neighbouring countries, to transfer them all; except maybe for Bethlehem, Nazareth and Old Jerusalem, we must not leave a single village, not a single tribe. And the transfer must be directed to Iraq, to Syria, and even to Transjordan. For that purpose we'll find money, and a lot of money. And only with such a transfer will the country be able to absorb millions of our brothers, and the Jewish question will be solved, once and for all. There is no other way out."¹⁰¹ (Emphasis added.)

That policy of confronting a people who are already in occupation of a land, then determining to remove or otherwise eliminate them and then claim the land on the basis that it is or was unoccupied bears an uncanny resemblance to the policy of the British colonial authorities in Australia after they had arrived and confronted the Aboriginal indigenous people. When persecution, genocide and enforced debasing encampment onto inhospitable tracts of land and reserves failed to satisfy the wants of the settlers the area was declared Terra Nullus (land not previously occupied) in order to sanctify its resumption and to avoid the tedious business of negotiating purchase or compensation with people who did not have the weaponry of the British settlers or their police and armies to defend themselves.

The effect of the mechanism set up by Israel under the Abandoned Areas Ordinance and related legislation was that there would be nothing for Palestinians to return to even if Israel opened its gate to them. In view of this the Israeli Government gave the Palestine Conciliation Commission an assurance that the funds received from the sale of abandoned or 'absentee' owned land would be credited to the refugees for future disposal, but several conditions were imposed. The main ones were that such funds would be used exclusively to resettle refugees elsewhere than in Israel and not for repatriation; that no funds would be disbursed until the opening of final peace talks with the Arab governments; that the value of counter-claims by Israel for land sequestered by Arab governments on the departure of Jewish refugees avoiding “Muslim xenophobia” would be deducted; and that the economic impact of the continuing Arab boycott would be taken into account.”¹⁰² No funds were distributed under the scheme during the early years and with those conditions providing the basis for a never-ending stream of disputes it must be considered unlikely that any ever will be.

But the Law of Return also generated tensions within Israel and throughout the Diaspora, and led to other problems for Israel. It focussed attention on the over-riding question of Jewish identity, “who or what is a Jew?” and in doing so it also drew attention to several related issues: the expectations of the immigrants; the role of the state in religious terms; the role of the religious authorities in law making or, put another way, the relationship between the State of Israel and the Jewish religious leadership; and the self-understanding of the world wide Jewish community. Herzl and many of the Zionist Organization leaders were determined that the Jewish National Home would be secular and that the clergy would be confined in their temples. But there were many who disagreed with them and believed that the laws of the state should be based on Biblical law even if it was not a theocratic state. It was in fact inevitable that the state and its laws would be influenced by religious principles and the self-understanding of those who governed it because the state was established on a semi-exclusive religious basis, because religious leaders were involved in the preparation of its constitution, and because the electoral system agreed upon echoed the system which had been used by the World Zionist Organization for its elections.

RELIGION, POLITICS AND NO THEOCRATIC STATE ...

That electoral system stipulated that the entire state of Israel was one electorate. There were to be no single electorates and not even a cluster of multi-seat electorates in which electors could support and relate to a particular Member of their persuasion. There were to be 120 seats and these were to be allocated to the candidates of parties contesting the election strictly in accordance with the percentage of the popular vote which the parties received – and strictly according to the order in which the parties listed their candidates. This was a highly democratic procedure in that it ensured that every shade of religious and political thinking and every ethnic group which chose to contest the election was virtually assured of representation in the Knesset. However it also ensured permanent political instability and gave the religious parties, and any other minor parties which were invited to join a coalition of parties to form government, the opportunity to insist on the implementation of their favoured policies as the price for their support of the coalition government. These factors became apparent in the election which was called for January 25, 1949, to establish a Constituent Assembly which would draft a constitution, and a government which would replace the Provisional Council of State which had drawn up and taken office upon the Declaration of the establishment of the State. Twenty one parties contested the election. A group of Labor parties gained 47.5 per cent of the popular vote and were allocated 57 seats, of which Ben-Gurion's Mapai Party held 46. A group of Centre Right parties gained 26 per cent and held 31 seats. A group of Religious parties gained 13 per cent for 16 seats, and all other splinter parties, together, gained the same.¹⁰³

After three weeks of difficult negotiations Ben-Gurion took office with a coalition of his own party and three religious parties, the United Religious Front (already a combination of the Mizrachi and the HaPoel HaMizrachi), the Progressives and the Sephardim which was confirmed by a vote in the Knesset of 73 to 45. There were immediate problems within the government because Ben-Gurion's Orthodox partners insisted that the Bible and the Talmud should be the basis of Israel's fundamental law. As Sachar states: "Plainly, the last thing Ben-Gurion and Israel then needed was a Kulturkampf between religionists and secularists."¹⁰⁴ The collapse of the government was avoided when it was agreed, as a compromise, that there would be two classes of laws: Fundamental Laws and ordinary or statutory laws. But the crisis soon erupted again when the Religious Front demanded that it should have automatic jurisdiction over the education of children who had arrived from the Yemen under Operation Magic Carpet. Mapai rejected the demand, the Religious Front withdrew its support and the government fell in February 1951.¹⁰⁵

Thus the electoral system which had been agreed upon encouraged the growth of religious parties, ensured that they would gain representation in parliament, and ensured that if Israel were not to be a theocratic state the representatives of the religious parties would often hold the balance of power, determine who formed government, what policies they would be able to implement and, therefore, the extent to which religious influence would show through its laws. The Mizrachi could be said to have earned its place in the first Israeli government by virtue of being the first religious group to support the political Zionist movement. Its origins lay in the Spiritual Centre society (Merkaz Ruchani) established by Rabbi Samuel Mohilever in 1893 in response to the excesses of the Tsarist regime during the 1880s. (See chapter 15) In 1897 Mohilever told the First World Zionist Congress that the revival of the land of Israel was one of the most important commandments of the Torah and that strict adherence to the Torah was an obligation if the Holy Land was to be, again, the arena for Jewry's spiritual mission.¹⁰⁶ "The Torah, which is the source of our life, must be the foundation of our regeneration in the land of our fathers," he said.¹⁰⁷ Five years later, under the leadership of Rabbi Isaac Jacob Reines, the Mizrachi was reorganized as a formal political party and became the first such group working within the World Zionist Organization. It followed a rigorous philosophy that the dual redemption of the Land of Israel and the Jewish spirit could only be accomplished within the strict precepts of religious Orthodoxy.

Although the tide of Western Christian anti-Semitism had ebbed dramatically by the 1950s there was no lessening of the importance of the questions raised by the Law of Return. It was widely accepted that anti-Semitism may rise again and if it did, was it to be Israel's role to provide a haven for those who faced persecution or oppression either as a crisis develops, or after the event as in the case of refugee resettlement in the wake of the Holocaust, or in the interventionist manner of Operation Magic Carpet and Operation Ali Baba? Or was it to be Israel's role to ameliorate the crisis by exerting its influence on the decisions of the governments of other countries in matters of refugee resettlement and ethnic affairs by enlisting the political support of its people in the Diaspora?

Then there was another very fundamental question. Was the State to assume a Vatican City-type authority for, and over, the Jewish communities of the Diaspora? Was it to assume a Vatican City-type role in endeavouring to influence world affairs or community values and social issues? Or was it, perhaps, to grant those roles to its religious leadership either by formally establishing a Great Sanhedrin, by legislation, or by informal delegation of its authority? If it did so, would that authority go to the Orthodox wing of the religious community or would it be exercised by a joint body of each of the wings working together? But these questions were of concern to people well beyond the bounds of Israel. They were basic to relations between Israel and the Christian Church or, more specifically, the dominant Catholic Church. And they were also basic to relations between Israel and the people of the continuing Diaspora, but especially the dominant Jewish community of the United States.

It soon became apparent that politicization of religion was "one of the critical weaknesses of the emerging Israeli State."¹⁰⁸ If, as the Law of Return implied, Israel's mission was to bring the Jews of the world together in a commonwealth, what was to be the relationship between the State and the 'remnant' who were still, in both the traditional and the Zionist view, 'exiles'? The fact that there were, and there would remain for many years, more Jews outside the National Homeland than within it did not negate the question. It made it more important. And the fact that the proportions, interests and influence of Orthodox, Conservative and Reformed Jews within Israel differed from those in the Diaspora aggravated the situation. Within a few years the operation of the Rabbinical Courts became an issue of contention and has remained so for fifty years.

The legal system of Israel was developing on the basis of a rare combination of consensus, experience and precedents from several sources. These included the Ottoman system, notably in matters of land ownership, the laws of the British mandatory administration, Biblical and Talmudic Jewish law, British Common Law and Equity, and some completely new Israeli initiatives, but it did not provide for trial by jury. An important departure from established Western practice was the adaptation of the Ottoman millet structure which had been continued by the mandatory administration. This allowed each religious community in Palestine extensive juridical autonomy in matters such as marriage, divorce, burial, and inheritance which related to the personal status of its members. Muslim, Christian and Jewish tribunals were each authorized to decide these matters on the basis of their separate religious laws.

As already noted, the Labor parties, led by Ben-Gurion, had set out to avoid institutionalizing the power of the Jewish religious authorities but it was a matter on which they had to concede ground to maintain their coalitions because there were military and economic matters to which they gave a higher priority than a confrontation with the Orthodox religious community. The result was that the Rabbinical courts and the religious courts of the Muslims and Christians were given significantly increased jurisdiction. In 1953 the Rabbinical courts were empowered to deal not only with matters of personal status but also the status of any “Jewish national or resident of Israel.” By this act foreign citizenship no longer exempted a Jew living in Israel from the jurisdiction of the Rabbinical courts. Two years later the judges of the Rabbinical, Christian and Muslim courts were given the status of state officials, thus increasing their apparent authority considerably. Both measures were “rammed through” the Knesset against strong opposition so that Ben-Gurion could secure Orthodox support for other measures which he considered of decisive importance.¹⁰⁹

AN UNEASY TRUCE WITH AN ‘ILLEGITIMATE STATE’...

So the uneasy state of ‘peace’ between Israel and its neighbours held, but with no one satisfied with the situation. Both sides became intransigent. The Arab position was that Israel was illegal and illegitimate and that there would be no peace until the Palestinian problem was resolved. Opposition to Zionism became consolidated on the grounds of religion. The UN, under pressure from the Vatican, continued to press for internationalization of the city and although most of the Arab states changed their positions on the issue and backed internationalization, Jordan supported Israel in opposition to the move. Israel made clear that it would not renounce its claims and that Jerusalem was its capital, in which government would be centralized whether the world liked it or not. (There were strong protests in 1953 when Israel formally proclaimed Jerusalem to be its capital, but about a year later most countries accepted it as fait accompli and permitted their diplomatic missions to conduct inter-government business there.) The Arab League moved to strengthen its trade boycott of Israel, closed all of its land borders except a niche into Lebanon for diplomatic purposes and established a Boycott Coordinating Office in Damascus. Israel responded by establishing an Anti-boycott Office in Jerusalem and began developing Eilat as a port for trade with East Asia, and in September 1951 it gained the support of the UN Security Council for a resolution that Egypt should cease restrictions on shipping through the Suez Canal. Deep-seated animosity, propaganda distortion of historical and current events, coupled with the misrepresentation and belittling of religious and cultural beliefs and practices became the norm of diplomatic, educational and media conduct on both sides. It all confused the world greatly and polarized world opinion and world support around particular issues on the basis of religious belief and perceived truths and falsehoods.

On what other basis could people understand a situation, make personal value judgements, and respond? And besides: it was normal conduct. Western governments had been manipulating and falsifying their release of information systematically for years. The great powers were fairly clumsy at it during the First World War and their people were very disenchanted when they gradually realized what had been done. (Chapter 17) The techniques were refined and became the subject of scientific study, tertiary courses and commercial practice during the 1920s and 1930s. (Chapter 18) Chamberlain’s conspiracy of silence, set up in a bid to protect Britain’s interests, helped to conceal the real issues from the world and to drag it relentlessly towards the Second World War. (Chapter 20) And the Roosevelt administration's sheer deceit and concealment of information from its own armed forces and from the general public during its manoeuvring towards the war, followed by the gross misrepresentation of the situation prior to the use of the atomic bombs against Japan, plumbed new depths in unspecified crime against humanity. (Chapters 24 & 26) As the Middle East war dragged into the 1950s the Israelis and the Arabs were, relatively, rank amateurs at the game.

In 1953, having assumed the throne following the assassination of his grandfather and then the abdication of his father, King Hussein of Jordan moved promptly to restore and improve the Al-Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock, to institute annual pilgrimages to celebrate the Prophet's Nocturnal Journey and Ascension from Jerusalem (the Night Journey), and to host a World Islamic Congress. Then, due to accusations that in other respects the Jordanian Government was neglecting economic development and services in the West Bank and East Jerusalem, tension developed between Palestinians on the West Bank and Jordanians on the East Bank. The situation improved somewhat when the Hashemite Kingdom agreed in discussions with the Arab League that although it claimed absolute sovereignty in the region it was only holding the West Bank and East Jerusalem until formal settlement of the Palestinian question. However, in spite of secret negotiations between Jordan and Israel, that prospect did not seem very close because of a virtual religious impasse. On one hand the numerically minor but very vocal and extremely nationalist Israeli religious Cherut (Herut) Party was demanding that Israel incorporate all of Jordan with possible further expansion in future to the full 'historical limits' of Eretz Israel, that it encourage mass immigration, a vigorous capitalist approach and a definite Western foreign policy, and that Israel's security be bolstered by a pre-emptive or preventative war with the Arabs if necessary.^{110 111} On the other hand Jordan had sought to use access to the Old City as a lever in bargaining for border modifications and had contravened that aspect of the truce agreement which provided for free access to and from the Hebrew University, the Hadassah Hospital and the Holy Places by restricting the movement of Jewish staff to and from the university and the hospital to fortnightly convoys, and by barring Jews from visiting the Wailing Wall.¹¹² In addition it permitted – or failed to prevent – desecration and demolition of synagogues in East Jerusalem and tombs in the ancient cemetery on the Mount of Olives. Eventually only one of 35 synagogues remained and thousands of tombstones, mainly taken from the route of a road constructed through the cemetery to the new Intercontinental Hotel, had been used as building material and for paving footpaths.¹¹³

... SUPPORTED BY A VIGOROUS DIASPORA ...

But during its early years Israel could not focus all its attention on its relations with its immediate Arab neighbours. The government's ambition was, in effect, to produce an 'instant self-sufficient nation' – something which no country had done in the history of colonization. To do so it had to develop a rationale for its economic development and secure the funds for mass settlement of refugees and migrants, provision of essential education, health and communications services, and industrial and agricultural development. In doing so it had to balance the broadly socialist philosophy of the majority of its population and the vigorously capitalist philosophy of a sizeable minority. But it also had to plan and raise funds for national defence and chart a course through a minefield of international relations. In the unique circumstances of its establishment these two tasks became unavoidably enmeshed in the intrigue of world politics. Its government professed a foreign policy of non-identification with the great power blocks but in reality Israel was firmly tied to the United States – whether it wished to be or not – because of several factors. These included Zionist opposition to settlement in other countries; the immigration and ingathering policies which the government pursued; the concentration of half of the total Jewish population in North America and the political influence which that community exerted in order to secure the establishment, recognition and security of the state, plus the financial support which it provided .

Very promptly after the UN partition resolution was adopted on November 29, 1947 the Jewish Agency sought a loan of $500 million through the US treasury for the settlement of migrants, but on December 22 the request was equally promptly rejected.¹¹⁴ On the basis of actual costs of about $2,000 per person¹¹⁵ the loan would have been sufficient to settle the entire population of about 250,000 Jews in European DP camps . Subsequently, within a few days of the proclamation of the state, Truman authorised “an emergency loan of $100 million to help the Zionist leaders put their house in order and finance their industrial development projects.”¹¹⁶ At that time, quite apart from the demands of defence, settlement and development, the new-born state faced the immediate loss of fifteen percent of its export income due to the Arab boycott, substantial war damage to the Dead Sea potash works and the citrus industry, and the temporary closure of the Haifa oil refineries. However, given that the Israel-Arab war was in progress when the loan was approved it is hardly credible that, even though an embargo against the sale of arms to the Middle East was in place at that time, at least part of it did not go towards arms purchases. In any case that loan would have released alternative funds for such purposes. Official data for US economic and military aid to Israel does not list any loans or grants for the year 1948 at all, apparently on the basis that although it required presidential approval it was a ‘private loan’ and not government to government aid. ¹¹⁷ In the meantime Golda Meyerson (Meir) had raised $50 million from private donations during her visit to the US in January-February 1948, and this was channelled through a Swiss bank direct to an arms-buying operation set up by the Jewish Agency in Geneva. It was three times the entire oil revenues of Saudi Arabia for 1947 and many times the allocation of three million pounds Sterling made by the Arab League to Jordan to assist its war effort. ¹¹⁸

... AND ‘BLOOD MONEY’

From the data which is readily available it is very difficult to get a true picture of how much money flowed into Israel from the date of the UN partition decision either as grants or loans to the government, as donations through affiliates of the Jewish Agency, or as private investment funds. However two things are apparent. First: that the economic crisis which Israel faced during its early years was a consequence of the 'instant Zionist nation' concept which the government was pursuing and which could not be financed from locally generated revenue. Second: that the development of the nation could not have proceeded in the way it did, its economy would have been unsustainable and it would have been indefensible without the funds which were provided for economic development and military purposes by the world wide Jewish community. During the decade of the 1950s the Israeli Government consistently incurred a substantial balance of payments deficit. Domestic production or 'earned income' covered only eight percent of Israel's foreign currency expenditure and the big deficit (92 percent of its foreign payments) was covered from three sources: world Jewry 59 percent, Germany's reparation contributions 29 percent, and United States military and economic aid 12 percent.¹¹⁹ Subsequently, when German reparations payments were being phased out the flow of private donations also fell for a few years – until the next survival-threatening crisis erupted. The United States' formal aid program was then increased dramatically in line with the undertakings by successive presidents that the security of Israel would be guaranteed.

The decision by Prime Minister Ben-Gurion to seek reparations from Germany in a bid to overcome the country's desperate financial situation after only two years of existence precipitated an extraordinarily bitter domestic crisis. Negotiations were opened late in 1950 and by December 1951 provisional agreement had been reached with Bonn (West Germany), requiring the Knesset to be summoned to sit on January 7th, 1952, to approve wider scale negotiations. Ben-Gurion was at great pains to show that the infusion of money was to help Israel absorb hundreds of thousands of survivors of the Nazi terror and that it was not compensation for the millions of Jews liquidated during the war. However the venom of attacks on the government for seeking 'blood money' indicated that many people did not believe him, rocked the government and severely strained its public support. Menachem Begin, a former commander of the extremist Etzel group and at that time leader of the Cherut Party which traced its origins to the notorious Irgun Z'vai Le'umi, described Ben-Gurion as "a Fascist and a hooligan" and said the negotiations were "the ultimate abomination." When an unruly crowd broke the reinforced police lines, injured more than one hundred police, smashed the windows of the Knesset and were at the point of forcing their way into the Knesset Chamber the Speaker ordered a recess and called in the army to quell the riot. The threat of violence against members of the Knesset and the prospect of civil war hung heavily over the nation but two days later, on January 9th, Ben-Gurion received a vote of confidence, 61 in favour and 50 against.¹²⁰ The negotiations continued and the Reparations Treaty (Shilumim Agreement) was signed in September 1952. It provided for total payments of $US822 million over twelve years, made up of $US715 million in goods to the State of Israel and $US107 million to be paid through Israel for the rehabilitation of victims of Nazi atrocities living outside Israel.¹²¹

The German grants, largely in heavy industrial and construction equipment, amounted to 25 percent of Israel's development budget in 1953-54, 47 percent in 1954-55, and an average of 20 percent over the full period.¹²² In addition West Germany agreed to provide 'restitution' for individual victims of Nazi persecution. The nation whose people had been persuaded to go to war again to counterbalance the unfair demands for reparations made by their victorious adversaries after a previous war was ready to make meaningful recompense for the real atrocities which it had committed rather than the trumped-up ones on which the earlier reparations demands had been based. In doing so it greatly assisted the establishment of the Zionist State which it had sought to prevent with such bitterness in the belief that its people had been largely responsible for the previous reparations debacle. But in doing so it also unintentionally helped to consolidate the challenge to the church and its self-understanding – the central issue in the continuing crisis – by strengthening the position of the Zionist State which had become the focal point of that challenge to the church's self-understanding.

When the economic, social and political turmoil in which Israel was deeply embroiled (and which is always associated with close-quarters war) also led to political turmoil and instability throughout the region both Israel and the United States exploited this in order to minimize the prospects of Arab unity and military cohesion in a multi-country approach to Israel. In quick succession came the revolt in Iraq against the British Treaty (1948); a military coup in Syria (March 1949); the Iranian oil crisis (1951) which began to reshape international oil politics and then ran on with the palace takeover of 1953 until international settlement in 1954; the assassination of King Abdullah of Jordan (July 1951); and the Egyptian military coup (July 1952). Such turmoil and disunity ensured that the world was discouraged from thinking too closely about how the crisis in the Middle East had come about, what its fundamental causes were, and what was required to resolve it.

The truce might have been rather uneasy, but the United States – the world's superhuman policeman, endowed with such masses of goodwill, wealth, and scientific expertise – would convert it into a lasting peace. With its position of world leadership said to be divinely inspired; with its insights into world affairs illuminated by its finely tuned Judeo-Christian heritage; and with its unchallengeable authority underpinned by its exclusive control of nuclear weapons which was said to be similarly divinely inspired, the United States had emerged from the midst of world calamity unscathed. It was the most powerful economic empire the world had ever known or that people cared to contemplate, and it was non-colonial. It dwarfed the British Empire which it had succeeded. Its authority was so awe-inspiring that no one (in the Western world or subordinate to any countries of the amorphous Christian gel anyway) could doubt its integrity or query its decisions. What was good for America must be good for the world. If a country ran its affairs on the basis of proper Judeo-Christian values it had absolutely nothing to fear from the United States. Did it? It was only the atheistic Communist bloc which was causing all the friction that had anything to be concerned about. Wasn't it?

FROM INTELLIGENCE TO INTERFERENCE

At the time that Britain and France went to their war with Germany, the foreign intelligence services available to the United States administration were very elementary. The armed services and the State Department had code-breaking units which “provided excellent information about military and diplomatic activity, but [which were] not much good at revealing politics, strategy and intentions.” The advice which they received from their diplomatic missions was very variable. In June 1940 an influential New York lawyer, William Donovan, who had a distinguished record from the First World War was asked by the White House to visit Britain to assess morale and military capabilities and to study British intelligence and counter-intelligence methods. He was briefed by Colonel Stewart Menzies, head of Britain’s Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), and Churchill who were eager to offset the anti-British influence of Ambassador Kennedy. In particular he was briefed on British propaganda and psychological warfare methods as well as being shown the latest top secret military inventions, including radar. His optimistic reports to Truman encouraged the president to increase aid to Britain, but when the Lend Lease Act was passed in March, 1941 (chapter 24) the situation had not changed and the US administration was still largely dependent on British intelligence for the information on which it was basing major decisions concerning its own defence and foreign aid. A coordinating committee had been set up in 1939, but each service had been given a regional responsibility: the FBI had the western hemisphere; the Army’s G-2 had Europe, Africa and the Panama Canal Zone; and the Office of Naval Intelligence – from which Roosevelt had received the notorious McCollum Memorandum in October 1940 – Asia and the Pacific rim. On March 18 Roosevelt therefore responded to urging from Donovan that a centralized system of intelligence was more vital than ever by instructing him to prepare a plan. He submitted it five weeks later, on April 26, and ten weeks later, on July 11, 1941, Roosevelt appointed Donovan as Coordinator of Information (COI) to put the plan into effect and to act as chief intelligence officer and coordinator of collection and analysis of information.¹²³

So far so good. But the inter-service rivalry was such that while he was struggling to recruit people for the new service and to get it up and running Donovan had effectively been shut out of the politicking around the McCollum Memorandum and Roosevelt’s plan to find a justification to take the United States into the war. Thus five months later he was not aware of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbour until several hours after the event, when he was summoned to join the president and his confidants at the White House during the evening of December 7, after dinner, when Roosevelt’s main interest appeared to him to be whether the attack was bad enough to unite Americans behind a declaration of war against the Axis powers.^{124 125} (Chapter 24) In the public outcry about the lack of warning which followed, the Office of the COI became a very convenient scapegoat and this gave Roosevelt the opportunity to reorganize the intelligence services further. On June 13, 1942, he signed a presidential order establishing the Office of Strategic Services (OSS) in place of the COI. The OSS became part of the military establishment, under the jurisdiction of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and Donovan was retained as Director with the rank of Major General. Circumstantial evidence suggests that, by that appointment, Donovan was compensated for having been shut out of the pre-Pearl Harbour politicking or, at least, Roosevelt was confirming that he had not been responsible for the debacle.

The role of the OSS as defined by the Joint Chiefs of Staff was primarily sabotage, espionage, counterespionage, covert action and subversion, and by the end of the war it had a staff of 25,000. Among the first persons recruited to it by Donovan was Allen Dulles. (Chapter 27) He was posted to Switzerland as head of covert operations in Europe – with a letter of credit for $1 million.¹²⁶ As the war progressed it did not bother the OSS whether it was targeting the enemy or an ally if the perceived interests of the United States were involved. It bothered Roosevelt, but not Donovan.

The alliance between the Western Allies and the Soviet Union had been a matter of convenience, pursued relentlessly by Britain when it was in a position of desperation, (chapter 24) and the history and memories of deep antagonism by the West towards Russia was always a factor in the thinking of Stalin and his colleagues. It could hardly have been otherwise. The pattern of the relationship had originated not with modern-age governments on the basis of politics, but with the Roman Catholic Church and its bid to take control of the religious life of the young Russian principalities in the tenth and eleventh centuries, and the subsequent development of the Polish-buffer phenomenon. (Chapter 8) It had been consolidated over many centuries but it had assumed a totally different character with Britain's efforts to keep Russia in the First World War, followed by British, French and American military action in collaboration with the Czarist White Russians in their effort to reverse the Bolshevik Revolution. (Chapter 17) And it had been reinforced by the Vatican's trenchant attacks on atheistic Communism during the 1930s (chapters 18 & 20); and its efforts to induce Britain and the United States to change their war target from Hitler's Germany to Stalin's Russia during the war (chapter 24). In the eyes of the US and Britain, the Soviet leaders were supposed to put all of that behind them and make believe it had never happened. Naturally that was rather difficult. Fear that it would all happen again was at the front of their minds, and with good reason. They wanted their buffer back. Not just Poland, but a strip of states all the way from the Baltic to the Balkans.

In 1944 Donovan suggested to Roosevelt that the OSS should target the activities of the Red Army in occupied territory. Roosevelt refused, but Donovan set his own agenda and "continued to keep an eye on the Russians." He and the OSS were taking some of the first tentative steps in the Cold War. According to John Ranelagh, an OSS agent, Robert Bishop, established contact with a top-secret unit of Romanian intelligence in September 1944 which had penetrated the Romanian communist party. For the next six months he was kept informed about Soviet plans for Romania and the rest of Eastern Europe. He reported to Donovan that Soviet plans were to create slave states which would be a buffer between Russia and Western Europe after the war. Corroboration of the Soviet plans was received a few weeks later when Finnish intelligence handed a captured book of Soviet codes to the OSS. Being unaware that their codes had been captured, Soviet forces continued to use them. When Roosevelt heard that the OSS had the codes he ordered Donovan to return them, uncopied, to the Russians. Donovan did return them – after he copied them secretly.¹²⁷

A TICKET TO FREEDOM ...

Ranelagh also says that within weeks of the end of the war US Army intelligence captured the head of the German Army's Soviet intelligence unit, General Reinhard Gehlen. It can be assumed that a prerequisite for appointment to such a post would be a history of dedication to, or at least demonstrated support for, the Nazi philosophy and cause, and that the head of such a unit would have no more compunction about the abuse of human rights than his colleagues in the Einsatzgruppen. On that basis General Gehlen should have at least been a candidate for examination as a possible war criminal, but such was not to be his fate. He was soon to be favoured with "a long and profitable relationship with the CIA and was subsequently head of the West German Federal Intelligence Service."

Gehlen provided a cache of 'Kremlin secrets' which he had carefully buried in case of such an eventuality. They included the Soviet order of battle at the time of the German surrender, and he was able to report that "Stalin was determined to keep Poland effectively occupied, with Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania and Bulgaria all becoming Soviet satellite states. And unless the Western Allies made clear to Stalin that they were prepared to defend their zones of occupation in Germany, the Soviets intended to occupy the whole of Germany too." In effect, in planning its buffer zone, the Soviet Union was doing no more than expanding its empire in the traditional manner of the other European colonial powers, and a lot less than Hitler had planned and attempted to implement with his Lebensraum. But he was not to be allowed to. Stalin was a Communist, hell bent on central planning and state control of resources which was just not acceptable to the great powers of the amorphous Christian gel. If he got away with it in Eastern Europe the 'disease' would probably spread throughout the Third World and that would never do. The West wanted unfettered access to their resources.

And besides: Russia had to be led back onto the proper sacramental track towards salvation. The great powers of the amorphous Christian gel had been forced to recognize the legitimacy of a Jewish state and, therefore, to recognize that Judaism was also a legitimate continuing religion. In addition it had reluctantly granted Islam the status of 'crusade exempt' – at least for the time being – because the defence of Saudi Arabia, seat of the faith and protector of the holiest site of Islam, had been declared vital to the security of the United States. 'Crusade exempt' and 'legitimate' were not quite the same thing because none of the churches recognized it and it was still a proper target for evangelism or even elimination, like Shinto in Japan. The war and the new circumstances had made the West look at all world religions in a new light, even if their conceptualization of God was not that of the church. But to allow a country like Russia to reject religion was simply not acceptable. What that really meant was that the alliance between the Vatican and the West was too mutually beneficial to scrap. It had to be held in place for quite a while yet. The West was dependent upon it to hold the Central and Latin American countries in check because some of them were already beginning to run off the rails: to challenge the idea of democratic capitalism. They wanted to do their own thing. Trade with whom so ever they wished. Only the church could be relied on to keep them in order. It would soon do so, through collaboration with a series of ruthless dictators with whom, like the European Fascists, it was more at ease than with the democrats.

The situation made the Western powers stop in their tracks and rethink their policy for the occupation of Germany. If they were going to win the hearts and minds of the battered people of Europe and prevent them from adopting the same policies they would have to develop policies quite different to those they had imposed after the First World War, which some political leaders in the West wanted to pursue again, and quite different to the policies the United States was already implementing in Japan. (Chapter 27)

Gehlen was in a situation directly comparable to the commander of Japan's special purpose 731st Regiment, Lt. General Shiro Ishii, who directed human guinea pig biological warfare research and avoided trial for such crimes by providing the United States with the results of the unit's research. (Chapter 27, No question of principle) When Donovan and Allen Dulles, then head of OSS, Germany, were told about Gehlen and his information they recommended that he be "taken on" by the US Army. But among Gehlen's files were the names of OSS men whom he claimed were members of the Communist Party and he was, no doubt, happy to talk about that file. It was therefore little surprise when an attempt was made to assassinate him and it was decided "to spirit him away to Washington." He arrived there on September 20, 1945, on the day that Truman signed an executive order requiring Donovan to disband the OSS in ten days,¹²⁸ and 18 days after MacArthur had set up his military government in Tokyo and set in train the motions for Japan's war crimes trials.

Truman's decision to disband the OSS resulted partly from with his Baptist upbringing and his dislike of secrecy and its unconstitutional conduct, and partly from the need to make economies. But the major factor was the politicking for control of the organization which had gathered pace again, and bitter public attacks on it in the US which were sure to cause some political fall out. The attacks were not because it had committed crimes. Anything which could be justified on the grounds of national security or as an anti-Communist measure was generally acceptable and was not widely regarded as a crime. The attacks were on the basis that it was supposed to have come under undesirable British influence¹²⁹ and that could mean whatever the writer or the reader wished to impute: that the US was propping up an intelligence system in Britain's interest, a bit like ongoing Lend-Lease; that it was inefficient and wasteful; that it was too soft on Communism; or that it was simply un-American. Truman ordered a complete review of American national security requirements, and the armed services battled with the State Department for control of the system.

... WITH A RETURN TICKET PAID

But the Cold War phenomenon was already being milked relentlessly by everyone who thought they could gain from it: politicians, the business sector and the armed services. Thus, four months later, in January 1946, when Truman issued a directive that a Central Intelligence Group (CIG) be set up and jointly staffed and funded by the Departments of State, War and Navy while the national security review continued, it was very much a product of the Cold War mentality with a very heavy emphasis on Russian and East European intelligence. On the recommendation of a core group which naturally included Allen Dulles, Gehlen was sent straight back to Germany with a budget of $3.5 million to “set up in business as the supplier of Russian and East European intelligence to the United States ... but (Dulles) was mortified when Gehlen’s services were annexed not by the CIG but by the Army.”¹³⁰

The product of the continuing review, the National Security Bill, was sent to Congress in January 1947. It provided for a National Military Establishment with unified control of each of the armed services, including a separate air force for the first time, and a Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) responsible directly to the president through a National Security Council (NSC). Its functions included making recommendations about intelligence coordination, and correlating and evaluating intelligence. Then there was a blanket clause: to perform such services of common concern to the government’s intelligence organizations as the NSC might determine. Nothing was beyond its reach and, although the CIA was to be subject to the oversight of the NSC, its head was to be in a remarkable position. He was also to be the president’s principal intelligence adviser, the protector of sources and methods of intelligence, and overall head of all intelligence organizations, including those of the armed services, the State Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), so that the heads of those bodies would, in future, have two bosses each. It was a certain prescription for continuing intrigue. Rear Admiral Roscoe Hillenkoetter was sworn in as Director of Central Intelligence in May, and the new structure took effect in July.

As expected, the feuding and rivalry continued so that twelve months later, in July 1948, when politicking over the Marshall Plan had given way to secret negotiations towards the establishment of NATO in the light of the Berlin Blockade and the Airlift; and while an uneasy truce was settling over Palestine and Israel, the New York Times could describe intelligence as “one of the weakest links in our national security.”¹³¹ Then a few weeks later, in August, the House Un-American Activities Committee heard allegations of Communist infiltration of the government, and the State Department in particular; John Foster Dulles went off to Amsterdam to address the World Council of Churches on the evils of Communism (but not the crisis in the Middle East); Allen Dulles set to work with his colleagues to review the operations and regulations of the CIA under the new arrangements, to draft changes to them, and to strengthen its position at the centre of US policy making; while the British sought to persuade the French to change their “short-sighted attitude in the interests of Western European security as a whole,” and to build on the Anglo-American talks which had got off to a flying start on August 10 in their bid to secure the fullest possible US commitment to involvement in Europe.¹³² And everyone waited for the ‘inevitable’ outcome of the presidential election: a victory for Republican Dewey.

It was commonly understood within the Republican Party hierarchy that John Foster Dulles had been promised the post of Foreign Secretary and Allen Dulles would be appointed director of the revamped CIA following the election. Allen was so eager to clear the decks in preparation for a prompt appointment that he actually completed and submitted his report and recommendations to the White House in the first days of November, immediately prior to the election. When John Foster learned what he had done he phoned, told Allen he was foolish, that Truman could act on the report at the last moment and appoint some one else as director, and that he should ask for it to be set aside for consideration after the election – by the new president. Allen did so.¹³³ However, as we have noted (A defining American election upset) Truman retained office. It was therefore in the atmosphere of anti-Communist paranoia which gripped Washington that the report was considered by the NSC in January, 1949, and referred to Truman just as the NATO talks were getting bogged down.

With Truman's re-election Marshall retired and Dean Acheson became Secretary of State. When he looked at the NATO proposals in February he decided there had not been sufficient consultation with Congressional leaders and no more could be done until Truman had their agreement. The new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Tom Connally, therefore became involved and, in debate on February 14, criticized what he saw as an automatic commitment for the US to go to war in Europe again on the basis of Article 5 of the draft agreement – the mutual guarantee clause. The British Foreign Office regarded the debate as "deplorable" and three days later Foreign Secretary Bevin took Acheson to task in an unusually strong telegram. He said that grave doubts emerging over the American attitude could well cause "every European country to shrink from the risks which they would be exposed to by signing the pact" and he implied that Britain, which was leading the charge, might have to reconsider its position. Britain wanted to know "whether or not the US government accepted the conception of the Atlantic Community as one fundamental unit which has got to be defended together for the sake of all the parts." The British government, he said, had based its policy on "the confident expectation that the US was willing to join in the creation of a solid Atlantic Community capable of resisting aggression from any quarter [and that he thought] the principle had been accepted and there was no difference of status between the various parties in such unity (except indeed that we, the European members, were in the front line and would probably take the first knock in any emergency)."¹³⁴

Acheson persuaded Connally to accept a compromise wording for the mutual guarantee clause and the North Atlantic Treaty was signed in Washington on April 4, but the incident had certainly done nothing to placate Republicans who maintained that the Administration and the State Department were soft on Communism. Under the treaty, twelve countries agreed to establish NATO with its headquarters in Washington for the purpose of providing mutual aid in case of an attack on any member.¹³⁵ With the treaty in place, the Western powers agreed to the immediate unification of the three western zones of Germany. The West German Parliamentary Council which was set up for the purpose adopted a constitution on May 8. Stalin could see no purpose in continuing the Berlin blockade. It was lifted on May 12, and traffic was flowing freely into Berlin from the West when the Federal Republic of Germany was constituted on May 23. The bill for a Central Intelligence Agency Act was before Congress about that time.¹³⁶

EXCOMMUNICATE! ANOTHER PAPAL INTERVENTION ...

On June 13, after the North Atlantic Treaty had been signed but while the CIA bill was under consideration, Pius XII authorized a decree of the Holy Office on Communism. Catholics were forbidden to join the Communist Party, and *any who “knowingly and willingly profess the doctrines of Communism, or defend its principles, or spread its errors” were subject to automatic excommunication. Damned! Catholics who joined the Communist Party under the force of hard circumstances, as in Iron Curtain countries, for the sake of work needed to support their families but who did not subscribe to its ideologies, were not to be subject to that automatic excommunication.*¹³⁷ [Emphasis added.] Coming on top of his obsequious support for the American brand of Democratic Capitalism in connection with the Italian elections only a year early, that decree helped to earn him the reputation as “the ideological leader of the Western forces,”¹³⁸ At least he was being consistent, building on the long-established pattern which began as soon as Karl Marx’ work began to have an impact in 1848, (chapter 14). The pattern was set in 1854, by Pius IX, “It must of course be held as a matter of faith that outside the apostolic Roman Church no one can be saved, that the Church is the only ark of salvation, and that whoever does not enter it will perish in the flood.”¹³⁹ This was followed, in 1863, by: “...it is necessary once more to ... censure the serious error into which some Catholics have unfortunately fallen ... the opinion that men who live in errors, estranged from the true faith and Catholic unity, can attain eternal life. This is in direct opposition to Catholic teaching.”¹⁴⁰ Then came Leo XIII’s encyclical on Socialism in 1878. Socialism was:

the deadly plague that is creeping into the very fibers of human society and leading it on to the verge of destruction ... [and the] ...most deadly war which has grown in intensity up to today, had for its object to subvert all revelation, and overthrow the supernatural order, that thus the way might be opened for the discoveries, or rather the hallucinations, of reason alone. ... [A] licentious sort of liberty was attributed to man by a set of men who gloried in the name of philosophers, and a new right, as they call it, against the natural and divine law began to be framed and sanctioned. ...[T]he socialists, stealing from the very Gospel itself... maintain that nature has made all men equal, and that, therefore, neither honour nor respect is due to majesty, nor obedience to laws, unless, perhaps, to those sanctioned by their own good pleasure. But on the contrary ... [t]he inequality of rights and of power proceeds from the very Author of nature ... [and] ... the minds of princes and their subjects are, according to Catholic doctrine and precepts, bound up one with the other in such a manner, by mutual duties and rights, that the thirst for power is restrained and the rational ground of obedience made easy, firm and noble. ... ‘There is no power but from God; and those that are, are ordained of God. Therefore he that resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God. And they that resist purchase to themselves damnation.’”¹⁴¹

The pattern continued. 1931: “ ‘Religious socialism,’ ‘Christian socialism’ are contradictions; no-one can be at once a true Catholic and a socialist, in the proper meaning of the term ...”¹⁴² Then, in 1937 Pius XI issued the encyclical Divini Redemptoris on Atheistic Communism, already discussed at length, (Chapters 18 & 20), and Pius XII drew the whole lot together in his Christmas Allocution in 1944 when he reluctantly endorsed American Democratic Capitalism and illustrated more clearly than ever before, the manner in which the church was the fabric of the amorphous Christian gel. (Chapter 27, Temporal Authority, the Lateran Treaty and civil government)

The effect of Pius XII's decree of excommunication against Communists which, with its other provisions, was a very direct call to undermine Communist governments at every turn, was to irrevocably confirm that linkage and to place Catholics in an invidious and, for many, intolerable position. It was not merely a matter of them having to bury their social consciences to comply. Neither was it merely a matter of putting even greater divisive political power in the hands of right wing Catholic parties in countries such as Australia. (chapter 27, A shift of gear: the Liturgical Movement.) The decree placed every Catholic worker in a country under Communist rule, or with widespread political unrest, under direct suspicion as a subversive. The conflict of conscience was similar to that for Catholics in Indochina who were expected to rise up and support Pigneau's bid to his nominee on the throne with a touch of help from Louis XVI, and with a treaty between Cochinchina and France as the prize. (Chapter 15) Either he could not be trusted in the workplace or in the party because he was actually working for the church to undermine the party, or he was being two-faced to secure his job, and still could not be trusted. The backlash was swift.

... MEANS TRAUMA FOR THE CHURCH IN RUSSIA ...

Stalin had sheathed his anti-religious sword at the time of Barbarossa in the interests of national unity and the war effort against Hitler. Orthodox Church leaders had thrown their weight behind the government; and Stalin had subsequently approved a strengthening of the structures of both the Orthodox Christian church and other faiths. (Chapter 24.) Four years later, at the end of the war, he was still happy to tolerate a "controlled" or compliant church, but he would not tolerate "active priests" or a subversive, white-anting church. Immediately following the Vatican's decree of excommunication he unsheathed his sword and unleashed a renewed campaign of harassment and closure of Roman Catholic churches in the satellite states and against the Vatican-related Uniate Church in the Ukraine. This was coupled with a systematic smear-and-hate campaign against the Vatican. Reasonable tolerance was still shown towards the Orthodox and Protestant churches – in fact the Orthodox Church benefited greatly – but the pope was vilified and caricatured as the warmongering "American policeman honoris causa."

The Uniate Church (the Roman Catholic Church of the Eastern Rite) in the Ukraine, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Romania was liquidated. Its properties were not seized as state property in the ordinary sense, but they were allocated to the Orthodox Church, and its clergy and members were virtually forced to join that church. They were given the theoretical option of joining the Roman Catholics of the Western Rite, but it was not a practical option because there were virtually none to join. Those who refused to join the Orthodox Church were incarcerated.¹⁴³

Now, fifty years later, with the Orthodox Church relieved of the pressures of state administration ten years after the collapse of Soviet Communist rule, the pope's decree and Stalin's reaction have come back to haunt the current generation. The Vatican's endeavours to arrange a visit to Moscow by Pope John Paul II in pursuit of its policy of rapprochement with the Orthodox Churches, are being undermined by friction over demands for the return of those properties. On August 3, 2000, Russian Orthodox Patriarch Aleksei II said that a meeting with Pope John Paul II was out of the question while disputes between Catholics and Orthodox in the Ukraine continue. Addressing seminarians, Aleksei II said: "As long as Greek Catholics continue seizing Orthodox cathedrals in Ukraine, as long as Roman Catholics are engaged in a large-scale expansion in the western regions of Ukraine and Byelorussia, such a meeting is out of the question." He was referring to ongoing disputes between Eastern-rite Catholics and Russian Orthodox over the church seizures because of the pope's decree, coupled with efforts by Catholics to convert non-churchgoing Ukrainians.

The patriarch noted that a meeting with the Pope, if it takes place "should yield concrete results and meet expectations of Russia's people," and said that three Orthodox eparchies had been ruined in western Ukraine. "Orthodox believers were expelled from cathedrals, priests were beaten up and worship objects were destroyed. Such actions against a sister-church at the end of the 20th century are hard to take," he said. He added that Catholics had no right to convert non-churchgoing Ukrainians, since 70 percent of Ukrainians were either baptized Orthodox or their descendants.¹⁴⁴

At least the Vatican's new step-by-step approach to bringing Russia into the Roman orbit – starting with rapprochement as the first step towards integration or unity within the Christian church under the papacy – is quite a change from its attempt to ride into the Soviet Union with Cardinal Tisserant's Eastern Missionaries in the vanguard of Operation Barbarossa, armed with its concordat with Hitler and aided by Our Lady of Fatima. (Chapters 24 & 25)

... AND THE CIA'S ROLE IS LEFT IN NO DOUBT

By the time the new Central Intelligence Agency Act was passed the anti-Communist paranoia in the United States had reached a new level and there was a tacit understanding in Congress that the principal purpose of CIA operations was surveillance of the Soviet Union, and that its activities would not be scrutinized too closely.¹⁴⁵ Every drop of propaganda value was squeezed from the anti-church program under way in Russia and this was said to justify the excommunication decree. The facts were the other way around. When the Soviet Union detonated its first nuclear device in August, the anti-Communist lobby had a field day. All the talk was about theft of secrets and spies (as if the US had none) and about how the Soviet Union was setting out to bomb the West into submission. No mention of all the deceit by Roosevelt, Truman and Churchill and their deliberate use of the disclosure of the bombs to be dropped on Japan in psychological warfare against the Soviets. No mention of the idea that they might want to improve their security and bolster their territorial buffer in view of the highly orchestrated anti-Communist campaign being waged by Western governments and industry in intimate association with the Vatican. That would be just too honest!

DEBACLE IN CHINA ... AND A FLOW ON

Then came the debacle in China. Since the occupation of Japan, United States aid to the Chinese Nationalists had amounted to almost $2 billion in cash plus $1 billion in military hardware, and 39 Nationalist army divisions had been trained and equipped. In spite of that, the regime of Chiang Kai-shek was collapsing. The onslaught of Mao Tse-tung's Communist forces was coupled with the people's hostility towards Chiang's tyranny, his wanton cruelty, and the extraordinary corruption and decadence of his entire bureaucratic and social system. It was in sharp contrast to the situation in the areas under Communist administration which were "models of honesty, progress and fairness." As a consequence entire divisions of the Generalissimo's forces defected to the Communists. American political and military leaders had no illusions about the nature and quality of Chiang's rule. According to General David Barr, head of the US Military Mission in China, the Nationalist forces were under "the world's worst leadership."¹⁴⁶

147

The first major successes by the Communist forces were in January 1949 when they took control of Tientsin and Peking while Acheson was pondering the NATO proposals. By June their armies had grown by defections from the Nationalists to 1.5 million men under arms while the Nationalists had fallen to 2.1 million. The State Department had to admit that the US had lost control of the situation a few weeks later, and on August 5 it announced the cessation of all aid to the Nationalists in a White Paper which concluded that "the ominous result of the civil war in China is beyond the control of the government of the United States." Cut off from their gravy train, the Nationalists began to flee, or to evacuate, to the island of Taiwan (Formosa) which they had been preparing for occupation for two years by terrorizing the Taiwanese into submission. It is estimated that in one massacre in 1947 up to 28,000 persons were slaughtered.¹⁴⁸ The continuing "two Chinas" problem was about to be born. Prior to the Nationalist Army's evacuation to Taiwan, the US Administration had accepted that the island was part of China, but with an international diplomatic crisis developing it began to have doubts. When it was suggested that perhaps it ought to be considered a separate country, Chiang Kai-shek objected, and the US agreed to his contention that "the proper way to view the situation was not that Taiwan belonged to China, but that Taiwan was China." That suited the US because it wanted Chiang to hold the China seat at the United Nations, not a Chinese Communist, and when the Chinese Communist Party officially proclaimed the establishment of the People's Republic of China at Peking on October 1, 1949, that was the way it remained.

Americans, according to Felix Greene, "simply could not bring themselves to believe that the Chinese, however rotten their leadership, could have preferred a communist government." It must have been the handiwork of a conspiracy, an international conspiracy, at the control panel of which sat, not unexpectedly, the Soviet Union.¹⁴⁹ They had been totally brain-washed with the idea of Chiang Kai-shek's Christian superiority. (Chapter 17) Why had the US been supporting it so vigorously at the outbreak of war and since, while MacArthur was doing such a fine job in Japan, if that were not the case? They could not accept the fact that up until that point the Soviet Union had been supporting the Nationalists, trying to force Mao Tse-tung to work with Chiang so that the nation would not be split, and that it was only on the proclamation of the People's Republic that Stalin recognized Mao and agreed to relinquish control of Port Arthur and return the Manchurian railway to Chinese control. The United States was not accustomed to being unable to get its own way, therefore, in the popular view, regardless of what the State Department said, the administration must have failed somewhere and it was expected to put the matter right. The US had to stay there and support Chiang Kai-shek to recover and return to China. It did not matter that the vast majority did not want him back. Senator Joseph McCarthy, who had not at that time developed notoriety for his anti-Communist witch hunts, led the charge, saying that the Truman administration was composed of "egg-sucking phony liberals" who protected the "Communists and queers" who had "sold China into atheistic slavery."¹⁵⁰

The tide had already begun to turn against both Chiang's Nationalists and the churches at the end of 1947 when the Communists were able to mount a sustained counter attack and cut Chiang's lines of communication, leaving his forces isolated in the cities, but Mao Tse-tung and Chou En-lai, decided they did not like Pius XII's decree of excommunication for Communists anymore than Stalin, and a campaign of harassment and the expulsion of missionaries began immediately the People's Republic was declared. In essence they simply annulled all of Chiang Kai-shek's political favouritism and support-buying exercises of the previous three years. (Chapter 27) Precise numbers of missionaries expelled are hard to determine because sources vary in the figures they use. While Stephen Neil reported that Protestant missionary numbers had recovered substantially to 4,062 at the date of proclamation,¹⁵¹ according to the Catholic Almanac 1997 "over 5,000 foreign missionaries, 510 of whom were American priests, brothers and nuns" were expelled. The difference would suggest that there were some hundreds more Protestant missionaries than the mission societies knew they had in the country. The Almanac also reports "the arrest, imprisonment and harassment of all members of the native religious, clergy and hierarchy; the forced closing of 3,032 schools, 216 hospitals, 781 dispensaries, 254 orphanages, 29 printing presses and 55 periodicals; denial of free exercise of religion to all of the faithful; the detention of hundreds of priests, religious and lay persons in jail and their employment in slave labour; the proscription of the Legion of Mary and other Catholic Action groups for 'counter-revolutionary activities' and 'crimes against the new China', complete outlawing of missionary work and pastoral activity."¹⁵² [Emphasis added.] What did the Vatican expect? That was exactly what the decree had required of them. But regardless of the circumstances, it gave the Vatican and Senator McCarthy even more ammunition.

Short of an all-out invasion of China with massive forces, there was little the US could do except support Chiang in attempted incursions and harass the struggling new People's Republic. It did so with relentless assaults against the Communist government, despite a request from Chou En-lai for aid and friendship, for which he saw no practical or ideological bar.¹⁵³ The American actions naturally had flow-on effects in other areas.

Not all of the Nationalist Chinese forces found their way to Taiwan. Many thousands took refuge in northern Burma, much to the displeasure of the Burmese government. After the British, American and Japanese intervention and manipulation of Burma during the war it reckoned enough was enough. It just wanted non-interference to enable it to get on with its affairs. However the CIA – the instrument of the new style of imperialism by courtesy of the United States – had other ideas. It began to regroup the stateless army into a part of the Chinese Nationalist fighting force, and during the early 1950s a number of both large and small scale incursions into China were carried out. In one incident in April 1951, a few thousand troops, accompanied by CIA advisers and supplied by air drops from American C46s and C47s, crossed into Yunnan province, only to be driven back by the Communists in less than a week with high casualties and the deaths of several CIA advisers. In another raid that summer the invaders succeeded in occupying a 100-mile strip of territory for some time and penetrated to a depth of 65 miles into China. The capabilities of the insurgent forces were built up by the CIA providing American engineers to help construct and expand airstrips in Burma; fresh troops were flown in from Taiwan; additional troops were recruited from Burmese hill tribes; CIA air squadrons provided logistical support and ferried enormous quantities of American heavy arms into Burma via Thailand. By then the army had been built up to 10,000 men, and Taiwan claimed that in 1952, from January to mid October, it killed, wounded or captured 44,000 Communist troops.¹⁵⁴

But it should have been apparent to any reasonable observer that, regardless of the immediate impact of such incursions, the Chinese People's Republic could not be defeated nor could the Nationalist Chinese return to claim government on the basis of such a campaign. The United States strategists had other considerations and they expected to be able to 'contain' any backlash in Burma. The People's Republic had become involved in two 'relief operations' on other sectors of its border and the US hoped that conflict on a third sector would provide a distraction and draw Chinese resources away from those sectors to the advantage of the United States. It depended on the perspective of the viewer what the incidents on those other sectors were. To the Asians involved, they were part of the continuing decolonization process. To the United States power brokers, they were the next phase in its campaign to succeed the European Colonial powers and both China and Japan as the key player in Asian affairs. This meant that for US domestic consumption, for all the Western Allies who were expected to support the US, and from the point of view of the European powers who were being eased out, those conflicts all had to be packaged as a part of the East West Cold War confrontation – or the sharp end of the Communist bid to take over the 'free world.' The 'Domino Theory' was dreamed up, and for a few years it worked. Those two other sectors on China's immense border were Korea and Vietnam.

The United States had embarked on exactly the same strategy as Britain during its run up to its Second World War defence-of-empire manoeuvres. It was trying to convince the world that each incident was separate and isolated, and that its interests were totally honourable and had nothing to do with self interest or with the trouble in the triangle. It was self-deception at its best. The United States appeared to be, and believed itself to be, in an unassailable position and still growing. So did Britain at the same stage of the cycle. The circumstances of Britain and the United States at the beginning of the cycle were remarkable for their relationship. At the time of its Balfour Declaration Britain saw its support for Jewish ambitions for a national home in Palestine as its grand step to even greater power. It believed that its power and authority and its role as Defender of the Faith at the pinnacle of Christendom was God-given by virtue of its exemplary Christian conduct and that it was destined for even greater things. Then, very promptly, and as a result of its own decisions, Britain found itself over stretched and under resourced. It had slipped past the peak of its power and influence without being conscious of it, and it was trying desperately to maintain its position as the pre-eminent world power by misrepresentation and by manipulating other countries and other people. We have traced it all: noting especially the major exercises in misrepresentation and manipulation, and the consequences for the world.

So: the United States was exactly the same. It was immensely powerful – frighteningly powerful – at the time that it picked up Britain’s cast off role as Zionism’s umbrella and pushed the steps necessary for the establishment of the State of Israel through the United Nations. Its power and authority was still rising, its grip on the resources of the Middle East was tightening, and it thought it had a long way to go before it would reach its peak, even though it was already sitting astride the pinnacle of world affairs. It was preparing for a long session on the throne. But it was, slightly reluctantly, having to relinquish its use of the epithet ‘The New Israel’ because it had just been instrumental in establishing the real new Israel. It had to adapt to the title of ‘leader of the Judeo-Christian world’ because it had become home to half of world Jewry, while it was at the same time the dominant component of the amorphous Christian gel.

At this point, within a year or two of the establishment of the State of Israel and the dramatic challenges to the self-understanding of both the church and the amorphous Christian gel which it so clearly demonstrated (but which had not been recognized), the United States was following the course which Allen Dulles had so clearly enunciated in the book which he wrote to justify the Marshall Plan to Republican-minded America. (Chapter 27, An obstacle to decolonization, new world shape) It was manipulating the economic, social, religious and political frameworks within which the world functioned in order to gain maximum advantage at the expense of the rest of the world in the manner of an imperial power, but without the need to ‘colonize’ and to rely on armies of occupation. It was, especially, manipulating the resource-rich countries which did not have the capacity or the need to exploit their resources for their own domestic industries, in the manner which Dulles had prescribed for the recovery of Europe.

It will need to pool its resources, reduce its cost of production, develop a large measure of free trade within the European area, reduce its population by emigration, and redouble its efforts to develop in those areas of the world where it still has overseas and colonial possessions, particularly Africa, new sources of raw materials, commodities, and wherever *possible, foodstuffs. The spirit of enterprise which built up the British Empire needs to be rekindled. There are still economic worlds open to peaceful conquest.*¹⁵⁵ [Emphasis added.]

It was also manipulating other countries to suit its perceived regional defence requirements (regardless of whether they were former allies or enemies) in a manner directly similar to Churchill's manipulation of the Soviet Union in the manner reviewed below. (Churchill's attitude: no basis for cooperation). Gradually, as more people understood what was happening, the term 'regional defence requirements' gave way to 'protecting US national interests' but the world was expected to accept that whatever was in the US national interest was also in their interests. In a disturbing and very negative sense that became the 'default' position, because a country soon found that it was to its disadvantage not to accept a proposal which was put "in the US national interest." Under Executive Order 12333 of December 4, 1981, the president may order any action which may be necessary to obtain the cooperation of another country.

*... the CIA shall: ... Conduct special activities approved by the President. No agency except the CIA (or the Armed Forces of the United States in time of war declared by Congress or during any period covered by a report from the President to Congress under the War Powers Resolution (89 Stat. 855) may conduct any special activity unless the President determines that another agency is more likely to achieve a particular objective;*¹⁵⁶

The interpretative note provided by the CIA's Public Affairs Office says:

*Only the president can direct the CIA to undertake a covert action. Such actions usually are recommended by the National Security Council (NSC). Covert actions are considered when the NSC judges that the US foreign policy objectives may not be fully realized by normal diplomatic means and when military action is deemed to be too extreme an option. Therefore, the Agency may be directed to conduct a special activity abroad in support of foreign policy where the role of the US Government is neither apparent nor publicly acknowledged. Once tasked, the Director of Central Intelligence must notify the intelligence oversight committees of Congress.*¹⁵⁷

In such circumstances the United States leadership could not conceive of a situation in which their own actions and policies, and the country's conflicts of interest would put them, like Britain, in a no-win situation. Thus, during the second half of the twentieth century the United States would pick up and drop friends at will; exploit their resources and become dependent on them; impose demeaning policies on them, and expect no one to notice, or at least to swallow their pride and their anger and make believe it had not happened as the NSC took full advantage of that presidential authority. And in 1949 and the years following, Burma was among the countries which had no option but to accept the dictates of the United States and the infant People's Republic of China was placed under enormous strain and a test of whether it had the will to stick to the path it had mapped out for its own economic and social development. The United States was attempting to do in China what it had attempted, together with Britain, France and some other powers, in Russia at the end of the First World War: overthrow a legitimate government born out of revolution against one of decadence and corruption. Its motive was the same: to prevent a growing challenge to its preferred economic, political and social model. And its stated justification was the same: to replace an atheistic system which had been condemned by the church with one system which had the blessing of the church and therefore must have been divinely sanctified. There was another system which the church had preferred but which was temporarily out of favor – at least in some circumstances: Fascism. The United States was already trying to impose another regime of that ilk just across one of the other sectors of China's border, in Korea, against the wishes of its people. But first, a brief look back at Burma.

William Blum describes the situation very succinctly.

In between raids on China, the "Chinats" (as distinguished from the "Chicomcs") found time to clash frequently with Burmese troops, indulge in banditry, and become the opium barons of The Golden Triangle, that slice of land encompassing parts of Burma, Laos and Thailand which was the world's largest source of opium and heroin. CIA pilots flew the stuff all over, to secure the cooperation of those in Thailand who were important to the military operation, as a favour to their Nationalist clients, perhaps even for the money, and, ironically, to serve as cover for their more illicit activities.

The Chinats in Burma kept up their harassment of the Chicoms until 1961 and the CIA continued to supply them militarily, but at some point the agency began to phase itself out of a more direct involvement. When the CIA, in response to repeated protests by the Burmese Government to the United States and the United Nations, put pressure on the Chinats to leave Burma, Chiang responded by threatening to expose the Agency's covert support of his troops there. At an early stage, the CIA had entertained the hope that the Chinese would be provoked into attacking Burma, thereby forcing the strictly neutral Burmese to seek salvation in the Western camp.¹⁵⁸ In January 1961, the Chinese did just that, but as part of a combined force with the Burmese to overwhelm the Nationalists' main base and mark finis to their Burmese adventure. Burma subsequently renounced American aid and moved closer to Peking.¹⁵⁹ For many of the Chinats, unemployment was short-lived. They soon signed up with the CIA again; this time to fight with the Agency's grand army in Laos.¹⁶⁰

They did not have long to wait, because US interest in Indochina had become more substantial immediately the People's Republic of China was proclaimed on October 1, 1949. Up to that point the American administration had still wanted France to vacate its Asian colonies and permit indigenous independence. How else could there be a great-power vacuum for the US to fill? The French General Jean Leclerc had gained no kudos when he said in September 1945: "I didn't come back to Indochina to give Indochina back to the Indochinese."¹⁶¹ But at that time the US did not know who it wanted to support because the logical leader, Ho Chi Minh, who had worked closely with the OSS during the Second World War while the French Vichy authorities had collaborated with Japan, was tainted with Communism. The US would not acknowledge that he was a "genuine nationalist," treated him as a tool of international Communism. They refused to even acknowledge his letters of request for economic assistance so that he had no option but to turn to the Soviet Union for aid, and the US was stuck with the French until someone more compliant came along. When the Communists gained control in China that prospect receded somewhat and became enmeshed in America's other interests as well. The French had signed the NATO treaty but they did not want US troops stationed on their soil and they did not want Germany admitted to the alliance, but they did want a rapprochement with Ho Chi Minh. There was the link.

Mao Tse-tung was eager to consolidate the position of the PRC government, to begin a crash program of regional reconstruction, rehabilitation, the restoration of law and order, and the reduction of inflation which was rampant in the wake of both the war with Japan and the post Second World War civil war. In view of America's support for Chiang Kai-shek and its refusal to extend assistance to his regime, Mao sought aid from the Soviet Union. In mid-December he travelled to Moscow for an extended visit to negotiate a Treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance.

On January 12, 1950, while Mao was in Moscow, Acheson outlined his Asian policy in relation to US defence needs in an address to the Press Club in Washington. He included Japan, Okinawa and the Philippines within the American line of defence, but, although it was known that the State Department considered South Korea to be vital to the security of its interests in Japan, he excluded both Taiwan and Korea from that defence line. [The distinction between US interests in Japan and Japanese interests is important because, without the situation which the US had brought about, Japan was quite capable of looking after itself.] There was some lively debate about the reason for those exclusions at the time, but it is reasonable to conclude that Acheson was sending the message to both Chiang Kai-shek and Syngman Rhee that the United States did not intend to garrison either Taiwan or South Korea and that Chiang should not attempt to invade China, while Rhee should not make an attempt to invade North Korea. If that was his aim, it had little effect on either Chiang or Rhee and it was being offset by other pressures from Washington.

There were plenty of hawks who were eager to see both Rhee and Chiang have a go, and on February 5 Senator Joseph McCarthy raised the stakes enormously by claiming that there were 205 Communists or neo-Communists in the State Department. To what extent McCarthy was playing domestic politics after the shock defeat of the Republican presidential candidate, Dewey, and to what extent he was responding to the Vatican decree of excommunication which had triggered such a dramatic international backlash, especially in China, is not at all clear – the two factors were intimately intertwined anyway – but the consequences for the whole world of the four-year era of McCarthyism which he triggered are impossible to quantify. Politicians who were so inclined anywhere in the western world, and investors and employers who wanted to exploit anything, any country or anyone at all, took full advantage of the opportunity to label and denigrate as 'commos' all opposition, and those who sought to restrain exploitation. The witch hunt knew few bounds and the Cold War soon spilled over into any country with which the Soviet Union wanted to trade or in which it wanted to establish a defence base.

On February 14, only nine days after McCarthy's address and four and a half months after the proclamation of the People's Republic of China, the Sino-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance was signed. It provided for $300 million in credit for reconstruction and military aid. Soviet educational and propaganda material immediately began to flow in to replace the American materials which had previously been supplied to the Nationalist government, and the reorganization of the Chinese army along Soviet lines and with Soviet-built equipment began. If that program was allowed to continue unhindered, the loss of US influence, prestige, access to resources and trade opportunities would flow on throughout Asia. It had to be stopped! It immediately became an article of faith within the State Department that a wedge had to be driven between China and the Soviet Union. It did not matter how. It just had to be done, and the end would justify the means.

France suddenly became the power of choice in Indochina! About two months later, in April, Secretary of State Acheson told French officials that the US was set against France negotiating with the Vietminh in North Vietnam. But at the same time the US wanted France to support its plan to include Germany in the West European defence organization. Over the next few months large scale shipments of tanks, transport planes and other military equipment were made to the French in Vietnam. The scene was set for future confrontations which the US did not anticipate. Two years later when the French scheduled a meeting with Vietminh negotiators in Burma, the US forced them to recall their delegation.¹⁶² Thereafter, if the French were to be confronted by the Vietminh, the US had no option but to support them. By that time the Korean War had become a major disaster for the United States, for the people of Korea, and for everyone everywhere who fondly believed that the accelerated technical developments which had resulted from the Second World War were to be used for humanitarian purposes. In due course it would be Vietnam's turn and it would be an even greater disaster.

KOREAN INTERLUDE

The prevailing Western understanding of the Korean War as a simple case of the Communist North invading the democratic South with the aid of China and Russia has been exposed as the myth that it is by the progressive release of documents in recent years. It is no different to the myths which still surround Pearl Harbour in the American self-understanding but which, together with the British and American manipulation to bring Japan into the war, have also been discredited by the progressive release or disclosure of documents over the years. But myths die hard and many people in the Western world – especially the United States and Australia – continue to demand an apology from Japan for its role in the Second World War when Japan is more realistically entitled to an apology from the West, and many of the same people continue to deny an apology to the indigenous people of their own countries for the conduct of their predecessors. A brief review of the circumstances leading up to the Korean War, and its conduct, is therefore helpful.

The Peninsula of Korea which appears, on a map, to hang like an appendage below Manchuria to separate the Seas of Japan and East China at the point where the Chinese and Russian Federation frontiers meet, had been ruled by the Yi dynasty continuously for 518 years, although as a vassal state of China for the second half of that period, until Japan conquered it in 1904 and it became a vassal of Japan. Six years later, in the manner of the European powers further south, or the United States in the Philippines, Japan simply annexed the peninsula and converted it from a vassal state to a colony, exploiting it for its resources and food supplies in the usual colonial manner. The struggle by Koreans for independence from Japan bears many similarities to the struggle for independence from the United States by the Filipinos during the same period. In the wake of the First World War 33 prominent Koreans prepared a proclamation of independence and read it at a mass rally of an estimated two million people in Seoul on March 1, 1919. Massive demonstrations, some involving waves of students, were also held in a number of other centres.

The Japanese quickly suppressed the 'March 11st Movement' with much the same 'gentleness' that the British colonial authorities suppressed the Eureka Stockade uprising in Australia 65 years earlier,¹⁶³ or the Burmese, during the period between. (Chapter 27, The British South East Asian saga) They arrested some 47,000 Koreans, of whom about 10,500 were indicted, while some 7,500 were killed and 16,000 wounded. Some of the leaders of the movement fled to China and set up a Korean Provisional Government (KPG) in Shanghai. They subsequently moved to Manchuria and established a base for all of the Korean resistance groups, bringing together all Korean exiles and establishing an efficient liaison with leaders inside Korea. It published a newspaper and sent delegations to Europe and the United States to plead their cause. They received little support outside of China because Japan had been an ally in the war just concluded, but Japan realized that its iron rule required more sophisticated methods. The gendarmerie gave way to an ordinary constabulary force, and partial freedom of the press was granted.

Taking advantage of the First World War business boom, Japan took leaps forward as a capitalist country and Korea became not only a market for Japanese goods but also a fertile region for capital investment. However its industrial development was achieved at the cost of agricultural production, and this led to a chronic shortage of rice, and its colonial policy followed much the same lines as the European powers in South East Asia. (Chapter 27, Colonial policy: philosophy or perfidy?) Rice production projects were established throughout Korea and many peasants were ordered to turn their dry fields into paddies. The program was temporarily suspended during the Depression years, but it was soon resumed in order to meet the increased needs of the Japanese military machine in its war against China, which began in 1931. Then, like all good colonial subjects, the Koreans were expected to supply the bread basket and they were therefore often forced to rely on low-quality cereals grown in Manchuria instead of their home grown rice which went to the army.

ENTER RIGHT ... SYNGMAN RHEE

One of the Provisional Government leaders was 44-year old Syngman Rhee. Born 25 years before the Japanese victory, Rhee had been raised in classical Confucian tradition, then educated at a Methodist school where he adopted Christianity, been imprisoned by the Chinese for establishing an Independence Club, became the first Korean to gain a doctorate at an American university (Princeton, in 1910), then worked in a Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) before becoming a high school principal. With such credentials he was elected president of the Provisional Government in Exile and he was the logical person to lobby the United States for help, but he stayed there. This meant that when Shanghai fell to the Japanese and the KPG had to move to the safety of Chungking in south-central China, Rhee was not there to provide leadership. As a result, in 1939, then aged 64, although he was retained as nominal president he was replaced as leader by one of the younger Koreans, Premier Yi Tong-hwi, who had stayed with other members of the Provisional Government in China. Rhee continued as their lobbyist in the US. Those in China were in intimate contact with each of the Chinese Nationalists, the Chinese Communists and the Soviet Union.

When Japan, a signatory to the Tripartite Pact, entered the world war in 1941 the KPG declared war against it, organized the Korean Restoration Army, recruited expatriate Korean independence fighters, and fought with the Allied forces in China until the Japanese surrender in August 1945. The KPG's key contacts were between Yi Tong-hwi and the Soviets from whom he sought military aid for revolutionary operations in Manchuria, and between Kim Ku and Chiang Kai-shek's Chinese Nationalists. Japan required its colonial subjects to be fully involved in that war, just like those of the European powers, and hundreds of thousands of men were drafted into Korean units of the Japanese Army and to work on military bases, munitions factories and mines. Thousands of Korean women were also drafted to accompany the Japanese armies in the notorious role of 'Comfort Women.' (Chapters 25 & 27) In the circumstances the KPG was as well placed as it could be to move straight into Korea and establish an indigenous civil government as soon as the war ended but, like the Polish Government in Exile in Britain, it was to find that the best laid plans can come unstuck.

In the Cairo Declaration, Dec. 1, 1943, the United States, Britain and China, pledged independence for Korea "in due course" and the vagueness of that declaration concerned them. They requested an interpretation from the US but received no answer. Later, at Yalta in February 1945, Roosevelt proposed to Stalin that Korea should be governed under a four-power joint trusteeship involving the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union and China. Stalin agreed in principle, but no formal agreement was reached. Then at Potsdam in July, when US military leaders insisted on encouraging Soviet entry into the war against Japan, the Soviet military leaders asked their US counterparts about the circumstances for an invasion of Korea, with which the Soviet Union shares a 30 mile common border. The Americans replied that such an expedition would not be practicable for them until after a successful landing had taken place on the Japanese mainland, and the Potsdam Declaration was then drafted to include the statement that "the terms of the Cairo Declaration ... shall be carried out." The assumption from that is that the Soviet Union was free to occupy Korea with no reservations.

ENTER CENTRE STAGE ... THE SOVIET UNION

On August 8 the Soviet Union formally agreed to enter the war against Japan, issued a declaration of war, and pledged its support for the independence of Korea. Its forces went into action on several fronts the following day, with some units landing directly in Korea at its northern tip adjacent to their own border. At the same time that they struck westward into Manchuria along their long north-south border, moved south along the Manchurian Railway near the Mongolian border, and at the same time used part of their Pacific coast forces to occupy Japan's Kurile Islands and to recover the island of Sakhalin. Stalin's aim was a speedy occupation of Manchuria by utilizing the Manchuria railway to the Yellow Sea at Port Arthur via Mukden, at which there is a major junction which would enable the Soviet forces to drive towards Pyongyang and Seoul by the most direct route, at the same time that they moved south along Korea's coastal wedge.

On August 11, the US military command, being the power which was to be primarily responsible for the Japanese surrender, issued General Order No. 1, for the terms of surrender for the Japanese forces operating in Korea. It provided for Japanese forces north of latitude 38 N (the 38th parallel) to surrender to the Soviets and for those south of that line to surrender to the Americans. That aspect of the occupation had not previously been discussed, the order made no sense at all in terms of a military strategy, and Stalin was quite entitled to ask: "Why do you want to do it that way? We are already well established in the north. We can occupy the whole country very easily. If all you want is the surrender and disarming of the Japanese forces and the liberation of the Koreans we can accomplish it very quickly." However Stalin did not ask the question. He raised no objection to the American's sharing the kudos of the relief and decolonization of Korea, and the Soviet forces did not attempt to move further south even they had ample opportunity to do so. No American forces landed in Korea until September 8. In view of the fact that the US military leadership had insisted that the Soviet Union enter the war against Japan and had openly said that they could not attempt an invasion of Korea, this order indicates very clearly their political masters were more concerned with getting a foothold in Korea than with the prompt relief and decolonization of the country.

In their drive south through Manchuria the Soviet forces had made very rapid progress and had reached Mukden, only 120 miles from the southern end of the Manchuria-Korea border, by August 14 when the Soviet Union signed a treaty of Friendship with Nationalist China – the country which laid claim to the entirety of Manchuria. The Japanese surrender was announced the following day and Soviet forces, having driven south from their own international border some days earlier, were in a position to accept their surrender immediately. Naturally the members of the Korean Provisional Government in Exile in China were ready and eager to return to Korea. However they had to wait until the country had been effectively occupied and they could go in with, or were invited to go in by, the Soviet and US authorities, but some of the local independence movement leaders were eager to get going straight away. On August 16, a broadly based Committee for the Preparation of Korean Independence (CPKI), with links to the Provisional Government in Exile, was organized with Woon-hyung Lyuh as leader. Their base was in the south, but they naturally claimed to speak for the whole country.

In the North, although the Soviet authorities did not recognize that committee, they did not attempt to impose a military government, and they moved to establish an indigenous civilian administration, predominantly Communist, immediately. On August 25, the People's Executive Committee of South Hamgyong Province was set up by the South Hamgyong province Communist Council with some other nationals plus trained expatriate Korean Communists who had accompanied the Soviet forces, many of whom were placed in key administrative roles. That council was formally recognized by the Soviet military authorities and provided the pattern for councils in all five northern provinces. There were still no Americans in sight and the Japanese were left unmolested in the south.

In the south the CPKI undertook food distribution, elementary law and order or policing services, and other local administration, and proclaimed the Korean People's Republic on September 6. But when American troops finally landed in southern Korea on September 8 and received the Japanese surrender in Seoul next day, General Hodge not only refused to recognize it: he dismissed its offer of services for the arriving Americans out of hand and suppressed it, setting up a US military government, the USAMGIK, in its place. Rhee was then flown to Korea from the United States in one of MacArthur's planes to work alongside the army before other members of the Provisional Government in Exile, waiting in China, were allowed in. Rhee was to be America's client – and compliant – puppet leader to ensure that the reconstruction of Korea followed the same lines that MacArthur was pursuing in Japan. When the other KPG members arrived they were told there was no role for them. If they wished they could go off and establish a political party to work towards participation in government through 'normal channels.' The Provisional Government thereupon broke up and its members set about organizing other political movements. Rhee would soon prove to be neither a puppet nor compliant, except in the sense that he supported and was steeped in the economic concepts of the US, was an excellent conduit for US business and investment contacts, and had excellent Protestant Christian credentials as well.

ENTER LEFT ... KIM IL-SUNG

In the North, the Communist authorities then formally introduced an expatriate Korean, Major Kim Il-sung, on his return to the country on October 14 as something of a national hero, and his election as First Secretary of the North Korean Central Bureau of the Communist Party soon followed. This was followed by the establishment of a Bureau of the five provinces to coordinate their administration. Kim had been among those who went to Manchuria and joined the Korean resistance groups in the 1930s. Noticed by the Russians for his leadership potential, he was invited to the Soviet Union for training, rose to the rank of major, and commanded a Korean contingent of the Soviet Army during the Second World War.

By this time, although it had not been the Allies intention, there were two clearly defined zones with neither side wishing to surrender its position in favour of the other. However the Soviet Union cannot be held solely responsible for that state of affairs. Asia was being treated to the same competitive divisions as Europe whether the people wanted it or not. When the Council of Foreign Ministers of the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union met in December they recognized this and resolved to set up a four-power trusteeship which would govern for five years. The fourth power was to be China. When that plan was announced there were widespread objections. Koreans wanted independence: not to be governed under a trusteeship for five years. They had had their Provisional Government waiting in Exile for years and they generally wanted that as the basis for their independence. As a compromise the United Nations set up a joint US/USSR Commission to run the country. This posed more difficulties because of their seemingly irreconcilable approaches to economic and political organization and the stalemate was confirmed. Instead of a form of national unity under trusteeship the people of Korea found themselves divided for the long term.

In February 1946, in a bid to smooth the discontent, General Hodge set up a Representative Democratic Council under Syngman Rhee, but its role was purely advisory. It could only make recommendations to the military government. On the other side of the demarcation line, the Communists promptly consolidated indigenous civilian rule by replacing their bureau and five provincial councils with a Provisional People's Committee for North Korea which had more statutory and executive authority than its predecessor. A few weeks later, when the Joint USA/USSR Commission convened, the Soviet Union said it was still prepared to have a four power trusteeship, provided that persons who had previously refused to accept the concept were excluded from it. Syngman Rhee was one of them, so the US rejected the proposal. Two months later, in May, the Joint Commission convened again but could make no progress, then in September the US proposed to the United Nations that unification be achieved by free elections instead of a trusteeship. This time it was the Soviet Union's turn to say no. A few weeks later, in October 1946, Hodge set up an Interim Legislative Assembly with half of its members elected and half appointed by the military government – in collaboration with Rhee. It had, for the first time, some statutory authority. It could enact ordinances on domestic affairs but they were subject to veto by the military government. In February, 1947, that assembly condemned the Council of Ministers' five year trusteeship proposal.

The competitive step-by-step approach of the Americans and the Russians was becoming another spiral as they each sought to consolidate their particular administration and as a result, on their respective sides of the demarcation line, Syngman Rhee and Kim Il-sung were both consolidating their power as well. In the North, at that time, the Soviet authorities took their next step and replaced the Provisional People's Committee with a legislative body, the Supreme People's Assembly, and in November the assembly set up a committee to draft a national constitution. By this time the manoeuvring in Europe over the Marshall plan, the establishment of NATO and the division of Europe into blocs was spilling over into Korea, and in the North the Supreme People's Assembly adopted a national constitution in April 1948. In the South elections were held a month later for the assembly, Rhee was elected as speaker, and in June the assembly also adopted a constitution.

A CHANGE IN BACKDROP ...

Then the troubles in Europe came to a head with the merging of the Western Zones of Germany and the imposition of the Soviet blockade of Berlin in retaliation on June 24. Any hope of the prompt unification of Korea was dead. Stone dead. In the South, Rhee was elected president under the newly adopted constitution on July 20, the Republic of Korea was inaugurated on August 15, and Rhee immediately assumed dictatorial powers and set about suppressing all domestic opposition. Rhee purged the National Assembly and outlawed the opposition Progressive Party which included some of his former colleagues in the Provisional Government in Exile which was to have been the springboard to an independent Korea, and executed its leader for treason. He controlled all significant appointments, including mayors, village headmen, and chiefs of police. In the North a one-party national election was held ten days later, on August 25, and the constitution of the People's Democratic Republic of Korea was ratified on September 3.

The demarcation line for the purposes of "Allies" receiving the surrender of a common enemy, Japan, in a single country was now formally an international border. To the north there was a Communist regime, to the south, a Fascist dictatorship, and neither of the national leaders wanted to recognize it. They were both intent on re-unifying the divided country under their preferred system. The first serious border clash occurred in October 1949, shortly after the Chinese Nationalist leadership fled to Taiwan and the People's Republic of China was proclaimed on October 1, and thereafter they continued sporadically, sometimes involving thousands of troops and deep territorial penetration. North Korea claimed that by the end of 1949 there had been 2,617 armed incursions into the North to carry out murder, kidnapping, pillage and arson in order to cause social disorder and unrest, and to increase the combat capabilities of the invaders. Stalin was trying to restrain Kim Il-sung and Acheson was trying to restrain Rhee. At the same time Acheson was trying to camouflage the loss of US influence in Chinese affairs which followed the evacuation of Chiang Kai-shek, and reduce the level of anti-Communist paranoia in the US, but the State Department was responding to it. It entered into a secret agreement with the UN Secretary General, Trygve Lie, to dismiss from UN employment any persons whom the Washington administration regarded as having questionable political leanings.¹⁶⁴ So much for the independence of the United Nations.

Coinciding with those moves, Mao Tse-tung made his approach to Stalin for aid to consolidate the position of the PRC government, to begin a crash program of reconstruction, rehabilitation, restoration of law and order, and reduction of inflation which was rampant in the wake of both the war with Japan and the civil war which followed. Mao travelled to Moscow for an extended visit in mid-December to negotiate a Treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance.

Then, on January 12, 1950, Acheson made his address to the Press Club in Washington, outlining his Asian policy in relation to US defence needs. It was known that the State Department considered South Korea to be vital to the security of its interests in Japan and, as noted above, he included Japan, Okinawa and the Philippines within the American line of defence, but he excluded Korea. Less than a month later, just as the expulsion of Christian missionaries from Communist China was providing media headlines, it was Senator Joseph McCarthy's turn to cause controversy when he raised the political temperature enormously, claiming that there were 205 Communists or neo-Communists in the State Department. And only nine days after McCarthy's announcement, on February 14, the Sino-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance was signed. (See above)

Over the next four months there was no let up in the frequency and violence of border incidents in Korea, regardless of the efforts by the two occupying powers to stop them. On April 13, in a radio address, US Ambassador-at-large Philip C. Jessop said: "There is constant fighting between the South Korean Army and bands that infiltrate the country from the North. There are very real battles, involving perhaps one or two thousand men. When you go to this boundary, as I did ... you see troop movements, fortifications, and prisoners of war."¹⁶⁵⁸ The extent of disquiet in South Korea over the management – or mismanagement – of relations with North Korea and over domestic matters as well became apparent six weeks later when elections were held for the national assembly. Rhee's party suffered a severe set back and lost control of the assembly. While the result did not directly affect his position, and he continued in the same ruthless manner as before, it reflected a dramatic loss of confidence in his performance and meant that he was eager to grasp any opportunity to recover his lost standing. He was soon to have one dropped in his lap.

... A VISIT BY A FRIEND

A fortnight after the South Korean national assembly elections John Foster Dulles visited Syngman Rhee for four days. It was one of his first assignments after returning to the State Department. Prior to his election to the Senate, Dulles had also had the status of Ambassador-at-large and since his failure to gain re-election to the Senate in 1949, which was almost as big a shock as Dewy's loss in the 'unlosable' election of November 1948, he had pined to return to a position of influence in international affairs. However he had played such a major role in the Republican campaign against Truman, giving him "a pretty nasty roughing up" with tactics which "made it plain how much he despised his President, loathed his Secretary of State, and held all their policies in contempt" that it took a rather humbling lot of lobbying to prise an appointment out of the White House. He began the process shortly after his failed election bid by getting a Washington correspondent for the Philadelphia Bulletin, Carl McCardle, to phone an officer of the State Department to intercede on his behalf, but it was about five months before he had persuaded his many opponents that he should be appointed. Even then, in April 1950, Truman's primary consideration was domestic politics.

The international situation was very volatile and it was difficult to get domestic support for major decisions while McCarthy was on the rampage with his anti-commo crusade and the State Department was under siege. He had a better chance of gaining consensus on major issues if he had someone with a proven track record from the Republican persuasion in the State Department team. Dulles certainly had such a record. In 1946, when it became apparent that a peace treaty with Japan which was acceptable to the United States could not be concluded with the participation of the Soviet Union, Truman and Acheson decided not to call a peace conference to negotiate the treaty. Instead, they gave Dulles the difficult task of personally negotiating and concluding the treaty. He had travelled to the capitals of many of the nations involved, and it appeared that a treaty could soon be signed. Truman and Acheson did not necessarily want Dulles to take over the completion of that task, but his presence could have a very productive influence on the opposition.¹⁶⁶ Even so, Truman put two conditions on the appointment: that he make peace with the New York Senator whom he had opposed, (he agreed not to stand at the next New York Senate election), and that his post be that of ‘consultant’ rather than ambassador-at-large.¹⁶⁷

This immediate assignment was to be “an exploratory tour of the Far East” and Dulles left Washington on June 14 with his wife and one staff assistant, John Allison. The Dulles family biographer describes the situation in these terms.

He made the journey to Japan by way of South Korea, for he wished to see and talk with President Syngman Rhee. Rhee, a fellow member of the World Council of Churches,¹⁶⁸ was an old friend, and Foster Dulles had always seen qualities in this sly, ruthless Oriental dictator which had escaped other Occidental observers. Syngman Rhee and Chiang Kai-shek were, for him, Christian gentlemen of a very high order. Ambassador George V. Allen, at dinner with Foster Dulles, once ventured to criticize both of them for preventing free elections among their peoples, describing them as “not exactly paragons of the democratic process.”

Foster leaned forward in his chair, his eyes blinking, and said:

“Well, I’ll tell you this. No matter what you say about the president of Korea and the president of Nationalist China, those two gentlemen are the equivalent of the founders of the Church. They are Christian gentlemen who have suffered for their faith. They have been steadfast and have upheld the faith in a manner that puts them in the category of the leaders of the early church.”

Allen added that Dulles spoke as if he had “his own line to God,” and that “he was getting his instructions from a very high source.”

Foster Dulles spent four days with Rhee in South Korea and made several speeches and one full-scale address in the South Korean Parliament. President Rhee had expressed fears that war was coming between his country and his North Korean neighbors, and that when it came, America would not be willing to help. He complained that Dean Acheson had already threatened to cut off aid unless he allowed free elections – which he was not about to do.

Foster Dulles took it upon himself to reassure him. In his speech to the Korean Parliament on June 19 [a speech that had not been cleared by Washington and which the State Department may not have even known he planned to make until after it was delivered], he declared:

*“The American people welcome you as an equal partner in the great company of those who make up the free world, a world which commands vast moral and material power, and whose resolution is unswerving ... I say to you: You are not alone. You will never be alone so long as you continue to play worthily your part in the great design of human freedom.”*¹⁶⁹

That was quite a remarkable performance which illustrates the concept of the amorphous Christian gel to perfection. The US has made much propaganda use of Russia’s rejection of the proposal for “free elections” to determine the future of Korea, yet they knew at that time that the Fascist strongman whom they had placed in power at the expense of a widely supported Provisional Government had absolutely no intention of allowing free elections in the South. Dulles had unscrupulously exploited his personal connections with the World Council of Churches to suit his own political ends (chapter 28) and he portrayed a perception that any action was justifiable as long as it was cloaked in a mantel of “Christianity.” On another occasion when he was consulted on proposals to “ease Japan from her status as a defeated enemy into a potential member of the family of free nations, ‘neutral on our side’ ... (because) the United States badly needed Japan as a military base” he said that Japan could be forgiven for the Bataan Death March on the basis that “Jesus teaches us that nothing is unforgivable.” Perhaps that is why he did not criticize the massacre of up to 28,000 Taiwanese by the Nationalists under his equally Christian friend Chiang Kai-shek. Perhaps he knew that the US Military Court in the Philippines had hung Yamashita in very questionable circumstances for a series of small scale massacres by troops, many of who he was not even commanding at the time of their offences. (Chapter 27) And, as if he was trying his hardest to illustrate the parody of Mein Kampf, he firmly opposed a decision to admit Communist China (with one fifth of the human population) to UN membership in a simple move which might have brought peace and avoided war and death and destruction on many fronts, and on a massive scale, on the grounds that: “It would confuse the American people, it would dismay the Chinese Nationalists under Chiang Kai-shek, and it would weaken the President’s program to strengthen American military defences.” [Emphasis added.]

... AND THE ACTION BEGINS

Six days after Dulles’ speech to the South Korean Assembly the two Koreas were at war. Conventional Western history says that North Korea launched an unprovoked large scale attack on South Korea on the morning of June 25, but there were no United Nations Observers on site at the time. They had completed their tour of duty of June 23, and their subsequent report was prepared from South Korean Government and US military sources, and hearsay. There were conflicting reports circulating until the ‘official’ line was pressed hard by Washington officials, and the facts are certainly not clear cut. The New York Herald Tribune reported on June 26 that:

“South Korean troops drove across the 38th Parallel, which forms the frontier, to capture the manufacturing town of Haeju, just north of the line. The Republican troops captured quantities of equipment.” London papers carried similar reports, except that some referred to the Southern forces having made a successful “relieving counter-attack.”¹⁷⁰

On the morning of the 25th, American writer John Gunther who was in Japan working on a biography of MacArthur, was playing tourist in the town of Nikko with “two important members” of the American Occupation. One of them was called unexpectedly to the telephone and when he returned he whispered: “A big story has just broken. The South Koreans have attacked North Korea!” That evening, on arrival back in Tokyo, they were met by several officers who advised them of a ‘corrected’ report. “... there was no doubt whatever that North Korea was the aggressor.” The North Korean version of events is that their invasion was provoked by two days of bombardment by the South Koreans, on the 23rd and 24th, followed by a surprise South Korean attack across the border on the 25th against the western town of Haeju and other places. In any case it was a continuation of lower level two-way border incursions which had been more or less continuous for eight months, and Rhee was very pleased indeed to know that he was assured of United States support by his close friend Dulles. On the morning after the war began, the New York Times noted that: “on a number of occasions, Dr Rhee has indicated that his army would have taken the offensive if Washington had given the consent,” and that before the war began “The warlike talk strangely [had] almost all come from the South Korean leaders.”¹⁷¹

On the morning of the invasion Dulles was also playing tourist in Japan, in Kyoto. On being advised of the situation he rushed back to Tokyo and, with Allison’s help, wrote an urgent cable to Acheson recommending that if the South Koreans could not hold the attack, “we believe that United States force should be used,” because not to do so “would start a disastrous chain of events leading most probably to world war.” Acheson and Truman were convinced. The president decided to show the Communists that armed invasion and the conquering of independent nations would be resisted by the democracies. Having got MacArthur’s “wholehearted support” – he would have expected nothing else – Truman ordered in the troops. Congress had not declared war, nor been consulted. He then decided to make it a United Nations operation to sanctify it. He summoned an emergency meeting of the Security Council and on June 26, Washington time, took advantage of the absence of the Soviet Union to stage-manage a vote condemning North Korea’s “unprovoked aggression.” The reason for the Soviet Union’s absence was its declared boycott because of the UN’s continued refusal, under US pressure, to seat the People’s Republic of China in place of the evacuated Nationalists. The Egyptian delegate sought to have the war regarded as civil war between peoples in a country which the United Nations was still trying to unify, and to have the word ‘unprovoked’ withdrawn from the resolution. However each of the other Security Council members, being heavily dependent upon US assistance themselves, were not prepared to confront the United States, and acquiesced in the words proposed.

IT'S LEGITIMATE, OF COURSE!

Next day the Security Council, with great reluctance and with minimal and carefully selected information to work on, was persuaded to go further. It recommended that member nations give South Korea additional assistance – the US Navy and Air Force had already been ordered into combat – “as may be necessary to repel the armed attack.” Ten days later, when it was apparent that if other countries were going to enter the war as well there would have to be a unified command, it was not declared to be a United Nations command. A resolution sponsored by Britain and France recommended “that all members providing military forces and other assistance ... make such forces and other assistance available to a unified command under the United States (and that) the United States ... designate the commander of such forces.” Truman designated MacArthur who then had two separate commands, continuing as Supreme Commander of the Japanese occupation as well. The forces were responsible to MacArthur, but Mac Arthur was not responsible to, or subject to direction by, either the United Nations or to the member countries which provided forces.¹⁷² The conflicts of interest were immediate and substantial.

It was important that if the action was to be seen as legitimate, and for the United States to sustain its self-understanding as the bulwark of freedom, other nations had to be involved. Those who believed that they were dependent on the United States for their own security or stability, and the Soviet Union and its satellites, and key United States leaders were well aware of that, even if it could be concealed from the world at large. General Eisenhower, later president, touched on the issue years later when he was writing his memoirs. He referred to the need to gather a ‘coalition’ of countries when he was considering US intervention in Vietnam in 1954, because the burden of the operation would fall on the United States and “the token forces supplied by these other nations, as in Korea, would lend real moral standing to a venture that otherwise could be made to appear as a brutal example of imperialism.”¹⁷³ [Emphasis added.] That is exactly what it was.

Immediately following John Foster Dulles’ unauthorized intervention in Korea, George Kennan, director of the State Department Policy Planning Staff, recommended that the US should support Communist China’s admission to the United Nations because the proposal for its admission was strongly supported by the Asian nations and, somewhat reluctantly, by the European nations, and Acheson saw no reason why the US should go against such majority feeling. However at a meeting of the NSC consultative group on July 25, 1950, Dulles firmly pushed the view quoted, and Acheson eventually decided that there would be no change in the American attitude and any attempt to let the Chinese Communists into the United Nations would be vetoed. Mosley says: “Kennan noted the glint of triumph in Foster’s eyes.” In similar vein Kennan had drawn attention to the need to make it clear that the action had to stop as soon as the South Korean territory had been recovered to the 38th parallel, pointing out the dangers of Chinese intervention if American forces pursued the North Koreans up the peninsula towards Chinese territory. Dulles ridiculed the idea, saying that the North Koreans should be shown that invasion doesn't pay.¹⁷⁴

So the war was to go on. In September Truman acted on Dulles' advice, not Kennan's, and gave MacArthur approval to land north of the battle line. He did so on September 15 at Inch'on, on the western coast adjacent to Seoul, and in what has been described as a "brilliant amphibious landing" he cut the North Korean forces and their supply lines, and captured 125,000 prisoners. On the 27th the US Joint Chiefs of Staff instructed MacArthur to destroy the North Korean forces and two days later Truman authorized an advance into North Korea. The United States, without pausing to consider what it was doing, was riding Churchill's Second World War treadmill. Escalation had to follow escalation. Then there was a consequential change in the pattern of flow-on effects. The Far East impinged directly on Europe instead of the other way around. Acheson agreed that US troops would have to be made available to NATO in case the Soviet Union was treating Korea as a diversion and planned to launch an invasion of Western Europe, and Congress approved of an additional four divisions (about 64,000 total personnel) being committed there. But whose war was it? Dulles had pushed for US intervention to prop up his Christian gentleman friend Rhee. Dulles and MacArthur had pushed for the escalation of the war into the Northern Korean peninsula and Truman had approved it. The death and destruction was getting greater by the day. Sixteen UN member states were now providing forces. Why should not the West be called to account? If the Soviet Union had moved west in Europe it would have been to take advantage of the diversion. It had not caused a 'diversion.' It would have been a matter of retaliation, or a statement that enough is enough!

A WARNING FROM CHINA

Another two days, and on October 1, China warned that it may intervene if UN forces crossed the 38th parallel. So what? MacArthur intended to go all the way to the Chinese border and the US were determined, so on October 7 it persuaded the United Nations General Assembly to adopt a resolution to establish a Commission to unify a democratic Korea, and to authorize UN troops to enter North Korea. It was another case of making a mockery of the United Nations by using it to legitimize decisions and actions already taken. It was already ten days since the US Joint Chiefs had instructed MacArthur to destroy the North Korean forces (a little different to 'unifying' their country) and eight days since Truman had authorized him to cross the border. It was patently obvious that the Western Alliance was going well beyond a policy of containment or recovery of territory, to occupation, destruction and domination

On October 20, MacArthur occupied the North Korean capital, P'yongyang, and he was even more determined to go all the way to the Chinese border. The first of his forces reached the southern end of the border six days later. Then the US administration began to recognize that things were getting out of hand. The operation was no longer a localized action to protect a small ally, and because of its scale it could trigger an even wider conflict and develop into another world war. The president's NSC adopted a proposal for a vigorous program of atomic and conventional rearmament to meet America's growing global 'commitments.' So did Britain. No longer prepared to be subject to a dependent client relationship with the United States and to rely on its goodwill (which was clearly questionable) in matters of nuclear arms, it detonated its first sole-control nuclear device less than two years later, in Australia's Monte Bello coral islands off the Western Australian coast.

But not everyone was happy with the policy of escalation. At the beginning of November the British prime minister, Clement Attlee, Churchill's successor, opposed the continued widening of the war and any proposal to use atomic weapons. And using a variation of Allen Dulles' rationale for United States deliberate involvement in Europe – economic self preservation – coupled with a variation of Ambassador Joseph Kennedy's pre-war rationale for non-involvement in Europe, former President Hoover called for the United States to “write off Europe” and to make the Western Hemisphere “the Gibraltar of Western civilization.”¹⁷⁵ He sounded a bit like Churchill on Britain's role in facing up to Hitler. However Hoover was motivated not by the preservation of empire or economic aggrandisement of America, but by his deeply held Quaker pacifism and abhorrence of war which, for many people active in the Society of Friends, involves an explicit renunciation of participation in war. He still had a vision of America as the moral embodiment of the 'New Israel.' The parody had not finished. It had gathered a new lease of life.

ACTION AND REACTION

MacArthur began his major push north towards the Yalu River border with China's Manchuria on November 11, and he was so confident of a quick occupation of the remainder that on the 24th he began his “Home by Christmas” offensive. He was well aware of the massive build up of forces on the Chinese side of the border. His use of “Home by Christmas” as the name for the next stage of the operation therefore suggests that he, or the State Department, was trying to give China the message that he would stop at the border, that the US was only interested in occupying North Korea and that China had nothing to be concerned about. If that was the case, China certainly did not believe the story, and Truman should have listened to Kennan, not Dulles. Kennan had been right and, in line with its warning to the United Nations of intervention if MacArthur went too far, China struck from the other side of the border next morning with an initial surge of 180,000 troops. Their numbers were progressively increased so that eventually, by 1952, 1.2 million Chinese troops, or about two thirds of China's available combat divisions, had been engaged. It took only three weeks for the combined Chinese and North Korean forces to roll the South Koreans, Americans and their UN coalition allies all the way back to the 38th parallel. Truman decided wisdom might be the better part of valour and that seeing they were back where they started, it was time to negotiate an armistice, but MacArthur disagreed. It was victory or nothing. Then, after a bit of a lull for a couple of weeks, on New Year's Eve, the Chinese showed that two can play the game of 'unification by force' when they provided the real force in North Korea's second cross border offensive. They could not make much progress at first because of the intensity of the US bombing, but they gradually got the upper hand, the US was forced to evacuate Seoul on January 4, 1951, and to stage a fighting withdrawal a further 30 miles south before they were able to secure a defensive line.

MacArthur was not at all happy. He did not like the idea of being beaten – especially by a wave of mere human beings: ill-equipped at that. He demanded the authority to bomb Manchuria and to blockade China's ports. Truman refused his demands and a conventional counter-offensive was launched late in January, but he declined to take 'No' for an answer and in February he wrote to Congress over the president's head, saying that "there is no substitute for victory."¹⁷⁶ Territory was recovered steadily and on March 31 the UN forces were again at the 38th parallel and under Truman's orders to halt there, but MacArthur ignored the order, crossed the border again and publicly called for the war to be extended to China in retaliation for its intervention on the side of the North. On April 11 Truman dismissed MacArthur and appointed General Matthew Ridgway with instructions to fight a holding action along the 38th parallel.

Truce talks began on July 10, 1951, when in a bid to resolve the impasse, the People's Republic of China dropped its demands for recognition, for the right to China's seat in the UN which was still held by the Nationalists in Taiwan because of the US veto, and for the withdrawal of all foreign troops. However little progress was made. Rhee was not in a cooperative mood. The talks were broken off in August, and fighting continued while another round of talks was held in October, mainly concerned with the repatriation of prisoners and border demarcation. In June 1952 Eisenhower retired from his post in Europe to seek the Republican nomination for the early-November US presidential election, which he won. In private he was critical of McCarthy and the highly divisive 'crusade' he was then running as chairman of the Government Committee on the Operations of the Senate, but in public he supported the call for a ban on the Communist Party.

THE THREAT OF A-BOMBS

In large measure Eisenhower had picked up where Dewey had fallen. The two Dulles brothers were to get the jobs they wanted: John Foster as Secretary of State and Allen as Director of the CIA,¹⁷⁷ both with effect from his own inauguration on January 20, 1953. Immediately after his election, Eisenhower took the very unusual step for a president-elect of making an overseas visit before his inauguration. He visited Korea. He would have been very well briefed by his Secretary-of-State-designate. During the visit he secretly informed the Chinese and North Koreans that "he was prepared to use nuclear weapons and would also carry the war to China if a peace agreement was not reached."¹⁷⁸ In the circumstances it is highly unlikely that he would have withheld from Syngman Rhee advice of either that threat, or the pending appointment of Rhee's old friend John Foster Dulles as Secretary of State. Rhee would have been most encouraged!

Then Eisenhower's State of the Union address to Congress on February 2 included the extraordinary statement, drafted by Dulles, that since the "Red Chinese" had intervened in the Korean War, he felt no longer any need to "protect" them from an invasion by the Nationalist Chinese forces of Chiang Kai-shek. The 'hawks' were in full flight! Headlines in newspapers next day read "IKE READY TO UNLEASH CHIANG ON REDS." It did not matter what the impact would be on international relations – many hard-line Republicans were actively stirring the international Cold War plot in order to force the pace of US military spending – it was a clear effort to capitalize on some of the anti-Communist momentum which McCarthy's irrational scare-mongering had generated.¹⁷⁹ But it was in complete accord with the policy which Dulles had been pursuing ever since the signing of the Sino-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance, of driving a wedge between China and the Soviet Union.

The process had started with MacArthur's preparations to drive across the 38th parallel, through North Korea towards the border with China's Manchuria. Peking had felt threatened. The early stages of the Chinese reconstruction program had been a "remarkable success." The Communist government had brought discipline to the labour force, restored law and order, implemented drastic financial policies to cut inflation, and won the confidence of the capitalists to such an extent that as MacArthur approached the border many urban Chinese were regarding the CCP leadership as the much needed reformers and numerous capitalists believed them to be "good for business."¹⁸⁰ That was not what the United States wanted to hear, but the CCP wanted to preserve and build on the gains they had made, and that was why the People's Republic issued a warning that it may intervene if the United States went any further. Peking asked Moscow for further assistance to repel the Americans but, not wanting to escalate the war, it refused. However when MacArthur reached its border China made a unilateral decision to push them back. Then, when China suffered horrendous losses from American aerial bombardment which it may not have suffered if the Soviet Union had given its support, strains in the Sino-Soviet relationship began to show straight away. That was what the US hawks wanted to hear. But the strains abated somewhat when Truman insisted in mid-1951 that the battle front should be stabilized at the 38th parallel and, with the beginning of truce negotiations, the end of the war appeared to be close.

However the truce did not eventuate, and in November 1952 Eisenhower made his secret threat to use nuclear weapons and extend the war to China. There was no immediate response from either North Korea or China to that threat, but China again asked for additional assistance and when the Soviet Union refused, the strains surfaced again. Then when Eisenhower made his open threat in his State of the Union message in February, 1953 to support the Nationalists in an invasion of mainland China from Taiwan the Sino-Soviet relationship was soon placed under further strain by Moscow's reluctance to provide everything that Peking asked for. That was exactly the response the State Department was looking for. There was a renewed burst of hostilities in June, with deliberate and provocative steps by Rhee to hinder peace talks in the hope that under the leadership – or prompting – of his old friend now running the State Department, the United States might support him in another bid to unify the peninsula by force.

Instead of returning all North Korean prisoners of war to North Korea in a coordinated exchange of prisoners, he ordered the release of those known to be anti-Communist to either stay or stir up trouble. Stunned, the Communist powers broke off the negotiations and renewed their attack, concentrating their fire on Rhee's South Koreans and largely ignoring the UN units. Rhee was disappointed. All he got was a calm-down message and the promise of United Nations funds to begin reconstruction and rehabilitation, but not the substantial military support he wanted. Having made their point, the Communist powers resumed negotiations and an armistice was finally signed on July 27.¹⁸¹

So the war was over. Some observers gave Eisenhower credit for having used the threat of nuclear war to bring it to an end, but that is only a small part of the story. It is most likely that if Dulles had not made his unauthorized intervention with Rhee and the South Korean Parliament when he was on his exploratory visit to the Far East, and if he, MacArthur and others had not then escalated the war in the manner outlined, the course of world events would have been a lot more stable. The Korean War would not have developed into such a major international crisis and the Eisenhower threat of nuclear attack which had the effects of exacerbating the Cold War still further – accelerating the militarization of Europe and the nuclear arms race – may not have even been necessary.

WINNERS, LOSERS ...

There were plenty of winners from the exercise. The United States arms manufacturers received a major boost. Defence expenditure in the US in Eisenhower's first year in office was $53 billion, four times pre-Korean War levels, and commodity producers in countries such as Australia, where wool growers benefited from record greasy wool prices, enjoyed boom years. In fact some observers said that the economic benefits of the war had been more important than the trauma, and following the armistice the reduced industrial and resource demands led to a significant slowing of the economies of the developed countries involved. That required more economic manipulation and resulted in more social stress. And naturally, all the mythology about how it started and where the blame lay had to be maintained, just like after the Second World War. Neither the front line personnel nor the civilian populations at home really knew what it was all about for some years, until records and correspondence was progressively made available. By then it did not matter. Or did it?

There were plenty of losers, too. The trauma had been massive, with an estimated four million casualties, most of whom were Koreans or Chinese.¹⁸² In addition several million Koreans were left as refugees and much of South Korea's industrial plant was damaged, while North Korea was utterly devastated by the massive American bombing campaigns. Overall, about two fifths of Korea's industrial capacity was destroyed and one third of its homes. The United Nations resolved, on the say so of the United States, to establish a Korean Restoration Agency (UNKRA) to aid South Korea in recovering from the disruption caused by the 1945 partition, for refugee resettlement, and to resolve the problems for those made homeless by the ensuing Korean War. A total of 34 member states and five non-member states contributed a total of $148.5 million before the termination of the program in mid 1958. Nothing for North Korea, of course. They had the Communist powers to call on.

What was the United Nations? Where were its principles? Well hidden behind the voting power and dominance of the Western Christian member states which were not at all interested in supporting a country which did not fit their preferred mould. (Chapter 28) Actually it did not have to fit its preferred mould completely. It only had to allow capitalist investment and exploitation. It did not have to allow unrestricted suffrage, nor freedom of political organization or democratic election of public officials. So South Korea qualified for support because it fitted the primary criteria: it allowed good ideologically unrestricted Western investment and exploitation and it was being run by a man of the highest Christian standing. It did not matter that he was running a brutal, corrupt Fascist dictatorship. He was a friend of the United States. And it was going to be a wonderful help in demonstrating the difference between the effectiveness of Capitalism and Communism, especially if the latter could be kept strictly isolated – politically and economically – and US policy was to be directed quite specifically to ensure that isolation.

North Korea's devastation had been far greater than that of the South, so had its casualties. It would take North Korea many years longer to recover than South Korea, even if there was a 'level playing field' on which they were working. This would ensure that there was not such a level playing field. The North would have to rely entirely on the Soviet Union and China for any foreign aid for infrastructure redevelopment, their resources were already stretched, the level of economic development in the North was lower than that in the South even before the war, and by ensuring that there was no flow of aid funds or private investment capital to North Korea from the Western World, it would be easy indeed to show that the gap between the two Koreas was widening. That should discourage any other Asian nations from wanting to try the Socialist experiment! But in addition the favourable land tenure, resources, investment and highly disciplined labour market environments which Rhee was setting up were so attractive that Western investment would pour into the country, commercial and urban development would be greatly stimulated, and employment would rise accordingly. The gap would be unbridgeable. And there would be unrestricted access for Christian evangelists. This would strengthen the position of the churches, ensure acceptance of everything which went with the Western ethic, and accentuate the social divide between the two systems as well.

Rhee could be relied upon to pursue a pragmatic and flexible policy in economic development through foreign investment. He did – with dire consequences for the greatly exploited people. But so did his successors after he was overthrown for abuse of power in 1960. During the next three decades, the South Korean economy grew at an average annual rate of nearly 9 percent, the gross national product more than doubled in size, and per capita income increased more than a hundred fold. South Korea was transformed into an industrial powerhouse with a highly skilled labour force. The population roughly doubled between 1953 and 1993. The capital, Seoul, mushroomed from under a million in 1945 to more than 10 million 40 years later and a new commerce-based middle class emerged. Land-reform during the Rhee years, coupled with a heavy emphasis on education and new technology as a base for economic expansion, led to an end to the power of the yangban or landlord class, and its replacement by a new technocratic elite. But it was quite a while before women were granted legal equality with men and property ownership rights, and as in many other countries, the extended-family system collapsed, rural-to-urban migration weakened traditional family ties and led to mass urban apartment dwelling of nuclear families with fewer children. However, by the 1980s South Korea could boast of the “miracle on the Han River” and it was touted by the Capitalist West as justification for efforts to bring down the monolith of Eastern Bloc Communism and as an example of how a Capitalist approach could solve the world’s development problems – especially after the trauma of war such as Korea’s.

China’s euphoric early days under Chinese Communist Party’s rule could not last. If the CCP was going to achieve the economic reorganization which it wanted, it was going to have to take steps similar to those of the Bolsheviks after the Russian Revolution. It did, but the backlash from the people directly affected was muted somewhat by the reservoir of popular support which resulted from the very respectable showing by the Chinese Army in Korea against the fantastic might of the US military, naval and air force machine. During the three years of war, a “Resist America, Aid Korea” campaign translated the atmosphere of external threat into a spirit of sacrifice and enforced patriotic emergency at home. However there was soon plenty of abuse of the privileged classes for Western governments and media to take full advantage of.¹⁸³

... AND A VARIETY OF AIMS

From the moment Eisenhower took office, just in time to claim credit for bringing that war to a close, he left John Foster Dulles very much to run United States foreign policy, and that was exactly how Dulles wanted it. His impact was immediate. His primary aim was to consolidate America’s position of pre-eminence and dominance, and to ensure that it had access to whatever resources it wanted. Not far behind were the linked aims of restraining the Soviet Union and eliminating Communism as a competing socio-political philosophy. He was not alone in that. It was a reflection of the driving national self-understanding. The extent to which people gave voice to it, and the extent to which it was apparent in their decisions and conduct was only a matter of degree. The correctness of that position was so self-evident to Americans that few people bothered to even debate it. They had God on their side. They had earned His support. Nothing else mattered. They were going to take full advantage of it. The only difference between John Foster Dulles and the majority of American citizens was that he had the personal ability, the drive and the determination to do something about it, coupled with a position which he had achieved to be able to do so. Conciliation and coexistence were not concepts that Dulles was interested in, and he and Eisenhower both saw, very early, that their management of the Korean situation had the potential to split the Sino-Soviet relationship and that maximum pressure on Peking, not conciliation, was the way to bring it about.¹⁸⁴

Eisenhower could not see – or perhaps did not care – that in using the threat of a nuclear attack on China to bring about an armistice with the Communist and anti-Communist forces separated by a demilitarized zone and otherwise restoring the pre-war status quo he was provoking people in other countries to resort to nuclear weapons to resolve their territorial disputes and that this ensured a spiraling arms race with the United States requiring an ever bigger and more destructive arsenal, linked with fantastic site diversity, instant communications, surveillance and interception systems to keep just one step ahead of the next power. The fact that the atomic bomb was used against Japan when it was not necessary, nor justified, was bad enough. But the shock of that action, coupled with the debilitating cost of developing and maintaining such weapons, was sufficient that if the United States had taken the advice of many of the scientists who had been involved in the development of the bomb and stopped right there, world history and relationships could have taken a different and more settled course.¹⁸⁵ However several factors ensured that the Soviet Union would either have to develop equivalent capacity or quietly dismantle its socio-economic philosophy and return to the Capitalist fold. The key ones were America's decision to continue nuclear weapon development and deployment, and its deliberate actions to enhance the Cold War, to totally isolate its former vital ally, the Soviet Union, together with its buffer satellite counties, through both economic and political policies, and to use the threat of nuclear war as a device to consolidate its power over smaller countries. Coupled with those were the continuing efforts by (almost) the entire amorphous Christian gel to eliminate the competing political and economic philosophy or ideology of Marxist Communism.

The self-understanding of Soviet leaders, Stalin in particular, would not permit them to take the alternative course. It would have been an absolute dereliction of duty to discard the opportunity to pursue the reforms which had been made necessary by the abuse of the Capitalist system – sustained by the amorphous Christian gel – and which had been the driving motivation behind the work of Karl Marx and his colleagues. In due course it would be the realization and acceptance of the pointlessness of degrading the whole of humanity through the ultimate pursuit of a system of nuclear 'defence' and the grossly debilitating costs of the system (not only in financial terms) which would lead people both within and outside of the amorphous Christian gel to take the first steps towards limiting and, perhaps, dismantling the system. Those who were determined to remain sitting astride the human pile failed – miserably – to understand that economic systems exist or are required to sustain humanity. Humanity does not exist to sustain an economic system. Humanity's communal systems are still evolving. That process will continue for a long time yet. No one system suits every situation, nor will it ever, and to endeavour to impose one system on the whole world is neither responsible nor realistic.

For a brief period during the immediate post war years, when all discussion of the use of nuclear weapons could be kept at the level of confrontation between ideologies, and when it appeared to be a matter for management by the two superpowers, many people, although they were very fearful of the consequences of a nuclear war, could be persuaded by the propaganda poured out by the nuclear lobby that it was a natural and inevitable consequence of the progress of humanity and that there was nothing they could do about it, nor was there a need to do anything about it. However, Eisenhower's threat to use nuclear weapons in what started as a localized argument (and was built into a regional conflict) simply because the mighty United States faced humiliation and the undermining of its dominance when it could not win without resorting to them, brought two new factors into play.

First: the need for second rank powers to protect their ideological independence by developing the capacity to retaliate. China's leaders, having had the threat used against them, believed that they had no option but to go down that track, even though they knew that to do so would place more strain on their resources and be more debilitating for their people in the medium term. Britain's case was a little different and much more complex but it fits in the same category. Britain was still trying to maintain the influence and self-understanding of a first rank power even though that rank had slipped out of its grasp as a result of its own decisions and actions from the moment it chose to go down the path of the Balfour Declaration and in doing so brought into play the Covenant of Sinai and the Qur'anic Night Journey. Its decision to proceed with development of its own nuclear bombs reflects two important considerations. One was its realization that, because of the division of Europe and the arming of NATO with American nuclear weapons (even though the establishment of NATO was a British initiative), it may be subject to a nuclear attack by the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Union, at Stalin's initiative, had made the development of ICBMs (Inter-Continental Ballistic Missiles) the basis of its defence program. It had to do so because while its principal ideological opponents, (the United States and Britain plus the Vatican), could reach key targets in the Soviet Union with bombs carried from air bases within striking distance of their targets, it could not retaliate in like manner. It was separated from targets in those countries by the full distance across Europe (and the Atlantic) in one direction or across the Bering Sea and Canada in the other direction. Hitler had shown that the technology was available for the development of long range missiles, and the Soviet Union now had to utilize it for its own defence. Britain's second consideration was that although it had been in the forefront of atomic research in the early stages of the Second World War (and had been the first to reach the conclusion that the development of an atomic bomb was feasible) it had transferred all of its technology to the United States and depended on it to finance and manage the actual development and delivery of the bomb. This meant that it had become dependent on a continuing intimate and totally reliable alliance with the United States in which there could be no room for territorial disagreement or other conflicts of interest. Given the nature of human relationships that was an impossible scenario. Britain had allowed itself to become subservient to the United States and that was not compatible with its somewhat battered self-understanding and national aspirations.

Second: Eisenhower had changed the thrust in the whole nuclear debate by shifting the use of nuclear weapons in localized conflicts, or in wars between immediate neighbours, out of the realm of science fiction and into the practical reality of small-power economics and politics. The genie was out of the bottle and it would not go back.

Thus, although the Korean War was important as a regional war because of the scale of death, destruction and trauma which was wrought with it, its historical significance lies in the fact that the way in which it was used as a weapon of imperialism by the United States, and the way in which the threat of the use of nuclear arms was used, changed the entire nature of the nuclear arms race, increased the prospect of inter-continental warfare, gave the United States the justification to negotiate military and communications bases around the world, and thereby enabled the United States to impose political and economic suzerainty over a number of countries in a manner which might not otherwise have been the case. It had militarized the Cold War and it had widened the playing field. It gave the United States the opportunity to assume visible responsibility for protecting the Nationalist Chinese, loosely ensconced on Taiwan, against invasion from Communist mainland China, and to justify intervention in Indochina in support of the French on the grounds that China was planning to move south. One move justified another, and another, and another. Thus it was from Korea that the pattern was established for many more conflicts, and the polarization of world affairs around the confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union was firmly in place. It would remain in place for forty years.

But Eisenhower was a team player and he had his Secretary of State to run the world for him. He had complete confidence in him to the extent that he ignored all criticism of his actions and his policies and said: "He is one of the truly great men of our time."¹⁸⁶ Therefore a brief review of John Foster Dulles' influence in that position is appropriate before a thumbnail sketch, or diary notes, of the arms race and Cold War timetable, and the changing emphasis in nuclear strategy and international relations, to illustrate the evolving world situation.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES – IN FULL FLIGHT!

Dulles viewed his appointment as secretary of state as a mandate to originate foreign policy, telling colleagues that: "The State Department can only keep control of foreign policy as long as we have ideas." He was aware that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) would be effective only in maintaining US interests in western Europe and that other organizations or alliances would be necessary for that purpose in the Middle East, the Far East, and the Pacific islands. He set out to fill those gaps. His principal mode of operation was to play on the existing level of fear of the Soviet Union and China – the same tactic which had been used to gain and to shore up alliances against Japan by Britain and the United States – and to constantly exaggerate it. The natural consequence was a steadily rising level of multi-directional antagonism which then, by action and reaction, progressively raised the actual level of danger and undermined capacity and the opportunity for people to distinguish between the reality of danger and the perception of danger. But Dulles was achieving his primary aim at every move: compounding the dominance and expanding the influence and wealth of the United States, at least in the short to medium term. He initiated the Manila conference in 1954, which resulted in the establishment of the South East Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO) which brought together eight nations either located in Southeast Asia or with interests there in a mutual defense arrangement. That was followed, in 1955, by the Baghdad Pact, later renamed the Central Treaty Organization (CENTO), involving the line of countries in the Middle East – Turkey, Iraq, Iran, and Pakistan – which provided close-proximity bases directly threatening the Soviet Union from the south in exactly the manner of NATO in the west, and which also provided a barrier to restrict legitimate trade and contact between the Soviet Union and the rest of Asia and North Africa.

Less well known was his involvement in negotiating two treaties which made “corrections” to the map of Europe. One was the 1954 Trieste Agreement which provided for partition of the formerly free territory between Italy and Yugoslavia. The other was the Austrian State Treaty in 1955, which restored Austria’s pre-Anschluss frontiers (chapter 21) and involved undertakings that there would never be another union between the German speaking countries of Germany and Austria.

Several factors seem to have determined Dulles’ foreign policy and how he pursued it. The first was the determination that the United States should achieve and maintain a position of dominance with the world as its chess board to which, in his view, it was entitled by virtue of a special place in God’s plan. The second was his profound detestation of Communism which was repeated ad nauseam and which was linked to his personal approach to religion. The nature, or the basis of his faith and his attitude to religion are difficult to understand or to define. The origins of it are clear enough – his upbringing in the family of a Presbyterian clergyman – and he wore his commitment to the pre-eminence of Christianity like regalia of office. But his deliberate exploitation of his involvement in institutional religion, and the World Council of Churches in particular, as a political grandstand raises the question of which drove which: his commitment to Christ or his commitment to America and its unbridled Capitalism. The third was his powerful personality and his insistence on moulding rather than responding to public opinion. The fourth was his strong belief, as an international lawyer, in the value of treaties – a belief he shared with Pius XII and many senior members of the Vatican hierarchy. Of the four, passionate hostility to Communism was the dominant feature of his policy. A brief extract from the official report of the first assembly of the WCC, (from which a note was also used in chapter 28), illustrate his use of the council as a political grandstand.

Photographers’ bulbs flashed as Dr. Mott called on John Foster Dulles to open the debate on the East-West issue. He began by reminding us that the world is hopefully looking on this Assembly, whose unity-in-diversity is a combination that “is needed to save mankind from disaster.” We may respond to these hopes, first, by exposing the futility of war. War may be the lesser of two evils, but “there is no holy war,” and there is “no reason to think that a new war would accomplish any good.” The way to avoid war, according to the Oxford Conference, is to regulate social change by two great religious principles: the supremacy of moral law over man-made law, and the sanctity of every human individual. The Western democracies have revered these principles and so preserved peace within their boundaries, however far their practice has fallen short of their profession. Marxian Communism denies them both in theory and practice, and necessarily concludes that violence is inevitable. When Communist Parties “rule nearly one-quarter of the world’s population” it is exceedingly hard to organize the *world for peace. It will not do to compromise the principles on which peace depends, nor "to use violence in order to convince people that violence ought not to be used." The only possible solution is for those who believe in moral law and human dignity to prove their faith by more effective works. The West has been living too long on its spiritual capital (Toynbee); even our good practices no longer express a great faith. Christians have a special responsibility for restoring the faith of the West, and bringing political realities into harmony with it; but they need better world organization, "remembering that God gave His Son because He loved the World, not merely the West."*¹⁸⁷

John Foster Dulles carried with him Joseph Stalin's Problems of Leninism wherever he went, and he impressed upon his aides the need to study it as a blueprint for conquest similar to Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf. He seemed to derive personal satisfaction from pushing the Soviet Union to the brink. In fact, in 1956 he wrote in a magazine article that "if you are scared to go to the brink, you are lost." Once, during the Austrian State Treaty negotiations, he refused to compromise on some minor points, even though the Austrians themselves pleaded with him to do so for fear the Soviets would walk out. Dulles stood his ground, and the Soviets yielded.

But Dulles could be equally intransigent with the allies of the United States. His insistence upon the establishment of the European Defence Community (EDC) threatened to polarize the free world, when in 1953 he announced that failure to ratify the EDC by France would result in an "agonizing reappraisal" of the United States' relations with France. That expression – an example of bully-boy in the playground tactics at their worst – and his announcement in a Paris speech that the United States would react with "massive nuclear retaliation" to any Soviet aggression, found a permanent place in the vocabulary of US foreign policy. Similarly, in a complete reversal of his former pro-Egyptian policy, Dulles claimed that Egypt's President Gamal Abdel Nasser was "nothing but a tin-horn Hitler." Although Dulles later conceded that his cancellation of an agreement to finance the construction of the Aswan High Dam could have been more subtle, he never shifted ground from his stated belief that Nasser, who had already purchased arms from the Soviet bloc, was bound to turn decisively against the US once he felt that he had the Soviet Union on his side.¹⁸⁸

In fact that brusque rejection, in July 1956, of President Nasser's request for aid in building the Aswan Dam led directly to the nationalization of the Suez Canal and the Suez Crisis and was a major factor aggravating the trouble in the triangle. Some observers saw it as the beginning of the end of American influence in the Middle East. In reality it made the US-Israeli alliance all the more important as, like Britain forty years before, it blundered from one event and one decision to another without realizing that it had become the key player in the drama unfolding after the Qur'anic Night Journey and Maimonides' understanding of the establishment of the State of Israel had come together to confirm the irrevocability of the Covenant of Sinai. He demonstrated that he had no better understanding of interfaith relations, of the Night Journey or of the parody of Mein Kampf than the church or any of the other key players involved. In the manner of a Churchill, Dulles also demonstrated his arrogant belief that, like Britain in the period between the wars and during the Second World War, the United States could make and break international friendships at its whim from a position of power which would prevent any adverse consequences. The world was his plaything.

Real international democracy was being brought to its knees. No people, no country, was permitted to vote into being a constitution, a system of government or an economic strategy and system of resource management which was not in favour with the United States. It did not matter if they bypassed the electoral process altogether, as long as their economic system had the approbation of United States and was accessible to its advantage. And the whole process was sanctified. It was being done in the name of Christianity. Two of its brands, anyway. The Vatican brand and the Reformed brand. The mainstay of the Orthodox brand was having difficulty relating to the Reformed brand of the Dulles style. It was tending to support the Soviet approach to social development and communal responsibility and to defend the choice of styles of government. On that issue it had little choice. To do otherwise would have encouraged another round of Soviet anti-religious activity and either total or partial suppression of religious freedom of the nature that had occurred under Hitler, under Stalin, and under a series of popes as well. It was about to back the Christian Peace Conference (CPC) which was established in Czechoslovakia 1958, a year before Dulles died, as “part of the world-wide ecumenical movement ... committed to close cooperation for peace and justice with all bodies and agencies of the World Council of Churches, with confessional world associations and other ecumenical organizations.”¹⁸⁹ The prime mover behind its formation, Professor Josef Hromadka, followed Dulles to the rostrum at the WCC’s first assembly. He agreed with Dulles on the futility of a new war, but said that the West, if it was victorious, would be “unable to cope with the area now under the Soviet government,” and “the West cannot now regain the supremacy in world affairs which it had for centuries.”¹⁹⁰ (See below: The CCP ... peeking through the curtain)

Dulles and his boss were in complete accord that the Cold War was simply a convenient playing field on which to achieve their aims. There was no need to resolve it. It was to be manipulated to best advantage and if a mechanism could be found within it to enable a wedge to be driven between the Soviet Union and China, so much the better. But the Cold War was one of two interlocked factors which were both new to the trouble in the triangle. The other was the nuclear arms race. Therefore before we consider the progress of those two factors it is advantageous to review exactly how they arose and whether they were avoidable. That review provides a base from which to trace the threads linking those two factors through the Suez Crisis and the Six Day War – lesser beacons before the critical beacon of the Yom Kippur War and the Arab oil embargo. They will lead directly, and quite quickly, through the closing generation of the twentieth century to the crises of the present time.

FROM COLD WAR TO ARMS RACE

There were so many themes running through world affairs at that time that people could not be expected to know whether the Cold War was a factor in other developments or whether those developments were contributing to the Cold War. They were, in fact, intimately linked.

Interwoven may be a better description. The decision had been taken by the United States and Britain to develop the atomic bomb in secret and to use it as a psychological warfare weapon against the principal ally of convenience whose reluctant agreement to remain in the war was the key factor in Britain's ability to retain its independence. (Chapter 24) Once that decision had been taken, it was going to require goodwill, judgement and cooperation on the part of the Western Allies which they simply did not have if they were to avoid a return to – or a continuation of – the tensions between East and West which had resulted from the misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel which we have already traced. Their self-understanding and the assumptions which they made about their particular socio-economic systems being the only way to go – because they carried the blessing of the church – was a simple case of erroneous circular responses in exactly the same mould as the responses at the time of Niceae and the formulation of the earliest Trinitarian doctrines. The church and the structures of state attached themselves to each other at a time of imperial conflict (chapter 2) in a symbiotic relationship. Each was dependent upon and feeding from the other for mutual convenience and growth. What the church said, made what the state did acceptable. The state therefore returned the compliment. It provided the church with the status which the church thought it required and this institutionalized the authority with which it spoke. The church could therefore call on the state to protect its interests, and when it did so, the price was further support for the state. The spiral became tighter and tighter. The abuse of authority and the need to rely on further manipulation of doctrine to support both parties became greater and greater, and the situation continued to deteriorate until there was some relief when Luther was called upon to swing his hammer.

The actions taken by the United States and the Vatican in Italy, and by the United States and the Reformed Churches in Japan (chapter 27) indicate that the situation was no different at the end of the Second World War. There was, unfortunately, a tendency among Western politicians and commentators to view world affairs as if everything started afresh with the end of the Second World War. It was no coincidence. Conservative politicians went out of their way to persuade people that the world had entered a new era, that the slate was clean, everything that happened prior to the war had been swept away and people should forget about it all and move forward. They succeeded in quite large measure in the West with the help of massive public relations misrepresentation; a compliant press which was not really in a position to do much else; a Roman Catholic Church which was riding to recovery on their bandwagon; and a cowered Reformed church which was desperately trying to work out its way forward. This was especially transparent to the rest of the world in the case of the Russian buffer zone and the nuclear arms race. The first example, the buffer zone, was not new. The second, the nuclear arms race, certainly was. But there was a continuum in world affairs such that the events of the 1940s were related very closely to the events of the 1840s. The fundamental issues which prompted the development of Marxist economic, political and social theory were the exploitation of people by those who controlled the means of production and distribution, the Capitalists, and the way in which that exploitation was integrated with, and sanctified by the church as the dominant religious power of the day. The fundamental issues which now prompted the Cold War and the associated nuclear arms race were the same. The emphasis had changed and the focus had changed. The parties to the process of exploitation had changed, and the site of exploitation had changed. But the fundamentals had not. Exploitation of one segment of humanity by another. And the nuclear arms race had more to do with exploitation than defence. To trace the links and the pattern of conduct, and to grasp how it relates to the trouble in the triangle it is necessary to briefly revisit some of those earlier issues and then move forward again.

In the earlier events (the round of revolutions of the mid 19th century and the formulation of Marxist theory) the exploitation was of the labour force employed within the domestic structures of the capitalist economies. In this sense ‘employers’ includes governments, notably the Russian monarchy, and semi-feudal landowners as well as commercial enterprises, and the ‘labour force’ includes men enlisted in the armed forces as well as rural and industrial workers. In the later events (the spread of applied Marxism beyond the country in which it was first applied, and the push for decolonization) the exploitation was no longer of the domestic workforce, it was of the people and resources of foreign or non-Western countries. People in the West – in the amorphous Christian gel – were therefore less aware of the scale or the impact of that exploitation. Overall they did not regard it as exploitation at all because, in their view, it was still the right of the white Christian West to command and to exploit all that, and all those, who lay beyond the white Western Christian world. And, in any case, they were persuaded by their leaders, many of whom were eager to demonstrate just how ‘Christian’ the West was, that all of the world’s resources were to be available to everyone, but not necessarily to be shared equally.

During the intervening period the situation had changed substantially, partly due to more enlightened thinking by those who dominated the economy, and partly due to more enlightened policies introduced by governments. But in both cases the more enlightened conduct was due to a combination of the influence of economists and philosophers whose work has already been discussed, and the fear of either industrial warfare or political revolution in the wake of further industrialization, the degradation of the First World War, and the Great Depression. But at the same time, in the one country which had tried the Marxist approach to economic and social management, the Soviet Union, the trial had brought very mixed results.

On one hand there was progress in many aspects of the country’s life and, overall, its economy was at a much higher stage, relative to the European West, than it had been under the Tsarist regime. In 1913 Russia ranked fifth in industrial output. By 1937 its industrial output was second only to the United States. In the West, people did not talk much about that. It was an embarrassment because it supported the case for central planning and central direction of the use of resources and space. It supported Marxist theory. A redistribution of wealth had been achieved concurrent with greatly increased productivity and a higher overall standard of living and, broadly, the elimination of poverty. According to the Capitalist West that was not supposed to happen! Most of that development had occurred during the first ten years of Stalin’s dictatorship, from 1928.¹⁹¹ And that national development had been achieved in spite of the vigorous and direct intervention by the Capitalist West to stir up and to assist a major civil war in an attempt to forestall the experiment before it even began. The civil war was followed by both war-induced famine and continuing policies of harassment aimed at isolating the Soviet Union economically and politically so that, whether it wished to or not, it was forced into a largely self-sufficient mode for its development.

On the other hand its repressive leader who had achieved a position of dictatorship just as absolute as Hitler, had orchestrated a sustained program of purges, repression and butchery against his own people. Best estimates indicate that the legalized savagery accounted for between 18 and 19 million deaths between 1930 and 1938. (See chapter 24, Russia's crisis of leadership, for details.) There had been nothing in previous human history to compare with it. There has been nothing since. And it involved the elimination or suppression of an entire sector of civil society, the wealthy elite, who had provided most of the leaderships of the Russian Orthodox Church. It was therefore very easy for politicians, investors and writers in the West to claim that the economic advances had only been made possible by – and had been dependent upon – exploitation and repression of the people and their rights. Their task in attacking Marxist theory was made even easier by the heavy emphasis which the government had placed on industrial development in a deliberate bid to catch up with the West, for very sound defence reasons, and to provide a base for future production of consumer and domestic goods. It was a case of realistic and effective planning to provide for the long term needs of the population and to offset the earlier period of neglect and exploitation. But in the meantime the people had to do without some of the consumer items which were becoming the daily fare of the general population in the West.

However Russia's purge was very much Stalin's personal initiative and responsibility, carried out by officials and party operatives around him who owed their positions and their lives (and deaths in many cases) to him. It was therefore directly comparable to Germany's Holocaust: Hitler's personal initiative and responsibility, carried out by officials and party operatives around him who owed their positions and their lives (and deaths in many cases) to him. But personal responsibility goes only so far. The organizations and systems which sustain any leader or leaders which commit gross crimes against humanity, and which enable or permit them to stay in office and to implement such programs must share the responsibility. Therefore the people and the systems of National Socialism in Germany, and Communism _as implemented in the Soviet Union, must share the responsibility. The Western powers, having flirted with National Socialism until the war, were quick to drop it and to denigrate it once the war started. The major segments of the church, (the Vatican-based Catholic _Church and the Reich Protestant Church) were not. The Western powers, having only _forged an alliance with Communist Russia to serve their own interests, were then equally quick in dropping it, denigrating it and isolating it when the war ended and it had served _its purpose. In this case the church was a little more consistent. It had trenchantly opposed the adoption of Communism in Russia from the start, because of the challenge which it posed to the church's self-understanding and theology, and it was very eager to forge an alliance with the Western powers to bring it down after the war, having failed to persuade them to make it their primary target instead of Nazi Germany during the war. (Chapters 20, 24 & 27) Like it or not, the church-at-large, and the Vatican in particular, have to live with being labelled as the fabric of the amorphous Christian gel and a major factor in the development of the Cold War.

MISCONDUCT, ITS CONSEQUENCES AND THE BEACON OF BARBAROSSA

However, as we have seen, the misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel, coupled with the self-understanding, doctrine and policies of the church which were the fabric which determined the nature of the gel, provided the initiative for the development of both Marxist Communism (chapter 14) and National Socialism (chapter 18). Therefore, because, in each case, they were, first, a consequence of the misconduct of the gel and, second, a very direct challenge to both the church and the gel, the church and its gel must also share responsibility for the fact that those enormous tragedies occurred. Put another way: if the misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel had not occurred, then neither Marxist Communism nor National Socialism would have evolved. The remarkable relationship between Britain and the Soviet Union, manipulated by Churchill with absolutely no regard for the lessons of history or the integrity which Christian Britain – led by the Defender of the Faith – was supposed to exemplify thus provides an excellent illustration of the parody of Mein Kampf.

This introduces another issue to ponder: the alternative scenarios in the event that Russia had not been able to withstand Operation Barbarossa and eventually roll the Nazi forces back towards Germany. There are basically two. The first is that Russia may have sued for peace prior to the German occupation of Moscow (instead of only talking about it). The second is that the German armies may have occupied Moscow after defeating the defending Soviet armies or forcing their evacuation.

In the first case, if Stalin had sued for peace, Hitler would have driven a hard bargain, based on the aims on which he had briefed senior colleagues, and which had somehow been leaked to Moscow. This included the annexation or suzerain control over an enormous slab of territory to provide all of the Lebensraum which he had aimed for – his version of a contiguous suzerain empire. He would have left the Soviet Russia to get on with the job of governing the vast bulk of its enormous territory. Hitler would have then been free to concentrate on his higher priorities. As much as he hated Communism, it was only his third priority to eliminate it as a political force. His higher priorities were to gain Germany's Lebensraum, and to expel all Jews from Europe, thus eliminating Judaism as a religious force on the continent. Having gained one, Lebensraum, he could concentrate on the other, and at the same time he would be able to turn the vast might of the Reich Armies against Britain which had stood in the way of his top priorities.

In the second case, Hitler would not have done what he had previously threatened – raze Moscow and wipe it off the map. The massive industrial capacity which it offered would have been far more important to his plans. It would have greatly increased his capacity to wage war against Britain and whoever else he wished. He was not only well aware of that: he was planning on it, so that on October 2, 1941, in announcing the launching of Operation Typhoon he broadcast to the world that: "Today begins the last great decisive battle of the war" and Germany was shortly to have "the three greatest industrial districts of the Bolsheviks" completely in her hands. This meant, he said, that: "At last we have created the prerequisites for the final, tremendous blow which, before the onset of winter, will lead to the destruction of the enemy."¹⁹² Five days later Stalin ordered the second approach to the Bulgarian ambassador to initiate armistice negotiations with Hitler. But in this second scenario, if Hitler had occupied Moscow without the total defeat of the Soviet Union, because the government had already withdrawn from Moscow to an alternative location before he got there, Hitler would not have been able to withdraw the bulk of the Reich Army for an assault against Britain. It would have been tied down, required to defend his occupation against counter-attack, not only to recover Moscow, but along the entire 1,300 mile front from Leningrad on the Gulf of Finland to Stalingrad and the Caspian Sea. The re-grouped Soviet forces were already being directed from the temporary Soviet capital which would have been secure and protected by an alternative defensive line behind which the Soviet reserves would have prepared for an assault on the Germans occupying Moscow or wherever they wished.

In either case Communism would not have been eliminated as a political force. To achieve that, Hitler would have had to occupy not only White Russia as far as Moscow, (which was as far as he got, about five per cent of the area of the Soviet Union), but virtually the entire land mass. That was greater than the total area of North America and second only to the land mass of the continent of Africa. That was simply not realistic. He knew it, and his announced aim was to occupy only Russia-in-Europe, as far as the Ural Mountains. Therefore neither Hitler nor the Vatican would have seen that aspect of their priorities achieved.

However it was the first scenario which Britain feared most: an armistice which would cut the Soviet Union out of the war games and leave Hitler free to turn his wrath against Britain by greatly strengthening his push south, through the Balkans or the Caucasus, cutting all of its normal lines of communication for defence and trade with the Far East, and from the oil resources of the Middle East, via the Mediterranean and the Suez Canal. The Soviet Union's capacity to resist Operation Barbarossa and its will to stay in the war were therefore of vital importance to Britain as it perceived its interests at that time. We have already noted that the continuation and escalation of the war as a consequence of decisions taken by Britain at several critical points left it, and the world-at-large, in a much more parlous state at the end of the war than if the alternative decisions (to end the war by armistice negotiations) had been taken. Its decision to pressure the Soviet Union and to support it to keep it in the war and to see off Operation Barbarossa instead of negotiating a territorial settlement with Hitler was in the same category. It influenced the way in which the Cold War and the arms race developed and it complicated the trouble in the triangle greatly.

It is a virtual certainty that if the crash program of national development which Stalin pushed through during the 1930s (in spite of such strenuous Western opposition) at the same time that Hitler was preparing his challenge had not been so strikingly effective, Russia would have succumbed to Operation Barbarossa and sued for peace on the basis of the loss of a big slab of territory. Put another way, if Soviet Russia had achieved only a lower level of industrialization it would not have had the capacity to resist the onslaught of Barbarossa. In that case Hitler would have been free to unleash his full force against Britain, either by cutting off its access to its empire or by a frontal assault. The British government and the United States governments both knew that in such circumstances Britain would be forced to capitulate. This knowledge of imminent defeat for Britain is why Churchill and his government were so desperate to keep Russia in the war by sacrificing some of their own production and some of the promised American Lend Lease production. (Chapter 24)

In that sense, the relationship between Britain and the Soviet Union in the Second World War was a re-run of the First World War. Some of the earlier participants were deceased and others had changed their roles. On the Russian side, the Tsar, Lenin and Trotsky had all gone. On the British side Lloyd George, and Balfour had gone, and Churchill had moved up from cabinet member to prime minister. And in Germany the Kaiser had gone and Hitler was in his place.

CHURCHILL'S ATTITUDE: NO BASIS FOR COOPERATION

In his various roles as a cabinet minister during the First World War, Churchill had first tried to prop up the capitalistic, exploitative Tsarist Orthodox Christian monarchy to keep it in the war against the equally Christian German monarchy which had simply wanted to split the spoils of the Muslim Middle East with Britain. Then he had tried to prevent the new-born revolutionary Bolshevik government from making its own peace with Germany. When that failed he tried to run it out of office. In the Second World War Russia, transformed into the Soviet Union, was again very close to capitulating and, even with the enormous scale of its industrial production, it was only able to keep going because of British cajoling and US Lend Lease aid. It follows that Britain's ability to remain independent at that stage was due in very large measure to the strength of Stalin's crash program of industrialization which had been carried out as a reaction to the British-sponsored intervention during the First War and continuing deep Western antagonism. This is one of the ironies of the parody of Mein Kampf.

Extracts from Martin Gilbert's Churchill: A Life, illustrate, in sequence, Churchill's total preoccupation with the preservation of Britain's power; his determination to manipulate anyone to that end; his disregard for human life and suffering; and his double standards on what constituted a war crime and leadership responsibility. We have already seen the influence which his decisions had on the course and escalation of the Second World War and in reinforcing the trouble in the triangle, but these extracts indicate the way in which he helped prepare the groundwork for that phase. They also illustrate the background which Stalin would have had in his mind – imprinted indelibly – when he was planning for the Soviet Union's security after the war, and the 'buffer zone' which became the justification, or the excuse, for America's bid to isolate the Soviet Union from the Marshall Plan, and the subsequent Cold War politics.(Chapter 27; the Marshall Plan; the Dulles Policy; Division!)

As 1917 came to an end, Churchill's energies [as Minister for Munitions] focused on [the coming] 1918 campaign. But now a new danger loomed: in Russia, a Bolshevik Government, coming to power at the beginning of November, declared that it would make peace with Germany. Once this happened, the Germans would be able to transfer vast numbers of troops from the Eastern to the Western Front, giving them a marked superiority in numbers. Greatly alarmed, on 19 January 1918 Churchill sent Lloyd George an appeal, begging him to ensure that the army was brought to 'full strength' at once. ... "A defeat here will be fatal." [Then, pressing for men to be shifted from the navy, munitions production, the home army and civil life to the army, he wrote:] "Stint food and commercial imports to increase shells, aeroplanes and tanks. ... The Germans are a terrible foe, & their generals are better than ours." ¹⁹³

On the Eastern Front, the Bolsheviks ... made their peace with Germany. Churchill cast about for some means of persuading them to re-enter the war, and re-active the Eastern Front. If the Bolsheviks could be 'induced' to make common cause with Romania, he wrote to the War Cabinet [on April 4, 1918], and jointly attack Germany, that would be the moment to send to Moscow 'representatives of the Allies, of sufficient weight to give the Bolshevik Government a new element of stability and a means of reaching a working arrangements with the other classes of Russian society.'

The decision was taken almost immediately to 'induce' the Bolsheviks to re-enter the war and re-active the Eastern Front in common cause with Romania. The inducement included bribes to anti-Bolshevik officers and the despatch of British forces to back them up. The number of British forces fighting with those White Russian anti-Bolshevik counter-revolutionaries was progressively built up to 14,000 troops. They were a small contingent in a total of 180,000 non-Russians drawn from the United States, Japan, France, Czechoslovakia, Serbia, Greece and Italy who were deployed with 300,000 anti-Bolshevik Russian troops, but British officers were prominent in the command structure. Seven British generals held military commands in North Russia, Siberia and Southern Russia.

Churchill was convinced that Britain and the Bolsheviks could make common cause. 'Let us never forget that Lenin and Trotsky are fighting with ropes around their necks. They will leave office for the grave. Show them any real chance of consolidating their power, of getting some kind of protection against the vengeance of a counter-revolution, and they would be non-human not to embrace it. They must, however, be forced by events and aided by foreigners. Without external aid and countenance they can do nothing. Hitherto they have had other hopes but these have utterly failed, and self-preservation will force them to tread a path which is also ours if they can be helped to gain it.' ¹⁹⁴ [Emphasis added.]

Britain's forces and its generals in the anti-Bolshevik command structure were some of the strongest strands in the 'ropes around their necks.'

Churchill sought every possible means of bringing pressure to bear on the German forces. A day before his suggestion of a deal with Lenin, [on April 3] he had written to Loucheur [the French minister responsible for munitions] about the need to continue the manufacture of mustard-gas shells, telling him he was 'in favor of the greatest possible development of gas warfare, and of the fullest utilization of winds, which favour us so much more than the enemy.' Within a month, more than a third of the shells fired by the British Army were mustard-gas shells. [Emphasis added. Hitler, then a despatch-runner corporal, was gassed on October 14, 1918, only weeks before the end of the war. Chapter 18]¹⁹⁵

In July, when the gas warfare was approaching its peak, an industrial dispute broke out in several British tank factories because of the way in which men were being transferred from job to job and factory to factory against their will. When Churchill proposed to force the strikers back to work by withdrawing their exemption from military service, the Deputy PM, Bonar Law, opposed such use of the Military Service Act 'as an agent in an industrial dispute,' but Lloyd George acted on Churchill's advice. He issued a statement, from Downing Street, that all strikers would be liable to be sent to the front. That meant that they would have been in the trenches to 'catch' the gas shells coming the other way: from the German lines. The strike collapsed.¹⁹⁶ That use of brutal and coercive industrial laws on Churchill's recommendation was ten years before Stalin seized absolute power and was in a position to do the same to the Russian people.

IMPERIALISM AT ITS WORST

The presence of foreign armies under British command in the civil war rather upset the Bolsheviks, and on August 31, a number of Bolshevik soldiers forced their way into the British embassy in Petrograd in protest. They confronted the Naval Attaché, Captain Francis Cromie, who shot three of them dead and was then killed himself. Churchill happened to know Cromie personally and, describing him as "a very gifted man of exceptionally high professional attainments" he wrote to the War Cabinet to urge that the perpetrators of the crime be pursued with "tireless perseverance."

Reprisals upon various Bolshevik nonentities who happen to be in our hands are of no real use, though they should be by no means excluded. The only policy which is likely to be effective, either for the past or the future, is to mark down the personalities of the Bolshevik Government as the objects upon whom justice will be executed, however long it takes, and to make them feel that their punishment will become an important object of British policy to be held steadily in view through all the phases of the war and the settlement. ... The exertions which a nation is prepared to make to protect its individual representatives or citizens from outrage is one of the truest measures of its greatness as an organized state. The fact that men are dying in thousands in fair war must not deaden us to the entirely different character of an act of this kind.

At its meeting on September 4 the War Cabinet decided to send a telegram to the Soviet Government 'threatening reprisals' against Trotsky, Lenin, and 'the leaders of the Government' if the lives of British subjects were not henceforth safeguarded.¹⁹⁷

At that time Stalin was spreading his efforts over two roles: Commissar (Minister) for Nationalities, and politco-military leader on various fronts of the civil war.

That Churchillian memorandum must stand as one of the most abject illustrations of Western imperial self-understanding. What was the Russian government's crime? Wanting to safeguard its people from further death and destruction in a war which resulted from the greed of other nations for the resources of people in yet another region? Hardly a crime. Wanting to organize their country in a manner and on a philosophical basis different to, and less exploitative than, the systems of the dominant countries? Hardly a crime. Britain and its collaborators were the invaders: not Soviet Russia. For once the situation was simple. The invading countries were drawn together in an alliance of convenience to prevent the spread or consolidation of a challenge to their preferred system. It appears that the 'crime' for which the Bolshevik government ministers were to be punished was their refusal to bow to Britain's interests. Which leaders had committed a crime against humanity: the ones who did not have direct control over the actions of a troop of soldiers who confronted a foreign official who promptly shot three of them; or the ones who proposed and authorized the mass use of biological warfare gas against tens of thousands of soldiers who represented a threat to their position of privilege? The philosophy behind that memorandum was exactly the same as that which gave Napoleon III the opportunity to invade Indochina on the trumped-up excuse of an attack on French churchmen (chapter 15); or which gave the United States the right to have Perry parade his gunboat diplomacy in Japan (chapter 15); or MacArthur and the Allies, later, to set up a number of 'exemplary' leadership war crimes trials in Japan to focus world attention on the depravity of the vanquished and the superior Christian ethics of the victors – avoiding at all times the suggestion that their own massive crimes against humanity should be judged on the same basis.

On November 26, 1918, eight months after trying to persuade the Bolsheviks to re-enter the war, immediately before Britain sent its troops in to subjugate them, and less than three months after the Petrograd incident, Churchill said in a speech to his constituents that: "Civilization is being completely extinguished over gigantic areas, while Bolsheviks hop and caper like troops of ferocious baboons amid the cities and the corpses of their victims."¹⁹⁸ [Emphasis added.] Wonderful rabble rousing electioneering. Just a trifle wide of the mark. It was Britain and its Allies who were provoking the situation which Churchill sought to exaggerate with such extravagance, and it was their troops who were causing much of the carnage. Churchill's totally un-called for remark was in the same class, and just as provocative to those who were its target, as his infamous and intemperate remark about the Indian civil rights leader Mahatma Gandhi. Churchill said he was "nauseated to see Mr. Gandhi, an Inner Temple lawyer, now become a seditious fakir of a type well known in the East, striding half naked up the steps of the viceregal palace while he was still organizing and conducting a defiant campaign of civil disobedience, to parley on equal terms with the representatives of the King-Emperor."¹⁹⁹ (Chapter 20)

Then on December 31, 1918, having been elevated to Secretary of State for War and Air, and being directly responsible for the conduct of Britain's continuing military operations in Russia, Churchill told a War Cabinet meeting which had been called specially to formulate British ongoing policy against the Bolsheviks that he was “all for negotiation” but he considered that there was no chance of securing a satisfactory settlement “unless it is known we had the power and the will to enforce our views.” He said that if the Bolshevik and anti-Bolshevik Russians “were ready to come together we should help them” but otherwise Britain should use force “to restore the situation and set up a democratic government.”²⁰⁰ Six weeks later, being Britain’s representative at the Paris Peace Conference, Churchill proposed to the Council of Ten (countries aligned against Russia) that it should at least examine what the military problems of intervention might be. Having been supported by the Italian and Japanese Foreign Ministers, he then advised Lloyd George that he intended to ask the council to set up a commission “to prepare, out of the resources that are available, a war plan against the Bolsheviks.”

That is hardly a personal record which would have given Stalin confidence (after he had lifted the country by its economic bootstraps with one hand, and suppressed civil rights and wreaked the kind of vengeance which Churchill claimed was afflicting Russia in 1918 with the other) to accept any advice from the man about Hitler’s intentions to invade his country. Neither would he have been eager to negotiate an agreement to continue the war against Hitler, using British and American aid, when he knew very well that the primary purpose of that aid was the self-preservation of the donors, not the considered and genuine support for his country, its people and its form of government. At the time of Operation Barbarossa Stalin also knew that the very strong overall position of the United States was that it would not go to Britain’s aid if an invasion was threatened and it was forced to seek an armistice or was defeated on the field of battle, but that it would take offensive action in its own interests, in Europe if necessary, after Hitler had defeated Britain and was directly threatening the interests of the United States. That was public knowledge and public sentiment. (Chapter 24.)

There was absolutely no chance of the US intervening on the side of the Soviet Union. Material aid in the circumstances was one thing. The US arms and related industries were eager to grow wealthy through it. Direct military intervention was another matter altogether. It was barely twenty years since American troops had vacated Russian soil after its abortive military adventure in anti-Bolshevism – together with Britain and a host of other countries – and it was most unlikely that they would be welcome to set foot again in case their objective changed in mid-action, prompted by more ‘divine’ encouragement from the Vatican. Roosevelt had exchanged personal representatives with the Pius XII at Christmas 1939. The president and Myron Taylor subsequently had to talk fast to persuade the pope and the Catholic hierarchy in the US that Lend Lease Aid was acceptable and to avoid the church taking a public stand against it. If it would not change sides altogether, Pius XII wanted the United States to take advantage of Hitler’s “high minded gallantry in defence of the foundations of Christian culture” and follow Franco’s example in permitting the organization of an anti-Bolshevik ‘Blue Division’ in which the volunteers wore prints and medallions with the image of Our Lady of Fatima, to fight with Nazi forces on the Russian frontier. (Chapter 24) Operation Barbarossa is therefore one of the key beacons.

BARBAROSSA: ...

If Hitler had succeeded in Operation Barbarossa, either by defeating the Soviet Union's armies on the field of battle or by forcing an armistice, the entire scenario would have changed. Not just the scenario of the Second World War, but that of the entire trouble in the triangle. Britain would have been faced with two alternatives: fight on with overwhelming odds stacked against it and be forced into a humiliating submissive armistice, or negotiate a less humiliating armistice immediately. Given the political circumstances in Britain at the time (chapter 24) it is highly unlikely that Churchill would have remained prime minister and equally likely that a new government would have entered negotiations immediately. Hitler would have secured all of the Lebensraum which he wanted in Eastern Europe and he would have promptly removed all of the Jews from that area. However these events were all some time before Hitler's decision for a Final Solution. He had been brutalizing the Jews in the occupied areas; the labour camps were filling fast; and the death rates were alarmingly high, but the Final Solution had not even been planned. It was not until July 31 that Göring issued a special directive known as 'the Fuhrer Order on the Final Solution.' That was five weeks after Barbarossa, and, because of Pearl Harbour, it was not until January 1942 that a conference could be held to begin to put it into effect. (Chapters 24 & 25)

As master of Europe, Hitler could have simply *demand*ed the emigration of the entire Jewish population to those countries which had refused to cooperate at the Evian Conference, and to Russia's BiraBidzhan autonomous Jewish region which was well out of his way. If the Evian nations outside of Europe agreed, and if the Jewish community departed: no Holocaust. A lot of trauma, certainly. And the Vatican would have been even more arrogant in its insistence that the Jewish community existed only to prove that the Christian Church (Vatican version) is the sole authorized representative on earth of the Triune God. As a consequence of that attitude it is unlikely that the refugees would have been given a cordial welcome. The Dunera experience and the Australian government's response to a request for organized resettlement clearly suggests otherwise. (Chapter 24) It must be assumed that the level of anti-Semitism would have risen in an antagonistic reaction to people having the hated Jews imposed on them (at a time of food, clothing and other restrictions in many of those countries) and the trouble in the triangle would not have gone away. It would have simply taken a quite different course.

The circumstances and the immediate role of the Jewish community in a radically different Diaspora would have taken a different course, too, and the challenge to the church would have developed in a different way. It would most certainly not have gone away. The Covenant of Sinai was still firmly in place. The Qur'anic Night Journey had already been triggered; the war of Gog and Magog was in progress; the worst of Hell had not been experienced; and Maimonides' expectation of the return to Israel was still on hold. Could it have arrived quietly? It is possible, but highly unlikely because there was no understanding of the relationship between the three faiths or the cause of the trouble in the triangle and therefore the pressure points would simply have moved elsewhere and the pressure would still have been on the Jewish Community. The Zionist Movement would have, naturally, maintained its pressure for unrestricted migration to Palestine and for the establishment of a Jewish state.

On the other hand, if the Evian countries refused to accept the Jewish refugees, the situation would have almost certainly unfolded as it did, in the actual event, with the Holocaust tinged with probably even more venom as Hitler reacted to yet another rejection. What would have the Western powers done? That would have been up to the United States. It was the only power – sitting in grand isolation and simply supplying the ammunition for the European powers to fire at each other. Its direct intervention can certainly not be assumed. France, one of the two partners which declared war against Germany, was already totally subjugated and Britain had even destroyed its fleet. Britain, the principal protagonist, was so close to defeat that it could do nothing except try to rally its few remaining supporters around it and at best, even with greatly increased assistance from the United States, it could have done no more than try to fight its way back onto the continent and go through another performance similar to that which it had already been through.

In such circumstances, if Britain had sought to negotiate an armistice, clearly under duress and with the whole world watching, the first piece of silver which Hitler probably would have demanded was the return of the former German colonies in Africa and the Pacific. It would have been quite impossible for Britain to revert to the Peel Plan or to sustain any proposal for accelerated Jewish settlement in Palestine. A review of a few diary entries indicates why. The longer the war continued, the more difficult it became for Britain to resolve the crisis and to retain its grip on its empire. But these entries also indicate how different the overall course of world events could have been if the British cabinet, already divided over Churchill's leadership (chapter 24), had bitten the bullet, overridden him or forced him from office, and sought an armistice. They also suggest that Soviet Russia's involvement in the trouble in the triangle could have changed very significantly.

Tsarist Russia had been as trenchantly anti-Semitic as any country in Europe (chapters 15, 16) but the situation changed dramatically in the early days of the Bolshevik Republic. Jews achieved a new level of recognition and prominence in civil life, as is shown by the way that they were subject to Britain's gross and unscrupulous manipulation in its Balfour Declaration manoeuvres (chapter 16), and the new government sought to redress the anti-Semitic excesses of the Tsarist regime. (Chapter 18) However the relationship soon deteriorated badly, not directly in terms of anti-Semitism but in terms of anti-Zionism, although in the circumstances it is impossible to separate the two factors quite as simply as that. Stalin's campaigns against the Jewish community-at-large were very brutal. They have been the subject of many books, and there is no question that the responsibility rests basically on him. However the responsibility must be shared by the churches and the governments of Western Europe and their communities because the rise of Zionism was a direct response to their anti-Semitism. (Chapters 15, 16) Thus Zionism, once initiated and established, would not simply dissipate, but, if Britain had been knocked out of the war, or had negotiated its way out through an armistice – in either case losing control of Palestine – the prospects for a Jewish state or a less formal Jewish homeland in accordance with the Balfour Declaration would have died with Britain's control of Palestine. This means that although Jewish aspirations for a homeland there would have remained, the political effort to achieve it at that time would have subsided. It would have been 'on hold' or in abeyance until such time that circumstances led to its reappearance.

In the circumstances such a subsidence in the vigour of Zionism would have contributed to a rapid change in the political and social environment in the Soviet Union. Stalin had beaten most of the organized Zionist activity out of existence before the war started but it was renewed by the influx of Jewish refugees from the Eastern Europe with the outbreak of war. The Jewish population of the Soviet Union was about three million before the outbreak of war but by the time of Barbarossa it was about five million. About 1.2 million were absorbed in the joint German-Soviet annexation of Poland; an additional 300,000 trekked in as refugees from German occupied areas; an estimated 280,000 were absorbed when the Romanian provinces of Bessarabia and Northern Bukovina were incorporated in June 1940; and another 265,000 when the Baltic States of Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania were annexed.

When Barbarossa was launched most of those who were not trapped and slaughtered or transported to German labour camps trekked east, further into Soviet territory. With Britain still in the war a high percentage of the refugees naturally clung to the hope that they might find Zion at the end of the rainbow yet, and those who showed any Zionist tendencies were among the first to join the enormous numbers of detainees already in Soviet labour camps. Reports indicate that "a sizeable percentage" of the 400,000 newly acquired Soviet subjects who were sent to labour or concentration camps were Jews.²⁰¹ It is reasonable to assume that if Britain was out of the war and there was no prospect of finding a home in Palestine, those people would have been more welcome, more eager to stay and settle, and that their contribution to the development of the Soviet Union to the east of the regions which were controlled by Germany would have been even more significant. Hitler would have pressed the Soviet Union to accept the total Jewish population of occupied Europe – and that was most of it – and with the natural tendency of immigrants and refugees from a common ethnic heritage to settle together, it is highly likely that the BiraBidzhan scheme would have become a success and not a failure. And in addition, with Belarus and the Western Ukraine lost to Germany; with many industries therefore forfeited altogether; with many more partly dismantled and being reconstructed on new secure sites further east; and with a substantial proportion of the Soviet Union's most productive agricultural land also lost to Hitler, the need for rapid redevelopment was urgent. The technical and professional skills which the Jewish refugees possessed would have been of enormous benefit to their new country – as they were wherever the survivors eventually settled. Thus, not only would the domestic relationships within the Soviet Union would have been substantially revised, the balance of Jewish populations across the Diaspora would have been quite different, and the post war relationships between the West and the Soviet Union could have been very different indeed. But none of that happened. Stalin was talked out of his bid for an armistice, so we turn to those key dates hinging around Barbarossa and his aborted armistice discussions.

... A DATE WITH DESTINY ...

~ 1939

~ October.

~ 11: Sachs proposed to Roosevelt that the US should develop an atomic bomb to dispose of Hitler.

~ 21: First meeting of the President's Advisory Committee on Uranium.

~ 28: Pius XII issued Summi Pontificatus (Darkness over the Earth) with absolutely no encouragement for Jewish rights. (Chapter 23)

~ November

~ 1: Pius XII issued Sertum Laetitiae, the special American encyclical, calling for special joint efforts for peace by the US and the Vatican so that "attempts with which the enemies secretly banded together seek to pull down the Scepter of Christ (may) be a spur to us to work in union for the establishment and advancement of His reign."

~ December

~ Roosevelt exchanged personal representatives with Pius XII, who stepped up pressure against the Soviet Union while the Vatican press stepped up pressure against the Jews.

~ 1940

~ July

~ A note from the Mufti for Hitler was handed to von Pappen who gave no encouragement for the Arabs to expect strong German support or intervention in Arab-Jewish affairs. Relations with the Arab states was a matter for Italy. While the Arabs did not want Italian intervention, given the Vatican's relations with Mussolini, they had no reason to fear that there would be Italian pressure for accelerated Jewish settlement.

~ August

~ Another Arab approach was made to obtain a German declaration consistent with Arab aspirations and their right to solve the Jewish problem in Palestine in a manner which conformed to the national interests of the Arabs, and proposing the resumption of diplomatic ties between Iraq and Germany; a favourable position for Germany in the Iraqi oil industry; and the resumption of the anti-British revolt in Palestine and Transjordan, for which logistical and financial support was requested. No conclusive arrangements were agreed because of the state of relations between Germany, Italy and Vichy France. (Chapter 24)

~ 1941

~ January

~ The Arabs were still pressing for talks with Hitler.

~ March

~ 1: Bulgaria 'adhered' to the Tripartite Pact (unknown to the Soviet Union).

~ April

~ Iraq broke with Britain and sought urgent support from Germany to ensure its independence.

- ~ May
- ~ Hitler supplied aircraft to support Iraq against the British, but to no avail.
- ~ June
- ~ ²²: Operation Barbarossa.
- ~ July
- ~ 7: With Roosevelt's authority, and by arrangement with Britain, United States troops occupied Iceland.
- ~ 9: Roosevelt announced that no American soldiers would fight in a European war.
- ~ 12: Anglo-Soviet Mutual Assistance Agreement. Each government agreed not to enter into a separate peace with Germany, and Roosevelt then 'did a Churchill,' approving a declaration by the US State Department that to give aid to the Communist power would benefit American security.
- ~ 14: Britain's assessment committee advised the government that an atomic bomb was feasible and recommended that it proceed to the development stage forthwith.
- ~ 16: Hitler 'reminded' senior ministers and officials of his aims in the newly conquered lands. Germany would dominate the Russian territory up to the Urals; the entire Baltic was to be incorporated into Germany; the Crimea was to be evacuated by all foreigners and settled by Germans only, as Reich territory; the Kola Peninsula and its large nickel mines would be taken by Germany; Finland would be annexed, with caution, as a federated territory; Leningrad would be razed and the area then handed over to the Finns; German colonies on the Volga would be annexed outright; the Baku oil fields would become a German concession; and the army was to be assisted by the specialist Einsatzgruppen in the task of eliminating Commissars and rounding up the Jews for transport to the labour camps or for any appropriate treatment.
- ~ 20: Anglo-Soviet naval cooperation took effect when a British mine layer began operations to disrupt German supply routes to the German-Soviet front. Three days later a task force of two aircraft carriers, two cruisers and six destroyers was despatched to join that action.
- ~ 21: First long-range air raid on Moscow.
- ~ 24: Japanese troops landed in Indochina by arrangement with Vichy French authorities.
- ~ 25: Britain and Russia jointly occupied the oil regions of Iran in anticipation of another German leapfrog in the Middle East.

First Armistice discussions: German-Russian front was close to (but did not include) Leningrad, Smolensk, Bryansk, Kiev and Odessa.²⁰² Stalin, Beria and Molotov discussed the possibility of an approach to Hitler for an armistice. Hitler, whose aim to get to the Ural Mountains was known to them, was to be 'bought off' with a large part of the Ukraine, Byelorussia and Moldavia plus control of the Baltic States in return for an armistice. The Bulgarian ambassador in Moscow, Ivan Stamenov, was asked to act as an intermediary to get the message to Hitler, but he refused, saying that even if they had to retreat to the Urals they would still win in the end.²⁰³

- ~ 26: Roosevelt ordered seizure of all Japanese assets in the US.
- ~ 27: German forces encircled Smolensk, preventing re-supply by rail from Moscow.
- ~ 29: New Soviet defence line established 150 miles west of Moscow.
- Hopkins advised Stalin that 200 US fighters were being shipped to Archangel – 18 days before Congress approved the aid budget.
- ~ 30: Britain announced the Polish-Russian Accord which it had brokered. Hitler was incensed.
- ~ 31: Göring issued ‘the Fuhrer Order on the Final Solution.’
- ~ August
- ~ 13: Atlantic Charter. “... after the final destruction of the Nazi tyranny (the leaders) hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries.” It was the next nearest thing to a US declaration of war against Germany which Roosevelt could make.
- ~ 15: Congress approved five billion dollars for Lend Lease aid to the Soviet Union.
- ~ October
- ~ 2: Operation Typhoon: German forces surged forward, broke through the Russian defences, and Hitler announced that the Bolsheviks’ three greatest industrial complexes would soon be in German hands.
- ~ 7: Second Armistice discussions: German forces had occupied Orel, Dnepropetrovsk, and Berdyansk on the Sea of Azov, but the front had not yet reached Kalinin, Bryansk, Vyazna, Kaluga or Mariupol (Yalta).²⁰⁴ Stalin again ordered Beria to approach the Bulgarian ambassador to act as an intermediary to seek terms from Hitler. He was reported as saying that he was ready to accept a “new Brest peace’ as Lenin had in 1918. Apparently the ambassador again refused to act.²⁰⁵
- ~ 9: Britain advised the US, and Stalin is believed to have learned at the same time from a sympathetic British scientist through Russia’s intelligence network, that British research showed that an atomic bomb could be built with a 25 pound core which might explode with the force of 1,800 tonnes of TNT. The information was withheld from Stalin by his British and American Allies.²⁰⁶
- ~ November
- ~ 30: At their meeting in Berlin Hitler assured the Mufti that after German forces broke through the Caucasus their objective would be not the occupation of Arab lands but the destruction of the Jewish homeland. They discussed the best means of recruiting Arab troops to the Nazi banner and the Mufti promptly commenced a broadcasting campaign to recruit Arabs for a new Arab Legion to rise up and overthrow the Allies in the Middle East. He also called for Muslims from Europe to join Hitler’s armies. The plan for a Middle Eastern Arab Legion failed, but some 6,000 Muslims were recruited to fight on the Russian front.²⁰⁷

~ December

- ~ 1: The leading German Panzer division reached within 12 miles of the Kremlin in the suburbs of Moscow. In Tokyo, Togo reported in detail to the Japanese Imperial Conference on the failed US-Japan negotiations while Japan's fleets waited for final instructions on whether to sail to battle stations.
- ~ 2: German General Halder and foreign observers believed a Soviet request for an armistice was imminent. Churchill knew that if that occurred there would be concurrent drives west by the Germans and south by the Japanese. He desperately needed an incident which would draw or impel the United States into the war, and strategies which would keep the Soviet Union in as well. He had to show them more support.
- ~ 5: Soviet Armies, reinforced by reserves brought from the Pacific border, launched a counter offensive against the German front. Britain, plus each of its settler-dominated dominions, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Canada, declared war against Finland, Hungary and Romania (which had each been coerced into the war by Hitler) in the show of support which Churchill had wanted.
- ~ 6: The US atomic bomb research project was shifted from the theoretical studies committee to the Office of Scientific Research and Development.
- ~ 7: Pearl Harbour: the United States in is the war – properly.
- ~ 12: Churchill instructed Eden to draw Russia into the war against Japan, provided it would not impair their western front, and saying “it is for consideration whether the exercise of any pressure required should be by the Americans rather than ourselves.”²⁰⁸ Propaganda about Britain and the United States helping their Soviet brothers in distress was stepped up but there was no mention of the desperation efforts being made to keep them in the war.
- ~ 16–17. In accordance with Churchill's instruction to draw Russia into the war against Japan, Eden talked with Stalin on two successive days about a post-war carve-up of Eastern Europe, dangling the carrot of territorial gain in front of him. Stalin grasped for the carrots, making acceptance of the British plan subject to certain conditions. The Baltic States were to be included within the USSR, the 1941 Finnish-Soviet frontier was to be recognized, the Soviet Union should gain some special facilities for bases from Romania, and the ‘Curzon Line’ should form the basis of the future Polish-Soviet frontier. Stalin said that Austria should be restored as an independent state; the Rhineland and Bavaria could also be independent; East Prussia should be transferred to Poland; the Sudetenland should be returned to Czechoslovakia; Albania should regain its independence; Yugoslavia should be restored and receive additional territory from Italy; and Greece should be restored to its former boundaries except that there should be island boundary adjustments between Greece and Turkey, with Turkey also receiving certain territories from Bulgaria and northern Syria.²⁰⁹ [These appear to be mainly corrections to some of the territorial ‘adjustments’ made after the First World War.]

~ 1942

~ January

~ 21: The Wannsee Conference. Planning and construction of gas chambers for the Final Solution began in earnest. The Holocaust was soon in full swing, and the world struggled on through another three and a half years of slaughter and destruction.

... AND A LESSON IN USING ONE'S FRIENDS

Churchill played at being an intimate friend with Stalin until late in the war. Then, again totally disregarding, or being unable to appreciate, his own role in Anglo-Soviet history and not wishing to admit either Britain's manipulation of Russia or its dependence on it, he had several things to say in quick succession about Britain's position in relation to Russia and the Far East.

~ 1945

~ May

~ 12: In a letter to Truman Churchill said he was "profoundly concerned about the European situation" he noted that the American Air Force had already begun to move from Europe to the Pacific theatre; its armies were also moving out; the Canadians would certainly leave; Britain's armies were likely to undergo marked reduction; and "the French are weak and difficult to deal with." Then:

Anyone can see that in a very short space of time our armed power on the Continent will have vanished, except for moderate forces to hold down Germany.

Meanwhile what is to happen about Russia? [He listed a range of anxieties about Soviet ambitions, and continued.]

An iron curtain²¹⁰ is drawn down upon their front. We do not know what is going on behind. ...

Surely it is vital now to come to an understanding with Russia, or see where we are with her, before we weaken our armies mortally or retire to the zones of occupation.²¹¹

~ 14: Only two days later Churchill wrote to Lord Halifax, then in Washington:

We desire the entry of the Soviets into the war against Japan at the earliest moment.

Having regard to their own great interests in the Far East, they will not need to be begged, nor should their entry be purchased at the cost of concessions prejudicing a reign of freedom and justice in Central Europe or the Balkans.²¹² [Emphasis added.]

~ 26: Two weeks later Churchill returned to the same theme in a note for Truman via

Ambassador Davies, adding a touch of the amorphous Christian gels' self-righteousness:

It must be remembered that Britain and the United States are united at this time upon the same ideologies, namely, freedom, and the principles set out in the American Constitution and humbly reproduced in the Atlantic Charter. The Soviet Government have a different philosophy, namely, Communism, and use to the full the methods of police government, which they are applying in every state which has fallen a victim to their liberating arms. The Prime Minister cannot readily bring himself to accept the idea that the position of the United States is that Britain and Soviet Russia are just two foreign powers, six of one and half a dozen of the other, with whom the troubles of the late war have to be adjusted.

Except in so far as force is concerned, there is no equality between right and wrong. *The great causes and principles for which Britain and the United States have suffered and triumphed are not mere matters of the balance of power. They in fact involve the salvation of the world.*²¹³ [Emphasis added.]

In Churchill's view there was to be no place in the sun for Russia, only a return to isolation. Britain had been saved from an enforced and ignominious armistice, firstly, by the ally which he was appealing to yet again, the US, through the Lend Lease program, and, secondly, by Russian perseverance. However Churchill was now saying, in effect, "we cannot contribute to a final fling against Japan; we need Russia to do it for us; but they will subjugate another country (Korea) in the process, while we are the world's salvation, but we then need protection from our own 'saviour.'" He could not recognize that he had been quick to use police state methods himself when it suited him, as in his proposal to send strikers to the trenches in the First World War in the middle of widely publicized gas attacks; in the round-up of 'aliens' for deportation at the beginning of the war, or in the repressive measures he had insisted on in India to make it toe the imperial line in 1942. (Chapter 24.)

Nor could Churchill admit that the "great cause" which Britain had gone to war for was to hold on to its colonies and its territorial rights, and in particular those in China which were slipping through its fingers very quickly. In fact Truman's predecessor, Roosevelt, had very deliberately and firmly cut Churchill out of discussions with Stalin about Russia's involvement in the final manoeuvres in the war against Japan and what territorial 'benefits' there might be for each of them. He had humiliated Churchill by simply requiring him to sign Britain's assent to an agreement – after it had been made in secret – that Russia would retain joint control, with China, of the Manchuria railway, enjoy the reinstatement of its rights to a naval base at Port Arthur and port facilities at the adjacent harbour of Dairen, the recovery of the southern portion of Sakhalin Island which Japan had seized in 1904, and the "acquisition" from Japan of its Kurile Islands.²¹⁴ There was absolutely no suggestion of Britain recovering any territorial rights in China except Hong Kong which was a convenient geographic entity on the coast. Similarly, the agreement that Japanese forces north of the 38th parallel in Korea would surrender to Russia while those to the south would surrender to the United States was made between those two countries without British involvement,²¹⁵ and even though Churchill agreed with the "fair and bright" decision to "cast" two atomic bombs on Japan, and Truman discussed it with him before he told Stalin, the US president simply obliged Churchill to acknowledge the decision. He was not part of it.²¹⁶ And although the American-Soviet decision had to stand, Churchill changed his mind on Russia's involvement in the war against Japan in the light of that decision. He wrote in his memoirs that:

- Moreover we should not need the Russians. The end of the Japanese war no longer depended upon the pouring in of their armies for the final and perhaps protracted slaughter. We had no need to ask favours of them. A few days later I minuted to Mr. Eden: “It is quite clear that the United States do not at the present time desire Russian participation in the war against Japan.” The array of European problems could therefore be faced on their merits and according to the broad principles of the United Nations.²¹⁷ [Emphasis added.]

That is hardly consistent with either his sentiments or his actions, and the carrots he instructed Eden to dangle in front of Stalin to keep Russia in the war, when Hitler’s Operation Typhoon – the kick-restart after Operation Barbarossa had run out of steam – was rolling towards Moscow, when Stalin was contemplating an armistice, and when Churchill could see the Third Reich Armies about to dismantle Britain’s empire. But it was consistent with the attitudes which were coming to the surface in the administrations in both London and Washington, and it was soon apparent that the Second World War had been little more than an interlude in the East-West or West East game of ‘beggar my neighbour.’ A mass of consultations had been proceeding between the Soviet Union, the United States and Britain over the situation in the Far East and about demilitarization and reconstruction in Europe – especially Eastern Europe where the devastation had been greatest. Then in July, before he left to meet Churchill and Stalin at Potsdam, while Britain and the United States were still at war with Japan, while they were still trying to persuade the Soviet Union to enter that war with them, and before Truman had finally shared his ‘secret’ of the new weapon with Stalin, he had put to Congress a request that Export-Import Bank’s post-war loan authority be increased from $700 million to $3.5 billion, of which $1 billion was to be earmarked for the Soviet Union. As expected, Congress approved, and on August 28, the Soviet Union formally applied for the loan. The timing of that application and its immediate approval in principle is noteworthy. It was 20 days after the Soviet Union had entered the war against Japan; 17 days after the United States had partitioned Korea; 14 days after Japan’s surrender had been accepted; but before the United States command and troops landed there or the United States had handed its Allies the terms of the occupation which they had to agree to. But nothing more happened about the loan, and the year dragged to a close.

~ 1946

~ January

- ~ 28: When the economic advisers to US missions in Europe met in conference in Paris for four days they decided that the United States should withhold aid from the Soviet Union unless it accepted the principle of multilateralism and opened the door to Eastern Europe for American enterprise.

The leaders in the West expected Stalin to take the sort of treatment being metered out to him like an obedient lamb, to forget about their attitudes and policies before the war, and to let them go about running the world as they wished. But even if he had been unusually naïve and had misjudged the situation badly in the weeks leading up to Barbarossa, he recognized his allies for what they were, and his speech to the party faithful in preparation for the rubber-stamp-election of the new Supreme Soviet only a few days after that Paris conference set alarm bells ringing in Washington. It was six months after the US-determined partition of Korea and the occupation of Japan, and five months since the $1 billion reconstruction loan had been agreed in principle. It was:

~ February

~ 9: Stalin spoke first of the causes of the war, returning to expressions that were Marxist-Leninist commonplaces, especially in the 30's, but had not been heard for 5 years.

He said that the Second World War had not been the result of mistakes by a particular statesman, although mistakes had undoubtedly been made. The war "was the inevitable result of the development of world economic and political forces on the basis of modern monopoly capitalism ... [and] ... the capitalist system of world economy harbours elements of general crisis and armed conflicts and ... the development of world capitalism in our time proceeds not in the form of smooth and even progress but through crisis and military catastrophes." These might perhaps be avoided "if it were possible for raw materials and markets to be periodically redistributed among various countries in accordance with their economic importance, by agreement and peaceable settlement." Then came the crunch. "But it is impossible to do so under present capitalist conditions of the development of world economy. Thus the First World War was the result of the first crisis of the capitalist system of world economy, and the Second World War the result of a second crisis." As he continued, Western observers took him to mean that in the current circumstances a third world war was inevitable and that if it was "an anti-fascist war, a war of liberation," one aim of which was the restoration of democratic liberties rather than just a fight for control of resources and economic power, the Soviet Union could enter on the side of the Allies and enhance the war's anti-fascist and liberation character. But if it was not? Victory had vindicated the policies of heavy industrialization and agricultural collectivization. The aims of the Soviet Union's next five year plan would be to rehabilitate ravaged areas of the country, restore and surpass prewar levels in industry and agriculture, extend the production of consumer goods, and construct all manner of scientific research institutions. "I have no doubt," Stalin said, "that if we give our scientists proper assistance they will be able in the near future not only to overtake but surpass the achievements of science beyond the boundaries of our country."²¹⁸

British officials took Stalin's speech in their stride, but it "profoundly affected" Americans. Justice William Douglas of the US Supreme Court regarded it as "the declaration of World War Three;" the director of the State Department's Office of European Affairs said it was "the most important and authoritative guide to post-war Soviet society;" and the head of mission at the embassy in Moscow saw it as the chance he had been waiting for! He cabled the State Department that the West must: "muster up the political manliness to deny to Russia either moral or material support for the consolidation of Russian power throughout Eastern and Central Europe." Failing that, he argued, there was no alternative but to divide Germany, divide

Europe into spheres of influence, and draw the line “beyond which we cannot afford to permit the Russians to exercise unchallenged power.”²¹⁹

- ~ 21: The State Department decided to act. Kennan’s 8,000 word cable became a blueprint for United States’ policy of “containment” towards the Soviet Union; hundreds of copies were distributed through the Cabinet Office and the Navy; and it was published as a supplement to the State Department’s Office of European Affairs Weekly Review.²²⁰

The State Department then advised the Soviet ambassador that the $1 billion credit was “one among a number of outstanding economic questions” and proposed that “negotiations” cover not only the loan but outstanding Lend Lease obligations, claims by US nationals against the Soviet Union, copyright protection, free navigation of rivers, civil aviation, a treaty of friendship and commerce, and the use of “democratic means” for the Eastern European countries to solve their pressing economic problems. It also suggested that the Soviet Union send observers to the first meeting of the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund on March 8, and the New York Times very conveniently ran a story that the Soviet loan request had been lost. The pace of events then quickened.²²¹

- ~ March

- ~ 15: After its observer had attended that meeting the Soviet Union advised that it would discuss only long term credit, the Lend Lease obligations and a treaty.

In the circumstances Henry Wallace urged Truman to make a new approach along economic and trade lines, saying: “We know that much of the recent Soviet behaviour which has caused us concern has been the result of their dire economic needs and their disturbed sense of security. The events of the past few months have thrown the Soviets back to their pre-1939 fears of ‘capitalist encirclement’ and to their erroneous belief that the Western World, including the USA, is invariably and unanimously hostile.” Truman ignored that advice, preferring that of Churchill next day.²²²

- ~ 16: In a speech at Fulton, Missouri, USA, Churchill resorted to his Second World War-type rhetoric with a statement – a repetition of that in his May 1945 letter to Truman, that an “Iron Curtain” had descended between the countries of the East and the West.

In doing so, Churchill aggravated the tension and perpetuated the ideological divide between Capitalism and Communism in the public mind and gave the US administration the justification for continuing along the path they had set. SO:

WHAT IF THERE HAD BEEN AN ARMISTICE?

The sequence of events and all available evidence indicates that if Stalin and his colleagues had used an alternative channel of communication to Hitler to propose and to negotiate an armistice when they first sought the help of Bulgarian Ambassador Stamenov late in July, 1941, the war on Germany’s eastern front would have ground to a halt very quickly. Britain would then have come under enormous pressure to seek an armistice also. It would have found it very difficult indeed to justify a decision not to do so, and it would have had to consider the likely loss of support of key allies, not only the United States, if it chose to continue the war. It is surprising that Stalin, Beria and Molotov, having twice sought the help of Stamenov, three months apart, did not try an alternative channel when he refused to cooperate. We shall return to this issue shortly. However they did not, and the opportunity for an armistice was lost.

To grasp the consequences of Stalin's decision to let drop the opportunity for an armistice, it is necessary to look at the situation from two points of view: first, the consequences of the war continuing in the wake of Barbarossa without an armistice, and second, the probable course of events if an armistice had been agreed.

THE EFFECTS OF A MISSED OPPORTUNITY

1. Europe

The most obvious consequence of continuing the war was the colossal death and destruction which occurred in Europe from that point forward. In Eastern Europe, at the end of July, 1941, when Stalin first discussed an armistice with Stamenov the German-Soviet battle front extended from the head of the Gulf of Finland, adjacent to Leningrad, along a line south, close to Smolensk, Bryansk and Kiev to Odessa on the Black Sea, but excluding each of those cities. The Soviet territory which had fallen to Germany, not including its share of Poland and the Baltic States which Stalin and Hitler had carved up between them, was limited to Belarus and the western half of the Ukraine. Thus far only that area, plus Poland and the Baltic States, had suffered massive devastation and carnage. By October 7, when Stalin ordered the second armistice approach, the devastated area had increased by about 25 per cent. By December 4, when the extent of Soviet territory occupied reached its pre-winter peak, the increase was about 50 per cent. But by November 12, 1942, when the area occupied by Germany reached its peak in the unsuccessful battle for Stalingrad, it had doubled. Then, over the next two and a half years that total area was fought over with unprecedented ferocity for the second time as the Soviet forces pushed the Germans back.

In contrast, in the western half of Europe the German occupation had been so swift that destruction and death had been relatively light. During the occupation phase of the war the people of those countries suffered trauma enough, certainly, but until the Allied invasions began, the main trauma for civilians was the roundup, deportation and slaughter of the Jewish and Gypsy populations, the terminally and mentally ill, the criminal, and the political opposition, plus Allied air attacks on military or industrial targets which were important to the German war effort and which were within the limited range of Allied bombers in Britain.

The greater extent of the death and destruction in Western Europe occurred during the return bout when the Germans fought with great determination as the Allies battered their way towards Berlin. It was not until two years after Stalin's initial attempt to set up armistice negotiations that Allied invasions began in the central Mediterranean, (Sicily in July 1943 and Italy in September), and it was another year before landings occurred in Southern France (August 1944) and northern France (September 1944). The appeals which Stalin made for the opening of a western front in order to draw some of the German forces away from the eastern front – which was where the Allies wanted them to stay – suggest that if he had known how the situation would unfold he would have pursued an armistice with more enthusiasm. He interpreted non-intervention in Europe by the Western Allies as confirmation that they were more interested in retaining control of the colonies of the Far East and the resources of the Middle East than they were in relieving the occupied areas of Europe. The strains which resulted were a significant factor in hardening Stalin's determination to secure a buffer zone, so that every decision or response which either half of the alliance of convenience made – east or west – contributed to the slide into the Cold War mentality. In the meantime the blanket of death and destruction had been spread over much of North Africa, the Middle East, Asia and the Pacific as well.

2. THE STRUCTURAL DEBATE

By May 1945, Soviet forces had reoccupied all Soviet territory and had either destroyed or pushed the German forces out of most of Eastern Europe. The tenacity of the German defence as its armies were gradually pushed backwards into a shrinking area was fueled by two factors: Hitler's fanatical determination, and civilian fear of the consequences of the unconditional surrender which the Allies repeatedly demanded. The result was that Europe was left in such a state that Western political and business leaders feared being swamped by Communism. Not by revolution, that was not seriously expected, but by the established democratic processes of the ballot box. This, coupled with Soviet determination to maintain a buffer zone of friendly suzerain states, and the knife-edge state of the US economy, led to non-cooperation, the adoption of the Marshall Plan, scare-mongering, misinformation, and propaganda which drew heavily on the techniques developed prior to the war and refined as the war progressed, and to the economic and political division of Europe. The Cold War.

The victorious Western Allies, with the United States calling the tune, perpetuated the myth that their form of democracy was the only acceptable form of participatory government. They could not simply say that what we want is the system which provides for most rapid and unfettered commercial development. They conveniently forget that before the war, even excluding the Soviet Union, more than half of Europe's people were living under Fascist rule or with variously restricted suffrage and that this was the system which the Vatican, the dominant wing of the Christian Church, had preferred, actively promoted, and sought to strengthen by means of its system of concordats. That was the system which gave the Roman Catholic Church the greatest influence in determining social policy. It simply was not correct to distinguish between the East and the West on the basis that one was "free" and the other was not. The United States was just as determined that its version of the freedom of man should apply everywhere as it had been after the First World War. It had insisted on the dismantling of the German monarchy at that stage (chapter 16), but Hitler had subsequently succeeded in reshaping the constitution to suit him. The pope was reluctantly accommodating the system which the US wanted to impose on Italy because he needed US support to ward off Communism, and the US administration already had its mind set on reconstructing Japan in a mould of its design as soon as it possibly could. (chapter 27) It was determined that there would be no return to Fascism in any of the countries of Europe, especially Germany, and it was eager to see a few less monarchies. So after the war in Europe had ground to a halt the United States sought to ensure that the new systems of government which would be set up in Europe would be compatible with its commercial and political interests. As the country which had “saved” the free world, that was its entitlement, surely. Who could argue?

Every country which had been occupied by Germany needed a new constitution, not just Germany, and unencumbered self determination was a luxury which they could not be allowed to enjoy in case they made the wrong choice. No one said from the steps of the Capitol: “this is the system which we want to impose on you.” Dulles, his diplomats, MacArthur and delegates at the United Nations and Bretton Woods did it for them – whether it was face to face or behind closed doors did not matter – and a few papal encyclicals did the rest. Ordinary people were simply left to assume that whenever the United States intervened in the planning and administration processes it was doing to protect existing freedoms as if all of Europe had been accustomed to its system, and that the Soviet Union was trying to impose a system which no one would possibly want.

3. ASIA, AFRICA, LATIN AMERICA

Asia was left with one of its two major powers, Japan, bombed into abject submission, under occupation and undergoing its Christian Reconstruction by courtesy of MacArthur. The other, China, the world’s most populous nation, was in a state of civil war and was about to come under Communist rule. It would join a community of nations which, at its short term peak before the United States intervened to overthrow the elected Allende government in Chile, encompassed one third of the world population.²²³ In addition, much of the Asian region was in turmoil as the colonial powers struggled to reassert their authority and the people tried to prevent them in a series of rolling wars of decolonization.

Africa was also in turmoil. The northern region had been a battle ground of the European powers as they contested control of the resources and strategic facilities of both that region and the Middle East, and the trade and communications routes between Europe and Asia. In southern Africa the National Party government in South Africa was taking full advantage of strained relationships in the wake of the war to pursue its Apartheid policy. And in the balance of the continent national liberation movements were flexing their muscles for a decolonization push while the corporations of the United States and Europe stepped up their efforts to gain access to, and control of, natural resources before the political climate could change.

In Latin America, within a few years – and totally inconsistent with both the Monroe Doctrine and its anti-Fascist stand – the United States would be ruthlessly removing a legitimately elected Communist government in Chile; actively propping up a series of right wing dictatorships; and unashamedly using the CIA to protect its commercial interests. Its leaders would justify all of that on the grounds that Latin America was “different.” Latin America was not like Europe. It had never been accustomed to democracy. It had had its Christian reconstruction instead, by courtesy of Rominus Pontifex, Pope Alexander VI’s Papal Bull of Demarcation and the Treaty of Tordesillas. (Chapter 9)

In general, the world was left in a state of shock and disbelief at the extent of death and destruction which modern warfare produced; the scale and consequences of Hitler’s attempted Final Solution; and the horrendous potential of nuclear warfare. It struggled to come to grips with what it all meant and to suppress the anti-Semitism which was at the root of it. At the same time that it sought to cope with massive economic and social dislocation and reconstruction; and the churches struggled to salve their consciences and to try to convince the world that it was not really a religious issue, but a socio-political one with theological overtones and lessons. Surprisingly quickly the world had to go through a phase of decolonization and the amorphous Christian gel had to welcome into membership of its ‘victors’ club’ a lot of people whose interests and aspirations were different to their own.

4. THE BRIGHT SIDE

However, there was a bright side. People would soon be distracted from all of the turmoil by the pace of postwar developments in the production of goods and the provision of services. The “benefits” of a few years of war through accelerated scientific and technical research and development were enormous. The most obvious of the “benefits” was the frenetic development of nuclear technology. To justify the enormous expenditure which had been required to develop the atomic bomb and the cost in death and destruction through the use of a couple of demonstration models, the United States and Britain promoted the development of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy as quickly as possible. Unlimited electricity generation was to be just the start. The world’s ships would soon be powered by clean, cheap, safe nuclear power plants which would greatly reduce the consumption of fossil fuels, reduce atmospheric contamination and release petroleum resources for use in the petrochemicals industries. In addition the prospects for the use of nuclear technology in medicine were intriguing, and scientists had hardly scratched the surface. The war – or the development of powerful rockets by Hitler’s scientists – had demonstrated that space travel was feasible. Developments in aircraft design and jet propulsion, coupled with the other developments, would soon make long distance travel so cheap and easy that international boundaries would soon mean little and people could travel freely wherever they wished.

So it went on. The synthetic and organic chemicals industries, primarily based on the use of petroleum derivatives, would revolutionize agriculture through the development of pesticides, fertilizers, vaccines and drugs for the prevention and treatment of all kinds of ailments. Plagues associated with poor hygiene, lack of sanitation, poverty, famine and pestilence would soon all be things of the past. The use of plastics and synthetic fibres would revolutionize packaging, fabrication, clothing and textiles and construction, simplifying transport and merchandising and having both direct and indirect impact on the transport industries. Advanced metallurgy would have a similar impact. In the fields of electrical goods, electronics and optics the developments and the benefits had to be seen to be believed. Land line telephones and radios were joined by television, fax machines, computers and satellite transmission; refrigerators and washing machines came within reach of the ordinary household – at least in the Western world; and typesetting and printing were revolutionized.

Hand in hand with these developments was a surge in the provision of education services at every level. That surge was both a requirement of the developments taking place and a consequence of them, and it very soon developed a momentum of its own, spiral fashion, with the spiral becoming more like a vortex, picking up everything in its path and tossing it out, not as trash but as the source material or fuel for ever more rapid accumulation of knowledge about our existence, life and resources, and ensuring developments and opportunities at an ever expanding rate.

But that process and its outcomes became yet another challenge to the church's authority. One aspect of that challenge has already been noted: the development of the 'big bang' theory (see above, A challenge of astronomical proportions). Another was forming from a combination of the scientific discoveries, education, and commercial exploitation of social freedom, and yet another separate challenge, the Kinsey Report (chapter 28) which had directly challenged the Vatican's social encyclicals: human sexuality and sexual freedom. We shall come to these later.

THE SPILLED MILK: WHAT MIGHT NOT HAVE BEEN

However, by considering the decisions and actions which were taken subsequent to Stalin's first aborted armistice discussion we can assess, with reasonable confidence, what the situation would have been if he had taken another step and proceeded to negotiate an armistice. Some of the key decisions and actions taken after that date are listed, in sequence, below. The list is not exhaustive by any means. In fact to list the decisions and actions taken by one or other of the colonial powers of the amorphous Christian gel with the aim of perpetuating their position of privilege (or keeping others under subjection) which had either short term or long term adverse flow-on effects for humanity would be a worthwhile exercise for Christian theologians who want to explore further the nature of Divine Judgement and its relationship to personal salvation.

- Roosevelt ordered the seizure of all Japanese assets in the United States and strengthened Japan's resolve to protect its position.
- Britain announced the Polish-Russian Accord in an effort to galvanize Polish and Soviet resistance. Hitler was incensed and Göring issued the Fuhrer Order on the Final Solution next day.

- Churchill and Roosevelt issued the Atlantic Charter with its 'final destruction' clause, then Roosevelt announced Lend Lease aid for the Soviet Union, so Hitler ordered the acceleration of plans for Operation Typhoon.
- Britain and the US withheld their first secrets on the feasibility of atomic bombs from the Soviet Union and unwittingly set up an atmosphere of mistrust.
- The Allied stand resulted directly in Hitler's change of heart on the Middle East and his decision for a strategic understanding with the Mufti of Jerusalem and the Arabs.
- Britain declared war on Finland in a further bid to keep the Soviet Union in the war.
- Roosevelt lifted the US atomic research project from the theoretical to the development phase.
- Pearl Harbour: Roosevelt dragged the US into war with him.
- Churchill dangled the carrot of territorial advantage in front of Stalin in yet another bid to keep him in the war.
- Hitler took his next step towards the Final Solution with the convening of the Wannsee Conference and preparation of plans for the construction of gas chambers.
- Churchill ignored Roosevelt's advice and pressed on with his India program and declined to negotiate with Japan.
- The Bretton Woods institutions were planned and the socio-economic confrontation between the Capitalist West and the Communist East was invoked.
- The US and Britain insisted on the Soviet Union entering the war against Japan.
- Truman insisted on bombing Hiroshima and Nagasaki
- The US partitioned Korea.
- Japan's surrender was accepted.
- MacArthur sought to enforce the Christianization of Japan.

The approximate human toll for the war was: battle deaths, 15 million; battle wounded, 25 million; civilian deaths, 39 million; prisoners of war, 3 million; total persons directly affected: 82 million.²²⁴ A reasonable estimate of the deaths, casualties and prisoners after Stalin's first aborted armistice discussions in July 1941 is 85 per cent of the total, or 70 million. Add your own guess for the number of persons indirectly affected. The atmosphere in which all subsequent peace, political settlement, reconstruction and development discussions took place, and the attitude of the governments involved would have been quite different if either of Stalin's two approaches were not aborted.

Of fundamental importance: there would have been no nuclear war at that time. Neither Britain nor the United States had gone beyond a theoretical feasibility study. No funds had been committed to development and it is a reasonable conclusion that if an armistice had been achieved – and if Hitler’s Jewish ‘problem’ had therefore been resolved by forced emigration and resettlement elsewhere in the Diaspora – the massive funds required would not have been committed. What country in its right mind would have proceeded with such a commitment? With an armistice in Europe, Churchill’s reasons for wanting to draw Japan into the war would have evaporated. Britain would have been left to resolve the argument over its territorial arrangements in China by some other means, unencumbered by a war in Europe, and there would have been no basis for Britain and the United States drawing Japan into a separate war. Although Roosevelt had ordered the seizure of all Japanese assets in the United States at about the same time as Stalin’s first aborted armistice discussions, that action, on its own, would not have been sufficient to precipitate a war and, in any case, it would have been easily reversible. All this means that Pearl Harbour would not have happened. There simply would have been no Pacific War. There would have been no basis for a confrontation between the East and the West in the way in which it occurred, and the Bretton Woods institutions, if such institutions were set up in due course, would have been set up in quite different circumstances and with somewhat different motivation. There would have been no need and no basis for the Marshall Plan and the division of Europe would have been on a completely different basis. Hitler’s empire would have been big – most of Europe west of a line from the Gulf of Finland to the Black Sea -but the probability is that it would not have remained intact for long. The most likely scenario would have been an extended pause while Soviet leaders licked their wounds and Hitler settled down to exploit his expanded empire until a later date when the Soviet Union would have probably made a bid to recover its lost territory.

The most important consideration would have been that there was a completely different basis on which the world would have been enabled – or required – to reflect on the trouble in the triangle. As already noted the trouble in the triangle would not have gone away: it would have simply been manifest in different circumstances. In view of the consequences of Stalin’s failure to pursue an alternative channel for an armistice the question must be considered: why did he not pursue a different channel when he was rebuffed twice?

THE BULGARIAN CHANNEL

No political leader likes to accept defeat, regardless of the ethnic cohesion or diversity of the country he or she leads, and regardless of the changes which may be made to the social, economic and political systems of the country. The fact that Stalin did not seek an alternative channel to Hitler after Barbarossa suggests that to some extent he and his colleagues were uncertain about the wisdom of the course they had embarked upon. They would have been committed to surrendering some of their core territory and core populations in order to secure the balance of the Union, and that was a ghastly thought. But politically they were caught between the devil and the deep blue sea. They were at war with a Fascist power which was a part of the amorphous Christian gel, whose system they detested, which equally detested theirs, but with which they had been in an alliance of convenience for a short time. Now, to avoid defeat at the hands of that power, they had to rely on the help of other powers within the amorphous Christian gel which they detested almost equally. They had developed a system which was a very direct and major philosophical challenge to the amorphous Christian gel of Western Capitalism whose leaders, both religious and political, had been hell-bent on destabilizing their system for 33 years. The idea of giving ground to either of them, or of being beholden to either of them, was most unpalatable. In any case it was natural that they would want to avoid ceding territory. No government ever wants to, and no people like being traded like chattels. Systems of government are supposed to be set up to serve the interests of people, not the other way around. So perhaps, in the circumstances of the time, they simply accepted at face value the advice of the Bulgarian ambassador that, with or without the British and American aid available, they could yet reverse the situation, push Hitler's forces back, and maintain their system without conceding to either the Nazis or the Capitalists.

In talking with Stamenov, Stalin, Molotov and Beria believed they were talking with the ambassador of a friendly country which they regarded as an important piece in the jigsaw puzzle of their own Balkans security shield. They did not know that Bulgaria had 'adhered' to the Tripartite Pact (Germany, Italy and Japan) on March 1, and they assumed that it had been overrun by the German forces which moved through Bulgaria to the border with Greece that day. If they had known, the ambassador would have been handed his passport and his marching orders immediately. This means that Ambassador Stamenov was little more than a listening post for Hitler who would have been absolutely delighted, and encouraged in his plans, to know that the Soviet leaders were seeking to negotiate an armistice. It can be assumed that Stamenov reported the Soviet approach to his government, but no references have been found to verify this, nor whether Hitler was advised of the approach. If he was advised, it did not affect the situation, except perhaps to encourage him to drive even harder. He could reasonably expect to get a greater area for his Lebensraum without too much trouble if he kept the pressure up. Both Britain and the Soviet Union knew that Bulgaria had been under strong pressure from Hitler as he manoeuvred to find a route through the Balkans to Britain's soft under-belly, the Middle East, but they did not know that its government had acquiesced and joined the Nazi camp. In a letter to Mussolini on December 31, 1940, Hitler compared Bulgaria with Spain and complained that:

- Bulgaria equally is reluctant to associate herself with the Tripartite Pact and to adopt a clear attitude in her international relations. The growing pressure exercised by Soviet Russia is the cause of this.²²⁵

In turn, Eden complained to Churchill in a memo dated one week later (January 6, 1941) that:

*Politically the attitude of the Bulgarian government causes me grave disquiet. They give the impression of men who have little control of events. Their Press is increasingly under German control, and is now little else but the mouthpiece of Axis propaganda.*²²⁶

He seems to have overlooked the carefully orchestrated control which Chamberlain had exercised over the British press. Then it was Russia's turn to complain. On January 17 the Soviet ambassador advised the German Foreign Office that:

The Soviet Government has stated repeatedly to the German Government that it considers the territory of Bulgaria and the Straits as the security zone of the USSR, and that it cannot be indifferent to events which threaten the security interests of the USSR. In view of all this the Soviet Government regards it as its duty to give warning that it will consider the appearance of any armed forces on the territory of Bulgaria and of the Straits as a violation of the security interests of the USSR.

And on January 28, Churchill wrote to Roosevelt:

*... the advance parties of the German Air Force have already to the extent of several thousand infiltrated themselves into Bulgarian aerodromes, with the full connivance of the Bulgarian Government.*²²⁷ [Emphasis added.]

This all means that Stalin was being advised and 'assisted' by two 'allies,' both of whom had ulterior motives. He already knew that Britain was not driven by altruism. Churchill was absolutely desperate for the Soviet Union to stay in the war as a decoy and a buffer. Within months of Barbarossa Britain would even try to incite the Soviet Union to escalate the war still further by establishing a second front against Japan, with exactly the same motive. (Chapter 24) Bulgaria was committed to aiding Hitler in his invasion and land grab, and the ambassador therefore saw it in both Germany's and Bulgaria's interests to discourage any talk of an armistice. Churchill should have read Mein Kampf and the Qur'anic Night Journey a little more closely. He may have recognized himself as a key player in both the parody and the prophesy. But probably not. He was far too intimately involved. There were two powers which he regarded as powers of evil. He was at war with one of them, he had long tried to suppress the other but he was now desperate to forge an alliance with it. They constituted two of the massive challenges to the theology, self-understanding and conduct of the church – they were the principal political challenges – and they both regarded him as the chief representative of a great power of evil. So did the ordinary people in a lot of European colonies scattered around the world.

It is an important aspect of the parody of Mein Kampf that every decision which Churchill took in his efforts to use and exploit other people to prop up Britain's colonial interests was complicating the plot, tightening the rope on which his 'works' were hanging around his neck and making it progressively more urgent that the trouble in the triangle be disentangled by a thorough reassessment of the theology and self-understanding on which it was based. The hypocrisy and double standards which were a constant feature of colonial policy are illustrated by Churchill's reaction to Stalin's strategic demands when Eden sought to induce him to declare war on Japan at their meeting on December 16. It was still the right of the great powers – and in this case Churchill meant Britain the United States and the Soviet Union – to barter and to carve up other people and their territory to their heart's content, provided you didn't get caught making multiple promises. On December 20, he noted for cabinet:

- Stalin's demands about Finland, Baltic States, and Romania are directly contrary to the first, second and third articles of the Atlantic Charter, to which Stalin has subscribed. There can be no question whatever of our making such an agreement, secret or public, direct or implied, without prior agreement with the US. The time has not yet come to settle frontier questions, which can only be resolved at the Peace Conference when we have won the war. The mere desire to have an agreement which can be published [for political advantage] should never lead us into making wrongful promises.* ... The Russians have got to go on fighting for their lives anyway, and are dependent upon us for very large supplies, which we have most painfully gathered, and which we shall faithfully deliver.²²⁸ [Author's note. Emphasis added.]

That was a lot of sanctimonious humbug. Britain's ability to avoid a humiliating empire-ending armistice was dependent upon Churchill's ability to persuade Stalin to remain in the war. That was, in turn, dependent upon Britain's capacity to provide the aid to enable him to do so, and that was dependent upon Churchill's ability to persuade the United States to support him. It was substantially US aid diverted to the Soviet Union: not British aid. Churchill must have hoped that people would not remember the Balfour Declaration; the McMahon Letter; the motives which prompted the preparation of the Atlantic Charter which he now sought to hide behind; the way in which he proposed to carve up French and Italian colonies in a bid to draw neutral countries into the conflict; or the proposals to use other European powers' African colonies, complete with their people, to buy Hitler off before Britain and France sealed the fate of a carved-up Czechoslovakia – which Stalin now proposed to put back together again. In addition there was the host of contradictory proposals, which were very recent indeed, which were variously planned to isolate Japan and keep it out of the war or to drag it in, first as an ally and later as an enemy as the balance of threats in Europe twisted one way and another and Britain's dependence on United States entry into the war became critical. (Chapter 23) Later, in his memoirs, Churchill wrote:

- NEMESIS personifies “the Goddess of Retribution, who brings down all immoderate good fortune, checks the presumption that attends it, ... and is the punisher of extraordinary crimes.” We must now lay bare the error and vanity of cold-blooded calculation of the Soviet Government and enormous Communist machine, and their amazing ignorance about where they stood themselves. They had shown a total indifference to the fate of the Western Powers, although this meant the destruction of that “Second Front” for which they were soon to clamour. ... Thus they had allowed the whole of the Balkans to be overrun by Germany. They hated and despised the democracies of the West; but the four countries Turkey Romania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia, which were of vital interest to them and their own safety, could all have been combined by the Soviet Government in January with active British aid to form a Balkan front against Hitler.²²⁹

Given the history of error and vanity of cold-blooded calculation set out in previous chapters, the treatment meted out to the Soviet Union by the West from 1917 to 1939, Churchill’s personal role in that history, and his widely publicized attitude towards the Russians as set out above, did he expect them to hug and kiss every Capitalist democrat from the amorphous Christian gel, and weep tears of blood at the fate which was befalling them? He should have been contemplating the Qur’anic Night Journey and the Hebrew Prophets rather than citing Nemesis. In fact Stalin had a worse record than Churchill. Much worse. It was not only his purges of the 1930s which should have been weighing heavily on his conscience, but the secret annex to the plan for the partition of Poland under the German-Soviet Non-Aggression Pact of August 22, 1939 which became his most conspicuous contribution to the trouble in the triangle, surpassing the more general challenge to the church of his involvement in Marxist Communism.

Now, having reviewed the circumstances in which the development of the A-bomb took place, and the circumstances in which, following Barbarossa, Stalin lost interest in an armistice and decided to push on with the war, we can briefly trace the way in which the nuclear arms race and the Cold War, together, became ever more intimately entwined in the trouble in the triangle.

TROUBLE IN THE TRIANGLE: THE ESSENTIAL ‘NUCLEAR ARMS RACE AND COLD WAR DIARY’

~ 1939

~ August

~ 2: Einstein wrote a letter to Roosevelt indicating support for the development of an atomic bomb

~ September

~ 3: Britain declared war against Germany

~ October

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO THE MESSIANIC AGE?

- ~ 11: Sachs delivered Einstein's letter to Roosevelt. The president ordered a study of the feasibility of developing an A-bomb.
- ~ 1941
- ~ June
- ~ 22: Barbarossa
- ~ July
- ~ 15: A British committee decides an A-bomb is feasible and recommends to the government that development should proceed.
- ~ 25: Stalin's first bid for an armistice.
- ~ 31: The Fuhrer Order for the Final Solution.
- ~ August
- ~ 13: The Atlantic Charter
- ~ December
- ~ 6: Responsibility for US A-bomb study was shifted to the Office of Scientific Research and Development
- ~ 7: Pearl Harbour
- ~ 1942
- ~ September
- ~ 23: Roosevelt ordered that the development of an A-bomb proceed under the name Manhattan Project with unrestricted funds.
- ~ 1945
- ~ July
- ~ 16: First atomic bomb test-exploded at Alamogordo, New Mexico, USA. Truman used the news to intimidate Stalin during deliberations at the Potsdam Conference. (Chapter 26)
- ~ August
- ~ 6: HIROSHIMA: THE AGE OF NUCLEAR WAR. [Six years after the study began; two years and ten months after the decision to build an A-bomb; three months after Hitler committed suicide.]
- ~ 9: Nagasaki: the second bomb. An Anglo-American propaganda blitz began to justify the use of the atomic bombs.
- ~ 28: The Soviet Union applied for the reconstruction loan of $1 billion which had been earmarked for it.
- ~ October
- ~ 16: J. Robert Oppenheimer resigned as director of the Los Alamos research laboratories which designed the bombs for the Manhattan Project.
- ~ The Federation of Atomic Scientists (now the Federation of American Scientists) was founded by members of the Manhattan Project staff by merging a number of individual associations of atomic scientists at various weapons sites. Its purpose was "to address the implications and dangers of the nuclear age."

FAS was the first organization ever “dedicated to ending the worldwide arms race, achieving complete nuclear disarmament, and avoiding the use of nuclear weapons,” and since that time much of its work has been in nuclear arms control and disarmament.²³⁰ Oppenheimer was not involved in its establishment, and while he may have been carried on the rolls as a member, the initiative came from younger and less senior members of the project.²³¹ Peace was, to them, more important than world domination.

~ 1946

~ February

~ 9: The State Department latched onto Stalin’s speech to the Communist Party.

~ 21: Kennan’s report and proposals became the basis of US “containment” policy.

~ March

~ 16: By resorting to Second World War-type rhetoric with a statement that an “Iron Curtain” had descended between the countries of the East and the West, Churchill aggravated and perpetuated the ideological divide between Capitalism and Communism, in the public mind, in a speech at Fulton, Missouri, USA.

~ 1947

~ Stalin initiated a defence strategy based on the development of ICBMs.

~ May

~ 29: An economic merger between the British and US occupied zones of Germany was announced.

~ August

~ The United States negotiated the Pact of Rio for peace and regional security among Latin American nations as an extension of the 1945 Treaty of Chapultepec.

~ 1948

~ March

~ The Brussels Treaty was signed by the Western Allies which proceeded to plan a West German currency and democratic government.

~ May

~ 14: Proclamation of the establishment of THE STATE OF ISRAEL: the trigger for the first Israeli-Arab war (chapter 28). Egypt closed the Suez Canal to all Israeli shipping and refused to allow passage through the Strait of Tiran for any shipping carrying freight to or from Eilat. This obliged all shipping travelling between Israel and Southern Africa, Asia or the Pacific to travel the extended route via the Cape of Good Hope and the Mediterranean.

~ 24: The Berlin Blockade was imposed by the Soviet authorities.

~ June

~ 3: Daniel Malan became prime minister of South Africa with the election of the National Party on a platform of APARTHEID, but the international spotlight was fixed on Hungary.

~ The estates of the churches in Hungary were expropriated and the educational system was nationalized. The Calvinist and Lutheran churches accepted the compensation and financial arrangements imposed by the state but the primate of the Catholic church, Cardinal József Mindszenty, refused to concede nationalization of the school system and began a concerted campaign against the decision. The church had never been prepared to forfeit control of its education system in any country. It was not about to set a precedent in Hungary.

Hungary was a country with a history of religious conflict at least as checkered as that of Poland. Competing dynasties from other European powers and feudal lords had been enmeshed in the Vatican's struggle to prevent the westward progress of Islam at the time of the Lutheran Reformation. From that time forward the country was blighted by religious, sectarian and ethnic intrigue as it was repeatedly carved up, reformed, and merged with – or annexed – its neighbours, and struggled for independence in the wake of the defeat of the Central Powers in 1918. During the Second World War the clerical-dominated governments under the regime of Admiral Miklos Horthy and Prime Minister Gyula Gombos then acquiesced in the extermination of the country's Jews and Gypsies in 1944 shortly before the country was relieved and occupied by Soviet forces in December 1944. Stalin authorized the establishment of a coalition government with representatives of all anti-Fascist parties represented and then free elections in November 1945, at which the Communist Party received 17 per cent of the vote, and the government was dominated by the Smallholders with 57 per cent. The Communist Party then set out to undermine the coalition and to boost its own standing, with the result that it gained an outright majority at the elections in 1947. Then, coinciding with the CIA-backed campaign in collaboration with the Vatican to prevent the election of a Communist government in Italy (chapter 27, A touch of foreign aid) the Social Democratic Party, which had been one of the parties in the coalition, was forcibly merged with the Communist Party to form the Hungarian Workers' Party. The prime minister in the coalition and leader of the non-Communist Smallholders Party, was intimidated into emigrating, and his party, together with all other non-Communist parties was dissolved. Hungary became a one-party state and the churches thus became the only base for either ideological or political opposition to the Communist regime.

~ August

~ 23: Declaration of the formation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

~ The US Joint Chiefs of Staff proposed an air offensive strategy designed to exploit the destructive and psychological power of atomic weapons.

~ December

~ Hungary's Catholic primate, Cardinal Mindszenty, was arrested and subsequently sentenced to life imprisonment. Catholic monastic orders were then dissolved and the Roman Catholic church accepted financial terms similar to those offered to the other churches. Eventually its bishops, with visible repugnance, took an oath of loyalty to the state but continued their crudely camouflaged campaign to reverse the situation.

~ 1949

~ February

- ~ 24: Egypt signed its armistice with Israel (see above: Cease fire ... Anglo-Israeli stand-off ... armistice ...) but soon placed guns at Sharm al-Sheikh, on the bluff at the southern end of the Sinai Peninsula, commanding the Strait of Tiran at the entrance to the Gulf of Aqaba which provides access to Israel's port of Eilat from the Red Sea.
- ~ March
- ~ 18: The text of the NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION (NATO) agreement was published – seventeen days before it was signed by the United States, Britain, France, Belgium, The Netherlands, Luxembourg, Italy, Portugal, Denmark, Iceland, Norway and Canada.
- ~ May
- ~ 8: The German Parliamentary Council adopted a constitution.
- ~ 12: The Soviet blockade of Berlin was lifted
- ~ 23: The Federal Republic of Germany was constituted.
- ~ June
- ~ 13: The Vatican issued a decree of excommunication against Communists.
- ~ August
- ~ The Soviet Union exploded its first nuclear device.
That was four years after Truman's intimidating chat with Stalin which preceded Hiroshima. The US administration put on a show of horror that the Soviet Union had caught up so quickly, claiming that it was only possible with stolen secrets and that the fast-track development indicated a Communist bid to take over the world. In fact, the development took four years after Truman's use of the development in a bid to harass Stalin. It was one year and two months longer than the period from Roosevelt's order to build a bomb and its first test, so it is hardly consistent with a fast-track dash to dominate the world! But from that moment, the United States had to consider the possibility of retaliation against it if it again used atomic bombs. The deliberate decision was made to stay in front and policy discussion centred on the development of the Hydrogen bomb. Oppenheimer immediately began campaigning against such a development.
- ~ October
- ~ 1: The People's Republic of China was proclaimed following the evacuation of Nationalist Chinese forces to Taiwan.
- ~ 7: The German Democratic Republic and the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (COMECON) were constituted by the Soviet authorities.
- ~ 1950
- ~ January
- ~ Truman gave approval for the development of an 'H'-bomb. The arms race had begun to spiral. Robert Oppenheimer opposed the decision on moral grounds. Truman's response was that the Soviet Union would not be inhibited by moral scruple.
- ~ French physicist Frederic Joliot-Curie, pointedly referred to by his detractors as a Communist, initiated the Stockholm Appeal and launched a petition against the development of nuclear weapons. It is reported to have been signed by some 270 million people, mainly in Communist countries. The Peace Movement and the Anti-Nuclear Movement took on more substantive form with the establishment of a network of organizations throughout the world.

~ February

~ 5: Senator Joseph McCarthy launched his anti-Communist crusade with an announcement that he could name 205 Communists or Communist sympathizers in the US State Department.

Four years of increasingly sensational and irresponsible accusations and investigations followed. Oppenheimer, one of McCarthy's prime targets, was hounded as a traitor, denied access to sensitive research facilities, accused of being a Communist and subjected to humiliating security hearings. An extract from the case to which he had to respond illustrates the situation at the time.

It was further reported that in the autumn of 1949, and subsequently, you strongly opposed the development of the hydrogen bomb; (1) on moral grounds, (2) by claiming that it was not feasible, (3) by claiming that there were insufficient facilities and scientific personnel to carry on the development, and (4) that it was not politically desirable. ... even after it was determined, as a matter of national policy, to proceed with the development of a hydrogen bomb, you continued to oppose the project and declined to cooperate fully [Then followed 'reports' that he circulated material critical of the proposal, and that some staff even resigned under his influence.] It was further reported that you were instrumental in persuading other outstanding scientists not to work on the hydrogen bomb project, and that the opposition to the hydrogen bomb, of which you are the most experienced, most powerful, and most effective member, has definitely slowed down its development.²³²

It may be in part an indication of the pressure of the witch hunt that FAS, the organization set up by staff of the Manhattan Project and dedicated to ending the worldwide arms race (see October 1945), had sunk to a very low ebb by 1948 and its chief executive officer resigned for lack of funds. As a result, when the Oppenheimer hearings occurred, it had no full time staff and the FBI concluded that it was irrelevant. It was therefore not drawn into the McCarthy Era hearings for a number of reasons, especially because it was doing so little at that time that it would have seemed ridiculous to cite it. Also, it was not radical enough. FBI agents joined Chapters and sat in on Chapter meetings until 1949 when it concluded that the Federation was just a bunch of "liberals." However it listed five senior, and quite distinguished, scientists as "fellow travelers" in its internal reports.²³³

In due course McCarthy even attacked President Dwight Eisenhower and conducted a 36-day nationally televised hearing of charges against army officers and civilians. That was his undoing. He was censured by the Senate.

~ June

~ 25: The Korean War began (see above, Korean interlude) and the CIA's standing changed significantly. The perception, generated by the opposition in Congress, was that:

The agency failed to give any clear warning about the invasion [of South Korea by North Korea] and there were emotive references to Pearl Harbour, not just in an accusing press, but in the highest Washington circles. The assumption was that the CIA's job was to monitor the whole world, whether or not what was happening affected US interests. Bedell Smith [General Walter Bedell Smith, appointed DCI in October 1950] determined upon the complete overhaul of the agency, in particular its estimating procedures.²³⁴

The United States was feeling much more comfortable and fear of its own economic collapse had abated in view of the financial and trade arrangements which were being put in place with Western Europe, and it was also very comfortable in its unofficial role as policeman to the world. It was totally in keeping with its post-war self-understanding. But very soon the CIA was working, unfettered, on the basis that virtually any action, including direct intervention in the affairs of a sovereign country, was justified if an action, policy or treaty relationship which that country was contemplating was in conflict with United States' interests. Not necessarily security interests: political or commercial interests were to be 'protected' too. It would be kept especially busy in the Middle East and Central and Latin America where the Vatican would need quite a bit of help to suppress the liberation theologians who were waiting in the wings. The beacons, or pockmarks en route to Maimonides' expectation of the Messianic Age include a number of these episodes.

~ August

~ 8: Pope Pius XII issued the encyclical Humani Generis with a warning against attempts to distort Catholic truths.

~ In Poland, the primate and personal representative of Pius XII, Bishop (later Cardinal) Stefan Wyszyński, had been negotiating a modus vivendi in an effort to maintain the Catholic Church's school system – the nearest thing to a concordat which the church could achieve in a hostile political environment.

Wyszyński, then a priest of 11 years standing and a doctor in sociology and ecclesiastical law, had founded the Christian Workers University at Włocławek in Poland in 1935. He directed it until the outbreak of war in 1939, was ordered to leave Poland, escaped the fate of 1,811 Polish priests who died in German concentration camps, and returned to Włocławek as rector of the seminary in 1945. He was appointed bishop of Lublin in 1946, then primate of Gniezno and, ad personam, of Warsaw in 1948. It was because of Poland's traumatic recent history and the consequences of its unwitting position as the prize 'buffer' between East and West (chapters 12, 17, 18) that he was able to sign a 'coexistence agreement' with the Communist government at a time when the church was being either disestablished or stripped of its properties under other Communist regimes.

Postwar Poland was, in area, about 20 percent smaller than prewar Poland. After the Holocaust with the death of about three million Polish Jews and the expulsion of several million Germans westward – the so-called 'population transfers' with the Soviet Union – Poland was virtually ethnically homogenous and the Roman Catholic Church was, for practical purposes, the only religious entity operating in the country. The buffer between Catholic Europe and Orthodox Russia which the Vatican had been trying to eliminate for hundreds of years was finally gone! Hitler and Stalin between them had got rid of the Jews and the expulsion of the mixed religion population of Germans had been approved by the Allied leaders at the Potsdam Conference. Some historians say that Churchill did not appreciate fully Stalin's hegemonic designs and that he believed that timely territorial concessions to the Soviet Union would preserve the internal independence of postwar Poland.²³⁵ In reality he was simply paying out on the deal which he had instructed Eden to make to keep Stalin in the war on December 16, 1941, when Stalin told Eden that one of the Soviet Union's conditions for meeting's Britain's war plan was that "the 'Curzon Line' should form the basis of the future Polish-Soviet frontier." (See above: Operation Barbarossa) Thus, at the Teheran Conference late in 1943, Churchill proposed exactly that: that the Soviet-Polish border coincide with the Curzon Line (more or less corresponding to the secret Ribbentrop-Molotov line) and that Poland be compensated with corresponding territory at Germany's cost. Roosevelt, having been briefed on the Eden-Stalin discussions at the time, naturally agreed. The Mikołajczyk government-in-exile in England, which was opposed to such a territorial deal, was not informed. For both Roosevelt and Churchill the Polish issue was secondary: the importance of retaining the Soviet Union as an ally was crucial. Poland was not to get in the way. This was confirmed when they showed no concern at the German announcement, on April 13, 1943, that the mass graves of 4,000 Polish officers who had been captured by the Red Army had been discovered in the Katyn Forest.²³⁶

In such circumstances the Communist authorities felt unable to implement the anti-religion policies which had been pursued prewar, and the Catholic Church continued to operate, but under severe constraints. When Wyszyński was elevated to the office of cardinal in November 1952 to show disdain for the increasing pressure to acquiesce in Communist policy which was being applied to the church – he was unable to go to Rome to receive formal investiture and in 1953 he was placed under house arrest without trial, on the grounds that that he had violated a pledge that the church would punish priests who engaged in anti-government activity.

~ October

- ~ 1: The effects of the Korean War were beginning to spin off in other directions. China felt threatened and warned the UN and the US that if it pushed beyond the 38th parallel China may intervene.
- ~ In Egypt, the barely-representative government of the Waft – "a rich party and a party of rich men, many of whom had grown rich at the expense of the state"²³⁷ – was under increasing domestic pressure after years of virtually incontestable rule because of the deteriorating national economy. It chose to capitalize on the growing anti-British unrest in the Canal Zone to deflect some of the criticism, and the prime minister, Nahas Pasha, denounced the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty as basic to the country's troubles. The domestic situation continued to worsen.

~ November

- ~ 1: Pope Pius XII issued the apostolic constitution Munificentissimus Deus, proclaiming the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin as dogma. He was the first pope since the Vatican Council in 1869-70 to exercise papal authority to define doctrine.

~ 25: MacArthur approached China's border and China intervened.

~ 1951

~ March

~ In Iran, Mohammad Mosaddeq, an outspoken advocate of nationalism who had opposed the grant to the Soviet Union of an oil concession for northern Iran similar to an existing British concession in southern Iran, called for the nationalization of that concession and the installations in Iran of the British-owned Anglo-Iranian Oil Company. The Majles passed the oil nationalization act, and the shah, Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, was obliged by vote of the Majles to appoint Mosaddeq premier.

When the nationalization took effect on May 1, the Mosaddeq government offered compensation based on the allocation of 25 per cent of net profits, guaranteed the jobs of all British employees, and indicated that it was willing to continue selling its oil through the industry's cuddly cartel arrangements. However Britain wanted the industry, not just compensation, so it withdrew completely from the Iranian oil market, put on a show of naval power, applied a total blockade and trade boycott, and froze all Iranian assets under its influence. It brought Iran's exports and foreign trade to a virtual standstill, excepting only that which could be conducted overland, mainly through the Soviet Union. Iran was an impoverished nation already. It was pushed to near destitution and it could make no compensation by way of foreign exchange payments even if Britain had been prepared to accept it. But Britain was at pains to show other nations which might entertain the dastardly idea of nationalizing British interests just how effective an oil and trade embargo could be in bringing a nation to its economic knees. They took very good notice. They also took note of the fact that the embargo had required the cooperation of the United States and its oil companies to be effective. They could have intervened or circumvented it at the drop of a hat. By his erratic personal behaviour, the ailing 71-year old premier gave the West very good opportunity to ridicule both him and Iran, deepening the gulf which already existed between him and the shah.

~ September

~ In response to Israel's complaints that Egypt's closure of the Suez Canal and the Strait of Tiran to its shipping was a breach of both the UN Charter and the 1949 armistice agreement, the Security Council adopted a resolution submitted jointly by Britain, France and the United States to the effect that the closure was illegal, and called on Egypt to cease such interference.

Egypt had argued that the armistice did not put an end to a state of war, that its action was necessary pending the signing of a final peace treaty, and that it was exercising its right under the 1888 Convention to take any action necessary to protect its own security. It refused to abide by the Security Council resolution which, in any case, contained no enforcement provisions, but although it continued to deny access to Israeli shipping, it greatly reduced the level of surveillance and interference with ships carrying the flags of other nations in trade with Israel.

- ~ Back on the other side of Asia, the Korean War increased the urgency for a Japanese peace treaty.

Details were negotiated hurriedly, with the Soviet Union being deliberately bypassed (see above), and 49 countries signed at the San Francisco peace conference. The Soviet Union attended the conference but refused to sign. Japan recognized the independence of Korea and renounced all rights to Taiwan which was well and truly under the control of Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist Chinese forces, the Pescadores, the Kuriles which had been occupied by the Soviet Union together with southern Sakhalin, and gave up the rights to the Pacific islands which had been allocated to it under League of Nations mandate. Japan's "right to individual and collective self-defense" was recognized but it was to be exercised through the United States-Japan Security Treaty (1951) under which US forces remained in Japan. Japan agreed not to grant similar rights to a third power without US approval – there were to be no more “access rights” granted to European powers such as those which the United States muscled in on seventy years earlier – and US forces were withdrawn from the mainland islands to Okinawa, half way to Taiwan. The question of reparations was left for Japan to negotiate with the countries which it had occupied. Japan's future relations with China were of great importance to it and Prime Minister Yoshida wished to delay a decision on recognition of either of the two Chinas, but Dulles insisted that the treaty would be opposed in the US Senate unless Japan agreed to recognize the Republic of China.

- ~ The United States negotiated defence treaties jointly with Australia and New Zealand (ANZUS).
- ~ The South African government embarked on a program to move blacks onto reserves. These were designated ‘homelands,’ and eventually 3.5 million people were ejected from normal towns into ten homelands.

~ 1952

~ January

26: The trauma of Egypt's servile position, the want to be relieved of decades of colonial domination and the consequences of being pawns, ravaged by other people's wars – and the want for self-determination – had been apparent in mounting criticism of the monarchy and the ruling Waft, and in demonstrations, strikes and protests for some time, but now, on ‘Black Saturday’ it erupted.

Widespread rioting in Cairo resulted in dozens of deaths and hundreds of injuries as mobs opposed to both elite privilege and Western influence of the type that Pius XII had complained about when he was moving the Vatican into democratic-capitalism-mode (chapter 27, Temporal Authority, the Lateran Treaty and civil government), rampaged through the city, looting and burning many neighborhoods and businesses.²³⁸ The Waft government fell. In a bid to achieve stability Farouk installed two new prime ministers in quick succession.

~ March

- ~ For a year or two the United States government had been pressing Britain to recognize Farouk as king of both the Sudan and Egypt, expecting to gain some greater influence in both countries by being seen to reduce the vestiges of colonial power and to reduce British influence in the region at the same time, but now, with dramatic upheaval in Egypt it urged the Churchill Government to speed up its discussions with Egypt and to begin the withdrawal of its forces immediately.²³⁹

- ~ 20: Of course Egypt was not the only country facing instability. When the South African Supreme Court ruled that Apartheid was unconstitutional, the government simply over-rode the decision by constituting parliament as a High Court.

The government had justified Apartheid on the grounds of Christian belief and Biblical teaching and, when it could no longer sustain that argument in its own constitutional court, it sought to maintain its position by also over-riding the democratic processes which the Vatican had just decided were equally as Christian as the Grand Fascism which it had been promoting until that time. It was being just as consistent as other powers of the amorphous Christian gel.

- ~ July

- ~ 23: In Egypt, only six months after the 'Black Saturday' riots, the British-backed monarch, Farouk, who was expected to acquiesce in whatever Britain wanted, was deposed.

A Revolutionary Command Council (RCC) controlled by Col. Gamal Abdel Nasser seized power but exercised it, initially, through a nominal regent, with Farouk's infant son, named to succeed him. That was a mere front to allow time for the change to be accepted without too much trauma (see below, The Sudanese Saga), and the RCC began to implement major social and economic reforms almost immediately. A land reform and redistribution scheme was given top priority. A limit (200 feddans) was placed on the area of agricultural land that an individual could own, and the resumed surplus was reallocated to small holders.

Nasser's progressive emergence from the shadows to recognition as president was of enormous significance. It represented a complete break with the past and a genuine revolution in national status and self-understanding. Farouk was a descendant of Muhammad Ali and belonged to a dynastic line which Egyptians rightly regarded as non-Egyptian and non-Arab. He not only represented continuing subordination to the powers of Europe but he was a constant reminder that for two thousand years, because of the peculiarities of its geographic position at the junction of Africa, Asia and Europe – the vital communication link between all three – it had been swept by, and was subordinate to, a series of major external powers. Nasser, born in Alexandria and the grandson of an illiterate farmer from rural Upper Egypt, was the first man of native Egyptian stock to exercise sustained and uncontested leadership in the country for that entire period.²⁴⁰ His rise to power therefore marked a political renaissance, a new place in the sun for Egypt, and generated a renewed national pride and a determination that the nation would not return to a position of servile submission. It was the basis of Nasser's burning ambition to make Egypt the new leader of the Arab world and of Dār al-Islām.

The spearhead of the renaissance was to be the ending of corruption and indulgence which characterized the political elite and the Free Officer Corps under Egypt's submissive or servile monarchy. In a scathing attack on the officer corps overall he said:

- They were overfed, lazy, and selfish and they spent their time eating, drinking, gambling, carousing, smoking hashish, and engaging in many different forms of tyranny and corruption. They had the most unmilitary stomachs I ever saw on army officers anywhere. They were fawning and subservient to the British Military Mission, and a disgrace to the uniform they wore. They spent money that belonged to the Egyptian Army on food and drink for themselves.²⁴¹

“War has no place in the reconstructive policy which we have designed to improve the lot of our people,” Nasser wrote in Foreign Affairs, January 1955; he was “adamant that priority in expenditure should be given to development projects,” and he was “prepared for peace with Israel on the basis of the 1949 armistice agreements.”²⁴² Some of Israel’s leaders, including Moshe Sharett, held reciprocal views,²⁴³ but not all, and that distinction, coupled with the circumstances and aims of the great-powers’ politics in the Middle East, soon led to a shift in emphasis.

- ~ In Iraq the government decided it was time for a resource producing country to receive reasonable value for the resources extracted by foreign enterprises. It raised the production tax to 50 per cent of production value, including royalties before the deduction of foreign tax.
- ~ In Jordan, King Talal abdicated in favor of his 17-year old son, Hussein, who immediately took steps to further deepen the Islamic character of East Jerusalem and to enhance the mosques of the Haram al-Sharif, including repairs and embellishments to the al-Aqsa Mosque.
- ~ October
- ~ Britain conducted its first independent nuclear tests – in Australia.
- ~ November
- ~ 1: The United States exploded its first hydrogen bomb – in the Pacific. It left an unanswered question. Was the timing of the detonation, three days before the US presidential elections, determined by weather conditions or by the need to claw back a few on the anti-Communist votes for the ailing Democrat Party cause?
- ~ 4: Eisenhower was elected president, but Truman remained in office for the normal transition period while his successor made a visit to Korea, threatened to use nuclear weapons, and to extend the war to China (see above), and Dulles fine-tuned his foreign policies and staff appointments.
- ~ With Iran suffering ever increasingly from Britain’s blockade, the Mosaddeq government retaliated by expelling the British altogether and Britain now decided it was time to get tough.

Under instructions from the second Churchill government, British officials approached the de facto head of the CIA’s Middle East division, Kermit (Kim) Roosevelt (a grandson of one US president and cousin of another) for US assistance to topple Mosaddeq. Roosevelt’s advice was that there was “no chance to win approval from the outgoing administration of Truman and Acheson [but] the new Republicans, however, might be quite different.”²⁴⁴ Britain therefore had to wait until February to pursue the matter.

~ December

~ 15: Pope Pius XII issued the encyclical Orientales Ecclesias on Communist persecution of the church, with a call for prayers for the persecuted.

~ 1953

~ January

~ Cooperation in Iran was only one of the problems Churchill had on his mind when he visited Washington for talks with president-elect Eisenhower. A proposal which Foreign Minister Eden had drawn up for Britain's phased withdrawal from Egypt as part of a general settlement of the 'Egyptian question' was high on his agenda.

It included, as well as the phased withdrawal of British troops; the maintenance of a military base in the canal zone in peace under conditions which would enable Britain and its allies to have immediate use of it in war; an Anglo-Egyptian organization for the air defence of Egypt; Egypt's participation in a Middle East defence organization; and a program of military and economic assistance to Egypt by both the United Kingdom and the United States. Churchill told Eisenhower that Britain was not asking for military help in Egypt "at present" but the fact that he even raised the matter and asked for US cooperation in joint economic assistance showed painfully clearly the parlous situation Britain was in, and gave Eisenhower every confidence that, with Dulles alongside him, the US was about to be handed an even stronger position in the Middle East. He asked Britain to consider the question of the US having a military representative in Cairo as well as Britain, which, Eden says, arose from Churchill's suggestion of "double-banked" diplomatic and military representation, but in view Churchill's rather vague request it was inevitable.²⁴⁵ Dulles had his foot in the door, and he was eager to get right inside! It would not take long. And according to Eden:

*Anglo-American differences about Egyptian policy persisted. ... our ambassador in Cairo commented that American policy in general seemed to be conditioned by a belief that Egypt was still the victim of British 'colonialism', and as such deserving of American sympathy. ... fear of losing their influence with the new regime, particularly on the part of the United States Embassy in Cairo and also an apparent disinclination by the United States Government to take second place even in an area where primary responsibility was not theirs, resulted in the Americans, at least locally, withholding the wholehearted support which their partner in NATO had the right to expect and which would have been of great, if not decisive, influence on our negotiations. Inevitably the Egyptians exploited the equivocal American attitude.*²⁴⁶ [Emphasis added.]

That statement says a lot about both the United States and Britain, and also the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel over all. It was Eden's way of saying that the United States was determined to sit astride the pinnacle of world power and that it was not interested in a cooperative territorial carve-up of the European style of 1885 (Africa); 1878 (Eastern Europe and the Balkans); 1919 (Versailles), or even 1947 (the Paris Peace Conference). It was also his de facto admission that Britain had not shifted from the concept of empire and colonial rights. But through the use of the expression ‘an area where primary responsibility was not theirs’ it was also a reflection of the idea that one power or set of powers had the responsibility – or the right, or the authority by virtue of some special characteristic or divine delegation – to determine the orientation or pattern of government in other areas whether the people of that area wished it or not. Eden was not referring to an obligation or a right exercised under the authority of the United Nations, such as a mandate or a trust. He was referring to influencing or interfering in the affairs of fully autonomous, independent nations which were members of the United Nations: founding members at that! He was referring to a ‘responsibility’ dreamed up by the dominant powers of the amorphous Christian gel, broadly within the framework of NATO, in order to prevent certain nations from “falling under the influence” of an alternative philosophical and economic system of which they disapproved, whether those countries freely accepted such patronage or whether they were even aware of it. He was not writing about influence in the colonial context, nor in the context of invasion and subjugation. He was writing in the context of the trouble in the triangle and the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel. As we have seen, those of the alternative philosophical persuasion were doing the same thing, but they were doing it as a reaction to or a response to the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel. The only way to unwind the spiral was to unwind the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel.

- ~ In Jerusalem, a meeting of the World Islamic Congress was held and special celebrations were organized to commemorate the Prophet’s nocturnal journey and ascension to heaven, the Night Journey. These became the precedent for an annual pilgrimage to the city.

Some Christian leaders complained that too much emphasis was being placed on the Islamic element in Jerusalem’s personality, that there was discrimination in favor of Muslims, and that there was excessive government interference in the administration of Christian holy places, notably inspection requirements and restrictions on the acquisition of real estate.

- ~ February

- ~ 2: In his State of the Union address President Eisenhower threatened to support Nationalist China in an invasion of mainland China. It can be assumed that he briefed Churchill on his intentions during his visit a couple of weeks earlier.

His administration adopted John Foster Dulles’ foreign policy of permanent confrontation with the Soviet Union and military alliances to ‘roll-back’ Communism. This shaped all trade and foreign policies, including overt and covert activities of the CIA, to ensure the isolation of the Communist bloc, to drive a wedge between the Soviet Union and China, and to sabotage economic development programs in all Communist-governed countries. [Co-ordination of policies and activities between the State Department and the CIA was simple. They were being run by the Dulles brothers who, between them, dominated the National Security Council and its advice to Eisenhower.] Subsequently, he proposed rapid development of a policy of “nuclear deterrence” to reduce the cost of maintaining large scale conventional armies and weapons. In particular the apocalyptic anti-Communist Dulles saw in Mosaddeq “the epitome of all that he detested in the Third World: unequivocal neutralism in the Cold War, tolerance of Communists, and disrespect for free enterprise, as demonstrated by the oil nationalization ... [and as he considered that] ... Iran was a nation exceedingly rich in the liquid gold, and that it shared a border with the Soviet union more than 1,000 miles long, he was not unduly plagued by indecision as to whether the Iranian prime minister should retire from public life.”²⁴⁷

~ March

~ 5: Stalin’s death was followed by a power struggle before Khrushchev assumed Soviet leadership.

~ July

~ 27: The Korean armistice was signed.

~ About this time increased Egyptian assistance to the Palestinian refugee communities living in large temporary camps in the Gaza Strip included arms and equipment for Palestinian commando groups known as fedayeen, and the number of niggling cross-border incidents steadily increased.

Israel claimed to be following a policy of retaliation on the basis of ‘an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth,’ but in the circumstances of the establishment of Israel it is impossible to say who was responding to whose action. Both parties kept up a steady stream of hit and run actions. Israel was just as eager to increase its arms supplies from abroad as were the Palestinians, and, with Egypt supporting and inciting anti-French guerrillas in the French North African colonies, France was eager to find a partner who could distract or discourage Egypt. Who more logical than Israel? A deal was done, but arms under the agreement did not start to arrive until the beginning of 1955.

~ August

~ In Iran, encouraged by both Britain and the United States, the Shah attempted to dismiss Mosaddeq but revolution forced the Shah to leave the country instead.

However within a few days, with the support of both countries, but mainly the CIA, Mosaddeq was overthrown, the Shah was restored to power and Mosaddeq was imprisoned for treason. This was among the CIA’s first covert operations. Kermit Roosevelt later claimed in a book about how he and the CIA carried out the operation that it was staged only to prevent a takeover of power by the Iranian Communist Party (The Tudeh) which was closely backed by the Soviet Union. He was thus arguing that Mosaddeq had to be removed to prevent a Communist takeover, whereas the Truman administration had believed that Mosaddeq had to be kept in power to prevent one.²⁴⁸ Although he was the titular head of Shī’a Islam the Shah was now seen to be supporting the US-Israeli alliance. This meant that while the US regarded him as providing “an island of stability,” to many Muslims he was the US surrogate and a traitor. The Shah retained Iranian oil-production facilities under Iranian government control but he was under enormous pressure to agree to the return of foreign oil companies. He did so, on new terms, and the consortium was operating through two companies within a matter of months. The politics of oil were becoming more tightly enmeshed in matters of religion.

- ~ About this time, the Jordanian cabinet declared Jerusalem to be the country's second capital; held a formal session there, and resolved to continue the practice on a periodic basis.
 - ~ The Brazilian government established Petrobras as a government monopoly oil entity and, from its point of view, the 'disease' which the United States feared was spreading!
- The Sultan of Morocco, who had been supporting the nationalist push for independence, was exiled by the French to Madagascar but that action aggravated the discontent and evidence of an imminent revolt was soon apparent.

~ September

- ~ 8: On the religious front, Pope Pius XII issued the encyclical Fulgens Corona, a call for Catholics to observe the Marian Year and concentrating attention on the dogma of Immaculate Conception.
- ~ But in Israel the authorities were more eager to secure the future of their state than to bother too much about theology. They began construction of a Jordan River water diversion scheme and, in doing so, aggravated tension with Syria which degenerated progressively to become the trigger for the Six Day War 14 years later.

About this time, the shipment of oil supplies from Iran were resumed and Israel again complained to the Security Council about Egyptian interference with its shipping. Egypt's response was that no ship or cargo going to Israel had been confiscated since September 1951, and that of 32.047 vessels transiting the canal during that period only 55 had actually been inspected even though domestic cargo was being carried from Haifa to Eilat via the canal under third party flags.²⁴⁹

~ October

- ~ With tension over all of these inter-linked issues increasing, and with the French eager for increased 'distraction' to keep Egypt occupied, Israel struck into Jordan in what was said to be an 'eye for an eye' raid in retaliation for a raid from the West Bank in which a woman and two children were murdered. But it was a bit more than an eye for an eye. The Israeli forces attacked the village of Qibya and killed 66 people. The Security Council condemned the raid but that was like pouring water on a duck's back. Israel knew that the Western powers might bark – even the United States did – but they would not bite. It only had the Arabs to worry about.

~ November

- ~ 9: In Cambodia Prince Norodom Sihanouk took command of the army and declared his country's independence, upon which France reoccupied Dienbienphu. It was not going to vacate Indochina that readily.

~ 1954

~ January

- ~ It did not seem to bother him at all that most of the world's people were aghast, wondering what fate was in store for them, when John Foster Dulles unveiled his policy of "massive retaliation” against any targets of the US’s choosing in response to “aggression” anywhere in the world.

This amounted to the threat of nuclear attack on either Russia or China at the slightest provocation which would require a big increase in US air force capacity, and access to air and communications bases around the world. The temperature of the Cold War was raised enormously, together with the concerns of people in countries which were required to host such bases and therefore could become nuclear targets by default. However, on the other side of Churchill’s ‘iron curtain’ the Soviet Union’s intelligence, national security, espionage and counter espionage organizations which had gone through a series of reorganizations during the Second World War, in parallel with those of the US, were now, in the wake of Stalin’s death, (in suspicious circumstances on March 5, 1953), being restructured again to take account of the demands of the Cold War. A new organization, the KGB, incorporating all aspects of Soviet security and intelligence except military operational intelligence, was established.²⁵⁰ It expanded to greater total size than the CIA, was considered to be of comparable professional competence, and was greatly feared at home and abroad. Two authorities on international terrorism have noted that the CIA and the KGB were (or are) “the two great terror organizations in the history of the world.”²⁵¹

~ March

~ 25: But Pius XII was trying to keep the world’s attention on higher things. He issued the encyclical Sacra Virginitas, concerning the pre-eminence of Evangelical Chastity.

~ June

~ And Eisenhower also had his eyes turned skywards. In spite of the fact that tactical nuclear weapons with a range of up to 500 km were already deployed in Europe at that time, he approved the US ICBM project as a top priority. Then, in contrast with his tough line in Europe, he took “an attitude of comparative neutrality” in the Middle East and encouraged Britain to “accommodate itself to Egypt’s demands”²⁵² while Dulles set out to woo Nasser into a positive pro-Western stance.

~ July

~ That raised concerns among the hard-liners in the Israeli Defence Department who were not cooperating in Prime Minister Sharett’s efforts to maintain dialogue with Nasser and who feared that cordial relations between Egypt and the United States would reduce American support for their own country.

Defence Minister Lavon and Chief of Staff Dayan colluded in schemes to sabotage both the growing cordiality between Israel and Egypt, which Sharett wanted, and between Egypt and the United States, which Dulles wanted. The plan which had the greatest ‘success’ in generating distrust between Cairo and Jerusalem involved a number of Israeli agents working with about a dozen locally recruited Egyptian Jews to plant bombs and set fires at various public buildings in Cairo and Alexandria, including libraries of the US Information Service. It was intended to cause anti-Egyptian sentiment within the United States at a time when the Nasser government was seeking arms and assistance from Washington and was also hoping to enlist American support in negotiations with Britain over the future of its military bases in the Suez Canal Zone. They hoped to persuade the British that their presence was still needed in Egypt. Even though the plot was uncovered and most of the participants were apprehended and tried – two Israeli agents were hung, six were gaoled and two Egyptian Jews were acquitted – both Nasser and Sharett were aghast at the other's reactions. Bitterness replaced the cordiality, and there were long term adverse repercussions.²⁵³ The situation was poised very close to war. But the plot brought some 'success' because the US government put direct pressure on Nasser to agree to at least a short term British presence in the canal zone, advising that unless he accepted "reasonable terms" they would stop all economic aid,²⁵⁴ and an agreement for a British withdrawal was initialled on July 27.

~ 28: Eden's announcement to the Commons next day was greeted with consternation and vigorous debate and there was a distinct expectation that the agreement may not be ratified.

The agreement provided that Britain's withdrawal would be phased over twenty months – to be completed by June 1956. Once vacated, the base was to be maintained jointly by Britain and Egypt in efficient working order and capable of immediate use in the event of an attack on any member of the Arab League or, against Nasser's wishes, the Baghdad Pact member, Turkey, but Britain would not be there. It was tantamount to giving away a vital piece of Empire which Britain had fought many wars to hold. It would be completely under Egyptian control! Britain would no longer have control of the vital defence, trade and communications link with the empire east of Suez. Only intervention in the debate by Britain's elder statesman, Churchill, ensured that the agreement would be ratified, and the fragility of the situation is indicated by his remarks. But they are important for another reason, not simply that he swung the vote in favour of vacating a vital piece of imperial territory. Churchill did not exhibit the belligerency of his war time leadership years when he had repeatedly sought to draw other countries into the conflict and to spread the war in his bid to maintain the empire at all costs. He was quite conciliatory. Was it that he had mellowed quite remarkably? Or had he realized that, as during the 1930s, the survival of Britain's empire depended on the maintenance of stability in the Suez region? It was the latter. But this time the players were different and the method of maintaining stability had to be radically different.

It was only 16 years since Chamberlain's cabinet had before it, on February 17, 1938, a Chiefs of Staff report from which it had to formally determine Britain's revised military strategy. The Committee of Imperial Defence had learned from Admiral Chatfield that it was largely "a question of balancing risks" between the three global theatres and the Chiefs of Staff had concluded after their Mediterranean Appreciation review that the unstable situation in the Middle East demanded military measures. Chatfield had said that *building the land and air defences in Egypt up to self-sufficiency for a sixty-day period would involve "some denuding of home defences" but the services were now willing to take that risk.*²⁵⁵ The Middle East was now recognized to be the critical factor in Britain's ability to hold its empire together. So critical that home and continental defences had to be cut to the point at which Britain was quite unable to deter Hitler from any adventures he cared to undertake. (Chapter 21)

It is no wonder that the Commons was aghast at the proposal to walk away from the Suez Canal just because people in one of its former colonies wanted a riot or two. That was not the way a colonial riot would have been dealt with previously! But now the situation was different and Churchill said, in part:

I have not in the slightest degree concealed in public speech how much I regretted the course of events in Egypt. But I had not held my mind closed to the tremendous changes that have taken place in the whole strategic position in the world which makes the thoughts which were well formed and well knit together a year ago utterly obsolete and which have changed the opinions of every competent soldier that I have been able to meet.

... I should be prepared to ... show how utterly out of proportion to the Suez Canal and the position which we held in Egypt are the appalling developments and the appalling spectacle which imagination raises before us. Merely to try to imagine in outline the first few weeks of a war under conditions about which we did not know when this session commenced, and about which we had not been told – merely to portray that picture and submit it to the House would, I am sure, convince honourable Gentlemen of the obsolescence of the Base and of the sense of proportion which is vitally needed at the present time, not only in military dispositions, but in all our attempts to establish human relationships between nation and nation.²⁵⁶ [Emphasis added.]

Later, Selwyn Lloyd, Minister for Defence during the Sudan phase and Foreign Secretary during the Suez phase of the crisis, was more forthcoming. He wrote, first, concerning the decision to go quietly, and, second, on its strategic importance:

Independence for the Indian Empire had deprived us of the firm base from which in the past our military efforts in the Middle East had been supported at no great cost to ourselves. The Suez base was no substitute. It depended on local labour which faded away when relations between us and Egypt were strained. It was obsolescent and beyond our financial means, so it had to go – although, as I have indicated earlier, I should have preferred a slower departure.²⁵⁷

[Critics said] it needed Suez ... to convince us that we were no longer a Great Power. This is very wide of the mark. We knew the facts only too well. ... The Second World War had turned us from the world's greatest creditor to the world's greatest debtor. We could not undertake any more external commitments. Our gold and dollar reserves only covered three months' imports. All this made the safeguarding of our supplies of oil from the Middle East the more important. What we did not foresee were the actions that would be taken against us by the United States Government.²⁵⁸

~ September

~ While Egypt celebrated its success in forcing Britain to begin the phased British evacuation of the Canal Zone, opposition to continuing French rule in North Africa, which had been limited to guerrilla warfare until then, came to a head with revolution in Algeria – with Nasser’s help. He extended his anti-colonial campaign to include the French by providing not only political support for the Algerian rebels, but arms as well, and urban Muslim communities became directly involved for the first time. In addition, in West Africa, Britain was under increasing pressure and it agreed to a loose federal system of government and a timetable for independence for the diverse complex of regions which it had progressively subjugated between 1861 and 1914 to form the single colony of Nigeria.

- ~ And to complicate matters further, when Israel complained to the Security Council, yet again, that Egypt was still restricting its trade through the Suez Canal, a resolution expressing “grave concern” that Egypt had not ceased interference after the Council’s 1951 resolution failed through a veto by the Soviet Union. Israel sought to test its ally’s mettle by sending one of its own merchant vessels, the Bat Galim, through the canal. It was seized, its crew was only released after three months in detention, and Egypt made it clear to the world that vessels from the Jewish State simply would not be permitted through.²⁵⁹ The question of rights of passage had moved from the political-hypothetical to the political-practical.
- ~ But it was not only in Africa that the desperation bids by both Britain and France to cling to their colonial privileges, which had been at the heart of their pre-Second World War manoeuvring, were entering their final stages, and a four-year guerrilla war of China-backed rebels confronting Britain for control of Malaya began, while in Vietnam Catholic peasants migrating south under pressure from the China-backed Vietminh were being integrated through the expansion of rice growing projects.
- ~ Thus, prompted by the rash of Communist-backed rebel activity in South East Asia, the South East Asia Treaty (SEATO) was signed by the US, Britain, France, Australia, New Zealand, Thailand, Pakistan and the Philippines. [It formally took effect in February 1955.]
- ~ October
- ~ 7: Showing his continuing concern for China, Pius XII issued the encyclical Ad Sinarum Gentem, on the church in China, followed four days later by Ad Caeli Reginam in which he defined the Feast of the Queenship of Mary. There was to be no end to the amplification of provocative Mariology.
- ~ 9: When the French forces finally left Hanoi, Eisenhower’s special envoy, General J. Lawton Collins, arrived to affirm US support for Diem, and, with the help of the US Navy, hundreds of thousands of refugees began to flee from the North to the South.

CENSURE! ANY CHANCE FOR A CHANGE OF DIRECTION?

- ~ December
- ~ 2: The atmosphere in the United States showed an immediate improvement when Senator McCarthy was censured by the US Senate for “conduct contrary to Senate traditions.” The open-air era of rabid McCarthyism and Communist witch hunting began to subside, together with the level of paranoia.

The world at large no longer believed it was justified. People were fearful of it and tiring of constantly provoked polarization. In fact, while the open-air face of McCarthyism was subdued, the under-cover version was still pursued relentlessly, but the US government gradually became aware of the resentment which activities such as the CIA's engineering of the overthrow of an allegedly Communist-backed government in Guatemala was generating. Subsequently, violent protests against Vice President Richard M. Nixon during his trip to Caracas and Lima alerted Washington to the dangers inherent in neglecting the genuine needs of the region. The United States agreed to fund an Inter-American Development Bank, while the State Department sought to avoid too close an association with unpopular, authoritarian regimes. Whatever the overall merits of such a policy were, it was to have disastrous effects in Cuba. But Latin America was not the only region where concern was being expressed with growing strength. The whole of Africa and Asia was affected, and within a few months of McCarthy's fall from grace this was made very clear at the Bandung Conference.

~ 1955

~ January

~ The United States celebrated the New Year by channeling the first aid under a $100 million package directly to the Saigon government, and agreed to train the South Korean Army.

~ February

~ 17: Ben-Gurion became Minister for Defence and ordered a series of actions which soon brought increased tension between Israel and Egypt.

In particular he ordered harsh retaliatory strikes in response to guerrilla raids launched by Palestinians in the Gaza Strip. He gave as his justification for that program that severe reprisals were necessary to deter a larger military confrontation. In the biggest such strike, on the 28th, Israeli paratroopers were dropped to destroy military targets and in the process ambushed and destroyed an Egyptian convoy of reinforcements, killing 38 and wounding 62. That raid ended, irrevocably, whatever possibility had remained for rapprochement between Nasser's government and the Jewish State.²⁶⁰

However there was another factor as well. As noted above (July 1953) France had agreed to supply Israel with arms on the clear understanding that they would eventually be used against Egypt in retaliation for its support of the Algerian rebels.²⁶¹ The first shipments under that agreement had just arrived and Ben-Gurion may have wanted to show his gratitude – or just try out the new equipment. The 'tits' for 'tats' were getting bigger and bigger in the struggle to determine the fate of colonialism and the young Jewish State which was born as a consequence of Britain's bid to consolidate its colonial power with the Balfour Declaration in 1917 was now helping the colonial powers in their desperate bids to retain their failing grip at the same time that it was helping the United States to supplant them. The parody of Mein Kampf was giving way to the parody of Der Judenstaat. Increasingly, whatever Israel did, from the expulsion and oppression of the Palestinians (chapter 28) to its support for the colonial powers, was in contradiction of the high ideals and policies set out in Herzl's original plan for a Jewish State. And Ben-Gurion, being fearful that with a change of leadership the Israeli government might take a more conciliatory approach in negotiations with the Arabs, to Israel's disadvantage, appointed several of his political and ideological allies to key positions in the Defence Ministry in a bid to ensure the continuity of his hard-line approach to national security.²⁶²

~ April

~ 18: But at least some people were eager to talk peace and reconciliation. The Indonesian government played host to a week-long conference of 29 Asian and African states, organized by Indonesia, Burma (Myanmar), Ceylon (Sri Lanka), India and Pakistan at Bandung.

Together, those countries represented more than half of the world population. The first such conference ever held, it reflected widespread dissatisfaction, especially within the sponsor countries, with the reluctance of the Western powers to consult with them on decisions affecting Asia; their concern over tension between the People's Republic of China and the United States; their desire to lay firmer foundations for China's peaceful relations with themselves and the West; their opposition to continuing colonialism, especially French influence in North Africa; and Indonesia's desire to promote its case in the dispute with The Netherlands over western New Guinea (Irian Jaya). Major debate centred upon the question of whether Soviet policies in eastern Europe and central Asia should be censured along with Western colonialism. A consensus was reached in which "colonialism in all of its manifestations" was condemned, implicitly censuring the Soviet Union, as well as the West. China's prime minister, Zhou Enlai, impressed other leaders by his moderate and conciliatory attitude, reducing the fears which some of the anticommunist delegates held about China's intentions. The conference unanimously adopted a 10-point "declaration on the promotion of world peace and cooperation," incorporating the principles of the United Nations charter and the five principles proposed by prime minister Jawaharlal Nehru of India.²⁶³

~ May

~ 7: The position of the Afro-Asian countries was strengthened considerably only a fortnight after the Bandung Conference closed when there was a turning point in the fate of Vietnam and the French empire. The French forces in Indochina were decisively defeated by the Vietminh at Dienbienphu.

A nine-power conference on the future of Vietnam, which had been planned four months earlier by a meeting of the Big Four foreign ministers, (six weeks before the battle began), opened in Geneva the next day, and dragged on and on. It was becoming clear that the Western powers would fall into line to help secure France's interests – they did not have any option except to prepare to surrender their own colonial authority – but it was also becoming clear that the system of colonial territories was in its final phase. The countdown had started.

The Afro-Asian group position was then strengthened further when Khrushchev made his first trip outside the Soviet Union, to Yugoslavia, showed a new flexibility in Soviet policy, and apologized to Tito for Stalin's denunciation of Yugoslav Communism in 1948. In the Belgrade declaration which was adopted at that time Khrushchev committed Soviet leaders to equality in relations with the communist-ruled countries. Later, in trips to Geneva, Afghanistan, and India, he showed the extroverted personal diplomacy for which he became quite highly regarded but his attacks on world capitalism were no less virulent and simplistic.

- ~ But at a different conference, NATO members ignored Khrushchev's new approach and agreed on a formula for the re-arming of Western Germany, and the occupation of the Western Zones of the country officially ended.
- ~ And that was followed immediately by the founding conference of the WARSAW PACT countries, in Warsaw.

European NATO members then feared the prospect that Warsaw Pact countries may in future be armed with nuclear weapons which would nullify the advantage of their US-armed bases and result in horrific short-range nuclear war in Europe, and those fears forced reconsideration of the type of weapons which should be based in Europe. Negotiations centred around the concept of a 'limited nuclear war' (LNU) utilizing only field weapons and short range missiles, but when the NATO forces undertook large scale field exercises or 'war games' it was apparent that once nuclear weapons were introduced into a conflict there would only be escalation. Stock piles became bigger and bigger. The concept of an LNU was a nonsense – a contradiction in terms.

- ~ At that time another Dulles initiative, the BAGHDAD PACT was also being negotiated and signed progressively, by Turkey and Iraq (February 24), Britain (April 5), Pakistan (September 23), and Iran (October 23), thus extending the anti-Soviet barrier from NATO in Europe, around the southern border of the Soviet Union, to link with SEATO.

However the negotiation of that treaty soon had other consequences that Dulles did not welcome and would not be able to cope with. In working pragmatically from one step to another within the framework of his 'isolate-the-Soviet-Union-at-all-costs' policy it appears that he often did not anticipate the consequences of what he was doing. He reckoned to deal with any complications from a position of strength as they arose. The Baghdad Pact proved to be another step on the way to both the Suez Crisis and the Six Day War. When a pact involving both Iraq and Turkey was proposed, Nasser immediately objected to it, apparently for two reasons. First, for what it was: a bid to further isolate the Soviet Union. Second, because it conflicted with his ambition to lead a regenerated Arab world and then a rejuvenated wider Muslim world. He already saw Iraq as a leadership contender, and its claims would be strengthened by the presence of its immediate non-Arab Muslim neighbours in another regional alliance which would include two other Muslim non-Arab countries, Iran and Pakistan. Then, in July, when Britain began to put pressure on Jordan to join as well, he was even more angry. It would not only add another Arab nation to the Soviet isolation ring, it would also tie another Arab nation more closely to the United States and its Israel support system. Nasser mounted a vigorous and successful campaign to prevent Jordan from joining.

Now: Britain was a member of the Pact even though it was not a country of the region, as it was in SEATO, because it had its seemingly vital interests in its Gulf State Protectorates. It needed the Baghdad Pact. It knew that its bases could not have remained in Iraq on the old footing and its military presence had to be under the umbrella of a pact. According to Lloyd: "With Turkey, Iran and Pakistan as members, together with US support, it could not plausibly be described as an instrument of British imperialism, but it ensured a presence for us." It was "an arrangement between equals which would be palatable in Iraq [but] its success ... depended very much on continuing American support."²⁶⁴ However, even though the pact was a Dulles initiative, the United States was not a member. Dulles claimed that he could not get the two-thirds majority vote in the Senate which was necessary for accession to a treaty. He did not think that Jewish opinion in America would be favourable. He told the British that once what he described as "a Palestine settlement" had been achieved, it would be different and he would recommend full American membership. He agreed, however, to send military and political observers to the meetings.²⁶⁵ If anyone doubted that the Jewish members of Congress, supported by their Congressional lobby, had the capacity to determine the outcome of votes, that was proof enough. Why then, if Dulles knew he could not get congressional support for his own country to join, and if it was causing significant tensions between countries in the region, was he pushing it so hard? Basically he was locked in by his total pre-occupation with isolating the Soviet Union in the context of his passionate hostility to Communism and his near-obsessive determination to eliminate it as an economic and philosophical competitor against Capitalism. (See above, John Foster Dulles – in full flight!) Selwyn Lloyd, then Britain's Minister of State and later Foreign Secretary, later wrote that he believed the real reason was that Dulles "wanted to have it both ways – to have a defensive alliance created on the Soviet southern frontier, but not by joining to incur the hostility of Nasser and those in other Arab states who thought as Nasser did."²⁶⁶ [Emphasis added.] However Dulles was very successfully incurring the hostility of Nasser. The Egyptian government had requested arms from the United States and the US chose this moment, in May, to reject the request. That left Nasser no option except to turn to the Soviet bloc.²⁶⁷

~ A neighboring Arab country which was not invited to join the Baghdad Pact was Syria. It did not share a border with the Soviet Union, so it was not a 'front line state' in that sense. But neither was Iraq. Iran and Turkey did, but not Iraq. It was only a little closer to the Soviet Union than Syria. However, for all that, the United States was interested in Syria. Very interested.

SYRIA: THE ODD STATE OUT

Congress had before it the US Mutual Security Act 1955 which dealt with America's relations with the beneficiaries of its economic or military assistance. The act was a matter of reaction. The Soviet Union had stolen a march on the United States with Khrushchev's policy of aid for developing countries in the context of 'Peaceful Coexistence.' He had initiated a program of carefully targeted diplomacy through state visits, linked with political consultations, bilateral agreements, and the provision of technical and manpower aid, all in the framework of coordinated or total economic planning, all within the philosophical framework that the nations of Asia, Africa and Latin America could not be truly independent until they were free from both economic dependence on their former masters and political subservience to them. This appealed to the leaders of many of those countries which did not have technical and commercial economies which had already evolved to a reasonably high level of sophistication.

The Soviet policy was much preferred to Truman's aid program which had been based on grants and loans to new nations lest they "drift toward poverty, despair, fear, and the other miseries of mankind which breed unending wars." To those on the receiving end, America's policy looked very much like the dribbling of aid for appearances where it was necessary to camouflage the impact of the 'Ugly Americans' and their policies of unplanned, uncoordinated commercial investment where there was a quick buck to be made in the name of 'development.' The US administration was therefore well aware that it had to put more order into its relations with the 'Third World'²⁶⁸ which was hell-bent on achieving decolonization, or watch it gravitate towards the anti-imperialist anti-Capitalist Soviet camp – and lose the opportunity to dominate it and to ensure that Capitalism was properly seeded, or bedded down. That was, after all, the purpose behind the establishment of the Bretton Woods institutions.

But there was a complicating factor. The United States had gone into the Second World War determined to dismantle the European colonial empires; it came out in the same frame of mind, and, as already noted, it was caught. Together with the Vatican, Britain and France were its main allies in the Cold War, so if it was to retain their help it had to (temporarily) sustain their rule by offering support (grudgingly) for their anti-nationalist and anti-Communist activities and those of the indigenous political parties and commercial interests in their colonies which were of like mind. In that context, every Third World country was now expected to either want or be grateful for American aid, so arrangements had to be put on a formal basis. When Eisenhower became president his administration cut back on foreign aid and triggered a great debate about the efficacy of aid and its purpose. The Marshall Plan, according to critics, was not a valid program for Third World aid because it was based on the need for industrial populations to rebuild their societies, while Third World countries needed – or so the argument ran – a means to kick-start industrial or agricultural development in 'primitive' barter or elementary cash-based economies. How could they become markets for the consumer goods of America without it? But foreign aid did not always serve US interests. Many Third World rulers chose neutralism or Socialism in preference to unbridled Capitalism because they did not have the administrative capacity to put a bridle on it. Neither did it promote sustainable economic growth because that required social and physical infrastructure which they did not have. They had to get that first, and that required planning. Those that supported aid programs claimed that American capital and technology were needed precisely to build infrastructure, to assist "nation building," and to prevent Communist "incursion" into such countries which might subvert the development of an advanced Western style 'consumer' society before it got off the ground.

The US Mutual Security Act 1955 therefore specified that a recipient country agree to make a contribution to “the defensive strength of the free world,” and declared it US policy “to encourage the efforts of other free nations ... to foster private initiative and competition [i.e., Capitalism].”^{269 270} The American concern was that Syria did not seem to appreciate the significance of this. It was not behaving as Washington thought a Third World government should. It was the only state in the region which had refused all offers of US economic and military assistance. It did not like the strings attached, such as the presence of American military advisers. America’s Syria-watching diplomats were therefore concerned that it was looking over its left shoulder, towards the Soviet Union. In May 1955 they prepared the first of a series of reports which spread over eight months and read, in part:

If the popular leftward trend in Syria continues over any considerable period, there is a real danger that Syria will fall completely under left-wing control either by coup or usurpation of authority ... the fundamental anti-US and anti-West orientation of the Syrians is stimulated by inevitable political histrionics about the Palestine problem ... Four successive short lived governments in Syria have permitted continuous and increasing Communist activities ... the Communists support the leftist cliques [in] the army ... apathy towards the Communism on the part of politicians and army officers [is a threat to security] ... the Arab Socialist Resurrectionist Party (ASRP) and the Communist Party of Syria are capable of bringing about further deterioration of Syrian internal security ... [danger of ASRP] coup d’etat [and] increased Communist penetration of government and army ... Of all the Arab states Syria is at present time the most wholeheartedly devoted to a neutralist policy with strong anti-Western overtones ... If the present trend continues there is a strong possibility that a Communist dominated Syria will result, threatening the peace and stability of the area and endangering the achievement of our objectives in the Near East ... [we] should give priority consideration to developing courses of action in the Near East designed to affect the situation in Syria and to recommending specific steps to combat Communist subversion.²⁷¹

The self-appointed ‘policeman’ for the world was going about his duties very efficiently. He was quietly searching for ‘crime.’ It appears that none was reported, except on the basis of the attitudes of the McCarthyist era. Another extract read:

In fact, the Communist Party does not appear to have as its immediate objective seizure of power. Rather it seeks to destroy national unity, to strengthen support for Soviet policies and opposition to Western policies and to exacerbate tensions in the Arab world. It has made significant progress towards these objectives.²⁷² [Emphasis added.]

If he couldn’t find any actual ‘crime’ committed to prosecute, then he had to anticipate it and preempt it. An ‘appropriate’ operation soon began to take shape.

~ July

~ While the Syria-watches were contemplating their “appropriate operation,” just across the border Nasser was still interfering in Jordan to prevent the king from joining the Baghdad

Pact. He was less concerned about keeping Jordan out of the anti-Soviet camp than he was about keeping in the anti-Israel camp. He could see that once it was beholden to the United States and Britain in the Baghdad Pact its foreign policy on the question of Israel would have to be aligned with those countries and not its fellow Arabs.

The drawn-out Geneva Conference on Vietnam called for hostilities to end in each of Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos; and a provisional line of demarcation between North and South Vietnam was determined at the 17th parallel. The US declined to accept the final conference declaration. Bedell Smith said it would not disturb the agreements reached, but would view renewed aggression “with concern.”²⁷³ It promptly supported the right wing Ngo Dinh Diem who refused to recognize the call by the conference for popular elections on July 16, moved to set up a dictatorship, and set about suppressing the Buddhist sects and Communist agents, But that was nothing new. The United States was already supporting a Fascist dictator in South Korea. South Vietnam was entitled to one, too. Ho Chi Minh promptly visited both Beijing and Moscow who obliged with military assistance.

Also at that time Dulles agreed, somewhat reluctantly, to a Disarmament Summit in Geneva. The Soviet Union called for a unified, neutral Germany. The West responded by requiring Western style ‘free’ elections. The Soviets declined. Eisenhower’s proposed “open skies” observation system which, he said, would mean that each power knew where the other had military facilities. The Soviets would not agree. They were fearful that they would be at a disadvantage because their spying facilities were less sophisticated, and there was quite a degree of sympathy for their point of view in other countries. In any case, they did not want to rely on spy-in-the-sky planes as basis for their relations with the West and Marshall Bulganin, in a mood to shift the emphasis and to get relations with the West back on an even keel, invited Eden to visit the Soviet Union. Eden declined, citing his work load at home, but, catching Bulganin’s mood, he extended an invitation for the marshal to visit Britain. He accepted, saying that he and Khrushchev would be travelling and would like to visit London.²⁷⁴

The summit meeting showed the world that rapprochement was possible, strengthened the push for non-alignment among the smaller countries, and made it clear that decision making was, properly speaking, a shared process. The great Western powers were beginning to find it just a trifle more difficult to make their decisions in private and then foist them on an unsuspecting world as the decisions of the United Nations. The UN had admitted 16 new members in one year compared with only nine in the previous ten years. Membership then stood at 76 countries and the new members felt that they wanted to know what went on behind closed doors, and why. But even worse, many of them had gathered courage and confidence from their participation in the Bandung Conference and they wanted to have a say in the decision making process, especially in policies affecting peace and development.²⁷⁵ And the majority of them were not even Christian! Eleven were, but six were Muslim, six were Buddhist and one was Jewish..

TO DAM, OR TO DAMN?

One country with an all-consuming interest in development at that time was Egypt. Its plans and negotiations towards the construction of a new high dam on the Nile at Aswan were at an advanced stage. The three-mile long dam was planned for power generation and irrigation to dramatically increase Egypt's primary production and to enable diversification and regional development which would underpin Egypt's political and economic independence. But there were some problems. One was that the Nile flowed through Sudan before Egypt and both countries wanted a share of the water. This was one of the key reasons for political interest in a Nile Valley Union. But agreement had not yet been reached on how many dams should be built and what proportion of the waters should be available to each country. Another problem was that the Aswan High Dam was going to cost $1.3 billion and Egypt did not have that kind of money. Assistance was required. Negotiations had reached such a point that Egypt's intention was to engage a consortium of British, French and German construction companies which would each be responsible for certain aspects of the project. Each government would help share the risk by backing their members of the consortium with financial aid, but it was decided to seek further help from both the United States and the World Bank. It was agreed that there would be an initial Anglo-American grant of $70 million, of which Britain's contribution would be only $14 million, and the World Bank would lend $200 million. It appeared to be on track, but there were details to be finalized,²⁷⁶ and politics began to get in the way.

~ September

~ The signatures of the non-Arab members, Pakistan and Iran, were not even dry on the Baghdad Treaty when Nasser made it clear that Egypt was not going to be brow-beaten into submission by the Pact and that he would trade with who ever he wished: even in armaments. He announced that Egypt would receive from Czechoslovakia MIG fighters, Ilyushin jet bombers, Stalin Mark III tanks, Czech T34 tanks, other heavy equipment and large quantities of small arms.²⁷⁷

The balance of power in the Middle East shifted dramatically. The news was greeted enthusiastically in other Arab capitals but the Israelis felt that they now had their backs to the wall. The deal was of such significance that Eden believed the British government must take steps to maintain some leverage over Egypt in view of the fact that it had already signed an agreement to withdraw its troops from the Canal Zone by mid 1956. He was convinced that it was "vitally necessary" for the West to accept financial responsibility for the Aswan High Dam scheme to provide that leverage. There had been talk of the Soviet Union helping with the dam and Eden felt that if such help were added to the arms deal it would mean "an undesirable extension of Soviet influence in Africa." However the government was divided on the issue. Some ministers favoured letting Nasser go to the Russians. They believed the presence of large numbers of Russians in the country might not endear them to the Egyptians and, because the Saudi royal family was strongly anti-Communist, the presence of Russians in Egypt "might cool Saudi-Egyptian relations" to the advantage of the West. However Eden had his way and the decision was taken to proceed.²⁷⁸

But Nasser, having announced the Soviet arms agreement, also closed the Strait of Tiran to all shipping, thus isolating the Israeli port of Eilat completely. Ben-Gurion thereupon instructed the Defence Ministry to prepare for war and submitted to cabinet a proposal to occupy Sharm al-Sheikh, the bluff from which Egypt commanded the strait. Cabinet declined to act on it.²⁷⁹

The stakes were getting higher and the tensions greater. The Turkish government feared that Egypt, now being armed by the Soviet Union, might be tempted to accept a Soviet base. If it did, Turkey, would be sitting right across the Soviet communications and supply route as well as its merchant and naval fleet access to the Mediterranean. That fact, meaning that the Western powers could sever his trade route, had been a major concern for Nasser when Turkey agreed to join the Baghdad Pact and it had fueled his opposition to the concept of the pact. Now it was Turkey's turn to worry. Having agreed to a Baghdad Pact base, the possibility of a Soviet base south of the Mediterranean meant that Turkey was now host to a potential prime target in the event of conflict in the Middle East. Because of that, the government might well come under pressure from its Muslim electorate to withdraw from the pact or face an uprising. It was eager that the risks should be spread more widely by the inclusion of another country in the region. But who? It would have to be a Muslim Arab country. There were no others. Iraq was already a member, having permitted the British oil fields protection base to remain under another name when it might otherwise have asked the colonial power to leave. Syria and Saudi Arabia were both firmly opposed to the pact. That left Jordan. Hussein already had the protection of the British-staffed Arab League under its 1948 treaty with Britain. Turkey therefore urged Britain to approach Jordan. But that was a very sensitive matter, too, because it was the western half of the original Palestine Mandate; half of its population was ethnic Palestinian; it was predominantly Muslim; and it was a launching point for Palestinian raids into Israel. Britain had its own reasons for wanting to strengthen the base, there was a coincidence of interests, so the decision was made. Entice Jordan into the pact. But it had become even more essential that the ethnic and religious question – the Arab-Israeli conflict – should not become a part of the debate. There had to be another round of public opinion manipulation. The only options seemed to be the tag of Communism or 'rogue governments, determined to dominate or undermine others.'

~ October

- ~ As with Britain, so with France. It was facing conflict in each of its major colonial regions as well.
- ~ 23: In Vietnam, in a referendum of his own planning, Diem defeated Bao Dai, assumed the role of chief of state, proclaimed the country a Republic, and named himself president three days later.
- ~ 25: And its troubles in North Africa, coinciding with Nasser's growing belligerence towards Israel, drew France and Israel closer together. The newly elected French Premier, Edgar Faure, welcomed Israel's Prime Minister Sharett to Paris with the greeting: "I've always been a friend of Israel, but now it is not a question of friendship. It is for reasons of political realism that France is called upon to help you. ..." Nasser was backing the Algerian rebels against French rule and Faure was eager for Israel to discourage him by applying pressure on his home territory. Supplies of arms and aircraft, and pilot training programs were arranged promptly. But this caused friction with the United States for both countries. Dulles objected to the diversion of some US aircraft from NATO service to Israel, and he did not want to see Israel armed in case it was inclined to take a provocative action which would lead to war and undermine America's relations with the Arabs. He placed restrictions on US equipment which could be supplied to Israel, and these remained in place until July, 1956, when France chose to ignore US and British policies on such issues.²⁸⁰

ISSUES CONFUSED

By this time, Britain and the United States were so paranoid about Communist influence in the Middle East that they could not distinguish between Arab nationalism, Arab anti-Israeli support for the Palestinians, or anti-colonial and anti-Capitalist empathy with the Soviet Union. Naturally, the Soviet Union was eager to get a foothold with alliances there, too. It was an essential defensive mechanism. It was also an essential aspect of the trouble in the triangle which was the origin and the basis of the entire saga. Therefore, because the only help which the allies of the Palestinians received in that context was from the Soviet bloc countries, everything which was either anti-Israel or anti-West was labelled as Communism or pro-Communist.

~ November

~ Thus: when King Saud of Saudi Arabia began supporting anti-Western pro-Palestinian groups in Jordan, Lebanon and Iraq he was not portrayed as supporting either the Palestinians or Arab nationalism, but Communism, and Eden wrote in his memoirs:

- The agents of King Saud, their pockets bulging with gold, were cooperating everywhere with the communists against Western interests. In accordance with their practice, the United States Government were treating the payments by the Arabian-American Oil Company to Saudi Arabia as a purely commercial transaction. Unlike ourselves, they did not feel any responsibility for ensuring that these oil revenues were wisely invested. King Saud, at liberty to spend his money as he wished, chose palaces for his family at home and subversion for his policy abroad, in Jordan, the Lebanon and Iraq. American. That is ARAMCO, money was being spent on a lavish scale to abet communism in the Middle East.²⁸¹ [Emphasis added.]

That simply was not fact. Saud was supporting the Palestinians in their struggle against Israel, and Eden knew it. He knew it very well indeed. He believed he had to conceal it, because if Britain were seen to be opposing the Palestinian cause it might as well pack up on the spot, leave all the oil in the ground, and go home before it was thrown out. Britain's only hope of being able to protect its interests in oil in the Middle East was to convince the Arabs that its actions against unrest were a bid to prevent Communist infiltration and not a bid to suppress the Palestinian cause or Arab nationalism. His statement was ironical to say the least in view of the relationship between Saudi Arabia and the United States. In 1943 Roosevelt formally declared that “the defence of Saudi Arabia is vital to the defence of the United States” and directed that Lend Lease aid henceforth be made available directly to Saudi Arabia instead of through Britain.²⁸² (Chapter 25) Then, the US having declared the kingdom (or at least the oil hidden beneath its sands) to be of ‘vital interest’, Secretary for the Navy James Forrestall feared the consequences of angering Ibn Saud so much that he advised Truman to “ditch Israel” in order to guarantee the Saudi king’s loyalty and his oil,²⁸³ in contrast to other advisers who maintained that to promote Islam was a dangerous long term solution. By 1945 the relationship had become so close that when Roosevelt and Ibn Saud reached agreement for an American air base at Dhahran the king penned a note in the margin of the agreement: “I urge my descendants to maintain the friendship of our American brothers and to renew this agreement.”²⁸⁴ In the light of that, the American administration appeared to take little notice when the first Muslim Brotherhood group was established in Jerusalem in 1946 and, with the support of the Palestinian leadership, there were five additional groups operating by the end of that year. ²⁸⁵ (Chapter 27)

Consistent with other situations which have been noted, the Western powers could see nothing wrong with buying or inducing support for either economic or political benefit if they did it themselves, but if someone else did it, it was a nasty Communist conspiracy and had to be stopped. So Saud was not allowed to give his money away to support an independence push, and Eden noted that: “... Nuri es-Said made a special plea at the Baghdad Conference [in November], directed particularly to the American Observer, to find a means of stopping, even for six months, the payments by ARAMCO to the Saudis. If this could happen, he thought that the whole situation would change in Syria, the Lebanon, Jordan and even Egypt.”²⁸⁶ But Britain was allowed to make “gifts” to keep a neighboring Arab country out of the anti-Israel and, therefore, out of the anti-Western camp. The two were synonymous. Eden continued: “... King Hussein was delighted. We acted quickly and, despite our financial cares at home, we made ready a substantial gift of military equipment. We also prepared the text of an agreement to replace the Anglo-Jordanian Treaty. This was to be negotiated as soon as Jordan had acceded to the Baghdad Pact.”²⁸⁷ [Emphasis added.] The gift was ten Vampire jet fighter aircraft. It was no mere gift to a friend in another country. It was a very urgent step in the process of buying protection for British interests. No more. No less. But at the same time the game of ‘divide and rule’ was being played for ever higher stakes and Britain also wanted to keep Lebanon out of the Syrian-Egyptian Pact. Eden instructed his foreign minister, Harold Macmillan, to ask Dulles to provide economic aid to that country while Britain provided military aid. It was agreed. Britain had set up, or had some influence in the setting up of, each of the Arab kingdoms which were now being subjected to this treatment – all for its own imperial convenience – in an earlier phase of the game, and all within the past one to two generations. They were all portions of the former Ottoman empire and they were all part of Dār al-islām.²⁸⁸

- ~ Also at this time, the politicking for power in Israel over the question of its security led to Ben-Gurion's return as prime minister.
- ~ December
- ~ 6: ~ Sir Gerald Templer, Chief of the Imperial General Staff arrived in Amman for a nine-day visit to negotiate Jordan's accession to the Baghdad Pact. He offered a large scale re-equipment and maintenance program for the Arab League, including provision for a new medium artillery regiment and conversion of an armoured car regiment to a tank regiment, which would raise the Legion to one infantry division and one armoured division, and he offered immediate negotiations to replace the Anglo-Iranian Treaty with a special agreement.²⁸⁹
- ~ 15: After much procrastination a joint offer was made to Egypt that the United States, Britain and the World Bank would lend $400 million towards the total cost of the Aswan High Dam.

That was the amount calculated to be the foreign exchange liabilities which Egypt would have to meet.²⁹⁰ The matter was settled – or so every one involved thought – and planning proceeded accordingly. But the United States put conditions on the proposal which the Egyptians did not like when they thought more about them; the loan agreement required Congressional approval; and there was a lot of politicking still to be done over Egypt's relations with the Soviet Union and Israel, and its influence on other countries in the region. They were the sticking points. Egypt had to undertake to give the dam priority over all other commitments (in order to safeguard the US investment), contracts were to be awarded on a competitive basis (effectively breaking up the consortium and giving the United States the opportunity to relieve Britain, France and Germany of some of the contracts); and Egypt was to refuse any aid from Communist sources. That condition was a direct attack on Nasser's policy of non-alignment and his existing trading and arms supply arrangements.

- ~ 19: Then, only a few days after the announcement of the High Dam agreement, in an act of self-determination which it had agreed to three years earlier, the Sudanese parliament voted unanimously for independence.

Britain had applied pressure for it to opt for complete independence rather than for a Nile Valley Union with Egypt. The use of the Nile waters and access to the Aswan High Dam storage assumed greater importance. So did the matter of de-colonization, political manipulation, and support for guerrilla independence movements. A short diversion will therefore help to put in perspective the relationship between those three countries, the circumstances of the wider push for decolonization, and the looming Suez Crisis. Egypt's situation was already complicated greatly by the unrest in other parts of North Africa. Every movement or agitation for independence had a flow on effect whether it was a British, French, Spanish, Portuguese or Belgian territory. To avoid total rebellion the French government had permitted the return of both the Sultan to Morocco and the leader of the rebel Constitutional Party to Tunisia, and negotiations towards independence had begun.

THE SUDANESE SAGA

The modern history of the relationship between Egypt and Sudan is a classic history of Christian European imperial manipulation. It involves the usual mix of oppression and exploitation, all intimately woven into the Christian reconstruction of Africa, the complexities of the slave trade and efforts to end it by methods which were often misguided and inappropriate, (chapters 11, 14) and all overlaid with the well established Christian misunderstanding of Islam. Those interactions can be traced from the time of the rise of the European-educated Christian, Isma'il Pasha, to the post of viceroy (later termed khedive) of Egypt in 1863 and his commissioning of an Englishman, Samuel Baker, to lead an expedition along the White Nile to establish Egyptian dominance, verging on suzerainty, over the equatorial regions to the south of Egypt, and to curtail the booming trade in human beings in the region of the upper Nile. When they succeeded in gaining control of the region but did not succeed in stamping out the trade, Isma'il Pasha actually appointed the most powerful of the slave traders as governor of an enormous region of the southern Sudan reaching to the headwaters of the westward-flowing Congo River system. He governed under the flag of Egypt. At the same time he appointed another English Christian, C.G. Gordon, to govern Equatorial Africa and to bring the kingdoms of the Central East African lakes regions, in which Islam was already established, under Egyptian control as well. He made no progress in the lakes kingdoms, but working through a cadre of like-minded European and American Christian officials he succeeded in suppressing the slave trade in the Sudan using methods which left whole regions in poverty. His opponents were quick to label Christianity as the religion of oppression and economic depression. Egyptian rule in the region, imposed through European Christians, was short lived and collapsed in a sea of discontent. Into that scene in 1881 strode Muhammad Ahmad, declaring himself to be the Sudan's 'divinely guided one,' the Mahdi.

The Mahdi had hardly settled into his self-proclaimed role when several of the European powers saw the opportunity to subjugate the greatly weakened khedive. Britain moved first in 1882, to keep the others out, to "protect" the khedive's government, and to put down a nationalist revolution which was hostile to foreign interests. Then, realizing that the waters of the Nile were vital to the life, security and future development of Egypt and that whoever controlled the upper Nile controlled Egypt, Britain sought to do deals to keep the other European powers out. In the spirit of the 1885 Berlin carve up of Africa, Germany and Italy negotiated agreements. But the spirit of competition between Britain and France was alive and well. France declined such an agreement and began scheming to get control of the upper Nile to force Britain out of Egypt. The planning took three years from 1893 to 1896 when a military expedition was ready to march right across Africa from the west coast to Kodok on the upper Nile to build a massive dam. Unable to stop them, the British government decided the conquest of the Sudan was necessary to secure its interests in Egypt. General Kitchener was ordered to carry out the task. With 25,000 troops he defeated the Mahdi's first army at Ataba in April 1898, then reached Omdurman (Khartoum) in September where he defeated the major army of the Khalifa, 60,000 troops, in a bloody but short battle which was writ large in school history books for a very long time as one of the glories of the Empire. The Khalifa fled and Kitchener marched on upstream to confront the French at Kodok two weeks later. There was a standoff! London and Paris prepared for an Anglo-French war, but the French government buckled first. Its army and navy were not ready for a full scale war. A treaty was agreed under which France would stay west of the headwaters of the Nile and, somehow, Britain had to govern the Sudan to avoid another such situation.

However, while the Khedive was under British “protection” he still had his independence, officially, and his Egyptian army, financed by him and not Britain, had provided the bulk of Kitchener’s force. He therefore still wanted a role in the government of the Sudan. In 1899 Britain agreed to a Condominium to rule Sudan. The governor-general was appointed by the Khedive but nominated by the British government, the flags of the two countries flew side by side in Khartoum, and Britain set out to pacify and Christianize the Sudan. Religious uprisings in the north which was predominantly Muslim were reasonably easily suppressed, but in the south which was dominated by animists with pockets of Christians, the uprisings continued and the British authorities could exercise little authority. The result was that the north was able to progress, but the south suffered neglect and depression. Wingate, as governor-general, adopted more enlightened policies and this led to a recovery of confidence in British Christian rule within the Muslim communities, but religious and ethnic divisions soon became entrenched and there was antagonism towards Egypt which was seen as being the lackey of the British.

After Wingate, the situation returned to ‘normal.’ To facilitate control, British officials segregated the animist cum Christian south from the Muslim and Arab dominated north. Another case of ‘divide and rule.’ Why should Sudan be treated any differently to Burma, Indochina, India or any other country? It was not. The situation was exacerbated when schools and colleges were established in the south and the educated youth, with higher aspirations, began making demands for social and economic development. The British then preferred to work with the semi-literate older generation so, with their expectations unfulfilled, the younger generation became more rebellious, turned to the Egyptian nationalists for support, and Sudanese nationalism began to be manifest through a number of associations. The White Flag League was established in 1924 with the specific aim of driving the British from the Sudan. When the governor-general was assassinated later that year the British blamed Egyptian influence and forced Egypt to withdraw from the joint administration and to withdraw all of its army except one battalion in Khartoum which was “a token of the Condominium.”²⁹¹ The Sudanese response was as bitter as that of the Egyptians. A Sudanese battalion mutinied in support of the Egyptians, and was promptly annihilated for its trouble. The rebellion was over.

Twelve years later, in 1936, with Britain’s imperial crisis deepening and a desperate need to limit antagonism in the linchpin of communications and security for all of the southern and eastern units of the empire – the Middle East – the British government was forced to relent. (Chapters 20, 21) A treaty was signed – without consultation with the Sudanese – which permitted a partial Egyptian return to the Sudan. Britain was seen to be saying to the Sudanese: “If we go, you remain subject to Egypt and you don’t get your independence.” Then during the war years, when it appeared very likely that Britain would be leaving whether it wished to or not, that treaty split the broad-based nationalist movement and polarized political opinion in the Sudan between those who wished to cooperate with Britain in a move towards independence, and those who wanted an alliance, or even a merger, with Egypt. While the war continued it was possible to mute those movements to some extent, but immediately the war ended all the tensions came to the surface and Britain's policy of divide and rule was in tatters. It had established an advisory council for the north to give some semblance of participation in government, but nothing for the south. It was soon forced to concede some legislative authority to the Sudanese and to do that it had to convert the advisory council for the north into a legislative council and, if it was not going to split the country into two, it had to introduce some southern participation in the legislative council. It did so in 1947, without consultation with Egypt with which it had the 1936 treaty of return.

It was time for Egypt to be upset again. Britain was now saying, in effect: "We want to hang onto the Sudan. This is the way we will do it, but, if we can't, there is a mechanism for independence in place." The British government played down the facts that Egypt's need to have security of water supply from the Nile was no less – in fact a lot greater – than when Britain and France had their standoff over control of Egypt, the Nile and the Sudan 50 years earlier; that the Sudan had provided a substantial proportion of recruits for the Egyptian Army; and that it clung to the prospect of an integrated rural settlement agreement with Sudan. Four years later, in 1951, after prolonged tension, Egypt unilaterally abrogated the 1936 treaty, proclaimed Egyptian rule over the Sudan, and told Britain it was time to go – at last. But that was a message Britain certainly did not want to hear because the Suez Canal was still a vital interest as it had been in the lead up to the Second World War. It was desperately trying to prevent the Far Eastern, South East Asian and Indian sub-continental colonies from slipping out of its grasp, and without the Suez Canal it was in deep trouble. (Chapter 27, Colonial policy: philosophy or perfidy? The Indian Saga. The British South East Asian Saga.)

However Britain had dug itself into another hole. It could not say: "All right, we will leave the Sudan and you can have it as long as we can keep the canal." The flow-on effects of that would have been rebellion in Sudan at being handed to Egypt instead of gaining independence, and with that would go a spontaneous increase in pressure from every other colony or territory for the same. Probably a round of rebellions. The government believed it had no option but to tough it out. It still had 80,000 troops in the canal zone and under the 1936 treaty they were entitled to stay for another six years, so there was some breathing space. It used the king's speech at the opening of parliament, on November 6, 1951, to put on a bold front. The king said: "My Government regard abrogation by the Egyptian Government of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of Alliance of 1936 and the Sudan Condominium Agreements of 1899, as illegal and without validity." Coming after Britain's 'token' repudiation of the Condominium Agreement in 1924, and in view of the circumstances of the 1936 and 1947 adjustments, it was a pathetic statement which did little except camouflage from the British public the real state of affairs, and the government was immediately under increased pressure from Sudan and the colonies. That was confirmed only a few days later when Eden stated that the Sudan was rapidly moving in the direction of self-government as a prelude to self-determination.²⁹² Whatever it did, it could not win.

Six months later, in May 1952, there were major developments. The Sudanese administration submitted a draft self-government statute for both Britain and Egypt to consider. Already approved by the Sudanese Legislative Assembly, it provided for elections to a Sudanese parliament; for a Sudanese Council of Ministers to take office after the elections; and for that council to be responsible only to that parliament. There was no immediate response to the draft from Egypt, but it came two months later, in July. It was then that the British backed monarch, Farouk, who was expected to acquiesce in whatever Britain wanted, was deposed and a Revolutionary Command Council (RCC) controlled by Col. Gamal Abdel Nasser seized power which was exercised, initially, through a nominal regent, with Farouk's infant son, named to succeed him. (See July 1952) But that arrangement was only a front to allow time for the change to be accepted without too much trauma. The RCC had no intention of the statute proceeding, but in October the British government announced its acceptance of the draft statute and said it "looked forward to the Sudanese exercising the right of self-determination in the near future." Negotiations over the details of the Sudan charter and for a new agreement for the British army to remain in the Canal Zone then ground on laboriously, intertwined, with the two major Sudanese political parties each intervening, from opposing points of view, to achieve the best outcome from their point of view. In due course, on February 12, 1953, Eden announced the signing of an agreement under which Sudan would be governed for a transitional period of three years by an elected government within the framework of the Condominium. But it was a clumsy agreement which introduced as many new tensions, especially at the religious interface, as the problems which it sought to circumvent. The governor-general's powers were restricted, with some of his decisions requiring the approval of a commission chaired by a Pakistani; special provision was made for accelerated development of the neglected southern provinces during that period; an electoral commission was chaired by an Indian; and a special Sudanization Committee was set up to administer defence.²⁹³

Elections for the new Parliament of the Sudan were set for November-December. The National Unionist Party (NUP) campaigned on the slogan "Unity of the Nile Valley" with the open support of Egypt and with some Egyptian leaders saying they would throw the British out of the Nile. The Ummah Party opposed union with Egypt and favoured independence and a loose arrangement with Britain. It was actively but less conspicuously supported by British officials. The NUP won overwhelmingly and three months later, on March 1, 1954, the new parliament was opened and the NUP leader was appointed the prime minister – to the sound of gun shots in street fighting between rival political groups and the police.

As far as the British public was concerned, in relation to Africa, the government's attention was then concentrated on the issue of the Suez Canal. But that issue could not be divorced in the government's thinking and negotiations from the issues of either Berlin and Cold War, or the Far East and South East Asia. The Foreign Ministers met in Berlin from January 25 to February 18, and the Geneva Conference on Indochina ran from April 26 to July 21, and control of the Suez Canal was important to both issues. It was so important, being at the centre of Israel-Egypt tensions at that time, that the US government put direct pressure on Nasser to agree to at least a short term British presence, advising that unless he accepted “reasonable terms” they would stop all economic aid,²⁹⁴ and an agreement for a British withdrawal phased over twenty months – to June 1956 – was initialled on July 27, 1954. As already noted, Eden’s announcement to the Commons next day was greeted with consternation and vigorous debate. It was only intervention in the debate by Britain’s elder statesman, Churchill, which ensured that the agreement would be ratified. The base, once vacated, was to be maintained in efficient working order and capable of immediate use in the event of an attack on any member of the Arab League or, against Nasser’s wishes, the Baghdad Pact member, Turkey. The result meant that no one was happy and propaganda, intrigue and disturbances in the southern Sudan followed until, on November 13, 1955, the last British and Egyptian forces withdrew from the Sudan, leaving the Sudanese in full charge.

So: on December 19, in the act of self-determination which had been agreed to three years earlier, the Sudanese parliament voted unanimously for independence. The NUP repudiated the policy which it had been elected on, and voted with the opposition for immediate independence with no formal links with Egypt. The government, on the advice of Britain,²⁹⁵ had decided that it wanted a close working relationship with Egypt, but it was “not going to tolerate Egyptian rule in exchange for British.”²⁹⁶ [Emphasis added.] So much for Egypt’s role in the defunct Condominium. It had been, in effect, “British rule,” and that was that.

With 1955 drawing to a close, the first six of Hussein’s Vampires were delivered from Britain; Ben-Gurion was able to manoeuvre his way back into office as prime minister in place of Sharett who was regarded as too passive in defence matters; and the Dulles brothers were both very busy shaping and disrupting relationships around the world. But they, and the United States administration overall, were not paying enough attention to relationships at home. The race question, with discrimination against black Americans, was getting more critical in the southern states and, after a couple of widely publicized incidents, the Montgomery Improvement Association was formed to lobby for changes to racial segregation laws in those states. The Rev. Martin Luther King Jnr. was asked to lead it.

FRUSTRATION 'REACTION' NEW LIAISONS

~ 1956

~ January

~1: Sudan’s two Condominium rulers, Britain and Egypt, both recognized its independence. Selwyn Lloyd later wrote:

- We had frustrated Nasser's ambitions, something for which he never forgave us. It remained a constant irritant. He continued to accuse us of turning the Sudan against him, over the Nile waters, over the division of sterling balances and of disrupting Arab unity.²⁹⁷ [Emphasis added.]

Whether the foreign secretary penned those words 22 years later as a simple matter of fact, or whether there was just a touch of glee in them, reflecting victory over a competitor, their historical significance lies in the fact that they indicate either, or both, of two things. First: a continuing lack of understanding on the part of the power which had exercised suzerainty over the region for so long of the origins of those ambitions. They included the way in which suzerainty had been exercised as if Egypt was a mere item of input (or a small cog at the centre of a mass of bigger ones which could not turn without it) in the expansion and consolidation of empire; the country's proud heritage as the seat of a former great empire; and the fact that "a Zionist entity" had been imposed on the total Arab world, right in the middle of Dār al-islām. Second: that while the situation involved contemporary politics, the politics was a product of the trouble in the triangle and a symptom of broken relationships – it was neither the origin of it, nor the basis of it. The continuing effort to camouflage the issue of religion and to put a synthetic emphasis on international politics, portraying it as an issue of the Western World versus Communism (as Eden and Eisenhower agreed to do when the Suez crisis came to a head) had several flow-on effects. It emphasized Britain's dependence on its alliance with the enormously more powerful United States; played into the hands of the United States which was playing its own games, made it easier for the United States to call the shots and to edge Britain out of the Middle East; made it ever more difficult for the world-at-large to understand the origins of the crises into which it had floundered; and ensured that the trouble in the triangle would get steadily more vicious – and global – until it became focused on a point at which it could no longer be camouflaged. The golden Dome of the Rock on Mount Moriah, in Jerusalem.

- ~ Coinciding with its recognition of Sudan's independence, Egypt celebrated the Christian New Year with Nasser's announcement of a new constitution under which the nation became a one-party Socialist State with Islam as its official religion, and, being more than irritated by the arrival of the Vampires in Amman, he greatly stepped up anti-Israel and anti-British propaganda through the Cairo-based 'Voice of the Arabs' radio system. Political and diplomatic pressure on Hussein to persuade him to fall into line with the overall anti-Israel pro-Palestine campaign increased.
- ~ 9: The British ambassador, realizing that the broadcasts were having their intended effect on the Jordanian population and that Hussein would be overthrown if he did not comply with the mounting public pressure, or if Britain did not intervene, and that Britain's authority would be flushed into the Jordan, appealed for at least two brigades of troops to be sent to Amman immediately.
- ~ 10: The British government's response was immediate. Two parachute brigades and an infantry battalion were flown to Cyprus, and the armoured regiment of the Arab Legion, commanded by General Glubb, was moved closer to Amman from its base adjacent to Eilat. Across the border in Saudi Arabia a force of close to 2,000, with light armoured support, was being gathered for a push into Jordan from the south. Whitehall promptly warned the Saudi government that if its force crossed the border the British government would 'fulfil its obligations' under the Anglo-Jordanian Treaty of 1948. The Saudi force withdrew to the south, but both Nasser and the Saud maintained pressure on Hussein to break his ties with Britain and to join the front against Israel. Nasser was determined that his ambitions would not be frustrated for long, and planning continued.

~ February

~ 15: An operation order was issued to commanders in the Egyptian Third Division. It read, in part:

*Para. III: Every commander should be prepared and prepare his troops for unavoidable wars with Israel in order to achieve our supreme objective, namely, annihilation of Israel and its complete destruction in as little time as possible, and by fighting against her as brutally and cruelly as possible.*²⁹⁸

That such an order was issued suggests that Nasser had no expectation that the Anglo-American assistance towards the Aswan High Dam would be forthcoming, because he would have taken for granted that it would be cancelled immediately he started a war with Israel. In fact he could have been aware already of the steps being taken in the United States to make sure that the loan was not forthcoming and that the British cabinet was still divided over the issue also. The possibility that the British government might renege on the agreement was actually canvassed in February in discussions involving the head of the World Bank as well as the two governments. Dulles expressed the view that Egypt had to re-align itself with the West, and the bank head advised that in Egypt's current political and economic circumstances the loan might not be viable. That was all several months before the final troop withdrawal in June.

~ 24: Within a few weeks of the recognition of Sudan's independence a "secret" speech by Khrushchev to the Soviet Communist Party Congress suggested that Eden's statements to the Commons on relations with Egypt must have given the Soviet Union some solace.

Khrushchev broke a long established taboo by condemning the excesses of Stalin's one-man rule and attacking his "intolerance, his brutality, his abuse of power." The spectacle of the First Secretary of the Communist Party exposing the wrongful executions of the Great Purge of the 1930s and the excesses of Soviet police repression, after years of fearful silence, had far-reaching effects that Khrushchev himself could barely have foreseen. The resulting "thaw" in the Soviet Union saw the release of millions of political prisoners and the "rehabilitation" of many thousands more who had perished.²⁹⁹ The intensity of the competition between the West and the Soviet Union for naval bases, other offence/defence facilities, and trade in politically uncommitted countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America which was reflected in Eden's remark about the need to finance the dam was muted somewhat, especially in the light of the Bandung Conference, by Khrushchev's denouncement of the previous excesses of the Stalinist era. He rejected the notion that war between the East and the West was fatalistically inevitable, and declared that the Leninist principle of coexistence of states with different social systems was the basis of the Soviet Union's foreign policy. However not every country which had been at Bandung welcomed it. The Chinese Communist Party leadership was dismayed by the criticism of Stalin's leadership and by Soviet attempts at rapprochement with the Capitalist West, and it began to compete against the Soviet Union with as much vigour as against the West.

~ March

~1: Hussein, having decided to acquiesce in his fellow Arab's demands that he join them in the push against Israel, issued an order for the prime minister to dismiss General Glubb and other senior British officers of the Arab Legion.

He had not, apparently, discussed this with his prime minister whose response was to summon the cabinet and put to them that they had four choices: comply with the king's orders; ignore them; remonstrate with the king and be prepared to resign; or remonstrate and be prepared to be dismissed. It did not take them long to decide. The prime minister sent for the British ambassador, advised him of the decision, then met Glubb and told him he must leave next morning. When the dismissal was announced, crowds flowed into the streets of Amman cheering for both Hussein and Nasser.³⁰⁰ It has been suggested that a group of Jordanian Army officers had threatened Hussein and the government with a coup if they did not dismiss Glubb, and that is quite likely in view of the circumstances, but while Eden referred to 'reports' of a coup threat he did not offer any confirmation.

Britain was in a bind. The government could send in the army units on standby in Cyprus and reimpose British rule, but if it did so the entire Arab world would have risen in rage; Britain would have received no support from the United Nations; the Baghdad Pact would have been in tatters; and there would have been an instant invasion of Israel. It could have annulled the 1948 treaty, withdrawn all military advisers and ended all aid, but that was exactly what the Arabs wanted. About eight days after the dismissal, Nasser announced that Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Syria jointly offered to support Jordan with an annual subvention of Stg. 20 million to offset the assistance which it was receiving from Britain. Shortly after, the Soviet ambassador in Cairo advised the Jordanian chargé d'affaires that his government was prepared to provide any financial or military aid which Jordan may need with a view to establishing good relations.³⁰¹ That was the straw the British government was clutching for. It had been at pains to keep the Arab-Israeli conflict dimension out of all reporting and had to portray the "incident" as a tiff between friends caused by failures of supervision by Glubb and his senior officers. It was also desperately trying to encourage a more cordial relationship between Jordan and Iraq. Now the Soviet ambassador's intervention gave the government the opportunity it needed. It had been a Soviet plot all the time! The anti-Communist bandwagon began rolling again. But it could not be rolled at quite the old speed. The discussion between Eden and Bulganin about an exchange of visits had been converted into a firm invitation for Bulganin and Khrushchev to visit London; the date had been fixed for April 18, only weeks away, and the itinerary was fairly well in place. According to Eden:

Our general policy in the Middle East was founded on the need to protect British interests in Iraq and the Persian Gulf. The main threat to these interests was the growing influence of Nasser with his anti-Western ideology and collusion with Soviet Russia, especially in arms supply. I was in detailed consultation with the government of Iraq, which fully understood the dangers, but I did not think it right as yet to give an account to Parliament. Nor could I make an announcement in the debate on the future of our relations with Jordan. ... [Emphasis added.]

*My main purpose was to draw Iraq and Jordan closer together. The best way to start the process was by a meeting between the two Hashemite kings, and this I set about to encourage.*³⁰²

Eden knew very well that Nasser had gone to the Soviet Union for arms after the United States declined to supply him because of his conflict with Israel, now he was about to host the Soviet leaders in London, so he had softened the political rhetoric to a reference to Egyptian-Soviet “collusion.” He made no reference to infiltration or domination. And Nasser’s policy of non-alignment and his insistence on trading with whoever he wished was well established and respected in the non-Western world, but the United States and Britain were determined to crush it. The harder they tried, the further they forced him into collaboration with the Soviet Bloc. It is remarkable that he “did not think it right as yet to give an account to Parliament.” He knew that he could not do so without discussing the hub of the crisis – Arab-Israeli relations – because to do so was to open it to the whole world, and he was determined to suppress it. It is also remarkable that in his memoirs he made no reference to discussions with the United States or to the reaction of the Eisenhower administration at this point, and yet they were in constant contact. Dulles and Eisenhower both wanted Britain out of the Middle East, but they did not want the Soviet Union in, and they did not want an Arab-Israeli war, because American assets, oil wells and refineries were scattered through the region. It could only apply diplomatic pressure on Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Syria, and it had greatly undermined its ability to put pressure on Egypt. It certainly could not go to Britain’s aid or it would further antagonize the Arab countries and, in any case, it wanted Britain out!

- ~ 2: France took the next reluctant step in its decolonization program next day. It was making a concerted effort to hold on to resource rich Algeria, in which about one million European settlers wanted French rule to continue, by counter-revolutionary repression, but it granted independence to Morocco and, less than three weeks later, Tunisia.
- ~ 21: When Selwyn Lloyd briefed cabinet in detail on the situation in the Middle East he said that Nasser was “not prepared to work for a settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute” and that he was willing to accept assistance from the Russians to achieve leadership of the Arab world.

He said that Britain had to realign its policy in the Middle East and instead of working to conciliate Nasser “we should do our utmost to counter him and uphold our true friends.” This meant seeking increased support for the Baghdad Pact and its members; detaching King Saud from Nasser; support Libya in order to prevent the extension of Egyptian or Communist influence there; counter Egypt's subversion in the Sudan and the Persian Gulf; and "seek to establish in Syria a Government more friendly to the West." Put simply, the foreign secretary was telling cabinet that the cohesion of the Arab world had to be destroyed to suppress the need to deal with the Arab-Israeli conflict. He went on to discuss possible actions aimed more directly at Nasser and his government, such as withholding military supplies, withdrawing finance for the Aswan High Dam, blocking sterling balances and getting the United States to reduce economic aid. If he had set out to design a program to force Nasser further into the Soviet camp and to entice the Soviet Union into the Middle East he could have found nothing more effective than those proposals – short of an invasion! He would add that later. But he said that this all needed US support, and the first task was to "seek Anglo-American agreement on a general realignment of policy towards Nasser." Cabinet agreed, but this would be "difficult to achieve," Lloyd told them, because, quite apart from other considerations, the State Department "thought that any open association with colonialist, imperialist Britain would be fatal to American influence in the Middle East," and Dulles "was determined to avoid any appearance of 'ganging up' with us." [Emphasis added.] After that meeting Lloyd formally advised Washington that the 'offer' of a loan to finance the Aswan High Dam might have to be withdrawn.³⁰³ He later noted that Nasser had already learned from an Iraqi Baghdad Pact delegate in March that "the Western powers were unlikely to support the dam."³⁰⁴

~ April

~ In the wake of France's decision to grant independence to Morocco, the Spanish government relinquished control of its Moroccan protectorate which merged with the Moroccan Sultanate a month later.

WELCOME VISITORS

~ 18: The 12-day visit to London by Marshal Bulganin and Khrushchev which had been anticipated with some apprehension, began on a warm and friendly note and discussions at Downing Street covered every point of tension or significant developments around the world. According to Eden: "It was about colonial affairs that argument was the toughest and, at times, the roughest." The Soviet leaders attacked the record and the principle, while Eden and Lloyd defended the present and progress towards self-government.³⁰⁵

But the tension reached its peak when discussion turned to oil and the Middle East. Eden knew of a Soviet-German exchange during negotiations in 1940 towards a four-power pact – well before Barbarossa – when Ribbentrop and Molotov discussed the post-war carve up of the British Empire and Molotov agreed to the basic German proposals "subject to the condition that the territory south of Batum and Baku in the general direction of the Persian Gulf [Iraq] was recognized as a focal point of Soviet aims." Eden was concerned that "the purposes of Soviet policy have not greatly changed since that date."³⁰⁶ He seemed to be implying that there was something unhealthy or unseemly about big-power grabs for resources and territory, and victors' carve-ups, and that they had to be stopped. He was quite right. But he had a blind spot. He seemed to think that the order of correctness had changed now that Britain was no longer an expanding power – in fact it was quite the reverse. He had already noted that the resource-acquisitive economic imperialism of the United States was somehow indecent, but he seemed to have forgotten about his own efforts at territorial carve-ups and giveaways, and especially the deal which he did with Stalin on Churchill's instructions in 1941. That was somehow different. He tossed it straight at the Soviet leaders.

... I told the Russians that the uninterrupted supply of oil was literally vital to our economy. They showed an understanding of our interest and appeared to be willing to meet it. I said I thought I must be absolutely blunt about the oil, because we would fight for it. Mr. Khrushchev replied that I would hardly find sympathy with the Soviet Government if I said I was prepared to start a war. They, for their part, would only resort to war if an attack were made on them or on the Warsaw Pact countries.

Later in the talks Mr. Khrushchev reverted to this topic and to my statement, as he put it, that I was prepared to fight a war in that part of the world. He said that it was close to the Soviet frontiers. If my statement was intended as a threat they must reject it. I repeated that what I had said was that we could not live without oil and that we had no intention of being strangled to death.

... We both understood that the Middle East was the area where our differences of policy were most likely to become acute. These discussions did something to put that danger at a further remove.³⁰⁷

When the Russians left for home Eden wrote to his senior cabinet colleagues:

Our main weapons of resistance to Soviet encroachment have hitherto been military. But do they meet the needs of the present time? I do not believe that the Russians have any plans at present for military aggression in the West. On the other hand, are we prepared with other weapons to meet the new challenge? This seems to me to be the major issue of foreign policy.³⁰⁸

Surely the implication behind that note was that there was no need for an acceleration of the arms race and, if anything, the opportunity for a phased reduction. He was indicating that the philosophical challenge for the hearts and minds of people, or the challenge of two competing socio-economic, should be met at that level with innovation and adaptation to satisfy the needs of the time. He was still trying desperately to cling to Britain's remaining colonial possessions – a matter which would be resolved to Britain's disadvantage within the next few months – but he was aware that there were better ways to go than the constant acceleration of the arms race and ruthless economic exploitation. However his allies across the Atlantic were not in agreement. The arms race would continue at an horrendous pace and exploitation would go from bad to worse.

~ May

- ~ 5: Israel, Britain and the United States all became more fearful of an Arab-Israeli clash when Egypt and Jordan reached agreement for the coordination of their armed forces.
- ~ 16: Their concern at Nasser's increasing liaison with the Communist world also increased when Egypt announced its recognition of Communist China.³⁰⁹
- ~ June
- ~ Since Stalin's death in 1953, and under the more open approach taken by Khrushchev, Tito, in Yugoslavia, felt less need for closer links with the West to ensure his security, and he came to see that he could balance his internal and foreign policies somewhere between the two power blocs.

He soon found an affinity with like-minded leaders in developing countries. Negotiations with Nasser and Nehru of India now led to a closer cooperation among states that were "non-engaged" in the East-West confrontation. From non-engagement evolved the concept of "active nonalignment" or the development and promotion of alternative policies to those pursued by the two big power blocs. They saw their position as quite distinct from "mere neutrality." The concept initially caused little concern for Khrushchev and the Soviet leadership which was eager to trade and to work with all Third World countries, but it was ridiculed by the United States which sought to distance itself from such a philosophy, and it added to pressure for reform in other Soviet bloc countries, especially Poland and Hungary. Yugoslavia, Egypt and India continued to develop closer ties for several years before Tito was able to convene the first meeting of nonaligned states in Belgrade, in 1961. There was much debate over how the concept of nonalignment related to the aspirations of the Afro-Asian Bandung Conference group, some of whose members wanted to be – or came under pressure to be – associated only with the Western Capitalist community. As a result there were no more meetings of the Bandung Conference group.

- ~ In Egypt there were celebrations as the last of the British troops withdrew "under an agreement honourably and freely negotiated" between the two countries which, according to Lloyd, brought to an end "an association of over 70 years which, despite differences and some hard words, has brought lasting benefits to both our countries."³¹⁰

When Lloyd issued a press statement to mark that withdrawal he referred to all sorts of Anglo-Egyptian cooperation in such a way that Nasser was left with only one conclusion to draw. Lloyd said very pointedly: "We have always hoped that Egypt would play her full part in the Middle East. We supported the foundation of the Arab League, and we have every interest in promoting unity and cooperation between Arab States." That was in direct contradiction of his actions concerning the Baghdad Pact. And: "I am sure that if we respect one another's legitimate interests and treat one another with fairness and mutual respect, the British and Egyptian people can build up a new friendship for the future." He made no mention of the High Dam. And on the US side Nasser's announcement of a one-party Islamic Socialist State was probably enough to sink the loan on its own, but the feeling was being expressed quite openly that in view of Egypt's continuing propaganda against the Baghdad Pact the loan 'offer' should be withdrawn. There were plenty of "friendly" countries in the Middle East which were “bombarding” Washington with requests for aid. In addition several Congressional lobbies were hard at work to undermine it. The China lobby had been infuriated by Nasser’s recognition of Communist China in May; the cotton lobby was against the loan because of Nasser’s deal with the Soviet Union over Egyptian cotton; and the Israeli lobby was against it on the grounds that it would strengthen one of their principal enemies.³¹¹

The curtain was about to rise on an affair which became a symbol of the end of the British Empire: an absolute debacle at the very facility which had been the focal point of Britain’s desperate efforts to hold the empire together for 20 years.

- ~ 18: Ben-Gurion, being very well aware of the significance of the British departure; being committed to a campaign of harassment against Egypt on behalf of France; and having indicated privately that he intended to sooner or later break the Egyptian blockade of Eilat, wanted someone more aggressive as foreign minister and asked Sharett to resign to make way for Mrs. Golda Meir.³¹² He was clearing the decks for action and he did not have to wait long for the opportunity.
- ~ In Poland, in the wake of Khrushchev’s denunciation of Stalinism in February, the sudden death of the country’s hard line leader, Bierut, in March, encouraged anti-Stalinists to organize a workers’ strike in Poznan to press for reforms. When it was violently suppressed, shock waves reverberated around the country and the Soviet Union threatened intervention.
- ~ July
- ~ 1: Three men met in Damascus in an atmosphere of intrigue “in the time-honoured tradition of the Middle East” – the business at which “the British were old hands” – but they were not British.

They were Archibald Roosevelt, another of the grandson-cousins and also a highly placed official of the CIA; Wilbur Crane Eveland, a staff member of the US National Security Council; and Michail Bey Ilyan, leader of the Conservative Populist Party in Syria and a former foreign minister. The first two were there on behalf of “Dulles and the Americans, still exulting in their king-making in Iran, [who] were looking to further remake the oil region in their own image.” Because of his expertise in the Middle East the CIA had asked that Eveland be seconded to it (from the body which was supposed to monitor its activities) for a series of assignments. The US ambassador to Syria, James Moose Jr., reasoned that a leftist-oriented or Communist-dominated Syrian government would clearly threaten American interests in neighbouring Turkey, which, in turn, could outflank all the state of the NATO alliance, and so forth and so on. It was clear that since the Syrian government could not be relied upon to do anything about this major impending disaster, something would have to be done about the Syrian government. Blum draws on Eveland’s memoirs to summarize the meeting as follows.³¹³

Roosevelt asked Ilyan “what would be needed to give the Syrian conservatives enough control to purge the Communists and their leftist sympathizers. Ilyan responded by ticking off names and places: the radio stations in Damascus and Aleppo; a few key senior officers; and enough money to buy newspapers now in Egyptian and Saudi hands.”

Roosevelt probed further. "Could these things, he asked Ilyan, be done with US money and assets alone, with no other Western or Near Eastern country involved?"

"Without question," Ilyan replied, nodding gravely.³¹⁴

Dulles and Lloyd were certainly on the same wave length in this exercise. Lloyd had told the British cabinet in March that steps would have to be taken to ensure a more friendly government in Syria.

THE SUEZ CRISIS

It had to happen. A confrontation between Egypt and Israel was becoming inevitable. The policies which Britain and France were pursuing to prop up their ailing colonial positions (deliberately drawing Israel into their schemes) and which the United States was pursuing to isolate the Soviet Union (the political embodiment of the Marxist challenge to the church and the amorphous Christian gel) were making it so. Iraq was plotting with the British to topple the governments of both Syria and Nasser's Egypt; the British were pressuring the Americans to join the conspiracy;³¹⁵ and the CIA [was] compromising – leave Nasser alone, at least for the time being, and we'll do something about Syria.³¹⁶ It was only a question of what or who would trigger it. Both the United States and Britain had decided to renege on their undertaking to help finance the Aswan High Dam. They had discussed the issue but had not decided how, or in what circumstances, to advise Nasser. They wanted it to be in circumstances of their own choosing and to their own advantage. The sequence of events, at this point, was brief but dramatic and had lasting consequences. Dulles made a precipitate decision with a minimum of consultation. As far as he was concerned it was simply another piece in the jigsaw puzzle with which he was seeking to further isolate the Soviet Union from its former allies and its trading partners, and to assume, for the United States, the dominant position in the Middle East. On March 8 he had told Lloyd that the United States was going to "enter into things in the Middle East more in the future" but when Lloyd asked him "How?" he simply replied that he had not thought it out.³¹⁷ Dulles probably expected that by wielding a big stick he could prize Egypt out of its arms supply arrangements with the Soviet Union and that it would return to the Western fold. If he anticipated a backlash he did not show it, and the crisis in the Middle East entered a critical new phase.

- ~ 17: The British cabinet again discussed Lloyd's proposal that the Aswan High Dam loan offer be withdrawn, but without any sense of urgency, and the foreign secretary "promised to circulate a memorandum on how the withdrawal of our offer should be put to the Egyptians."³¹⁸
- ~ 18: In the Soviet satellite, Hungary, after some weeks of politicking and political upheaval, the previously disgraced Communist Party general secretary, Laszlo Rajk, was 'rehabilitated' on the orders of Khrushchev, and there was a change of government leadership, with some liberalization, at the same time.

- ~ 19: Egypt's ambassador in Washington, Ahman Hussein, briefed by Nasser that he should accept all the American conditions for the loan "so long as he did not give the impression of being humiliated," prepared to keep an appointment with Dulles for further talks, hoping to achieve an American commitment to "hundreds of millions of dollars over a period of ten years or more."

During the morning, prior to the appointment, Dulles discussed the matter with Eisenhower then, one hour before the appointment, advised the British ambassador, Makins, that the offer was to be withdrawn. When Dulles told Hussein that Congressional authorization was going to be required for the loan, clearly implying that approval may not be granted, Hussein is said to have responded that if the United States would not pay he was sure the Soviet Union would. Dulles promptly told him that the United States would not be blackmailed and the offer of help over the dam was withdrawn. According to Lloyd: "Dulles must have made up his mind at very short notice to play it this way. Murphy [Undersecretary of State] says that Dulles had not discussed with State Department officials the consequences of an abrupt withdrawal. They had not been weighed carefully in advance. ... I had had no idea that there was going to be this abrupt withdrawal."³¹⁹

- ~ 26: One week after Dulles dropped his bombshell, and only six weeks after he had agreed to terms for Britain's continued control of the Suez Canal until its lease expired in 1968, it was Nasser's turn to drop his. At a gathering of diplomats and business representatives for the opening of a new oil pipeline near Cairo he announced the nationalization of the canal.

In a speech full of vitriol he gave a potted version of its involvement in Egypt from an Arab perspective and showed what a raw nerve Dulles had touched. He said that Egypt had faced a long struggle with 'malevolent imperialism;' Jordan had delivered the worst defeat to date for imperialism when it had refused to join the Baghdad Treaty a few months earlier [he did not say that its decision was under great pressure from Egypt and with rioting in the streets]; Britain, through its Balfour Declaration, had been responsible for the birth of Israel; it had allowed the Zionists to equip, supplied them with arms, and, wishing to exterminate the Palestinians, had turned their country over to the Jewish Haganah; it had tried to infuse hatred of Egypt into its Sudanese brethren; and now, in league with the United States, it was aiming at the obliteration of Arab nationalism.³²⁰ At the end of his speech, at a given signal, the offices of the Suez Canal Company were seized by force and its staff were required to continue operating the canal. Jordan's King Hussein promptly sent a message of goodwill, saying to Nasser: "We look forward to the future when the Arab flag will fly over our great stolen country."³²¹

NATIONALIZATION OR INTERNATIONALIZATION?

- ~ 27: Immediately the nationalization – with compensation – had been announced, Eden wrote to Eisenhower about the strategy he proposed to follow. Eisenhower agreed. They would set their own ground rules for the international row which would erupt, and they knew that with control of the international media in their hands, Egypt would hardly get a serious hearing at all.

Eden set out a number of points: the canal is an international asset; it is vital to the free world; Nasser cannot be allowed to exploit the revenues for Egypt's exclusive use; the West should start with political pressure, but it should be prepared "to use force to bring Nasser to his senses." There was absolutely no suggestion that the matter should be resolved by arbitration or by reference to the International Court of Justice. Two weeks later, during debate in the Commons, Opposition MPs claimed that the government feared that if the matter went to the International Court the probability was that Britain would lose or that the court would rule that the matter was not within its jurisdiction, which would amount to a win for Egypt through the back door.³²² Selwyn Lloyd claimed that this argument was unfounded, but Eden did, by implication, admit in his letter to Eisenhower that Egypt had a strong case. He wrote: "We should not allow ourselves to become involved in legal quibbles about the rights of the Egyptian Government to nationalize what is technically an Egyptian company, or in financial arguments about their capacity to pay the compensation which they have offered. I feel sure that we should take issue with Nasser on the broader international grounds."³²³ What that meant was the international political grandstand.

Eden's immediate concern was the impact which a politically motivated closure of the canal would have, and while he knew very well indeed that the trigger for such a closure was almost certain to be the Arab-Israel conflict he insisted that the two issues be separated. Every government involved knew that a closure of the canal was therefore a very powerful political tool in the Arab armoury in time of conflict – Britain, the United States, France, Israel and the Arabs especially, and Eden was very concerned that if the two issues were linked in public statements it might be sufficient to incite Egypt and the other Arab nations to try it out. Two extracts illustrate the dilemma for the Western powers.

*The immediate threat is to the oil supplies to Western Europe, a great part of which flows through the canal ... If the canal were closed we should have to ask you to help us by reducing the amount which you draw from the pipeline terminals in the eastern Mediterranean and possibly by sending us supplementary supplies for a time from your side of the world.*³²⁴

*At an early stage in their discussions, the three Foreign Secretaries [British, French and United States] agreed that the Arab-Israeli dispute should be treated as a separate matter from the future of the canal. ... [Then, following a brief statement of the nature of the conflict ...] Though this was all too true, to associate Israel's problems with those arising from the nationalization of the canal would, at this time, have tangled them to Nasser's advantage. If we were to get action, we had to keep the issues crisp.*³²⁵

Intense diplomatic and political negotiations began immediately and continued for three months while Britain sought to find a deal which would enable it to retain control of the canal.

Conferences involved, at times, both Dulles and Eisenhower and the representatives of 22 countries.

Between them, Britain and the United States managed a compliant Western-controlled media system very well. There was virtually no media reporting of the compensation package or Egypt's rights in regard to nationalization. Most of the discussion centred on how the nasty Egyptians wanted to exploit and control shipping plying between Europe and Asia as if, somehow, the whole of Asia would be placed at a disadvantage when their shipping fees were going to Egypt and its development program rather than into the pockets of foreign investors. Any reference to most of Britain's and Western Europe's oil coming from West Asia – Saudi Arabia, the Gulf States, Iraq and Iran – was played very low-key. And there was, as the governments had agreed, a very definite pattern of separation of reporting about the canal, and about the Arab-Israeli conflict and Egypt's refusal of passage for Israeli shipping and the closure of the Strait of Tiran and access to Eilat. People were definitely not supposed to link the two issues. If they did it might not only incite the Arabs to close the canal, it would raise all those embarrassing questions about the role of the amorphous Christian gel in the establishment of the State of Israel, about its relations with its neighbours, and the theology of it all. The trouble in the triangle was alive and well!

~ August

- ~ In the Soviet Bloc the lessening of state controls which Khrushchev had initiated a few months earlier continued with the release of former Communist Party general secretary Gomulka from prison in Poland and his readmission to the Communist Party.
- ~ 5: Unable to get the international support that they were looking for, the British and French governments established a joint staff team in London to prepare plans for a landing in Egypt. It was quite ambitious. About that time, the French Interior Minister, Bourguès-Maunoury, called the visiting Israeli director general of the ministry of defence, Shimon Peres, and asked: "If we make war on Egypt, would Israel be prepared to fight alongside us?" Instantly, Peres said "yes."³²⁶ The British and French staff could scheme to their hearts content.
- ~ 8: Three days later Eden made a statement to the Commons. In effect what he said was 'the government has decided to go to war.' But he used the strategy which he had canvassed with Eisenhower.

The alternatives are now clear to me to see. If we all join together to create an international system for the canal and spend its revenues as they should be spent, to develop it rapidly, that can bring growing prosperity to the East and West alike, the countries which produce the oil and the countries which buy it. There will then be a wealth for all to share, including Egypt. There is no question of denying her a fair deal, or a just return. But if anyone is going to snatch a grab and try to pocket what really belongs to the world, the result will be impoverishment for all, and a refusal by some countries at least to lead their life at such a hazard. Meanwhile, we have too much at risk not to take precautions. We have done so. That is the meaning of the movements by land, sea and air of which you have heard in the last few days.

*We do not seek a solution by force, but by the broadest possible international agreement. That is why we have called the conference. We shall do all we can to help its work, but this I must make plain. We cannot agree that an act of plunder which threatens the livelihood of many nations shall be allowed to succeed. And we must make sure that the life of the great trading nations of the world cannot, in the future, be strangled at any moment by some interruption to the free passage of the canal.*³²⁷

- ~ 13: While delegates prepared for the international conference which Britain hoped would pull the world into line behind it (due to begin on the 15th) Menzies broadcast to the world:

*International law is not a precise body of jurisprudence: it's always in the making. But if there is one thing clear it is that national contracts with the governments or citizens of other nations must be carried out unless there is legal excuse for non-performance. If at any time and for any reason of real or supposed self-interest, a nation could claim that its sovereign rights entitled it to set treaties aside or violate international contacts, all talk of or reliance on international law would become a sham. We cannot accept the legality or the morality of what Nasser had done.*³²⁸

Next day Selwyn Lloyd went one better.

*The rule of law must prevail. We are not bellicose – neither the British Government nor people. With Britain, force is always the last resort. We shall work with all our power for a peaceful solution, but that solution must include some form of international control for this essential waterway. We are not seeking British control, we are seeking international control.*³²⁹

Neither statement was anything but hollow bombast.

In any case, the Menzies and Lloyd statements must be viewed against some of the treaties and ‘contracts of convenience’ of the previous few years: the Balfour Declaration; the deals done by the oil industry during the 1930s or during the war; the British Government’s financial dealings with Czechoslovakia at that time; Churchill’s deal with Stalin over the future of Poland (although that was a ‘stab in the back’ rather than a direct contradiction of the agreement which Britain had brokered between the Soviet Union and the Polish government in exile on July 30, four and a half months earlier) (chapter 24, A complete solution to the Jewish Question)³³⁰; Nuri’s ‘contract conversation’ with Lloyd himself on March 10, (see note ²⁹⁰; ‘make sure that Turkey [does] not invade Syria ... [and] ... the Israelis should not attempt to improve their position ... while Iraq organizes a movement against [Syria] by elements in Syria more friendly to Iraq and the West.’); or the Roosevelt-Eveland-Ilyan discussions just outlined.

- ~ 23: The outcome of the 22-nation international conference was an agreement by 18 of them for the appointment of a five-nation delegation³³¹ with Menzies as chairman, with the task of persuading Nasser to agree to a formula based on six principles which Dulles had proposed.

The six principles agreed included: recognition of Egypt's sovereignty; a guarantee of fair return for the use of the canal; the negotiation of a new convention to govern the use of the canal; the operation of the canal would be entrusted to a board which would include Egypt; other countries would be appointed on the basis of a pattern of maritime interests; and operating procedures would be determined without political motivation to favor or to disadvantage any user. Negotiations dragged on.

The key issues were the board and the operating procedures. The operation of the canal would be entrusted to a board which would determine operating procedures without political motivation to favor or to disadvantage any user. Transit rights would be determined by the board, not by Egypt. Nasser might still have been able to close the Strait of Tiran and cut off access to the minor port of Eilat, but it would not have been able to close the canal to Israel's shipping and force it all the way around Africa and through the Mediterranean. The political stakes were high. The Soviet Union was represented at the international conference, and although it supported Egypt's position it played a low-key role and did not seek a seat on the negotiating committee. The five nation committee prepared to meet Nasser at the beginning of September, with Britain and France wanting to keep open the military option, to be able to use it to apply more pressure on Egypt. But outside of that formal diplomatic circle the State Department and the CIA were conducting their own negotiations – through the group of three conspirators who had met in Damascus on July 1, Roosevelt, Eveland and Ilyan.

About the time of the international conference, Ilyan expressed concern to his CIA contact, Eveland. Nasser was now the hero of the Arab World, and collaboration with any Western power to overthrow an Arab government was politically indefensible. However he was easily enough placated and planning continued, with the coup in Syria scheduled for October 25. The logistics, as outlined by Ilyan, called for senior colonels in the Syrian army to:

take control of Damascus, Aleppo, Homs, and Hamah. The frontier posts with Jordan, Iraq, and Lebanon would also be captured in order to seal Syria's borders until the radio stations announced that a new government had taken over under control of Colonel Kabbani, who would place armored units at key positions throughout Damascus. Once control had been established, Ilyan would inform the civilians he'd selected that they were to form a new government, but in order to avoid leaks none of them would be told until just a week before the coup.

For this operation, money would have to change hands. Ilyan asked for and received half a million Syrian pounds (approximately $167,000). The Syrian further stipulated that to guarantee their participation the Syrian plotters would require assurance from the highest level of the American government that the US would both back the coup and immediately grant recognition to the new government. This, Ilyan explained, could be communicated as follows: in April, President Eisenhower had said that the United States would oppose aggression in the Middle East, but not without congressional approval. Could the president repeat this statement, in light of the Suez crisis, he asked, on a specified date when Ilyan's colleagues would be told to expect it? Eisenhower's words would provide the guarantees they were seeking.

An affirmative reply to Ilyan's plan arrived in Damascus from Washington the next day. A proper occasion for the requested statement would have to be found and Secretary Dulles would be the one to use it. The scheme was for Dulles to make public reference to Eisenhower's statement between 16 and 18 October, thus giving Ilyan the week he needed to assemble his civilian team.³³²

DON'T INTERVENE NOW ...

~ September

~ 2: Eisenhower did not learn of the Anglo-French landing plan until the day the Menzies committee arrived in Cairo, but he immediately wrote quite sharply:

There should be no thought of military action before the influences of the UN are fully explored ... American public opinion flatly rejects the thought of using force particularly when it does not seem that every possible peaceful means of protecting our vital interests has been exhausted without result ... The use of military force against Egypt under present circumstances might have consequences even more serious than causing the Arabs to support Nasser.³³³

But he also wrote:

"I assure you we are not blind to the fact that eventually there may be no escape from the use of force."

Eden's response was equally blunt and he showed the importance which he placed on keeping control of the little cog in the middle of Britain's big machine. He compared Nasser to Hitler, and with an echo of Churchill's defiant stand after his Lend Lease negotiations with Roosevelt, "We mean to hold our own. I have not become the King's First Minister in order to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire,"³³⁴ he said: "it would be an ignoble end to our long history if we accepted to perish by degrees."³³⁵

~ 4: Following preliminary discussions on the 3rd, Menzies presented the committee's proposals, then, being aware that Nasser had told his military commanders that Franco-British mobilization moves were a bluff, he asked for a private talk with Nasser at which he told him that "it would be a great mistake on his part if he excluded the possible use of force from his reckoning."³³⁶

- ~ 5: Eden, Menzies and the negotiating team were staggered to learn of flaring newspaper headlines with reports that Eisenhower, questioned at a press conference about the possible use of force, had rejected it “completely and unconditionally.” He had said that if Nasser rejected the present proposals others would have to be worked out. “We are committed to a peaceful settlement of this dispute, nothing else,” he said.³³⁷ Nasser kept talking, but he had no need to. The proposals were dead in the water.
- ~ 6: Eden’s reply to Eisenhower reflected frustration and amazement. He reminded the president that they had agreed that everything possible would be done to get a peaceful settlement; that the use of force was a last resort and that it would, in any case, take quite some time to put into effect; and that negotiations would continue. He also discussed the situation in other countries of the Middle East; gave his assessment that Nasser was out to “expel all Western influence and interests from Arab countries;” and said that when he had achieved revolutionary control of the entire region “these new governments will in effect be Egyptian satellites if not Russian ones,” and wrote:
- In short we are convinced that if Nasser is allowed to defy the eighteen nations it will be a matter of months before revolution breaks out in the oil-bearing countries and the West is wholly deprived of Middle Eastern oil. In this belief we are fortified by the advice of friendly leaders in the Middle East.
 - The Iraqis are the most insistent in their warnings; both Nuri and the Crown Prince have spoken to us several times of the consequences of Nasser succeeding in his grab. *They would be swept away.*³³⁸ [Emphasis added.]

The Americans had been very eager to dismantle monarchies and to replace them with US-style republics at every opportunity, and, as has been noted, they had been very successful. However, there had been some circumstances in which they found it to their advantage not to do so and now, in the Middle East, they suddenly found untapped reserves of love for monarchies. They were not to be touched! However Eden had, without realizing quite what he was doing, put his reply to Eisenhower in the context of the parody of Hitler’s Mein Kampf. He wrote:

- In the nineteen-thirties Hitler established his position by a series of carefully planned movements. These began with the occupation of the Rhineland and were followed by successive acts of aggression against Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and the West. His actions were tolerated and excused by the majority of the population of Western Europe. It was argued either that Hitler had committed no act of aggression against anyone, or that he was entitled to do what he liked in his own territory, or that it was impossible to prove that he had any ulterior designs, or that the Covenant of the League of Nations did not entitle us to use force and that it would be wiser to wait until he did commit an act of aggression.
- In more recent years Russia has attempted the same tactics. The blockade of Berlin was to have been the opening in a campaign designed at least to deprive the Western powers of their whole position in Germany.³³⁹

He would have served his purpose better if he had based his case simply on the circumstances of the time and the adverse consequences for Britain and the United States as he saw them. It would have been a case based on pure self interest, but it would have been an acknowledgment of fact. By naming the series of situations which he did, he drew attention to some of the factors in colonial policy to which Nasser objected, to which the embryonic United States had been subjected in its own colonial days, and which were the basis of its initial determination to bring down the imperial colonial system. It had also lost sight of the track and was now hell bent along the alternative track which it had designed to achieve domination which was no less exploitative and no less destructive of human relations than that which it had set out to destroy. But for a person of Eisenhower's experience and knowledge of the circumstances which Eden referred to – and in which they had both been involved – Eden's letter must have read like a hollow sham. Each situation reflected poorly on either Britain's motives at the time, or the conduct and self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel, or both.

Reference to the Rhineland drew attention to the way in which the First world War had been triggered and conducted; and the disgraceful and destructive media methods which had been used to justify and to camouflage those matters; the hypocritical demands and manoeuvring of the victorious powers in imposing the Treaty of Versailles which sealed the fate of the Rhineland so that it became a cause célèbre for Hitler (chapters 16 & 17); and finally, the way in which the Catholic hierarchy in Germany and the Vatican cooperated and aggravated ethnic relationships in the Rhineland in their bid to secure the Reich Concordat which Hitler then exploited with gay abandon as the Second World War approached and proceeded, (Chapter 18). Reference to Czechoslovakia drew attention to Eden's personal involvement in three situations. First, the proposal to 'buy Hitler off' with an offer of various African colonies in lieu of Lebensraum, or contiguous colonial expansion in eastern Europe; second, the piece-meal Munich carve-up of Czechoslovakia in an effort to defer the piece-meal carve-up of Britain's empire; and third, the decision to renege on the White Paper and the Balfour Declaration at the time of Munich in order to avoid aggravating Arab antagonism which would have strengthened Hitler's hand (chapter 21, Twin decisions: Palestine and Czechoslovakia). Reference to Poland drew attention to the fact that Eden had acted for Churchill in the sleazy deal with Stalin to keep the Soviet Union in the war by means of territorial concessions which included that portion of Poland east of the Curzon line, (see above, ... a date with destiny ...). And a reference to the Berlin Blockade by Russia was very surprising indeed in view of the fact that it was only four years since Britain had imposed a blockade against Iran, with the cooperation of the United States, and only three years since the CIA had removed the Iranian Parliament's choice for prime minister, Mosaddeq, at the request of Britain and in one of the first such operations which Eisenhower had authorized after taking office in February 1953.

Eden's letter demonstrates very clearly that he had no more idea than Churchill what the trouble in the triangle was all about. The Qur'anic Night Journey, the parody of Mein Kampf and Maimonides' understanding of the establishment of the State of Israel were totally lost on both of them. It was lost on Eisenhower and Dulles, too. But he had shown that he had a knowledge of modern history, so even if he did not squirm with embarrassment on reading Eden's message he must have thought something to the effect that "Britain has had it. Finished. I might as well help it out and take over its 'responsibilities' in the Middle East."

In much the same vein, Eisenhower does not seem to have been at all worried by the inconsistency between saying that Britain and France could not use force against Egypt to secure the canal, while the CIA was planning the overthrow of a legitimate Syrian government by Syrian military force – paid for by the United States and carried out on his explicit authority. As noted above (see From Intelligence to Interference and following sections), such action may only be taken on the explicit authority of the president. Neither does he seem to have been concerned about a host of other inconsistencies such as those which were highlighted by the Menzies-Lloyd statements. The world had forgotten about the earlier ones, and it did not know about the current ones, and even if it did, most of those who had any influence would think like the Vatican and Dulles: anything is justified by the need to put down a challenge to the church or in the interests of preserving the influence and authority of the amorphous Christian gel.

Then there was another inconsistency. Eisenhower's complete and unconditional rejection of the use of force was quite out of keeping with some of his other decisions: his threat to extend the Korean War to China and to use nuclear bombs; his extension of the war in Indochina by intervening directly in support of Dien Bien Phu; or his use of the CIA to overthrow the Mosaddeq government in Iran in cooperation with Britain, just referred to. The view was widely held in Britain, and Lloyd made no effort to conceal it, that the Americans were trying to muscle in on British interests in the Middle East and to reduce Britain's influence still further. That view is supported by actions and statements by Eisenhower and Dulles during the crisis, beginning with the request that a US military adviser be placed in Britain's "area of responsibility," Cairo, and it is also consistent with America's long-running efforts to dismantle imperial colonialism and to replace it with economic and defence-treaty colonialism. In particular it is supported by the way in which Eisenhower ruled out the use of force and the timing of his announcement, which undermined the five-nation delegation's negotiating position; the fact that he had written in a contradictory manner to Eden on September 2, the day the Menzies delegation arrived in Cairo to open negotiations; and the relationship between that message, his public statement, and a further intervention by Dulles a few days later.

... DO IT MY WAY!

There can be no doubt that Eisenhower was trying to erase the memory of the way in which Dulles had triggered the crisis with his abrupt withdrawal of the loan offer; that he was saying to Nasser 'I'm your friend, Buddy,' and that he intended the United States to act as the intermediary between Egypt and Israel in all matters – especially security and passage through both the canal and the Strait of Tiran – and that it was the first step towards reversing Egypt's reliance on the Soviet Union for arms. A more charitable view offered by some is that the United States was more acutely aware of the possible flow-on effects of a war with Egypt, that other Arab countries and Israel may become embroiled in another regional war – and that this would place a significant proportion of the Western World’s oil supplies at risk either by embargo or by destruction of facilities and denial of access. But as we have seen from Eden’s message to Eisenhower on July 27, quoted above, he was well aware of those flow-on effects: that was the very reason he had written it, and why he wanted to keep the two main concerns – the Israeli-Arab conflict and control of the canal – separated. It is therefore quite clear that all of these factors were involved in Eisenhower’s decision, together with America’s want to keep the anti-Communist barrier in place and to prevent the Soviet Union from becoming firmly established in the Middle East. However, during the next few months the Soviet Union was preoccupied with its own problems in Eastern Europe which made it less likely that it would want to intervene directly in the Middle East. The Suez crisis and a crisis in Hungary were about to run hand in hand.

- ~ 7: With the Cairo talks broken down as a result of Eisenhower’s public intervention, Eden wrote again next day, to tell the president that the British Government “might, within twenty-four hours, wish to announce [its] decision to go to the Security Council” and its ambassadors were briefed to rally as much international support as possible.

Dulles responded immediately, telling the ambassador that the United States now queried the basis in law of Britain’s case; opposed any immediate pronouncement; would neither sponsor nor support the draft Franco-British resolution to the Security Council; and would find it very difficult to support the operation in its present form. He accused Britain of trying to enlist the aid of the Security Council to force a new treaty on Egypt which would bestow new rights on the users of the canal; he advised Britain and France to merely inform the Security Council of the situation by letter and ask for no action; and he declined to sign such a letter on the basis that the United States “did not wish to create an identity of interest, which might prove embarrassing” to France and Britain.³⁴⁰ And in addition he refused to allow US shippers to withhold all or part of the fees which were due to the canal company, and told Britain and France that they should resume paying theirs in full.

- ~ 8: Selwyn Lloyd complained to the United States that Britain and the United States seemed further apart in their thinking than at any time since the crisis began.
- ~ 9: Then, after two days spent “in reflection” and with his position strengthened enormously by Eisenhower’s public statement against military intervention and “the impression he had derived from the United States,” Nasser rejected the formula proposed by the international committee outright – with comments that bears a remarkable similarity to the position that Dulles had put to Eden two days earlier.

The idea of insulating the canal from politics was unreal, he said, and it could never be “sundered from Egypt’s political life.” Its sovereignty was a matter of real importance to Egypt and the establishment of an international authority would mean “the restoration of collective colonialism.” According to Eden the five members of the committee each responded promptly to “the taunt of colonialism,” with the Ethiopian, Iranian and Swedish representatives rejecting it as “ridiculous,” and with Henderson, the US ambassador to Iran, standing up for “the anti-colonial record of the United States.” Menzies, with his legalistic outlook and deep personal commitment to Britain, would not concede that there was any historical element in the crisis. He told Nasser that “the critical atmosphere in the world began at the very moment that you nationalized.”³⁴¹ Britain considered seizing Egypt’s Sterling balances – an action akin to United States seizure of Japanese assets in 1941 – and military action, but stopped short. However, Anglo-French discussions continued, of course, and about this time Bourghès-Maunoury asked Peres straight out whether Israel would attack Egypt on October 20 in conjunction with the French and the British. Peres sought a response from Ben-Gurion but did not get an answer.

~ 10: Dulles followed Nasser’s statement with an alternative to the Anglo-French plan to go to the Security Council. He proposed a Suez Canal Users’ Club (SCUC). The conclusion is almost inescapable that Nasser had spent some time on the telephone during his two days of reflection! Eisenhower was less than two months away from a US presidential election.

~ 11: The British cabinet had to consider the plan against a backdrop of a particularly severe Israeli “reprisal” raid on a Jordanian border post in which 16 Arab Legionnaires were killed. In desperate need of a solution to ease the tension on all fronts, cabinet resolved to adopt the American plan. Eden was influenced in part by the fact that close cooperation with the United States had been a guiding principle throughout his political life, but also by the knowledge that: “If we had told the United States Government that we did not consider the Users’ Club a workable proposition and that we preferred to go direct to the Security Council ... we would I suppose have forfeited, for the time being at least, something of their goodwill.” If there had been any lingering doubts about who held the power, the decision making authority and the leadership of the amorphous Christian gel at the beginning of the crisis, they should all have been dispelled by now. The United States reigned supreme.

During September the British government prepared to set up the SCUC but, under considerable pressure from the Opposition, it also prepared to take the issue to the Security Council. It had been reluctant to initially because it was not in the ‘fortunate’ position that the United States was at the outbreak of the Korean War, when the Soviet Union was not participating and was therefore not present to exercise its veto. (See above, ... and the action begins) Eden knew that the Soviet veto would be used in the Security Council and that the General Assembly would not support the use of force either. He wrote:

From the first the Soviet Government made it plain that it would give diplomatic support to the Egyptians. This meant that Moscow would run no risks, but would take every political pot-shot from behind cover. The use of the veto in the Security Council was the easiest of these, for it never gave the Kremlin the slightest embarrassment. ... Nor would any initiative in the General Assembly meet with success in the face of Afro-Asian extremists supported by the Soviets. [Then, referring to opposition within Britain to the use of force ...] Therefore the condition of United Nations approval for the use of force by Britain and France was equivalent to denying its use.³⁴² [Emphasis added.]

Eden could now expect a US veto as well, and the admission to the United Nations of 12 African and Asian members, six in the previous year alone, was beginning to restrain the Western powers also. (Israel, although geographically in Asia, is not included in those figures.) But in mid September he received a letter from Marshal Bulganin indicating that while the Soviet Union “stood by Egypt’s side” it was not inciting Egypt and was eager to contribute to a peaceful settlement. Events continued to move dynamically. A series of international conferences were held; agreement was reached on resolutions to put to the Security Council for the establishment of SCUC; fifteen countries agreed to join and in spite of Dulles making a speech belittling the scheme which he had proposed; and a meeting to constitute it was planned.

The French were not satisfied with that situation and in mid-September Bourgès-Maunoury pressed the Israelis for a definite response to the joint attack plan. The military attaché in Paris was warned that the price of French support was nothing less than Israel’s collaboration in the impending operation at a time close to the US presidential elections when Eisenhower, it was hoped, would be unable to react.

- ~ 23: Ben-Gurion cabled Peres who was again in Paris, saying: “Tell them that their dates suit us,” but when he relayed the message, Peres held his hand out for more supplies. Bourgès-Maunoury agreed. However Ben-Gurion wanted to know the British position, so the plan was transmitted to London.
- ~ 24: Eden was incredulous and disliked the plan, fearing that it would further weaken Britain’s relations with the Arab countries, and especially Jordan, against which Israel’s attacks were becoming more frequent and more severe. He withheld a decision. His concerns deepened next day.
- ~ 25: A full brigade attack was launched by Israel against a Jordanian post, with several dozen casualties.
- ~ 29: Four days later Golda Meir and General Dayan arrived in Paris to ask for a substantial list of heavy equipment, additional planes and arms. Shipment began immediately.

A DIFFERENCE OF OPINION

October

- ~ 1: The planned SCUC meeting was held in London with Selwyn Lloyd presiding. It was twelve days before the resolution was to be decided by the Security Council and five weeks before the US election. The founding member countries were waiting for the United States to confirm that it would participate by paying its canal dues through the association. But complications flowed in from all directions. When Bulganin advised Eden that the Soviet Union, for various reason, would oppose the plan, he telegraphed Eisenhower immediately. The wider danger of the Middle East was Russia, he said, then:

There is no doubt in our minds that Nasser, whether he likes it or not, is now effectively in Russian hands, just as Mussolini was in Hitler's. It would be as ineffective to show weakness to Nasser now in order to placate him as it was to show weakness to Mussolini. The only result was and would be to bring the two together. [He then referred to Egyptian plots to bring down Libya, Saudi Arabia and Iraq; said that the SCUC had to succeed to show those countries that Nasser was losing; and called for the United States to ensure that all countries which it could influence used the canal. He concluded ...] I feel sure that anything which you can say or do to show firmness to Nasser at this time will help the peace by giving the Russians pause. ...³⁴³

- ~ 2: Next day it was clear that Eisenhower and Dulles did not agree, and with a press statement by Dulles they widened the debate to include the question of colonialism and virtually said that if Nasser held firm, "the United States would fall apart from France and Britain over the seizure of the canal."

The United States [the Secretary of State said] cannot be expected to identify itself 100 per cent either with the colonial powers or the powers uniquely concerned with the problem of getting independence as rapidly and as fully as possible. There were, I admit, differences of approach by the three nations to the Suez dispute, which perhaps arise from fundamental concepts. For while we stand together, and I hope we shall always stand together in treaty relations covering the North Atlantic, any areas encroaching in some form or manner on the problem of so-called colonialism, find the United States playing a somewhat independent role. The shift from colonialism to independence will be going on for another fifty years, and I believe that the task of the United Nations is to try to see that this process moves forward in a constructive, evolutionary way, and does not come to a halt or go forward through violent, revolutionary processes which would be destructive of much good.³⁴⁴

Dulles had touched a raw nerve indeed. It was the same nerve which Bulganin and Khrushchev had touched during their visit to London in April. Whether he realized it or not, he had touched on one of the fundamental issues which had brought the trouble in the triangle to a head, and one of the fundamental issues (relations with one's 'neighbours') which was, one step back into history, basic to the Covenant of Sinai and the catalytic role of the people-Israel in that process. Certainly Eden does not give any indication that he realized it. His response was, basically, to say that the dispute had nothing to do with colonialism but was a matter of international rights. In fact nine of the eighteen nations which took part in the canal committee discussions were current colonial powers, and an additional five were former colonial powers which had forfeited their colonies either as a result of being on the losing side in one of the wars or in one of Europe's periodical territorial carve-ups. (See note ³³¹) Eden insisted that: "If the United States had to defend their treaty rights in the Panama Canal, they would not regard such action as colonialism, neither would I. Yet their rights in Panama are those of one nation, not of many nations, as at Suez." Later he was at pains to justify Britain's recent record as a colonial power. He did not try to justify the exploitative, oppressive and decaying system overall, or its consequences, and he did not refer to the fundamental self-understanding which had underpinned the system and he gave no hint of recognition that Britain's effort to prop up its position of colonial privilege had dragged the world into the Second World War and the urgent need to recognize and to resolve the trouble in the triangle. His main concern was to repudiate Dulles' statement and to turn some of the blame for the sequence of events back on the United States and him, and his effort to project an image of progressive colonialism "for a century or more," encompassing the period from 1848 to 1956, serves either to show his insensitivity to the actual record of the period or to highlight the enormous iniquity of colonialism from Rominus Pontifex (chapter 9) to the round of revolutions and Marx's Manifesto in the middle of the nineteenth century, (chapter 14). He wrote, in part:

It is worthwhile to probe deeper into the causes for the frequent divergences on colonialism, which have presented a continuing problem in Anglo-American relations and still do so, despite official denials.

With the passage of nearly two centuries since 1776, this issue should vex us less. George III has much to answer for. But it is too easy an explanation merely to take refuge in that monarch's mistaken judgements. (Chapter 13) Britain has had her share of responsibility for the instinctive American reaction to any question of colonialism. What is disturbing is its tendency to reappear at any critical moment in the relations of the United States with one of her Western allies. ... The United Kingdom has, for a century or more, and in an increasing degree, applied herself to the trustee conception of her responsibilities towards colonial territories. ...

The United States point of view on trusteeship tends to differ from our own. In their judgement, there is nothing wrong in expending large sums of capital in the development of a country and deriving much gain from the process, the American companies or individuals accepting no responsibility for the administration of the country. This point of view is strongly held and there can be no doubt that in many parts of the world the results are satisfactory, both to the countries concerned and to the United States. On the other hand, this practice can also have unexpected consequences which seem less laudable. It remains a fact that two of the more backward countries in the Middle East and in Africa, Saudi Arabia and Liberia, are also two where American interests play a conspicuously large part. [Emphasis added.]

Much of the sparring between the United States and Great Britain on colonial issues could certainly be removed if more was understood of the record of this country in the colonial sphere, especially since the beginning of the century. But the orderly development of self-government in an important territory, like Malaya or Nigeria, is not sensational news; a riot in Cyprus is. As a consequence, understanding grows slowly.³⁴⁵ [See above, September 1954.]

In responding to the Dulles barb with his reference to economic practices which can also have unexpected consequences which seem less laudable, Eden alluded to the policies and practices which, within a few years, would lead to two linked crises and reactions. First, heavy pressure to permit and to accept foreign investment and resource exploitation resulted in a spiral of dependence on foreign investment and foreign commercial domination, which led in turn to calls for a New International Economic Order to break that cycle, but which would be ruthlessly brushed aside in a bid to consolidate the system to which Third World countries were objecting. Second, economic and cultural globalization which resulted in the destruction of long established community structures and the degradation of cultural heritage in the name of 'development' and led not only to renewed calls for a NIEO, but to a dramatic deepening of the trouble in the triangle through the linkage of religion and social degradation. The whole process has been controlled by, and to the benefit of, the amorphous Christian gel. In the early stage of the process it would have been possible to sever the links through judicious controls and strong international leadership. In October 1956 both were lacking and very few people were either conscious of the problem or interested in doing anything about it. The world was just reaching the crest of the very long wave of 'foreign-investment-and-resource-extraction-is-good-for-development' momentum. It is no longer possible to sever those links without concurrently – and as a precondition – resolving the trouble in the triangle. The process had a long time to run. It has now been running for two generations since Dulles so shamelessly sponsored it in his push for acceptance of the Marshall Plan in 1948. (Chapter 27)

- ~ 3: Israel's foreign ministry announced that it was withdrawing its representative from the joint Israeli-Jordanian Mixed Armistice Commission. It had to convey the impression that Jordan was its real target, not Egypt.
- ~ 11: Nine days after the Dulles barb, Eden had more than the philosophy of colonialism to worry about when the Israelis launched their biggest attack to date against Jordan, pounding a police fortress with tanks, artillery and planes. It was as if their intentions were real and not a bluff!
- ~ 12: As a result of that attack Hussein invoked the Anglo-Jordanian Treaty and the British charge d'affaires in Tel Aviv told Ben-Gurion that an Iraqi division was about to enter Jordan for its protection, and that if Israel took further military action Britain would be obliged to come to its aid also.³⁴⁶

THE MESS OF POTTAGE: MIXED PERCEPTIONS AND EXPERIENCE

Confusion reigned supreme. Britain had already warned Saudi Arabia against an attack on Jordan which was intended to induce it into joining the push against Israel in order to undo the wrongs done to the Palestinians. Now it was threatening Israel for taking action against Jordan which was intended to induce it not to join that push. Jordan was a treaty partner of the 'enemy' whom Israel and the French were about to attack. That attack was expected to be at least as much for Britain's benefit as their own, But Jordan was also a treaty partner of Britain which was relying on it as a security buffer for its interests. Israel's 'defensive action' was superficially based on ethnic conflict. But the root causes of its conflict lay in a series of factors, and brief consideration of each of them helps towards an understanding of what the crisis was really all about, and the way ahead. The first factor was Britain's colonial history and its manipulation of the triangle of faiths, and in particular its manipulation of world Jewry and now the State of Israel. The second, was the insistence of Israel's current mentor, the United States, and other countries of the amorphous Christian gel, that its establishment had to be imposed on the Arab communities. That imposition was a matter of placating the corporate conscience of the amorphous Christian gel. The circumstances of each of the key players were important, so, a brief review of each: the non-Middle East players first.

Britain had a proud Christian heritage and it had played an important role, albeit politically motivated, in consolidating the Reformation and in planting the Reformed Churches around the world. It was the former master of the entire region who had gained control of it largely as a result of conflicting promises to the main protagonists. It was the power which, out of sheer greed and self-interest, had sponsored the idea of a Jewish homeland in the middle of the Muslim Arab world. It had been mentor to the Zionist Movement and protector of the embryonic state up to the point of its establishment which, because of the maze of conflicts it had got itself into, it finally refused to support. It had reneged on its role as 'umbrella' for the Zionist cause and had walked away at the critical time when it should have been able to see and understand its critical role in the trouble in the triangle, and left others to sort out the mess. It had dragged the region through two wars based around a combination of the protection of its colonial interests and other tensions and conflicts within the amorphous Christian gel, and it was now dependent on maintaining or restoring stable relations with all of them in order to secure its economic lifelines and access to the remaining units of its colonial empire. It had all sorts of treaty commitments which related to the crisis, but the key ones were with Egypt, the nation with which it was now in conflict over the facility of the Suez Canal; with Jordan; with another of the Arab countries, Iraq, on which it was dependent for a substantial proportion of its oil as well as for security support; and with Turkey, a non-Arab Muslim nation which need not have been involved but was drawn in as another member of the multi-purpose security shield. Britain's decisions and actions throughout were based on the self-understanding and assumptions of superior rights as a major player in the amorphous Christian gel, and it was now forced to camouflage its role in the mess which it had caused by placing the blame on the power which represented the greatest challenge to that self-understanding – the Soviet Union and atheistic Communism. And it was trying to restrain the young state of Israel from its engagement in a battle with its neighbours for its own security.

France was another major player in the Reformation and in determining the nature and conduct of the amorphous Christian gel, and its competition with Britain for power and control in the region had helped to build the framework for the crisis. It had a major interest in the facility which was the focal point of the crisis, the Suez Canal, but control of the canal was of less significance to France than it was to Britain. Its main motive for joining the stoush was to suppress Egypt and the challenge to its colonial authority in North Africa which Egypt was leading. To do so it needed, and was using, its new relationship with Israel whose imposed existence was the primary cause of the conflict.

The United States was established amid the turmoil of the Reformation and, recognizing that, its leaders had determined that it would have a constitution which prevented the perpetuation of religious strife in the New World. Having worked its way through a long period of anti-Catholicism, as circumstances changed it had entered into both an agreement and a political alliance with the Vatican of a nature which it did not have with other churches or the authorities of other religions, and which many people had regarded as unconstitutional. It was now the major player in the amorphous Christian gel. Its rapid rise to that position had been circumstantial, and it had changed gear circumstantially so that its self-understanding was no longer Christian. It considered itself to be the principle Judeo-Christian nation and that it had the God-given right and authority to make every major decision for the world and to use its military might to impose it. It was determined to do so. It had assumed the role of umbrella for the Zionist Movement with precisely the same motives as Britain – self interest and a stepping stone to regional and resource control – when Britain had rejected that role, but it had extended it to encompass world Jewry.

The United States had suffered from the abuses of colonialism and had developed an intensely anti-colonialist position in world affairs as a consequence, but it had then proceeded to develop a new theory and practice of economic imperialism with consequences more far-reaching than those of territorial colonialism, and it was hell-bent on imposing that system to its own benefit by utilizing the most insidious mechanism – a network of international intelligence and subversion systems. It saw the challenge of atheistic Communism more in terms of an economic and political challenge than the theological and social policy challenge which the Vatican saw, but it had responded to the opportunity of an alliance with the Vatican against Communism and was taking full advantage of it in much the manner that Hitler did with his concordat. It had been the originator of a series of treaties, or pacts and alliances ringing the Soviet Union, and one of them, the Baghdad Pact was now enmeshed very firmly in the trouble in the triangle through the Suez crisis. That reaction of some of the Arab nations to that pact had actually enabled the Soviet Union to extend its influence into new areas. One reason was the punitive action taken against Egypt by the United States and Britain, and another was the way in which Britain was trying to manipulate the pact and its members as instruments for its own economic security which was being threatened by its broken relationships with the Arab countries. In addition, the decisions taken and the policies pursued by successive presidents, coupled with the nature of its constitution and electoral system, had ensured that interfaith relations had become, and would remain, a major consideration in United States domestic and international politics. Britain had tried, in 1948, to break the spiral of complications which rose from the trouble in the triangle, but it could not. The United States was now experiencing the further tightening of the spiral.

The Soviet Union, the ongoing embodiment of the Marxist challenge to the church's theology and self-understanding, was organized as a federation of republics on an irreligious or atheistic basis but, having gone through a phase of vigorous suppression of religion, it was again supporting, or tolerating, organized religion. Paradoxically, it had brought together a number of states through mechanisms which could well be described as a merging of pre-revolution tsarist Russian colonialism and post-revolution Bolshevik colonialism, but it had become the most determined opponent of colonialism. And also, while its basis was anti-religious, it had become home to the most complex mix of religious faiths of any nation by virtue of its enormous extent and the way in which its constituent republics were drawn together. The only major religious communities not represented are the Hindu and Shinto. It was, to a large degree, politically and economically isolated, but this was not a situation of its own making: it had been imposed on it by the Western powers. It would have had no reason to be involved in the Suez crisis if it were not for the way in which Britain and the United States had abused their relationship with the Arab states – Egypt in particular – encouraging them to establish working relationships with the Soviet Union in contradiction of the Western policy of isolation, thus enabling it to become a major arms supplier into that strategic area.

Jordan was essentially Sunni Muslim by faith, with about five per cent Christians. It was one of the states which had been set up by Britain to serve its own purposes. It was now trapped in a mire of hatred all around. It had conflicting treaties with two of the opposing parties in the current dispute. One was with Egypt, because of their natural allegiance as Arab Muslim nations with a shared heritage. The other was with its former colonial master who was now partly dependent on it for the security of its interests in the Middle East, but on whom it, Jordan, was now dependent for protection from both Israel and one or two of its Arab neighbours who were upset at its reluctance to join them in a war against Israel because of its treaty with Britain. And to further complicate matters, it had a substantial population of indigenous Palestinians – being one half of the area of the mandate of Palestine – but it was also home to a substantial proportion of the Palestinian Arabs who had been expelled as refugees by Israel, for whom the other Arab nations were fighting. And it was because of their raids against Israel that Jordan was now under attack. But, in addition, East Jerusalem and part of the West Bank was now Jordanian territory, and Jordan was the custodian of the holy sites of the Old City, the most important of which were the Al Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock which was central to the Qur'anic Prophecy of the Night Journey.

Saudi Arabia was the birth place of the Prophet Muhammad and custodian of the Ka'ba, the holiest shrine, focal point and major point of pilgrimage of Islam. It was the seat of the vibrant resurgence of faith, the puritanical Wahhabi reform movement, and it was a 'closed' country with a virtually 100 per cent Muslim population. It was naturally a strong supporter of the Palestinian cause. The United States had also declared the defence of Saudi Arabia vital for its own security and it was one of the major oil producers for the Western world. The monarchy had been accused by Britain of abetting the Communist cause in the Middle East. It was doing nothing of the kind. It was abetting the Palestinian cause and protecting the integrity of Dār al-islām. If the Soviet Union gained any benefit from it, that was the indirect consequence of the British policy, not Saudi Arabia's.

REMARKABLE EGYPTIAN EXPERIENCE ...

Egypt had a somewhat special place in the unfolding trouble in the triangle. It was intimately involved in the development of Yahwism as the parent faith of the triangle of Abrahamic faiths, and it became a mixing bowl as two, then three faiths emerged and interacted. It was the base of one of the more advanced civilizations at the time that Abraham and his family migrated from Mesopotamia, and it is generally accepted that they travelled as far as Goshen in the eastern portion of the Nile Delta before turning back to Hebron. At the time that Joseph, one of the sons of Jacob, was sold into slavery in Egypt in the 17th century BCE it was the leading state in the Near East, receiving a steady stream of migrants from Asia, and the north eastern delta area, around Goshen, had been settled by successive waves of Palestinians. The practice of slavery was not common at that time, but a couple of generations later it became more widespread, with large numbers of captive slaves being acquired by major state institutions or being conscripted into the Egyptian army. Forced labour, especially in dangerous mining ventures, became standard corrective treatment for foreign slaves or fugitives caught fleeing from any personal obligations. The influence of the kingdom reached a peak in the early years of the 15th century BCE when Thutmose I ruled from Carchemish on the Euphrates where it crosses the border between modern Turkey and Syria, to the fifth cataract on the Nile, only 200 miles from Khartoum. It appears that at the time that Moses led the people of Israel out of bondage in Egypt and they made their way to Mount Sinai, Ramses II was on the throne and using a lot of forced labour in a building program on a massive scale which included religious edifices of many kinds from Nubia in the Sudan to Syria. The religious environment in Egypt at that time has been described in these terms:

... Egyptian society consisted of a descending hierarchy of the gods, the king, the dead, and humanity (by which was understood chiefly the Egyptians). Of these groups, only the king was single, and hence he was individually more prominent than any of the others. ... the “is on earth for ever and ever, judging mankind and propitiating the gods, and setting order [ma’at, a central concept] in place of disorder. He gives offerings to the gods and mortuary offerings to the spirits [the blessed dead].” The king was a god, but not in any simple or unqualified sense. His divinity accrued to him from his office and was reaffirmed through rituals, but it was vastly inferior to that of major gods; he was god rather than man by virtue of his potential, which was immeasurably greater than that of any human being. To humanity, he manifested the gods on earth, a conception that was elaborated in a complex web of metaphor and doctrine; less directly, he represented humanity to the gods. ... The king’s position changed gradually from that of an absolute monarch at the centre of a small ruling group who were mostly his kin to that of the head of a bureaucratic state – in which his rule was still absolute – based on office-holding and, in theory, on free competition and merit. By the 5th dynasty, fixed institutions were added to the force of tradition and the regulation of personal contact as brakes on autocracy, but the charismatic and superhuman power of the king remained vital.³⁴⁷

Over the centuries which followed, Egypt came under the influence of first the Assyrians and then the Persians. It was under Persian control at the time that Nebuchadrezzar destroyed the temple in Jerusalem, in 586 BCE, and many Jews fled not to Babylon but to Egypt which had been reduced to a conquered province, and some were enlisted in the Persian army of occupation. They introduced a new religious dimension, but they did not proselytize to any great extent, preferring to practice their monotheistic Yahwism within their restricted communities. Alexander came along in 332 with his Macedonian and Greek armies to push the Persians out, and Greek influence became dominant over a couple of centuries of instability until the Romans decided it was their turn in 168 BCE, and the religious scene became even more confused.

The native traditions persisted in village temples and local cults, many having particular associations with species of sacred animals or birds. At the same time, the Greeks created their own identifications of Egyptian deities, identifying Amon with Zeus, Horus with Apollo, Ptah with Hephaestus, and so on. They also gave some deities, such as Isis, a more universal significance that ultimately resulted in the spread of her mystery cult throughout the Mediterranean world. The impact of the Greeks is most obvious in two phenomena. One is the formalized royal cult of Alexander and the Ptolemies, which evidently served both a political and a religious purpose. The other is the creation of the cult of Sarapis, which at first was confined to Alexandria but soon became universal. The god was represented as a Hellenized deity and the form of cult is Greek; but its essence is the old Egyptian notion that the sacred Apis bull merged its divinity in some way with the god Osiris when it died.

It was in that environment that a well-educated Hellenized Jew wrote the Book of Wisdom about 50 BCE in an attempt at rapprochement between Greek culture and Judaism, but only added to the confusion, and Philo (c.25 BCE–50 CE) came along, about the time that Jesus was preaching in Palestine, with the best of intentions to extend the influence of Judaism but only succeeded in muddying the waters still further. (Chapter 1) The Jewish authorities rejected both the Book of Wisdom and Philo's writings. So did the leaders of the church in Jerusalem. But then the church arrived in Egypt. The first confirmed presence of Christians is dated about a hundred years after Philo's death, coinciding with the second anti-Roman uprisings in Jerusalem, although some writers date a Christian presence from the destruction of the temple 40 years earlier.³⁴⁸ A catechetical school was later established at Alexandria, probably in the second half of the second century, and this made it the acknowledged centre of Christianity in Egypt. It had some catching up to do. Its parent cum partner cum competitor had stolen a march on it. But that school soon became a centre for controversy as well as confusion. Two of its third century leaders, Clement and Origen, approved the use of Wisdom for public reading and used Philo's writings to 'expand' their Christian teaching.³⁴⁹ In 325, Athanasius, (at that time secretary to the bishop of Alexandria but, later, appointed bishop), succeeded in persuading the Council of Nicaea to adopt the basic Trinitarian statement of faith, the Nicene Creed. Subsequently a more complex statement of faith, which soon dominated the church's self-understanding and theology, was issued in his name: the Athanasian Creed. (Chapter 2) It was not a case of merging a sacred bull with a god; it was a case of merging a man born by divine intervention with God, the source of authority for the intervention. In pursuing the numbers game, the church was going one better than both the pagans and the Jews. Perhaps they were not winning the numbers game. In any case they were not able to simply do what Jesus did: teach from the Law and the Prophets and add his Gospel teaching to it. Syncretism provided the means for the church to lift its numbers prior to 391, when the practice of pagan religion was officially made illegal, but even so it engulfed its pagan precedents only slowly and untidily, and because it was playing to pagan rules it had to cope with a pagan revival in the first half of the 5th century. By then there was a great heterogeneous mass of commitment and belief, and Gnostics and Manichaeans were all able to think of themselves as Christians. (Chapters 3 & 4)

But in addition to absorption by syncretism, church leaders tried to compete with the Jews and the pagans on the basis that ‘our God is higher than your god.’ They were soon teaching that Jesus was not of human nature at all, but purely of divine nature. The church fathers tried to resolve this in 451 at Chalcedon, a Greek city on the Turkish side of the Bosphorus, but they had little hope because that area had been the source of the Greek component of the Egyptian amalgam. The situation worsened because a bishop of like mind, Julian, was forced from his see at Halicarnassus (another Greek city in Turkey) and fled to Alexandria which became the centre of that belief: Monophysitism.. The bulk of the population still followed pagan magical practices which were simply converted into a Christian context, but in the middle of all that stood a few great churches and monasteries in which formal Monophysite Christianity, which had been adopted officially as the basis of Egypt’s church, was practiced. Over the next three or four generations a network of strongly Monophysite centres took root in Abyssinia and Yemen, across the Red Sea from each other; in Syria and in Armenia.³⁵⁰

There was a lot of trade between those centres, so Monophysite Christians and Jews under the influence of Philo’s version of Judaism plied their wares between Abyssinia-Yemen at the southern end of the Red Sea, and Alexandria and Syria on the Mediterranean coast with Armenia further north. And the main trade route was a straight line down the Mediterranean and Red Sea coasts through a town called Mecca where lived a young man named Muhammad. Those traders provided his first contact with the people of the Book. It was not long before he issued his call for a return to the straight and narrow path. “There is no god but God.” His ministry and Islam took off! (Chapters 6 & 7) In 632 Muhammad declared a holy war against Byzantium, and 10 years later Alexandria capitulated, several months after Byzantium had formally conceded and signed Egypt over to the Arabs. Islam was now Egypt’s official religion but, as in other countries, Christians and Jews were permitted to continue their rites as long as they adhered to the conditions laid down. After the division of Islam into two main streams, Sunni and Shi’ism, Egypt remained under Sunni leadership except for the period of the Fatimid Caliphate from 969 to 1171. During that period the country became an important centre for Shi’ite scholarship with the establishment of the al-Azhar College, but that was soon followed by a quite remarkable development. When Saladin claimed power during the period of the Crusades, he retained as a personal physician not a Muslim, but a Jew: the Spanish refugee, Maimonides. (chapter 8) Thus, at a critical time in its history, when Muslim Egypt was fighting to secure Jerusalem and the Holy Land against the licentious, ravaging Christian rabble whom the popes were sending in successive waves to prove that there was not a triangle, it was home to the Jew whose understanding of the evolving relationships between Judaism, Christianity and Islam and his insights into the eventual return of Jews from the Diaspora to establish a State of Israel, now enable us to understand more fully the significance of the Qur’anic Night Journey and how to find our way out of the trouble in the triangle.

... AND A UNIQUE ISRAELI EXPERIENCE

Israel was the product and the focal point of the trouble in the triangle. More than two thirds of its population was, by then, of the Jewish faith: the faith of the people who were still bound by a covenant which no one else wanted to recognize and who, because of their historical circumstances, had largely lost sight of that covenant, was embroiled in conflict and under threat because its self-understanding problem had become just as big as that of the amorphous Christian gel. The oppression and abuse which had forced their pioneers to take the decisions which they did had largely dissipated as a consequence of Hitler having fulfilled his role as the Scourge of the Qur'anic Night Journey when the church and the powers of the west failed to recognize the parody of Mein Kampf and change direction. Having failed to recognize the gravity of their transgression against the people of Palestine its leaders were happy to accept that they had been redeemed as a people, consistent with the Covenant, while ignoring the fact that the Covenant is a two-way contract and carries penal clauses as well as guarantees. They were now under enormous pressure to make good their transgression by resolving the problems caused by the imposed establishment of their state, but they could not see beyond the privileges of statehood and the need to secure it by military means in the manner of any other state.

But Israel is not like any other state. It is supposed to be the shining light upon the hill, guiding humanity towards Maimonides' understanding of the Messianic Age through example and precept. Its failure to resolve the issues raised by the circumstances of its establishment in the worst possible example of imperial colonialism – issues which its people had all experienced elsewhere – meant that it would face the same backlash as any other colonial power, except on a more intense exemplary scale. It was now trying to take advantage of another crisis within the triangle to secure its position by force, in collaboration with either one or two of the powers which had been key players in the whole mess. It was ignoring the basis of the Covenant and the teaching of the Law and the Prophets that security is a product of sound relationships and that it is undermined by relationships destroyed. It could not possibly ensure its long term security without resolving the crises of refugees; trauma compensation; land rights; water resources; and the question of Jerusalem. As long as they remained unresolved, Israel's security crisis remained unresolved. Jewish leaders knew that, historically, Jews had enjoyed a sound relationship with Muslims. They had been better treated in Muslim-controlled communities than in Christian-controlled communities. Anti-Semitism was a Christian phenomenon, not a Muslim phenomenon, and theologically Muslims are much closer to Jews than to Christians. The broken relationships and the bitter antagonism which had been generated through the Zionist determination to return to Palestine and the savage, destructive and soul-destroying guerrilla wars between them during the 1930s, the outright war of 1948, and the threat of another war were the outcome of the self-understanding, policies and actions of the church and the amorphous Christian gel. But the antagonism was now so deep that people forgot that it was circumstantial and the Western world – the amorphous Christian gel – was very eager to encourage the belief that it had always been that way and that it was the Christians who were the friends of the Jews.

Such was the mess of pottage into which Britain and France were treading when they sought to use Israel as a pawn, or a lever, to reverse the nationalization of the Suez Canal and to maintain their grip on the remainder of their fragmenting empires. The church had not learned anything from the debacle which followed its ill-conceived series of crusades. Neither had any of the powers associated with it. Britain had not learned anything from the debacle which followed its Balfour Declaration. Could it be expected to learn anything from its Suez adventure?

~ 13: After ten days of debate the Anglo-French resolutions to provide for the SCUC was submitted to a vote in the UN Security Council.

The first part, setting out the principles on which the operation of the canal should be based, was passed unanimously. The second part declared that the SCUC proposals corresponded with those principles and invited the Egyptian Government to put forward its proposals for putting the scheme into effect through continued interchange with Britain and France. But it also specified that until the arrangements were finalized the canal should be open to free passage by all shipping. That was the clause, or the problem, which each of the Western powers had wanted to camouflage and keep out of public reports and debates for fear of triggering an Arab-Israeli war. That clause was to be, in effect, a test case on the banning of Israeli shipping by Egypt. But in reality it was much more than that. Israel was the Jewish State. Egypt, under its dynamic new indigenous leader, represented the aspirations and evolving self-understanding of the long-suppressed Dār al-islām. And Britain and France, being the beneficial owners of the facility which had been nationalized, represented the amorphous Christian gel whose self-understanding and conduct was the basis of the trouble in the triangle, which had been responsible for the rise of Islam, the abuse and long term suppression of both world Jewry and Dār al-islām, and which had precipitated and facilitated the establishment of the State of Israel. The Suez Crisis therefore encapsulated the entire trouble in the triangle. Thus that 'test case,' if it proceeded, was going to provide the opportunity and the circumstances in which the world could pause, look around, realize how stupid and contradictory of the Divine Intention for humanity the world situation had become, and begin to work through the trouble in the triangle. There were nine votes in favour and two against: Yugoslavia and the veto of the Soviet Union. The SCUC scheme was, officially, dead. However the matter was now out in the open.

SCUC A DEAD ISSUE: BACK TO SQUARE ONE

For everyone, it was back to square one. The British and French governments had to decide whether they would quietly accept the nationalization of a commercial facility or whether they would fight to hang on to it, and how to avoid their commercial and imperial interests being more firmly enmeshed in religious, ethnic and political conflict by virtue of the circumstances which they had set up. The State of Israel had to decide whether it was prepared to make peace with its neighbours in a manner which would lead to the end of antagonistic actions against it such as the closing of the canal and other trade sanctions imposed by its neighbours, and whether the basis of the existence of the State was political survival of a communal entity or the fulfilment of a Covenant obligation. The Arab states had to decide whether they would accept the presence of a detested Jewish State which the amorphous Christian gel had imposed on them, to their great distress and disadvantage, or whether they would fight to eliminate it; and they had to resolve the tension between their religious self-understanding as Muslims and the political aspirations of Dār al-islām.

In addition, Britain and France in particular, and the amorphous Christian gel at large, had to determine whether they were going to continue to pursue policies based on an assumption of superiority and fight to maintain an assumed right to a position of privilege, or whether they were happy to accept that the colonial era was over. Dead. Redundant. Not an appropriate way to conduct the affairs of the world's people, being all equal in the sight of God. The Soviet Union, the embodiment of the most direct and visible socio-political challenge to the amorphous Christian gel, also had two options. It had to decide whether to intervene in a constructive manner to help resolve the crisis, or whether it was going to concentrate on bolstering its own authoritarian power which was also under challenge because of its long-running record of the abuse of human rights. The people of church, synagogue and mosque all had to try to understand what it was all about. The Book of the Law and the Prophets, the Gospel and the Qur'an was all laid out before the world on the sands in the shadow of Mount Sinai. But everyone wanted to look the other way – at the waters of the Suez – and in view of the fact that it had not grasped the basis and the nature of the trouble in the triangle under the stimulus of the parody of Mein Kampf, there was no chance that the church, as the dominant partner, was now going to do so with a flash of inspiration in the circumstances of the time. This crisis would simply add to the mounting pile of circumstantial evidence which it had to grapple with – if its self-understanding had been shaken enough to permit it. The United States, the undisputed leader of the Judeo-Christian world, faced questions which were no less challenging. It could use the enormous power at its disposal as an adjust to moral authority to help each of the parties work through the issues involved in the trouble in the triangle. Or it could further capitalize on that power and authority to consolidate its position at the pinnacle of human affairs and to substitute its new form of economic colonialism for the failed imperial colonial system. And it was just three weeks before the United States presidential election!

It is unlikely that the leaders of any of the powers involved actually verbalized or even conceptualized their options in those terms. They were well aware that they were in a pickle, but they did not attribute any of the responsibility to themselves. It was all someone else's fault. They were being very pragmatic and thinking only in terms of the contemporary political situation and the consequences for their relationships with each other if they could not precisely control the actions of the countries in the Middle East. But in an historical context – and in the context of the trouble in the triangle – they are the choices which they had. It took only three days for Britain, France, Israel and the United States to 'make their determinations' or, more correctly, to confirm by their actions that they were not about to change course.

~ 16: Extracts from Eden's published record of the meeting in Paris between him, Selwyn Lloyd and their French counterparts, M. Mollet and M. Pineau, illustrate the crisis they were in.

They were prepared to gamble everything, and accept the possibility of a major war, rather than allow Nasser and his people to enjoy the benefits of a canal which had been dug through their country – against the wishes of its leaders because they had foreseen the possibility of such a situation – and work out why the crisis had developed and how to resolve the trouble in the triangle. Eden's outline of their review of the situation shows painfully clearly that they separated the question of control of the canal from the military consequences of intervention and failed to look at a total picture. He noted: the growing menace of hostility by Egypt against Israel; Russia's veto took the pressure off Egypt and enabled it to begin the fedayeen raids again; the group of eighteen's principles for use of the canal were "impeccable" and the group must stand by them; the ball was in Egypt's court because the Security Council had instructed it to produce proposals to conform to them; if the Americans had their way the Users' Club would be no more than a fee collecting agency for Egypt which would get a greatly increased net return; and the French in particular "had no confidence in American support for our negotiations."³⁵¹ Then:

Unless Israel was prepared to just sit and wait until it suited her enemies to strangle and finally destroy her, it was clear that before long she would have to take some counter action, at least to put an end to the fedayeen raids. If directed against Jordan, from which some of the fedayeen raids were said to be mounted under Egyptian leadership, then the position for us would be terrible indeed. We had a treaty obligation to defend Jordan. The Jordanians had no effective air force, our fighter squadrons provided their only effective protection. Already there had nearly been an incident when, in some counter-raid an Israeli aircraft had for the first time been engaged. Our help had been called for and our aircraft were on the point of going up, when a wise and rapid exchange of cautionary messages on the spot avoided catastrophe.

Nevertheless, the danger was there. If an attack were launched against Jordan, the Israelis would be using their French Mystères, the delivery of a number of these having previously been agreed by the United States, France and ourselves, the three partners of the Tripartite Declaration. The Royal Air Force would be in action for Jordan, the United States would be on the sidelines. This was a nightmare which could only too easily come true; Jordan calling for support from Nasser and ourselves, Nasser calling for support from Russia, France lined up with Israel on the other side.

As long ago as January, our Ambassador had warned Jordan that Egyptian interference was highly dangerous for her. Egypt was manoeuvring to embroil Jordan with Israel. If Israel were to act against one of her encircling enemies, the choice lay between Jordan and Egypt. Syria was insufficiently important. Jordan had provided the one effective military force, the Arab Legion, in the fighting of 1948-49. Despite the large supplies of Soviet equipment which the Egyptians had received, the Legion was probably still the most formidable military formation which Israel's neighbours could put into the field. It might be thought imprudent to act against Egypt while leaving the Legion intact. As against this, Egypt was the political source and inspiration of the threat to Israel. ...

[We] were acutely aware of the consequences of action by Israel against Jordan, which we had to do all in our power to avert. Our relations with Israel were not close or intimate, there were constant arguments about the supply of arms. Therefore ... we asked the French Ministers to do everything they could to make clear to Israel that an attack on Jordan would have to be resisted by us. This they undertook to do. It was not only our own treaty engagements which concerned us, but the effect upon Iraq of events in Jordan. To fail to carry out our engagement would be the end of our position in the Middle East; to have to carry it out would be disastrous for Western unity. No dilemma could be more difficult. If Israel were to break out against Egypt and not against Jordan, this dilemma would not arise. For this reason, if there were to be a break-out it was better from our point of view that it should be against Egypt. On the other hand, if the break-out were against Egypt, then there would be other worries, for example the safety of the canal.³⁵²

THE UK & FRANCE AGREE: 'WE'LL DO IT OUR WAY'

The outcome of the meeting was that the British and French agreed in principle to a joint operation against Egypt with Israel; that Britain would withhold mobilization in defence of Jordan; and that France would try to persuade Israel not to take any further actions against Jordan. Eden wanted Israel to initiate an action so that Britain would have the 'justification' to go in to save the canal from damage. But Ben-Gurion did not want to get embroiled in the issue of the canal at that point. He only wanted to clear the Egyptians from Gaza and end the blockade of the Strait of Tiran. He sent the Israeli operation plan back, and sought another meeting.³⁵³

~ 16: While the French and British prime ministers met in Paris, in Washington, in strict accord with the understanding given to Ilyan by his CIA collaborators, Dulles held a press conference. A reporter asked whether, in the light of recent Israeli attacks on Jordan, the United States might come to Jordan's aid per "our declaration of April 9." Yes, replied the Secretary of State, and repeated the reference to Eisenhower's April statement. The wheels were immediately put in motion for a coup in Syria.³⁵⁴

Was that the conduct which Dulles had in mind when he told the delegates at the First Assembly of the WCC that the Western Democracies had reverenced the principles of the supremacy of moral law over man-made law, and the sanctity of every human individual? He told delegates that in contrast: "Marxian Communism denies them both in theory and practice, and necessarily concludes that violence is inevitable." When Communist Parties "rule nearly one quarter of the earth's population" it is, he said, exceedingly hard to organize the world for peace. Christians have a special responsibility for restoring the faith of the West, and bringing political realities into harmony with it. (Chapter 28; Is politics a matter of faith?) One presumes he would have put the conspirators in the same category as Syngman Rhee who he described as "a Christian gentleman of a very high order" and "the equivalent of the founders of the Church.

... gentlemen who have suffered for their faith ... who have been steadfast and have upheld the faith in a manner that puts them in the category of the leaders of the early church.” (See above: ... a visit by a friend) However, there was shortly a message from Ilyan to Eveland in Beirut, postponing the date of the coup for five days, to October 30, because Colonel Kabbani had advised Ilyan that his people were not quite ready.³⁵⁵

The amorphous Christian gel was alive and well, but it did not take much longer for the atheistic Soviet Union to confirm that it was going to stay basically on track, too, in a bid to retain control of its satellite system, even though there was, already, a definite and progressive relaxation of controls which had been in vogue since February, and for a few weeks the Suez Crisis ran hand in hand with a crisis in the Soviet Bloc as some people tried to accelerate the relaxation process. Eisenhower and Dulles sought to take full advantage of the confusion, although they feared that the Soviet Union might take some rash action in the Middle East in order to exert their authority.

- ~ 18: In Warsaw three days of confrontation between the Polish government and the Soviet Union began, and tension ran high as the Poles insisted on the right to run their own affairs.
- ~ In Cairo Nasser came under pressure from the US to give way on the issue of political control of traffic through the canal. He refused to budge.
- ~ In London, Lloyd shuttled between two meetings. The first was the SCUC council which determined to press ahead with its plans in spite of the Soviet veto and to confront Nasser, but to offer him modified procedures. The second was a cabinet meeting at which it was accepted that the British and the French should intervene to protect the canal, if Israel moved against Egypt.³⁵⁶
- ~ 21: There was a major breakthrough in Warsaw for those who wanted Polish independence from Moscow when the rehabilitated Gomulka was elected to the Polish Politburo and as First Secretary of the Central Committee. A Polish-Soviet accord on trade and military cooperation was agreed to, it was announced that most senior Soviet officers would leave the country, forced collectivization was discontinued, and the heavy handed approach of the political police was relaxed. Gomulka was later elected ruling member of the Council of State.
- ~ Nasser announced that he would regard the payment of canal dues to SCUC by any country as a hostile act.
- ~ And politics in the Arab world moved a little to the left with the election of an anti-Western majority in Jordan's general election.
- ~ 22: French, Israeli and British officials, including Selwyn Lloyd and Ben-Gurion, began three days of secret meetings at Sevres to determine whether to launch a joint action in Egypt and, if so, to plan it. Ben-Gurion told of the “mortal danger” facing his country and the importance of destroying the fedayeen bases and breaking Nasser's stranglehold on Israel's economy, and said that Israel had firmly decided to attack Egypt which had armies massed in Sinai and had refused passage to Israeli ships. However he wanted an agreement that all three would attack Egypt, with French fighter and British bomber support for the Israeli ground forces. He also wanted the Egyptian air force 'eliminated' before Israel's ground forces began to move, to prevent Egyptian aerial bombardment of Tel Aviv and other centres.

- ~ 23: The Israeli and French delegations met again in the morning, prior to the British returning from London. They agreed that France would provide aerial protection for Israel's cities and naval protection for its coast, and that it would drop supplies to the advancing Israeli forces. Then, after the British arrived, the broad Anglo-French-Israeli plan was agreed to. Israel would launch an attack which would appear to be aimed at the canal, but would be designed to clear Sinai and break the blockade. The Egyptians could be expected to react. Britain and France would issue ultimatums to both parties to cease fire and pull back. Israel would make a conditional reply. Egypt was expected to refuse. Britain and France would jointly attack Egypt's airfields, destroying its aircraft before they could be airborne, and troops would be landed to secure the canal zone.

However confusion resulted when there was not a complete and frank disclosure between them of the details which the Israelis and French had already agreed to.³⁵⁷ The British were not told that the French would provide naval and air protection for Israel and that supplies would be dropped to Israel's troops. Those agreements 'blew' any pretence, any cover stories, that the attack was not a matter of collusion. The world would see very clearly that the whole exercise had been pre-planned. Britain's 'holier than thou' approach to armed diplomacy would be shown to be a sham. Cooperation between allies in war time is one thing. Absolute deceit and dishonesty to precipitate a war is another. But what had changed? Very little. The scale and impact of the operation was different. This was much smaller than dragging a whole world into conflict. This time Britain did not want to drag the whole world in as a means to maintaining its grip on its colonial empire. It was different to using American aid on a massive scale to keep the Soviet Union in the Europe's war and to drag Japan and the United States in – to convert it from a European war to a world war. Eden was dead scared of the consequences. He knew very well that: "To fail to carry out our engagement would be the end of our position in the Middle East; to have to carry it out would be disastrous for Western unity." The prospects for maintaining its grip on the remaining units of its empire were very slim indeed. And yet Eden would not pull back and find another way to make peace. He and his colleagues simply did not understand the situation.

And while the scale and consequences of the action were totally different to Roosevelt's decision to conceal the manoeuvring to drag Japan into the war, and to use the threat to his own people at Pearl Harbour as a means to drag his own people into the war, the total deceit and amorality of the exercises was the same. Similarly, it was the same as in the case of Truman's decision to keep the war against Japan going so that the United States could have a real life and death demonstration of the power of the atom bomb and establish the unique world position of the United States. In each of these cases the world was a play ground in which the aim of the game was to either maintain or gain a position of power and privilege over one's competitors, companions or the world community. Ever since Britain issued the Balfour Declaration to take advantage of the people of the Covenant and to use Israel as a means to an end, Palestine and Jerusalem had been a microcosm of the world's trials and tribulations; a magnifying glass under which to examine the morality and the propriety of human conduct; the manipulation of human relationships; and the relationship between humanity and God. In fact from the time of the Covenant of Mount Sinai it has never been any different. The world simply could not see it. The human population had not grown to the point at which broken relationships were critical to human affairs. Nor had it achieved the level of understanding, or developed the capacity to utilize the resources which, together with humanity, comprise the totality of creation. It has taken 2,000 years to reach that point. Now that it has been reached, the consequences of the abuse of human relations and the consequences of the abuse of creation are critical. This is the situation which Eden could not grasp as he pondered which alternative to select at Suez. He was revisiting the Balfour Declaration, but he could not see it. Neither could the church. The amorphous Christian gel was only interested in a favourable outcome for itself. It would continue to stumble from one blunder to another, from one crisis to another, each one centred on Jerusalem and its relations with the people of the Covenant – and each one getting progressively more traumatic – until it comes to a realization of what the trouble in the triangle is all about.

- ~ So Britain, France and Israel went about their planning.
- ~ Egypt, Jordan and Syria did , too. They established a joint military command under Egyptian leadership.

A HUNGARIAN DISTRACTION

- ~ But in Hungary the people were more interested in what was happening in Poland. News of Poland's new deal with the Soviet government electrified the nation. Students in Budapest staged a procession, planning to present a petition to the hierarchy, but they were rebuffed and police fired into the crowds. The peaceful demonstration turned into a major revolutionary demonstration and demands were made for the reinstatement of the deposed prime minister, Imre Nagy, the withdrawal of Soviet forces, and similar concessions to those in Poland. Units of the army joined the revolutionaries, and army depots and munitions factories handed out arms. Clashes with the militia occurred and Soviet troops intervened to restore order.
- ~ 24: With a very high level of popular support, the deposed premier, Nagy, assumed office as prime minister in Hungary, but he promptly found it necessary to form a coalition government in collaboration with the Catholic hierarchy, and being driven from one concession to the next, within days he found himself at the head of a genuine coalition government composed of Smallholders, Social Democrats, and National Peasants, which, with a "Catholic Association," had reconstituted themselves.³⁵⁸ He therefore immediately authorized the restoration of multi-party democracy and announced the country's neutrality. Soviet troops had previously been withdrawn, and he now began negotiating for the complete evacuation of Hungary.

- ~ At the end of their three days of discussions, British, French and Israeli officials signed what some commentators refer to as “the secret Treaty of Sevres.” Lloyd described it as a record of discussion, produced quite unexpectedly, of “elements of the contingency plan which had been discussed, and the actions which could be expected to follow them in given circumstances.” He said that the decisive cabinet meeting took place next day, but he then added: “Our obligations under the Tripartite Declaration were discussed” and this leaves little room for doubt that the document, which had been signed by Patrick Dean as Deputy Undersecretary of State for Foreign Affairs after Lloyd had left the meeting, was intended to be acted on.³⁵⁹ ‘Contingency plan’ was simply another name for a ‘plot.’
- ~ 25: Next day, after Dean had briefed Eden and four of the six most senior members of his cabinet³⁶⁰, the British cabinet agreed, without dissent, that if Israel attacked Egypt, as it was expected to do on the 29th, that Britain “would act as Eden had proposed.” An ultimatum would be issued to both Israel and Egypt by both Britain and France. Lloyd wrote:

Eden therefore suggested that, if Israel did attack, Britain and the French should issue an ultimatum to both sides. If Nasser complied, his prestige would be fatally undermined. If he did not, there would be ample justification for Anglo-French action to safeguard the Canal. It was better that we should be seen to hold the balance between Egypt and Israel rather than to be accepting Israeli cooperation in an attack by us on Egypt. ”³⁶¹ [Emphasis added.]

DAYS OF DECEIT!

Deceit was in full flight! Cabinet had confirmed that for the second time in two generations Britain was using Zionism and the Jewish people as a mechanism to either gain or secure control of a region or a facility which it regarded as vital to either the expansion or the underpinning of its imperial interest. In the first situation it used the Balfour Declaration to gain control of the Mosul oil region in direct contradiction to a prior agreement it had made with the leaders of the Arab communities. They could not be expected to forget it. In the second situation it was using the State of Israel, which had finally been set up in spite of Britain having reneged on the Balfour Declaration, as a weapon with which to secure control of the Suez Canal. In doing so it was about to renege on agreements which it had with some of the Arab neighbours of Israel which had been made as a consequence of the conflict generated when the State of Israel was imposed on them. They were the same people to whom it had offered an independent Arab state, including Palestine, and the restoration of the Caliphate prior to announcing the Balfour Declaration. In both situations the people-Israel had acted, or would act, very deliberately and after much thought in self-interest in a manner contradictory of the Covenant of Sinai when there were alternative policies or actions available to them. However they had done so in response to pressures which had resulted from oppression which was a consequence of the misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel. It was another classic case of being “the meat in the sandwich.” They were caught between powerful forces in a conflict which was not of their own making, but they pursued the course which they took by virtue of their own decision making.

Like it or not, the Covenant of Sinai would not go away. They were predestined to act as a catalyst in the evolution of human relations and the understanding of humanity's relationship with God. They were not predestined to make particular decisions. And with the US presidential elections only 12 days away there were still more contradictions in store. None of the parties had yet disentangled themselves from the parody of Mein Kampf.

- ~ Dayan went home to Israel and issued revised orders for the operation. The initial thrust was to appear to be aimed at the canal, to ensure the reaction by Egypt which Britain and France required to justify their intervention, before the main thrust turned south to clear Sinai and Sharm es-Sheikh. The Israeli cabinet had not yet been briefed on what was about to happen.
- ~ 27: Ben-Gurion finally briefed his cabinet and sought their approval for the plan. They gave it. He admitted to them:

*I do not know what will be the fate of Sinai. What we are primarily interested in is the coast around Eilat and the Gulf. I imagine that there will be powers who will force us to withdraw. There is America, there is Russia, and there are the United Nations, Nehru, Asia, Africa; and I must say that I fear America most of all. America may compel us to withdraw from positions we will occupy – but the important point is freedom of shipping.*³⁶²

Partial mobilization was ordered. A French flotilla moved towards its allocated place off the Israeli coast while LSTs began discharging heavy equipment and a squadron of transport planes arrived in Israel from Cyprus with technicians and equipment.

- ~ 28: Speaking in Dallas, Texas, and not being in direct touch with developments in the Middle East, Dulles said that it would be “intolerable” for the Suez Canal to be solely in Egyptian hands.
- ~ In Rome, Pius XII was keeping in close touch with developments in the Soviet Bloc, and issued the encyclical Luctuosissimi Eventus, calling for prayers for Hungary.
- ~ 29: Under a shroud of secrecy a squadron of transport planes took off at 3.30 pm to begin Israel's agreed Suez Zone operation.
- ~ 30: The deception was so complete that it was not until the early hours of the morning that Egyptian authorities realized the action was a major assault and not another long-distance sabotage raid. Reinforcements were then rushed into Sinai and Nasser appealed for his Arab colleagues to make war on Israel. But he knew that instant mobilization was impossible. The only immediate action could be border shelling by Syria and Jordan.
- ~ And the deception was so complete that it upset United States' plans as well. Early in the morning a very distraught Michail Ilyan appeared at the door of his CIA contact, Eveland. “Last night,” he cried, “the Israelis invaded Egypt and are right now heading for the Suez Canal! How could you have asked us to overthrow our government at the exact moment when Israel started a war with an Arab State?” the Syrian Opposition leader demanded. But the Dulles brothers were not that easily put off. Scheming began again almost immediately.³⁶³

- ~ Ben-Gurion approved an announcement that: “Israeli defence forces entered and engaged fedayeen units in Ras en-Nakeb and Quntilla, and seized positions west of the Nakhl crossroads in the vicinity of the Suez Canal. This action follows the Egyptian assaults on Israeli transport on land and sea destined to cause destruction and the denial of peaceful life to Israel’s citizens.”³⁶⁴
- ~ Britain and France had the signal they required. They issued their pre-planned ultimatums. There were the “withdraw and cease hostilities” clauses, but the key one was clause c.):
- in order to guarantee freedom of transit through the canal by the ships of all nations and in order to separate the combatants, to accept the temporary occupation by Anglo-French forces of the key positions at Port Said, Ismailia, and Suez.

The United Kingdom and the French Governments request an answer to this communication within twelve hours. If at the expiration of that time one or both Governments have not undertaken to comply with the above requirements, United Kingdom and French forces will intervene in whatever strength may be necessary to secure compliance.

But Eden’s deception was going too far. He even tried to convince Eisenhower that the action was all spontaneous. His action went beyond the selective withholding of information which both governments were expert at – as they had both proven with deadly monotony ever since the beginning of the Second World War. It was plain dishonesty. It was only seven weeks since, being in desperate need of a solution to ease the tension on all fronts, he had insisted that cabinet accept the Dulles’ SCUC plan. He said he was influenced in part by the fact that close cooperation with the United States had been a guiding principle throughout his political life, but also by the knowledge that: “If we had told the United States Government that we did not consider the Users’ Club a workable proposition and that we preferred to go direct to the Security Council ... we would I suppose have forfeited, for the time being at least, something of their goodwill.” Now, in a critical situation, the Americans had not been briefed because of the Anglo-French fear that they would apply pressure to stop the plan. Eden knew that:

*The chief danger, especially for us, was that the conflict would spread. A localized war between Israel and Egypt, while troublesome, should not be highly dangerous internationally. The same could not be said of a war which had spread to include Syria and Jordan, with Iraq morally compelled to take a hand too. If this was to happen, the Jordan commitment would raise its head again, not in an acute form, but alarming enough. Two events could be counted on to encourage Jordan and Syria to inaction, swift Israeli military success and the knowledge that British and French forces were on the way and would be used to localize the dispute. If that restraint was to be effective it must be applied at once. Twenty-four hours might well be too late, forty-eight certainly would.*³⁶⁵

After a morning cabinet meeting, Eden sent a message to Eisenhower inviting his general support and advising him of a statement which he was to make to the Commons later in the day. That statement would say, in essence, that: the government had never made a secret of its belief that “justice entitled us to defend our vital interests against Nasser’s designs;” that Egypt had to a large extent brought this attack on itself; that Britain could not afford to see the canal closed; and that the government was preparing to take the matter to the Security Council.³⁶⁶ Then in his covering note to the president he said:

My first instinct would have been to ask you to associate yourself and your country with the declaration. But I know the constitutional and other difficulties in which you are placed. I think there is a chance that both sides will accept. In any case it would help this result very much if you found it possible to support what we have done at least in general terms. We are well aware that no real settlement of the Middle East problems is possible except through the closest cooperation between our two countries. Our two governments have tried with the best will in the world all sorts of private and public negotiations through the last two or three years and they have all failed. This seems an opportunity for a fresh start. ... Nothing could have prevented this volcano from erupting somewhere, but when the dust settles there may well be a chance for our doing a really constructive piece of work together and thereby strengthening the weakest point in the line against communism.³⁶⁷ [Emphasis added.]

Eden's message crossed with one from Eisenhower in which he expressed his disquiet upon a number of points, but considered it of the greatest importance that the United Kingdom and the United States should quickly and clearly lay out their present views and intentions before each other, so that they might not in any real crisis be powerless to act in concert because of misunderstanding."³⁶⁸ Eden had that with him when he went to the Commons and faced a torrid time of questioning. By the time he had placated the members, and gained a motion of support for the action taken, it was the morning of the 30th in New York and the Security Council was meeting.

CAUGHT RED HANDED: GO TO THE UN!

The US delegation was determined to condemn the Anglo-French-Israeli action in forthright terms, pressing for a resolution which would demand an immediate cease fire and the withdrawal of Israeli forces behind an armistice line, making any British and French intervention unnecessary. Britain and France vetoed it. Lloyd later claimed that the United States' resolution was a matter of both international and United States' domestic politics. He was playing to the gallery of the newly independent members of the United Nations. Trying to steal a march on the Soviet Union. The bidding for allegiance – and resource and defence base opportunities – had moved into a new arena. Eden quoted from a campaign speech by Vice Presidential candidate Richard Nixon:

In the past the nations of Asia and Africa have always felt we would, when the pressure was on, side with the policies of the British and French Governments in relation to the once Colonial areas. For the first time in history we have shown independence of the Anglo-French policies towards Asia and Africa which seemed to us to reflect the Colonial tradition. That declaration of independence has had an electrifying effect throughout the world.³⁶⁹

The Soviet Union proposed an alternative which did not imply criticism of Britain and France and which Britain could accept, but France still vetoed it. Then Yugoslavia moved that the matter be referred to the General Assembly, taking it out of the hands of the Security Council and away from the power of veto. By the UN's rules that was treated as a procedural motion, not subject to veto, and it was carried: 7 – 4, with Britain and France voting against, and Australia and Belgium abstaining. The new Asian and African members of the United Nations were about to experience meaningful participation in its affairs, to the discomfort of some of the major powers, for the first time. The General Assembly was convened to meet in emergency session 48 hours later, at 5.00 pm on November 1. While it was in the act of making that decision, at midnight Tel Aviv time, Golda Meir advised Britain and France of Israel's pre-planned conditional acceptance of the Anglo-French ultimatum. It was 4.00 pm at the United Nations. But world leaders knew it was patently a joke. They did not even need to see the French support of the assault to know that. The withdrawal clause stipulated that Egypt should withdraw its forces to a distance of 10 miles from the canal, and it was all Egyptian territory. The Israeli forces pulled out all the stops to occupy the entire territory.

~ 31: Egypt rejected the Anglo-French ultimatum.

Eden addressed parliament and explained why his government had not been able to support a resolution condemning Israel's action. He spoke of Israel's need for guarantees of security; the impossibility of pronouncing blame for all that had gone before; and the cumulative effects of those previous actions. He did not say: "We cannot condemn them because they did it at our request and in full collaboration with France and us." Neither did he say: "It is all part of the trouble in the triangle and this is just a holding action while we work out how to deal with it." How could he? He did not comprehend it. And even if he did, it is most unlikely that he would have admitted it. To do so he would also have had to admit: "We are a major player in the amorphous Christian gel, we are a basic part of the problem, and we have to totally rethink the direction of our international policies." That would have been difficult!

British and French forces went into action at 7.00 pm. Tel Aviv time, (5.00 pm London time) The total destruction of Egypt's air force on the ground was hardly consistent with the Anglo-French protestations that they were only enforcing an armistice. The French were very happy. It would be some little time before Nasser would feel able to offer any further support for rebels in the North African French territories. But Khrushchev was not. He did not want a third world war. He told Nasser that in quite firm terms. He said Moscow would provide all the moral support which it could, but Nasser had to make peace with Britain and France as soon as possible. And both Syria and Jordan told him that they would not provide military support. The bluff appeared to be working. But Egyptian forces went into an additional action in spite of no substantial support. They scuttled a number of ships travelling through the canal. It was a very simple way to block it. All of the oil tankers bound for Europe from Saudi Arabia, the Gulf States, Iraq and Iran would now have to travel around the Cape of Good Hope.

~ November

- ~ 1: In Rome, Pius XII issued the encyclical Laetamur Admodum, on the crisis in the Middle East.
- ~ In Budapest, only nine days after assuming power with strong support from the Roman Catholic hierarchy, Nagy announced Hungary's withdrawal from the Warsaw Pact, to which it had adhered since 1955. He asked the United Nations to recognize Hungary as a neutral state, under the joint protection of the Great Powers. Soviet officials were uncertain whether to let matters take their course, but Nagy's denunciation of the Warsaw Pact was too threatening. Soviet tanks, which had halted just across the frontier, began to return, reinforced by other units.
- ~ 2: In New York, with four days until the United States presidential election, the General Assembly meeting, deferred from the previous evening, got under way.

Dulles launched an attack on Israel, Britain and France, and moved that all parties now engaged in hostilities in the Middle East (Israel, Egypt, Britain and France) should agree to an immediate cease fire; that all parties refrain from introducing military equipment into the area; and that the General Assembly remain in emergency session until the resolution was complied with. Before the day was out the resolution had been adopted, 64 votes in favor, five against, and six abstentions. Those voting against were Australia, New Zealand, Israel, Britain and France. Those abstaining were Canada, South Africa, Belgium, Laos, the Netherlands and Portugal. Of the 11 countries which either voted against or abstained from voting, Laos was the only country which was neither a British Commonwealth member or a colonial power, and even Laos had ongoing links with France while it was in the middle of its bid to slough-off its colonial heritage, caught up in the Indochina wars. Israel could be excluded from consideration on the basis that it was one of the belligerents, but it was widely regarded as a colonizing power by the colonial subject-nations.

Britain was totally isolated. So was France. But Britain was the power which had originally triggered the entire fifty-year rolling scenario through its Balfour Declaration. The consequences of that declaration brought Hitler's grand parody Mein Kampf into play and triggered the fulfilment of the Qur'anic Night Journey, thus bringing the trouble in the triangle to a head. The sequence of key correspondence was as follows. The McMahon letter, with Britain's promise of a state for the Arabs, including Palestine, was dated October 24, 1915; the Sykes-Picot Anglo-French carve-up correspondence was dated May 1916; and this day, two generations later, the day on which the United Nations General Assembly – with a batch of new former-colony members voting on such a matter for the first time – told Britain to get its troops out, and quick, was actually the anniversary of the issuing of the Balfour Declaration: November 2, 1916. The chickens were coming home to roost!

- ~ 3: Next day, in London, Eden stood firm. He told the Commons that in spite of the United Nations resolution, the British and French Governments believed they had to continue their action unless the UN itself took responsibility for ensuring a peace settlement, Israel's security, and "satisfactory arrangements ... in regard to the Suez Canal." He was asking the world to take responsibility to resolve the crisis which Britain, leading the charge for the amorphous Christian gel, had triggered. He was not conscious of the irony of it.

- ~ In New York, the Security Council turned its attention from the Middle East to the crisis in Hungary. It had been under some pressure from Britain to do so, to the extent that the US delegates suggested Britain was too eager to shift the spotlight from its trouble in the Middle East to the Soviet Union's troubles within the Soviet Bloc. When the matter came before the Council the Soviet Union put the shutters up and refused to cooperate, so Britain made sure that the same mechanism was used as for the Middle East: the matter was referred to the General Assembly.
- ~ 4: Next morning Soviet tanks re-entered Budapest; Nagy took refuge in the Yugoslav embassy and Cardinal Mindszenty, the Vatican's key local player in Hungary's politics, took refuge in the US legation; and by the time the General Assembly began to debate the matter the Soviet forces were in full control. A resolution calling for the immediate withdrawal of the Soviet forces was carried: 50 in favor, 8 against and 15 abstentions, compared with 64:5:6 in the case of the Middle East resolution.

The Soviet Union took even less notice of that resolution than Britain had two days earlier. The revolution was crushed, ruthlessly, a puppet government installed, and the reforms reversed. General Pál Maléter, head of the Hungarian national forces, who had been invited by the Soviet commanders to negotiate, was imprisoned and the situation was remarkably confused. Rioting and fighting broke out and although the major hostilities were over within a fortnight, industrial unrest continued for weeks before the rebellious workers were brought to heel. Nagy, Maléter, and a few close associates were apprehended, tried and eventually executed in 1958. Others were seized and transported to the Soviet Union and an estimated 200,000 refugees including a substantial proportion of Hungary's educated classes escaped to the West..

But after the 'distraction' of Hungary, which – much to Britain's annoyance – a significant number of delegates regarded as basically an in-house row and not a matter of colonial-style intervention, the UN was able to turn its attention back to the Middle East and the question of whether the General Secretary should be authorized to organize an international peace keeping force, UNEF, or a truce supervisory organization, UNTSO, or both. It was resolved with 57 votes in favour, none against and 19 abstentions to establish a UNEF. In the meantime, while the UN debate was continuing, the British cabinet determined to continue. A naval force was on its way to Egypt and a parachute drop at the three key canal centres was planned for first light next day. One matter which had made the government hesitate was not world or public opinion which were highly antagonistic, but the threat of oil sanctions. At the mention of oil Macmillan is reported to have thrown his arms in the air, exclaiming: "Oil sanction! That finishes it."³⁷⁰ The government was already in deep trouble, with one minister having resigned, and there was no doubt that the economic and political effects of an embargo would bring the government down. However the government pressed on. The Israeli forces had swept through Sinai, claimed Sharm es-Sheikh, and, for practical purposes, its part of the operation was over and a complete success.

- ~ 5: Britain's air drop at the three key Suez centres then began as planned at 8.00 am., supported by a naval barrage and bombing runs over selected targets. The Soviet Union sought to have the Security Council condemn Israel, France and Britain for continuing their actions in the face of the General Assembly resolution, but, naturally, with a couple of vetoes, it could not succeed.

CEASE FIRE, OR ELSE ...

However he had other weapons at his disposal, just like Britain and the United States. Propaganda and nuclear weapons. He grabbed the initiative at the United Nations, where the Soviet Union had seen its stocks slump over the Hungarian affair, even though members had shown that they were less concerned about that than by the Anglo-French adventure in the Middle East. He issued a statement which had immediate and powerful impact around the world.

In what position would Britain have found herself if she herself had been attacked by more powerful states possessing every kind of modern destructive weapon? And there are countries now which need not have sent a navy or air force to the coasts of Britain, but could have used other means, such as a rocket technique. We are filled with determination to use force to crush the aggressors and to restore peace in the East. We hope you will show the necessary prudence and will draw from this the appropriate conclusions.³⁷¹

Rumours began to spread like wildfire that the Soviet Union was attacking London and that the Third World War had begun.

- ~ 6: Eisenhower immediately responded by applying equally strong pressure on the British and French Governments to cease fire immediately, phoning both Eden and Mollet personally, and according to some reports, insisting that there must be a cease fire within twelve hours.³⁷² American voters had to be told something. They did not like the idea of a Third World War fought with nuclear weapons over a strip of territory they did not care much for. Neither did they like the idea of the Soviet Union gaining kudos and a stronger position in the Middle East, Africa and Asia through being seen as the friendly power which had brought the two big colonial powers to heel. They were already beginning to file through their voting booths. They wanted a president who got things done!

Eden was also advised from Washington that Britain's urgent loan application for $1 billion from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) would be conditional on an immediate cease fire. The operation had already cost Stg 120 million and the costs would rise. The Commons was due to sit at 11.00 am for the Queen's speech, and cabinet had to meet in emergency session before that. Eden had been told by the ambassador to the UN that he was doubtful that he could prevent a censure against Britain for more than a few days but, with Eisenhower in the mood that he now was, Eden must have realized a censure and sanctions, including the threatened oil embargo, were a matter of hours, not days away. Macmillan was of the view that the economic and political pressure required an immediate cease fire. A country can always hope to offset, or diffuse, political pressure by diplomacy. Economic pressure can bring a country to its knees or provoke it into a war very quickly, and both Britain and the United States were past masters at it. Situations considered already include: George III's trading and finance policies as a trigger to the independence of the North American colonies (chapter 13); the role of the Rothschild banks in the Franco-Prussian War (chapter 15); Britain's bid to involve Japan in an embargo against the Soviet Union and Germany in June 1940; the several embargoes either mooted or impose in the lead up to the Second World War, notably the United States' oil embargo against Japan in 1941 (chapter 24); and the most recent one, Britain's trade embargo against Iran over the nationalization of oil production facilities (this chapter, above). Now that oil sanctions were threatened against Britain, it was another matter altogether!

Sterling was a reserve currency and a large proportion of the world's trade was conducted in pounds sterling, including almost the entire trade of countries of the British Commonwealth. Therefore any threat to the value of the pound, or to the acceptability of contracts written in sterling, had dire consequences not only for Britain but for every country which traded on the basis of sterling, and for the stability of the entire Commonwealth. It was bad enough that Eisenhower was using his influence to block the release of funds held by Britain in the IMF. However the $1 billion loan which was being held up was only the first tranche of a drawing program which had been submitted. That drawing was required to protect sterling from a sudden rash of speculation. Macmillan had reason to believe that the speculation was being "stimulated" by the US Secretary of the Treasury, George Humphrey, as the mouthpiece for Eisenhower.³⁷³ It was perfectly clear to the whole cabinet that Macmillan was right. Britain's total gold and dollar reserves had fallen by three percent in September, five per cent in October, and already, in early November, by 15 per cent.³⁷⁴ If Britain did not order a cease fire in Egypt it was finished as an imperial power. Totally finished.

Between the Queen's speech at 11.00 am and the rising of the House for lunch, Eden phoned Mollet and told him that the British Government proposed to announce a cease fire at 4.00 pm. At least two French ministers favoured France continuing alone if Britain quit and the French cabinet was forced to debate the issue. Mollet proposed to concur with the British decision and the majority of his cabinet supported him. Only a little time was lost due to that delay and the joint cease fire order was issued at 5.00 pm.. Eisenhower phoned Eden to say how pleased he was.³⁷⁵ He had reason to be. The American voters had liked what they heard him saying, the main results were in and he had increased his majority. But the disengagement and Anglo-French withdrawal were going to be much more drawn out. For one thing, the American election was over, the pressure was off, and many Americans were agreeing with what Dulles had said 10 days earlier: they did not want the Egyptians to be in control of the canal!

~ 7: The UN General Assembly carried a resolution calling for the immediate withdrawal from Egyptian territory of all British, French and Israeli forces but then the haggling over which countries should provide the troops for a UNEF.

Such a force could not be established very quickly, so, by default, the invaders had to stay until the matter was resolved. Britain was deeply divided over whether it should even accept the UN demand, and many countries, notably the Afro-Asia bloc, were saying that no troops from any Commonwealth country should be included in the UNEF. There was also the question of who should clear the canal to reopen it for traffic, and with whose equipment. Britain was the only country which maintained an effective canal clearing system. Eden proposed a meeting with Eisenhower to discuss the Middle East and a range of other international issues, notably Western relations with the Soviet Bloc, and initially the president indicated he would be happy for a meeting and that Mollet should come too. But before Eden had even gone into the House to announce an immediate visit Eisenhower had phoned again to say bluntly that after consulting Congressional leaders he had decided there would be no American consultations with either Britain or France until the UN resolution had been complied with and all British and French troops were out of Egypt. He later went further and said that all consultation was deferred indefinitely.³⁷⁶

Eden claimed that: “We [Britain] had intervened to divide and, above all, to contain the conflict.”³⁷⁷ [Emphasis added.] But he had shown very clearly that he did not understand the basis of the conflict. Without such an understanding, his idea of containment could only be to maintain the status quo and therefore he ought have used the phrase which everyone understood: “divide and rule.” However Eisenhower, with Dulles at his right hand, was very eager for close consultations with both Israel and Egypt. He sent a personal appeal to Ben-Gurion saying that once Israel had withdrawn from Egyptian territory, new and energetic steps would be taken to solve the basic problems which had given rise to the present difficulties, and the State Department was actively wooing Egypt as well. Over the next two weeks Britain made frantic efforts to negotiate a system of UN forces to “relieve” part of the British force, or to complement it, without a British withdrawal from the Canal Zone, and to arrange for the prompt clearing of the canal, but it struck repeated snags. Britain would not withdraw its forces until the UN had a full force in place and until the canal was cleared and it received assurances about its own and Israeli transit rights. Egypt would not agree to the clearance of the canal until it was assured of complete control of it subsequently and until all foreign troops were gone.

- ~ 12: Egypt gave some ground on the 12th by agreeing to the stationing of UNEF troops, not on the canal, but in a border buffer zone between it and Israel in the Sinai. But there were plenty of people who were not happy, and the British-controlled IPC pipeline from Iraq through Jordan to the Mediterranean was blown up immediately.
- ~ 23: When the UN General Assembly met in full session on November 23 the debate became a bit of a slanging match over whose offences were worse: Britain, with France, in the Middle East, or the Soviet Union in Hungary and Poland.

With its colonial record Britain could not win, but its situation was made to look even weaker by the fact that only shortly before, within weeks of Gomulka’s return to power, Cardinal Wyszyński had been released from house arrest and an agreement was concluded which allowed religious instruction in state schools, provided that Communist approval was sought over appointments to higher church offices. This 'compromise' defused a crisis which, with continuing church agitation, might have invoked a Soviet invasion and repression in Poland such as in Hungary. The Assembly was in no mood for Britain to stay in Egypt. It accepted proposals from the UN Secretary General for the clearing of the canal, but then immediately adopted an Afro-Asian bloc resolution expressing regret that Anglo-French forces were still in Port Said, and calling for their withdrawal forthwith. With the United States supporting the resolution it was carried by 63 votes in favour, only five against, and 10 abstentions. Relations between Britain and the United States fell to near rock bottom. After a lot more haggling Britain and France agreed to December 22 as the date for their final troop embarkation; clearing of the canal began on December 27; the Eisenhower Doctrine on relations with countries in the Middle East was announced on January 5; Eden, broken in health, conscious of the divisions within the country, and conscious of the basis and impact of the Eisenhower Doctrine, resigned from office on January 9, 1957. The canal was reopened to traffic on April 4 under an agreement which provided for the 1888 convention to remain in force, for cooperation between the Canal Authority and shippers and traders, and for UNEF units to occupy Sharm as-Sheikh, with uncontested freedom of movement for Israeli shipping through the Strait of Tiran to Eilat.

DEFEAT. FOR WHOM?

The Suez Crisis was over. Officially, anyway. Britain put as bold a face on the debacle as it could, saying that Egypt had been defeated and, in Eden's words: "It is unlikely that Nasser or any other Arab leader will readily undertake a war of extermination against Israel in the immediate future, without support from outside." He also said: "The intervention succeeded in its limited purpose, the immediate rescue of the Lebanon and Jordan, though probably the more effective deterrent was the conviction that Israel would fight if the United Arab Republic took over Jordan. Egypt now knew beyond argument what Israeli fighting meant."³⁷⁸ [Emphasis added.]

In other words he had shifted the emphasis dramatically away from the original motive for British intervention. The alliance of convenience had been brought together on the basis of three quite different motives. They were not brought together with a common goal or even a common understanding of the circumstances.

Basically Britain's aims were to secure the Suez Canal in order to protect the investment of its shareholders in the company; to prevent the loss of transit rights for its vital oil cargoes and for other trade with its empire east and south of Suez and the consequent trading disadvantages of longer shipping times and higher costs, especially in the event of war; to avoid the complex consequences of another war between Israel and its Arab neighbours. It could not claim that the independence and security of the Jewish State was a major motive, per se. It had not only thrown away the Zionist umbrella which it had held aloft from 1917 to 1948, it had refused to even support the establishment of that state when the chips were down. If it would not support it then, when it really mattered, because the consequences of its earlier policy were hurting too much, it was rather hypocritical to try to persuade the world that it had gone in to protect the Israelis. The British government even admitted that its relations with Israel had not been close, or particularly cordial, and that France had developed a closer relationship with it. As we have seen, and as other countries soon worked out, the British government had wanted Israel's help to camouflage the fact that it wanted to invade Egypt in order to regain control of the canal. The lesson for the world from that was that a colony or mandated territory and its people still had their uses, even after they had achieved independence.

France's aim was quite straight forward. It wanted to teach Egypt a lesson for aiding and abetting, or even sponsoring, decolonization movements and guerrilla uprisings in its North African colonies. Its interest in the canal was, relatively, secondary.

Israel's aim was basically self-preservation and security for its people which would be enhanced considerably by securing transit rights through the Suez Canal and the Strait of Tiran. It could reasonably expect to achieve that aim in collaboration with a couple of powerful allies. It had little hope of success if it simply invaded a strong Arab neighbour because of the likelihood that it would have to fight multiple wars on four, if not five fronts. Its critics claimed that it was also pursuing an expansionist policy but, although some of its leaders and citizens harboured an ambition to incorporate all of the territory from the Nile to the Euphrates, it is drawing a long bow to suggest that expansionism was a main motive in the Sinai-Suez War. A spin-off benefit perhaps, but transit rights and security from attack were certainly its driving motives. Its people had learned the very hard way that to survive means to fight as the outcome of three and a half thousand years of a history which, while it was certainly not without blemish, had peaked with three generations or so which were just as traumatic as the middle period of destruction and dispersal. Its leaders knew that very well.

However, the 'rescue' which Eden referred to – or the prevention of either Jordan or the Lebanon cooperating more fully in the Palestinian cause – soon required Britain to base additional troops in Jordan and to provide other additional support, or for the protection of the oil pipelines and terminals which it still controlled. It also led directly to the United States basing troops in the Lebanon. The Arab world was being quite rapidly fragmented, sucked further and further into Great Power politics, with an increase in outside 'divide and rule' interference, not a reduction. Those who thought that the trouble in the triangle was going to be resolved by an increased dose of great power military and political intervention and a continuation of divide and rule tactics were to be sadly mistaken. Until the triangle was properly understood and steps were taken systematically to disentangle the self-misunderstanding, arrogance, intrigue and misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel which had evolved over 1,925 years – since the death and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth – the crisis in the Middle East would simply continue, with the key players stumbling from one blunder to another.

There was a great deal of debate about the impact which the Suez Crisis would have on Britain's long term status and influence. Those at the centre of government policy making at the time sought to play it down. Lloyd wrote that: “Those who contend that Suez was a watershed in our national history often maintain that Eden’s Government still regarded Britain as capable of independent action on a global scale.”³⁷⁹ [Emphasis added.] This implies that the Suez action was taken on the basis of a Soviet containment action or to resolve the Arab-Israeli question. In reality the debate only got to that level because, as already noted, Eden and the government were at pains to paint it in that light in order to camouflage their base self-interest motive, and Lloyd conceded that Britain’s financial situation was so parlous (having become “the world’s greatest debtor”) that it could only act in global affairs in collaboration with the United States.

THE COLONIAL WATERSHED ...

However Suez was a watershed in Britain’s affairs and it was more than that. It was a watershed in world affairs. It was another critical point in the trouble in the triangle. It was as if Britain was doing its damndest to confirm Israel’s covenantal role at the centre of the trouble in the triangle. One major segment of the trouble had opened in 1916 with Britain’s audacious bid to use the Jewish community’s aspirations for its own ends: to bolster its waning colonial authority and to extend its empire to its greatest and wealthiest extent by incorporating the resource-rich Middle East. Then, over a period of two generations, as a consequence of the destruction of human relationships and the exploitation of people which we have traced, it progressively lost the lot. At the time of Suez it did still have a clutch of colonies, trust territories and other suzerain entities, but the antagonism generated by that action and the further weakening of its international status, generated such increased pressure for decolonization that the independence of that clutch within a few years was assured – together with the independence of almost every other colony of a European power and the trust territories. Britain had raised the debate on decolonization to a new level which could be described as ‘fever pitch’ and it had succeeded, inadvertently, in bringing the two great opposing powers together on an issue of fundamental importance in human and world affairs. The Soviet Union, the dominant socio-economic challenge to the amorphous Christian gel, was vigorously supporting Egypt. It would have done so in any case, to drive a bigger wedge between Britain and its oppressed former suzerain or neo-colonial state, but by their joint actions, the United States and Britain had forced them into a stronger and much closer relationship. The Western powers tried to say it was all politics, but that is not the case. Colonialism simply was not compatible with Marx’s philosophy, so there was a natural affinity between the enormous Communist power and the small, struggling subject nations.

Once Britain had started the process through its attack on Egypt, the United States, with its own colonial heritage had no option but to support the de-colonizing push even though it was not eager to surrender its own territories, and the process gathered self-sustaining momentum until it was complete. Over the three years 1956 to 1958 an additional seven new members, all either Asian or African, were admitted to the United Nations. This provided a much more substantial voting bloc which the European and American nations had to take notice of, but when a total of 17 were admitted in September-October 1960 – all African except one which was Asian – the balance lurched suddenly and the Afro-Asian bloc, with the support of a few Latin American members or the Soviet Union, could determine matters which came to the General Assembly rather than the Security Council. On December 14, 1960, as soon as they were in a position to do so, they submitted and were able to have adopted the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (Resolution 1514(XV)).

The Declaration states that the subjection of peoples to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation constitutes a denial of fundamental human rights, is contrary to the Charter, and is an impediment to the promotion of world peace and cooperation, and that “Immediate steps shall be taken, in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories which have not yet attained independence, to transfer all powers to the peoples of those Territories, without any conditions or reservations, in accordance with their freely expressed will and desire, without any distinction as to race, creed or colour in order to enable them to enjoy complete independence and freedom.”³⁸⁰ In 1961 a Special Committee was established to examine the application of the Declaration, and a year later the Assembly noted that, with few exceptions, the provisions of the Declaration had not been carried out. Repressive measures, including armed action, was still being taken in many countries against dependent peoples. The Special Committee was enlarged and given authority to monitor the implementation of the declaration, to advise the Security Council on any matters related to non-self-governing territories which might threaten international peace and security, and to make recommendations about how the provisions of the Declaration should be applied. The exposure of their policies and abuses or failures to act properly had a very salutary effect on the colonial powers and those which were administering Trust Territories, and the process of decolonization was accelerated.

... AND THE EISENHOWER DOCTRINE

Quite apart from that major development, Britain’s adventure substantially weakened its position in the Middle East in relation to other powers. Syria was driven more firmly into the anti-Zionist anti-colonialism camp. Iraq, one of the countries which Britain had humiliated during the Second World War then recruited as the pivotal member of the Baghdad Pact, and which had become the principal ‘security guard’ for Britain’s remaining petroleum interests in the Middle East, was soon more deeply divided over the question of its relations with Israel and the West. Two years later the monarchy was overthrown, the royal household and the prime minister were massacred, it withdrew from the Baghdad Pact which naturally had to be renamed, it developed closer ties with the Soviet Union, and it played a key role in the reorganization of the petroleum and other resource industries. These things provided a basis for the Western powers to increase their anti-Soviet rhetoric and to continue their policies of playing down the fundamental problem in the Middle East, the trouble in the triangle, and the Cold War was soon edging to new heights instead of being alleviated. They also gave the United States the opportunity that Dulles had been angling for to become more directly involved in the region.

Only two weeks after the last British and French troops withdrew from Port Said, while Israel was firmly in place at Sharm es-Sheikh, and work to clear the canal was still in an early phase, Eisenhower announced his 'Doctrine' for the Middle East. He raised the Cold War tension by a promise of military or economic aid to any Middle Eastern country which might need it to resist Communist aggression. He knew from the Bulganin-Khrushchev visit to London that the Soviet Union had no intention of aggression in the area. But after having forced Egypt to turn to the Soviet Union for arms by refusing to supply it, he and Dulles were able to justify the doctrine on the basis of the threat which the Soviet Union had made to Britain (in a bid to halt its action against Egypt) and to conceal from the wider public the effects of their own action. They took full advantage of the fact that Britain was now seen as intent on supporting Israel and suppressing, rather than supporting, Arab aspirations. That understanding had naturally undermined its relations with the Arabs, and it was an easy matter for the United States to portray itself as the friendly, helpful neighbour in contrast to an arrogant, incompetent and unfriendly Britain. The Doctrine was thus aimed more at extending American influence and at gaining greater access to, and control over, the oil resources of the region than at checking the growth of Soviet influence in the Middle East, but the two issues were intimately related.

The United States administration reckoned it had achieved a coup but in fact it had 'done a Balfour.' It had already picked up the Zionist umbrella which Britain had dropped, in 1948. Now it had followed, in reverse order, with its equivalent of the McMahon correspondence. It had made conflicting undertakings to both the Jews and their Arab neighbours. In doing so it had choreographed a juggling act which it would have to maintain in perpetuity – unless it could do better than Britain, recognize the basis of the trouble in the triangle and move to dismantle it. It had put itself in an equally perpetual state of dependence for its own security on peace and stability in the Middle East. To be able to satisfy its own ambitions – its own greed – it had to ensure that it could do several things all at once. It had to supply Israel and also supply the Arabs with arms at a level which would satisfy them. It had to discourage them all from trading with the Soviet Union. It had to discourage them from throwing their American-supplied weapons at each other. And it had to support its companies in securing all of the oil leases and facilities they wanted. The new policy meant that it was not only the security of Saudi Arabia which was "vital" to the security of the United States. It was the entire region. It follows that such a juggling act will collapse in a heap if one of the four partners in the act – Israel, the Arab states, the US petroleum industry, or the United States administration – steps out of line. It must be assumed that if people in the US administration gave any thought to these relationships they aped Britain 50 years earlier and thought "We're big enough and powerful enough; we can handle any situation which looks like getting out of hand."

This meant that Eisenhower had to be able to either guarantee support and security to every country, and to keep it happy, or be able to suppress tension in any country in the region which did not want to play to his rules. That is rather a tall order at any time, but without integrated bases in enough countries to be able to use one or more at a time, it is a near impossibility. Therefore, with the approval of Congress, Eisenhower proclaimed that he would use the armed forces of the United States to protect the independence of any Middle Eastern country seeking American help. That was short hand for saying “I want land bases everywhere but if I can’t get them I’ll have a big fleet nearby.” The Eisenhower Doctrine was promoted on the basis that it represented no radical change in US policy because under the Truman Doctrine similar support had been pledged to Greece and Turkey ten years earlier. It was said to be a continuation of the American policy of ‘containment’ or resistance to any extension of the Soviet sphere of influence. But it was different, in a couple of respects. Although Greece and Turkey were in a constant state of tension over control of Cyprus, they were both members of NATO, and that encouraged a greater degree of stability in their relationship. In addition, Dulles had already put in place SEATO and the Baghdad Pact which formed an almost unbroken chain with NATO and which were supposed to provide all the ‘containment’ which was necessary. The United States and Britain were both aware that the Suez Crisis had raised tensions which placed Iraq’s continued membership of the Baghdad Pact in doubt and Britain had already been trying to recruit Jordan to strengthen the chain,

However, the outcome in such a situation, as Britain’s troubles had demonstrated, is not dependent upon politics and might of arms. It is dependent on the maintenance of stable human relations. If relationships break down, then everything falls apart. And in the Middle East relationships are dependent on religious belief. Belief and self-understanding. In 1956 the religious issue seemed to have subsided somewhat. The politics of land occupation seemed to be in the forefront of the dispute. But now, in the year 2000, religion is in the forefront again. Circumstantially. And the United States administration is showing no more signs that it understands the trouble in the triangle than Britain did before it. Its conduct bears an uncanny similarity to that of Britain before the Second World War. It has tried every trick in the book to divide and rule; playing one country against another to prevent the formation of cohesive Arab or Muslim alliances, making individual allegiance to the United States the basis of stability. It is trying the Munich ‘bought peace’ technique again, second time round. But that is jumping ahead again.

We are still at the crisis which Britain had to face, and very slowly overcome. Through the Suez adventure it had generated a more uniform level of antagonism towards it that even Hitler faced when he invaded what was left of Czechoslovakia after the Munich carve-up. The Eden Government had succeeded in turning almost the whole world against it. All except the faithful white Christian Anglo-Saxon dominions of the Commonwealth. They were the only ones to stand by it in the final vote when the UN General Assembly said “Quit!” The last curtain was falling for a once great empire. And yet Britain’s unshaken self-understanding as a key player in the amorphous colonial Christian gel is illustrated by Eden’s poignant parting words as he and Lady Eden sailed from Tilbury for a long holiday in New Zealand following his resignation:

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO THE MESSIANIC AGE?

The difference between the West and Egypt has not been colonialism – it is the difference between democracies and a dictatorship. The British people, with their instinctive good sense, have understood that. I am sure they will always understand.³⁸¹

Sir Anthony and Lady Eden were leaving a Britain which was in crisis, and the Middle East was also in crisis. Neither seemed to be in a situation which could be characterized as the Messianic Age. Yet according to the mainstream church the Messianic Age was here and now, and according to Maimonides it would be associated with the establishment of the State of Israel which had already happened, eight years before. Everyone had reason to ask “What has happened to the Messianic Age?”

CHAPTER 30

EMBARGO! NOT FOR WANT OF WARNINGS. NEW ORDER OR DISORDER?

Everything seemed strangely quiet in the Suez Canal Zone during the last days before Christmas, 1956. The last of the British forces had withdrawn from Port Said on the 22nd and block-ship clearing was not due to start until the 27th. The threat of the total expulsion of British and French subjects from Egypt, made in November, had eased. At the height of the crisis about 2,500 out of the 10,000 British subjects, mostly Cypriots and Maltese, and about 3,500 French citizens had been driven out either by direct or indirect means,¹ and significant British and French assets, notably oil facilities, had been sequestered. This pre-Christmas lull meant that most people of the amorphous Christian gel who lived in the Western world could reflect on newspaper photographs of great ships towering majestically over the dunes in a broad expanse of desert - going nowhere - while they settled down to the serious business of celebrating the birth of the second person of their Triune God. That man, Jesus of Nazareth, had been born not far from where the worst of the Sinai-Suez War fighting had been - about 180 miles as the crow flies - and, according to Christian tradition, he passed through the area twice as a child. The first time he was babe in arms. His mother, Mary, and her husband - the baby's step-father - Joseph were fleeing from their home for the protection of the baby because Joseph had been warned in a dream that the Roman-appointed king of the Jews, Herod, was searching for him to kill him. Herod's reason was that stories were circulating that the baby was a future king of the Jews. That sort of story could lead to a lot of unrest because the Jews were already pressing for their independence from Rome, and stories of a child born by divine intervention to be king in a community which had all sorts of messianic expectations could well spark open rebellion. The second time, he was a toddler, probably about three or four, because Joseph and Mary stayed in Egypt until after Herod died.

If that tradition is true, then it is most likely that the family crossed the region where the Suez canal now stands and where the British had battled the Arab Egyptians for control of the Canal Zone. The main area of earlier Palestinian migration and settlement was a little further west, in the area of Goshen, between the Sea of Reeds and the Nile, where Abraham and his tribe were thought to have travelled before settling at Hebron; where Joseph's family probably settled; and from where Moses may have led Israel out of bondage in the Exodus. But Christian's didn't talk much about that rather vague piece of history at Christmas. They preferred to focus on Bethlehem. And people did not talk much about Jesus and Jews in the same breath if they could avoid it; nor about Israel and Egypt. It was all too sensitive. It could get highly emotional and political. The World Council of Churches had found that - for the second time at successive assemblies - when it met at Evanston on the shore of Lake Michigan, near Chicago, in the second half of August, 1954. That was only two weeks after Britain had succumbed to United States pressure and signed an agreement to quit its military bases in the Suez Canal Zone. (Chapter 29)

At its first assembly, in 1948, it had been persuaded not to put the question of Israel and Middle East conflict on its agenda. (Chapter 28) Now it had happened again. Not only was it left off the agenda as a separate item, but when the assembly's report on its main theme, 'Christ is the Hope of the World', the decision was taken, quite deliberately after some fairly forceful debate, to delete reference to Israel from the draft statement. After only six years of operation the assembly was more concerned about reviewing the work of the first six years and refining the structure of the WCC for best effect over the next six or seven years. It had planned to resolve the unfinished business from the first assembly: the contentious issue of its constitution and basis for membership or, in other words, its answer to the question: 'what is a Christian?'. The Central Committee had received a number of submissions during the years since Amsterdam, and an additional one was received from the Church of Norway too late to be added to the business papers for the assembly. The decision was therefore taken to leave the matter in the 'too-hard basket' until the next assembly, and at Evanston a simple statement on the purpose of a 'basis for membership' was adopted. The formal effect was to maintain the status quo: the WCC was definitely a traditional Trinitarian Christian body. But an informal effect was to relax the rigidity a trifle by regarding the basis of membership as "less than a confession [but] much more than a mere formula or agreement."²

The group of theologians who drafted the assembly statement on its main theme included in it references to Christ being the hope of Israel as well as the rest of the world, and the relationship between the church and its parent faith. It proved more than a little contentious. African delegates objected to the tendency to Euro-centricity in the statement and there was debate over whether Christ was a sign of something "coming" or already here. The Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem wanted the statement modified because in that city "every statement about Israel was apt to become bitterly controversial" and he emphasized that "many hopes other than that of Israel were fulfilled by Christ's coming." A Coptic delegate proposed the deletion of all reference to Israel "in view of the special political problems vexing the Near East." Other delegates also referred to the "possible political implications" and queried whether references to Israel referred to ancient Israel, Israel scattered, or to Israel as a single state. The World Council of Churches was in just as big a bind over Israel and Christian-Jewish relations as the Vatican. Dr. Berkhof, from Holland, one of the drafters, said it had to be noted that "Jesus Christ was born of Israel as fulfilment of the promises God gave to His people [and] the Epistle to the Romans meant that Christians looked to Israel in a special spiritual sense." There were therefore no political implications in the statement as drafted, he said. When the report was voted on, it was amended by the deletion of the section referring to Israel: 195 votes to 150. As a consequence, being very concerned at the theological implications rather than the political, a group of 24 delegates including Pastors Marc Boegner and Martin Niemöller signed and submitted a statement on the hope of Israel.³ Their statement, which is included in full in the notes, read in part:⁴

The New Testament, however, speaks also of the “fullness” of Israel, when God will manifest His glory by brining back His “eldest son” into the one fold of His grace (Rom 11:12-36; Matt. 23:29) This belief is an indispensable element of our one united hope for Jew and Gentile in Jesus Christ. Our hope in Christ’s coming victory includes our hope for Israel in Christ, in His victory over the blindness of His own people. To expect Jesus Christ means to hope for the conversion of the Jewish people, and to love Him means to love the people of God’s promise.

In view of the grievous guilt of Christian people towards the Jews throughout the history of the Church, we are certain that: the Church cannot rest until the title of Christ to the Kingdom is recognized by His own people according to the flesh.⁵

We cannot be one in Christ nor can we truly believe and witness to the promise of God if we do not recognize that it is still valid for the people of the promise made to Abraham. Therefore we invite all men to join with us in praising and magnifying that God who “concluded them all in unbelief that He might have mercy upon all (Rom. 11:32).

So it was quite apparent that most Christians in the Western World were trying not to think too much about the theology of Christmas in 1956, while others of their number were settling down to the even more serious business of doing what they did best: exploiting the people and the resources of the non-Western world. However it was a temporary quietness.

On the other hand, as Christmas approached, some people were involved in matters of faith and exploitation in a different manner. In the South Africa of J.G. Strijdom, successor to Dr. Malan, where the National Party government insisted that its Apartheid laws were all based on the Gospel, 156 senior officials of the African National Congress and trade unions, plus academics and other key supporters of the Anti-Apartheid Movement had been arrested on December 9 and charged with treason for being involved in an international Communist-inspired conspiracy to overthrow the government by violence. They were acquitted of those particular offences when the court found the charges of violent intent and Communist infiltration of the ANC not proved, but the government had plenty of other nets ready to catch them. Among them was a man named Nelson Mandela.

And another man who had reason to celebrate after dicing with death was Fidel Castro, one of only 12 Cubans to survive out of 81 who had landed on their island state a week earlier in an unsuccessful bid to launch an armed uprising against the corrupt dictatorship of Fulgencio Batista. Castro and Ernesto (Che) Guevara, who would both soon become household names in the United States, retreated into the Sierra Maestra with their surviving colleagues to wage guerrilla warfare against the Batista forces. With the help of growing numbers of revolutionary volunteers, Castro's small forces won a string of victories over Batista's demoralized and poorly led armed forces which had been propped up by the United States since Batista seized power in 1952. Castro's campaign was largely a propaganda war waged through American media, and with growing disenchantment in the United States a new ambassador to Havana was ordered to preside over Batista's demise. Two years after Castro's landing, in March 1958 the United States suspended arms sales to Cuba.

That was a signal from the White House that although the United States was trenchantly opposed to Communists, even if they came to power through free choice and free elections, there were some right wing dictators who also went too far. But three months later there was a different message promulgated by the Vatican. On June 29, Pius XII issued the encyclical Ad Apostolorum Principis (To the leaders of the Apostles) calling on Chinese Catholics to resist the control of the Beijing government - a government which had come to power with overwhelming popular support as a result of the abuses of another right wing dictator. The letter was not announced until after it had been smuggled into China.⁶ Naturally the Chinese Communist government reacted against such a message, and two weeks later, on July 14, Pius XII issued another encyclical: Meminisse Juvat, Prayers for Peace and for the Persecuted Church.⁷ It was to be his last. He died on October 9, after dominating the world's religious affairs for a lot longer than the nineteen and a half critical years of his pontificate, being Vatican secretary of state for nine years of Pius XI's reign. (Chapters 20 & 21.)

On January 25 the next year, 1959, and just as Castro was moving house to Havana, Pius XII's successor, Pope John XXIII, stunned the world by announcing that he would convoke a council of the world-wide Catholic Church. Could it be that the new pope, having quite a different background to Pius XII, had realized the implications of the Balfour Declaration, Mein Kampf, the establishment of the State of Israel, and the establishment of the World Council of Churches? His path to the papacy was not via the Vatican hierarchy. He had served in Communist Bulgaria, Orthodox Greece and Muslim Turkey - he was there for most of the Second World War - as well as in France as papal nuncio, and in his most recent role as patriarch of Venice he had shown more interest in empowering people than Vatican officials. That breadth of human experience showed when he summoned the church to meet in council at the Vatican. There had not been a council of the church since 1869 when Vatican I determined papal primacy and infallibility. In the view of many members of the hierarchy that made any further councils quite unnecessary because the Vatican had all the power it needed to run the church as it saw fit. In their view, to hold a council in an atmosphere of multiple challenges to the status and authority of the church could only draw more attention to those challenges, give them legitimacy, and weaken the authority of the church as God's earthly administrator. The convoking of a council was therefore quite divisive, and two distinct 'schools' developed. Put simply, one school said 'let's assess the challenges and respond as we see appropriate' and the other said 'let's put the shutters up and repel the challenge!'⁸ But as author Edward Stourton points out, there is no single document which sets out the reasons behind John XXIII's decision.

It is said that the idea first came to him during a briefing from his Secretary of State: as Cardinal Tardini went through the day's reports from the Vatican diplomatic service, painting a grim picture of a world in turmoil, the Pope was inspired by the notion that a full Council of the Church - something that had taken place only twice in the previous five hundred years - would enable it to engage with the problems of the twentieth century. But the vague and lukewarm way in which his cardinals and the Curia, the Vatican bureaucracy, initially responded to it suggests that many of them saw it as the dream of a slightly dotty old man. John had been chosen, after all, to serve as a 'transitional pope' - the papa di passaggio. When he told eighteen of his curial cardinals of his plans on 25 January at the church of St Paul's Without the Walls, they were so astonished that they were reduced to silence - 'Too moved and too happy to utter a word,' one of them explained later, rather unconvincingly - and the official organ of the Vatican, Osservatore Romano, broke the news to the world in a statement so terse that it was almost lost between the announcement of a diocesan synod for the clergy of Rome and plans to update canon law. But the calling of the Council was a recognition of the fact that now, with the hindsight of three decades, seems blindingly obvious: the Church and the world around it were moving in steadily different directions, and however healthy the Church may have appeared on the surface, its intellectual mindset was simply not sustainable in the long-term.⁹

So it looked as if the church might be about to develop a new self-understanding and a new relationship with the world when Castro entered Havana as a hero, able to do so without as much as a token battle. It was a moment in history that the world would soon have good reason to remember. Castro was not interested in restrictive trade practices. He had a country to run. He had to pick it up by the bootstraps and overcome a long history of exploitation and the abuse of human rights, he was in a hurry and he had inherited a treasury which had been stripped bare! He wanted the best trade deals that he could get for Cuba and he knew that it was being ripped off by the petroleum pricing policies of the major oil companies. Russia was prepared to supply oil to Cuba on a barter basis in return for sugar. No cash needed to change hands. And the transfer value was substantially lower than the prices the companies were charging themselves, under their transfer pricing agreements, for oil from other sources. Castro told the oil companies to accept and to process Russian crude oil. They refused. They were going to make less profit, and besides that, it was contrary to the United States foreign policy of isolating the Soviet Union from world trade. But Castro was not to be trifled with. He got all dictatorial and told them to process Russian crude or take the consequences. They still refused, so he expropriated the facilities of Exxon, Texaco and Shell, and declared that henceforth he would work to a Marxist policy. The United States was perfectly comfortable working with dictators. It was setting them up elsewhere and proving that democracy was a luxury that a country could only have if it suited the United States. But dictatorship was one thing and having the audacity to expropriate large American property holdings - especially oil assets - was quite a different thing.

Castro's attitude towards the oil industry was not a new experience for them. During the 1950s the oil producing countries had each gained confidence and, following the lead of Venezuela in 1943, moved towards a more appropriate level of royalties and profit sharing schemes to provide revenue for development. They had to battle the companies and their governments every inch of the way. Each was on its own because there was not yet a producers' group to provide co-ordination, and they were being played off, each against the others. And in the wake of the nationalization of the Suez Canal by Egypt and the Sinai-Suez War, Egypt had sequestrated British and French oil production assets as well. The disease was spreading. Rapidly. Indonesia nationalized all oil concessions in the country, but not the companies' operations. The fields had been allowed to run down during the period of politicking, Japan stepped in, with its companies agreeing to rehabilitate the fields and to a new schedule of imports. At about the same time, China introduced interest free credits for Third World Countries in spite of its own economic problems. The West was certainly not winning the credibility stakes in the Third World and a young Senator, John F. Kennedy, knew it. He made the establishment of a corps of American Volunteers to work in Third World countries a plank in his platform as a candidate for the Presidency. Following his election in November the plan was put into effect with the establishment a Youth Peace Corps. It was not the first such volunteer program, but with the resources at Kennedy's disposal it was very soon the biggest.

Indonesia's oil field nationalization decision was basically a response to the US decision in March 1959 to impose restrictions on oil imports and to boost local production in a bid to further force down the royalties and taxes which foreign countries could demand. The collusion between the US government and its oil industry, and between US-controlled companies and the British and European companies, was palpable. Using the excuse that they had to sell their increasing foreign production in the more highly competitive European market – which they controlled and were selling into anyway – the companies had already reduced posted prices twice to cut payments to the various governments under the new profit sharing arrangements. BP led the first price cut in February, 1959. In fact from late 1957 and through 1958, in spite of small increases made following the reopening of the Suez Canal, Middle East crude was being delivered to the US East Coast ports at prices from 60 to 80 cents per barrel less than crude produced in the United States.¹⁰ Therefore the country which had been affected most drastically was Venezuela, because it was more heavily dependent upon the adjacent, and dominant, United States market than the Middle East countries which had established and more direct access to the alternative European markets. The Venezuelan government therefore established a Coordinating Commission for the Conservation and Commerce of Hydrocarbons within its Ministry of Mines and Hydrocarbons, and the oil minister, Perez Alfonzo, embarked on a round of urgent discussions with Arab oil producing countries at the time of the Arab Petroleum Congress in Cairo in April 1959. His most noteworthy contact was the Saudi Arabian Director General (later Minister) of Petroleum and Mineral Affairs, Abdullah Al-Tariki.¹¹

In May 1960, after a round of discussions with other governments, Alfonzo and Tariki issued a joint declaration in Caracas. It contained the basis of a proposal for an international petroleum agreement which, they said, would be adhered to by Venezuela, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Iraq and Kuwait. It envisaged that the growth of production would be geared to the growth of demand and prorated among the signatory countries primarily on the basis of proved reserves, but with special provision being made for the participants' current market position and for new oil discoveries in participating countries or new areas. The plan had already been unveiled at the annual meeting of the Texas Independent Producers and Royalty Owners' Association (TIPRO) where Alfonzo had said that the keynote of Venezuela's oil policy was conservation "as a means of stretching out our reserves over the longest period of time." The country's dependence on oil forced it to hope for an annual production increase, but the government did not want production to rise proportionately to what was regarded as the country's current share of world demand. World demand, Alfonzo said, was expected to rise at a rate of seven per cent, and if Venezuela planned for an annual increase of four per cent, there would be an important share of the international market available to other producers.¹² The oil companies were "aghast" at the prospect of losing their grip on their biggest price bargaining chip: control of production levels and sources. The propaganda onslaught began immediately to raise public opposition to these dastardly schemes to disadvantage other producing countries and to hold the consumers of the Western world to ransom. Strong pressure was applied to dissuade the other major producer, Iran, and other countries in the Middle East and Africa, such as Nigeria, from joining the plan. The contrast between the producer-governments' attitude of 'let's conserve it and use it responsibly' and the oil industry's attitude of 'let's rip it out and get a fast buck for it' was made all the more stark by the publication of Vance Packard's book The Waste Makers. Much of the waste and irresponsible use of resources to which Packard drew attention pivoted around the excessive use of products from the petro-chemicals industries.

This may appear to have little to do with Cuba, but on the basis that Indonesia's nationalization decision had been encouraged by Cuba's stand, even though it was not a direct consequence of it, and the fact that Cuba was bringing in Russian oil gave the United States another stick with which to beat Cuba in the propaganda war. Sympathy for Cuba in the United States quickly evaporated. Castro sought Soviet aid and was soon forced into reliance on it when, in retaliation, the United States curtailed Cuba's sugar import quota in July 1960. Having only recently disposed of a right-wing dictator Eisenhower then chose to be consistent. He instructed the CIA to explore means of removing Castro on the grounds that he was harbouring a Soviet presence uncomfortably close to the United States. Cuba had become embroiled in the Cold War and the arms race.

The Soviet Union had stolen a march on the United States in the application of satellite technology and it had received quite a boost to its international standing in October 1957 when it launched Sputnik 1, the first artificial earth satellite. Then five months later, in March 1958, it offered to suspend all nuclear tests if the West did likewise. That led to an international conference of experts who recommended, in August, that stations should be set up to monitor nuclear tests, and in October the three major nuclear powers of the day, the United States, the Soviet Union and Britain, agreed to suspend all nuclear testing. However Britain and the US refused to cooperate fully until they had completed their catch-up round of planned tests, and there were plenty of unnerving developments in international affairs which enabled them to justify continuing competitive development. One, coinciding with China's Great Leap Forward program,¹³ in August, caused much concern in the West.

Portrayed in the West as the start of China's push for world supremacy rather than as a continuation of the conflict between the Chinese Communist government and the Chinese Nationalists on Taiwan, it began with an intense bombardment of two islands, Quemoy and Matsu, only 10 to 15 miles from the mainland coast, which were held by Nationalist China. It was essentially a bid by Communist China to coerce the Soviet Union into supporting its claim to the major island of Taiwan, and the war of words was nowhere near its peak. Chiang Kai-shek sought to use the incident to coerce the USA into supporting an invasion of the mainland. The Soviet Union pledged to defend mainland China, and the US 7th fleet re-supplied Chiang's forces on the islands. Three months later, in November, a bid to prevent the escalation of conflict with Taiwan, Khrushchev advised Mao Tse-tung at a summit meeting that the Soviet Union would not share its missile technology, and that it would maintain direct control of any warheads sent to China. Similarly, the US chose not to get further involved, and in line with the earlier negotiations, a one-year Nuclear Test-ban Treaty took effect. It was the first real glimmer of hope that the Cold War might be abating.¹⁴ But then there were more incidents in Berlin and Khrushchev issued an ultimatum that all Western troops should be withdrawn from the city immediately.

In spite of that there was some encouragement for the view that the Cold War was easing in the new year, 1959, when Khrushchev, confirming the policy he had already made clear to Mao, refused to deliver nuclear warheads to China. But that decision, aggravated by United States policy, brought a terse response. China announced that it would not remain dependent on others and would develop its own nuclear arsenal. Competition for leadership of the Communist world community between the Soviet Union and China, which as already noted, the United States was doing all it could to encourage, split the Communist world. The Soviet Union, already being deliberately demonized and isolated from world affairs by the United States, was in a very invidious position. It was sandwiched between the nuclear-armed NATO countries and China. China was being goaded by the United States into becoming increasingly independent and belligerent, yet one of the key factors in its attitude was the fact that the Soviet Union would not support it in its struggle with the United States and the other Western powers. The United States, on the basis of Dulles' policies, was using fear of a blowup between China and the Soviet Union to entice more Asian and African countries into its camp, and the hawks in American politics then utilized both that fear and the claim of responsibility for international defence to push for greater and greater armaments. And in all this, the Soviet Union was hemmed in by Dulles' Baghdad Pact and SEATO to the south.

Then the scene changed again. Dulles, terminally ill with cancer, resigned as Secretary of State. He died on May 24. Eisenhower immediately took a more active role in foreign affairs, changed emphasis significantly, using personal diplomacy in a bid to reverse the escalation of the arms race and invited Khrushchev to visit the United States. But the effects of eight years of deliberate provocation, isolation of the Soviet Union, and divide and rule tactics through the establishment of a chain of buffer pacts had been dramatic and could not be that easily reversed. The concept of Asian-African solidarity which had been demonstrated at the Bandung Conference became less and less meaningful, even though cohesion was still evident in the deliberations of the United Nations, and major schisms among the sponsors of the original conference began to emerge. When China and Indonesia, which was in the process of adopting a system of 'guided democracy,' pressed for a second Asian-African conference, India, together with Yugoslavia and the United Arab Republic (Egypt), succeeded in organizing rival conferences of nonaligned states that refused to take the strong anti-Western positions urged by China. And President Sukarno, in Indonesia, decided to go his own way. In July, by presidential decree, he reinstated the 1945 constitution, dissolved the legislature and proceeded to appoint a military-dominated legislature and to govern through "guided democracy." The government declared five principles of belief - the Pancasila (belief in one God, nationalism, humanitarianism, democracy and social justice) - to be the national ideology and the basis of national life. A government-sponsored nonpartisan organization, Golkar, became Sukarno's electoral power base.

As time past it appeared less and less likely that another conference of the Bandung pattern would ever be held. An important factor in the deterioration of Afro-Asia relations was the intense politicking and rivalry over the role and membership of the Baghdad Pact. This was exacerbated by Britain's abortive Suez adventure and the immediate announcement of the Eisenhower Doctrine. In July, two and a half years after the Suez debacle, the monarchy and the corrupt pro-British and anti-Soviet government in Iraq were overthrown in the first of three coups, each five years apart. The new military government withdrew from the Baghdad Pact which could hardly remain named after the capital of country which had withdrawn. It was renamed CENTO.

A factor in that internal and very bloody¹⁵ Iraqi coup was the fact that the CIA had revisited Syria, in full accord with Britain's views,¹⁶ eight months after the earlier planned coup had to be aborted when Israel launched its attack against Egypt to start the Sinai-Suez War. (Chapter 29) The second alleged coup attempt, planned in June to August 1957, was also aborted - when it was exposed. Syrian army officers who claimed that they had been recruited and assigned major roles in a plot to reinstate a former right-wing dictator, Adib Shishakly, walked into the office of the head of Syrian intelligence services, handed over their bribe money, and named as their CIA contacts the US military attaché, vice consul, and second secretary for political affairs. The State Department claimed that the whole exercise was a fabrication and retaliated to the expulsion of its three diplomats by expelling the Syrian ambassador and one other officer.¹⁷ The evidence to support the Syrian claims of a planned coup is strong, but even if it was a fabrication, the two events in quick succession in Syria and Iraq illustrate the level to which their relationships with the United States had fallen and the impossibility of the Eisenhower Doctrine working.

So: there were plenty of agenda items for Khrushchev's visit, in September, 1959, and the Khrushchev-Eisenhower discussions at Camp David reduced the international tension significantly and were regarded as a personal success for both leaders. They agreed on another summit in eight months, in May 1960. However, in February, the Chinese observer at the Warsaw Pact meeting announced that any arms agreements reached at the planned US-USSR summit would not be binding on China, and Mao undermined Khrushchev's efforts to repair the Sino-Soviet relationship by condemning his efforts at détente as vile revisionism. In doing so he confirmed China's willingness to confront nuclear war from a position of strength. In the light of Mao's trenchant attack on his policy, Khrushchev's ability to negotiate at his second summit meeting with Eisenhower, in Paris, was further undermined on the eve of the meeting when a US U-2 spy plane was shot down over the USSR and Eisenhower admitted that such flights had been operating for four years. But, being more concerned than ever about the deteriorating relationships, the Soviet Union withdrew all of its military specialists from China in July, even knowing that its move was likely to trigger another backlash. France's decision to detonate its first nuclear bomb in September had only heightened international tension.

Four months after the second Khrushchev-Eisenhower summit the oil ministers of Venezuela, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Iraq and Kuwait met and, after five days of consultation, formally constituted the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC). The diplomatic pressure of the United States which had been responsible for putting the Shah back on his Peacock Throne in 1953, and the commercial pressure of the oil companies had failed to keep him out of the organization. What was just as bad, OPEC had met for the first time in Baghdad, capital of the country which had withdrawn from the anti-Soviet southern buffer pact. There was another burst of propaganda about how nasty these governments were, getting together to fix prices and exploit the energy users of the world, as if that was their motivation. In fact the amoral and exploitative conduct of the oil companies over a very long period (chapter 19) had forced those countries to overcome some of their differences which were largely linked to the divide and rule policies of first Britain, and then the United States.

The amazing sequence of events between the two world wars, in which the Government of the USA and its oil companies had out manoeuvred the British and French to gain concessions in the region, and in which the former member companies of the Standard Oil group had achieved the impossible – domination of the Middle East - had been capped in 1937 by an event in Qatar. The Anglo-Iranian Oil Company (formerly the Anglo-Persian) had negotiated concessions in Qatar, but the Americans intervened under the Red Line Agreement and the concession was transferred to the IPC. Eight years later, with the Second World War over, new fields were brought into production in the Middle East and across North Africa in quick succession. The main interest of the British and French was to ensure adequate supplies and national security. However the Americans grasped the opportunity to rationalize their production around the world, to discontinue exporting from the massive reserves of the USA, and to exploit foreign oil resources to supply their affiliates around the world. By manipulating production from country to country they succeeded in depressing foreign crude oil prices below those for indigenous crude in the USA and reaped quite massive profits at the well-head.

Industrial development was taking place around the world at a great pace – very largely due to petroleum – and those countries which had granted concessions between the two world wars realized that they were not appropriate to the new circumstances and sought to re-negotiate them. Their demands were quite moderate, such as small increases in royalties, guaranteed minimum returns to enable proper budgeting for development programs, improved labour conditions and things of that nature, but the oil barons said NO! Every country received a few kicks but the most brutally treated was Iran. Iran's failed efforts in 1948 to re-negotiate the 1933 agreement with Anglo-Iranian led to the public pressure for nationalization which forced the Shah to appoint Mosaddeq as prime minister and to agree to the nationalization. The confrontation with the British Government (chapter 28) resulted in the industry shutdown and Iran faced a lengthy constitutional crisis and economic collapse. America went through the motions of assisting in negotiations between Britain and Iran but the oil industry closed ranks, took vigorous action to increase production in neighbouring Iraq, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, and set about starving Iran into submission. Iran was to serve as an example to its neighbours that they should not attempt any further nationalizations. However the consequences of the parody of Mein Kampf were such that the British Government, the controlling shareholder in Anglo-Iranian, had become just another pawn in the game. When Iran's oil industry was reactivated after a catastrophic break of three and a half years it was an international consortium with 40 per cent American interest which was holding the reins.

In spite of that experience, the other major Middle East oil producers knew that the Shah's support for OPEC could not be taken for granted. In fact he had not intended to join it, and the other founding members knew that without his support the organization would have no teeth. He was politically dependent on the United States; he was relying on oil revenues to restore Iran's economic and social well being and to recover the position of Middle East leadership which he had lost in 1951. He was therefore opposed to the prorationing scheme sponsored by Venezuela and Saudi Arabia. He was the titular head of Shî'a Islam while most of his neighbours were Sunni-dominated, and his political relations with Iran's Arab neighbours were "decidedly shaky." He was literally pushed into joining by another critical example of the exploitative conduct of the oil companies and their Western governments only weeks before the founding meeting of OPEC. Responding to pressure from their Western governments to do something to check inflation, in which oil prices are a significant factor, and wanting to maximize their profits at every link in the fuel service chain from drill hole, through transport and refining to petrol pump, the companies cut their posted prices for crude oil for the second time in quick succession - without even consulting the producer governments whose main revenues they were reducing. The Shah's response put the situation clearly.

If the companies which produce our oil do not come and discuss the market situation with us, but cut our revenues without opening their books to us, what are we to think? The question is that we should not be left with the feeling that everything is being hidden from us. This is *important for two reasons. First, the government has to know what revenues it can count on for its budgetary and economic development planning. Second, as owners of the oil, we must be treated as equal partners. The companies must realize that this is for their own good.*¹⁸

OPEC's first few years were not spectacular. The member governments concentrated on consolidating profit sharing through revised taxation arrangements, on developing confidence among its members, and on achieving an identification of interests and needs of all Third World countries. They were all in the same boat - just dealing with different resources or commodities, but all being played each against the others.

But the world was not sitting waiting for OPEC to make a move. It was pressing on with its Cold War. The United States attempted to overthrow Castro in Cuba, by an invasion at the Bay of Pigs on April 15, 1961. An invasion had been planned by since May 1960, within months of the expropriation of the American oil companies' assets, and the wisdom of going ahead with it had been debated within the newly inaugurated administration of President John F. Kennedy before it was finally approved. The action opened with three American planes, piloted by Cubans, bombing Cuban air bases, then two days later Cubans trained by the United States and using US equipment, landed at several sites, the most important of which was the Bay of Pigs. The invasion force was routed in a two-day fiasco and more than 1,100 prisoners were taken. The Kennedy administration backed attempts to ransom the prisoners, but the efforts of the Tractors for Freedom Committee, headed by Eleanor Roosevelt, failed to raise the $28,000,000 needed for heavy-construction equipment demanded by Castro as reparations but Castro agreed after some months to release the prisoners in exchange for food and medical supplies valued at $53 million.¹⁹ Against that backdrop Khrushchev and Kennedy met in Vienna on June 4.

Two weeks later, on June 19, 1961, Britain recognized the independence of one of its small protectorates in the Persian Gulf, Kuwait.²⁰ However only six days later, Iraq renewed its claim, first made in 1938, to the territory on the basis that it was the successor to the Ottoman Empire. Its claim was rebuffed by first British, then Arab League forces, but it left it on the record for later 'consideration.'²¹ That event caused little interest at the time, but the construction of the Berlin Wall by East German Communist authorities, which began on August 12, to prevent movement from East to West certainly did. It would remain a physical barrier and, for the West, a symbol of the ideological barrier between East and West which it would exploit for propaganda value with devastating effectiveness for 28 years.

That situation meant that when the World Council of Churches met for its Third Assembly, in New Delhi in November, international affairs were given a higher profile than at the previous two assemblies. The report of the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs (CCIA) was a major item in the assembly's business. It covered international peace and security; disarmament and nuclear tests; the responsibilities of non-aligned countries; the changing structure of the international community; the problems of new and developing countries; human rights and religious liberty; and a substantial coverage of regional flash points around the world - "areas of special concern in the present world" - among which were included Berlin, the Congo, Angola, Algeria, Vietnam, Laos, Korea, Cuba and the Dominican Republic. The report noted that: "of these Berlin seems to be the most dangerous, though the potential danger in Vietnam is also regarded as very real."²² But there was no mention of Israel or the Middle East in general. The silence was deafening.

The executive staff were well aware of the situation and were, in fact, working on some aspects of it, notably a very well organized refugee service, focussed on Lebanon, which received strong financial support from churches and philanthropic organizations in North America. They had also made possible the establishment of an ecumenical centre for training for ministry in young countries, at Château de Bossey, near Geneva, Switzerland. The principal benefactor had been John D. Rockefeller Jnr who offered $2 million towards the establishment of the centre in February 1946, subject to his grant being matched by a similar amount raised by mission boards. Within a few months nine North American Mission Boards had raised the matching amount between them, and the centre was opened in September that year, a couple of months after the WCC's main new development of the summer months, the setting up of the Commission of the Churches on international Affairs.²³ But over the life of three assemblies since the coincidental establishment of both the State of Israel and the World Council of Churches there had been no formal or informal reports submitted to the world assembly. The unspoken embargo was palpable. Influential figures were intent on making sure that the issue did not go to the assembly, even though there was, quite obviously, a third war brewing as a follow-up to those of 1948 and 1956, and the world had done nothing to help resolve the fundamental issues swirling in the bottom of the cauldron of broken interfaith and ethnic relations which was the Middle East. Every self-interested move which the great Western powers took further aggravated the tensions, but the only approach which either the United States or Britain understood, or cared to implement, was to jam the lid tighter and tighter on the kettle. Discussion of the crisis was a no-no. The decision by the previous assembly to even delete a theological reference to it, on political grounds, has been noted above.

At this assembly the WCC reached some significant decisions which had been in the pipeline for some time. It confirmed the integration of the International Missionary Council and the World Council of Churches; it adopted very progressive statements on religious liberty and racial and ethnic relations; it adopted a strong statement on anti-Semitism; and it finally adopted a revised statement on the basis of the Council's membership;. That statement was still strongly Trinitarian, but it was clear, precise, it had the overwhelming support of existing members which was shown by a vote of 383 in favour and only 36 against, with 7 abstentions. Two things were certain: everyone had confirmation that the entire mainstream Christian church was Trinitarian and undivided in that respect, and there was a basis for closer cooperation with the Vatican and the Orthodox churches. That cooperation was being assisted by Pope John XXIII who approved the attendance at the assembly of five Vatican observers. The new 'basis' of membership and operations read:

The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the Scriptures and therefore seek to fulfil together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit.²⁴

The statement on anti-Semitism was prepared in response to fresh incidents of anti-Semitism in Germany and elsewhere and it submitted through the Policy Reference Committee, not the CCIA. It read:

The Third Assembly recalls the following words which were addressed to the churches by the First Assembly of the World Council of Churches in 1948:

We call upon all the churches we represent to denounce anti-semitism, no matter what its origin, as absolutely irreconcilable with the profession and practice of the Christian faith. Anti-Semitism is sin against God and man. Only as we give convincing evidence to our Jewish neighbours that we seek for them the common rights and dignities which God wills for his children, can we come to such a meeting with them as would make it possible to share with them the best which God has given us in Christ.

The Assembly renews this plea in view of the fact that situations continue to exist in which Jews are subject to discrimination and even persecution. The Assembly urges its member churches to do all in their power to resist every form of anti-Semitism. In Christian teaching the historic events which led to the Crucifixion should not be so presented as to fasten upon the Jewish people of today responsibilities which belong to our corporate humanity and not to one race or community. Jews were the first to accept Jesus and Jews are not the only ones who do not yet recognize him.²⁵

In spite of the promise of a break in the Cold War as a result of the summit meetings, fear and apprehension was deepened when full scale production of Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles (ICBMs) began early the new year, 1962. These were designed to be either sited in heavily protected underground silos or launched from submarines with the intention of “enhancing” strike power while reducing dependence on long-range bombers.

And people were hardly accustomed to that thought when they learned on February 6 that the American Military Assistance Command had been established in South Vietnam and the number of US advisers was to be rapidly increased from 700 to 12,000. That could only mean that war was in the offing and that was what people also feared later in the year when United States failed relations with Cuba led to the Cuban Missile Crisis. The United States learned in July that the Soviet Union had begun shipping missiles to the island and the presence of Soviet technicians was reported soon after by US U-2 spy planes. Then the presence of a ballistic missile on a launching site was reported on October 14. It was too close to home! The people of Europe had to live with them, waiting for someone to trip over a telephone wire or something, but Americans did not want them in their back yard! Such missiles could hit much of the eastern United States within a few minutes of being launched. Eight days later, on October 22, Kennedy announced that the island was being “quarantined” and warned that US forces would seize “offensive weapons and associated matériel” that Soviet vessels might attempt to deliver to Cuba.

Khrushchev’s view had been that if the United States had its missiles as close as that to Moscow, then he was being negligent in defensive or retaliatory preparation if he did not place similar weapons the same distance from New York and Washington. He was not expecting any provocative action from the European powers. They knew that all hell would be let loose around them if they did. It was the United States which had mounted and maintained the barrier of three pacts around Russia and was doing its damndest to impose economic isolation to undermine the Soviet economy. It was the United States which had ultimate control of the buttons on the weapons in Europe, not the host countries. But it was so far away that it was at the least risk of attack. If the balance of terror theory which the United States had devised was going to be really valid, then the United States had to be subject to the same risk.²⁶

However at that point there was an intervention of a very unexpected kind. Concerned at the possible consequences of the crisis, an American Jewish newspaper editor, Norman Cousins of the Saturday review, and a Belgian Dominican, Felix Morlion, who were attending a conference together contacted the Vatican and asked that the pope issue an appeal for peace. John XXIII was rather pre-occupied with other matters at that moment, but he agreed, provided that both the Soviet and US leaders agreed in advance to such a plea being issued. Khrushchev gave his consent quickly. The White House agreed to a general appeal, provided that Kennedy’s prior consent to the appeal remained secret. The plea was issued on the 25th, and published by Pravda on October 26 under the heading “We beg all rulers not to be deaf to the cry of humanity.” Discussions occurred through intermediaries. Cousins was briefed by Cardinal Bea at the Vatican then travelled to Moscow for more than three hours of discussions with Khrushchev. What followed was more like religious negotiation than a Cuban Crisis intervention.

The memorandum of principal points of his discussions with Khrushchev which Cousins presented to the pope read: 1) Russia desires the pope’s mediation, and Khrushchev agrees that it should not be limited to mediation in moments of crisis, but should be a continuous action by the pope in the cause of peace; 2) Khrushchev affirms that he wants to open lines of communication with the Vatican through private contacts; 3) Khrushchev acknowledges that the Church respects the principle of the division of church and state in many countries; 4) Khrushchev acknowledges that the Church serves all human beings for the sacred values of life and is not only concerned with Catholics; 5) Khrushchev acknowledges that the pope has acted with great courage, considering the internal problems that he faces, just as Khrushchev has internal problems in the Soviet Union.²⁷

Whether or not Kennedy’s tactic would have worked without the Cousins-Morlion initiative may never be known - unless Kennedy left some as-yet unpublished notes of his intentions - but it was one of the more productive exercises in papal intervention, and it can only have improved the prospects for future emigration for Jews in the Soviet Union and better relations between Jews and Christians. The fact that in his circumstances John XXIII was prepared to respond immediately to an overture from a Jew was a clear indication that he was ready to take the church in a new direction. On October 28 Khrushchev advised Kennedy that work on the missile sites would halt and that missiles already in Cuba would be returned to the Soviet Union. Kennedy, in turn, committed the United States never to invade Cuba (although he said nothing about halting subversion or attempted coups) and he secretly promised to withdraw the nuclear-armed missiles that the United States had stationed in Turkey in previous years - the things which had made Turkey so uneasy at the time of the Suez crisis. But Cuba to Washington, Turkey to Moscow, and West Germany to Moscow were all the same distance, so the United States still had the upper hand. And the Soviet Union's troubles were far from over. China formally split with the Soviet Union over its readiness to bow to the West.

VATICAN II: FIRST SESSION

The reason for John XXIII's preoccupation was that at that time another of the more productive exercises in papal intervention - a quite remarkable exercise with potential to dramatically change the direction of world affairs - was well under way in Rome. On September 11 Pope John XXIII had opened the first session of the Second Vatican Council which he had foreshadowed - to such deafening silence from his Curia, three and a half years earlier. Four sessions, each of about three months and beginning in September, were held in consecutive years. The final session closed on December 8, 1965. In view of the fact the purpose of the council was to review and renew the entire life and work of the church it was logical that the fundamental issues and doctrine which determine the church's self-understanding and the way that it relates to, and interacts with, the rest of the world should have been considered and determined first, and an effort was made to do this. However it was only partly successful. Four key areas were recognized: the 'constitution' of the church, or what makes it tick and gives it authority; the nature and meaning of divine revelation; the nature and purpose of liturgy; and the role or purpose of the church in the modern world. Everything else would fall into place if the Council got those right, and there were officially another 12 'areas' to consider. In fact 18 major documents were produced. None were completed in the 1962 session. Two were promulgated at the end of the 1963 session and only one of those dealt with a core issue, the Constitution on Sacred Liturgy, which logic world suggest, should come after an understanding of revelation and the nature of the church. Three more documents were finalized in 1964, only one of which, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, was a core issue. The vast majority, 13, including the other two core documents, the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, were all promulgated in 1965.

While the overall cause of that state of affairs was the amazing amount of politicking engaged in to influence the outcome of each document, it was not helped by the fact that, after showing such insight and incisiveness in convoking the Council, at the beginning of his pontificate, John XXIII did not indicate at the opening of the Council a firm direction in which he believed the church should move. He expected the policies he had introduced and initiatives which he had taken to be sufficient guidance. In June 1960, a year before the WCC's second assembly, he established the Vatican Secretariat for Christian Unity, he approved of five clergy attending the assembly, he sent a personal representative to meet the Orthodox Patriarch, Athenagoras I, he directed that indigenous hierarchies should be established in Korea, Vietnam and Indonesia, and he instructed all of the religious orders operating in North America to assign at least ten per cent of their members to work in Latin America within ten years. He also had a number of pejorative references to Jews removed from the Roman-Rite for Good Friday.

When it came to the work of the Council he wanted renewal and pastoral effectiveness, he determined that the liturgy would be the first matter dealt with by the Council, he wanted the promotion of unity among Christians dealt with quickly and sensitively, and he wanted the Mass to be conducted in the vernacular, but although he was implementing a program of renewal as quickly as he could he knew that a lot of the Vatican hierarchy were not in favour of his program and as a result he was hesitant and showed uncertainty about the manner in which that renewal was to be achieved through the Council. His opening address reads as if he was taking one step forward and one step backwards. In one statement he appeared to be invoking a new understanding of Judaism, in line with his modifications to the Good Friday liturgy, but in others he turned back to the Fathers of the Church from whose words the church's anti-Semitism had developed, and he still relied rather heavily Mariology. The conservatives took full advantage of that apparent indecision. The church's self-understanding was alive and well. Some extracts illustrate the dilemma for a person looking for guidance from the pope on which way to go, especially if he wanted to break with traditional thinking and saw the calling of the Council as a step in that direction. John XXIII freely admitted that he did not have a firm agenda when he decided to call the Council. It was a matter of sudden inspiration.

... it will suffice to repeat as historical documentation our personal account of the first sudden bringing up in our heart and lips of the simple words, "Ecumenical Council." We uttered those words in the presence of the Sacred College of Cardinals on that memorable January 25, 1959, the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, in the basilica dedicated to him. It was completely unexpected, like a flash of heavenly light, shedding sweetness in eyes and hearts.²⁸

... we sometimes have to listen, ...to ... persons who, though burning with zeal, are not endowed with too much sense of discretion or measure. ... they can see nothing but prevarication and ruin. They say that our era, in comparison with past eras, is getting worse, and they behave as though they had learned nothing from history ... They behave as though at the time of former Councils everything was a full triumph for the Christian idea and life and for proper religious liberty.

... we must disagree with those prophets of gloom, who are always forecasting disaster, as though the end of the world were at hand. In the present order of things, Divine Providence is leading us to a new order of human relations which, by men's own efforts and even beyond their very expectations, are directed toward the fulfilment of God's superior and inscrutable designs. And everything, even human differences, leads to the greater good of the Church.

The pope was quite right. Divine Providence is leading us to a new order of human relations which, by men's own efforts and even beyond their very expectations, are directed toward the fulfilment of God's superior and inscrutable designs. But he could not see beyond the church's authority to manage it all.

... the world of today ... is so busy with politics and controversies in the economic order that it does not find time to attend to the care of spiritual reality, with which the Church's magisterium (teaching authority) is concerned. ... the pages of ecclesiastical history ... note clearly how the Ecumenical Councils themselves, while constituting a series of true glories for the Catholic Church, were often held to the accompaniment of most serious difficulties and sufferings because of the undue interference of civil authorities. The princes of this world, indeed, sometimes in all sincerity, intended thus to protect the Church. But more frequently this occurred not without spiritual damage and danger, since their interest therein was guided by the views of a selfish and perilous policy.

He wanted to brush down, shake out and renew the church's authority, but not depart from it, and he was anchored to the mass of evolved Mariology.

... however ... it is necessary first of all that the Church should never depart from the sacred patrimony of truth received from the Fathers. ... Mother Church rejoices that, by the singular gift of Divine Providence ... under the auspices of the virgin Mother of God ... the latest and humble successor to the Prince of the Apostles who is addressing you intended to assert once again the magisterium (teaching authority), which is unfailing and perdures until the end of time ...

... we should like to look to the past and to listen to [the] ... solemn and venerable voices ... [of Councils] throughout the East and the West, from the fourth century to the Middle Ages, and from there to modern times, which have handed down their witness ... [to] the Church of Christ, which from Jesus takes its name, its grace, and its meaning.

... however, there has also been for more than nineteen centuries a cloud of sorrows and of trials. Not without reason did the ancient Simeon announce to Mary the mother of Jesus, that prophecy which has been and still is true: "Behold this child is set for the fall and the resurrection of many in Israel, and for a sign which shall be contradicted" (Lk. 2: 34) . And Jesus Himself, when He grew up, clearly outlined the manner in which the world would treat His person down through the succeeding centuries with the mysterious words: "He who hears you, hears me" (Ibid. 10:16), and with those others that the same Evangelist relates: "He who is not with me is against me and he who does not gather with me scatters" (Ibid. 11 :23).

The pope could recognize the origins of Christianity within Judaism, he wanted to rid the church of traditional anti-Semitism, and for a moment it was as if he was going to pick up the threads of Pius XI's 'Hidden Encyclical' which Pius XII had severed, and move forward (chapter 22), but it was not to be.

The great problem confronting the world after almost two thousand years remains unchanged. Christ is ever resplendent as the center of history and of life. Men are either with Him and His Church, and then they enjoy light, goodness, order, and peace. Or else they are without Him, or against Him, and deliberately opposed to His Church, and then they give rise to confusion, to bitterness in human relations, and to the constant danger of fratricidal wars.

He was able to accept that science was here to stay and that the world had benefited from it very greatly, and he was adamant that the human capacity to unravel and to utilize the secrets of the created universe were God-given. However he appeared to be no closer than his predecessors to admitting that the church had suppressed all scientific effort throughout its history, because of its self-understanding, and that this had contributed directly to the crises which the world faced. It was as if the Renaissance and the Enlightenment (chapter 12), had nothing to do with the church's suppression of that God-given human capacity, and it was as if the papal Oath Against the Errors of Modernism (chapter 16) had never been imposed. That oath was not normally be applied any more and it would eventually fall in the wake of Vatican II, but at that stage it was still on the books.

... the Church has not watched inertly the marvelous progress of the discoveries of human genius, and has not been backward in evaluating them rightly. But, while following these developments, she does not neglect to admonish men so that, over and above sense - perceived things - they may raise their eyes to God, the Source of all wisdom and all beauty. And may they never forget the most serious command: "The Lord thy God shalt thou worship, and Him only shalt thou serve" (Mt. 4:10; Lk. 4:8), so that it may happen that the fleeting fascination of visible things should impede true progress.

...[this] Ecumenical Council, which will draw upon the effective and important wealth of juridical, liturgical, apostolic, and administrative experiences, wishes to transmit the doctrine, pure and integral, without any attenuation or distortion, which throughout twenty centuries, notwithstanding difficulties and contrasts, has become the common patrimony of men.

For this a Council was not necessary. But ... the whole world expects a step forward toward a doctrinal penetration and a formation of consciousness in faithful and perfect conformity to the authentic doctrine, which, however, should be studied and expounded through the methods of research and through the literary forms of modern thought.

There was an oblique reference to matters such as Maimonides and the Inquisition, the terror of the stake during the religious wars of the Counter Reformation (chapter 10), the pogroms of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries (chapters 15 & 16), and the very recent activities of the Ustashe (chapter 24), but there was no admission that those affairs degraded humanity and left stains on history which were each, in turn, factors in the trouble in the triangle. There was only the observation that "the Spouse of Christ prefers to make use of the medicine of mercy rather than that of severity,” which implied - one hopes inadvertently - that the Vatican could return to such methods if its preference changed once he was out of the way.

... often errors vanish as quickly as they arise ... The Church has always opposed ... [and] condemned them with the greatest severity. Nowadays however, the Spouse of Christ prefers to make use of the medicine of mercy rather than that of severity. She ... meets the needs of the present day by demonstrating the validity of her teaching rather than by condemnations ... [and] experience has taught men that violence inflicted on others, the might of arms, and political domination, are of no help at all in finding a happy solution to the grave problems which afflict them.

And having opened with a touch of Mariology, John XXIII closed his address to the Council the same way - after a reference to the fact that the rest of the church still had to find its way back to Rome.

Unfortunately, the entire Christian family has not yet fully attained ... visible unity in truth.

Almighty God! In Thee we place all our confidence, not trusting in our own strength. ... O Mary, Help of Christians, Help of Bishops, of whose love we have recently had particular proof in thy temple of Loreto, where we venerated the mystery of the Incarnation dispose all things for a happy and propitious outcome and, with thy spouse, St. Joseph, the holy Apostles Peter and Paul St. John the Baptist and St. John the Evangelist, intercede for us to God.

The debates were about to begin. They would be very vigorous, and over the four years that Vatican II continued, the reform-minded progressives made remarkable progress, in spite of strong opposition from the conservatives who held most of the critical posts in the hierarchy, and reference will be made to some of the significant advances at the times that they were announced. The strength of the resistance to change is illustrated by the manoeuvring around the Declaration on Religious Liberty. The adoption of the draft declaration, Dignitatis Humanae, inspired by some progressive thinkers, notably Americans, would mean that the Roman Catholic Church formally embraced the concept of human rights and it had the strong support of a 44-year old lecturer in ethics at the Catholic University of Lublin, Karol Wojtyla - Pope John Paul II. The reason was that “it enjoyed the support of the leaders of the Church in the Soviet empire because it gave them an intellectual framework for their opposition to Communist rule.”²⁹ Compulsion in matters of conscience was out! Human rights was firmly on the international agenda. No because every Western government was eager to embrace the concept in its own bailiwick, but because it would become another weapon in the trade and political negotiating armament which would be wielded ruthlessly as the late twentieth century flew past. However it “marked a seismic shift in the Church’s thinking.”³⁰ Until the Vatican lost its papal states as a result of the Risorgimento it had never accepted any restraints to its power over the individual. And through its system of concordats, which were its way of getting as close to a theocratic state as it could, it had exercised and maintained enormous power over social legislation, community ‘norms’ and penal codes. If the Council adopted Dignitatis Humanae the Vatican was virtually locked into the freedom of thought of the Reformation.

*The same Church that had brought the world the Crusades and the Inquisition [would now publicly accept] that 'Man's response to God in faith must be free; no one therefore is to be forced to embrace the Christian faith against his own will' ... and ... 'The Truth cannot impose itself except by virtue of its own truth ...'*³¹

If the church wanted to apply such restraints to civil authorities surely it had to surrender the right to discipline its own members in matters of faith, morals and even heresy! That would not do. A conservative faction in the Council “planned a coup.” The secretary-general of the Council, Archbishop Felici, proposed that the text of the Declaration on Religious Liberty should be referred to a special commission because of a ‘desire buy the Holy Father that the text be reconsidered and reworked.’ He then proceeded to appoint the members of the commission himself, “ensuring that it consisted largely of prelates who were known to be opposed to the very idea of religious liberty.” The progressives were aghast, but they were determined that they would play the art of procedural church politics just as effectively. Fourteen met at the home of Cardinal Frings and drafted an appeal to Pope Paul VI who had been elevated to the papacy in June 1963 following the death of John XXIII.

*With great sorrow we have learned that the Declaration on Religious Liberty, although in accord with the desire of the great majority of the Fathers, is to be entrusted to a certain mixed committee ... three of whom appear to be opposed to the orientation of the Council in this matter. This news is for us a source of extreme anxiety and very disquieting.*³²

The pope took charge of the matter himself, hand-picked a committee, then, being painfully aware of its implications, the probability that it would release a flood of dissent and the possibility that it could split the church, personally worked over the redraft until he was persuaded that it was appropriate. A year had been lost by the time he sent it back to the final session of the Council for adoption.³³

However that was still three years away when John XXIII closed the first session of the Council on December 8, 1962. Twelve days later there was a religious gathering of a different kind in New York. During the previous two years there had been a number of informal contacts between people in leadership positions in various faith communities, all very concerned at the state of world affairs, the threat of nuclear war, and the fact that religion was as often as not a cause of conflict instead of a means towards its resolution. They each saw a much more productive role for people of faith than the church at large and other world faiths currently seemed able to play and the need to co-ordinate initiatives on an interfaith basis.. One of them was Rabbi Dr. Maurice Eisendrath, a long term president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. Another was Dr. Albert Schweitzer, the Nobel Laureate famed for his medical work in French Equatorial Africa. And a third key figure was Dr. Dana McLean Greeley who had been elected president of the American Unitarian Association four years earlier. Then, unaware that Eisendrath had already approached Schweitzer about sponsorship of a religious summit, Greeley convened the December 20 meeting at the building of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, adjacent to the UN headquarters. Others who became involved at that point included Bishop John Wesly Lord, Rabbi Dr. Albert Vorspan, Bishop Daniel Corrigan, Rev, Dr. Homer A Jack and Monsignor Edward Murray. That meeting demonstrated that there were some senior Catholic clergy who were not waiting for Vatican II to decide the church's attitude towards working with people of other faiths. It considered a range of issues including whether the proposed interfaith organization should be confined the Christians and Jews or opened more widely, and whether it should be confined to senior executives of major faiths or involve a wider constituency, and the decision was taken to push ahead with a series of consultations, then wider conferences targeting particular international issues. The vigour with which the group approached its task was such that in due course the World Conference on Religion and Peace was established with Homer Jack as its first secretary general. Its principal office was established in Geneva, but in due course it was shifted to New York to enable it to work more closely with agencies of the United Nations.³⁴ And as if to highlight the importance of their work, Bishop John Robinson through out a challenge to the Christian church with his little book Honest to God, questioning the basis on which people who regard themselves as Christians should view themselves, their beliefs, their actions, and their relations with other people. "I suspect," he wrote, "that we stand on the brink of a period in which it is going to become increasingly difficult to know what the true defence of Christian values requires."³⁵

Iraq, which had become an ally of the Soviet Union following its withdrawal from the Baghdad Pact, was also affected by the spin-off from the Cuban missile crisis as well. In February 1963, being unable to bridge the gap between Nationalist groups which wanted a Pan-Arab union with Egypt and Syria, and the Communists who were opposed to such a union because it would prevent closer relations with the Soviet Union, the Iraqi military government was overthrown by an alliance of Nationalists and the Baath Party. On the bright side, a Nuclear Test Ban Treaty was agreed by the US, the Soviet Union and other countries under which tests of nuclear weapons in the atmosphere, in outer space and under water were banned, thus limiting future testing to underground sites.

But soon afterwards the world was shocked by the assassination of President Kennedy on November 22. The subsequent murder of the assassin before he could even be questioned inhibited the criminal investigation and many theories were advanced for the motive behind the killing. However the people of the United States were so shocked that, fearing that it was connected with Kennedy's campaign for civil rights for black Americans, it had a salutary influence in domestic race relations. In June, following the murder of an official of the National Association for the Advancement of Coloured Peoples (NAACP) in Mississippi, Martin Luther King had led a peaceful civil rights demonstration in Washington. That was followed on August 28 by a march of 200,000 people, many of whom had walked all the way to Washington from the Southern States, in a campaign against race segregation and inequality before the law. Kennedy, always a supporter of changes to the US law to provide for proper and uniform human rights, immediately ordered the preparation of a Civil Rights Bill, and that was being considered - reluctantly - by Congress at the time of his assassination. The opposition did not come only from the radical fringe of American politics. In June, about then time of the murder of the NAACP official, Governor George C. Wallace had personally stood in the doorway of the University of Alabama in an unsuccessful attempt to prevent the registration of two Negro students. Previously a judge, he vigorously opposed the Civil Rights Commission, was elected governor of Alabama of a segregationist platform in 1962, and six years later he stood for president as the nominee of the anti-liberal American Independent Party. He received 13 per cent of the vote in the southern states.³⁶ However, within months of assuming office, President Lyndon Johnson succeeded in persuading Congress to pass the Civil Rights Act, forbidding discrimination on the grounds of race and using financial regulations to enforce desegregation of schools. It was stronger than the Kennedy bill which Congress had been reluctant to pass.

In view of the findings of a Civil Rights Commission investigation in 1961, no open minded person could have doubted the need for such legislation. The commission estimated that in approximately one hundred counties in the southern states Negro citizens were prevented - by outright discrimination, fear of physical violence or economic reprisal - from exercising their right to vote. The law in many of these places was nothing more than a device to exclude Negroes from voting. Communities with a high Negro population density were often grossly under-represented in both Congress and state legislatures, so that their full and meaningful participation in elections was effectively prevented.³⁷

The race question and communal ethnic violence had been raising its ugly head increasingly around the world as economic competition aggravated social and ethnic tensions. They went hand in hand, so that wherever the Cold War went, especially in the throes of decolonization, race tension was sure to follow. In October 1958, in the aftermath of the Suez debacle and against the wishes of French settlers, President Charles de Gaulle had offered cease fire terms to the Algerian liberation army, the FLN, which had established a provisional government in exile in Tunisia (the GPRA). The settlers said "No", so the war continued with great brutality and, during the following 12 months while 68,000 Algerian Muslims were killed the French lost 5,800 troops and settlers. Then in September 1959, when de Gaulle was forced to concede that the Algerians should determine their own future, the French settlers organized a terrorist group, the OAS, to sabotage all moves towards independence, and began organizing against de Gaulle at home. In April 1961, four French generals who supported the settlers attempted a coup against him but in March 1962 the French government reopened negotiations with the Algerian GPRA; a national referendum in France on April 8 approved independence after years of bitter struggle; the OAS resistance collapsed; most French settlers fled to France; the Armistice of Evian brought full independence which was recognized on July 3, and the FLN proclaimed a one-party state.

Britain's attempt to begin decolonization in the West Indies by federating a series of disparate islands in much the manner that it had sought to federate regions of West Africa, brought the people much the same fate, but it was the Belgian Congo which caught world attention. Riots in the mismanaged and greatly exploited country which had been the personal fiefdom of King Leopold II of Belgium between the Berlin Conference carve up of 1885 and 1908 (run with great brutality, extortion and wealth accrual), led to a precipitate decision by the Belgium government to grant independence the following year. The result was a bun fight of mammoth proportions between the competing independence movements; instability, continuing exploitation, corruption and injustice which still wracks the country. In South Africa the circumstances for the black population continued to worsen. A violent showdown occurred at Sharpeville - a name which was to be imprinted indelibly in people's minds as the cause célèbre in the campaign against racism. On March 21, 1960, a massacre of blacks taking part in a peaceful, unarmed demonstration against Apartheid at Sharpeville focussed world attention on the treason trials of ANC officials which was then in its fourth year, as well as the issue of race violence. The South African government proclaimed a state of emergency; detained over 20,000 people; banned the ANC and the Pan-African Congress; invoked the Suppression of Communism Act, and compelled blacks to carry identity cards. Other Commonwealth countries were so outraged that strong pressure was applied by the Commonwealth to force it to repeal its Apartheid laws. The government rejected the pressure, conducted a whites-only referendum and on May 31, 1961, South Africa was proclaimed a republic and left the Commonwealth.

However, in quick succession the Cameroun, Congo-Brazzaville, Gabon, Chad, the Central African Republic all achieved independence and set up the Union of Central African Republics. They were followed very quickly by Togo, the Ivory Coast, Dahomey, Upper Volta, Niger, which set up the Union of Sahel-Benin. There was also growing unrest in Angola and Mozambique, but the first of Portugal's colonies to decide that armed rebellion was the only way to independence was Guinea. However the rebels had only limited success and Portugal clung to its colonial "rights" with great harshness and strong military action. Even after ten years, when other events finally overtook Portugal, the rebels had still only expelled the Portuguese forces from three quarters of the country. However, by that time the trauma and cost of the war was such that some of the more enlightened officers were pressing the government to take an alternative path, saying that colonial rule could not be maintained by military occupation.

Those countries which had achieved independence took a major step forward on May 25, 1963, with the establishment of the Organization of African Unity, (OAU). As an inter-governmental organization its aim was to promote unity and solidarity between the African states which were emerging with rapid decolonization, to eliminate all remaining forms of colonialism from Africa, and to promote international cooperation. Membership has varied somewhat from year to year as the continent has been wracked by political disputes, border incursions, wars of independence and civil wars, but its basic activities including diplomacy in support of African liberation movements, mediation of boundary conflicts and interstate civil wars, research in economics and communications, and other affairs, has gradually expanded. One of its early efforts in this regard was mediation in the border dispute between Morocco and Algeria by Ethiopia's Haile Selassie, but one of the developments it did not support was South Africa's proclamation of the Bantu State of Transkei.

Very soon, in spite of its dastardly act of nationalizing US oil fields, Indonesia was back in America's good books. Against strong opposition from the West Irianese, or West Papuans, who wanted independence, Indonesia pressed the Netherlands to cede Irian Jaya to it. The Netherlands was not happy. It transferred the administration of the territory to the United Nations, but out of all the politicking the decision was taken to transfer it to Indonesia in 1963, subject to an act of self-determination in due course to determine its long term future. When time came for that act, in 1969, it was well stage-managed. Indonesia wanted the territory and the United States gave it full support. The territory contains the largest deposits of copper in the world and the United States wanted its companies to have access to them. There was no guarantee that they would have if independence was granted. The decision was never in any doubt.

VATICAN II: SECOND SESSION

So the world stumbled on. Against a backdrop of violent struggles against oppression and for decolonization which dotted the globe in profusion, and the threat that the Cold War might suddenly erupt which was never far from people's minds, Vatican II met for its second session. It promulgated the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, and the Decree on the Means of Social Communication.

The decision by Pius XII to issue the encyclical Motu proprio Quotidianis precibus on March 1945, to promote the Liturgical Movement and the recitation of the Breviary had been amazingly successful. Its purpose had been to focus peoples' attention on the form or practice of worship and to distract them from the greater controversy over the role and activities of their clergy and the church during the war which was obviously about to erupt with the impending defeat of the Nazi regime and the collapse of the current phase of Fascism.(Chapter 27) It was so successful that now, as the council was endeavouring to make the life of the church more meaningful or relevant, it had a real problem. There was a "significant democratic resistance" from both lay people and their parish priests in the European heartland of Catholicism to the introduction of a democratic church. In Stourton's words: "For most believers the liturgy defines the church: Mass on Sundays represents their principal point of contact with their religion - 'lex credendi, lex orandi' as the old Catholic saying has it, 'the way you pray is the way you believe.' The promised shake-up of the liturgy therefore touched their Faith where they felt it most keenly.' The battles between conservatives and progressives began in St Peters, the venue for the Council plenary sessions, but was repeated when the clergy had the task of introducing it to their flocks. This led, in due course, to the emergence of the traditionalist movement under Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre.³⁸ The most shocking change for many people was the change to the vernacular. For some, it meant that being able to think about the words they were uttering introduced the opportunity to challenge what they had been mouthing for years. For others who did not care to challenge the words, the vernacular seemed to lack the grandeur and authority of the Latin, reducing the Mass to mere street talk.

Even though he did not set a clear direction for the Council, John XXIII had tried to bring the church into the twentieth century, and in March 1963, three months before he died, he established a commission to revise the Code of Canon Law. The revision took twenty years to complete! He did not even live long enough to see the completed Constitution of the Sacred Liturgy, but it did not challenge the fundamental self-understanding of the church. Clause 2. Reads, in part:

2. ... it is the liturgy through which, especially in the divine sacrifice of the Eucharist, "the work of our redemption is accomplished," and it is through the liturgy, especially, that the faithful are enabled to express in their lives and manifest to others the mystery of Christ and the real nature of the true Church. The Church is essentially both human and divine ... The liturgy daily builds up those who are in the Church, making of them a holy temple of the Lord, a dwelling-place for God in the Spirit, to the mature measure of the fullness of Christ. ... it marvelously increases their power to preach Christ and thus show forth the Church, a sign lifted up among the nations, to those who are outside, a sign under which the scattered children of God may be gathered together until there is one fold and one shepherd.³⁹

Fifteen years after the establishment of the State of Israel - the central fact of the Christian Era to date - most of the world had grown accustomed to the fact that it had a new, somewhat synthetic state in its midst. It was synthetic in the sense that it was not based on an existing ethnic community; people had been gathered from many nations, speaking many languages and of many racial backgrounds. The one common thread which bound them together and which had justified the establishment of the state was their religion. It was unique. It had not been established by negotiation and agreement with the people whose territory had been allocated to. It had been imposed on those people by outside bodies: by the same people whose misconduct and self-understanding had precipitated the push for it to be established - the amorphous Christian gel. Fifteen years of rising and falling trauma should have been long enough for the scholars of the amorphous Christian gel which had set it up to assess and to understand what it was all about. But it had not been. The dominant wing of the church still perceived itself - a mere institution organized by people - as "a sign lifted up among the nations, to those who are outside, a sign under which the scattered children of God may be gathered together until there is one fold and one shepherd" and it still insisted that the only way to salvation was through its sacred liturgy "through which, especially in the divine sacrifice of the Eucharist, "the work of our redemption is accomplished."

The Arabs whose territory had been expropriated to establish the new state seemed to be the only people who were aware of just how synthetic it was. They still wanted redress for wrongs, but no one was interested in listening. Now, whether it was aware of it or not, whatever the amorphous Christian gel did in pursuing its own interests at the cost of all others seemed to trigger a new trouble spot or aggravate world tensions and, in particular, the trouble in the triangle. However the nature of its self-understanding and the nature of media coverage of world events left most people quite oblivious to the significance and the implications of what was happening. It was also quite consistent with the Western World's tradition of isolating every international "incident" and fighting spot fires as they broke out, rather than developing a fire prevention program. As we have seen, Britain had perfected the technique during the 1930s, almost to the point of an art form, to avoid the world at large linking one situation with another, realizing the parlous state that Britain was in, and moving to take advantage of it. The United States was now utilizing the same technique. It had taken full advantage of the parlous state that Britain was in to strengthen its position of power and privilege in the key region: the Middle East. It had a better idea of what was causing the spot fires but its technique of fire prevention was simply to smother the whole lot. It even had a scheme prepared for mutually assured self destruction in the event that someone else tried to strip it of some of its privileges. So: from this point, a few diary entries will help to pinpoint the overlapping or related issues as the Middle East again takes centre stage in the trouble in the triangle.

~ 1964

~ The Soviet Union began a substantial build up in conventional weapons and army strength, after a period of gradually reducing its military strength, partly in response to the Sino-Soviet split and partly from an expectation that if a war with NATO occurred there would be a heavy preliminary stage of ground warfare before either side resorted to nuclear warfare.

The United States was well aware of this, but chose to portray it as an increased Soviet threat in its effort to further isolate the Soviet Union and to tie Third World countries into defence and trade arrangements. Right wing parties in allied countries eagerly joined the bandwagon. Competition intensified. The United States Secretary of Defence, Robert McNamara, argued that the best deterrent against nuclear warfare was for the two superpowers to have sufficient capacity for mutual assured destruction (MAD). This meant that each could eliminate the other as a modern industrial state by imposing "unacceptable damage" which was defined as the destruction of 25 percent of the population and 50 percent of industrial capacity. This, he argued, would ensure a stable relationship between the two superpowers.

But the situation in the Middle East was steadily deteriorating with absolutely no sign of stability coming from the Eisenhower (or Dulles) Doctrine. When Iraq withdrew from the Baghdad Pact after the overthrow of the pro-Western monarchy and pact headquarters were shifted to Ankara the United States realized the policy of not being more directly involved in the pact was untenable. It became an Associate Member and assumed responsibility for the management of its affairs. The Cold War spilled over into the Arabian Peninsula - virtually on Riyadh's doorstep - when the Yemeni civil war brought neighbouring tensions to the surface. Egypt supported the Socialist Republican forces, while Saudi Arabia and the United States supported the Yemeni Monarchists. Syria had already withdrawn from the United Arab Republic after its military coup; Iraq had laid claim to Kuwait after Britain withdrew and Kuwait had thereupon joined the Arab League; and Israel, taking advantage of its new relationship with the European Common Market group, was pressing ahead with its Jordan water diversion schemes to take full advantage of its market position. That automatically aggravated tensions with its neighbours.

~ January

~ Thirteen Arab heads of state met in Cairo to consider the worsening crisis over the use of water from the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee, with the primary aim of formulating a 'reply' to Israel's plan to remove water from the Sea of Galilee. In addition to preparing their own plan for a water diversion scheme they called for the establishment of Palestinian commando units to carry out sabotage operations against the Israeli water installations, and for the Arab League delegate, Ahmad Shuqayri, to prepare plans for the establishment of a "Palestinian Entity" which would enable its people to contribute more effectively to the struggle against the Jewish State.⁴⁰

~ May

~ Four months later it appeared that a new dimension had been added to the complex of crises in the Middle East when the Palestine Liberation Organization was constituted. At a gathering of 422 Palestinians in Jerusalem a charter was adopted and provision was made for the establishment of a Palestine National Council with Shuqayri as its first president.

~ While those plans were being put in place the OAU set up a Freedom Committee to assist those trust territories and colonies still struggling for independence and, in particular, to organize an international boycott of South Africa; and in Iran the Shah exiled the Muslim leader Ayatollah Khomeini in response to his demands that the cultural Westernization of the country be reversed, and that the government's support for Israel, in collaboration with the United States, end. When the United Nations resolved to intervene in the dispute between Greece and Turkey over the future of Cyprus, Turkey, then hosting the headquarters of CENTO, moved to restore good relations with the Soviet Union, and the (East) German Democratic Republic formalized a Treaty of Friendship with the Soviet Union as well.

~ June

~ 11: Nelson Mandela and seven other ANC defendants were convicted of sabotage under the Suppression of Communism Act, the Sabotage Act and other statutes, and sentenced to life imprisonment. He had been one of the key figures in the anti-Apartheid struggle, but now he became a figure head, and the cry "Free Mandela!" became a rallying call for the movement internationally.

~ 15: As a result of the governments of the large Western economies getting together within the framework of the United Nations, the countries which (by virtue of limited trading capacity) had not been invited to play 'economic planning and bargaining' with the developed Western Countries were further marginalized and left to trade as best they could at the beck and call of the major players. This led to the GROUP OF 77 being established in Geneva at the close of the first conference of the UN Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD). Of the 77 present, 29 were original members of the United Nations, and the others were either countries which had not sought membership on the terms required of founding members of the UN, or had achieved independence during the decolonization period of the 1950s and early 1960s. It was their first attempt to generate a bit of bargaining power and to break the cycle of Western corporations - aided by their governments - simply staking claims for resources and expecting the Third World countries to be grateful.

~ August

~ 7: A new phase in the series of de-colonizing struggles and Cold War spin-off wars in Asia opened when North Vietnamese patrol boats attacked a US destroyer and the US Congress passed the Tonkin Gulf Resolution, and authorized extraordinary presidential powers for military action in South East Asia. This marked the formal beginning of the VIETNAM WAR.

~ September

~ Another Arab summit meeting resolved to proceed with a scheme to divert Jordan River water upstream from the points at which Israel drew its water.

~ October

~ China exploded its first nuclear bomb and its rift with the Soviet Union widened.

~ 14: Khrushchev fell from grace in the Kremlin for not being able to handle either of the crises with China or the United States. He was succeeded by Leonid Brezhnev and Aleksei Kosygin.

~ 30: Vietcong forces attacked the air base at Bienhoa, but with another presidential election due four days later, Johnson rejected a military proposal for retaliatory raids into North Vietnam.

~ November

~ 3: Johnson was returned to office.

~ When Saigon was convulsed by rioters protesting at Khanh's oppressive rule and the worsening crisis with their northern neighbours due to US intervention to prop him up, the US ambassador urged him to leave the country.

VATICAN II: THIRD SESSION

~ 21: At the end of its third session the Vatican Council promulgated three more documents: the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, a Decree on Ecumenism, and a Decree on the Eastern Churches.

There were some bright spots. Contact with the Ecumenical Movement was no longer banned under pain of excommunication as it had been at the time of the establishment of the World Council of Churches. In fact after announcing his intention to convoke a Council, John XXIII had pushed ahead with a number of very progressive reforms, already noted above, including a mission of five delegates to the second general assembly of the World Council of Churches in New Delhi in 1961. But as was to be expected from the Dogmatic Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, there was no significant change in the Vatican's self-understanding. The significance of the establishment of the State of Israel had not registered. A detailed analysis if the three documents cannot be attempted here, but extracts are sufficient to illustrate the Vatican's continuing self-understanding and attitudes. First, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church.⁴¹

Clause 6. In the Old Testament the revelation of the kingdom is often made under the forms of symbols. In similar fashion the inner nature of the Church is now made known to us in various images.

Some of those images were taken from the Old Testament, some were taken from the writings of the early church Fathers, and others were lifted straight from the syncretistic exercises of the early days when the merging of images from pagan religions worked wonders in drawing people into the church.

The Church is ... a sheepfold, the sole and necessary gateway to which is Christ . It is also a flock, of which God foretold that he would himself be the shepherd , and whose sheep, although watched over by human shepherds, are nevertheless at all times led and brought to pasture by Christ himself ...

The Church, further, which is called “that Jerusalem which is above” and “our mother” , is described as the spotless spouse of the spotless lamb . It is she whom Christ “loved and for whom he delivered himself up that he might sanctify her.” It is she whom he unites to himself by an unbreakable alliance, and whom he constantly “nourishes and cherishes”.

Given the church's long history of violence, oppression and corruption, the use of the term “spotless Spouse” was, to say the least, inappropriate.

Clause 8. The one mediator, Christ, established and ever sustains here on earth his holy Church, the community of faith, hope and charity, as a visible organization[9] through which he communicates truth and grace to all men. But, the society structured with hierarchical organs and the mystical body of Christ, the visible society and the spiritual community, the earthly Church and the Church endowed with heavenly riches, are not to be thought of as two realities. On the contrary, they form one complete reality which comes together from a human and a divine element. For this reason the Church is compared, not without significance, to the mystery of the incarnate Word.

To claim that the church was divine, and to compare it in significance with the virgin birth, by divine intervention, of Jesus of Nazareth was going too far. It was bad enough for the church to devise a doctrine presenting Jesus of Nazareth as existing in time before the creation of the universe (chapter 2), but to put the church - an organization established by people in response to Jesus' simple command to his followers to go into all the world and preach and teach - in the same category was inviting excessive credulity.

Just as Christ carried out the work of redemption in poverty and oppression, so the Church is called to follow the same path if she is to communicate the fruits of salvation to men. Christ Jesus, “though he was by nature God . . . emptied himself, taking the nature of a slave”, and “being rich, became poor” for our sake.

This statement was quite consistent with the church's long established teaching and its self-understanding, even if it had fallen short of it. But including it in that manner is a dogmatic statement on the church confirmed very emphatically the basis of the trouble in the triangle.

Clause 4. This holy Council first of all turns its attention to the Catholic faithful. Basing itself on scripture and tradition, it teaches that the Church, a pilgrim now on earth, is necessary for salvation: the one Christ is mediator and the way of salvation; he is present to us in his body which is the Church. He himself explicitly asserted the necessity of faith and baptism, and thereby affirmed at the same time the necessity of the Church which men enter through baptism as through a door. Hence they could not be saved who, knowing that the Catholic Church was founded as necessary by God through Christ, would refuse either to enter it, or to remain in it. Fully incorporated into the Church are those who, possessing the Spirit of Christ, accept all the means of salvation given to the Church together with her entire organization, and who – by the bonds constituted by the profession of faith, the sacraments, ecclesiastical government, and communion – are joined in the visible structure of the Church of Christ, who rules her through the Supreme Pontiff and the bishops. ... Even though incorporated into the Church, one who does not however persevere in charity is not saved. He remains indeed in the bosom of the Church, but “in body” not “in heart.” All children of the Church should nevertheless remember that [their exalted condition results, not from their own merits, but from the grace of Christ.] If they fail to respond in thought, word and deed to that grace, not only shall they not be saved, but they shall be the more severely judged.

That was a remarkable statement given that the church's claims for the efficacy of penance through bought indulgences was the trigger for the Reformation. And clause 16, following, was just as remarkable because it was the first significant acknowledgment by the Vatican - or any wing of the church - that the triangle actually exists and that both the Jews (“that people to which the covenants and promises were made”) and Moslems (“these profess to hold the faith of Abraham, and together with us they adore the one, merciful God, mankind's judge on the last day”), are included in the plan of Salvation.

Clause 16. Finally, those who have not yet received the Gospel are related to the People of God in various ways. There is, first, that people to which the covenants and promises were made, and from which Christ was born according to the flesh: in view of the divine choice, they are a people most dear for the sake of the fathers, for the gifts of God are without repentance. But the plan of salvation also includes those who acknowledge the Creator, in the first place amongst whom are the Moslems: these profess to hold the faith of Abraham, and together with us they adore the one, merciful God, mankind's judge on the last day. ...

However that bright spot was too good to last. They were only in a half-way house and they still needed the church for salvation!

Whatever good or truth is found amongst them is considered by the Church to be a preparation for the Gospel and given by him who enlightens all men that they may at length have life. But very often, deceived by the Evil One, men have become vain in their reasonings, have exchanged the truth of God for a lie and served the world rather than the Creator. Or else, living and dying in this world without God, they are exposed to ultimate despair. Hence to procure the glory of God and the salvation of all these, the Church, mindful of the Lord's command, "preach the Gospel to every creature" takes zealous care to foster the missions.

It was only to be expected that the claim of papal infallibility would be repeated, because, having been promulgated at the First Vatican Council and being a key means of holding the world-wide Catholic Church in submission to Rome, there would have been far reaching implications if it were not confirmed. What was surprising was that the concept of infallibility was extended to bishops "in certain circumstances."

Clause 18... In order that the episcopate itself, however, might be one and undivided he put Peter at the head of the other apostles, and in him he set up a lasting and visible source and foundation of the unity both of faith and of communion. This teaching concerning the institution, the permanence, the nature and import of the sacred primacy of the Roman Pontiff and his infallible teaching office, the sacred synod proposes anew to be firmly believed by all the faithful, and, proceeding undeviatingly with this same undertaking, it proposes to proclaim publicly and enunciate clearly the doctrine concerning bishops, successors of the apostles, who together with Peter's successor, the Vicar of Christ and the visible head of the whole Church, direct the house of the living God. Clause 19: ... The Lord Jesus, ... constituted in the form of a college or permanent assembly, at the head of which he placed Peter, chosen from amongst them. He sent them first of all to the children of Israel and then to all peoples, so that, sharing in his power, they might make all peoples his disciples and sanctify and govern them

Clause 20. That divine mission, which was committed by Christ to the apostles, is destined to last until the end of the world, since the Gospel, which they were charged to hand on, is, for the Church, the principle of all its life for all time. For that very reason the apostles were careful to appoint successors in this hierarchically constituted society. In that way, then, with priests and deacons as helpers, the bishops received the charge of the community, presiding in God's stead over the flock of which they are the shepherds in that they are teachers of doctrine, ministers of sacred worship and holders of office in government.

Clause 21. In the person of the bishops, then, to whom the priests render assistance, the Lord Jesus Christ, supreme high priest, is present in the midst of the faithful. Though seated at the right hand of God the Father, he is not absent from the assembly of his pontiffs; on the contrary indeed, it is above all through their signal service that he preaches the Word of God
...

Clause 22. The college or body of bishops has for all that no authority unless united with the Roman Pontiff, Peter's successor, as its head, whose primatial authority, let it be added, over all, whether pastors or faithful, remains in its integrity. For the Roman Pontiff, by reason of his office as Vicar of Christ, namely, and as pastor of the entire Church, has full, supreme and universal power over the whole Church, a power which he can always exercise unhindered. The order of bishops is the successor to the college of the apostles in their role as teachers and pastors, and in it the apostolic college is perpetuated. Together with their head, the Supreme Pontiff, and never apart from him, they have supreme and full authority over the universal Church; but this power cannot be exercised without the agreement of the Roman Pontiff. The Lord made Peter alone the rock-foundation and the holder of the keys of the Church, and constituted him shepherd of his whole flock. It is clear, however, that the office of binding and loosing which was given to Peter, was also assigned to the college of the apostles united to its head.

It was also to be expected that there would be plentiful references to Mariology. However it is noteworthy that those references were more restrained than for quite a few years. Section III of the document, headed 'The Blessed Virgin and the Church', opened with the statement:

In the words of the Apostle there is but one mediator: "for there is but one God and one mediator of God and men, the man Jesus Christ, who gave himself a redemption for all."
[Emphasis added.]

An optimist might have seen in the way the matter was handled a spark of hope that the Vatican was about to repudiate the Doctrine of the Trinity. No such luck. But the references to Mary and intercession were simple, direct and unembellished. The first, in effect, acknowledged the promulgation of the Dogma of Mary's Bodily Assumption: "Taken up to heaven she did not lay aside this saving office but by her manifold intercession continues to bring us the gifts of eternal salvation." The second, coming after a section on the Cult of the Blessed Virgin in the Church, was similarly brief and direct, noting that "... she who aided the beginnings of the Church by her prayers, may now, exalted as she is above all the angels and saints, intercede before her son in the fellowship of all the saints ...". The emphasis was placed on her example to humanity, and there was a warning against teachings or actions which might lead others into error about the true doctrine of the church. This was the first time that the brakes had been applied to the runaway steam train of Mariology since Pius XII sought responses from the clergy about whether to proclaim, as dogma, belief in the Bodily Assumption of Mary and then proceeded to do so. Quite apart from proclaiming the Dogma, the Marian Year, and instituting the feast of Mary Queen of Heaven, Pius had invoked the name of Mary in the majority of his 41 encyclicals between 1939 and 1958, and did so with transparent political motives when dealing with Portugal and in connection with Hitler's invasion of Russia, Operation Barbarossa, (Chapter 25). This significant shift in emphasis suggests that the Council, and especially either the drafting committee or Paul VI, believed that the matter had got out of hand and was undermining relations with other churches or with the Jewish and Muslim authorities with whom Vatican officials had to relate in the Middle East. The sections of the dogmatic constitution which refer to Mary include the following.

Clause 66. Mary has by grace been exalted above all angels and men to a place second only to her Son, as the most holy mother of God who was involved in the mysteries of Christ: she is rightly honored by a special cult in the Church. From the earliest times the Blessed Virgin is honored under the title of Mother of God, whose protection the faithful take refuge together in prayer in all their perils and needs. Accordingly, following the Council of Ephesus, there was a remarkable growth in the cult of the People of God towards Mary ...

Clause 67. The sacred synod teaches this Catholic doctrine advisedly and at the same time admonishes all the sons of the Church that the cult, especially the liturgical cult, of the Blessed Virgin, be generously fostered, and that the practices and exercises of devotion towards her, recommended by the teaching authority of the Church in the course of centuries be highly esteemed, and that those decrees, which were given in the early days regarding the cult images of Christ, the Blessed Virgin and the saints, be religiously observed. But it strongly urges theologians and preachers of the word of God to be careful to refrain as much from all false exaggeration as from too summary an attitude in considering the special dignity of the Mother of God. ... Let the faithful remember moreover that true devotion consists neither in sterile or transitory affection, nor in a certain vain credulity, but proceeds from true faith, by which we are led to recognize the excellence of the Mother of God, and we are moved to a filial love towards our mother and to the imitation of her virtues.

Clause 68. In the meantime the Mother of Jesus in the glory which she possesses in body and soul in heaven is the image and beginning of the Church as it is to be perfected in the world to come. Likewise she shines forth on earth, until the day of the Lord shall come, a sign of certain hope and comfort to the pilgrim People of God.

Clause 69. It gives great joy and comfort to this sacred synod that among the separated brethren too there are those who give due honour to the Mother of Our Lord and Saviour, especially among the Easterns, who with devout mind and fervent impulse give honour to the Mother of God, ever virgin. The entire body of the faithful pours forth urgent supplications to the Mother of God and of men that she, who aided the beginnings of the Church by her prayers, may now, exalted as she is above all the angels and saints, intercede before her Son in the fellowship of all the saints, until all families of people, whether they are honoured with the title of Christian or whether they still do not know the Saviour, may be happily gathered together in peace and harmony into one People of God, for the glory of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity. [Emphasis added.]

Now, the Decree on Ecumenism, Unitatis Redintegratio. It began with a firm statement of purpose which John XXIII had initiated.

The restoration of unity among all Christians is one of the principal concerns of the Second Vatican Council.

Then it proceeded to lay out the basis on which the Roman Catholic Church was to approach its work with other Christian churches to achieve what it perceived as Christ's purpose, thus:

Christ the Lord founded one Church and one Church only. However, many Christian communions present themselves to men as the true inheritors of Jesus Christ; all indeed profess to be followers of the Lord but differ in mind and go their different ways, as if Christ Himself were divided.[1] Such division openly contradicts the will of Christ, scandalizes the world, and damages the holy cause of preaching the Gospel to every creature.

... some and even very many of the significant elements and endowments which together go to build up and give life to the Church itself, can exist outside the visible boundaries of the Catholic Church: the written word of God; the life of grace; faith, hope and charity, with the other interior gifts of the Holy Spirit, and visible elements too. All of these, which come from Christ and lead back to Christ, belong by right to the one Church of Christ. ... It follows that the separated Churches[23] and Communities as such, though we believe them to be deficient in some respects, have been by no means deprived of significance and importance in the mystery of salvation. For the Spirit of Christ has not refrained from using them as means of salvation which derive their efficacy from the very fullness of grace and truth entrusted to the Church. ... Nevertheless, our separated brethren, whether considered as individuals or as Communities and Churches, are not blessed with that unity which Jesus Christ wished to bestow on all those who through Him were born again into one body ... (Clause 3.)

... The term “ecumenical movement” indicates the initiatives and activities planned and undertaken, according to the various needs of the Church and as opportunities offer, to promote Christian unity. These are: ... Finally, all are led to examine their own faithfulness to Christ’s will for the Church and accordingly to undertake with vigour the task of renewal and reform. ... For although the Catholic Church has been endowed with all divinely revealed truth and with all means of grace, yet its members fail to live by them with all the fervour that they should, so that the radiance of the Church’s image is less clear in the eyes of our separated brethren and of the world at large, and the growth of God’s kingdom is delayed. ... This Sacred Council is gratified to note that the participation by the Catholic faithful in ecumenical work is growing daily. It commends this work to the bishops everywhere in the world to be vigorously stimulated by them and guided with prudence. (Clause 4.)

The attainment of union is the concern of the whole Church, faithful and shepherds alike... (Clause 5.)

... In certain special circumstances, such as the prescribed prayers “for unity,” and during ecumenical gatherings, it is allowable, indeed desirable that Catholics should join in prayer with their separated brethren. ... Yet worship in common (communicatio in sacris) is not to be considered as a means to be used indiscriminately for the restoration of Christian unity. (Clause 8.)

... Most valuable for this purpose are meetings of the two sides – especially for discussion of theological problems where each can treat with the other on an equal footing – provided that those who take part in them are truly competent and have the approval of the bishops. From such dialogue will emerge still more clearly what the situation of the Catholic Church really is. (Clause 9.)

Sacred theology and other branches of knowledge, especially of an historical nature, must be taught with due regard for the ecumenical point of view, so that they may correspond more exactly with the facts. (Clause 10.)

... When comparing doctrines with one another, they should remember that in Catholic doctrine there exists a “hierarchy” of truths, since they vary in their relation to the fundamental Christian faith. (Clause 11.)

... All believers in Christ can, through this cooperation, be led to acquire a better knowledge and appreciation of one another, and so pave the way to Christian unity. (Clause 12.) ... Therefore some worship in common (communicatio in sacris), given suitable circumstances and the approval of Church authority, is not only possible but to be encouraged. (Clause 15.)

... Far from being an obstacle to the Church’s unity, a certain diversity of customs and observances only adds to her splendour, and is of great help in carrying out her mission, as has already been stated. (Clause 16.)

The Roman Catholic Church under the leadership of John XXIII and Paul VI had indeed moved a long way. The use of the expression a “hierarchy” of truths suggested that not everything was absolute truth, that tradition, syncretism and enculturation had introduced misunderstandings, and that, in the interests of Christian Unity and world understanding they may be expendable. When this is read together with the agonizing reappraisal of Christian-Jewish relations which was proceeding at a pace within the World Council of Churches there was real hope that at last the trouble in the triangle was being understood.

~ December

~ 24: When Vietcong rebels attacked the US military billets in Saigon, President Johnson again refused to sanction raids into North Vietnam.

As long as the United States declined to do so there was always a hope that a diplomatic solution would be found. However it would soon become apparent that the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel was still getting in the way, and the determination of those who controlled the direction of the great Western Powers were intent on ensuring that no socio-economic system other than their preferred version of Democratic Capitalism - in cooperation with a few Fascist dictatorships of course - would gain a foothold. The challenge to the amorphous Christian gel by Marxist Communism simply had to be suppressed.

~ 1965

~ January

~ Relations between Indonesia and Malaysia had broken down progressively in late in 1963 Sukarno adopted a policy of confrontation towards his neighbour. Now, on Malaysia being seated in the Security Council, Indonesia withdrew from the United Nations. Later in the year Singapore withdrew from the federation and constituted itself as an independent republic.

- ~ And in the West Bank, Palestinian dissatisfaction at the progress being made by the young PLO led to the formation of a Fatah militia group, 'The Storm,' to carry out commando raids into the Jewish State.
- ~ February
- ~ Further Vietcong attacks on US installations persuaded Johnson to authorize air strikes against North Vietnam.
- ~ United States Cold War strategists expected that the development and deployment of Surface to Air Missiles (SAMs) would counter the use of both long range bombers and Ground-launched Cruise Missiles GLCMs. This had serious implication for the security of Western Europe which was in the firing line, and France demanded changes to the structure of NATO, recalled its officers, and threatened to withdraw altogether if there was not a realignment of authority.
- ~ March
- ~ 8: The first United States ground troops went into action in Vietnam and the pace and intensity of the war rapidly accelerated.
- ~ July
- ~ The Geneva disarmament conference resumed under the shadow of France's threat to withdraw from NATO. The United States resisted pressure for a transfer of weapon sites, and the Soviet Union pressed for all foreign troops to be withdrawn from Europe. A few months later France increased its demands to either the withdrawal of all NATO forces from its territory or their subordination to French command.
- ~ September
- ~ In China, under the Communist Party's 16-point program, and with the formation of the Red Guards, the Cultural Revolution was stepped up, the removal of the elite from all public offices gathered momentum, and so did the suppression of the churches.
- ~ 30: The Sukarno regime in Indonesia fell in a double coup in which a group of army conspirators intended to eliminate the entire ruling military government. The kidnapped and murdered six generals but one, Nasution, escaped. However General Suharto, commander of the army's strategic reserve, seized the initiative, removed the president and assumed power himself. There were conflicting claims about whether the Communist Party (PKI) was involved at all and, if so, in which coup - to topple the president or the army or both. The new army leadership resolved to eliminate them anyway, and over the following months several hundred thousand people across Java and Bali were slaughtered. (Estimates range from 80,000 to over a million.) Stripped of much of his power, and facing student unrest, Sukarno was forced to delegate extensive powers to Suharto. Who was appointed acting president two years later. He assumed full powers in March 1968.
- ~ November
- ~ 11: The Ian Smith regime in Southern Rhodesia responded to the OAU's action and the growing nationalist movements with a unilateral declaration of Independence.
- ~ December

~ 8: VATICAN II: FOURTH SESSION

~ The final session of the Second Vatican Council saw the release of an historic deluge of eleven major documents.

They included the two remaining key documents, the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, plus decrees, declarations or statements on missionary work; the ministries of bishops, priests and the laity; the training of priests; the renewal of religious life; relations with communities of faiths other than Christianity; and the divisive Declaration on Religious Freedom which has already been discussed. There was indeed a breathe of wind - a touch of the Spirit - wafting through the sacred halls of Rome. It threatened to become a gale, sweeping all the cobwebs before it. In the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World the Council said, in part:

Though mankind is stricken with wonder at its own discoveries and its power, it often raises anxious questions about the current trend of the world, about the place and role of man in the universe, about the meaning of its individual and collective strivings, and about the ultimate destiny of reality and of humanity. ... Therefore ... proclaiming the noble destiny of man and championing the godlike seed which has been sown in him, [the Council] offers to mankind the honest assistance of the Church in fostering that brotherhood of all men which corresponds to this destiny of theirs. Inspired by no earthly ambition, the Church seeks but a solitary goal: to carry forward the work of Christ under the lead of the befriending Spirit. And Christ entered this world to give witness to the truth, to rescue and not to sit in judgment, to serve and not to be served. (Clause 3.)

Today, the human race is involved in a new stage of history. Profound and rapid changes are spreading by degrees around the whole world. Triggered by the intelligence and creative energies of man, these changes recoil upon him, upon his decisions and desires, both individual and collective, and upon his manner of thinking and acting with respect to things and to people. Hence we can already speak of a true cultural and social transformation, one which has repercussions on man's religious life as well. ... Never has the human race enjoyed such an abundance of wealth, resources and economic power, and yet a huge proportion of the world's citizens are still tormented by hunger and poverty, while countless numbers suffer from total illiteracy. Never before has man had so keen an understanding of freedom, yet at the same time, new forms of social and psychological slavery make their appearance. Although the world of today has a very vivid awareness of its unity and of how one man depends on another in needful solidarity, it is most grievously torn into opposing camps by conflicting forces. ... political, social, economic, racial and ideological disputes still continue bitterly, and with them the peril of a war which would reduce everything to ashes ... (while) ... man painstakingly searches for a better world, without a corresponding spiritual advancement. (Clause 4.)

Today's spiritual agitation and the changing conditions of life are part of a broader and deeper revolution. As a result of the latter, intellectual formation is ever increasingly based on the mathematical and natural sciences and on those dealing with man himself, while in the practical order the technology which stems from these sciences takes on mounting importance. ... Advances in biology, psychology, and the social sciences not only bring men hope of improved self-knowledge; in conjunction with technical methods, they are helping men exert direct influence on the life of social groups. (Clause 5.)

A change in attitudes and in human structures frequently calls accepted values into question, especially among young people, who have grown impatient on more than one occasion, and indeed become rebels in their distress. Aware of their own influence in the life of society, they want a part in it sooner. This frequently causes parents and educators to experience greater difficulties day by day in discharging their tasks. The institutions, laws and modes of thinking and feeling as handed down from previous generations do not always seem to be well adapted to the contemporary state of affairs; hence arises an upheaval in the manner and even the norms of behaviour. (Clause 7.)

... it [therefore] devolves on humanity to establish a political, social and economic order which will growingly serve man and help individuals as well as groups to affirm and develop the dignity proper to them. (Clause 9.)

The Declaration on the Relation of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, Nostra Aetate, was even more exciting.⁴²

The Catholic Church rejects nothing that is true and holy in [Non-Christian] religions. She regards with sincere reverence those ways of conduct and of life, those precepts and teachings which, though differing in many aspects from the ones she holds and sets forth, nonetheless often reflect a ray of that Truth which enlightens all men. Indeed, she proclaims, and ever must proclaim Christ, "the way the truth, and the life" (John 14, 6), in whom men may find the fullness of religious life, in whom God has reconciled all things to Himself .

The Church therefore, exhorts her sons, that through dialogue and collaboration with the followers of other religions, carried out with prudence and love and in witness to the Christian faith and life, they recognize, preserve and promote the good things, spiritual and moral, as well as the socio-cultural values found among these men. (Clause 2.)

That was a shift of monumental proportions from the policies and conduct of the church over 1,700 years. It was also a matter of some irony, considering that during the preceding three hundred years it had been doing its damndest to syncretize many of the precepts, teachings and practices of such religions in order to absorb their populations. But in view of the church's absolute rejection of the ministry of the Prophet Muhammad which had triggered the establishment of the triangle, and then its disastrous efforts to squash the triangle flat with the ghastly Crusades and a series of political manoeuvres over a long period, what was to follow was even more dramatic.

The Church regards with esteem also the Moslems. They adore the one God, living and subsisting in Himself, merciful and all-powerful, the Creator of heaven and earth (5), who has spoken to men; they take pains to submit wholeheartedly to even His inscrutable decrees, just as Abraham, with whom the faith of Islam takes great pleasure in linking itself, submitted to God. Though they do not acknowledge Jesus as God, they revere Him as a prophet. They also honour Mary, His virgin mother; at times they even call on her with devotion. In addition, they await the day of judgement when God will render their deserts to all those who have been raised up from the dead. Finally, they value the moral life and worship God especially through prayer, almsgiving and fasting. Since in the course of centuries not a few quarrels and hostilities have arisen between Christians and Moslems, this Sacred Synod urges all to forget the past and to work sincerely for mutual understanding and to preserve as well as to promote together for the benefit of all mankind social justice and moral welfare, as well as peace and freedom. (Clause 3.) And so were the passages dealing with the Jews and their faith.

... the Church ... remembers the bond that spiritually ties the people of the New Covenant to Abraham's stock. Thus [it] acknowledges that, according to God's saving design, the beginnings of her faith and her election are found already among the Patriarchs, Moses and the prophets. She professes that all who believe in Christ — Abraham's sons according to faith — are included in the same Patriarch's call, and likewise that the salvation of the Church is mysteriously foreshadowed by the chosen people's exodus from the land of bondage. The Church, therefore, cannot forget that she received the revelation of the Old Testament through the people with whom God in His inexpressible mercy concluded the Ancient Covenant. Nor can she forget that she draws sustenance from the root of that well-cultivated olive tree onto which have been grafted the wild shoots, the Gentiles. Indeed, the Church believes that by His cross Christ Our Peace reconciled Jews and Gentiles, making both one in Himself. ...

Since the spiritual patrimony common to Christians and Jews is thus so great, this Sacred Synod wants to foster and recommend that mutual understanding and respect which is the fruit, above all, of biblical and theological studies as well as fraternal dialogues.

True, the Jewish authorities and those who followed their lead pressed for the death of Christ; still, what happened in His passion cannot be charged against all the Jews, without distinction, then alive, nor against the Jews of today. Although the Church is the new People of God, the Jews should not be presented as rejected or accursed by God, as if this followed from the Holy Scriptures. All should see to it, then, that in catechetical work or in the preaching of the Word of God they do not teach anything that does not conform to the truth of the Gospel and the spirit of Christ.

No foundation therefore remains for any theory or practice that leads to discrimination between man and the man or people and people, so far as their human dignity and the rights flowing from it are concerned. The Church reproves, as foreign to the mind of Christ, any discrimination against men or harassment of them because of their race, colour, condition of life, or religion. On the contrary, following in the footsteps of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, this Sacred Synod ardently implores the Christian faithful to "maintain good fellowship among the nations" (1 Peter 2, 12), and, if possible to live for their part in peace with all men, so that they many truly be sons of the Father who is in heaven. (Clause 5.)

Nostra Aetate was indeed a remarkable document. Vatican II under John XXIII and then Paul VI had not only swept aside the efforts of Pius XII to maintain the momentum of the church's self-understanding and its efforts to keep the Jews in subjection, it had leapt far ahead of anything which Pius XI had hoped to achieve in the Hidden Encyclical. But the church could not bring itself to accept that the Covenant of Sinai was still, and always had been, firmly in place. Thus, being unable to recognize or to accept that fact, and being also unable to accept the validity of the Qur'anic prophecies - even though it had come to accept Muslims as persons and sincere believers - it still had no hope of comprehending the meaning and consequences of the trouble in the triangle. That being the case, the integrated consequences of the Covenant of Sinai and the Qur'anic prophesy of the Night Journey simply had to flow on. However there was a glimmer of hope that the process would not take too long, because in his closing address to the Council, Paul VI moved even further away from the contentious interpretations of Mariology than the council had done in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church. He said:⁴³

... note what is taking place here this morning. While we close the ecumenical council, we are honouring Mary Most Holy, the mother of Christ, and consequently, as we declared on another occasion, the mother of God and our spiritual mother. We are honouring Mary Most Holy, the Immaculate One, therefore innocent, stupendous, perfect. She is the woman, the true woman who is both ideal and real, the creature in whom the image of God is reflected with absolute clarity, without any disturbance, as happens in every other human creature.

And in the closing liturgy which was read by other members of the hierarchy he had a word for "those who hold in their hands the destiny of men on this earth, to all those who hold temporal power" - especially the great powers - on their need to consider the Will of God And he did not link it to any claim of superior or prior authority for the church. That was a remarkable leap forward as well.

We proclaim publicly: We do honour to your authority and your sovereignty, we respect your office, we recognize your just laws, we esteem those who make them and those who apply them. But we have a sacrosanct word to speak to you and it is this: Only God is great. God alone is the beginning and the end. God alone is the source of your authority and the foundation of your laws.

~ 1965 drew to a close on a high note of expectation for some of the smaller newly-independent countries. OPEC's first few years had not been very spectacular, and very few people knew very much about it, except that it was a nasty 'cartel' which was trying to milk the Western World's energy consumes. Its main concerns had been the consolidation of profit sharing through revised taxation arrangements; the development of confidence among its members; and a growing identification with the interests and needs of all Third World countries. This community of interest was now demonstrated in a very meaningful manner by Kuwait. It established the first of a series of development aid funds to assist other countries through commodity-income grants and loans.

~ 1966

~ Then, as the new year progressed, OPEC and its members began to take the initiative more strongly and to break new ground. Indonesia pioneered the production-sharing principle for new leases and Iran negotiated the first government to government sale of royalty crude. This was seen by the oil companies as an attack on the free enterprise system and they opposed it vigorously. Because of this the early sales were all of a barter or development-aid type with Eastern European countries. No money changed hands. It was very similar to the earlier Russia-Cuba oil for sugar deal which had so upset the major oil companies and the US administration.

~ January

~ Nigeria suffered two bloody coups in quick succession. In January the prime minister was among the many national leaders killed in a military coup, then the military government was treated to the same fate in a counter coup in July.

~ March

~ The inter-religious peace organization (see 1962) held a national conference in Washington with some 500 participants. While it was still basically an organization of Christians and Jews, it was gradually moving towards establishing an international organization embracing all faiths.

~ April

~ The undeclared war between the Arab states and Israel was getting gradually more destructive and there appeared to be less and less will by the great powers to intervene to disentangle the web of animosity and hatred which the trouble in the triangle had spawned. In one act of 'retaliation' the Israeli Defence Force blew up 14 houses in two villages which they claimed had harboured infiltrators.

~ June

~ 24: Pope Paul VI issued the encyclical Sacerdotalis Caelibatus, confirming that celibacy was to remain the standard circumstance for Catholic priests.

~ August

~ Chairman Mao Tse-tung launched China's Cultural Revolution in an attempt to stamp out traditional cultural values and ensure compliance with his personal political philosophy. Schools were shut and cadres of former student Red Guards were organized to 'cleanse' their communities of all bourgeois values. Within two years the level of national industrial productivity had fallen by 12 per cent, China had become politically very unstable and it was virtually an international pariah for 11 years.

~ The nature of the action in Middle East changed to more deliberate military warfare when units from Israel and Syria fought a pitched battle in the region of the Sea of Galilee in the vicinity of the contentious water diversion schemes.

~ November

~ 13: In the biggest retaliatory action to that date the IDF launched an armoured assault on three West Bank towns south of Hebron.

~ December

- ~ 19: The UN General Assembly endorsed a treaty on the peaceful uses of outer space.

Formally titled a Treaty on Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space, including the Moon and Other Celestial Bodies, it came into effect on October 10, 1967 after being ratified by the US, USSR, UK and a number of other countries. On the same day the UN opened the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights for signature by member countries, but it was 10 years before sufficient countries had signed for it to enter into force. It incorporated most of the rights set out in the Declaration of Human Rights in 1948. Reflecting a strong continuing dissatisfaction among radical groups with the pace of change in employment and discriminatory practices in the United States, race riots occurred in many cities.

~ 1967

- ~ Western European countries were as concerned as ever that a small border incident may trigger a nuclear attack from the Soviet Union, and they pressured the US to develop a policy which would avoid such a situation while maintaining capacity for conventional weapons wars on the continent. A policy of “flexible response” was developed. They should have been showing more interest in the border incidents in the Middle East.

~ April

- ~ 7: Conflict over the cultivation of land which was disputed by Israel and Syria in what was supposed to be a demilitarized border zone led to two actions which were, in effect, a curtain raiser for the main event which was only two months away.

~ May

- ~ Following the actions in April, the Arab states became convinced that Israel had decided to invade Syria, possibly with the aim of overthrowing the Baath Party regime.

The Syrian intelligence service advised Nasser on the 8th that they were expecting an attack; reports from Lebanon of Israeli troop movements near the border tended to confirm that; Israeli prime minister Eshkol fuelled the fears when he announced twice, on the 9th and the 12th that Israel would carry out reprisals against Syria if it continued to support Fatah attacks; and the New York Times converted speculation to near-fact when it reported that Israeli leaders had decided that the use of force against Syria “may be the only way to curtail increasing terrorism.”⁴⁴ Next day, on the 13th, the Soviet Union advised both Syria and Egypt that its own intelligence reports confirmed the presence of Israeli troops massing near the Syrian frontier. But those reports did not correspond with UNTSO reports which confirmed the absence of any troop concentrations on either side of the border. Disregarding those reports, the Egyptian government declared a state of emergency on the 16th and asked the UNEF to withdraw from the positions they occupied in Sinai, including Sharm es-Sheikh. Next day, following a meeting of defence and intelligence chiefs, the government was advised that if the UN forces were withdrawn the Strait of Tiran should not be closed to Israeli shipping because it “would mean cutting off the political line of retreat and make war inescapable.”⁴⁵ However the UN had no option but to do as the host government asked and make way for Egyptian forces on their own territory. On the 18th both Iraq and Kuwait announced the mobilization of their forces.

- ~ 19: The UNEF was withdrawn, the buffer zone thus disappeared, Egypt was free to move its own troops in, and everything was in place for open warfare.
- ~ 21: The Egyptian government announced the mobilization of reserves; Shuqayri announced that 8,000 fighters of the Palestine Liberation Army based in Gaza were being placed under Egyptian command; and the Israeli government concluded that Egypt had decided on war.
- ~ 23: Ignoring the advice which he had received from his defence and intelligence services, Nasser ordered that the Strait of Tiran be closed to Israeli shipping, blocking tankers from Iran, and Saudi Arabia announced that it had ordered its troops to prepare for war with Israel.

This prompted immediate great power responses. There was a “reaffirmation” from President Johnson that the Gulf of Aqaba is an international waterway and that the blockade of Israeli shipping is therefore illegal. His Secretary of State, Dean Rusk, told him, after discussions with Congressional leaders, that Congress would support Israel but was opposed to unilateral intervention. The Soviet Union announced, without naming Egypt or the blockade, that: “Should anyone try to unleash aggression in the Near East, he would be met not only with the united strength of Arab countries but also with strong opposition to aggression from the Soviet Union.” The UN Security Council met, and continued in session for several days, and the Soviet Union consistently rejected moves to compel Egypt to lift the blockade. Next day De Gaulle refused to reconfirm France’s commitment to an open canal policy and warned Israel that France would not support it in a “shoot first” policy.

- ~ 24: Jordan joined the growing number of Arab countries which had ordered mobilization.
- ~ 27: A critical decision was taken by the Israeli government, by a split vote of nine for and nine against, that it would continue diplomatic efforts to end the Fatah incursions and that it would not, for the moment, invade Sinai to occupy Sharm es-Sheikh to reopen the Strait of Tiran. That decision incensed Israeli military leaders who told their prime minister very bluntly that as war was now inevitable and only a matter of who started it first, any delay would simply add to Israeli casualties.⁴⁶

International politicking reached fever pitch. After discussions with the Soviet Union, Johnson advised Eshkol that: “Israel just must not take pre-emptive action and thereby make itself responsible for the initiation of hostilities.”⁴⁷

- ~ 28: Diplomatic and political pressure gave way to public rhetoric with Nasser’s statement at a press conference that: “We will not accept any possibility of coexistence with Israel.”
- ~ 29: The widespread bitterness and emotion throughout the Arab World at having the Jewish State imposed on by the Western powers was reflected in the prolonged applause which Nasser received in the Egyptian National Assembly⁴⁸ when he reviewed the establishment of Israel, its support by the West, and his decision to close the Strait of Tiran in a prepared address in which he said, in part:

The circumstances through which we are now passing are in fact difficult ones because we are not only confronting Israel but also those who created Israel and are behind Israel. We are confronting Israel and the West as well - the West, which created Israel and which despised us Arabs and which ignored us before and since 1948. They had no regard whatsoever for our feelings, our hopes in life, or our rights. The West completely ignored us, and the Arab nation was unable to check the West's course. ...

Now, eleven years after 1956, we are restoring things to what they were in 1956. This is from the material aspect. In my opinion this material aspect is only a small part, whereas the spiritual aspect is the great side of the issue. The spiritual aspect involves the renaissance of the Arab nation, the revival of the Palestine question, and the restoration of confidence to every Arab and to every Palestinian. This is on the basis that if we were able to restore conditions to what they were before 1956 God will surely help us and urge us to restore the situation to what it was in 1948. ...

The issue now at hand is not the Gulf of Aqabah, the Straits of Tiran, or the withdrawal of the UNEF, but the rights of the Palestinian people. It is the aggression which took place in Palestine in 1948 with the collaboration of Britain and the United States. It is the expulsion of the Arabs from Palestine, the usurpation of their rights, and the plunder of their property. It is the disavowal of all the UN resolutions in favour of the Palestinian people. ...

I said yesterday that the states that champion freedom and peace have supported us. I spoke of the support given us by India, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Yugoslavia, Malaysia, the Chinese People's Republic and the Asian and African States. ... I wish to tell you today that the Soviet Union is a friendly Power and stands by us as a friend. In all our dealings with the Soviet Union - and I have been dealing with the USSR since 1955 - it has not made a single request of us. The USSR has never interfered in our policy or internal affairs. This is the USSR as we have always known it. In fact, it is we who have made urgent requests of the USSR. Last year we asked for wheat and they sent it to us. When I also asked for all kinds of arms they gave them to us. When I met [War Minister] Shams Badran yesterday he handed me a message from the Soviet Premier Kosygin saying that the USSR supported us in this battle and would not allow any Power to intervene until matters were restored to what they were in 1956.⁴⁹

- ~ 30: Hussein flew unexpectedly to Cairo; achieved a rapprochement with Nasser which reversed the tensions which had persisted since the Suez debacle; and concluded a mutual defence agreement under which Jordanian forces would be placed under Egyptian command in the event of a war with Israel.
- ~ 31: The president of Iraq echoed Nasser's address, saying: "The existence of Israel is an error which must be rectified. This is our opportunity to wipe out the ignominy which has been with us since 1948. Our goal; is clear - to wipe Israel off the map."⁵⁰
- ~ However the Arabs and the Israelis could not have the war games to themselves. Less than a year after the second of its coups, Nigeria was plunged into three years of the Biafran Civil War as issues of religious and ethnic division, control of the oil rich eastern regions, demands for regional autonomy, and a declaration of independence by the eastern regions under the name Biafra caused enormous confusion.

~ June

- ~ 1: Under great pressure from the IDF chiefs, and having been confronted by Brigadier General Ezer Weizman who through his IDF insignia on the prime minister's desk with the words "Jewish history will never forgive you if you do not declare war", Eshkol relinquished the post of defence minister which he had held jointly as prime minister, appointed General Moshe Dayan, and invited Menachem Begin to join the cabinet as a minister without portfolio.⁵¹
- ~ 3: With preparation for war well advanced, the Israeli cabinet voted to take a pre-emptive strike against Egypt with forces facing Jordan and Syria to be held in a defensive posture, even if they are attacked⁵².
- ~ 5: The war which the world had to have, the immediate trigger for which was conflict over competing water diversion schemes, burst with a devastating attack by Israel on Arab targets. Kosygin used the "hot line" to Johnson for the first time. They agreed that the superpowers should stay out of the war and encourage a cease-fire.⁵³
- ~ 9: Nasser broadcast to the nation, setting out again the background to the crisis from the Arab perspective, admitting a "setback" and noting the lessons which had to be learned in terms of "three vital facts:"

(1) The elimination of imperialism in the Arab world will leave Israel with its own intrinsic power; yet, whatever the circumstances, however long it may take, the Arab intrinsic power is greater and more effective. (2) Redirecting Arab interests in the service of Arab rights is an essential safeguard: the American Sixth Fleet moved with Arab oil, and there are Arab bases, placed forcibly and against the will of the peoples, in the service of aggression. (3) The situation now demands a united word from the entire Arab nation; this, in the present circumstances, is irreplaceable guarantee.

He then announced that he was taking full personal responsibility for the setback, and that he was resigning from all public office.

The forces of imperialism imagine that Jamal Abd al-Nasser is their enemy. I want it to be clear to them that their enemy is the entire Arab nation, not just Jamal Abd al-Nasser. The forces hostile to the Arab national movement try to portray this movement as an empire of Abd al-Nasser. This is not true, because the aspiration for Arab unity began before Abd al-Nasser and will remain after Abd al-Nasser.

However as a result of the public display of national emotion and demonstrations across the country he reversed that decision next day and remained in office.

- ~ 10: The Soviet Union, followed quickly by each of the Soviet bloc countries except Romania, severed diplomatic relations with Israel and Kosygin used the hot line again to warn Johnson that if Israel pressed on to Damascus the Soviet Union would intervene. Johnson assured him that the Israelis would stop, but directed the Sixth Fleet to the Syrian coast as a signal that if the Soviet Union intervened the United States would also.

Following the capture of the Golan Heights the IDF discontinued the action and a cease fire was observed by all warring parties at 6.30 pm..

~ 23: Johnson and Kosygin met for two days in New Jersey, but they were poles apart in their views on a solution to the overall Arab-Israel question - and also on the question of Vietnam - and no concrete agreements were reached.

~ 27: The Israeli Knesset resolved to formally annex, or incorporate Arab East Jerusalem, the old city, and surrounding areas into the sovereign State of Israel.

The world knows that brief and bruising encounter as the Six Day War and as a dramatic victory over the might of its larger Arab neighbours in an action taken in self-defence by a small state which had not yet celebrated its twentieth anniversary. It was certainly an action taken in self-defence, but the reality was that the outbreak of the war was the consequences of the cumulative effects of the policies of the amorphous Christian gel and the victory was made possible through the support of the same gel. The war solved nothing. It did not greatly improve Israel's security and it actually complicated the situation by greatly lengthening the perimeter it had to defend. During the course of the war, Israel occupied all of the remaining territory which had been allocated for a Palestinian state, viz., the West Bank (Judea and Samaria) Gaza and Sinai, and the Syrian Golan Heights as well. Its security was dependent on the continued provision of an umbrella by the United States. What the war did was change a number of relationships, introduce a number of new factors into the trouble in the triangle and permanently anchor the Middle East as the focal point of world affairs and world relationships. It ensured that those relationships would come under increasing strain until such time that the basis of the trouble in the triangle was recognized and understood and a concerted effort was made to dismantle it.

And in doing so it demonstrated more clearly that the events of the previous twenty years that the conduct of the State of Israel was a parody on Herzl's Der Judenstaat. Mein Kampf, Hitler's parody of the amorphous Christian gel, was simply an encapsulation of the attitudes, self-understanding and conduct of the amorphous Christian gel which he proceeded to put into effect with devastating efficiency. Since 1948 the conduct of the Zionist State of Israel had been in sharp contrast to all of the grand principles which Herzl had set out as the basis for the State of Israel which he worked so hard to bring into being - right to the point of inviting the former leader of the criminal terrorist gang, Irgun Zvai Leumi, into the government as a minister without portfolio. (Chapter 15) It was the Irgun and Stern Group which massacred 254 defenceless civilians at the village of Deir Yassin on April 9, 1948, and triggered the mass exodus of Palestinians. (Chapter 27) He was now drawn into the government with the clear intention that he should be able to bring his vast experience of such matters to bear on the conduct of the country's defence and security systems. His appointment, which was opposed by many of the more moderate Israeli leaders, has been described as "a revolutionary change in Israeli political history."⁵⁴ It was much more than that. It was a matter of pasting a few more negative points on the Covenant 'score card' which would have to be offset by some positive points in due course. But in another sense nothing had changed. That Covenant was still firmly in place and the People Israel, or World Jewry, was still the instrument of Divine Will through which the trouble in the triangle would be exposed and by means of which humanity would be enabled to move towards the Messianic Age of Maimonides' expectations. (Chapter 8) The stage had been reached that to be able to dismantle the crisis it was necessary to recognize the twin parodies and move to redress them. And it was, and still is, for the Christian church to defuse the fundamental cause of the tension through developing a new self-understanding and totally new relationships, and the starting point for that is the repudiation of the Doctrine of the Trinity.

There is really no need to review the conduct of the war in detail. Israel struck hard to eliminate the air power of the Arab states, especially Egypt, before they had a chance to strike at targets in Israel. Its ground forces made rapid progress through Gaza and Sinai, and swept through East Jerusalem and the West Bank. Then, after some delay because of the fear of Soviet intervention, not wanting to fight on all fronts at once, and because of the more difficult terrain and well equipped opposition, it made a lunge against the Syrian army and soon gained control of the Golan Heights as well. It was all over in a flash. But there were a few obvious changes in relationships and power balances at the time which each of the great powers fed into their strategic planning programs, notably the United States, and these are important. However, whatever the amorphous Christian gel did to consolidate its position of power and privilege just compounded the trouble in the triangle so that further wars in the Middle East would erupt periodically. This was the third in a sequence: 1948, triggered by the imposed establishment of the state; 1956, the Sinai-Suez War; now 1967, triggered by competition for water resources - each one getting progressively more complex - and there was no reason to believe that the sequence would not continue until the trouble in the triangle is ultimately dismantled by one means or another.

~ August

~ Right wing and radical religious groups helped to ensure that it would continue when they established the Land of Israel Movement and called on the Israeli government never to surrender any territory. And at the same time US Defence Secretary McNamara made it quite clear that current approaches to the other big war of the time, in Vietnam, was doing nothing to resolve the issues which ostensibly justified foreign intervention. He told a Senate sub-committee that the US bombing was ineffective. A few weeks later Johnson announced that the United States would stop the bombing in exchange for 'productive discussions.'

~ November

~ 22: The UN Security Council adopted Resolution 242 in a bid to find a settlement between Israel and its neighbours.

Essentially the UN sought to resolve the issues of legitimacy and territory. Realistically it could do nothing else. It certainly did nothing to address the trouble in the triangle. It could not. That initiative had to come from the church. There was no such initiative in sight. The UN called for the withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict; the termination of all claims and belligerency; respect for, and acknowledgement of, the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every state in the area, and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries, free from threats or acts of force. It also called for a guarantee of freedom of passage through international waterways in the area; a just settlement of the refugee problem; and the establishment of demilitarized zones under UN supervision to ensure political and territorial inviolability. Israel and all Arab states accepted the resolution as a basis for permanent settlement, but Syria and the PLO did not. They felt constrained by two things: the annexation of East Jerusalem by Israel on June 27, and the establishment of the Land of Israel Movement.

As a matter of logic, the Palestine Liberation Organization moved its base to Jordan, King Hussein's Hashemite Kingdom, which had been the eastern half of the previously mandated territory of Palestine and therefore had a significant proportion of Palestinians in its total population. The combined movement of ethnic Palestinians from west of the Jordan to the east as a result of the wars of 1948, 1956 and now the 1967 Six Day War was that the ethnic Palestinian population became a majority of the population of Jordan and progressively changed the social and employment pattern of the kingdom. Tensions were inevitable as the PLO sought stronger support from the king for its claims and the king sought to prevent guerrilla activities being launched from Jordan.

But that was not the only consequence for Jordan. The Israeli government had given an undertaking, through UN emissaries that it would not invade the West Bank, which Jordan had formally annexed in 1950, if Jordan stayed out of the war. Clearly that was not realistic for Jordan. It was the principal protector of the Palestinians whose interests were a key factor in the war, and it was in an alliance with Egypt and Syria. Thus, having failed to persuade Jordan to stay out of the war, Israel invaded the West Bank as soon as Hussein ordered the Arab Legion to shell positions in the Jewish sector of Jerusalem. The occupation of the West Bank meant that Jordan's territory was back to its former area, but its economy was seriously undermined because it had become largely dependent upon that area for growth. It lost control of East Jerusalem and responsibility for a great number of key religious sites. Its relationship with Britain was in tatters and it became more dependent on its relationships with its Arab neighbours.

The occupation of both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip by Israel immediately meant that the Palestinian question assumed an even greater importance in Middle East and international affairs. Large populations of Arabs came under Israeli rule and that meant that the United Nations would be required to play a much bigger role. But when one quarter of the population of the West Bank, about 220,000 persons, fled across the Jordan into the Kingdom of Jordan proper the complications became greater. The need for UN-managed refugee camps increased, and so did the opportunity for the government of Israel to increase the number of Jewish settlers in the areas vacated. In that sense it was an extension of the refugee crisis of 1948. In the case of Syria's Golan Heights the situation was even more stark. From an estimated 120,000 before the war, the population fell to a mere six to seven thousand.

But there was a big question about who would develop the UN policy, how it would be administered, and whether the United States would recognize whatever policy was decided. The number of Third World countries was now such that they could determine votes on the floor of the assembly and, as Nasser had told his parliament, many of them were sympathetic to the Palestinian cause. Since the passage of the resolutions on decolonization another 22 member countries had been admitted - everyone from the Third World - lifting total membership to 122. But that counted for little if they could not enforce decisions taken. If the United States did not want a decision acted on, it was most unlikely to be put into effect. And in addition, since the Suez crisis Israel had mounted a strong diplomatic effort to strengthen its relationships with a number of newly-independent Third World countries, notably in Sub-Saharan Africa, in a deliberate effort to counter the Arab trade boycott. It had provided packages of technological and development assistance - especially in matters of security which were of concern to a number of governments - and it established an extensive program of scholarships and other assistance to enable students and technicians from Africa to study and train in Israel in specialized fields.⁵⁵

There were also significant resource implications as well as the human and territorial implications. Egypt's oil fields in the Mount Tanaka region of Sinai and its facilities at Abu Rudeis with a capacity developed to 75,000 barrels of crude per day fell under Israel's control, so the commercial and strategic balances shifted and Israel was relieved, in part, of its reliance on Iranian oil obtained under United States protection. And concerning the issue which actually triggered the war - water - in place of Syrian armour which could command the water diversion schemes of the River Jordan, Lake Tiberias (the Sea of Galilee) and Upper Galilee, there was Israeli armour which could also overlook Damasus from an open-territory distance of less than 40 miles compared with about 75 miles from the nearest former Syrian positions to Jerusalem. Israeli forces completely surrounded the lake and were in complete control of all of the water resources of the region. Syria, Jordan and the West Bank settlers were totally dependent upon the future goodwill of Israel for water supplies for their most productive agricultural areas as well as a large proportion of their industrial and domestic requirements.

But the implications rolled on and on and were far wider. The Eisenhower Doctrine which was designed to ensure America's succession to Britain as the key foreign power in the Middle East, and which, in isolation, had never been viable, was now a sham. To seek to be the principal supplier of arms to a number of neighbouring countries may be a sustainable policy if they are all on good terms or if, as the United States had been trying to do, the supplier could keep the lid on tensions and retain good relations with each of them. But when there is deep division between them and the possibility of war, it becomes untenable. Nasser's statements to the Assembly in Cairo in which he had encapsulated the Arab national feeling very well indeed, made that patently clear. A country proposing such a policy as the Eisenhower Doctrine must be able to determine against whom the weapons will be used and, in effect, control each country's foreign policy. If spontaneous good relations do not exist, then that is only possible by dangling the carrots of preferential treatment in other respects, notably trade; by buying inaction through development grants or other forms of 'bought peace;' by heavy handed threats to withdraw existing benefits; or by threats of direct intervention. A firm rebuff, or tension over the way in which the relationship is managed, can only push a country towards an alternative supplier and the tensions must immediately rise because more direct competition for relationships is encouraged..

This was exactly the situation into which the United States had blundered. It could not supply countries which were likely to go to war with Israel without the means to prevent them from doing so. But it wanted their oil and it wanted its barrier between them and the Soviet Union, so it had to devise ways and means of preventing them from going to war. Because it had sought, and gained, commercial control of the lion's share of the petroleum resources of the region it had to be able to maintain strategic control, or be prepared to substitute alternative sources of supply, at least for the duration of any periods of conflict. And if, in the event of a war between the neighbours it intervened directly in support of Israel, the period of substitution may extend indefinitely, or require military intervention to maintain control, either in short term "protective" exercise, or with permanent bases. In any case, the relationships are bound to be difficult, with an undercurrent of widespread public unease, even if the governments of the day are constrained to the arrangements. This had already been demonstrated several times by the violent revolutionary or military overthrow of governments which were seen to be lackeys of the British government. Within weeks of the cease fire being put into effect the Soviet Union began replacing the arms and equipment which the Arab countries had lost, regardless of whether the original equipment had been supplied by it or by the United States, and installed surface to air missiles along the Suez Canal as a cover for Egypt's artillery emplacements and defence against air attack on its air force bases where almost its entire fleet of aircraft had been destroyed on the ground twice, just a few years apart. By the end of 1968 the Soviet Union had re-supplied the Arab states with arms and equipment to the value of $2.5 billion and had provided between 2,000 and 3,000 military training advisers.⁵⁶ At the same time President Johnson agreed to sell Israel 50 Phantom jets, just before he left office, to offset the French Mirage jets which De Gaulle had withheld following the Six Day War. He also increased military assistance loans to Israel from $7 million in 1967 to $25 million in 1968.⁵⁷

During the Six Day War America's relationships under the Eisenhower Doctrine were indeed put to the test and found wanting. Immediately the war erupted several Arab states imposed a ban on the export of crude oil, but the United States simply side-stepped it by increasing domestic production of crude by one million barrels per day to supply Britain and France and drawing on its enormous reserves. The ban therefore had no effect and was soon lifted. However, as a result of that experience, and knowing from the way in which the British and United States governments and their oil industries had previously wielded the "oil weapon" with devastating effect against countries which were out of favour, the Arab governments recognised the need for a regional grouping within the OPEC. The concept of withholding resources to safeguard their interests, notably in relations with Israel and the USA as its main supplier of arms, had to be fine tuned, ready to put into effect in the event of another such emergency. The Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries (OAPEC) was established. The new organization included some countries which were not members of OPEC.

About four months after the Six Day War an incident occurred which threatened to blow out into another full scale war. The distinct possibility that a more definite and more effective oil embargo could then be applied against the allies of Israel, added urgency to their deliberations within the United Nations. In that incident, on October 21, Egyptian naval vessels sunk an Israeli destroyer, Eilat, which they claimed had violated Egyptian territorial waters and was heading for Port Said in a provocative manner. Three days later the IDF responded with a massive artillery barrage, destroying two oil refineries at Suez.

When the UN Security Council then negotiated an urgent cease-fire and subsequently passed Resolution 242, calling for a withdrawal from all occupied regions, the Israelis were willing to view their conquests (except Jerusalem) as bargaining chips, but they insisted on Arab recognition of the right of Israel to exist and firm guarantees against future attack. The so-called front line Arab states were at first neither able (for domestic reasons) nor willing to give such guarantees and instead courted Soviet and Third World support against "US-Israeli imperialism." Hence Israel remained both greatly enlarged and possessed of shorter, more defensible borders, although it did acquire the problem of administering more than a million Arabs in Gaza and the West Bank, and the UN resolutions failed to address the refugee problem adequately and it was unable to enforce an Israeli withdrawal from occupied territories in the manner to which Israel had formally agreed.

And while the Security Council called for the principle of free navigation through all of the international waterways to be recognized, that call was easily circumvented by the simple expedient of leaving scuttled ships in the Suez Canal and refusing permission for their clearance. Israel had access to the Eilat, but the world had to revert to transporting all its goods of trade around the Cape of Good Hope, and its naval fleets had to use the same route. The canal remained closed from the Six Day War until after the next one. While that closure did not greatly inconvenience Israel, because oil tankers were able to access Eilat via the Strait of Tiran and it has unimpeded shipping access to its Mediterranean ports, it deprived Egypt of significant income from transit fees, and it also added to freight costs and inconvenience for shippers serving Europe and Asia via the Cape of Good Hope. It was cleared and reopened in 1975.

Another consequence of the Six Day War which previous crises in the Middle East had failed to achieve was that the World Council of Churches completed a serious reconsideration of the interfaith implications of the establishment of the State of Israel. The study had been proposed by its Faith and Order Commission three years earlier, and a report was ready for its meeting from July 29 to August 9, while the United Nations was struggling with the preparation of its own resolution on the crisis. The drafters had sought to answer two questions. First: in what way does the continuing existence of the Jews have theological significance for the church? – Second: In what ways should Christians give witness of their faith to Jews? The fact that the second question was even nominated indicates that there was an expectation that the study team would find no need to modify any of the church's doctrines – especially the most fundamental one, the Doctrine of the Trinity. This is supported by the fact that this study was commissioned after the assembly had confirmed the Trinitarian basis of the Council's membership and operations. The church's self-understanding therefore placed the study team under some constraints, whether it was intentional or not. It considered a range of issues including historical and theological considerations, the Church and her witness, Ecumenical relevance, and some implications which flowed from those issues. If it started at basics and considered the question of whether Jesus could be the Messiah without being God in Person, they camouflaged it well.⁵⁸ One paragraph reads:

*The fact that by far the greater part of Israel did not recognize God in Jesus Christ posed a burning question for Paul, not primarily because of the crucifixion, but because even after Christ's resurrection they still rejected him. The existence of Jews today who do not accept him puts the same question to us, because in this respect the situation today is basically the same as it was in Paul's time.*⁵⁹

It then concluded:

We feel assured that an ongoing encounter with Jews can mean a real enrichment of our faith. Christians should therefore be alert to every such possibility, both in the field of social cooperation and especially on the deeper level of theological discussion. We realize that at the moment many Jews are not willing to be involved with Christians in a common dialogue; in that case Christians must respect this expressed or silent wish and not force themselves upon them. But when such conversation is possible, it should be held in a spirit of mutual respect and openness, searching together and questioning one another, trusting that we together with the Jews will grow into a deeper understanding of the revelation of the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

*What form this further understanding may take, we must be willing to leave in his hands, confident that he will lead both Jews and Christians into the fullness of his truth.*⁶⁰

The Commission accepted the report and commended it for further theological study on a wider geographical scale. It was, however, felt that such issues as: (1) the concepts of salvation and election, and (2) the nature of God in relation to the two concepts of the People of God and the Body of Christ require a more thorough study and a more detailed examination. That report was certainly not about to rock the foundations of the church's theology and its self-understanding. The first Reformation – 'the one that got away' (chapter 10) – was still in the record books on its own. The world would have to wait for quite a while for the 'real thing' to come along.

The Six Day War also stimulated a significant shift in religious thought and life in Israel and throughout the Diaspora. The trauma and exhilaration of victory and survival of the State of Israel raised the level of consciousness of the affairs of the state among people throughout the Jewish World. In 1968, for the first time, the World Union of Progressive Judaism held its biennial conference in Jerusalem and five years later, in 1973, the central administration was transferred to Israel. Then there came another war, but two years later again the WUPJ formally affiliated with the World Zionist Organization. The international reform Movement, so long neutral on Zionism, had thus placed itself firmly under the Zionist institutional umbrella, and the process had started with the Six Day War. Although Reform theologians drew no causal connection between the Holocaust and the establishment of the Jewish State, in the wake of the seemingly miraculous salvation of the Six Day War, they did note a prevalent sense of renewed divine presence: God had not after all, it seemed, forsaken Israel.⁶¹

At the same time, Soviet support for the Arabs and the breaking off of diplomatic relations with Israel led to a deterioration in the plight of Jews in the Soviet Union, and this generated an increased sense of responsibility to do something about it among Jews in the Diaspora. The most obvious step was further pressure on the United States to intervene and to make it an issue in US-Soviet relations. This complemented a rise in the ecumenical spirit which flowed from the Second Vatican Council through Nostra Aetate in 1965, and Jews worked closely with Christians in the anti-nuclear and disarmament movements, as the interfaith movement rose higher on the agenda of Reform Judaism. However that spirit was dampened by a wave of disappointment which swept across the American Jewish community when Christian leaders remained silent during the critical period as the Six Day War approached.⁶² It was further dampened by a wave of Black anti-Semitism when Jewish slumlords were targeted during the Black civil rights campaigns, and the Black-Jewish partnership in such matters threatened to fall apart.

In fact the coincidence of the war in Vietnam and the Six Day War complicated life for the Reform Movement's Religious Action Centre considerably. Jewish War Veterans were strongly defending US involvement in Vietnam, and the Orthodox rabbinate and laity were supporting American determination to resist Communist aggression, but Reform leaders took a reverse stand and were prominent in the campaign to end the Vietnam War. The general secretary of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations had said in November 1965 that: "We transgress every tenet of our faith when we fight on another's soil, scorch the earth of another's beloved homeland, slay multitudes of innocent villages." As a result the Reform Movement had to defend itself against accusations of double standards and self interest when on one hand it was "dovish" on Vietnam but "hawkish" on Israel and Palestine. Temple Emanu-El in New York withdrew from the Union for a year because of its attitude towards the Vietnam War, and 24 congregations, about four percent of UAHC membership, supported it in doing so, although they did not withdraw.⁶³

So: the Six Day War came and went, and the Western World settled back to thinking that it had everything under control. God was in His heaven and all was right with the world. They were right to the extent that nothing had really changed. The amorphous Christian gel had not understood what was happening - that the war had been yet another challenge or another opportunity to reassess its self-understanding and its theology - so it carried on as it had been and after a pause the pressure began to build up towards the next big challenge: the Yom Kippur or October War. We could skip everything in between and go straight to it, but there are just a few pointers to note on the way, including the way in which the pressure began to build up when the West was lulled into apathy again by the cessation of the formal war.

In August a US Senate sub-committee was told by the Secretary for War, Robert McNamara, that US bombing in Vietnam was ineffective, and a few weeks later Johnson announced that bombing would stop in return for “productive discussions.”

~ December

~ After a delay of about four months, the North Vietnamese foreign minister responded to Johnson’s offer to stop the bombing by saying that talks could start once the United States halted its bombing. At that point it had 500,000 troops in Vietnam, with contingencies from several allied countries.

~ 1968

Far from seeing the cessation of US bombing in Vietnam, the New Year saw an escalation of the war while the Peace Conference was in progress in Paris, and General Westmoreland asked for an additional 206,000 troops! But Johnson announced, late in March, that further reinforcements would not be sent to Vietnam, that there would be a partial halt to bombing - and that he would not seek re-election as president.

Caught up in violence, war and crisis around the world and at home, the United States was at war with itself. Martin Luther King’s assassination in April signalled that there was still a long way to go in the civil rights struggle in America, and the establishment of the Black Panther Movement with a platform of armed self protection and violence to gain civil rights, confirmed it. And only two months later, in June, the assassination of Senator Robert Kennedy, a brother of the assassinated former president and himself a contender for the presidency signalled that America’s social instability was worsening with every crisis that it dabbled in around the world. The assassin was a 24-year old Jordanian, born in Jerusalem.

But the United States was not the only country showing similar symptoms. In Poland, one of the Soviet bloc countries which had severed diplomatic relations with Israel when it appeared set to swoop on Damascus, a tightening of visa regulations and such like turned into another round of anti-Semitism. Cardinal Wyszyński, who had helped to engineer Gomułka’s return to power, was doctrinally a strong conservative and shared Pius XII’s views on education and the roles of the church and the Jews. His influence was said to be apparent as Gomułka became ever more autocratic in his behaviour and became involved in an ‘anti-Zionist’ campaign that resulted in purges within the party, the administration, and the army. Thousands of people of Jewish origin emigrated. In addition Polish troops joined the Soviet-led intervention in Czechoslovakia. Wyszyński’s influence also contributed to demonstrations by students in favour of “intellectual freedom” which led to government reprisals in March 1968 and brought to an end a so-called “little stabilization” that Gomułka had succeeded in achieving.

Also, during the year, the Spanish government decided to give up the effort to hang on to its colonies in Equatorial Africa, but it regarded the phosphate rich Spanish Sahara as a different case. There was still a profit to be made after the cost of maintaining some sort of colonial administration. Or so it thought. The neighbouring countries, Morocco, Mauritania and Algeria were each interested, too, and they could each make a claim on the basis of ethnic community interest. Protracted struggles followed.

~ July

~ 1: The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NNPT) was signed by the US, USSR, UK and 59 other countries, under which the 3 major signatories agreed not to assist states which did not already possess nuclear explosives to obtain or produce them. It became effective in March 1970 and was to remain in force for a 25-year period. Two other major nuclear powers, France and China, signed the treaty in 1992. It was extended indefinitely in 1995 by a consensus vote of 174 UN member countries.

~ Two bodies with very different perspectives had the future of Israel and Palestine on their agendas concurrently during July. One was the Palestine National Council which met from the 1st to the 17th, and the other was the World Council of Churches which met in Uppsala, Sweden, from the 4th to the 20th.

~ The World Council of Churches was meeting in assembly for the fourth time.

This assembly was different to those which had gone before. For the first time, consistent with the fact that the Faith and Order Commission had distributed its report on the church and the Jewish people late the previous year in the wake of the Six Day War, the assembly had before it a formal item on the Middle East! But as with the statement on anti-Semitism it was handled by a Policy Reference Committee, it was not presented as a part of the CCIA report, it was brief, and it contained no reference to theology. When Dr. (later professor) Krister Stendahl proposed the addition of a third paragraph calling for the WCC to “discern ways in which religious and theological factors affect the conflict” it was amended during debate by the deletion of the word “theological”, by 188 votes to 128.⁶⁴ The statement as adopted read:

We are deeply concerned that the menace of the situation in the Middle East shows no present sign of abating. The resolutions of the United Nations have not been implemented, the territorial integrity of the nations involved is not respected, occupation continues. No settlement is in sight and a new armament race is being mounted.

In these circumstances we reaffirm the statement of the Heraklion Central Committee in August 1967, and make the following points based upon it:

a) The independence and territorial integrity and security of all nations in the area must be guaranteed. Annexation by force must not be condoned.

b) The World Council of Churches must continue to join with all who search for a solution of the refugee and displaced person problems.

c) Full religious freedom and access to holy places must continue to be guaranteed to the communities of all three historic religions preferably by international agreement.

d) National armaments should be limited to the lowest level consistent with national security.

e) The great world powers must refrain from pursuing their own exclusive interests in the area.

The forthcoming report of the Special Representative of the United Nations Secretary General is urgently awaited, and the Assembly earnestly hopes that it may open the way to a settlement.

*It is the special responsibility of the World Council of Churches and of its member churches to discern ways in which religious factors affect the conflict.*⁶⁵

~ The Palestine National Council was charting its course towards the establishment of a State of Palestine.

It approved The Palestinian National Charter which set out the Palestinian self-understanding, the aspirations of the people, how they hoped and planned to achieve them, and its relationship to the Arab nation. This is especially important, because it captured two concepts in one sweep. It said, in effect: "On one hand, we the Palestinians are an integral part of the Arab nation, but on the other hand we are a cohesive community within the nation. We do not want to be forcefully scattered over many states like the Jews of the Diaspora: we, too, want a state of our own." It therefore complemented the concepts which Nasser had expressed in his address to the Egyptian National Assembly which had amounted to a declaration of war against Israel as the epitome of the amorphous Christian gel's imperialism and colonialism and it confirmed the expectation of cohesion within the Arab nation in the event that a confrontation occurred because those aspirations were being denied and repressed. It was the Palestinian equivalent of Herzl's Der Judenstaat. It encapsulated the Arab challenges to Britain and its Balfour Declaration, and the way in which the Christian Western countries had imposed their will on the rest of the world by means of a stacked United Nations. But more especially it reflected the way in which responsibility to compensate for the trauma of the Holocaust which had been suffered by the first member of the triangle of Abrahamic faiths (World Jewry) had been flick-passed to the third member (the Muslim world community) by the second member (the amorphous Christian gel).

However the people of the gel did not want to recognize it as such, or respond to it, because if they did so they would have to go right back to basics to work out how they had got into that situation, and Israel had become so dependent on the gel, and notably the United States, that it could not say: "This is what it means!" Israel and the Zionist Movement therefore set about denigrating it as an amateurish basis for terrorist operations with the sole aim of pushing the Jewish population into rafts on the Mediterranean Ocean, to drift, rudderless from country to country once more. They were not interested in that and neither, on a careful reading of the charter, were the Palestinians. The Charter made it perfectly clear that when the Palestinian State was established all Jews then living in the Palestinian State would be entitled to full citizenship. It was anti-Zionist. It was not anti-Semitic But Israel claimed that the PLO was not offering any meaningful solutions and accused it of wanting to do exactly what the church had tried to do over many centuries, and what Hitler had tried to do in the early stages of his rule. The West was not in the least interested in such a scenario. It was fraught with problems. If the amorphous Christian gel had not been able - or had not been willing - to resettle Europe's Jews during the late 1930s, (and that was what the Evian Conference (chapter 20) was all about) it had even less hope of, or interest in, achieving the impossible in the wake of two wars in the Middle East. In any case, they had gone to a lot of trouble to appropriate this plot of land for the purpose, there was a lot hanging on the success of it, politically, and they were not about to let go of it and to hunt for another piece of land. The world population had grown at such a rate that the whole world was now spoken for. There were no more areas available, realistically, to appropriate for the purpose of forced colonization, or for refugee or convict dumping and the like - except perhaps the Mid West of North America, or BiraBidzhan, or North Western Australia. People just had to learn to live together! The Palestinians would have to work out their own solution. There were only a few of them. The Charter read, in part:

Article 1: Palestine is the homeland of the Arab Palestinian people; it is an indivisible part of the Arab homeland, and the Palestinian people are an integral part of the Arab nation.

Article 2: Palestine, with the boundaries it had during the British Mandate, is an indivisible territorial unit.

Article 3: The Palestinian Arab people possess the legal right to their homeland and have the right to determine their destiny after achieving the liberation of their country in accordance with their wishes and entirely of their own accord and will.

Article 4: The Palestinian identity is a genuine, essential, and inherent characteristic; it is transmitted from parents to children. The Zionist occupation and the dispersal of the Palestinian Arab people, through the disasters which befell them, do not make them lose their Palestinian identity and their membership in the Palestinian community, nor do they negate them.

Article 5: The Palestinians are those Arab nationals who, until 1947, normally resided in Palestine regardless of whether they were evicted from it or have stayed there. Anyone born, after that date, of a Palestinian father - whether inside Palestine or outside it - is also a Palestinian.

Article 6: The Jews who had normally resided in Palestine until the beginning of the Zionist invasion will be considered Palestinians.

Article 7: That there is a Palestinian community and that it has material, spiritual, and historical connection with Palestine are indisputable facts. It is a national duty to bring up individual Palestinians in an Arab revolutionary manner. ... He must be prepared for the armed struggle and ready to sacrifice his wealth and his life in order to win back his homeland and bring about its liberation.

Article 9: Armed struggle is the only way to liberate Palestine. This it is the overall strategy, not merely a tactical phase. The Palestinian Arab people assert their absolute determination and firm resolution to continue their armed struggle and to work for an armed popular revolution for the liberation of their country and their return to it . They also assert their right to normal life in Palestine and to exercise their right to self-determination and sovereignty over it.

Article 10: Commando action constitutes the nucleus of the Palestinian popular liberation war. ...

Article 13: Arab unity and the liberation of Palestine are two complementary objectives, the attainment of either of which facilitates the attainment of the other. Thus, Arab unity leads to the liberation of Palestine, the liberation of Palestine leads to Arab unity; and work toward the realization of one objective proceeds side by side with work toward the realization of the other.

Article 14: The destiny of the Arab nation, and indeed Arab existence itself, depend upon the destiny of the Palestine cause. From this interdependence springs the Arab nation's pursuit of, and striving for, the liberation of Palestine. The people of Palestine play the role of the vanguard in the realization of this sacred (qawmi) goal.

Article 15: The liberation of Palestine, from an Arab viewpoint, is a national (qawmi) duty and it attempts to repel the Zionist and imperialist aggression against the Arab homeland, and aims at the elimination of Zionism in Palestine. ...

Article 16: The liberation of Palestine, from a spiritual point of view, will provide the Holy Land with an atmosphere of safety and tranquility, which in turn will safeguard the country's religious sanctuaries and guarantee freedom of worship and of visit to all, without discrimination of race, colour, language, or religion. Accordingly, the people of Palestine look to all spiritual forces in the world for support.

Article 22: Zionism is a political movement organically associated with international imperialism and antagonistic to all action for liberation and to progressive movements in the world. It is racist and fanatic in its nature, aggressive, expansionist, and colonial in its aims, and fascist in its methods. Israel is the instrument of the Zionist movement ...

Article 24: The Palestinian people believe in the principles of justice, freedom, sovereignty, self-determination, human dignity, and in the right of all peoples to exercise them.

Article 26: The Palestine Liberation Organization, representative of the Palestinian revolutionary forces, is responsible for the Palestinian Arab people's movement in its struggle - to retrieve its homeland, liberate and return to it and exercise the right to self-determination in it ...

Article 28: The Palestinian Arab people assert the genuineness and independence of their national (wataniyya) revolution and reject all forms of intervention, trusteeship, and subordination.

Article 30: Fighters and carriers of arms in the war of liberation are the nucleus of the popular army which will be the protective force for the gains of the Palestinian Arab people.

Article 31: The Organization shall have a flag, an oath of allegiance, and an anthem. All this shall be decided upon in accordance with a special regulation. ⁶⁶

- ~ 17: In Iraq, bitter at United States support for Israel in the Six Day War, the Baath Party seized absolute power in the country's third coup in ten years and turned to the Soviet Union for support.
- ~ 20: In the United States the people celebrated, the government basked in glory reflected from their scientists, and the nation's prestige recovered greatly in the eyes of the world as the first astronaut to walk on the moon, Neil Armstrong, stepped from the "Eagle" onto its dusty surface with the words, "That's one small step for [a] man, one giant leap for mankind."
- ~ 25: And in Rome, Paul VI issued the encyclical Humanae Vitae, against artificial birth control, which assumed central importance in Catholic social teaching and social action.
- ~ August
- ~ President Johnson ordered a stop to all bombing of North Vietnam. One stroke towards peace ... perhaps.
- ~ And at the Vatican, leaders of world Catholicism met for the 39th Eucharistic World Congress to discuss social justice issues in an atmosphere of peace, love and harmony, while just a two-hour flight north from Rome people were enjoying anything but social justice in an atmosphere of peace, love and harmony.

In Czechoslovakia a reform-minded leader, Alexander Dubcek, had replaced a traditional Stalinist Communist at the beginning of the year and set course for social and economic liberalization with increased civil freedoms, an independent judiciary, and other democratic institutions. His intention to do so was well known, and it was also known that he intended to remain within the mainstream of Soviet bloc Communism. However his plans unnerved some Warsaw Pact leaders and on the night of August 20-21 Czechoslovakia was invaded by a combined force from all Warsaw Pact countries except Romania, dominated by Soviet units, and the reform movement was suppressed. A Soviet-controlled security service was installed, and the Dubček leadership was gradually forced out of top posts and eventually expelled from the party. The suppression was thorough, but there was no mass terror.⁶⁷

Indeed Social Justice considerations were big news in a number of countries. At this time, the home of a leader of the Liberation Theology Movement in Brazil, Archbishop Helder Câmara, was raked with machine gun fire in an attack which was believed to have been instigated by the country's military rulers. Câmara who, as archbishop of the poverty-stricken archdiocese of Olinda and Recife, and general secretary of the Brazilian conference for 11 years, was encouraging the Brazilian church to take an active role in promoting social change. His interest in the shantytown slums of Rio de Janeiro and his television sermons earned him renown as a champion of the poor. At the second Vatican Council, Câmara had advocated a church that distributed its riches. The impact of his social programs and addresses in favour of reform in weekly radio broadcasts led to government authorities harassing him actively, interfering with his ministry in the slums and condoning, possibly instigating, the machine-gun attacks on his residence. Câmara had angered landlords and army officers by warning that only the social action of the church could ward off a violent revolution by the dispossessed. He attacked the disparity in wealth between developed and underdeveloped nations, and, at home, the prevalence of an "internal colonialism" that fostered disrespect for basic human rights.

Also at this time, the second Latin American Catholic Bishops' Conference was held in Medellín, Colombia, and its active support for the liberation theology movement became headline news around the world. But it was not universally popular. The bishops issued a document affirming the rights of the poor and asserting that industrialized nations enriched themselves at the expense of Third World countries. They urged coordinated social action to set things right. That was music to the ears of the poor and the oppressed, but not to the political and industrial leaders who benefited from the way the Latin American socio-economic system functioned. What the bishops were saying and beginning to put into effect was likely to incite rebellion and upset the status quo. Because of their insistence that Christian ministry includes involvement in the political struggle of the poor against wealthy elites, active liberation theologians were often criticized - both formally, from within the Roman Catholic church, and informally - as "naive purveyors of Marxism and advocates of left-wing social activism." Many of their critics were well connected with the Catholic Church hierarchy and pressure was soon brought to bear to force them to conform to standard social theology.⁶⁸

At first the Vatican hierarchy did not intervene and the movement gathered strength and gained many successes in relieving social distress, reaching a peak of influence during the 1970s. But in due course some authorities became fearful that church-state relations were being undermined, that this could cost the church status and influence - and no doubt the flow of cash as well - and in the mid 1980s instructions were issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith with warnings against translating sociology into theology and advocating violence in social activism.⁶⁹ Further pressure was applied during the 1990s and Pope John Paul II appointed more conservative prelates in Brazil and elsewhere in Latin America in a bid to curb the movement's influence. Other leaders of the movement included the writer of Teología de la liberación (1971; A Theology of Liberation), Gustavo Gutiérrez, a Peruvian priest and theologian; Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero of El Salvador (killed in 1980); Brazilian theologian Leonardo Boff; and Jesuit scholar Jon Sobrino.

~ October

~ But there was not much social justice to be talked about among the Palestinians, and antagonism between Egypt and Israel continued at a high pitch after the major Suez engagement, with period heavy shellin across the fortifications which Israel had built on the eastern side of the Suez Canal, and the IDF now undertook a major retaliatory attack well inside Egypt. Bridges across the River Nile were attacked and electricity plants in Upper Egypt were put out of action. Diplomatic intervention was achieving nothing and the situation gradually deteriorated.

~ November

~ 5: Richard Nixon was elected President of the United States. The Jewish vote was estimated to have favoured the second candidate, Humphrey, by 81 per cent to Nixon 17 per cent, and Wallace 2 per cent in one of the closest results in US history.⁷⁰ Nixon appointed Henry Kissinger as his assistant for national security affairs. He was elevated to head of the National Security Council some time later, in 1969.

~ 16: A bit of the gloss fell from America's reputation when the world learned of the cold-blooded massacre of about one hundred civilians at Mylai, Vietnam, which had taken place a year earlier. It was America's equivalent of Deir Yassin.

~ December

~ The spin-off effects of Israel's dispossession of the Palestinians, and their conversion into refugees, now began to show more clearly in other countries.

They had become apparent first in the former British mandated territory of Jordan, but as the PLO increased its influence in Southern Lebanon, began to develop administrative arrangements for its own refugee enclave, and made more cross border raids from there, tension between the Lebanese government and the PLO increased, too. This was especially so when, in response to a terrorist attack on an Israeli El Al airliner at Athens airport, Israel launched a retaliatory attack in Beirut, Lebanon, by landing troops at the airport: 14 Arab commercial aircraft were destroyed. The Christian-dominated government had stood aloof from the June War, thus being the only immediate neighbour of Israel which was not invaded and did not suffer territorial losses, and, in a bid to stay clear of the conflict, it now sought to restrict and control the Muslim-dominated PLO in the south. This led progressively to Muslim youth demonstrations in Beirut and other cities linked to demands that the government give the PLO more support. The interfaith conflict factor came in to play immediately, and the Israelis were just as eager to take advantage of as Britain ever was with its Hindu and Muslim communities in India. This was later illustrated when clearly when, at the time of the 'civil war' in Lebanon when Israel was contemplating more direct intervention against the PLO, a senior Israeli government official said to this author: "If your fellow Christians in Lebanon can't control the Muslims, we will have to do it for them."

~ 1969

As the New Year passed, clashes between Lebanon's government forces and the PLO increased and the government's inability to restrict the operations of the PLO illustrated the weaknesses in Lebanon's faith-based constitution and its lack of preparation or will to work in a team with the other Arab states to force Israel to find a solution to the Palestinian problem. Because of their different circumstances they did not have the same priorities. This resulted in pressure being brought to bear by other Arab states for Lebanon to do more for the Palestinian cause and led directly, as an initial act of intervention, to the closing of the border between Syria and Lebanon.

Then it was almost as if the world was being given a dose of light relief from the pathos of Vietnam and the Middle East when tension between Catholic Civil Rights activists and Protestant extremists gradually worsened and put the spotlight on Christians in conflict in a British-Irish national crisis. The decolonization process took another controversial step when the carefully orchestrated 'Act of Free Choice' resulted in the incorporation of West Papua into Indonesia. Massive foreign exploitation of its resources began, coupled with large scale immigration from Java. The Free Papua Movement (OPM) progressively gained momentum. And the American Black Civil Rights Movement had a major success when a US Federal Court ordered an end to the dual segregated school system in Mississippi.

~ February

~ When Golda Meir assumed office as prime minister in Israel following the death of Eshkol she received confirmation of the United States commitment to the security of the Jewish State from Rogers, but she and her government began having misgivings when, a few weeks later, he added the stipulation that the concept of "secure and recognized boundaries" should not "reflect the weight of conquest" and "any changes agreed upon in the 1967 boundaries should be minor."⁷¹

Organizations such as the Land of Israel Movement were somewhat disturbed and pressure on the government to establish defended villages, kibbutzim, in the occupied territories increased. That was the colonizing aspect of Zionism to which the PLO objected most, so there was a hardening of attitudes on both sides. Those changes seemed to be the signal for both sides to step up the tempo and intensity of their campaigns, and in a war of attrition it was apparently Egypt's aim to destroy the Israeli positions along the canal to enable it to then recover Sinai, while it was Israel's aim to destroy Egypt's capacity to do so with quite deep strikes.

~ March

~ Coinciding with that development, the peace talks in Paris were progressing very slowly, and Nixon secretly ordered an expansion of the war in Indochina with the bombing of Cambodia, but then commenced a phased withdrawal of US troops from Vietnam in the interests of “Vietnamization” of the war, in which Kissinger played a major role.

~ May

~ 6: Lebanon’s crisis entered a new phase when the president declared a state of emergency and proclaimed that the government would only support the Palestinians in future if they submitted to the authority of the state and curtailed their actions against Israel. In a town near the border with Israel, the Lebanon army had tried to arrest a group of commandos when they returned from a commando raid; the towns people harboured them; the army threatened to blow up the town; and the commandos surrendered. The situation worsened; protests were organized, and the political opposition suddenly gained new muscle.⁷²

~ July

~ 25: Nixon announced the ‘Nixon Doctrine,’ which appears to have been substantially influenced by Henry Kissinger, during a visit to Guam, and developed a policy of détente with the Soviet Union, and the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) began.

Tessler notes that according to Kissinger’s memoirs, during this period “Hussein remained reluctant to take on the Palestinians.”⁷³ [Emphasis added] This suggests that US strategy was to keep the level of tension between the Arabs and Israel suppressed by eliminating the Palestinian factor and by fostering cordiality between Jordan and Israel. That suggests either a lack of appreciation of the nature of the Arab nation, or a belief that other Arab communities could be persuaded, by means of a few favours and divide-and-rule tactics, to dump one of their integral communities.

~ “Incidents” occurred on the Sino-Soviet border.

~ August

~ An “incident” also occurred in Jerusalem. A young overseas Zionist activist on a visit to Jerusalem attempted to fire the Al-Aqsa Mosque on the Temple Mount. To some it appeared just another case of arson inspired by religious hatred. But the fact that a person would attempt to destroy one of the most revered places of worship in all dār al-islām prompted an event of far reaching importance only a few weeks later.

~ September

~ During a visit to the US base at Gaum, Nixon announced that the 550,000 American troops in Vietnam, and those of allied foreign countries, would be progressively withdrawn. However he said it, he could not camouflage the fact that the war had been a disaster, in human terms, for the people of Vietnam, the United States, the other Western countries which had been persuaded to back a “United Nations effort” and for the world.

~ In Morocco, King Hassan II, was host to a summit meeting of Islamic countries to consider the wider implication of the attack and to coordinate a response. The in-principle decision was taken that there should be a permanent forum for consultation at national leadership level within dār al-islām, and consideration was given to what its role should be, the nature of the organization, and how member countries could be involved. A meeting of foreign ministers the following year was determined as the next step, and subsequently the Organization of the Islamic Conference was established in 1971. The huge flames which spring from small sparks are not always as may be expected.

~ October

~ Nixon's announcement of proposed American troop withdrawals from Vietnam was not enough to avoid two massive anti-Vietnam War protests in successive months in Washington.

They were followed by similar rallies in each country which contributed forces to the destruction, total inhumanity, depravity and suppression which passed as a war to avoid the Communist overthrow of democracy in South East Asia but which was, in reality, a war to ensure United States hegemony in the region. The people of the world, and especially the Western world, were becoming numbed by the series of crises which engulfed the world. Old concepts of peace and stability seemed to have been lost. People had to cope with a constant elevated level of tension, information overload and manipulation, and old social values were being discarded together with the expectation of peace and stability, especially by the threat of nuclear war which hung over them. For many people, the traditional Judeo-Christian values of America were no longer relevant. The Flower Power generation had arrived. Hippies, drop-outs, draft resisters, drugs, licentiousness, communal living and alternative life styles filled the pages of hundreds of "underground newspapers." The process had been gradual at first and people, generally, took little notice. There was a new high-tech world of the space age, big business, fortunes to be made. The establishment view was, overall, "if they can't cope let 'em drop out, as long as we don't have to look after them." But only two months before the first of the big anti-war rallies the world had been variously shocked, amused or bemused when the youth counter-culture and youth suicide became factors to be reckoned with when 450,000 people descended on Bethel, New York State, for the Woodstock festival of rock music, art and everything which went with it.

Five years earlier a magazine editor turned research scholar and then Visiting Professor at Cornell University, Alvin Toffler, had coined the term 'future shock' to encapsulate the circumstances which the Western world faced and had to come to terms with. Now, after several years of social research he published a book of that name Future Shock, and the world had an excellent opportunity to understand and plan how to cope with the phenomena he described. Sociologists took it up, concerned at how to slow down the 'system' and enable people to live more natural lives. . So did big business. But not to consider how to offset the phenomena, but how to capitalize on it. And to 'protect' the system which had spawned the new phenomena there had to be more arms and more militarism with more resource and human exploitation, so the pressure spiralled upwards. After a while interest lapsed in some aspects of the counter-culture, notable the drop-out alternative life styles, but some other aspects remained, taking firm hold on society. The key one was the drug scene. It was soon all downhill for a lot of young people who either could not cope or simply rejected the culture which the dominant forces in society imposed. As Christmas approached it was, for them, a rather meaningless extravaganza.

And Lebanon's Christians began to think the same way, because in November the government had been forced to accept mediation by Nasser in its row with the PLO, and the outcome was virtual autonomy for a PLO state-within-a-state in South Lebanon under the Cairo Agreement. It could bear arms, determine its own military and foreign policy, and administer that portion of the country. The central government could no longer prevent any attacks on Israel which the PLO wished to mount. Unless the trouble in the triangle was miraculously resolved, or unless - at least - Israel and the PLO could be reconciled there was a near-certainty of an Israeli invasion of the south, or civil war in Lebanon, or an open war between Lebanon and Israel. Circumstances would soon determine which it was to be. No one understood the trouble in the triangle well enough, or had the will, to try to resolve that, and too many vested interests were involved on either side of the Israel-PLO divide for anyone to be able to soften their attitudes towards each other.

~ December

~ Having given his proposals to the Soviet government six weeks earlier, Roger's announced his plan for a joint US-USSR approach to resolving the Israel-Egypt conflict.

He simply proposed that Israel would return to the recognized international boundary between the two countries, and they would each give a binding undertaking that their territory would not be used to launch hostilities against the other. The implication was that the four 'great powers,' would guarantee the peace. At a meeting of the big four week about a week later, he proposed that a similar plan be put into effect for Israel and Jordan also. Israel was not about to give up the territory which it had occupied, on such an elementary basis, even though it had accepted Resolution 242. It rejected the plan outright. Egypt and Jordan wanted their territory back, so they were prepared to agree, with some conditions, but the other Arab countries objected. They wanted an overall settlement which resolved all issues, especially the Palestinian question, and they objected to a piece meal approach under which one country could again be played off against another. There was a stalemate.

In reality the plan had only a little to do with peace between Israel and its neighbours, and absolutely nothing to do with the fundamental question of Western-imposed Zionist colonial settlement in Palestine, or the trouble in the triangle. There was no attempt to resolve the second issue and no understanding of the third. The plan had all to do with protecting the interests of the United States. The Eisenhower Doctrine was no more, as already noted. The Arab countries had all turned to the Soviet Union for their defence supplies, naturally, (see above, supplies for the year 1968), because the United States would not supply them without a guarantee that they would not be directed against Israel, and if the United States was unable to broker a stable peace, and very quickly, it was in danger of not only forfeiting its strategic position in the Middle East, but also its entire commercial interests. All those beautiful black gold wells. If that happened, its relationship with the Soviet Union in world affairs was in danger of being inverted. Thus the very least that the United States had to be able to do was coerce Israel into withdrawing from the land which it had occupied; coerce it into accepting a guarantee of its security so that in turn Israel would not feel the need to undertake further actions against its neighbours; and so that its neighbours felt able to accept that uneasy peace. It was a very tall order.

If it was not supplying their armaments, the only means the United States had of securing peaceful relations between the Arabs and the Israel was by trade. Trade meant buying their oil, which it was hell bent on controlling anyway, so that appeared to offer a solution. But that became a matter of a dog chasing its tail. The more it bought from the Arab countries, as a proportion of its total requirements, the more it became dependent on them - and on stability in the Middle East - for its own security. And the United States administration could not put all of its cards on the table, because if it did so it exposed the weakness of its hand. Whatever it did had to be seen to be done in the interests of world peace, and therefore, contrary to everything else that it was doing, it had to be seen to be collaborating with the Soviet Union. It is incredible if the Soviet Union did not see the basic strategy behind the American plan. If they saw it, then it indicates that - consistent with the leads which they had been trying to take at the various disarmament conferences - they were more interested in world stability than in scoring a major point at the expense of the United States. If they did not see it, they must have been persuaded by other issues or advantages.

Rogers' decision, or in terms of ultimate authority, that of the president, was not taken lightly. They had initiated an in depth study of the petroleum industry and US requirements which was published, and its recommendations put into effect, a few weeks later, in February. Such a study is not done overnight. The two things were certainly running in parallel: preparation of the Middle East settlement proposal and the petroleum utilization proposal. That step reinforced, remarkably, the United States' dependence on peace and stability in the Middle East which was already in place because of the earlier policies it had pursued. However they had not put all their cards on the table in December, so Israel, Egypt and Jordan could only react to the hand that had been played.

The Israeli government rather spoiled Nixon's Christmas when it made it displeasure patently clear on December 22, four days after the second phase plan - Israel's withdrawal from the West Bank - had been announced. Cabinet issued a forceful denunciation calling the Rogers Plan "an attempt to appease [the Arabs] at the expense of Israel" and stating that "Israel will not be sacrificed by any power or interpower policy and will reject any attempt to impose a forced solution on her ..." ⁷⁴ The following week, in Washington, the Israeli Ambassador told Henry Kissinger, then Nixon's national security adviser, "I personally shall do everything within the bounds of American law to arouse public opinion against the administration's moves." ⁷⁵ In addition to its substantive objections, Jerusalem also complained that US intentions had deliberately been kept from it, even though the relevant documents were being readied for presentation at the very time that Golda Meir was visiting Washington, and Rabin wrote in his memoirs that he was "genuinely appalled" at the lack of consultation. ⁷⁶ This suggest very strongly that Israel did not know that the petroleum decision was just about to be released and that it had certainly not been briefed on the administration's self-preservation strategy. This situation and the United States' decision parallel quite remarkably Britain's decision to dump the White Paper proposal for the partition of Palestine and, in effect, renege on the Balfour Declaration in the midst of the Munich negotiations. (Chapter 21)

~ 1970

~ January

~ Israel made its displeasure even more patently clear in the New Year by ensuring that the Egyptian government would renounce its conditional acceptance of the plan.

Israel's Phantom jets - which Johnson had agreed to sell it just as he left office - were put into devastating use against Egypt. Bombing raids were launched deep into Egypt, reaching within a few miles of Cairo, and later in the month the IDF captured and temporarily occupied Shadwan Island at the entrance to the Gulf of Suez, near Sharm es-Sheikh, in an action in which two torpedo boats were also sunk, thirty Egyptian soldiers were killed and many more were wounded or taken prisoner. That action, combined with others in previous months, left Egypt's defence forces so under-equipped that it forced Nasser further into the Soviet camp and set the scene for further action in three years time. He made a secret trip to Moscow to appeal for further aid.. It was not long in coming.

~ February

~ Just as the US Cabinet Task Force of Oil Import Control released its report, about 1,500 Soviet personnel arrived in Egypt with advanced anti-aircraft equipment, including new SAM-3 missiles to strengthen Egypt's vital defences and to deter Israel from any further such actions.⁷⁷

According to Tessler, Israeli officials argued that the Soviet decision to intervene was actually made as early as the fall of 1969 [possibly October] and that if that was the case their intervention should not be seen as a response to Jerusalem's deep-penetration retaliatory strikes. If that were the case, it suggests a decision taken about the time that Rogers sent his proposals to the Soviet government, October 28, 1969, and if so, it also suggests that they saw through the US strategy immediately and were determined to do their bit to undermine it. However in either case the result was the same. When the Russians arrived Israel responded with even more intense attacks which encouraged Nasser to further expand the Russian presence. Soviet combat personnel arrived as well as advisers, and highly trained Russian pilots flew in defence of Egyptian positions, forcing Israel to cease deep penetration raids, encouraging Egypt to step up its own attacks on Israeli positions, swinging the balance temporarily in Egypt's favour, and resulting in an overall increase in battle actions during the next few months. It also resulted in a rapprochement between Jerusalem and Washington so that by mid-June the US was able to propose to each of Israel, Jordan and Egypt that they accept a three-month ceasefire and engage in another round of talks with American envoy Gunnar Jarring.⁷⁸

THE CRITICAL DECISION: 'DEplete THE ME AND CONSERVE OUR RESOURCES'

The report by the United States Cabinet Task Force on Oil Import Control is subtitled A Report on the Relationship of Oil Imports to the National Security. Given the circumstances of the time, and its consequences, it is a truly remarkable document which bears close scrutiny. Two issues had coincided. One was the want by major companies in the US oil industry to extract every possible dollar out of every available barrel of oil, regardless of where it was located. The other was the administration's need to find a way out of the crisis of its broken relations with the Arab oil producing neighbours of Israel without enabling the Soviet Union to take advantage of its predicament and thereby undermining both its role as the dominant force in world affairs and its ability to negotiate the most advantageous access to the raw materials of the world.

The American oil industry and government authorities were very conscious of the vast petroleum resources within continental and off-shore USA and they had been very happy to capitalize on their position as the principal supplier of fuels, solvents, lubricants, and chemical industry feed stocks to the world during two world wars and lots of smaller ones. That had been highly profitable. But now they either had control of, or access to, other vast sources of petroleum which could be extracted even more easily and even more profitably, especially if the industry were fully integrated all the way from the well, through transport, refining and distribution.

The two groups, commerce and government, wanted to exploit the resources of the world while they conserved their own. It was totally consistent with the philosophy which John Foster Dulles had espoused at the time of the establishment of the Bretton Woods institutions and the Marshall Plan. There were worlds to conquer and resources to exploit without the need for imperial armies! But they reckoned there was another convincing reason, especially in the case of the Middle East. If all of its petroleum was to be preferentially removed it would remove a security consideration and virtually take the Middle East out of future strategic consideration. At first the administration was not enthusiastic. In fact it was opposed to the concept. But then, when Israel-Arab relations loomed large in America's security planning, and when there was even a possibility that the crisis might open the door for the Soviet Union and that US interests might be elbowed out, it was decided to re-examine the matter, and a cabinet task force was appointed to do the job. If a suitable proposal could be devised there would be many advantages. Conservation of US crude; depletion of the Middle East reserves to eliminate a strategic consideration, prevent those fields from falling into European or Soviet hands; gain a big commercial advantage over Europe which would have to draw from the area; pick up greater profits by importing low-cost crude, and squeeze their competitors in America who did not have access to imported crude. Pressure began to mount for the removal of import restrictions and for other benefits.

The task force was set up. It did a very thorough job. While Golda Meir was trying to ascertain the strength of US support for Israel, and while the Egyptians and the Israelis were hurling shells and bombs at each other, the Cabinet Task Force was talking oil and the State Department was talking to Moscow about a possible joint approach to peace in the Middle East. Some extracts from the report - and others from a minority "separate report" which were in strong opposition to the adopted report - show the emphasis the task force placed on security.⁷⁹ The extracts have been edited to condense them.

A BIT OF ERRATIC THINKING

Nature of security. *We begin ... by focusing on possible import interruptions ... [T]he risks to security from interruptions of oil supply do not, in the main, concern any danger to the functioning of the nation's armed forces. The military needs of the nation in an emergency, even if all requirement had to be procured in the United States, are such a small fraction of total domestic consumption that oil supply for the armed forces is very unlikely to be placed in jeopardy. We are thus speaking largely of security, of supply for defense production and for essential civilian uses – space heating, motor vehicles, etc. The risk of import interruptions poses a threat to the functioning of the civilian economy which might possibly have a serious effect on the nation in general or on defense industries in particular.*⁸⁰

Possibilities or probabilities. *[If the] United States [were] largely "dependent" on imports for its petroleum supply, [t]o what extent might such "dependence" compromise our security? ... [A] risk that is not considered probable may nevertheless threaten such serious damage as to warrant expenditures to guard against it. We must ... balance the impact on essential consumption of any given risk against the likelihood that it will take place. ...*⁸¹

Kinds of risks. *... we begin by noting the major difficulties that might attend dependence on foreign supplies. (1) War might possibly increase our petroleum requirements beyond the ability or willingness of foreign sources to supply us. (2) In a prolonged conventional war, the enemy might sink the tankers needed to import oil or to carry it to market from domestic production sources such as Alaska. (3) Local or regional revolution, hostilities, or guerrilla activities might physically interrupt foreign production or transportation. (4) Exporting countries might be taken over by radical governments unwilling to do business with us or our allies. (5) Communist countries might induce exporting countries to deny their oil to the West. (6) A group of exporting countries might act in concert to deny their oil to us, as occurred briefly in the wake of the 1967 Arab-Israeli war. (7) Exporting countries might take over the assets of American or European companies. (8) Exporting countries might form an effective cartel raising oil prices substantially. We shall discuss these matters in greater detail after noting three more general topics: (1) the adequacy of tanker capacity in various crises; (2) the role in our analysis of other consuming areas, especially Europe and Japan; and (3) the fact that many countries produce crude oil and desire to sell it.*⁸² [Emphasis added.]

Tanker capacity in a crisis. Apart from a war case to be discussed later, free world tanker supply would be adequate in most crises. The 1975 supply of tankers would, however, fall short of carrying 7 per cent of the free world oil available for export if (1) all US import controls were removed, (2) our Alaskan production turned out to be at the low end of the predicted range (1 MMb/d in 1975 and 2 MMb/d in 1980), and (3) supply either from the overseas Western Hemisphere or from North Africa ceased to be available. It is worth noting, moreover, that this tanker shortage would be substantially larger—about 10 per cent—with continued import controls, since the volume of world oil trade and the resulting size of the available tanker fleet would be correspondingly smaller⁸³

Other consuming countries enter our analysis in three ways. [The report then discussed pooled supplies, allied needs, competing demand, and producing countries.]⁸⁴ Concerning producing countries it noted:

*Oil revenues needed. Most exporting countries ... need their hard-currency oil revenues (or the equivalent) to finance internal economic development and military requirements. Expectations generated by such revenues are difficult to stifle for any extended period, although it must be recognized that some individual countries have in the past foregone revenues for several years for political reasons. Generally speaking, however, every producing country wants to sell more oil.*⁸⁵ [Emphasis added.]

*Middle East uncertainties. So long as tensions continue in the area, several problems with Middle Eastern supplies may be noted.*⁸⁶

*Physical disruption. In the event of another regional war, it is not inconceivable that major Arab installations might be attacked. Incidental interdiction of Iranian delivery routes is also possible. A physical disruption attributable to a regional war is not likely to be long - probably not more than a few months - but we cannot exclude the possibility of prolonged interruption. Sporadic guerrilla activity - short of regional war - is not likely to interrupt the bulk of exports.*⁸⁷

*Concerted political denial. It is possible that the Arab states might band together as they did briefly in 1967 to ban oil shipments to specified Western countries. If the boycott were brief or were directed selectively against only one or two importing countries, total supply would remain adequate. Thus to have a problem, one must postulate something approaching a total denial to all markets of all or most Arab oil. The probable duration of any such concerted action may, however, be limited by the difficulty of maintaining political cohesion in the face of sacrifice of immediately needed revenues and the risk of losing market share to exporters not participating in the boycott. [A footnote indicated that Iran could take advantage of the situation by expanding its production.] Still, given the tensions in the area, the possibility of a prolonged and virtually total boycott cannot be ignored. ...*⁸⁸ [Emphasis added.]

Radical regimes; Soviet involvement. Hostile governments are unlikely to arise simultaneously in major supplying countries. There might, however, be a succession of such governments. In either case, such governments would need to market their petroleum. If they wished to deny supplies to the West, they would have to rely on the Soviet Union, itself a major producer and net exporter, to absorb large volumes of supplies diverted from the West ... [The report proposed that this was not likely to happen because by 1980, the Arab countries alone would be exporting something like 30 million barrels per day, requiring an underwriting of more than $10 billion per year. It then discussed Venezuela separately and 'other countries.']

Economic exploitation. *The exporting countries might form an effective cartel that would charge us "a monopoly price." But that seems unlikely... Furthermore, the possibility of a monopoly price in the future is not usually a persuasive reason for paying an enhance price now.*⁸⁹

The report then considered war Contingencies, noting that nuclear war and general non-nuclear war were considered unlikely, and, concerning limited war, that: "Our experience in limited wars such as in Korea and Vietnam indicates that dependence on foreign oil supplies in limited wars does not lead to protracted supply interruptions." [A footnote indicated that the Defense Department purchased about 40 per cent of its needs offshore, and discussed Japan, South East Asia and Europe, noting that simultaneous denial to Europe and Japan "seems quite unlikely".]⁹⁰ It next turned to incremental wartime demand and the risks to wartime tanker deliveries.

The Task Force had been told that "a prolonged conventional war is a possibility but not a probability or the key risk." It said that while "the distinctive implications of submarine risks must be stressed ... Import restrictions do not bring us total insurance against submarines unless provision is made to supply the East and West Coasts from Gulf Coast and Alaskan sources by pipelines or other inland means of transportation [and] Western Hemisphere oil on the other hand does provide incremental security, since in the view of the Defense Department the Caribbean and coastal waters affected during World War II are now significantly more secure than the high seas."⁹¹

Turning to Consumption

*... We assume domestic demand for all petroleum ... of 18.6 million barrels per day (MMb/d) in 1980 at current prices [based on] government and company submissions to the Task Force. At lower prices, there would be some increase in consumption from expansion of the petrochemical industry, increased use of asphalt, greater use of low-sulphur liquid fuels to minimize air pollution, substitution of fuel oil in space heating, and some increase in gasoline consumption. Quantification is not easy, but we adopt as plausible the estimate of Standard Oil Co. (NJ,) that a 10 per cent price decrease would increase demand 1 per cent. This would imply an increase of 0.7 MMb/d in 1980 if prices fell from present levels to about $2.00 per barrel. ...*⁹²

CLEAR WARNINGS, RATIONAL DISSENT, IGNORED

Considering that Egypt and Israel were then in the middle of a highly destructive war of attrition; that Soviet advisers and pilots were assisting Egypt in large numbers; that Israel had already destroyed two Egyptian refineries; and that, as it acknowledged, the Arabs had attempted a boycott in 1967, the recommendation to immediately cut domestic production and increase imports, would have seemed a flight of fancy of enormous proportions if the risks were not being traded for the opportunity to secure the allegiance of, or control over, Arab producers. Even so, three top ranking members of the task force still seemed to regard it as a flight of fancy. In their dissenting Separate Report on the Oil Import Question, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Commerce and the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission said they did not agree generally with the analyses and conclusions in the Task Force Report and specifically oppose the program which it recommends.⁹³ They said:

The program would substitute a tariff for the present quota system. A tariff is highly undesirable in many respects and would lead to domestic and international problems of great significance.

The program would result in price fixing. Stripped of its foliage, the recommendation of a tariff of $1.45 is designed to produce a domestic price of $3.00 a barrel for oil. The control of imports based upon any predetermined price for domestic oil is not only impractical, but would be a further retreat from a free market.

The program would risk the national security in fundamental respects. It would make us dependent on insecure foreign supplies by discouraging the exploration and development necessary to build our own reserves of oil and gas. Because of its adverse impact on the natural gas industry the proposed program would disrupt energy resource utilization and consumer demand for 75 per cent of our current energy base.

The program would involve substantial economic loss to the industry, to its 1.2 million employees and to the 31 oil- and gas-producing states, so as to weaken our internal economy and impair the national security within the meaning of the statute.

These objections to the majority program are multiplied by the intimation that the recommended tariff of $1.45 a barrel is to be followed by further liberalization. The analyses in the majority report are directed toward a proposition that the price of domestic oil should be forced down toward $2.50 a barrel. Whether or not such further actions do occur, the uncertainty that they present to the industry must necessarily involve a significant reduction in oil and gas exploration and development. The record shows that at a price of $2.50 a barrel the United States would be at the mercy of distant supplying countries within ten years.

It is neither desirable nor timely to consider a major change in the quota approach of the oil import program. ... The present Mandatory Oil Import Program, based upon import quotas, has in fact worked effectively... There is no need for a fundamental change in the structure of this program at this time.

Nevertheless, some increase in oil imports is appropriate, since the probability is that we will need to bring more oil into the United States over the long term [and] we propose that ... steps be taken to improve the administration and policy guidance for the Mandatory Oil Import Program ... [and to] ... provide for an annual increase in the percentage of oil imported for each of the next five years, moving it up gradually from the present level. ...

They said their alternative program would serve the national interest best; effectively protect national security by stimulating further development of our own resources; reduce reliance on historically uncertain distant sources of supply; and avoid major shock to the oil producing and refining industries, to their stockbrokers and landholders, and to the states dependent upon them for tax revenues. Then they added a very blunt supplementary warning about the effects if the proposals was intended to force the price down. US national security would be jeopardized for reasons including that the availability of supply from domestic production, from Canada, and from Latin American sources has been overestimated; the dependence on Middle East and North African supply will inevitably be significantly higher; and “we question seriously the wisdom of the United States undertaking the risks involved in becoming oil dependent on Middle East countries.” There would be major investment losses to American producers, reduced employment, reduced state revenues, and damage to the economies of a number of states.

They slammed the approach taken to costing the recommendations, saying that the available supply of natural gas would be seriously reduced or its price increased, but at the same time there would be large scale waste of oil and gas resources if the recommendations were implemented. They said that the premises on which the Report seeks to satisfy national security considerations were not supported by the record, and were based on the most optimistic assumptions, seriously understating the probabilities, severity, and consequences of oil supply interruptions in both a conventional war, when the availability of adequate oil supplies would be a major factor in determining the military and diplomatic options open to the United States. Similarly, in a short conventional war supply shortages can result from regional wars or guerrilla activities and “recent history and current events indicate that the probabilities of these interruptions are considerably greater in both frequency and duration than the Report implies.”

“Extreme nationalism pervades policy thinking in most foreign oil producing nations” they said, and those countries know that oil is a non-replaceable resource and “we cannot assume, therefore, that a continuance of dollar income will rank high in their priorities or that their actions will be rational by Western standards. Widespread denials, moreover, are not dependent on concerted action; they may reflect concurrent individual actions arising from a common approach to domestic and international problems. Two such denials of Middle East oil have been experienced in the past 13 years. That requirements were met without serious supply deficiencies lends little assurance that they can be similarly met if the status of the US producing industry is substantially changed.” They could have said: “We and Britain have each shown them how to do it, and they are quick learners!”

They noted that the oil industry’s inventories were normally kept to minimum levels consistent with seasonal requirements and provisions for contingencies, and that inventories cannot be drawn upon in an emergency without causing future shortages. And referring to the implication in the report that in an emergency some unspecified amount of petroleum would be replaced by conversions to alternative fuels, particularly to natural gas and coal, they said: “Such an anticipation is entirely unrealistic.”

PUSH ON REGARDLESS!

Three very senior policy advisers could hardly have been more scathing, but in view of the administration's hidden agenda the recommendations were implemented. Depletion allowances for domestic producers were reduced. There were substantial increases in domestic crude oil prices and the lifting of free-oil regulations which related imports to the level of domestic production. The major American oil companies then embarked on a systematic programme to reduce domestic production of crude oil, exploration, drilling and reining. And they applied pressure to the government and the public to provide finance for overseas exploration out of grants and higher profit margins. The administration may have thought that by offering the Arab petroleum produces the opportunity to supply more oil to the United States they were strengthening the trade ties and reducing a security risk, but the major oil companies were trading national security for higher profits and they had the government in a weaker position from several points of view.

Domestic crude oil production in the United States, having peaked in 1970, immediately began a steady decline, just as the minority report had said it would, and total domestic consumption continued to rise. The short fall between production and consumption was made up by additional imports from the Middle East. The Arabs generally, and the Palestinians in particular, rubbed their hands with glee. They knew that the United States could not now afford to allow a war in the Middle East because of the threat to its own security. They could therefore expect cooperation from the United States in applying pressure on Israel to make concessions to redress the wrongs done to the Palestinians. They began to have visions of a State of Palestine with East Jerusalem as their capital. It was their turn to cry "Next year in Jerusalem!" (cf. Chapter 16.) And the United States had lost the capacity to limit arms build up in the Middle East because if the Americans wanted their oil they had to let the Arabs trade with who ever they wished.

The Israeli government perceived the situation very quickly. Before the ink was dry on the new regulations they realized that if the United States had made itself dependent on the Arabs for stability it was not likely to rush to its aid to defend Israel. The Americans would necessarily play their "even handed" game and apply pressure on Israel for it to make unacceptable concessions, in order to avoid offending the Arabs. Israel could therefore no longer rely on it, without serious reservation, to hold up the umbrella. They already sensed that as soon as Rogers trotted out the US plan for US-Soviet cooperation in the Middle East. They now knew that they had to be able to hold their own umbrella. They made it quite clear that if America did not want a war in its oil territory the best way to ensure that it could avoid one was by providing Israel with sufficient means to secure its own defence that its neighbours would be reluctant to risk a war. They wanted weapons, planes, tanks, artillery - and plenty of them. The graph of US aid to Israel suddenly changed. It went almost vertical! But what did that achieve? If Israel had arms and had not resolved the Palestinian question to their satisfaction, and if the Arabs did not have comparable arms, it left them in a hole. They did not like it. They expected to at least have parity with Israel, and it did not really worry them who they bought their arms from. They would soon be independent of aid to obtain them, because the prospects for their future oil revenues were looking good. The Middle East was about to have its mini-arms race. But it would only be mini compared with the real thing between the United States and the Soviet Union.

THE WINNER, BIG OIL: THE LOSER, THE WORLD.

And the oil industry had achieved a coup as well. It could demand anything and if it did not get it, it could just pull a plug or two somewhere and the United States would have to back it or face a regional war. Furthermore, with such copious supplies of oil available to them from the Middle East where production costs were so much lower than anywhere else, the oil companies could screw any country which had reserves of oil and which wanted to go into production to generate development funds for virtually any concessions. The grounds were very simple. We don't need your oil. We can get it more cheaply somewhere else. We are doing you a favour. Take our price or leave your oil in the ground!

Where did this leave the United States? Desperate for peace in the Middle East, but with a lot less bases than it needed if it was going to play policeman. Having lost its footing in the Middle East it had to have massive mobility and strike power or allow the Soviet Union to take over the role of king-maker peace-maker. If it did that, Israel would be forced to make concessions to the Palestinians which would be domestically unacceptable in both Israel and the United States. The United States would be in for a rough ride. It therefore needed a lot of big aircraft; big air fields dotted around the world to handle them; big missiles so that it did not have to be close at hand; and big aircraft carriers and cruisers which were not dependent on regular refuelling stops. That meant nuclear powered. That meant allies who were prepared to have visits by nuclear powered and nuclear armed ships, or the means to coerce them into issuing an invitation. And all of that meant a string of highly sophisticated signal stations strategically placed for pin-point accuracy in position finding. This all had to be packaged and sold as the defence of the free world. No one would accept the idea of the defence of pure American self-interest. Even though the Soviet Union was being surprisingly cooperative in almost every issue of international significance - except the easing of restraints on Jews in the USSR and permission to emigrate to Israel - the anti-Commo agitation and propaganda could not be put away yet. It was still needed to whip up those naval, air and navigation bases. All because the United States had got itself into an untenable position in the Middle East. It was aping Britain between the two world wars to perfection. The US-Israeli Alliance had become the determining fact in international affairs. And it was all because no one cared to dismantle the trouble in the triangle. It was not Israel's fault - except to the extent that it refused to recognize that it had become the colonial oppressor par excellence and that it refused to put things right with just as much resistance as the European colonial powers. The difference was, as we have traced all the way through the trouble in the triangle, that it was in that situation because of the misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel and it still remains, essentially, for the gel to dissolve itself and start all over again.

The world would just have to stagger on for a while longer yet. But it should not take too long for things to come to a head one way or the other. The United States had picked up the Zionist umbrella when Britain threw it away in 1948. Then it set its own treadmill going, succeeding Britain and the European powers as the great exploiter. It started off without armies: just economic and political policies. But each time it lifted the treadmill a notch it had to apply more military power. It had slipped a notch in Korea in 1950, then stepped up a gear the first time at Suez when Britain finally withdrew from the imperial stakes and the United States took over with the Eisenhower Doctrine. It slipped another notch in Vietnam in 1964, and now it had made its next gear change with the Oil Import Question and its decision to exploit the reserves of the Middle East in what it hoped would be a peace bargaining chip. It did not take it long to realize what had happened. It now needed far more fire power constantly available than it had required before, but it had a constant juggling act to keep the interests of Israel, the Palestinians and the Arabs, and the oil industry in some sort of perpetual balance. The graph, The Widening Gap, illustrates the dilemma. [For the supporting data, see note ⁹⁴.]

DIPLOMACY - OF SORTS - CONTINUES

~ July

~ US Secretary of State Rogers made proposals for the settlement of the Israeli-Arab conflict which were acceptable to Jordan but not to the PLO.

~ September

~ 4: In Chile Salvadore Allende became the first person to be freely elected president on a Marxist-Leninist platform in a non-Communist country. He did it against heavy odds at his third attempt, with the United States having provided massive financial and organizational support, coordinated jointly by the State Department and the CIA, for the previous Christian Democratic government.⁹⁵ Three days later a CIA report concluded, in part:

The US has no vital national interests within Chile.

The world military balance of power would not be significantly altered by an Allende government.

An Allende victory would represent a definite psychological set-back to the US and a definite psychological advantage for the Marxist idea.⁹⁶

~ Allende then proceeded to nationalize several US companies and complete the nationalization of the copper industry, which the Christian Democrats had already partly nationalized, but, in spite of the CIA report, the United States imposed an economic blockade and took internal domestic steps to sabotage the economy as well.

~ In Jordan, relations between the government and the PLO had been wearing thin for some time because the king's priority was to maintain reasonably friendly relations with Israel, and to avoid giving the PLO a say in government, except in affairs directly affecting the management of the refugee camps, while the PLO's priority was to strengthen its position in order to put increased commando pressure on Israel and to keep the plight of the Palestine people and the independence issue before the world.

At the same time tension developed between the Palestinians living in the West Bank and those living in Jordan, because the Israeli reprisals were directed at villages on the West Bank, not in Jordanian territory. Israel expected, quite naturally, that the West Bank settlers would want the incursions to cease so that they could live in peace. Gradually the PLO, whose people represented a substantial proportion of Jordan's real population, wanted a more direct say in government, and, in spite of Yasir Arafat saying that the PLO did not want to interfere in the affairs of government of any of the existing Arab host states, the reality was that some factions wanted a say and began to put direct pressure on the government to change its structure and methods of operation. The more radical factions began to regard Hussein as a liability rather than an ally, describing him in terms such as "reactionary", "a puppet of imperialism", and "a Zionist tool," and also began manoeuvring for his overthrow.⁹⁷ When Hussein indicated support for the Rogers plan in July, Fatah, the dominant faction of the PLO, found itself drawn towards the 'overthrow Hussein' factions.

A series of incidents between July and September, including an attempt to assassinate Hussein, several aircraft hijackings, the seizure of an oil refinery and the establishment of a unified command for the Jordanian and PLO armies with Yasir Arafat as commander, convinced the king that he had to eliminate the PLO challenge. He dismissed the civil government, appointed a military government, and, with Arafat refusing to negotiate, appointed a new Commander-in-chief. Next day:

~ 17: Hussein ordered all out war against the PLO, the destruction of its camps and its headquarters. The slaughter and brutality was comparable to that during the Israel-Arab conflicts, with estimates of the number of deaths ranging from 1,500 to 30,000. With the PLO in a desperate plight and the refugee camps badly battered, Nasser intervened with the king and negotiated an armistice, but Hussein was determined that no future PLO activities would disrupt his relations with Israel. In due course he ordered a second stage of the PLO elimination process.

~ December

~ In Poland Premier Gomulka had registered a foreign policy success by signing a treaty with West Germany that involved a recognition of the Oder-Neisse border. However, major strikes in the shipyards at Gdansk, Gdynia, and Szczecin, provoked by price increases, now led to bloody clashes with police and troops in which many were killed. Gomulka had to step down and was replaced as first secretary by the more pragmatic head of the party in Silesia, Edward Gierek. The uneasy church-state accord continued under Gierek, although Wyszynski more openly supported the Workers' Defense Committee, Solidarity, and Rural Solidarity which would soon press for greater freedom. In due course Wyszynski's last major act in Poland would be to negotiate arrangements for the visit of Pope John Paul II in 1979.

~ 1971

~ The World Council of Churches established the Program to Combat Racism (PCR).

~ April

~ Hussein's prime minister, Wasfi Tal, ordered stage two of the assault to eliminate PLO influence in Jordan. The fedayeen were driven from Amman and other major towns and many prisoners were taken, but some PLO posts remained operational.

~ May

~ The Soviet Union signed a Treaty of Friendship with Egypt, and followed it with another with India, while the founding Summit Meeting of the Organization of the Islamic Conference convened in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, which was then designated as the headquarters of the organization.

Very ambitious plans were prepared to fulfil the aims of promoting Islamic solidarity by coordinating social, economic, scientific, and cultural activities. Under the banner of strengthening the struggle of Muslims, the conference pledges to eliminate racial segregation and discrimination, especially in regard to the PLO. Projects include the International Islamic News Agency, the Islamic Development Bank, the Islamic Solidarity Fund, and the World Centre for Islamic Education. Its membership (2000) includes Afghanistan, Algeria, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Benin, Brunei, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Chad, Comoros, Djibouti, Egypt, Gabon, The Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Mauritania, Morocco, Niger, Oman, Pakistan, Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, The Sudan, Syria, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, and Yemen

~ July

~ Wasfi Tal ordered a final assault on remaining PLO bases in Jordan. Its remnant forces fled to Lebanon, reorganized, and turned to international diplomacy in addition to direct confrontation. The process of rebuilding a military presence was slow, and Israel had reason to think that it may have faced the last challenge to its territorial ambitions. But although Hussein was caught in a sandwich which was the result of the way in which Israel had been established - not one of his own making - and had lost patience with the PLO, the Arab nation at large was still very sympathetic to its cause. A domestic argument between brothers did nothing to alter the historical relationship between the Arab nation, Britain and Israel. Nor did it alter the fundamental relationship between the amorphous Christian gel, World Jewry, and dār al-islām.

~ October

~ 26: In an historic decision the United Nations General Assembly voted to overrule the continued use of its veto by the United States in the Security Council, expelled Nationalist China and admitted the People's Republic of China in its place.

~ By the end of the year Britain had relinquished its protectorates over all of the Persian Gulf States which it had controlled and in which it maintained a military presence at the height of its imperial power. The United States was then the only Western power to control military bases in the Middle East.

~ 1972

~ The Soviet Union became obsessed with the prospects of a hostile China, while Paulo Freire did all he could to consolidate the gains of the Liberation Theology Movement and to further undermine the grip of US-sponsored, Catholic Church dominated, right wing dictatorships in Latin America with the mass paperback publication of his Pedagogy of the Oppressed.

~ May

~ Under the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT I) the Soviet Union and the US agreed to an Antiballistic Missile Systems treaty (ABM) under which the nationwide deployment of such systems would be banned and the number of anti-missile missiles which each would hold was limited to 200. This then placed the emphasis on the need to reach agreement on the limitation of strategic offensive weapons, but accelerated the development of multiple independently targeted re-entry vehicles (MIRVs)

~ July

~ In the spirit of things to come, the Soviet Union showed that it was more intent on peace than war when it was reluctant to support Sadat's policy of continuing confrontation with Israel and made it clear that it would not necessarily support Egypt in another war against Israel. It was so clear that Sadat announced the withdrawal of Soviet advisers and opened secret channels of communication with Washington, hinting that Egypt and the United States, together, could eliminate Soviet involvement in the Middle East. He reasoned that only the Americans with their special relationship with Israel might be able to influence the Israelis to return the occupied territories without war.

~ October

~ In what has been described as the achievement of détente by America, steered by Henry Kissinger, the US and the Soviet Union reached a comprehensive trade agreement. Nixon agreed to seek congressional approval for the Soviet Union to have most favoured nation treatment, in return for the Soviet Union repaying part of the Second World War Lend Lease appropriations. Then, following the failure of North Vietnam's spring offensive, South and North Vietnam and their backers all decided that it was time to end hostilities.

Secret talks began in Paris between Kissinger and Le Duc Tho of North Vietnam towards a cease-fire agreement based on the release of prisoners of war, evacuation of the remaining US and other foreign forces within 60 days, and political negotiations among all Vietnamese parties. However South Vietnam's president, Nguyen Van Thieu was concerned that the plan might enable the Americans to claim "peace with honour" and leave him appearing to carry all of the responsibility and the need to deal one-on-one with the Communists while 100,000 troops opposed to his rule remained in his country. The fighting and grandstanding therefore continued but with yet another US presidential election only ten days away Kissinger announced on October 26, with less than complete openness, that “peace is at hand.” Then, secure after his landslide re-election but facing even greater political pressure to bring the troops home, Nixon sought to impose his version of peace in a manner hardly filled with the spirit of peace at Christmas. He ordered 11 days of intensive bombing over Hanoi itself, from December 18 to 28, while threatening Thieu with an ultimatum that the US would make a separate peace and end its aid to South Vietnam if he did not accept the peace terms.

~ 1973

~ The UN General Assembly declared Apartheid to be a crime against humanity.

~ January

~ 27: Henry Kissinger was the US negotiator for a Cease Fire Agreement which was signed in Paris to end the Vietnam War.

~ March

~ 29: The United States withdrew the last of its troops from Vietnam, leaving a legacy of devastation, death, chemical defoliation, landmines and the destruction of an entire social order in a country which it had gone in to “save” from a socio-economic system of which it did not approve.

It was 19 years since the Geneva Peace Conference; 11 years since the American Military Assistance Command was formed, and almost nine years since the ‘official’ start of the war. The United States had lost its first war after dropping an estimated 7,800,000 tonnes of bombs - more than were dropped during the entire Second World War by all countries. That is equal to 120 tonnes per square kilometre, or one third of a tonne for every man, woman and child in North Vietnam.⁹⁸ Total US expenditure was about $155 billion. Estimates of total Vietnamese deaths (North and South) were more than 2,000,000 soldiers and civilians, compared with some 58,000 American and other foreign deaths. The end of that stage of US involvement in South East Asia also brought to a close 15 years of astounding change in world politics that featured the arrival of the space and missile age, and the climax of decolonization.

~ In Chile, Allende was elected for a second term against even greater odds than in 1970 and the US continued its campaign of destabilization to generate chaos. Chile was not allowed to have the government of its own choice.

~ June

~ The Soviet Union and the United States reached agreement to refrain from the threat or use of force against each other, to reduce the possibility of nuclear war.

~ August

~ The US ceased bombing attacks on Cambodia. Nixon announced the appointment of Henry Kissinger as Secretary of State. Previously National Security Adviser, he was the first Jew to hold the post.

~ September

~ 11: In Chile, Allende was killed in a massive US-backed military assault on the presidential palace in a coup which was followed by a period of repression under a military junta headed by General Augusto Pinochet. An estimated 30,000 people died and 150,000 were imprisoned, tortured or exiled.⁹⁹

~ Henry Kissinger was appointed US Secretary of State.

~ October

~ 6: During the Muslim month of Ramadan, and on the Jewish Day of Atonement, Egypt and Syria launched coordinated attacks against Israel in a bid to recover the Golan Heights and Sinai in the October War, otherwise known as either the Yom Kippur War or the Ramadan War.

The war took Israel completely by surprise. It had been pursuing policies aimed at “pacifying” the Palestinian population of the West Bank and Gaza with the immediate aim of ending all guerrilla activity, but which many Israeli politicians hoped - and expected - would involve the Palestinians in the management of their own local affairs to the extent that they would lose interest in the concept of independence enshrined in the Palestine National Charter. That, so the reasoning went, would enable Israel to remain in permanent occupation of those regions and to eventually incorporate them into the State of Israel, in defiance of UN Resolution 242 which required it to withdraw. Failing that, they preferred to return the West Bank to the Kingdom of Jordan and to retain the Gaza Strip, but in either case there would be no independent state of Palestine. Israel, pursuing a policy of “the carrot and the stick” had been lulled into a sense of confidence by the way in which many of the local Palestinian elite had responded to the “carrot” of local municipal elections in March and May 1972, and concessions which were proving commercially favourable. It was a revised version of Britain’s Indian ‘divide-and-rule’ policies. Those who were able to accept either permanent Israeli occupation or re-incorporation into a United Arab Kingdom of Jordan were given preferential treatment compared with those who wanted the more “radical” program of Palestinian independence. They were given the big “stick.” And big it certainly was.

Life in Gaza, which was home to the majority of the radical Palestinians who were involved in commando raids against Israel, was “paralyzed.” For two years it had been subjected to house to house searches, in which the families of suspects would be rounded up and transported to detention centres in occupied Sinai. About 12,000 people had been rounded up and transported in that manner prior to July 1973. The suspected commandos were subjected to treatment such as being forced to stand waist deep in the Mediterranean under armed guard for hours while the searches were carried out, and economic sanctions were imposed on their villages. In July 1973 the Israeli military commander decided that the refugee camps should be further thinned out, to make compliance operations easier, and an additional 13,000 people were rounded up and transported to the Sinai detention centres. During the weeks which followed, large numbers of suspects were gunned down in murderous raids on the camps. The program was successful to the extent that fedayeen raids in Gaza were fewer, fragmented and less effective.¹⁰⁰

Sharon was winning the war of the weapons. But he was losing the war of wills. He seems to have ignored the fact that the Palestinians were not a small separated ethnic community which could be suppressed in isolation. They were a fully integrated part of the total Arab nation, and the Arab nation was essentially Muslim, under the umbrella of dār al-islām regardless of the fact that a small percentage of the population was Christian. That complete sense of community and integration was clear from the Palestine National Charter, from the broadcasts by Nasser, from the statements and policies of the Arab League, and now from the statements and policies of the Organization of the Islamic Conference as well. Dār al-islām is just as cohesive as World Jewry. Much more cohesive than the amorphous Christian gel. Hitler knew that if you kick one Jew you kick every Jew. The British government knew it too. That was the basis of the Balfour Declaration. It was no different with the Arab nation or with dār al-islām. Kick one Arab and you kick every Arab. Kick one Muslim and you kick (almost) every Muslim. But the amorphous Christian gel is so fragmented, so diffuse, that the same does not apply. It cannot be said that if you kick one Christian you kick every Christian.

YOM KIPPUR. MORE THAN A WAR OF WILLS: A CHANGING WORLD

So: motivated by a complete sense of community with the Palestinians, Egypt and Syria struck without warning. Their training and security had improved enormously under the professional eye of their Soviet military advisers since the Sinai-Suez debacle, and their planning and preparations had been so good that the element of surprise was complete. Israeli intelligence had been unable to give its government any warning at all and their front line units had been lulled into a sense of over confidence. In its initial assault, on October 6, the Egyptian army smashed through the Israeli fortifications along the western edge of the Sinai, then leap-frogged over them to divide the Israeli forces and make great progress across the peninsula. Similarly, the Syrian armour smashed through Israel's eastern positions on the Golan Heights and forced the Israelis to retreat to new defensive positions in the southern sector of the Golan Heights. The Arab advances were so rapid and decisive that Israel ordered the mobilization of reserves and Defence Minister Dayan, after visiting the Syrian front told the commander of the Israeli air force that desperate measures were required and the fate of "the Third Temple" was at stake.¹⁰¹ With Israel facing the prospect of defeat the government appealed to the United States for urgent assistance. Egypt and Syria were being re-supplied progressively by the Soviet Union, and, after a few days hesitation, the United States undertook a massive re-supply operation designed to turn the tide. Nixon was determined to show Israel and its supporters - and the Arabs - that America had not deserted the Jewish State with its change of oil import strategy three or four years earlier. But he was not going to "do a Korea" or "a Vietnam" and send in the troops. He did not want a war in the Middle East in which the United States could only be the loser from two points of view. The Soviet Union could roll its forces straight in the short way, via the Caucasus, in overwhelming numbers and with unrestricted armour and artillery capacity, while the United States had to fly them in. And even if it won the war on the ground, it would lose the war of the oil wells. That would spell economic and political catastrophe. After his few days of hesitation he decided on an air lift. He would supply the wherewithal and the Israelis could do the ground work, and the war was not likely to blow into a big one. American forces would not have to confront Soviet forces, and the Arabs could not say that the United States had gone to war against them. It was simply aiding a “preferred ally.”

On October 24, after another very short war of only 16 days, an armistice was agreed. Logic would suggest that with the armistice everything would quickly return to normal. The troops could go back to their barracks; the governments could go through the motions of shaking hands again and, perhaps, agreeing on small revisions to their boundaries. Even full voting rights might be possible for the Palestinians in a state which they did not want to call home. But this was the Middle East where nothing has ever been that simple. There was a bit more of the parody to act out. Not the parody of Mein Kampf this time, but the parody of Der Judenstaat. The world was in the middle of the trouble in the triangle and until that was dismantled nothing was going to be simple.

Nixon’s response to the Oil Import Question was coming home to roost. However he did not like the consequences which the three minority dissenters had made perfectly clear in their ‘separate report.’ He was going to do what he, and other members of the amorphous Christian gel had done when, acting in the name of the United Nations, they determined to establish the State of Israel and made the Arabs take responsibility and pay the price for the Western world’s largesse or the salve for its conscience. The United States was about to go to war with everyone who disagreed with its support for Israel. It would turn the screws a touch so that those countries would not be so silly in future. It was going to be quite simple, and almost painless for the United States. The allies of the Palestinians had sought to apply an oil embargo against the United States and Holland, the key allies of Israel in the Yom Kippur War, in an effort to force them to drop their support for the Jewish State and to negotiate a settlement of all the outstanding issues. It was a very simple matter to deflect the effects of that embargo onto other people because the United States held a strangle hold over the supply lines and the tanker fleets. And in addition, the major players in the oil industry would all stick together. They had a lot at stake in this too, and they could not afford to let the Arabs win. The world was heading for an unprecedented situation from which the road to recovery would be slow and difficult.

THE OIL EMBARGO AND CHANGING RELATIONSHIPS

When the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries, OAPEC, announced on October 17, 1973, that several of its members would cut their oil production by five per cent each month until Israel withdrew from all of the territory which it had occupied as a result of the Six Day War in 1967, and that some members had imposed an embargo on shipments of oil to the United States, Holland and countries through which those two might be supplied, it was not an act of war. The United States had very deliberately not entered the war, militarily, and some of the OAPEC members who imposed those supply restraints were not even at war with Israel. It was a negotiating mechanism which those members had learned very well from very painful experience at the hands of both Britain and the United States. It was intended to put pressure on Israel indirectly by applying pressure on the major players in the amorphous Christian gel which had been responsible, both directly and indirectly, for imposing the colonial Zionist state on their community.

But to consider it as simply a political negotiating mechanism is also to miss the point. It was a critical phase in the trouble in the triangle and another event which illustrated the nature of the role of the people of the Covenant, the people Israel, in drawing humanity to a clearer understanding of its relationship with God and the norms of conduct and relationships provided for the guidance of humanity. The embargo became the trigger for dynamic changes in power relationships; in the relationships between the people directly caught up in the trouble in the triangle; and changes in the circumstances of trade and development which are inevitable, but which the amorphous Christian gel, dominated by the United States, has sought to prevent by a number of insidious means. Each new trick drags the world into greater disarray with more and more tension which makes the recovery and the upward movement towards Maimonides' understanding of the Messianic Age all the more difficult and increases the potential for disastrous lurches one way or another before that upward movement becomes apparent.

The western world, the amorphous Christian gel, insists on treating the situation which has evolved as if it were a series of only vaguely related incidents and economic difficulties, rising unemployment and fears about the collapse of the currently dominant and apparently sacrosanct global economic system. Its financial leaders meet, with a few politicians tagging along to give their meetings legitimacy, in august economic forums while police outside are used to violently suppress the efforts to be heard of those who see a more meaningful alternative. They debate particular factors such as whether the socially and environmentally destructive influence of the tax free and uncontrolled mass movement of capital from one market to another are real, or just the figment of the fertile imagination of those who want to rein in their excesses. The price of oil, the inflationary impact of the taxes which are associated with it, and attempts by various governments to restrict the free-enterprise sector of industrial activity are their greatest concerns. It concerns them little whether the world which they are currently controlling is stable and fit to live in for the ten or eleven billion people who will want to call the planet earth their home - and to share its water, food, land, resources and sunshine - when the population reaches its anticipated plateau in about six generations from now. Responsible, informed advice is that it will not be if they carry on the way they are going. In any case, if they do carry on the way they are going it is a near certainty that broken human relationships will have brought their system crashing down around their ears long before we get through another six generations to that population plateau level. That is what the oil embargo was all about. That is why the trouble in the triangle has to be resolved - and quickly. Attempts to deal in isolation with the factors which concern our world leaders to the point of distraction from reality cannot bring about stability and can only lead to further industrial and political manipulation and greater uncertainty.

So: if the oil embargo was as important as all that, it is equally important that we understand how it happened, how it was manipulated, and some of its consequences. To pick up some of the key issues, discussion follows on an outline of events as they affected a number of countries, then the development connection, and a close look at Australia's circumstances which encapsulate the issues involved, before a very brief diarized overview of the remaining years of the twentieth century.

ON COURSE FOR A DATE WITH DESTINY

The die was cast and the American oil industry had put its country, and the world at large, on course for a date with destiny when the president accepted the recommendations of the Cabinet Task Force on the Oil Import Question. There was soon a confrontation with the Revolutionary Libyan Government over prices and government equity interest or participation in existing oil fields, and a highly organised attempt by the oil companies to boycott Libya into submission. For that purpose the US government even exempted the companies from United States anti-trust laws. That was an abuse of legal process which was to the detriment not only of Libya, which was pushed to the edge of economic and social chaos, but to the whole world because of the flow-on effects. The world has forgotten about - or was never properly informed about - America's bid to crush Libya into economic submission, but it has been preoccupied to the point of obsession with the crash of an American civil airliner in Scotland in December 1988 with the deaths of 270 persons which is currently the subject of international legal prosecutions. Many observers allege that the two situations were linked. However the American non-anti-trust action was followed by an ultimatum from OPEC that government participation must be agreed to promptly. The pace was quickening. Revised pricing agreements were signed. Systematic price adjustments to offset, firstly, the dollar devaluation and, secondly, western inflation were agreed to.

Iraq was then unable to get satisfaction from the Iraq Petroleum Company (IPC) so it nationalized its oil concessions. The companies turned the heat on Iraq, boycotted its nationalised oil and brought its industry to a halt. Again the Western world's governments turned their backs on a producer government and Iraq could make sales on a barter basis only to Eastern Europe, in much the same manner that Cuba had bartered sugar for oil a few years earlier. One by one the companies capitulated on the questions of participation and agreements were signed with Libya, Saudi Arabia and Abu Dhabi. OPEC established a contingency fund to assist Iraq and Syria which had been affected by the loss of pipeline transit fees because of the lack of lifting from the Mediterranean terminals served by the pipelines from Iraq. The companies began another round of supply manipulation in Latin America because they had committed themselves to reaching staggering new production levels in the Middle East, and Venezuela led the way with another initiative – penalties for variations up or down from agreed production targets which were related to the previous year's actual production. Iran proposed the total acquisition of all the facilities of its oil industry, coupled with guarantees of supplies for the consortium members. It had nationalised the concessions in 1951, as already noted.

Canada had very quickly realised that problems arose from its unrestricted exports to the United States, and it imposed controls and began to reduce exports. It is reasonable to assume that the Government was also conscious that the American companies were using Canada as both a shield and a big stick in their dealing with the countries of the Middle East and Latin America. Then in mid year, 1973, the US government further relaxed import controls, and imports from the Middle East shot up immediately. (See the chart, The Widening Gap.) But before anyone realized what was happening the Middle East was at war. The sequence of events during and after the Yom Kippur War illustrates a remarkable degree of responsibility on the part of the Arab producers in sharp contrast to the conduct of the American dominated oil industry as a prime collaborator with the US State Department in pursuing its Middle East policy.

On October 6,th Israel found itself at war with Egypt and Syria. Next day, the 7th, Iraq expropriated the American quarter interest in the IPC subsidiary which was still operating, in retaliation for US support of Israel. All of the major oil companies immediately stopped lifting Iraq's oil from the Mediterranean terminals altogether. On the 8th Aramco halved the flow of oil from Saudi Arabia to the Mediterranean and subsequently stopped shipments from Sidon. In collaboration with the State Department it was cutting supplies to Europe to say to those governments, in effect and in very blunt terms: "come on board and support Israel against the Arabs." Iraq entered the war in support of Egypt and Syria on the 10th, then talks which had been in progress between OPEC's negotiators and the oil companies on revised pricing, participation and buy-back arrangements broke down when the companies stalled for time on the 14th. Next day, the 15th, with Israel having stalled the progress of both the Syrian and Egyptian forces, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait entered the war as well.

President Nixon announced next day, the 16th, that the US would not allow Israel's security to be jeopardized and directed the 6th fleet to the eastern Mediterranean. OPEC negotiators announced that an agreement would no longer be sought with the companies and henceforth prices would be fixed by the producing governments unilaterally. An immediate increase of 70 per cent in posted prices was applied. It was then, on the 17th, with the tide turning against the Arabs in the war, that OAPEC announced that several of its members would cut production rates by five per cent each month until Israel withdrew from all territory which it had occupied in 1967, and that some members had imposed an embargo on shipments to the USA, Holland and countries through which they might be supplied.

The United States and the oil industry set about a massive media blitz and succeeded in confusing the world-at-large about its role in the October War and the oil embargo by means of a smoke screen of innuendo, incomplete information and misrepresentation. The oil industry generally, in league with the US government, was at pains to show that the Arab countries were holding the rest of the world to ransom through the use of the oil weapon. However the facts are that the matters of oil price and oil embargo were, and are, quite separate issues. The protracted price negotiations were between the oil companies and all members of OPEC including Venezuela, Iran, Nigeria and Indonesia – not just the Arabs. The embargo was a political matter between the Arabs and the United States. The outbreak of the Arab/Israeli war enabled the United States and the oil companies to confuse the two issues, and thereafter they certainly were linked. The oil industry and the United States administration hoped that by placing all the ‘blame’ on the Arabs at that time that the world might be stung into opposition, resulting in OPEC retracting its decision, and in other countries adding their weight to the US-Israeli Alliance against the Arabs.

The US and its oil industry used the oil weapon before the Arab states by closing the Mediterranean oil ports, thus cutting Europe’s supplies by 1.7 million barrels per day, initially, in an effort to coerce European governments into an anti-Arab posture through self interest and, at the same time, applying more pressure on the allies of the Palestinians by reducing the income available to them. The Arab states decided on economic warfare only after the American President threatened military and naval intervention and moved a troop-carrying fleet to the region. The production cut first announced was equal to about the rate of imports of Arabian petroleum into the United States. The clear intention of these countries in coupling productions cuts and embargoes was to apply pressure to the United States, and not to the world generally. However, the effective control of transport which the United States was able to exercise enabled it to buffer itself and to divert the supply cuts against whoever they wished. The US made big issues out of the fact that Iraq did not impose productions cuts and Saudi Arabia imposed bigger cuts than other OPEC members, implying division within the ranks. Those actions were in fact highly complementary.

Iraq had nationalised much of its oil industry and the government directly controlled 1.6 million barrels per day which was almost all committed in government to government deals with Spain, Italy, France, Yugoslavia, Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Romania, Russia, Bulgaria, Brazil, India, Egypt and Turkey. The Arabs had no wish to interfere with the flow of oil to these countries but it was precisely those countries which were affected first, and dramatically because of the speed with which it was done, when the oil companies stopped lifting from the Mediterranean terminals. The balance of Iraqi production, 0.4 million barrels/day, was in the hands of British and French companies supplying those countries with the full support of the Iraqi government.

On the other hand Saudi Arabia’s production at that stage was entirely in the hands of American-controlled Aramco. More than 60 per cent of the Arab crude oil imported into the USA, was from Saudi Arabia, and this was 20 per cent of US imports. Saudi Arabia therefore was in a better position to affect supplies in the USA than any other Arab country. However the US was able to keep the Mediterranean port of Sidon closed to oil tankers for the duration of the war and three weeks afterwards. Baniyas (Syria) from which most of Iraq’s government-to-government supplies are shipped was attacked by the Israeli air force, severely damaged and closed, but it was operational again on a restricted basis within a few weeks. That was the end of Britain's window of opportunity. While it was closed the Arabs risked damage to pipelines and pumping stations by forcing the exceptional volume of 750,000 barrels per day through the Iraq-Tripoli pipeline which had a normal design capacity of 500,000 barrels per day.

By December 7th there was a shortfall in Bunker 'C' and marine diesel fuels of 25 per cent compared with actual requirements throughout the world. This must be related to the actual drop in crude oil production in Arab countries resulting from both Arab-directed costs and US manipulation of 5 per cent in October (approximately one per cent of gross world supplies) and 24 per cent in November (7 per cent), and also to the stocks normally held at major ports. By late November oil tankers were being laid up because of insufficient bunkers and marine fuel to carry crude oil and refined products. These lay-ups inevitably affected countries friendly to the Arabs or, more especially, those buying nationalised crude oil from Iraq. Shipments of wheat, coal, iron and other basic commodities between countries friendly to the Arabs were also affected to some extent from about this time.

Imports to Europe fell immediately the oil companies stopped lifting Iraqi Oil from Baniyas, before it was bombed by Israel, and a drop in imports to Britain was apparent immediately the embargo was announced. However imports to the United States were maintained at a record daily rate during November and were 7.7 per cent above the daily rate for September. The graph 'USA Petroleum Consumption, Production and Imports 1970-1975' illustrates these matters. Export restrictions imposed by Canada, Venezuela and Ecuador contributed to the drop in US imports to a low point in February. The subsequent recovery in US imports was rapid. By May imports were above the base September level and they continued to climb steadily. The contrived stock shortages and massive price increases engineered around the world shook the economies of every developed country but had the most devastating effects in the USA, where the combined effect resulted in the large scale shut-down of the automobile industry and, by negative flow-on effects, other manufacturing industries and the construction industry.

The main graph page 1790, compiled from data published monthly, progressively, by the Petroleum Economist shows the peak of crude oil production in the United States which was reached in 1970. Over the five year period 1966-1970 the domestic demand for petroleum products had risen by 22 per cent while domestic crude oil production had increased by only 16 per cent. On a two year average basis, the proportion of domestic crude used to meet total domestic demand had fallen by 4 per cent, from 69 per cent to 65 per cent. Data showing that change in supply and demand pattern and the data on which the graph is based are set out in footnotes.^{102 103 104} In that year, 1970, domestic crude production was 74 per cent of total 'new stock,' and imports accounted for only 26 per cent. The steady and deliberate decline in production which the dissenting minority report had anticipated began immediately, as a result of the adoption of the recommendations of the Cabinet Task Force on the Oil Import Question. Over a five year period that decline was at exactly the same rate as the increase over the previous five years.¹⁰⁵ For the full year 1973, the year in which the embargo was applied in mid October, domestic crude production had fallen to 60 per cent and imports had risen to 40 per cent of total new stock. Imports reached a new record high level for the full month of November, even though the embargo had been in place for six weeks, before falling to a trough in March at the time that the embargo was lifted.

The graph shows that total domestic consumption of all products fell significantly more than imports, while stock levels were held virtually static. The industry did not tap into its standard stock levels. After a slight rise from June to October there was a slight fall from October to March, but the overall stock level at the end of 1973 was still marginally higher than the stock level at the beginning of that year. The figure of most significance in illustrating the gross irresponsibility of the petroleum industry is the domestic crude oil production figure. That figure illustrates the way in which the industry exploited not only the people of the United States but the entire world community while it played politics on two fronts - domestic and foreign policy - for profit to the disadvantage of all other parties involved. The production figures which were published progressively at the time of the embargo, and on which the main graph is based, indicated that domestic crude production was maintained at the same trend-level as before the embargo - continuing slightly downward but with a marginal increase for the month of February 1974. However, revised production figures which were published subsequently, and which are shown in the supplementary graph for the period September 1973 to June 1974, show a different situation. From the time that the embargo was imposed, domestic crude production was allowed to fall at a rate corresponding approximately with the fall in the level of imports. From March, when the embargo was lifted, domestic production was also increased at a corresponding rate so that by May it had recovered to the level before the embargo. The shortfalls in imports and in domestic crude production together correspond closely with the drop in domestic consumption.

It is difficult to find illustrations of the abuse of resource control and power politics which had a more lasting and degrading impact on human affairs than that. Throughout that period the American public and the world at large were being bombarded with propaganda about how the Arabs were holding the world to ransom. Not only had the oil companies ceased lifting oil from Iraq altogether; not only had Israel forced the closure of the Baniyas terminal by bombing to prevent any shipments of crude oil to Europe from the remaining Mediterranean terminal; but the oil industry in the United States had reduced production to tighten the economic and political screws even further. It could not argue with any legitimacy that it was impractical to increase production at short notice. It had increased production very readily in 1967 in order to increase supplies to Britain and Europe to offset the impact of Arab production cuts at the time of the Six Day War. And in addition, Iraq had put its pumping stations and pipeline at risk in order to increase the flow to Baniyas by 50 per cent in an effort to increase supplies to Europe. The industry in the United States had far more capacity and ability to increase production dramatically at this critical point. It chose not to do so. It chose to do the reverse. It cut production.

Those who determined the course of the industry appear to have had three main motives. One coincided with the political motives of the Arabs in applying the embargo against the United States, but it was exactly the reverse. By using the rest of the world as its direct target, it was applying indirect pressure on the Arab countries to coerce them into “softening” their support for the Palestinians and their easing their pressure on Israel to make good the suffering of the Palestinians. Another was to undermine the influence of OPEC and to use the economic damage resulting from the production shortfalls to pressure it to slash its price increases, remove some of the restraints which it had placed on the operations of the industry, and to stay out of participation in such a complex and risk laden industry. Yet another was to persuade the world that it needed a highly profitable oil industry, free of competitive restraints, as the only way to finance the massive exploration and development which was necessary for the world to stay one step ahead of an enormous energy crisis. The aims of the oil industry neatly dovetailed with the aims of the US State Department; the State of Israel and its supporters; the Western world’s heavy resource extractive industries which did not want OPEC-type organizations interfering in their affairs any more than the oil industry; and with the church at large and the Vatican in particular because it did not want to see any increase in the influence of Islam which was very likely if the Arabs won this round. The amorphous Christian gel was in fine fighting form!

The official OAPEC embargo was lifted on March 17, 1974. The real aim and effect of this was to remove the ‘justification’ or the means by which American political manipulation of oil supplies was managed. It was to provide relief for the countries which were either allies of the Palestinians or which were not in a position to protect themselves in any way, and not to take the political pressure off the United States. In any case it was pointless to continue it because the United States, through its stranglehold of distribution and production around the world had made a mockery of it. The profits and share values of the oil industry jumped sharply. Percentage profit increases for selected US-based companies for the January – March quarter of 1974 compared with 1973 were: Exxon (Standard of New Jersey) 38 per cent; Mobil (Standard of New York) 66 per cent; Socal (Standard of California) 92 per cent; and Texaco 123 per cent. These figures must only be regarded as indicative because there is no common accounting base for comparisons.

A TOUCH OF PLANNING

As important as the immediate economic effects of the manipulation of the embargo were, the strategic, interfaith and human relations implications were much more far reaching. If the industry was being driven by the motives or aims noted above it was to be sorely disappointed. Its actions backfired in every case. Interfaith and human relations first. Although Egypt and Syria were not immediately better off at the end of the brief and bloody encounter, their cause had been lifted to new heights of international understanding. The Arabs were seen to be the champions of the underdog. That meant the Muslims, too. The church’s role, and its attitude to those outside the narrow pathway to salvation which it prescribed, were under a brighter spotlight than ever. Other Third World countries were hurting, certainly, from the combined effects of the steep oil price rises and from the traumatic and disruptive impact of the US-imposed supply cuts. But as soon as the huge bags of gold began arriving on the doorsteps of the major oil producers they began to share it out through a series of aid programs. At first it was a bit ad hoc, hit and miss, as urgent needs were drawn to their attention. This was indeed something quite new and quite radical. People in the Third World were not accustomed to profit sharing on an international scale by those who exploited them or their resources. The ripple of excitement was visible, audible and real. The oil producers had to do some immediate planning. They were not accustomed to the flow of cash which was coming their way. They did not have the financial institutions which could handle it. They were virtually starting from scratch. They had to do some planning, and quickly.

First, there were their own needs for economic development with provision for social planning and enhanced physical infrastructure. Then there was investment to protect their future when their oil would run out. And overlaying the whole lot were the responsibilities which were part of a religious commitment. Help for those less fortunate. Protection and preservation of the environment. And propagation of one faith. It was the Muslim's turn to wonder whether there was a touch of Divine intervention in their changing circumstances, just like the Jews after their salvation in the Six Day War. It was their chance "to get out from under the heel of the Christian West."¹⁰⁶ They were going to put their faith into action. And they were going to spread the word and support their fellow Muslims wherever they lived. Dār al-islām was about to blossom! Enormous, inspiring mosques began to spring up and beckon the faithful not only in the mainstream Muslim world but in countries where there were only small populations of Muslims. So did international Islamic universities, schools and colleges, and hospitals. Where there were small Islamic societies, they began to flourish. Where there were none, they began to sprout.

Now strategic considerations. As already noted, if the United States was to be able to sustain Israel in the face of military attack, without having to launch an invasion of the neighbouring Arab countries which would be a task of Herculean proportions and which would backfire with disastrous repercussions, it had to be able to control military re-supply routes both by air and sea; it had to have air strike capacity from places out of range of immediate retaliation; and it had to be able to secure both the oil fields and the petroleum shipping lanes for itself, for its allies and for Israel as well, because Israel does not have significant supplies of its own. Securing the shipping lanes of the Middle East to be able to supply Israel was going to be very difficult indeed. This caused enormous complications for countries lying on those supply routes - especially if they were not favourably disposed to support the US-Israeli alliance in conflict with the Arabs, and it certainly will again, in the event of another war between Israel and its neighbours. Any other war in the Middle East pales into insignificance alongside a war involving Israel. Such a war threatens to become a war of the United States and Israel versus the rest - if Israel is able to retain the support of the United States - and the simple reason is the current nature of the world's oil and resource dependence.

This need not have been the case, even for a world dependent upon petroleum, if the Western powers had been prepared to utilize their own resources rather than exploit those of other people who were not in a position to resist, and if it had not continued to practice exploitation when the imperial colonial era had been extinguished. In the years following the Yom Kippur War and the oil embargo there was a mad scramble for each country to develop secure petroleum sources of its own, and that has relieved the potential for crisis to some extent, but oil is not the only resource which plays a major role in the stability and continued economic success of the West. To force such a change was actually an important motive in the decision of OPEC to impose the structural and pricing policy changes which it did. But that factor still exists to the extent of each country's dependence on other countries - especially the allies of the Palestinians.

It is therefore apparent that any pressure to increase, instead of to reduce, dependence on oil from the Middle East in current circumstances by coercing the countries of the Middle East to open their valves a little wider actually increases the potential for multilateral crisis in the event of another war. In such circumstances, those who lead the push for greater supplies from the Middle East on the basis that it is necessary to reduce domestic oil product prices certainly have a mixed bag of motives. One could well be an attempt to spread the 'risk' factor and make other countries equally dependent on peace and stability in the region as is the United States, making them more amenable to supporting the United States and Israel in a showdown. If they are not aware of the consequences of such a manoeuvre, or if they are so convinced of their power and the invincibility of their system that they believe they can roll their way through any crisis, then they are incredibly naïve. Just as naïve as those who thought they could deflect the impact of the oil embargo onto the rest of the world without any adverse consequences for themselves. However the majority who make such calls are probably not in a position to be aware of such issues and they are concerned only with short term domestic economics.

MILITARY RESUPPLY FOR ISRAEL IN A CRISIS

Coupled with the question of guaranteed passage for Israel's tankers is the question of resupply of arms, ammunition and heavy equipment in the event of an Israel/Arab war. This is quite different to and separate from arrangements for the 'normal' supply of these items, whether under congressional aid programmes or commercial contracts, in which case sea transport is quite adequate. The characteristics of a war in the Middle East are such that resupply of Israel must be by air.

The question of resupply bases is so important that the struggle between the US and Israel on one hand in their efforts to obtain secure resupply bases, and the Palestinians and their allies on the other hand in their efforts to prevent such bases being made available, will linger until the trouble in the triangle is finally dismantled and peace becomes a reality in the Middle East. The effects of that struggle were manifest in intense domestic political manoeuvring in each country which is a potential resupply base. In very few cases is an open or public debate likely on the issue of bases-for-Israel or no-bases-for-Israel. In most cases legal, commercial or industrial tactics coupled with personal attacks were used to change leadership or leadership policies in the direction which each interest-group wished. It is always the bread and butter issues which arise as secondary effects around which the public posturing occurs.

In October 1973 the US carried out a massive airlift which avoided humiliation for Israel, by a shuttle service using refuelling facilities in Guam, the Philippines, Thailand and the Azores. Britain refused the use of its bases. Turkish and Greek bases were also used for related purposes. However, subsequent to October 1973 the use of all of these bases for such purposes was denied – with the sole exception of Guam, which is a territory of the US. The key bases in 1973 were the Azores and Guam. A senior diplomat at the US Embassy in Canberra confirmed (on February 6, 1976) that the arrangements which were then current for US access to the Azores specifically excluded their use for Middle East operations in support of Israel. The vulnerability of Guam, quite apart from the requirements of sound strategic planning, makes it absolutely essential for the US to have resupply access to at least one alternative base on the eastern approach to the Middle East, as well as at least one and preferably two secure bases on the western approach. The bases on the approach from the east must lie somewhere along a line from Korea or Japan in the north, through the chain of island states, to the northern region of Australia in the south. The bases on the approach from the west must lie somewhere between Britain or Ireland in the north to the Ivory Coast region of Africa. Spanish bases, already mentioned in connection with trade route protection, are therefore important, being well placed in the resupply-flight belt as well.

The economic and political factors leading to the denial of bases, subsequent events in each case, in related territories and in countries in the resupply-flight belts must be considered. The situations in Portugal, plus Angola and Timor, Spain, Greece, Turkey, the Philippines and Thailand illustrate this, and Australia's special position involved a number of inter-linked issues.

Member countries of the Islamic Conference should be excluded from consideration as resupply-flight bases in view of the stand being taken by the Conference in support of the Palestinian cause. These include Indonesia and Malaysia on the eastern approach and all of the countries of the northwest coast of Africa, from Morocco to Gabon, excepting Sierra Leone, Liberia, Ivory Coast, Ghana, Togo, Dahomey, Cabo Verde and Equatorial Guinea. Nigeria was granted Observer status at the Conference. However, all of the African countries listed are members of the Non-Aligned Nations Group and all except Cabo Verde and Equatorial Guinea are also members of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU).

PROTECTION OF THE VITAL INTERESTS OF THE US

For this purpose we must consider 'vital interests' to be those factors which, if interrupted or interfered with, prejudice the economic or political stability of a country. Vital interests change from time to time as domestic arrangements, indigenous supplies of raw materials, foreign trading patterns and trade routes, international alliances and the technology of warfare change. In present circumstances America's most vital interest is its oil supplies from other countries.

America's current dependence on foreign oil, although a consequence of its own decisions and actions, is very real, as indicated by the dissenters in their Separate Report. Strategic considerations can be looked at from the point of view of guaranteeing supplies and protecting supply chains.

The US must be able to replace any shortfall in petroleum supplies in the event of an embargo on supplies from Arab countries being imposed on it. The options available include: increased domestic production; increased supplies from other sources by negotiation; increased supplies from other sources by manipulation; substitution of alternatives for petroleum oil and products; and the withholding of product exports. In the early stages of the 1973/74 embargo, manipulation resulted in imports for the month of November 1973 being an all-time record as shown in the graph of US petroleum supplies, page 1791. That option is no longer open to it without prejudicing its international relationships or without the use of associated force.

The obvious option of an immediate substantial increase in domestic production has been effectively killed by the industry's deliberate policy of running down both production capacity and refining capacity to exploit overseas sources although, in the wake of the embargo, dramatic changes in government policy were made and the strategic reserve was established. The nature of US politics is such that the industry will press for further concessions or the electors will have to pay a high price before that policy is likely to be reversed. The present situation in which one candidate for the presidency is pushing for an increase in domestic drilling while another has sought the release of part of the strategic reserve illustrates that. Even that option presupposes that available refining capacity exceeds domestic crude production capacity by a reasonable margin and access to export refining capacity in other countries is not impeded to any greater extent than access to foreign crude oil.

Reliable figures for achieving increases in production in an emergency are difficult to obtain, but serious consideration must be given to the contention in the Separate Report that 5 per cent reliable excess is not likely to be maintained. Figures for well drilling in recent years support that contention.

In an economy as complex and as energy dependent as the United States there is no way that significant substitutions could be achieved in a short term without major disruption and loss of industrial productivity during conversions as the Separate Report made clear. Increased nuclear power generation is no longer an easy political option, and it takes time and capital even if the electors were to embrace it again. Hydrogeneration accounts for only a few percent of gross energy production and even a big relative increase would not be significant in short-term substitution and is dependent on other factors as well. There is great reluctance to substitute solid fuels for liquid, gas or electricity and such substitutions require much time and capital, and, in the current circumstances in which the United States is already trying to find ways to avoid its international climate change obligations, a change back to substantial use of solid fuels is politically unthinkable. Natural gas offers the best prospects for short-term substitution and it is used extensively in place of oil products as a chemical feed stock, but any further substantial substitution would have to be met by imports or by withdrawal of supplies from other uses, and the effect on industrial employment and the slowing down of the economy would keep the financial number crunchers very busy indeed.

The withholding of exports by USA was used as both a commercial and a political lever in 1973/74, and commercially it was highly successful in forcing price increases for many product lines such as solvents and waxes beyond cost-justified levels in countries such as Australia. In other countries without established price control procedures, price increases of the same nature were achieved in basic fuels as well as in refined products. However, politically the policy backfired violently with the expropriation of US-owned assets in many countries, increased pressure for government control of - and participation in - the industry, the establishment of national tanker fleets and the establishment of national grids and strategic reserves. As a future emergency conservation measure it could still be useful but politically, it would again have wide repercussions, even if it was seen to be differently motivated from the manoeuvring of 1973/74, being for different reasons - economic stability rather than market exploitation - and it would be an option which the US administration would want to avoid until forced into it by domestic circumstances. Commercially such a policy must now have less attraction!

To offset an embargo on supplies from one source, increased supplies by negotiation is the obvious choice if the government has been unable to impose the logical option of increased domestic production. However, the ability of the US to negotiate increased supplies in an emergency is dependent on a number of factors: normal commercial and political relationships between the US and the potential suppliers; their ability to increase production quickly; the scale on which emergency supplies are required, and, most critical, their political preparedness to replace embargoed supplies in the event of a war in the Middle East which involves Israel. It must be assumed that every Arab producer would decline to increase the supplies available even if it did not join in an embargo against the US and those of its allies who collaborated in military support of Israel. On the other hand, it cannot be assumed that every other current supplier which does not participate in an embargo will agree to either increase production or allow exporting companies free rein in the disposition of supplies available to them. All of the oil imports into the US are in commercial hands with no government-to-government agreements because the industry has resisted with vigour any attempts at Administration 'interference'. In contrast to that, the major governments of Europe have numerous government-to-government agreements, even if most of the mechanics of supply have been left in commercial hands. Neither the exporting governments nor such importing governments will be prepared to see earmarked supplies 'diverted' by the commercial interests of another country.

A TOUCH OF MANIPULATION

There was a range of factors which led to countries denying transit and resupply-base facilities during the embargo, and in the events which followed the denial of such facilities. The situations in Portugal and related territories, Spain, Britain, Greece, Turkey, Cyprus, Thailand, the Philippines and Latin America each serve to illustrate the complex flow-on effects of the trouble in the triangle. The case of Portugal and the Azores bases is especially important. The consequences flowing from it are of immense significance and the world is currently experiencing another round of shock waves from it.

PORTUGAL: A VERY SPECIAL CASE

The United States used the Portuguese Azores Islands as a main base for military resupply to Israel in October '73 and Portugal's petroleum supplies were 'protected' accordingly. But on November 14, while the embargo against supplies of oil to the US was still firmly in place, the government of Portugal advised the United States that the Azores bases would only be available to it for Middle East operations in future in return for American support and equipment for Portugal in its long-standing wars to suppress guerrilla liberation movements in its African colonies. What made it change its mind?

On October 16, President Nixon had sent 2,000 troops to join the 6th Fleet on stand by in the Eastern Mediterranean, declaring that the US would not see the security of Israel jeopardised. It was the next day that Arab Oil Ministers imposed an embargo on shipments to the US. During UN debate on a Peace Keeping Force on the 25th Russia said it might send troops to help police the cease-fire. This move was rejected by the UN which excluded both US and Russian troops. The US immediately placed all of its troops on full alert, without consulting its NATO allies. Next day, NATO allies and the US clashed bitterly. Its allies condemned the placing of US troops on full alert whether with or without consultation. A US spokesman countered with the objection that no NATO ally except Portugal would allow planes on re-supply flights to Israel to land and refuel. It took Portugal a month to react!

In other words it was prepared to trade an embargo by the Arabs for the continuation of its colonial authority in Guinea Bissau, the Cape Verde Islands, Angola and Mozambique. During 1972, 81 per cent of Portugal's oil supplies had come through commercial channels from Arab countries, (Iraq 38 per cent, Saudi Arabia 32 per cent, United Arab Emirates 11 per cent). Although the producing fields in Angola were mainly held by the Gulf Oil Co of the US, under highly favourable terms, and the fields produced more than double Portugal's imports, only 10 per cent of its supplies were received from its colony. It is therefore apparent that Portugal's prime interests included the oil fields of Angola and the uranium deposits of Mozambique with, in addition, the copper, manganese and diamonds in Angola. Negotiations with the US proceeded. On November 21 the Ministerial Council of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU), objecting to this effort to tighten the colonial grip with a capitalist sledge hammer, and to the implication that Zionism was to be preferred to African self-determination, adopted a resolution. It invited all member states of the OAU, and it appealed to all friendly countries, to impose a total economic embargo, including in particular an oil embargo, against Israel, Portugal, South Africa and Rhodesia; and it called for the setting up of a framework to promote cooperation between members of the OAU and the Arab League.

Another week later, on November 28, the Sixth Arab Summit Conference resolved:

- 1. That those Arab States which had not already done so would break off diplomatic relations with Portugal, South Africa and Rhodesia,*
- 2. That a total embargo on Arab oil exports would be imposed on those countries,*
- 3. To take special measures to continue normal oil supplies to fraternal African countries,*
- 4. To extend full support to the African countries in their struggle for national liberation and economic progress,*
- 5. To collaborate with the OAU in the establishments of a committee of seven countries to organise Afro-Arab co-operation, and*
- 6. To instigate whatever administrative and financial arrangements might be necessary within that framework.*

In accordance with the spirit of those meetings four funds were established during the following three months, viz; the Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa, January 18, 1974, capital $231 million, later increased to $500 million; the Arab/African Fund, capital $200 million; the Arab Fund for Technical Assistance to African States, capital $25 million; the Arab-African Oil Assistance Fund, February 1974, capital $200 million.

Disenchantment with the guerrilla wars had already reached significant levels among army officers. This was rapidly compounded by the new agreements and their effects on Portugal's domestic activity and international relations. The government was overthrown in a military coup on April 25, 1974, and on June 12, the new government offered each of the African colonies self-determination. Independence was granted to Guinea Bissau and the Cape Verde Islands on August 26, and the withdrawal of troops from guerrilla operations in the mainland colonies began. Conflicts within the government led to President Spínola's resignation on September 30. In January, 1975, independence for Angola was set for November 11. A provisional Government was established including nominees of the Portuguese administration and the three established liberation movements. The Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA) was by far the longest established and the largest. The Zaire-based National Front of Angolan Liberation (FNLA), which had formed a Provisional Revolutionary Government during the 1960's included relatives of members of the government of that country. The National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA), based mainly in the south, was the most recently formed.

Concurrently with those developments the Portuguese Government entered into agreements with both Iraq and Russia for government-to-government oil supplies, giving an indication of just how far the new governments had shifted ground from mid-November 1973. In March, 1975, the Provisional Government in Angola increased the oil royalties and taxes payable by Gulf, but not to the OPEC price levels, and on the March 12 a counter-coup to reinstate General Spínola as president was attempted but failed and he fled the country. Gulf refused to pay the new royalties and taxes. A secessionist movement – reported to be fostered by the US, and assisted financially by Gulf – developed in the Cabinda Enclave, and the Provisional Government gradually became ineffective because of growing dissension, and civil strife worsened. The MPLA established firm control in the capital (Luanda) and also in Cabinda after a brief but brisk round of fighting early in June. Portugal sought international help to evacuate Europeans during this period, and the MPLA went ahead and proclaimed the Republic of Angola on the planned date, November 11. Western reports rarely made any reference to the background to the crisis. They were aimed at establishing how greedy the Angolans were, how they had a history of in-fighting, how they were totally incompetent to run a country, and how desperately they needed foreigners back to run the country for them.

Subsequently many factors were introduced to compound the problem and to confound the outside world. Many press ‘sources’ presented the struggle by the US to retain control of the Cabinda oil fields and the consequent assistance received by the MPLA to ensure local control as the response to an attempt by Russia to set up a puppet government in an African state. The US shifted its strategy away from secession for Cabinda to annexation by Zaire, on the assumption that a ‘friendly’ government in Zaire would look favourably on US oil interest, and then back again after its Ambassador was expelled from Zaire on June 19 for being implicated in a coup plot, which was uncovered. The situation became highly confused and when, after failing to get the support of the OAU, the Front for the Liberation of the Enclave of Cabinda proclaimed the independence of Cabinda in August, in Kampala, Uganda, it claimed to have the support of the key countries of Zaire, Congo and Gabon. The OAU was portrayed as divided over whether to support the movements ‘backed by the West’ or the MPLA ‘backed by Russia’, while the real issue was that of a government of national unity, involving all three parties, or a one-party MPLA government. The closing of the Gulf refinery, and their production operation, and the further withholding of disputed payments on the grounds that Gulf didn’t know whether to pay them to the MPLA or to FLEC, the Cabinda separatists, further inflamed the situation.

Recognition of the MPLA by the OAU, various governments including Portugal, and New Zealand eased the tensions to some extent but did not close the chapter. Greatly strengthened anti-colonial efforts, co-ordinated between governments and fuelled by an increased flow of funds and resources, were directed at Rhodesia, South Africa and its dependent territories.

Portuguese East Timor seemed to have been bypassed by the upheavals of the African colonies for some time, and there was a chance self-determination would take place smoothly. However, among a host of factors including military and political stability in the immediate region, the potential advantages of a small independent territory on the eastern re-supply route which was not aligned with the Islamic Conference did not escape the attention of those concerned with Israel’s defence. At the same time the increasing interest of Australian-based oil companies in both sections of Timor began to complicate the situation. Coupled with a genuine Australian sympathy for self-determination causes, these factors resulted in Australia playing a very confused role – both at government and non-government level – with unfortunate consequences for relations between Australia and Indonesia and unhelpful, overall, to the people of Timor.

However they all came together with a determination among certain Roman Catholic leaders, strongly supported by the Vatican, that their two small territories should not be absorbed into Muslim Indonesia. The establishment of those enclaves was yet another consequence of the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel and competition between the European colonial powers for exclusive trading posts. One small island but two colonizers: Portugal and Holland. A totally artificial border split the island and its communities in two - except for a small Portuguese enclave in the Dutch section, completely isolated from its Catholic co-religionists in the larger section. Essentially the only difference between the people of the two sections of the island was that at one end they had a modern-era Portuguese-Catholic heritage overlying their indigenous language and culture, while at the other end the overlay was of Dutch-speaking Protestant heritage. The people at the south western Dutch-Protestant end were quite happy to be associated with the new nation of Indonesia - the largest nation in dār al-islām. The people at the north eastern Portuguese-Catholic end were not happy to have that association.

A GRAND IMPERIAL EXPERIENCE

The British experience is noteworthy in view of several factors: Britain's complicated historical and commercial involvement both in the Middle East and with the United States; Churchill's WWI decision to have a substantial government share-holding in the Anglo Persian Oil Company, with the power of veto in all company decisions; Britain's traumatic involvement in the establishment of the modern state of Israel, and its position on the aerial re-supply route which makes it a potential alternative transit base for US Middle East operations. During the year before the 1973/74 embargo Britain's imports had been sourced essentially from 13 countries. Of the 13, 11 were members of the Organization of the Islamic Conference. Of the two who were not members, one, Nigeria, had observer status, and the other, Venezuela, had intimate working relations with them as a founder member and the initiator of OPEC. Ten were also members of the Arab League, and six had been under British domination during the colonial era and many of their leaders had reason to bare grudges because of the treatment they had received from time to time.¹⁰⁷

Immediately after the announcement of the oil embargo, crude oil imports into the UK dropped sharply despite the undertakings given to the UK government by Arab governments that liftings to the UK would not be restricted in any way, the 50 per cent British share holding in Kuwait, 40 per cent in Iran and significant holdings in Iraq and North Africa. But the reason was not the strain in their historical relationship. Tankers loaded under manifests showing UK destinations were diverted elsewhere. Britain's Conservative Prime Minister, Ted Heath, is reported to have summoned the Chairman of British Petroleum to indicate with some degree of firmness that as the British government was the principal shareholder, through the Bank of England, in BP, and in view of BP's 40 per cent holding in the Iranian Consortium, he expected that Britain would receive preferential liftings and at least the non-restriction from Arab countries which their governments had guaranteed. The Chairman is reported to have replied that he could not make such arrangements due to the structure of the industry and inter-company agreements and that if the Prime Minister intended a government direction he would have to have it in writing and would give it normal consideration as with all shareholders' communications. The Prime Minister apparently found that he was unable to issue such a direction.¹⁰⁸

Press reports continued to attribute the shortfalls to 'the Arab embargo'. On December 10 the British government approached Kuwait for direct government-to-government supplies to offset the shortfall which had reached 20 per cent of normal liftings from all sources. On January 7, 1974, the British and Iranian governments signed an agreement for 5 million tons of oil for 1974, and on January 22 the government announced the resumption of arms sales to Arab countries. There were no smiles on the other side of the Atlantic. If Britain wanted to play that game and supply the enemies of Israel with arms, it would have to take the consequences. The government soon found it necessary to introduce a three-day working week because of the severity of the oil shortfall, coupled with industrial strife on the coal fields. On February 20 the Labour Party gained office in a snap election called in view of the national emergency, and in which control of the oil industry was a major issue. Heath would not be the only Commonwealth prime minister to lose office as a consequence of the Yom Kippur War and the oil embargo. The dissolution of the Shell-Mex BP partnership in the UK, which had been announced in 1971, was accelerated. The partnership finally ceased on January 1, 1976, the same day on which the British National Oil Company was established and become responsible for all British government oil production assets and the management of supplies available to the government from its planned 51 per cent participation in other purely commercial operations. Through the purchase of Woodside-Burmah's holding in BP the government then had over 50 per cent interest in the company. A jointly owned tanker fleet was established by BP and the National Iranian Oil Co, and it was operated under BP management. The government proceeded with plans for 51 per cent equity in all new North Sea (British sector) production operations but faced great difficulty in negotiations for participation in current North Sea operations of foreign companies, notably Exxon.

The British government was not the only Western government to decide that the national interest demanded either government to government oil supply arrangements, or control of its own tanker fleet, or massive national security oil storage facilities, or participation and effective control over vital energy suppliers, or all those and more. But such massive undertakings required equally massive sums of money as well, which could not be raised through normal government revenue sources. They had to be financed through loans from one source or another. The major finance institutions of the Western world - the amorphous Christian gel - were not interested in providing them. To do so would run counter to the interest of the US-

Israel Alliance and that was not acceptable, and the oil companies and other resource giants were opposed, naturally, because they could see their power bases being weakened, especially if such collaboration between governments across the international divides led to the growth of more OPEC-type resource organizations. The world would end up with a lot of well planned mixed semi-socialist economies and that would never do! The only people who were able and prepared to lend for such projects on such a scale were the new petro-dollar wealthy countries of the Middle East.

Very soon there was a steady stream of diplomats, ministers, and civil servants from the governments of Europe and other Western world countries as well as Third World countries beating a path to the oil capitals of the Middle East. Some were lucky. Some were not. The Arabs put one condition on such loans. They had to be secured under government-to-government agreements, and it was not just a matter of the financial security of the loans. What mattered was recognition of the new status of the Arab world. A signature on a government-to-government agreement implied acceptance that after a long period of colonialism the Arab countries were now accepted on an equal footing; recognition of the legitimacy of the Palestinian cause; and a just settlement of the Palestinian question contrary to the dictates of the US-Israeli Alliance. That was the sting in the tail. Some governments were able to offer government-to-government agreements on that basis. If they were “masters in their own houses” they could. If they were not: that was just unfortunate. The funds might be available from some other sources, but not from the government treasuries. But not all governments had money worries on their minds. Some were more concerned about how their territory and their bases had been used, or might be used in the event of another war in the Middle East.

A MEDITERRANEAN MIXING BOWL

Turkey is, geographically, in a critical position wedged between Asia, Europe, Russia and Africa. Its history has been moulded accordingly with periods of turbulent relationships including confrontations between Islamic empires and the Christian empires of Rome and Constantinople. The Turkish Ottoman rulers who had an uneasy relationship with their subject peoples in Eastern Europe, Asia Minor and North Africa saw the remnants of their empire dismantled by Britain and its allies after its WWI alliance with Germany. Subsequent to WWII the country became embroiled in the Cold War and, in spite of protests from some Muslim countries, notably Egypt, it was persuaded to enter formal alliances with other Muslim nations within the Baghdad Pact which was later re-organized around Britain and the United States as CENTO, as already discussed. Concurrently, Turkey has been a key piece in the NATO jigsaw for which it provides “essential” surveillance into southern and central Russia. With Greece it sits astride Russia’s access to the Mediterranean and therefore its short route to the Indian Ocean via the re-opened Suez Canal, as well as the Mediterranean seaboard of the Middle East.

Turkey's support in the Middle East conflict has been for the Arab cause while in other political and economic matters it has been aligned with the West through being drawn into the OECD, the EEC, (as an Associate Member) and the International Energy Agency, IEA. Its relations with Greece became severely strained over the issue of the future of Cyprus with its mixed Christian and Muslim population, being adjacent to the south coast of Turkey with a Greek Orthodox Archbishop as President, strong economic links with Greece, and Commonwealth membership. However NATO dependence on both countries required them to develop close working relations and the Military government in power in Greece at the time of the Yom Kippur War agreed to the use of Greek naval bases by the US Sixth Fleet in Middle East operations. That decision was revoked when the Premier was deposed on November 25 1973, but further damage had been done to relations between the two countries.

On July 15, 1974, a US-inspired but Greek-conducted coup was attempted on Cyprus. Not only did the President escape to Britain, but a Turkish invasion of Cyprus was precipitated, resulting in a Greek/Turkish war on the island. Nine days later the Greek President dismissed the military government and called on the former civilian Premier to form an interim government and to conduct elections. In September the Turkish Premier resigned and relations between Turkey and the US deteriorated rapidly, and the Greek elections two months later resulted in a landslide victory for the interim Premier Karamanlis. Then on February 5, 1975, the US imposed an embargo on arms sales to Turkey. It was a member of NATO, it was now host to the headquarters of CENTO, both designed to isolate the Soviet Union, but it was not allowed to buy arms. They might be used against the wrong people.

The mixing bowl of the trouble in the triangle was working overtime, and eight days later the Turkish Cypriot forces partitioned Cyprus and proposed a Federal form of government for the island to couple a Greek southern and Turkish northern state. Less than three months later, on April 30, the new Greek Government announced that the US had 'agreed' to relinquish the use of both the naval base and the air bases which had been in use since 1953, and on July 16 Turkey announced that the US occupation of 25 Turkish bases would be phased out if the arms embargo against it was not lifted. Ten days later Turkish troops actually occupied 26 of the 27 bases used by the US and/or NATO, and all US operations on the bases were suspended. Only operations carried out specifically for NATO were permitted at the other base and all US shipping movements were placed under restrictions and subjected to customs examination. Negotiations for a settlement dragged on with Turkey insisting that any pact for the re-activation of the bases was not to be subject to the whims and caprices of any "ethnic power group" in Congress. Turkey and Libya thereupon negotiated an arms and oil supply arrangement, and soon afterwards negotiations were completed for an export oil pipeline from Iraq to terminate on the Turkish coast. Greece, while maintaining its membership of NATO, withdrew from all military commitments.

COMING FROM THE OTHER DIRECTION ... OR ... IT DOESN'T PAY TO ARGUE

Both Thailand and the Philippines provided air and military bases for the US for operations during the war in Vietnam under mutual defence treaties, and Thai bases were also being used for ordinary flights to the Middle East. However in October 1973, both countries declined the use of their bases for military resupply flights and soon found themselves faced with cuts in their oil supplies through normal commercial channels of up to 30 per cent, even though they had been excluded from any embargo by Arab countries. Their Asia neighbours soon came to their aid.

Indonesia, through Pertamina, was able to divert some fuel, oil and gasoline to Thailand (and also Myanmar) but only at a rate of about 5,000 b/d. China provided 50,000 tons of diesel fuel for Thailand, used mainly in the tin mines, and this led to a re-evaluation of the need for diplomatic relations between the two countries, a marked shift in Thailand's attitude towards the role of the US in South East Asia, and to restrictions on the use of Thailand as a base for operations in Vietnam. The US was required to progressively reduce its air force strength in Thailand and its ability to sustain military operations in Vietnam declined. A deadline of March 1976, was later placed on the evacuation of all operational US forces from the country. The status of that deadline was an important issue in subsequent changes of government. On the passing of the deadline the government insisted that all remaining operations, including communications systems used in association with flights to Diego Garcia and the Indian Ocean be moved to another country within one month.

In the case of the Philippines the wife of the President visited China - unofficially, because they had not had diplomatic relations since the establishment of the PDR of China - and was able to arrange a massive trade agreement involving 8 million tons of crude oil in return for minerals, lumber, copra and other agricultural produce. The Philippines National Oil Company was established and acquired all Exxon facilities. Negotiations were subsequently announced for the US to phase out its use of Clarke and Subic air bases, which it had occupied as part of the quid pro quo for granting full independence to the Philippines, so that the land and facilities could "be put to productive use in the interests of the development of the Philippines." Diplomatic relations were also established with China in due course.

Both Thailand and the Philippines negotiated long-term oil supply agreements with countries in the Middle East. Some were barter agreements, and some involved joint exploration and refinery construction. Countries involved included Kuwait, Iraq, Egypt, Libya, Saudi Arabia and Iran. The spin-off from the argument between partners in the triangle of Abrahamic faiths was having a direct impact on the Asian people of the non-Abrahamic, non-messianic faiths who did not like what they saw. The long-assumed moral and ethical superiority of the great white western Christian powers - the amorphous Christian gel - which had already taken a battering as a result of the Second World War was appearing less and less justified. Close, cordial relations were developing between those Asian countries and the Muslim countries with which they found they had a lot more in common: community of interest; more closely allied ethical standards; similar problems ... and a common heritage of oppression by the amorphous Christian gel whose presence was increasingly bringing social discontent, the collapse of long established social order, and a continuation of oppression. The oppression now simply came packaged differently.

SOUTH OF THE BORDER: A CRISIS THAT LINKED THREE CONTINENTS

From a distance the Middle East crisis often appears to have passed by Latin America and the Caribbean with hardly a ripple. In fact two countries are members of OPEC - Venezuela and Ecuador- and another, Peru, has discussed membership, and Mexico has a close working relationship with the organization. Seven countries of the region are members of the Non-Aligned Nations group, two are observers and another three have guest status at conference. Several regional cooperation groups already existed at the time of the Yom Kippur War and a number of countries then played an active part in establishing commodity cooperation groups. Subsequently most of the commodity groups have lost their influence as the United States and Europe have sought to place all trade negotiations in the hands of the World Trade Organization.

However, at the time a marked militancy developed in relations with the US in particular but the industrially developed world in general, and the commercial activities of US interests are no longer accepted without question, many important operations were nationalised and the resources on which others are dependent were expropriated. These countries are not directly affected by the strategic considerations of the US/Israel alliance to the same extent as countries lying between North America and the Middle East. Manipulation of their supplies of oil - whether as consumers or producers - is their main strategic interest. However the oil dependence of several countries of the region on either the Middle East or Africa contributed largely to the shift in their stance.

Prior to 1973 the Catholic-dominated countries of Latin America tended to be much more supportive of Israel than of the Muslim Arab states. However, under the impact of the oil embargo their support swung heavily for a time towards the Arab cause. It faltered a bit, as did numerical support from the Non-Aligned Nations Group overall, when a resolution equating Zionism with racism was submitted to the United Nations. However, it recovered somewhat because the countries of the South began to realize that their economic and political stability was not totally dependent on a submissive relationship with the United States. A number of them had been seated in the United Nations at Nelson Rockefeller's initiative (chapter 27) in order to bolster support for whatever the United States wanted to manoeuvre through the General Assembly and in order to secure a position for the United States against the possibility of Soviet influence in the region, but they began to have confidence in other relationships and a determination to break their geographic and historical isolation.

In January, 1974, while the world was still reeling from the impact of both the manipulation of the embargo and the imposition of more responsible pricing policies, the Lebanese Foreign Minister, Fuad Naffah, helped that process along when he visited Mexico, Venezuela,

Colombia, Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina and Cuba at the request of the Arab Summit meeting a few weeks before. He told those governments that the Arabs had forgotten Latin America because its problems seemed somewhat alien to them. They were all quick learners and by the time he left they each had a good understanding of the other's problems and what they had to do about them. "No underdeveloped country that backs the just cause of the Arab World will suffer from an energy shortage," Naffah told them. They knew quite well that a "just cause" included Israeli evacuation of the territories occupied since June 1967 and recognition of the national rights of the Palestinian people. However not all of them wanted to get too close to the Arabs. Brazil, a major oil-deficient country, preferred to make arrangements with the Nigerians and the Iranians rather than with the Arabs, but in any case the Israeli cause in Latin America had suffered a severe setback.¹⁰⁹

However interference in interfaith relations was very unedifying at times. Direct pressure of the kind which United States and Zionist interests had used to persuade Latin American countries to vote in favour of the partition of Palestine (chapter 27) was apparently exerted on the Uruguayan commander-in-chief, General Hugo Chiappe Posse, by a Libyan diplomat who agreed to provide all the oil Uruguay needed - provided that all the Jewish members of cabinet resigned. The military papers in Montevideo had made no secret of their want to force the minister for planning, Moses Cohen, a person of Jewish origin, from office but the undiplomatic pressure backfired. It was the minister for the economy, Manuel Pazos, who resigned.¹¹⁰

Similarly, when the Brazilian government decided to support the Arab resolution describing Zionism as a form of racism, mass meetings were organised by Jewish groups who wanted to test an order given early in October by Justice Minister Armando Falcao forbidding public meetings of any kind. They believed the order was aimed against them and relations with the military government deteriorated further. The president and some members of government had not hidden their view that Jews could not be loyal to both Brazil and Israel, and when the Saudi foreign minister, Omar al Sakkaf, visited Brazil they formally recognised the rights of the Palestinians. According to press reports, large Libyan investments were promised in exchange for an anti-Zionist vote.¹¹¹ Following the military coup in Portugal, Brazil had promptly recognised the new regime because the government had been unhappy with Portugal's attempt to hold on to its colonies in Africa by military force, and its need to find new markets, coupled with its search for oil supplies, had forced Brazil to reassess its policy of unquestioning loyalty to Portugal and acceptance of whatever treaties it pursued. Senior army officers had agreed with General de Spínola that military victory was impossible and the fall of the government provided an opportunity for Brazil to shape a new African policy, but it took the oil crisis to actually bring it to a head. The Brazilian government was eager to secure agreements with Nigeria and Libya and it was afraid of possible Arab and African boycotts if Brazil did not quickly "abandoned the Portuguese camp." When the Nigerian foreign minister, Okoi Arikpo, visited Brazil in January 1974 the foreign minister signed a joint declaration repudiating both apartheid and colonialism. Local press reports suggested that Brazil's policy shift towards the Arabs and the Africans may have been a factor in the Portuguese political crisis.¹¹²

EMPOWERMENT, PROTECTION THROUGH UNITY AND ...

The impact of the oil embargo in breaking the United States strangle-hold on Latin American affairs and in encouraging a sense of unity and empowerment among Third World countries was quite remarkable. And while it was certainly never the Vatican's intention that any of its subordinate bodies should encourage closer relations between its flock and Muslim countries, or Socialist countries, that was a primary effect of the growth of the Liberation Theology Movement which was coming to its peak about the time of the Yom Kippur War.

At a conference of the Organization of American States in May 1974 there was strong support for the thrust of debate at a concurrent special session of the United Nations General Assembly. The assembly reaffirmed the permanent sovereignty of states over their natural resources, and the rights of nations producing raw materials to enter into associations to maintain and increase prices. That was directly opposed to the Washington argument that companies which had been nationalised had rights to compensation 'established by international law.' The United States argued that this included compensation in respect of concessions to exploit mineral resources, and Kissinger had warned that the formation of blocs by producer nations would lead to the formation of counter-blocs.

But, as the Argentine ambassador put it, the members of the OAS were determined to treat Washington as 'just one more Latin American capital,' and the momentum for more OPEC-type groups was growing. And to make things worse for the West, the Venezuelan president planned to use the country's new oil wealth, backed by strong nationalist sentiment, to nationalise the iron and steel industry and the takeover of two United States mining companies. He proposed that unprocessed iron ore exports would eventually be banned and that would profoundly affect the United States, which took 13 million of the 23 million tons exported by the two companies in 1973. A national iron and steel industry was being planned and foreign companies producing a wide range of goods and services would be required to sell 80 per cent of their capital to Venezuelans within three years. One company concerned, the Cada chain, was half owned by Rockefeller interests. It was the government's intention that at least half the earnings from oil were to be transferred to a special domestic development fund and agriculture would be given special tax exemptions and incentives. Most of the balance was to be used for investment and aid within Latin America, and in defence of its interests as a developing region producing food and raw materials.¹¹³

The foreign policies of both Brazil and Argentina had changed dramatically, but the Peruvian minister of mines, General Jorge Fernandez Maldonado was another in the long line of Latin American pilgrims who had toured the Middle East. He announced on his return to Lima that he had secured 'economic, financial and mutual support agreements with the Arab nations,' that Peru will attend OPEC conferences as an observer, and that it was planning to seek full membership.¹¹⁴

Mexico's reaction to the Middle East crisis was no less significant in view of its relationship with, and substantial dependence on, the US. It had nationalised its oil industry in 1937 because of the repressive tactics of the oil companies. At that time the US government had refused to intervene on behalf of the US-based companies which proceeded to isolate Mexico internationally as effectively as they could, but the UK government intervened and diplomatic relations were broken off, by Mexico. Compensation was not finalised, nor diplomatic relations re-established with the UK until October 1941. Without foreign commercial help Mexico's oil industry faltered and by the end of the war it had become a net importer of both natural gas and oil – through commercial channels.

But in 1974 when substantial new fields were located the United States tried to arrange an export/import preference deal with Mexico in an effort to break OPEC's influence. Mexico stood firm. During discussions at Presidential level Mexico succeeded in using oil pressure in reverse to get better treatment for illegal immigrants into the US. The government then proceeded to make arrangements for preferential exports to other Latin American countries, to make a major trade pact with Jamaica and Venezuela over oil and bauxite smelting, and to offer supplies of oil to Israel with whom it had always had close relationships. This had the effect of relieving Israel's dependence on its relationship with Muslim Iran under the protection of the United States. It discussed membership of OPEC but an understanding was reached that it was not eligible for membership and the matter was not pursued further. However, the government's attitude was shifting, and when the anti-Zionism resolution was before the UN Mexico voted in favour of it. After the first vote, in November, the Jewish community in the US suspended extensive travel programmes in Mexico, and confirmed the suspension after the second vote a month later. Then in March, 1976, the Mexican government invited the PLO to open an information office in Mexico City. The invitation was confirmed by the Foreign Minister at a joint press conference with the visiting Israeli Foreign Minister!

And while the United States was trying to break Mexico's connections with OPEC the foreign ministers of the Islamic Conference were more intent on demonstrating the spirit of empowerment. On July 21, 1974, meeting in Kuala Lumpur, they resolved to establish an Islamic Foundation for Science, Technology and Development. When it was finally established five years later it became a subsidiary organ of the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

... THE DEVELOPMENT CONNECTION

The fact that these developments had all taken place within nine months of the Yom Kippur war demonstrates the dynamic way in which the relationship between Latin American and the Arab world had been transformed and the cohesion which was developing at an amazing pace within the former colonies of the Third World. Unwittingly, Israel was the trigger for it all. The United States had certainly not anticipated any such reactions when the decision was taken to deflect the Arab oil embargo onto the rest of the world. It had been warned, very clearly, not only by the dissenting minority on the Oil Import Question, but by the mini-embargo which it had deflected in 1967, and it had demonstrated its own expertise at the embargo game several times. However its self-understanding had not changed. It was determined to push on with the policies it had in place to perpetuate its position at the pinnacle of world affairs and as the chief member of the amorphous Christian gel. But the nature of the gel had changed somewhat. It was now the amorphous Judeo-Christian gel.

In a nutshell, through the oil embargo the issues of Third World development and self determination had become firmly linked with the Middle East crisis, Zionism and inter-faith relationships for a number of reasons. A very important one was that accelerated development in each of the oil producing countries was made possible whether they were Arab or not because the Arab oil producers were first able to increase the flow of funds, through prices raised to higher levels than it had previously been intended, or possible, to negotiate, as a direct consequence of their embargo against the US. That embargo had been implemented, with some reluctance, as a direct consequence of the war between Israel and its neighbours. Another important reason was that aid was channelled to other developing countries from the Arab oil producing countries at a rate which contrasted sharply with the flow of aid from the Western countries which had held virtually exclusive responsibility for the flow of funds prior to the October war. The will and the ability of other groups or countries which are dependent on the export of raw materials for development income to negotiate or enforce higher prices in order to achieve that income sprang directly from the Arab action in 1973.

However the continued ability to achieve that income has subsequently been undermined by the way in which the Western powers were making a rapid recovery after the temporary shock; gained control of the new 'petro-dollars.' The western powers were able to entice the producer countries into placing the bulk of their funds in the financial institutions of the west which were then able to fulfil two distinct functions. One was to manage and control the placement of loan funds and to get the kudos and the majority benefit from doing so instead of the oil producing countries whose money they were managing.. The other was to impose the established financial, lending, investment and commercial practices of the West on those countries which sought to borrow investment funds, or which got into financial difficulties because of their inexperience in managing a western-style capitalist economy and required help. It was the sudden transition from 'poor-nation' to 'poor-nation-with-a-massive-cash-flow' without the benefit of steady transition and without the opportunity to develop the large financial institutions necessary to manage the enormous funds which became available, which made it necessary for the new oil economies to turn to the West for assistance. That was no fault of the oil producing countries. It was circumstantial.

It is ironic that by this mechanism the greater part of the benefit from the new oil production arrangements flowed back to the West and did not stay with the oil producers and the people of the Third World. It is even more ironic that the countries of the Third World were not only required to adapt to the financial and monetary systems of the West, but they also had to cope with a deluge of social conduct, habits and influences which were foreign to their culture, undermined their social fabric and left them with massive urban slums, unable to provide the infrastructure for either their urban or rural populations.

In addition, aid and development funds were deliberately withheld, or provided with conditions attached by the United States as a political weapon in attempts to secure the use of bases and facilities which were required for the support and defence of Israel or to buffer the US against the effects of an embargo in the event of another war. The flow of aid from Western countries to the Third World had been deliberately hampered, not only from political motivation but also as a consequence of the recession in the Western world which had been seriously aggravated by the manipulation of the oil flow in 1973 / 1974.

Attempts to preserve the privileged economic position of Western countries, or to avoid increased pressure against the capitalist system which resulted from trading realignment, by undermining commodity-export groups or government-to-government trading arrangements had the effect of inhibiting development mainly in those countries of Africa and Asia which were, or which become, aligned with the Arab cause against Zionism. They are therefore seen both as pro-Zionist and racist.

The truth was soon evident and understood that while emergency relief aid will always be needed in some circumstances, and while there will always be a role for assistance towards specific development or social programmes, assessments or feasibility studies, the only means by which development of Third World countries can be effectively accelerated is by substantially increased national income. Grants and Loans within the existing institutional and trading pattern are of only limited effectiveness and value. Therefore the increases in national income must come from either increased income through the private sector or increased trading through government entities with government ownership of the exhaustible resources being traded, coupled with an agency relationship in the case of replaceable resources which are the product of personal labour. Given the freedom to choose, most Third World governments opt for the latter alternative because of the conduct of private enterprise; the inability of governments to properly control the utilization of their natural resources when they are in the hands of major companies which have operations in a number of countries; the high proportion of income which is repatriated; and the relatively low proportion of total funds which, through taxation, are available for development.

This enables Western vested interests to discuss the whole issue as if it were simply a matter of capitalism versus socialism/communism, and not one of development and international relations. It camouflages and confuses the fact that a country's desire to have control of its own resources, rate of extraction, utilization and national development does not equate to socialism and many of these countries, whether the Muslim or Christian heritage wish to operate within a basically free enterprise structure. The tactics employed by the Western world and its 'free' enterprises have been a significant influence in pushing many developing countries towards a greater degree of state ownership and operation within a 'socialist' framework.

In simple terms, people across the Third World can not be criticized for seeing the life equation this way. The Western world is Christian; it has stood over us for years; and it is now denying us development and a fair deal. It is doing this to maintain and extend its privileges and control over us, to enforce Zionism against the rights of the Palestinians, and it is imposing social values which we reject.

The Arab community is helping us with aid; it is enabling the redistribution of wealth from the oppressor to the oppressed, and it has made it possible for us to get a better deal for our resources to speed our development. The Arab community is Muslim: therefore Muslims are good and Christians are bad, and therefore Islam's teaching must be right and the Christian Church has failed. Putting it another way, the 'religious connections' which were already showing before the October war have been reinforced by events since then. In the minds of uncommitted observers - and not only uncommitted observers but may Christians as well - Christianity is associated with capitalism, corruption, decadence in the Western world, colonialism, oppression and exploitation in the Third World, support of corrupt regimes in the Third world, theological divorce from daily life and organisational failure

Judaism is associated with racial arrogance, religious exclusiveness and a privileged relationship with the West, while Islam is associated with fair distribution of wealth, development of 'community, responsible corporate action, support for the underdog, a practical faith for living, and organizational simplicity.

Whatever the US now does in terms of its alliance with Israel emphasizes these associations and denies rather than accelerates development in the Third world. That alliance will continue to be counter-productive in world relationships until either the US is prepared to sacrifice its position of dominance and privilege, or until Israel negotiates a proper settlement with its neighbours.

The natural reactions to these links are well illustrated by the Portuguese experience. That attempt to trade strategic bases required by the US/Israel alliance for colonial power and resources probably had wider repercussions and underlined the consequences of Israel's continuing refusal to make sacrifices more than any other single incident, although the pressure applied to Thailand by restricting its oil supplies was also of immense significance. In addition Venezuela established a novel development aid scheme for Latin America. It charged full OPEC prices for crude oil but accepts part payment in the currency of the customer and places that amount to the credit off the customer's country in a development fund. The amounts so earmarked were available on highly favourable terms for development programmes supported by the government off the country. The sudden massive transfer of funds from oil importing developed western countries to oil exporting countries not only benefited 'the Arabs' and other members of OPEC. Countries which also benefited directly included Mexico, Colombia, Peru, Bolivia, Trinidad, Bahrain, Oman, Angola, Tunisia, Malaysia, Congo, Zaire (from November 1975 when exports began), Canada, Norway, the People's Republic of China and the former Soviet Union. While its charter does not permit these countries to become members of OPEC (and whether they would want to in any case is a separate matter) they have certainly moved closer to the OPEC member countries in international affairs and attitudes to development.

All oil importing countries were actively encouraged to develop their own petroleum and other resources and in many cases assistance was provided by the present exporting countries. Investment in industry and property meant a reverse flow in funds to a number of developed countries for a time.

However, as important as the effects of the transfer of these funds are, they are not the main development connection. The main connection was the ability of developing countries to negotiate higher prices for their raw material exports and, as groups, to move towards revised commodity trading arrangements as part of a new economic order. Prior to the October war a number of governments had been trying without much success, to gain support for commodity export groups along the lines of OPEC. Those which had been established found that because of pressures applied to divide the members very little could be achieved. However the instant success of the oil embargo in achieving both price justice and political change strengthened the hands of those others already established, triggered the establishment of a series of others, and also encouraged the producer members of the UN sponsored commodity study groups to look much harder at trade questions rather than being restricted to technical co-operation.

According to the Handbook of International Organisation, 1975; "One of the most significant developments in intergovernmental organizations has been the proliferation of commodity organizations. While it is difficult to generalise about these organisations, three general observations can be made. The importance of intergovernmental commodity organizations as forces in world politics is a relatively recent phenomenon. Intergovernmental commodity organizations comprised solely of producer states are increasing, while organization made up of consumer and producer states are declining in number. While the organizations' goals have always included the exchange of technical and scientific information and the expansion of trade, they now embrace trading, marketing and pricing arrangements, as well."

A very high proportion of producer members of these commodity organization are members of the Non-Aligned Nations group, and even though the more recent successful moves to shift commodity trading arrangements into the arena of the World Trade Organization has reduced the influence of the original commodity groups, the potential for their activation in a crisis, and their cross-membership with the Islamic Conference and OPEC are of very great significance. The strong trend towards the establishment of resource producer groups which have the capacity to negotiate on behalf of their member countries was not welcomed by Western governments and their major resource consuming industries. It clearly inhibited the resource consuming companies from direct one to one negotiations with government authorities who had control of resources and this meant that they could not "play" one government against another to depress resource prices and to obtain preferential access to resources, to demand investment incentives, tax concessions and other benefits. They could no longer do the things which the oil industry had been so expert at doing until OPEC was established. It was a part of the Western self-understanding - the aura of the Capitalist free enterprise system - that it was a company's right to walk into a country of the Third World where the needs of the people were seen to be very elementary and to offer a pittance for what ever resources were available. It was just the normal thing to do: buy cheap and sell high. That was exactly what the great empires of Europe had been built on and, in their view, there was no justification for changing the system. But the growth of producer groups would do exactly that. They would change the rules of the game in favour of the Third World.

However there was a second aspect of producer group functions. They were not only interested in price maintenance. They were interested in market rationalization as well, to enable every country which wanted the opportunity to supply a commodity to do so. That could be good in one sense, because it gave companies which wanted to enter a field the opportunity to do so, and tended to prevent the producer governments from demanding high prices. But on the other hand, for companies already in the mineral extraction business it could be serious. Unless the demand for a resource was rising faster than new production, it meant a reduced market share and greater competition for the favours of processors. The boot was then on the other foot.

Then there was an additional issue. The relationship between western and non-western governments. Western governments were expected to support their own enterprises and not to enter into arrangements with non-western governments. In the long term any collaboration of that nature could only reduce the advantage enjoyed by western enterprises. Western governments were therefore expected to stand aloof from such commodity producer groups, or to boycott them. There was no place for sentiment, like supporting the underdog, in world trade. That was a matter for big business. But just occasionally a government came along which had a conscience, in spite of the best efforts to prevent it. One such government had been elected in December 1972, in Australia. It set about introducing a new social order by establishing the Australian Assistance Plan under which a new tier of community-based regional bodies were directly involved in social planning, the development of new welfare and educational initiatives and even the allocation of significant slabs of government funds. It was especially intended to strengthen rural Australia against the debilitating influence of urban population concentration.

But it had the audacity to say that it was going to end Australia's servile dependence on United States decision making. It was going to have an independent foreign policy. It ended military conscription and it was getting positively revolutionary! It took Australia into a series of commodity producer groups, including those concerned with copper, bauxite and iron ores, with the stated intention of strengthening the negotiating position of developing countries and to end the "divisive competition between Australian [resource] producers."¹¹⁵ It began dismantling barriers to Asian and African migration, it moved towards establishing full recognition of indigenous Australian land rights, and it even wanted to prevent Australia from being caught again in the event of another exercise in massive manipulation of the world's oil supplies. It planned the establishment of a oil tanker fleet, a massive natural gas strategic storage system with a pipeline linking North Western Australia with Sydney via the South Australian Cooper Basin, state-controlled coal export facilities, a uranium enrichment plant, and an in-situ emergency oil storage plan in collaboration with Arab governments. That was intolerable. It had to go. The question in Washington was, "how?" It would be easy enough to prevent the schemes from going ahead because they were going to cost billions and the government did not have control of the Senate, the Australian Upper House. It could therefore never get approval for a government-to-government agreement, but the fact that such a government was trying to do these things in a formerly friendly ally country was bad enough. It could unleash an unacceptable pattern of conduct for governments in many countries. Time would tell.

~ 1974

~ The oil embargo against the United States had been lifted, but prompted by the impact of the rise in oil prices and the need for more equitable distribution of wealth and economic opportunities, the Group of 77 demanded that the United Nations examine alternatives for - and move towards - a New International Economic Order (NIEO). They had the support of the Australian government, too.

~ The Indian government ordered the test explosion of its first nuclear bomb, and this meant that the arms race was getting more and more out of control. Any government would soon be able to build, or obtain access to nuclear weapons and they might not all be as responsible as the United States!

~ People in the United States had become more worried about the possibility of a nuclear war in the wake of the Cuban missile affair and the concept of mutually assured destruction - MAD - as a basis for security through deterrence began to fall from favour. The US Secretary of Defence James Schlesinger announced that future US nuclear targeting would be geared to selective strikes and not massive blanket attacks.

~ 1975

~ September

~ The United States and Israel signed an agreement, kept secret for some time, under which the US agreed to help Israel meet its requirements for arms, economic assistance, and energy and to support Israel's right to free passage through the Straits of Bad el Mandeb and the Strait of Gibraltar, and pledged not to recognize or negotiate with the PLO as long as it did not accept Israel's right to exist.

That agreement was signed on the same day as the second Egypt-Israel disengagement agreement under which Israel agreed to withdraw from the Mitla and Gidi passes and, reluctantly, to return the Abu Rudeis oil fields. The 'non-recognisable' PLO had been growing progressively stronger, better organized and better equipped around its base in South Lebanon ever since the Cairo Agreement of November 1969, and after being ejected from Jordan in July 1971, it developed a high degree of organization. However relations between the PLO and the government were continuing to deteriorate as a result of the Yom Kippur War, and while Syria was exerting its influence to assist the Palestinians, Israeli forces were providing clandestine help for the Lebanese forces. Thus, although the PLO did not initiate the civil war in Lebanon which was about to erupt, its presence as a sub-state, and the strained relations which resulted, were a major factor in triggering the war. Concurrent with the US-Israeli negotiations, a consultation on the crisis in the Middle East was being held by the World Council of Churches at Cartigny, Switzerland. The civil war erupted while the consultation was in progress and two participants from Lebanon, the Metropolitan of Beirut and the assistant secretary general of the Middle East Council of Churches, found it necessary to withdraw early. Some of the executive staff of the Council who were involved in that consultation had also taken part in a retreat during the previous week, and among the matters discussed were the implications for the Council in the event that the question of the Doctrine of the Trinity became contentious, re-kindled debate about the basis of membership, and caused friction between member churches.

~ October

~ In New Zealand the government acknowledged a history of suppression of indigenous Maori rights and the failure of governments to honour the Treaty of Waigani. It passed the Treaty of Waigani Act and established a tribunal to make recommendations on Maori land claims and measures which were necessary to redress past wrongs. However, after a few years, governments came under strong pressure to exclude resource bearing areas, water resources and fisheries from Maori claims and to release them for private enterprise competition.

~ 16: In Australia all eyes were on Canberra where the Opposition used its numbers in the Senate to block supply. The constitutional crisis which had been widely anticipated was breaking. At the same time, just an hour or two flight from the Australian coast, in the oil-rich Timor Sea over which Australia had been negotiating with the Portuguese authorities prior to the collapse of Portugal's empire, Indonesian forces invaded the small colonial territory in order to absorb it into Indonesia. The future of the two small Portuguese-Catholic territories which made up one half of the island was being determined. The Australian government did not object. It had its mind on higher things - quite apart from the constitutional crisis - oil and the need for good relations with Indonesia. But its immediate problem was how to manoeuvre the Opposition into passing the supply bill so that it could carry on governing and prepare for an election on the issues of its choice.

~ November

~ 8: A small item appeared in the CIA's top secret National Intelligence Daily, an internal briefing paper prepared in the Directorate of Central Intelligence for US government eyes only. It read:

The determination of the Australian Opposition to force a general election is weakening. Prime Minister Whitlam has managed to raise real alarm about the dire consequences of government bankruptcy, which he claims will result from the Opposition's blocking of Government appropriations.

Disenchanted Australians are swinging, at least temporarily, in support of Whitlam's Labor Party. They agree with the Prime Minister and blame the Liberal-Country coalition for the mess.

The Liberal members of the Opposition are having doubts about the wisdom of stalling on appropriations. Several Liberal Senators, unenthusiastic from the start over the tactic, are threatening to break ranks. Some Liberals, worried by the strength of public reaction, are talking of replacing Opposition Leader Fraser.

Fraser this week offered to delay an election for six months - a proposal quickly rejected by the Prime Minister. Although Fraser has not yet abandoned stalling on the appropriation bills, his ability to force an election has clearly been weakened.¹¹⁶

Later that day the CIA took the extreme step of accusing Whitlam of being “a security risk” and threatened to end the intelligence ties which had been developed between the two countries over the period of a generation, and the Governor-General, Sir John Kerr, was given a special briefing on the CIA’s “deep security concern surrounding Whitlam.”¹¹⁷

~ 11: In circumstances of deep intrigue, Kerr dismissed Whitlam, dissolved parliament, appointed the Opposition Leader, Malcolm Fraser, as caretaker prime minister, called elections for December, and immersed Australia in its constitutional crisis.

The window of opportunity to get rid of the government had opened when it used very unorthodox means to raise the loans to finance its very ambitious ‘Australian Independence Program.’ The ‘Khemlani Loans Affair’ had swamped the government and given the Opposition the opportunity to withhold Senate authorization for supply, the bills required to approve the funds for the day to day running of the government. But the election was not going to be fought around the issues of the Middle East and foreign affairs. That would be divisive and the opposition did not want the election to be focussed on issues like resource management, relations with the United States and Israel, and defence planning. It had to be focussed on domestic issues like inflation and unemployment. As in Britain, but to a lesser extent, these had blown out because of the effects of the manipulation of oil supplies. That could be blamed on the Arabs, of course, and one did not want to blame one’s principal ally! So the election campaign got under way. The Opposition cause did not languish for lack of funds to fight a vigorous media campaign on its own terms.

~ 23: At the Fifth Assembly of the World Council of Churches in Nairobi a bid by delegates from South Africa to inhibit the operation of the Program to Combat Racism was defeated decisively (62 in favour, 325 against, 22 abstentions). Speaking during debate on that issue, Bishop R.C. Nichols of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in the USA had more than South Africa on his mind when he said: “Peace is not the absence of war but the presence of justice.”¹¹⁸

Portugal had just granted independence to its remaining African colonies: Guinea-Bissau, Sao Tome and Principe, and Angola. East Timor was its remaining colony. A rush of one million expatriate Portuguese and refugees to Portugal was causing great social and industrial tensions and destabilizing the country still further. Unfortunately Nigeria had returned to a period of coup and counter coup. Gowon was deposed in July 1975 by a Muslim, Brigadier Murtala Mohammed, who was murdered in an attempted counter coup in February 1976. Worse was to come over the next 25 years.

The assembly also had before it a report prepared by the Cartigny consultation on the crisis in the Middle East and in due course it adopted a statement in two parts: the Middle East and Jerusalem. Concerning the Middle East generally, it noted that current events demonstrated that tensions persist unabated and that continued escalation of military power in the area can only aggravate the threat to world peace from the unresolved conflict. It noted that there was an international 'consensus' that the basis for a peaceful settlement required Israel to withdraw from territories which it occupied in 1967; the right of all states including Israel and the Arab states to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries; and the 'implementation' of the rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination. It was "encouraged" that the parties to the conflict seemed to be progressively willing to accept these principles and recognized that the Second Sinai Disengagement Agreement was a means of reducing tension between Egypt and Israel. It then said:

However, since [the disengagement agreement] is not addressed to the fears and distrust among Israel, other neighbouring states, and the Palestinian people, [it] must be followed soon by resumption of the Geneva Peace Conference for reaching a total settlement on the basis of the principles mentioned above. The Geneva Conference should necessarily involve all parties concerned, including the Palestinians.

We note that some Arab states have recently declared their readiness, with the participation of the Palestine Liberation Organization, to seek agreement with Israel based upon these principles.

Although the parties have not trusted one another sufficiently until now to engage in dialogue, full mutual recognition by the parties must be seen not as a precondition to, but rather as a product of, the negotiation. We call upon all parties to take those steps essential to negotiations with hope for success. Among these steps, we emphasize the cessation of all military activity, both regular and irregular, including terrorism.

Peace in the Middle East must be based upon justice and security for all concerned. The wellbeing of each party depends upon the wellbeing of all other parties. We urge the churches to help their constituencies to have more accurate information on and more sensitive awareness of the various discussions of the Middle East conflict. The churches could thus help to promote natural trust among the parties and to develop a responsible involvement in peaceful solution on the part of their members and the government of their countries. This opportunity is open to churches within the area and the churches outside the area as well.

That statement showed very clearly that the executive staff of the Council were very well informed indeed on the crisis in the Middle East. They had been ever since 1948, and yet it was not until Uppsala twenty years later that the issue appeared on the business paper of an assembly, and only now, seven years later, that there is a reference to an opportunity for the “churches within the area and the churches outside the area as well” to “help ... promote natural trust among the parties and to develop a responsible involvement in peaceful solution on the part of their members and the government of their countries.” Politics, religion, the theology and consequences of the church’s self-understanding, human rights, exploitation of people, and the use of land and resources were, and always had been, intimately involved in the trouble in the triangle. But it took an international crisis which actually hurt to bring the fact to the surface. The facts of life had not changed. No one ever surrenders a position of privilege or reassess and surrenders a self-understanding and practices which are to the disadvantage of others until pleading progresses to force. For the privileged to say to terrorists: “Why did you take up weapons? Why did you not come and talk to me?” is arrant nonsense. Change in the relationship between oppressor and oppressed, or the distribution of benefits between the politically strong and the politically weak never occurs simply because the two sit around a table and talk. They only sit around a table and talk after the oppressed has been able to hit back in some way.

The conduct and history of the European colonial powers had demonstrated that very well. The United States was doing all it possibly could to prove that the version of democracy which it was hell bent on promoting only works if the playing field is fairly level, and it was perfectly comfortable subverting the principle and reverting to the law of the jungle when the processes of democracy did not suit it. And the response of the amorphous Christian gel to the inspired work of the Liberation Theologians in Latin America was about to confirm it all. However the extent of the hurt from the OAPEC oil embargo - a classic case of the oppressed hitting back - had not been sufficient to make the amorphous Christian gel surrender more than a sliver of its pedestal of privilege and it had not shaken the church’s self-understanding to the point of reassessment either. In fact the gel was about to stiffen and use its almost-undisturbed power to consolidate its position of privilege. The world would have to wait quite a bit longer until the pressure in the boiler of the trouble in the triangle reached the point of blowing the safety valve - triggering action by the people of the Covenant whose role and obligations have not changed.

Now: the portion of the WCC assembly statement referring to Jerusalem. It noted that Jerusalem continues to be a focus of deepest religious inspiration and attachment for “many millions of Christians throughout the world, as well as for the adherents of the two great sister monotheistic religions,” each with “their responsibility to cooperate in the creation of conditions that will ensure that Jerusalem is [an open] city” ... “where they can meet and live together [and] the tendency to minimize Jerusalem’s importance for any of these religions should be avoided.” It noted the various treaties which had governed access to the city, that the “Status Quo of the Holy Places must be fully safeguarded and confirmed” and that none of the church authorities of a given denomination could represent unilaterally ... all Christians [and] ... each church authority of a given denomination [represents] only its own point of view.” It then noted that “the question of Jerusalem is not only a matter of protection of the Holy Places, it is organically linked with living faiths and communities” and it is “essential that the Holy Shrines should not become mere monuments of visitation, but should serve as living places of worship integrated and responsive to Christian communities ... [and] ... for those who out of religious attachments want to visit them.”

Finally, after “recognizing the complexity and emotional implications of the issues surrounding the future status of Jerusalem” it said “such status has to be determined within the general context of the settlement of the Middle East conflict in its totality,” that “apart from any politics, the whole settlement of the inter-religious problem of the Holy Places should take place under an international aegis and guarantee which ought to be respected by the parties concerned as well as the ruling authorities” and these matters “should be worked out with the most directly concerned member churches, as well as with the Roman Catholic Church. These issues should also become subjects for dialogue with Jewish and Muslim counterparts.”

That statement was sensitive. It recognized a sister relationship between the three faiths. It acknowledged the complex relationships within the church and the fact of its diverse and divisive theology. And it took account of realpolitik. It had been drafted under the guidance of dialogue staff who worked intimately with people of the partner faiths, and with people of the non-Abrahamic faiths as well, and whose understanding of the relationships was way out in front of the church at large. It could not possibly have been written before the Balfour Declaration. It could not even have been written in 1948. It took the trauma of the Holocaust - imposed by Hitler as the Scourge of the Night Journey - and the fourth conflict centred on Jerusalem within a single generation of 25 years to tear away some of the cobwebs and to shake the self-understanding of the Christian church to that point of recognition. There was still a long way to go. Churchmen and women would still only talk dialogue and not reassessment of theology. And it had taken real trauma - the direct painful impact of the oil embargo on the amorphous Christian gel - to even get to that stage. The catalyst was in place throughout. The people of the Covenant were back at their home base, by courtesy of the self-misunderstanding of the church and the gross misconduct of the amorphous Christian gel, but no one had been prepared to recognize the coincidence of the Qur’anic Night Journey and Maimonides’ understanding of the circumstances of the return of the people of the Covenant to Israel. There was still quite a long way to go. It was only November 1975.

~ December

~ Australia went to the polls for the election which the CIA said it had to have and the caretaker government of Malcolm Fraser won a sweeping victory. Australia was embroiled more deeply in the trouble in the triangle than most people realized, and the importance of the position in world affairs which the Whitlam government had adopted was not widely recognized. Because it impinged directly on each of the major factors in world relationships, a close examination is called for.

AUSTRALIA AND THE TROUBLE IN THE TRIANGLE

Australian Jewry has tended to assume a special relationship between Australia and Israel because of the assistance received by the Jewish Agency from Australia’s delegations to the United Nations and in particular the significant role played by the Dr. H. V. Evatt (formerly Minister for Foreign Affairs and later Leader of the Federal Opposition) in his role as chairman of the UN Ad Hoc Committee on Palestine in 1947. It was that committee which finalised the proposals for the partition of Palestine into separate Arab and Jewish states which the General Assembly adopted later that year. It was therefore rather hard for the Jewish community to accept that the Australian government's policy of 'even handedness' in relation to the Middle East was not, in fact, a distinct move away from Israel and towards support for the Arab position, especially in view of greatly increased diplomatic activity in the region, economic collaboration, and very definite support for the developing countries of Africa. Australia's position was critical in three 'areas'. In each area it had many options but basically two, and the implications of each choice were quite distinct. In brief, the areas and basic options were as follows.

Geographic location in relation to the strategies of the US/Israeli alliance. Australia could either support the alliance and provide the facilities required, or decline to do so and thus strengthen the immediate position of the Arab cause.

The exploitation (or 'development') of mineral resources. Australia could permit unrestricted resource extraction and export irrespective of ownership or control, and that course, in the circumstances of the time, made overseas-based companies and governments the main benefactors in terms of both political and economic gain, tended to bolster the capitalist system, to consolidate the Western position of privilege and, in so doing, to restrict the Third World's means of accelerating development. On the other hand it could move to control resource extraction, regulate exports and prices and supervise ownership or control patterns. This course provided increased benefits for Australia, enabled conservation of resources, and would have provided support for Third World countries in commodity group negotiations, coupled with progressive redistribution of wealth, accelerated development and the narrowing of the privilege gap.

Political Relationships. Australia's options were to support Israel in its present stand and assist it to maintain or negotiate from a position of relative strength, or shift ground, assist the Palestinians to strengthen their negotiating position and reduce world tension, but incur the displeasure of the US

Broadly speaking, the dismissed Government of Gough. Whitlam had moved firmly towards the second option in each case, while the government of Malcolm. Fraser moved even more decisively towards the first option in each case.

GEOGRAPHICAL LOCATION: THE US/ISRAEL ALLIANCE

This area related to the strategic requirements of the US/Israel Alliance and involved three considerations: transit bases for both military re-supply of Israel and personnel and equipment for operations in the event of US intervention; naval and air facilities for operational maintenance and trade route surveillance; and communication facilities. What was once a problem of remoteness had become a problem of conflict of allegiances and consequences of the highest order.

The nature of the strategic requirements of the US/Israel Alliance showed quite clearly that the trouble in the triangle knew no boundaries and its spin-off affected countries and people without regard to their normal religious and political interests and associations. New tensions could be generated and new issues could become important, undermining relations between neighbours, without most people having any idea at all why it was happening. For example, geographic isolation or distance between countries meant nothing once the United States had to start a serious hunt for re-supply transit bases.

TRANSIT BASES

Australia lies at the southern end of the belt in which a secure transit line base had to be located. It was not in an ideal position, being on the extremity, but each time another country of the belt denied alternative bases, the need for such a base in northern Australia, and the pressure on Australia to provide it, became greater.

The logical country, in terms of America's post Second World War relationship with it, was Japan, but it denied the use of its bases; established joint petroleum operations and a tanker fleet with Arab countries, mainly with private capital but under agreements sponsored government-to-government. It had diversified its energy supplies as much as possible and was drawing about five per cent of its needs from the People's Republic of China, but it was still highly susceptible to an oil embargo.

When US-based companies cut supplies to Japan the Prime Minister appeal to Dr. Kissinger, personally, to intervene. He declined, unless Japan supported America's position and requirements with respect to the Middle East, otherwise the matter remained strictly one of commerce. Rigid restrictions were imposed. Japanese industry was seriously disrupted, trade relations with the US were strained, various tariff rearrangements were made by both countries, petroleum product prices in Japan soared, output of fertilizer was cut (to avoid restricting heavy industry activity) and exports to China and India (at a critical stage of the season) were cut. Japan approached China for emergency supplies of oil (the arrangement was subsequently converted to a long-term agreement); sought government-to-government deals with Iran and Arab countries; markedly shifted ground away from Israel - and the Prime Minister was subjected to accusations of graft and corruption. He was accused of accepting bribes from US sources and resigned in disgrace amid political scandal. There was a shift to the right, but the government's Middle East position did not.

The Philippines was not prepared to permit the use of its bases either and the renegotiation of its bases agreement resulted in the US being restricted to operations in the 'western Pacific', with Indian Ocean and Middle East operations excluded.¹¹⁹

In Thailand the use of bases by the US had been a major issue in domestic politics since 1973. In April, 1976, following the national elections, leaders of the largest single party in the new parliament said that the party ought to be prepared to relax the ban on US flights to the Indian Ocean but the suggestion would be subject to discussions with other probable partners in a coalition. However there were active Muslim secessionist movements in the south of Thailand and uprisings among the 3.5 million Malay Muslims (10 per cent of the population), and the Islamic Conference had made formal approaches for a better deal for the Muslim minority following the 1974 conference of foreign ministers.

The government of Malaysia was among the strongest non-Arab supporters of the Palestinian cause and the internationalisation of Jerusalem, together with Pakistan and Iran. Tunku Abdul Rahman became the first Secretary-General of the Islamic Conference Secretariat when he stepped down at the end of his term as Head of State and Malaysia provided much of the expertise for the Islamic Broadcasting Association which was established in Jeddah.

During the oil embargo of 1973/74 the Singapore government directed its very big refining industry – US companies and all – not to fuel US naval vessels or air force craft.

Indonesia's President Suharto and President Ford held discussions on December 6, 1975, and although all of the matters relating to the Middle East are known to have been discussed, their joint communique made no reference to them. A previous report proposing an increase in military aid was released, but their communique did not mention defence, air bases, or Timor. After mentioning presidential hospitality and good relations, it referred to discussions of “international, bilateral, and regional issues”, indicated that the US agreed to “continue to provide substantial development aid” and that the presidents “agreed to expand dialogue at Ministerial level and on specific issues.

With all of those potential base-hosts eliminated the remaining possibilities were Korea, Taiwan, Papua New Guinea, Timor and Australia. East Timor would have ceased to be available if those pressing for its independence did not achieve their aim, but, as noted above, Indonesia was in the middle of determining that matter at the time of the Australian elections.

Korea's circumstances were so complex that it could hardly be defined as a ‘secure base’. In 1972 its oil supplies, all commercially controlled, were obtained from: Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and other members of the Islamic Conference.

Taiwan was not available.

Each of Papua New Guinea, Darwin and Perth probably only became operationally acceptable as transit bases when used in conjunction with Diego Garcia, which is approximately the same direct air distance from Israel as are the Azores.

Diego Garcia had become vital to the US/Israel alliance and the requirements which flow from it. It was a transit base for final operational deployment of ground troops for either offensive or defensive operations in Israel, and it was also as a staging base for such troops. Both shore-based and carrier-based attack and reconnaissance aircraft can operate over the whole of the Middle East from the island, but especially over the Arabian Peninsula and Persian Gulf. Submarines, both long-range and attack, and carrying either conventional or nuclear weapons, can operate from it and the whole of the Middle East is within range of nuclear warhead missiles launched from submarines operating it. Without Diego Garcia, the surveillance and/or control of trade routes east and west of the Persian Gulf is very difficult and therefore the security of oil supplies for the US are at serious risk in the event of hostilities. The name of Diego Garcia therefore figures prominently in any consideration of the trouble in the triangle.

Whatever their purpose – transit or otherwise – all operations in the Arabian Peninsula, Persian Gulf or Red Sea require a primary access route to be available from the Indian Ocean. Australian access bases have significant advantages which partly offset the greater distance involved in the event of no other bases being available, firstly, because it is unnecessary to fly over restricted and potentially hostile airspace, and secondly, since transit base operations and Indian Ocean operations are intimately related and must be considered together, they can be co-ordinated more easily within this country.

NAVAL AND AIR FACILITIES: TRADE ROUTE SURVEILLANCE

The principal trade routes which the US had to protect in the context of the US/Israel alliance and a potential war in the Middle East were Iran to Israel via the Persian Gulf, the Arabian Sea (northern Indian Ocean), the Gulf of Aden, the Red Sea and Gulf of Aqaba. If that route becomes untenable, then the alternatives are the Mediterranean Sea route via Gibraltar, or a land route or a land/sea route from a neighbouring country's fields. The fields and pipeline systems of Iraq to the Mediterranean coast and tanker to Haifa would be more than adequate, but as the Gulf War later showed, the repercussions of an attempt to take over Iraq's supplies would require the US to intervene in Saudi Arabia to 'protect' its own imports from that country. Because the Mediterranean sea route is acutely vulnerable the most likely alternative at that time became Saudi Arabia, Tapline, Sidon and tankers to Haifa.

In addition the United States has to protect the route from the Persian Gulf ports to the east coast of the USA via the Cape of Good Hope and from the Persian Gulf ports to the west coast of the USA via the Straits of Malacca or, in the event of that being unavailable, the Timor and Arufura Seas. In each case, naval and air capacity in and from the Indian Ocean is vital.

Such considerations made it apparent that in the circumstances of the time Australia was in a potentially critical situation. Similarly, renegotiation of the border between Australia and Papua New Guinea involved the strategic questions of naval access and defence as well as sovereignty over a group of islands, their people, fish and seabed resources, regardless of the fact that public debate was directed at the questions of citizenship and social welfare benefits for the people of the Torres Strait islands.

THE EXERCISE OF OPTIONS

The McMahon Liberal/Country Party coalition government, which preceded the Whitlam government, had placed restrictions on the use of Cockburn Sound naval base by the US These were confirmed and extended by the Whitlam government, which strongly supported the Afro-Asian concept of a 'nuclear-free zones of peace' in the Indian Ocean. The Whitlam government also opposed the US development of Diego Garcia.

Within weeks of assuming office the Fraser government inverted that policy completely. It vigorously endorsed the US development of Diego Garcia and invited the US Seventh Fleet to use Cockburn Sound as a base in the Indian Ocean. It did not exclude nuclear-powered ships and as the available surveillance equipment could not distinguish between nuclear-powered ships carrying nuclear warheads and those not carrying them, and as a dependent government is not likely to enforce physical equipment checks, such a policy amounted to an open invitation to nuclear-powered and nuclear-armed ships and submarines and aircraft to use Australian bases.

COMMUNICATIONS FACILITIES

Naval vessels and aircraft in military operations require more sophisticated communications systems than similar vehicles in civilian use. A system which may be quite adequate for navigation and position fixing for civilian vehicles may not be sufficiently accurate and reliable for military purposes – position fixing, reconnaissance, identification and weapons systems. Accordingly, the major powers place a great deal of emphasis onto development of precision military communications systems. Both the U.S.S.R. and the USA developed 'hyperbolic low-frequency navigation systems' in parallel following the Second World War. The Soviet union had three transmitters in operation. The Americans planned the Omega system, with a network of eight transmitters give effective global coverage.

In Australia, the establishment of communications bases by the USA was the subject of vigorous controversy. The US Navy began to place Omega receivers in its surface ships in 1967, and at time of the Six-Day War, the US government approached the Australian government for agreement to establish a US Navy transmitter in Australia. However, it was not until September 1968 that the US Navy decided to establish a world-wide Omega system. In that light, a transmitter in Australia was most important as the accuracy of the system over the Indian Ocean would be low without such an Australian transmitter. The use of the system in the Antarctic would also not be possible without the Australian base. However, a transmitter in SE Australia would be unreliable for shipping on the coastal trade or approaching the Australian coast and an arc from Tasmania to Brisbane could be adversely affected. A transmitter in New Zealand or somewhere south of Australia would be of greater benefit to Australia, but reliability to the west of Australia in the Indian Ocean) would be poorer. Any US submarine missile launch against the Soviet Union. or China would have to be made from waters in which the vessel would not be dependent on the Australian transmitter.¹²⁰

It was of special significance, but not referred to in the report from the Joint Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence dealing with the Omega Navigational Installation (Australian Government Publishing Service, 1975) that Diego Garcia lies on a direct line from Reunion to Japan and thus, for position fixing as opposed to message communications, the triangles – Norway/Reunion/Japan or Liberia/Reunion/Japan – are not acceptable. Similarly, it lies outside the triangles formed by any other three transmitters except triangles which include the proposed Australian transmitter. Therefore, on technical grounds, the transmitter in Australia was essential for an acceptable degree of reliability in position fixing for all vessels and aircraft operating from Diego Garcia and relying on the Omega system. Furthermore, the Russian-built Berbera base is on the gulf of Aden coast of Somalia. It appears to have been an Arab initiative after the 1967 war, it is aimed primarily at command of the Red Sea route, and it was not under construction at the time that US interest in the Indian Ocean routes to the Middle East increased and when the initial approach to Australia for an Omega base was made. Justification of US build-up is therefore not valid if seen in terms of a response to prior Soviet build-up, even considering that the Soviet Union is reported to be expanding the Somalia Indian Ocean port of Kismaya.

THE EXERCISE OF OPTIONS

It was concurrent with the announcement that Britain had agreed to the US developing facilities on Diego Garcia in December, 1970, that the Liberal-Country Party coalition government agreed in principle to the establishment of an Omega base and detailed discussions and planning commenced. The Australian government exchanged notes with the US government (set out in the report) concerning conditions in August, 1972. Minor points of difference had been resolved, but the agreement had not been ratified in December when the L-CP government was defeated in a general election.

The incoming Whitlam government reversed the decision, declined to conclude an agreement, but, in view of the public debate which had occurred, referred the matter for enquiry to the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence in May, 1973. Because of the way in which the parliamentary committees are appointed, that committee was dominated by members of the former government and not the Whitlam government of the time. Its report, completed in May, 1975, was a bit like the US Cabinet Task Force Report on the Oil Imports Question. It carried a dissenting report and the following extracts from the primary report illustrate the situation.

... the Committee concludes that there is no likelihood that an Omega transmitter built in Australia will be attacked because of a belief that its signals assist ballistic missile submarines.¹²¹

*There is some disquiet in Australia that the building of a local transmitter may have adverse effects, but the Committee hopes that its thorough investigations and the availability of its findings will allay these fears.*¹²²

It is apparent that whether or not an Omega transmitter in Australia was required for ballistic missiles submarines, its strategic significance at that time made it a primary target for attack if there was an outbreak of war in the Middle East between Israel and its Arab neighbours and which involved both the United States and the Soviet Union. Thus, despite the committee's favourable report, the Whitlam Government confirmed its decision not to proceed with an agreement or the construction of a transmitter. As the New Zealand government had previously also declined such an installation, and as circumstances suggest an installation on Guam or any of the other US-administered Pacific territories would not provide the same capability, the US military capabilities in the Indian Ocean, with regard to Middle East operations, was significantly retarded. It was no wonder the US administration and the CIA were unhappy with Whitlam. Dissent on such a matter was not acceptable!

Shortly after the Fraser government assumed office, the prime minister "responded positively" to statements by the newly-appointed US ambassador to Australia, made at his very first press conference, to the effect that one of his first jobs would be to pursue discussions about an Omega base with the Australian government because it was crucial to the "free world's ability to counter the increased Soviet influence in the Indian Ocean". [Emphasis added.] An instrument to authorise establishment of an Omega installation was one of the first items submitted to the new Parliament when it assembled in March, 1976.

RESOURCES

The Whitlam government's attitude to resource extraction has already been noted. In terms of a 'national philosophy', at the stage when Australia's economy was even more heavily rural-export based, the argument was commonly used and generally accepted that it was essential to develop the country's mineral resources in order to diversify the economy, increase export earnings, provide employment, build population of non-urban areas and 'avoid the Yellow Peril' which would be coming to grab Australia's unused resources. The corollary was that large-scale foreign investments were necessary to achieve this.

Discussion of the side-effects of accepting massive equity capital investment, as opposed to non-equity capital, from integrated companies or consortia of related companies in the countries which would import the extracted minerals and the conflicts of interest which would be generated was usually superficial. The conflicts which were discussed tended to hinge around profit repatriation, employment and wages, and other policies which were potentially restrictive. Little consideration was given to the experience of, and consequences for, countries in Latin America where the resources had been used by the international giants to play one country against another for the continued financial benefit of those giant companies. That was, after all, Latin America, not Australia!

Even less consideration was given to the way in which Australia and its resources could be used, either by a government of its own or by a combination of foreign political and commercial influences to retard the development of other countries or to influence the course of international alliances. The issue of the moment was the development of Australia, not of other countries.

AUSTRALIA: CAUGHT IN THE MIDDLE OF THE TRIANGLE

When the Yom Kippur War erupted and the oil embargo was imposed the instant success of the embargo in forcing oil prices justice encouraged and welded together all of the Third World resource producing nations, and notably those of Arab North Africa and Latin America, in view of the Whitlam government's well articulated position it was bound to become involved in another dispute with the United States. The resources issue simply added to its woes. It could anticipate the outbreak of another war between Israel and its neighbours - everyone could do that - but it could not reasonably have anticipated the response of the United States government and the oil industry to the imposition of an oil embargo. Most people would have expected negotiations to begin towards some sort of rational settlement. However the deep-seated self-understandings of the major players involved, and the principal player in the amorphous Judeo-Christian gel in particular, did not permit rational discussion. That would have to wait until more settled times. But in more settled times people relax, or relapse, into complacency and the incentive to think about the fundamental issues of the trouble in the triangle wanes. Therefore it was virtually inevitable that the issue would be shelved until another crisis erupted, or until there was the apparent and understandable potential for another crisis of such proportions that people would say: "Stop! Let's call a halt to the action; do some thinking and start all over again."

In the meantime the Whitlam government became, like Ted Heath's government, a victim of the trouble in the triangle. All areas of vital importance to the US-Israeli Alliance had coincided in its policies. It had no hope. The defence issues of resupply routes, communications facilities, political relations with the Arab nations, resources policy and support for the developing countries of the Third World brought together a coalition of interests which was just too powerful. It could have, perhaps, survived an onslaught from one, or two, but not the whole lot together. If it had control of the Senate it would probably have survived because it would have been able to offer one or another Petro-dollar wealthy country a government-to-government loan agreement. The government's relations with the Arab countries were extremely good. The funds were available, provided there was a government-to-government agreement.¹²³ It could not offer one. The election was fought on the domestic issues of financial management, inflation, employment and the skulduggery involved in a well-motivated but ill-conceived bid to obtain the funds through a back door. It could not work. With all the cards stacked against it, and being manipulated with the help of the CIA, it could not have survived until it was able to win an election with a big enough margin to secure control of the Senate. Without realizing it, the government fell victim to the trouble in the triangle.

The world did not fall apart simply because the government of Australia changed hands. But the decisions taken by the new government helped to further strengthen the US-Israeli Alliance and meant that any resolution of the trouble in the triangle was likely to be deferred yet again. The world simply carried on as if nothing had happened.

~ 1976

- ~ The Group of 77 issued the Manila Declaration in which its members deplored the lack of action by the major powers to bring some equity into world trade and development, made proposals for a New International Economic Order, and called for urgent action by the United Nations and its dominant members.
- ~ In an effort to secure the approval, or at least recognition, of other countries for its form of 'decolonization' the South African government offered the homelands 'independence' supported by South African subsidies. Between 1976 and 1981 four homelands did so, without gaining recognition from any country. Another spiral began. Black South African leaders, including Bishop Desmond Tutu, began calling for an international boycott of South Africa; other African countries sought to isolate it in trade and international forums; South Africa retaliated with a program to destabilize those countries which soon included CIA-type tactics of sending military raiding parties into every other southern African country; those countries turned increasingly to either the Soviet Union or China for trade and defence support; and the United States increased its efforts to sabotage such contacts and the level of anti-Communist rhetoric increased.
- ~ June
- ~ 16: Police opened fire when thousands of students demonstrated in the black township of Soweto against a new law requiring Afrikaans to be used as the language of teaching. Rioting followed in the suburbs of Cape Town and Johannesburg and further repression focussed world attention on the crisis of Apartheid. Principal overseas support for the campaign against Apartheid was coming from the churches, notably the WCC's Program to Combat Racism, and Communist countries.
- ~ 1977
- ~ The facts of Soweto were enough to persuade the UN Security Council to support, unanimously, a mandatory embargo on the supply of arms to South Africa. Whether that resolution would have been supported so strongly if the Third World countries had not reached the numerical position in which they could bring the matter before the General Assembly is very problematic.
- ~ The Soviet Union deployed the first of its Intermediate-Range Nuclear Ballistic Missiles (IRBMs) with a range of 1,000 km.. Its basic strategy was to have the capacity for a major pre-emptive strike against US long-range arsenals if a regional war erupted and indications were that it was escalating and the US was preparing to introduce nuclear weapons.
- ~ Following Mao's death in September 1976, and the purge of the 'Gang of Four' who were held responsible for propping up his program, China's Cultural Revolution was declared at an end. About three million party members and ordinary citizens, including many teachers and other professionals had been purged and now sought reinstatement or a new role in society.
- ~ 1978

In quick succession Vietnam was invited to join the East European Economic Community, COMECON. Relations between Vietnam and China, and between Vietnam and Cambodia immediately deteriorated. The US postponed its planned 'normalization' of relations with Vietnam, and Vietnam and the Soviet Union signed a Pact of Friendship which China denounced as a threat to the security of South East Asia. The repression of ethnic Chinese in Vietnam began, and the result was one more large scale refugee exodus. It was just another major refugee crisis for the United Nations to try to come to grips with. When President Carter announced full scale diplomatic relations between the United States and China it was a case of the wedge was being driven in, firmly, between the Soviet Union and china. As the year closed, Vietnam invaded Cambodia.

Then Carter introduced a new factor into relationships in the Middle East when he invited Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin and Egyptian president Sadat for a direct conference with him at Camp David.

Afghanistan's situation was complicated when Daud was assassinated in an army coup and the military government of Mohammad Taraki aimed at closer ties with the USSR, but it faced increased Muslim resistance and Taraki was also murdered a few months later. The ruling faction was then led by Hafizullah Amin.

~ 1979

When, as a consequence of the Camp David conference, an Israeli-Egyptian peace agreement was signed, Egypt was suspended from the Organization of the Islamic Conference. It was five years before it accepted an offer to rejoin the organization. The Shah of Iran fled in the face of an Islamic Revolution which was led by senior Muslim clerics whose paramount leader, Ayatollah Khomeini, had been forced into exile for some years. The basis of the revolution was resentment at the rapid Western secularization of Iran under the influence of the Shah's alliance with the United States and the divisive influence which that was having in the Middle East.

It was soon China's turn to invade Vietnam.

Then, in response to the deployment by the Soviet Union of Ground Launched Cruise Missiles (GLCMs) missiles with a range of 5,500 km and the capacity to carry three nuclear war heads, which could strike targets anywhere in Europe within 10 minutes, the European NATO powers persuaded the United States to deploy two IRBM missile systems, one of them mobile, with a range of 2,000 km, with the capacity to strike Moscow from Western Europe. The stakes were being raised, and in June the SALT II treaty was agreed, but in the light of the United States reversal of relations with China, which facilitated China's invasion of Vietnam, and deployment of much greater missile capacity in the NATO countries, the policy of détente was in tatters, no real progress was made and international relations deteriorated further when the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan to eliminate the CIA's surveillance network and to prevent it from establishing new facilities to replace those which it lost in neighbouring Iran with the overthrow of the Shah.¹²⁴

Ayatolla Khomeini returned and was declared the nation's Spiritual Leader. The Islamic Revolution was in full swing, and the US hostage crisis followed in November, when students stormed the US embassy in Tehran, and took a number of hostages. The students found documents which provided evidence of CIA involvement in Iranian politics. A few weeks later a referendum resulted in the adoption of a constitution which provided for a nationally elected president, a single-house parliament, a Council of Guardians composed of clerics and judges to ensure the maintenance of Islamic law, and a supreme religious leader.

The Soviet occupation of Afghanistan began on December 25. Amin was murdered in another coup; and the KGB installed Babrak Karmal. The US then accelerated the arming of competitive Muslim groups in order to gain control and replace the link in its surveillance system following the fall of the Shah in neighbouring Iran.

~ 1980

In April, five months after the hostages were taken, the US attempted, unsuccessfully, to rescue them. They were not released until after lengthy negotiations on January 20th next year. In the meantime Iraq took advantage of the volatile political situation to invade Iran in a bid to seize the disputed Shatt Al-Arab waterway which controlled access to its oil facilities. The dispute then widened to embrace control of the adjacent province, relations between civil and religious law, and relations with the United States. The devastating war, in which Iraq resorted to the use of gas against massed Iranian counter-attacks, continued for eight years.

Negotiations began in October towards a treaty to control the placement of Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces (INFs) within what was termed a "countervailing" strategy involving a range of "targeting options," but a lot of people wanted them eliminated, not "controlled," and an organization for research, education and anti-nuclear war campaigning, International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War, was established by doctors in the US and USSR. By 1985, when it was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize, its membership had grown to 135,000 in 41 countries.

~ 1981

Late in the year the more pacifist-inclined actor-president of the United States, Ronald Reagan, proposed removing NATO's INFs (1,000 km range) if the Soviet Union dismantled its SS-20 GLCMs (5,500 km range). No conclusion was reached, but the Soviet Union warned that the negotiations would end if NATO proceeded with the planned deployment of enhanced missiles.

~ 1982

On September 15, Pope John Paul II met Yasir Arafat for a 20-minute private audience at the Vatican, then, in what a PLO official termed "a turning point" in favour of the movement, issued a call for Israel and the PLO to "accept the existence and the reality of the other." Prior to the meeting an Israeli spokesperson had said "If, in fact, Arafat meets the pope, Israel would view the meeting grievously," then, after the event, another official complained strongly. He said that the Roman Catholic Church had not spoken out against the Holocaust or the killing of Christians in Lebanon, but now the pope wanted to meet the guerrilla leader sworn to destroy Israel and thus complete the work of the Nazis.” Yet another, in the Foreign Ministry, called it “revolting,” and the commander of the Christian militias in Southern Lebanon claimed that Arafat had been responsible for killing at least 100,000 Christians and said “We wonder how our spiritual father can receive our killer.” At that the Curia issued a communiqué expressing outrage at “language so little respectful of a pope of whom one cannot ignore what he had said on numerous occasions, and particularly during his visit to Auschwitz, to condemn and abhor the genocide directed by the Nazis against the Jewish people (and not only against them).”¹²⁵

~ 1983

When the United States deployed enhanced missiles in Europe. The Soviet Union withdrew from arms limitation talks. Soon afterwards, Mikhail Gorbachev assumed power in the Soviet Union and began to implement policies of Perestroika (restructuring of the economy and democratization of social and economic life) and Glasnost (openness in government, social justice and education) which he had foreshadowed in a speech three months earlier. It was another move in the right direction and Reagan announced the start of second search for an alternative to MAD. He envisaged a Strategic Defence Initiative which would render nuclear weapons “impotent and obsolete.” It was dubbed ‘Star Wars.’ He later sought to shift the super-power talks away from arms limitation to Strategic Arms Reduction (START).

The United States moved a step closer to formalizing its relationship with the Vatican when a rider, proposed by Senator Richard Lugar, was added to the State Department Appropriation Bill to repeal the 1867 ban on diplomatic appointments to the Vatican..¹²⁶

~ 1984

The foreshadowed new relationship between the United States and the Vatican was formalized when full diplomatic relations were established after some acrimonious public debate. Opposition is said to have come from the World Council of Churches, the Seventh Day Adventists, and the Baptists. An Evangelical minister associated with President Reagan, Rev. Jerry Falwell, told the White House that if they appointed an ambassador to the Vatican he may ask for a similar appointment to Mecca. He also proposed a condition on the appointment to the Vatican: that it recognize Israel. Political speculation centred on Reagan’s need for the Catholic vote in the presidential election later that year, and “American progressives feared a conservative cabal by Reagan and John Paul II.”¹²⁷ Such speculation was to be expected in view of the Vatican’s silence on the matter of Reagan’s Star Wars proposals and the sensitivity of discussions at the time of the Soviet walk out from arms limitations talks over that issue in december 1983. The Vatican Secretary of State, Cardinal Casaroli, had told reporters that the Vatican was trying to mediate that crisis but he was not hopeful of attaining “very conciliatory results,” and the absence of either papal or Vatican condemnation of the Star Wars proposals, despite personal lobbying by Gromyko and other Soviet diplomats, was considered a diplomatic victory for the United States. That victory had resulted less from US obbying than from the Vatican's general orientation toward Western European security policy.¹²⁸ The proximity of the rider to the State Department's appropriation bill, the arms talks crisis, and Reagan's decision on an appointment to the Vatican seems too much to be a coincidence.

~ 1985

The United States took advantage of Iran's circumstances to seek favours in return for secret arms deals in the Iran-Contra Affair. Senior officials of the US National Security Council (NSC) arranged weapons transactions and other activities that either were prohibited by the US Congress or violated the stated public policy of the government. The head of the NSC, Robert C. McFarlane, undertook the sale of antitank and anti-aircraft missiles to Iran, believing that such a sale would secure the release of a number of American citizens who were being held captive in Lebanon by Shi'ite terrorist groups loyal to Iran. This and several subsequent weapon sales to Iran directly contradicted the US government's publicly stated policy of refusing to bargain with terrorists or to aid Iran in its war with Iraq. The NSC believed that Iran was sponsoring international terrorism. A portion of the $48 million that Iran paid for the arms was diverted by the NSC and given to the Contras, the US-backed rebels fighting to overthrow the Marxist-oriented Sandinista government of Nicaragua. NSC officials also raised private funds for the Contras, violating a 1984 law under which direct or indirect US military aid to the Contras was banned.¹²⁹

In New Zealand an international incident erupted when the Greenpeace ship Rainbow Warrior, which was due to sail to Moruroa Atoll where the French government was conducting nuclear weapons tests in the atmosphere to protest at, and to inhibit, the tests, was sunk by French intelligence agents on the orders of a government agency. The French minister for defence was eventually forced to resign and the head of the defence intelligence service was dismissed. In Moscow, following an unsuccessful coup against Gorbachev in which leaders of the KGB were involved, the organization was stripped of some of its powers and downgraded in a bid to speed up democratization of the Soviet Union.

There was good news on the Apartheid front in October when a conference of the Commonwealth Heads of Government reached an 'Accord' by means of which they sought to isolate South Africa and to apply an economic embargo until such time that it rescinded its system of Apartheid. They also proposed that a group of seven 'Eminent Persons' visit South Africa for consultations and to further assess the situation. The accord was only reached after a period of great reluctance on the part of Britain's Thatcher government because of the impact of such embargoes on British investors. A few months later the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group, including Malcolm Fraser who had bitten the bullet and brought on Australia's constitutional crisis to get rid of Whitlam, the thorn in America's side, commenced consultations in South Africa. The consultations continued for several months without the Group being able to achieve the substantial changes which they sought. A extra dimension was added to that good news when the Kairos Document was published by churches of South Africa in a direct Theological challenge to the attitude of the dominant church on Apartheid

~ 1986

US Congressional leaders, and parts of the administration, then saw that the whole of Africa was being pushed more firmly into collaboration with the Soviet Union and China, and Congress passed a comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act under which new investment and loans to South Africa were banned, import restrictions and a ban on air links were imposed. The legislation was in tune with the dramatic adjustment in dominant American attitudes to the race question, and resentment of South Africa's racial policies, but it was in contrast to its own recent track record and it was passed in the face of opposition from President Reagan who was apparently more concerned about the immediate impact on US companies which had major interests in South Africa, and who sought to veto the legislation.

On the other hand, concerned that progress was too slow, Gorbachev proposed that nuclear disarmament talks be accelerated with a radical agenda aimed at a nuclear-weapons-free world by the end of the century. Shortly afterwards the issue was made more urgent when, in April, a catastrophic explosion at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant in the Ukraine led to 32 deaths, the evacuation of tens of thousands from adjacent towns, many thousands of cases of human radiation illness and cancers, with massive radio active fallout which contaminated farm land, forests and water ways, caused abortions and deformities in livestock in Eastern Europe and demonstrated that such fallout could never be restricted in the event of deliberate use. The contamination affected areas of Ukraine, Russia, Belarus, much of Eastern and Central Europe, and drifted as far as Sweden, Italy and France. When the leaders again met in a summit in October at Reykjavik, Iceland, Reagan basically supported the Gorbachev proposal but he refused to drop the Star Wars plan, and as a result no agreement was reached.

~ 1987

It was not until more than a year later that Reagan and Gorbachev reached agreement that the USA and USSR would eliminate their stocks of intermediate and shorter range land-based missiles which had nuclear warhead capability. The Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces (INF) Treaty was ratified by both powers the following year. It was agreed that a total of 2,619 missiles would be dismantled over three years. Two thirds were Soviet and one third US. West Germany's Chancellor Helmut Kohl opposed modernizing NATO's missile system to avoid antagonizing the Soviet Union and precipitating another round of new developments. He expressed concern that Germany was the prime launching place for NATO and thus the prime target for the Soviet Union.

There was an initiative of enormous importance in interfaith relations when, at great personal risk, a delegation of religious leaders from the Christian, Muslim and Hindu communities of South Africa met with representatives of the African National Congress and a delegation from the World Conference on Religion and Peace in Lusaka, Zambia. The meeting was an initiative of Archbishop Desmond Tutu to review the individual and collaborative approaches of the three faith communities to the struggle against Apartheid. They were drawn together within the WCRP of which Tutu was a joint World President. The Lange Labour government in New Zealand, elected in 1984, also took a great risk when, with strong public support, it actively promoted the campaign to limit nuclear weapons and to ban them from the Pacific region. It refused to allow visits by US naval vessels unless an assurance was given that they were neither nuclear armed or powered. The US government refused to give such an assurance and excluded New Zealand from the ANZUS Treaty. It applied rigorous trade and financial pressure in an effort to force the government to change its position, fearing that if New Zealand was able to have its way, other US defence arrangements could be undermined, not only in the Asia-Pacific region but around the world. The value of the New Zealand currency plunged and the government had to take strong measures to stabilize the economy. The New Zealand public maintained its support for the government's anti-nuclear stand and it was re-elected in 1987, only to face further deterioration in the country's economic position and defeat at the 1990 elections by the National Party which reversed the anti-nuclear policy.

~ 1988

President Jakes of Czechoslovakia resigned in December following three months of economic and social upheaval and the violent dispersal by police of massive student demonstrations. The Czech Communist government then agreed to cede power to an interim government with a majority of non-Communists pending elections seven months later.

~ 1989

The world knew that the Cold War and the arms race was unnecessarily exhausting and Gorbachev proposed extending negotiations to eliminate all nuclear weapons but Thatcher (Britain) and Bush (USA) insisted that this would be "imprudent." However NATO agreed to postpone modernizing some systems as a step towards continued negotiations. They were urgently needed because Europe was still very tense. In June, non-Communist parties gained power at the Czech elections and a law was promptly passed to prohibit former senior Communist officials from holding senior political, economic or judicial posts. A few months later the East German Government was forced from office by popular uprisings. Gorbachev either supported, or acquiesced in the move, and a few weeks later, on November 9, the new East German Government opens the Berlin Wall and allows free movement from East to West.

~ 1990

The trouble in the triangle took one turn for the better when the Soviet Union relaxed restrictions on the emigration of Jews, and then another when the newly installed President of South Africa, F.W. de Klerk, announced that parliament would consider a radical program of reform to the Apartheid system. In due course all of the major Apartheid legislation was repealed, including the Group Areas Act, the Population Registration Act and the Lands Act, and the state of emergency was lifted. Nelson Mandela was released from prison on February 11, and his election as president of the ANC followed, enabling consultations towards the drafting of a new constitution for South Africa to begin.

Then the real big breakthrough came about the same time, after much debate on a proposal from Gorbachev, when the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union resolved to relinquish the constitutional guarantee of monopoly power in government, thus providing for a multi-party electoral system. Gorbachev also proposed that the US system of election of the president by universal suffrage be adopted as from 1995, and that changes to give the president executive powers take effect immediately. He was confirmed as president of the Soviet Union on March 15 on the basis of the new powers.

With the impending collapse of the Soviet Union, American opinion was sharply divided on how to take advantage of the sudden surprising victory in the Cold War. Neo-isolationists urged the United States to pare back foreign commitments neo-nationalists wanted the country to look more to its own interests abroad liberals hoped for a “peace dividend” that could be applied to a domestic agenda ranging from education to health care and crime and all hoped to address the yawning deficits in the U.S. budget and trade balance. Internationalists of both parties however insisted that Americans would miss a historic opportunity if they turned inward after the Cold War. Twice before in the 20th century the United States had led the world to victories over tyranny only to see its plans for a democratic world order frustrated. As the only nation with the unique combination of military economic and ideological strengths needed to lead the United States now had a duty to “win the peace.”

Not far away, after a period of upheaval Hungary adopted a new constitution and held free elections. Gorbachev approved. Poland also went through a period of turmoil and constitutional crisis which led progressively to the end of the Communist regime. However in the Soviet Union change was not going to be easy and the fragmentation of the party hierarchy began. Gorbachev was under challenge from both those who wanted the former system of a single party maintained and those who wanted change at a faster pace. In May the Soviet Union and the United States (Gorbachev and Bush) signed a series of 16 agreements, some of which related to trade and disarmament. They followed that with the signing of the START treaty, committing their countries to a total of 1,600 intercontinental bombers and missiles, being a 30 per cent reduction in capacity. The Iraqi and Iranian Foreign Ministers were in make-up mode, too. They met in Geneva to resolve some of the issues outstanding after the end of the Iraq-Iran War, but it proved to be a prelude to another round of conflict in the Middle East. On August 2, intent on achieving a position from which it could, in due course, lead a push against Israel, Iraq occupied Kuwait on the pretext of Kuwait’s failure to honour OPEC oil production and pricing agreements and its refusal to waive loan debts incurred by Iraq during its war with Iran. Next day the UN Security Council called for Iraq to withdraw, and four days later it imposed a total ban on trade with Iraq which promptly announced the annexation of Kuwait. But understanding the complexities of the trouble in the triangle was not easy. The United States only understood the concepts of either buying peace, Camp David style, or heavy handed force, and on November 29 the UN Security Council authorized military action to force Iraq out of Kuwait if it had not withdrawn by January 15, 1991. Over the next ten weeks the United States, acting in the name of the United Nations and on the rationale that it was relieving an occupied country; securing world oil supplies; and protecting other Arab countries from Iraqi subjugation, organized a Korea or Vietnam-type coalition of European, Arab and other countries including Britain, France, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Syria. The force of 700,000 personnel was comprised of 540,000 Americans and 160,000 others. Almost all of the military, naval and air force hardware and munitions were supplied by the United States. The Soviet Union, Iraq's principal supplier of arms, in desperate need of US economic support to overcome its internal crises, agreed not to intervene and to withhold all further arms supplies from Iraq. A few weeks later Gorbachev won approval for a new constitutional treaty between the Soviet Union and the member Federated Republics.

There was trouble of a different kind brewing when Slobodan Milosevic gained power as president of Serbia in December and moved to appropriate all Yugoslav national assets to Serbia. Slovenia declared its independence, and the presidents of the six constituent republics were unable to agree on the formation of a new loose federation. [Serbia, Croatia, Bosnia and Hercegovina, Slovenia, Macedonia and Montenegro.] During the Cold War the US had favoured Yugoslavia in order to drive a wedge between it and the Soviet Bloc, but it would not now provide any assistance to relieve its deep seated problems.

~ 1991

On January 16 when the Gulf War began with Operation Desert Storm, it soon changed from an operation to relieve Kuwait and recover its territory, to an operation to pursue and destroy the Iraqi Army. At other times the Soviet Union may have intervened to prevent that tactic, but it was in no position to exert any influence. It had too many problems of its own and the United States was left to run the rest of the world. Soviet troops were busy suppressing rebellions in the Baltic Republics. and Gorbachev faced calls for his resignation. Aided and abetted by the United States, "progressive" forces throughout the Soviet bloc were pressing for reform, and in February the Baltic Republic of Lithuania voted overwhelming for independence from the Soviet Union.

At that stage, on February 28, a cease fire was called in the Gulf War.

A draft constitutional treaty to govern relations between the Soviet Union and its constituent republics was drawn up in March and it gained the general support of the republics in a referendum, except that the Baltic Republics, Moldavia and Georgia refused to take part or to recognize it. Tensions between the republics were near explosion point. Three months later, in June, speaking in Oslo to accept the Nobel Peace Prize which had been awarded to him in 1990, Gorbachev emphasized that the economic recovery of the Soviet Union was vital to the future of the new world order. He stressed that his country's urgent need was for massive, unconditional foreign aid, and warned that if Perestroika failed "the prospect of entering a new, peaceful period in history will vanish, at least for the foreseeable future."¹³⁰ A few days later Boris Yeltsin became the first elected president of the Russian Federation in 1,000 years.

Gorbachev was still working for reform within the framework of the existing structure of the Soviet Union and in July he produced a draft charter which amounted to a complete rewriting of the principles of the Communist Party. It provided that the Party would stand for conversion to a mixed economy; unconditional denunciation of Stalinism and totalitarianism; acceptance that Marxism is not necessarily the sole foundation of socialist theory; and the freedom to worship for Party members. After vigorous debate the Supreme Soviet approved legislation designed to break the central government's stranglehold on industrial and commercial property. While they did not want to totally dismantle the system they had worked under for so long - and they still believed it could be made to work - the majority were realists enough to know that enforced economic and political isolation from more than half of the world had made it impossible to manage the system in the way they may have wished. The relatively low productivity levels which they were achieving, coupled with the debilitating costs of defence systems on a scale which was ludicrous, had made the system insupportable. They needed help, and they needed lots of it.

In mid July Gorbachev was invited to the London summit meeting of the Group of Seven (G7) industrialized democracies. He had early urged them to recognize that it was time for the "Soviet Union's organic incorporation into the world economy." He was given assurances of immediate expert advice and technical assistance. This was to include "special association" with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. He also received pledges of additional aid conditional on continued transition to a free market economy. He knew that the virtual ending of Soviet Communism would mean a struggle with the conservatives around him, but he also knew that it had to be done. He went home to finalize the draft Union Treaty.

On August 15 when it was ready for public airing, his final version contained no reference to socialism; it endorsed all forms of property; it vested ownership and control of all economic resources in the republics; provided that membership of the proposed new Union was voluntary except that the 1922 constitution would remain in force in any republic which refused to sign the new treaty; and provided for election to all union bodies and of the executive president. Those elections were to be followed by presidential appointment of a new Cabinet of Ministers and a Soviet of Republics. Delegates of the republics would form one chamber of a bicameral national parliament which would approve the cabinet appointments made by the president. In addition the premiers of the republics were to have the right to participate in cabinet meetings and their votes would decide issues.¹³¹ It was dynamite. It was too much for the conservatives.

Three days later Gorbachev was placed under house arrest by senior party and government officials acting as a 'State Committee for the State Emergency' (SCSE) when he refused to step down and hand all authority to Vice President Yanayev. On the 19th the Soviet newsagency, Tass, reported that he was ill and had temporarily yielded power to Yanayev and that the Soviet Union would be run by the SCSE for six months. It moved swiftly to reverse the reforms and suppress dissent. Yeltsin denounced the coup and called for a general strike. Two days later the coup collapsed but Yeltsin, ignoring pleas from Gorbachev, signed a decree ordering the suspension of the Communist Party in the Russian Federation.

On August 24 Gorbachev resigned as general secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and persuaded the central committee to disband. Republics which declared their independence or confirmed their non-cooperation in the proposed new union were Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Ukraine, Byelorussia, Azerbaijan, Uzbekistan, Kirghizia, Armenia, Georgia and Moldavia. They were the mainstay of the old Union. The end was near. On September 5 the Congress of People's Deputies formally annulled the old power structures and appointed a State Council with Gorbachev as head to administer affairs for a transitional period while a new constitution was being agreed. There was as much conflict as coordination during the next three months as the federations each sought to determine their futures. In October before the three months had passed for the new system to be put in place, free parliamentary elections were held in Poland. The satellites were not eager to wait to see how the new arrangements would work.

On December 8 the Federations of Byelarus, Ukraine and Russia signed the Minsk Agreement to establish the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) as an alternative to Gorbachev's proposed new union. On the 21st the leaders of the eleven former republics of the USSR met in Alma-Ata, Kazakhstan, and signed a declaration joining them as member states of the CIS. The USSR was a mere shell. Gorbachev resigned on the 25th, very bitter, as president of the USSR. He had wanted reform, not disintegration. Next day the Supreme Soviet of the USSR voted itself out of existence. The USSR was no more.

~ 1992

By agreement with the other republics of the CIS, the Russian Federation was recognized as the legal successor to the USSR and assumed control of the nuclear arsenals of the former USSR in consultation with the other republics in which they were sited, and the United States and Russia reached an informal agreement, START II, to make further drastic reductions in their nuclear armaments over an unspecified period. The new President of the Russian Federation, Boris Yeltsin, signed friendship treaties with Britain and France in return for aid and credits, and, soon after, Bush and Yeltsin signed the START II Pact, agreeing to reduce long range nuclear arsenals by two thirds within ten years. The US also approved an economic assistance package and help to dismantle Russia's nuclear weapons. Clinton then agreed to an additional $1.6 billion in aid. There was much debate about whether to apply shock therapy to propel Russia into capitalist mode at the risk of causing high unemployment and social disruption, or whether to hasten slowly, and about how much influence Russia should be allowed in international affairs. But after half a century of enforcing isolation on its big eastern neighbour neighbour Europe was finding it just as difficult as the United States to work out a new relationship with the Soviet Union, and this was reflected in tortuous negotiations over the future of the European Community. Under the Maastricht Treaty the European Community became the European Union; the European Parliament at Strasbourg gained enhanced powers, and it was agreed that there would be monetary union by 1999, plus common policies on crime, immigration, social welfare and the environment, and joint action on security and foreign policy

A NEW ERA?

The Cold War was at an end. That was official. The enormous structure which had been built as the material challenge to the amorphous Christian gel based on Marx' philosophical challenge had collapsed. That did not mean that a challenge was no longer relevant. It was needed as urgently as ever. But the structure had collapsed for two basic reasons. One was that those who gained control of the structure of the challenge in its early years had lost sight of the original point of the challenge and abused their power and the human rights of their own people to the extent that it was a challenge in a political and military sense only. The philosophical challenge had dissipated very quickly. The second reason was that the powers of the amorphous Christian gel - both religious and political - had set out to undermine the challenge and to make the system which carried it unworkable. They had succeeded admirably. Their first efforts was through direct invasion to prevent the structures of the challenge from being built. Then, having failed, except to the extent that they had forced it to become a military backed regime at least as brutal as the one which it replaced, they had sought to isolate it from the rest of the world by political and military means, and to withhold from it everything which they regarded as necessary for a vibrant successful state. Finally, having destroyed the challenge, the principal member of the gel refused to lend it a hand to recover and to join the world community and could only regard it as another opportunity for market and resource exploitation. The combined burden had proven unsustainable. The Western world regarded the collapse of the soviet Union as a great success. Being unable to appreciate the nature of the trouble in the triangle they were not likely to see it any other way, and the world would just have to wait for a challenge from a different source. There would soon be plenty of them.

With the United States now the undisputed dominant power in world affairs the Clinton administration articulated the principles of its new foreign policy in a series of speeches. Official spokesperson Lake explained in September, 1993, that democracy and market economics were in the ascendancy, so that just as the United States had previously laboured to contain Communism it should now work for “enlargement” of the community of free nations. Secretary of State Albright outlined the moral, financial and political benefits of multilateral action in regional disputes and Clinton personally defined his goal as nothing less than “to expand the reach of democracy and economic progress across the whole of Europe and to the far reaches of the world.” Within three weeks of Lake’s speech this bold agenda began to unravel. On October 3-4 more than 75 US Army Rangers were wounded in an effort to capture the renegade Somali warlord, General Maxamed Farax Caydiid (Muhammad Farah Aydid), and two American corpses were dragged through the streets of Mogadishu before television cameras. American opinion immediately turned against the intervention, especially when it was revealed that the troops were fighting under UN commanders and had been denied heavy weapons by Secretary of Defense Les Aspin. Clinton was obliged to announce a deadline of March 31 1994 for evacuation of the troops which in turn meant abandoning the state-building mission.

But that was only indicative of the troubles which lay ahead. The Cold War may have been ended, but the United States, other powers in the amorphous Christian gel, together with the church, had been so preoccupied, or obsessed, with the confrontation with the challenge that had originated with Karl Marx that they failed to grasp the fact that the trouble in the triangle was a very complex matter. Marx had provided a major philosophical challenge, but the real challenge was the relationship between Christianity and its self-understanding, and its partners in the triangle of Abrahamic faiths, Judaism and Islam, and they had paid very little attention to that, other than at the political level. It was time to begin some serious thinking. Very soon they would be encouraged to do so as one trouble spot after another appeared to take on a new dimension. American leaders began to talk of the new world conflict being between the West and Islam, as if the world Muslim community was simply taking up the attack against the Capitalist West where the former Soviet Union had left of.

Such was not the case. What the world was experiencing was a reaction in many parts of the world to the abuses and excesses of the amorphous Christian gel which had simply been submerged by the political confrontation between the West and the Communist East. As each of these “new” challenges arose, or became more apparent, they would all have a basic component linked directly back to the decisions and conduct of the amorphous Christian gel either during the European imperial colonial era or the American-dominated era of economic imperialism and globalization. Every conflict which has erupted since the collapse of the former Soviet Union can be shown to have either a territorial, ethnic, or religious aspect which is an integral part of the evolution and history of the trouble in the triangle. Each of those conflicts, whether it is the crisis in the Balkans, the series of crises which have wracked Africa, Afghanistan, East Timor, Fiji, Indonesia’s Ambon, the so-called Asian economic melt-down, or the continuing saga of Northern Ireland - as well as the major conflict between Israel and the Palestinians centred on the questions of refugee return and the future of the city of Jerusalem - all link directly to the trouble in the triangle. Solve that, and the world will be closer to peace and stability than it will ever be if the amorphous Christian gel continues on its merry way, blinkered by the self-understanding and conduct which has resulted from its insistence that its developed Trinitarian theology is the be all and end all of human salvation.

EMBARGO! NOT FOR WANT OF WARNINGS. NEW ORDER OR DISORDER?

CHAPTER 31

TO GOD BE THE GLORY!

The world has celebrated the beginning of a new millennium. Or at least a very large hunk of it has. That part of it which has fallen under the influence of the Christian church and its amorphous Christian gel of doctrine, imperialism, militarism, commercial exploitation, racism and crude politics all rolled up into an insidious self-understanding from within which some of its key leaders still believe that their membership of it gives them the right and the authority to command and to benefit preferentially from anything which exists. However that part of the world which does not want to celebrate it or which sees no great point in doing so, cannot avoid being uncomfortably aware of it. And even that fact is an accident of the trouble in the triangle.

Until about 1,640 years ago no one had thought that it was necessary to have a universal system of dates to record events of historical importance or for planning future events. Each scattered kingdom or republic, or locally dominant religious community established its own system, usually based on the beginning of the reign of each successive ruler. The Chinese and the Indians were apparently better organized than the Europeans, with Chinese historians able to date some events as early as 4,697 years before the current year (2000 CE), the Vikrama era of the Jains dates from 2,058 years ago. But with those exceptions, the recording of history by generation or length of reign was a bit clumsy. During the reign of each ruler someone had to remember, for the community's oral history or, if it had a system of written history, to record the sequence in which things of importance occurred, and for how long each ruler held sway, or how many generations there were from one event to another. It was a bit vague, too, because no one thought to tell their subjects or their successors that they had to produce their first offspring at precisely the same age for the convenience of history! The fifth generation in one royal line might coincide with only the fourth generation in one neighbouring kingdom, or the sixth generation in another. So in the writings of the early church we read that Jesus of Nazareth was born in the forty second generation of Jewish history, or, to be more precise, that he was born in the fourteenth generation after the Babylonian exile which was fourteen generations after King David, who was of the fourteenth generation after Abraham.¹ Some of its writers also noted that Jesus was born in the reign of King Herod.²

It was only three generations later that some other authorities in India thought it wise to be able to record events a little more reliably and the Shaka or Salivahana era, which is recognized throughout India, dates from 1,922 years ago. It would have soon become known to people in the Arabian Peninsula that such a system was being used in India, because of the number of coastal traders plying back and forth along the two or three thousand miles of coastline from the west coast of India to the Horn of Africa, but there appears to be nothing to suggest that they had taken up the system. However the dramatic spread of dār al-islām through the territories of other rulers, east through Iran into Afghanistan, and west across North Africa made it necessary for the Arabs to be able to relate events in one part of their empire to events in other parts. The second caliph, ‘Umar I, who reigned for ten years beginning 1,366 years ago, thereupon determined that universal dating would be based on the rise of Islam, with year one being the year that the Prophet Muhammad and his small band of followers fled from Mecca to Medina. Wherever dār al-islām went, the Arab Islamic system of administration went too, and the new system of recording dates and events was an essential part of it. Thus the new calendar crossed into Spain from North Africa with the Berbers 1,289 years ago. Within four years virtually the entire Iberian Peninsula to the Pyrenees Mountains was under the rule of Muslims who had been aided and abetted by the Jewish community, and everyone was happily working to a new understanding of time and history. Then in 722, after the Muslims broke through the gaps in the Pyrenees and swamped the southern coast of France as far as the Rhone, there began a period of eleven years of papal power politics and corruption during which the Arian Visigoths were double crossed to enable the pope to maintain his alliances with Boniface and Charles Martel - financially supported in their ‘evangelism’ by clergy and piles of Peter’s Pence from across the channel in England. The pope and Martel were successful, and in 732 when the Muslims reached Poitiers, in Central France, they were turned back to the Spanish border. (Chapter 7.)

Among the key figures of the church in England at that time was a 60-year old monk named Bede who was based at the monastery of Jarrow which provided many helpers for Boniface’s program of evangelism. He had become prominent as a Biblical scholar and church historian and was subsequently canonized, honoured with the posthumous title ‘Venerable’ and proclaimed a Doctor of the Church. He is most often mentioned in connection with “clarifying” the date of Easter and his histories, but it was he who, when the Muslims were firmly entrenched in Spain and threatening to burst through Central Europe, determined that Europe would not adopt a calendar and a dating system based on the mission of the Prophet Muhammad. He set out to persuade the church to adopt a system based on the birth of Jesus Christ. There was already within the church a body of opinion, or a movement of people, who, from their reading of chapters 20 and 21 of the Book of the Revelation of John anticipated some kind of apocalyptic event one thousand years after the time of the Messiah, followed by a period of the reign of the saints and a second apocalyptic event after a second thousand years. There were a range of ideas, concepts and interpretations involved, some contradictory of others. Some people expected a catastrophic occurrence which would signal the end of the world. Others expected such an era of chaos and catastrophe to be the prelude to a second coming of Christ in person, in glory, to reign in person, literally taking charge of the church or superseding the church in some way. The church at large, although its leaders included the book in the official church canon of the Bible, questioned its credibility as prophecy and left it in the too-hard basket. In a sense it was treated in the same manner as the Qur’anic Night Journey:

“Ignore it. It’s irrelevant. It was only written to offset the pressure from the Roman imperial authorities to revert to emperor worship.”

However one consequence of the decision to base the recording of the passage of time on the life of Jesus Christ was to focus attention on the literal change of date from one millennium to another, to side-track reflection on the Book of Revelation, and to encourage the establishment of Millenarian cults with a fixation for that date to the exclusion of all else. The members of some cults even entered into suicide pacts in anticipation of a cataclysmic event at the stroke of midnight on the day designated as the end of the second millennium, with tragic consequences for them and those directly affected by the events, but with little discernible impact on the way the church thought about the issue.

Even if one were to accept that an inspired prophecy could be so precise as to anticipate the exact moment of an occurrence such as the return of the Messiah in person, or a ‘big bang’ in reverse, the ideas proposed beg the question of what defines the start and end of each millennium. Would it have been the moment of birth of the Messiah, the moment of his death, or the moment of his resurrection? Or would it have been the experience of Pentecost from which the church dates its birth? But to focus on such questions is to misunderstand the nature of prophecy and to confound oneself by conceptually placing God in a straight jacket defined, or determined, by the limits of one’s own capacity to comprehend. We have, therefore, to look at the entire matter with a fresh mind, building on what is now apparent about the relationship between the three partners in the triangle. In particular we must recognize and reflect on the way in which the role of the people of the Covenant relates to, and has interlocked with the Qur’anic prophesy of the Night Journey (chapter 6), Maimonides’ understanding of the return of the people Israel to Palestine (chapter 8), the personal statements of Jesus, and those key passages from the Book of Revelation.

To do that we must first think about how we got here, and how we let ourselves, as humanity, get into the mess we are in. As a body of people we know a lot more about the world in which we live, and about the universe into which our world fits as little more than a mere speck, than people did about 400 years ago when the vice-chancellor of Cambridge University calculated the date and time of creation (in the wake of the Reformation) based on Biblical sources: nine o’clock in the morning on October 23, 4004 BCE, with all species created complete, of course!³ (Chapter 15) We can have every confidence in the scientific consensus which has developed in recent years that the universe came into being somewhere between ten thousand million and fifteen thousand million years ago, and that our world began a separate existence somewhere between four and five thousand million years ago.

Our scientists can tell us that no matter existed prior to that occurrence, but they cannot tell us what the originating cause of the occurrence was. Now it takes more than a modicum of intelligence on the part of a lot of people over some hundreds of years to have made the observations and developed the techniques and the equipment required to reach such conclusions. But even with that accumulated knowledge and the developed skills required to have achieved that understanding of the origins of the universe they are happy to concede that they cannot emulate it. Given a bit of existing matter, or a source of energy, they can probe it, examine it, modify it, plan around it, utilize it, construct, convert, degrade, and explain it. But they cannot create it from nothing. In the sloppy, self-centred, egotistical manner of today our politicians, commentators, scientists, business people, computing buffs, artists and musicians, more or less everyone - at least in the Western world - say, at the drop of any old hat, that they have “created” something or other. They have done nothing of the kind. They may have built, designed, written, painted, formulated, unraveled, discovered, composed, executed, conceived, fabricated, or converted, for arguments sake, but they have created absolutely nothing. They are totally incapable of doing anything without the necessary building blocks. However such abuse or misuse of language is more than sloppiness. It indicates a mind set and reflects a process of conditioning which we shall come back to. The scientific consensus therefore leads logically to the conclusion that an external ‘cause’ beyond our comprehension was responsible for the big bang of creation.

That being the case, it is not logical to say that life was generated spontaneously, without external cause, or that the course of evolution has been haphazard. Again, in a remarkably short time span, our scientists have been able to identify genetic patterns, understand and utilize the characteristics of DNA, manipulate chromosomes, modify patterns of growth and determine what characteristics they wish to implant in a living organism. They can predict with remarkable accuracy the outcome of their efforts, but not invariably so. They do make mistakes and they do, at times, exceed the bounds of their current knowledge. But as with physical and chemical scientists, one thing is absolutely certain. They may be able to manipulate life. They cannot create it. That is the exclusive province of the external cause which is beyond our comprehension. So: to some charts.

Chart 1

Humanity in Universal History

Time scale: Thousand million years

Chart 1, drawn with units of one thousand million years, indicates humanity's place in universal history. All of human history fits into less than a pin prick at the forward end of a graph of time, and the only way to graph human population growth is by means of the finest possible vertical line. This does not suggest for one moment that humanity is of no consequence in the divine scheme of things, nor that it is an incidental extra. All that we can say, with reasonable confidence, is that humanity is the most recent 'component' to be introduced into the universal environment. We cannot say, on any basis at all, that there will not be some one or more additional 'components' introduced at a future time. To do so would be totally presumptuous. The scientific consensus seems to be that the universe is likely to be around for another 25 thousand million years. That is a fairly long time! If it has been in existence for 10 to 15 thousand million years and humanity has just been introduced, how can we possibly preclude the possibility of a future life 'presence' of one form or another?

The second chart, drawn to units of only one million years, shows that while we can place a few pointers to human evolution along the time line, even at that scale the growth of the human population can still only be illustrated by means of a fine line at the forward end of the time span. Similarly, we can only place the development of systematic religion as a pin prick below an arrow at the forward end of the period of human evolution, too.

Chart 2

Systematic Religion in Human History

Time scale: million years Population: billions

The third chart, covering a period of only four thousand years, shows how we fit into a very brief heritage of religious development. It suggests something of the circumstances in which the development of systematic religion has taken place. It identifies the early period of barbaric communal life when urbanization was beginning, with broken relationships and brutal wars in the early stages of the development, which was the background to the development of all of the major systems of religion and ethics. It then shows the fantastic population explosion which was about to occur and notes some of the key beacons scattered along the path of the trouble in the triangle which we have discussed. Both population growth and urbanization placed strains on people and communities, and required systems of ethics, morality and conduct which would enable people to live in peace and harmony.

It is of major importance that in the overall historical context of that development, all of the world's great religions and systems of ethics have their origins in the same general period. That was the period when there was a growing need for systems of ethics, morality and relationships on which the conduct of both individuals and their communities could be based to ensure long term harmony within communities and therefore long term viability of human life on this planet. It was as if the Divine Authority was saying "get your act together and live in harmony or I'll start all over again." Who do we think we are, given our minute time and space in the universal scheme of things, to say: "we are so important that God would never let us self-destruct"? That may be the case. But if we did, it could be less than another pin prick on the leading edge of time before a successor population could have evolved to be given a chance to make a better go of colonizing planet earth.

After all, we simply do not know the limits of creation or whether there are other units of the universe colonized by living creatures. There is absolutely no reason why there should not be. Who is to say, and on what grounds, that the Divine Authority would not or could not place one or more colonizing populations on other units of the universe somewhere in time and space?

Chart 3

The Human Population Explosion: Development of the Abrahamic Faiths

Time scale: Thousand years Population: billion

Some people will say that logical reasoning simply led people in different regions of the world to develop systems of ethics and conduct to suit the circumstances of their time and the cultures which were already evolving around them. Others will say that those systems are in some way inadequate inventions of man or even, in the extreme view, false religions. And still others may see divine inspiration behind each of them, and it has even become acceptable in recent years to say that ‘nowhere has God left the world without witnesses to the Divine Will’. I hold that view.

There is absolutely nothing inconsistent in the idea that persons in different regions of the world, in communities with quite different circumstances and environments, could be divinely inspired or guided in the development of seemingly different systems of ethics. Similarly there is absolutely nothing inconsistent in one community of people in one particular place in the world being selected by divine will to enable us to focus on a series of critical relationships and therefore having a special relationship involving a covenant obligation to The Divine Authority, at the same time that the Divine Authority concurrently works through selected people in other parts of the world. That critical series of relationships includes: humanity’s relationship to God; the relationships of person to person and community to community; and the relationship between humanity, its environment, and the resources, capacities and faculties available to humanity. That is exactly the situation which we have. Abraham and his successors were specifically designated by God to learn from personal and national experience the nature and reality of the relationship between God and humanity. In doing so, they were to provide an illustration of that relationship and thus enable all humanity to understand and to live in harmony on the basis of the critical relationships already noted. They may not have thought of their task and their role in those terms but they were certainly well aware of a special relationship with Yahweh - the Divine Authority. They came to understand that a key person in their on-going relationship with Yahweh would be a Messianic figure.

But because of their circumstances during that period they tended to look for a political leader figure rather than a person who would exemplify God’s Will, provide an illustration of God’s incomprehensible authority and power, and clarify the relationship between humanity and God. Thus when Jesus of Nazareth lived out his ministry they divided into two groups. The majority could not recognize in him the Messiah for whom they were waiting. A minority recognized him but were confused about his person and his relationship with God.

That minority then divided into two camps. One, the Jerusalem-based community, sought to remain within mainstream Rabbinical Yahwism while the other sought to redirect it. Their circumstances and their reasoning have been discussed in early chapters. However, briefly, the latter group, working in the Hellenistic regions to the north of Palestine, grasped the established Gnostic concept of a divine saviour from the realm of the pure spirit above who could effect the release of the soul or the divine spark within each person. They merged this with another concept, the ‘logos’. This referred to a pre-existing agent in creation which provided a continuing bond between God and the universe, and which was already Philo’s syncretistic attempt to rationalize the Apocryphal concepts of the Book of Wisdom and the Greek philosophy of Plato. They then took advantage of Philo’s development of the idea of a Messianic Age and although Philo did not necessarily link the final redemption of that age with a particular Messianic agency or Messiah, they identified Jesus of Nazareth with all of those concepts. But they went further and used various techniques of syncretism, notably in relation to Mary the mother of Jesus and an assortment of feasts and symbols, to penetrate and absorb a host of pagan sects.

Subsequently the Jewish revolt against Roman rule led to the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 CE and the massacre of about 600,000 Jews (including most of the Jerusalem-based Christian sect), the development of new leadership within Rabbinical Judaism and the establishment of the Jabneh Sanhedrin. The northern or Hellenistic Christian group was left to determine the theology and to chart the future course of the sect which had already established a presence across Asia Minor and in Rome to which it turned increasingly for leadership. That group adopted an increasingly Trinitarian stance. It was then expelled from the synagogues, it more firmly established its own identity as the Christian Church and it set out in competition with Judaism. Subsequently, in order to save their skins when Jerusalem was again purged 65 years later, the remnant Christian community in the city disowned the Torah, renounced its connection with the Judaists and joined the Hellenized-Christian communities to their north. (Chapter 1.)

Confusion and controversy then marked the life of the young church as it sought to supplant both Hellenistic paganism and Judaism, and to penetrate the heart of the empire. But its influence was spreading and an alliance of convenience for the leaders of the empire and the church was soon forged. The benefits for the church were an end to persecution and the opportunity for rapid penetration throughout the empire. The empire wanted political stability and successive emperors believed it was achievable through religious conformity. Having adopted Christianity and having granted the church the status, privileges and trappings of state religion, the emperors expected the church to deliver both conformity and stability. They got neither. Constantine's big bid - Councils of the church - resulted in the adoption of the Creed of Nicaea but there was continuing disruption because this was not acceptable to many. Subsequent councils struggled to find an acceptable compromise. The result was firstly, the development of a complex web of creeds, doctrines and dogma and secondly, a long running heresy hunt which was enforced with ruthless disregard for the sanctity of human life as the church built an enormous state-funded ecclesiastical structure which provided a power base from which it could exercise rapidly increasing civil authority. Between the third and fifth centuries 16 heresies were condemned. These things ensured the fragmentation of the church and a host of sects or denominations each teaching its own theology in a territorial niche.

The key belief that God the Father, Jesus Christ the Son, and the Holy Spirit are three equal and co-eternal persons of one Triune God, known as the Doctrine of the Trinity, was enshrined in two statements. First, the Creed of Niceae (as variously amended) and second, the Athanasian Creed which was the dominant statement of the church's belief, teaching and conduct for a very long period. But that creed also embraced or implied the ideas that the church exercised powers delegated by Jesus, that the church had replaced the Jews as the 'Chosen People', that it was therefore the sole representative of God on earth, that there was no salvation outside the church, and that Judaism was no longer valid. (Chapter 2.) That creed generated the "God's own" complex among Christians, inhibited or even prevented an understanding of other faiths, and generated and entrenched bigotry, racism and anti-Semitism within Christianity.

The church, which was by then dominated by non-Jews who had become adherents either by conversion or syncretistic absorption, disregarded the fact that such teachings were a direct contradiction of Christ's teaching on personal conduct and judgment. It placed blind acceptance of dogma before both faith in a covenant relationship of trust and action in response to an understanding of God's will, which were the basic tenets of Judaism and which Jesus of Nazareth had exemplified.

But it also entrenched the church's erroneous self-understanding that it is the exclusive representative and interpreter of the Divine Will on earth. Thereafter, wherever it was present the church acted on that self-understanding and wherever its influence was felt human understanding of the power, authority and glory of God was inhibited by that self-understanding and tended to be restricted to the capacity of the church or its politics, and by the pomp, splendour and mystique of its liturgy.

The consequences of that development, compounded by the conduct, heresy hunting and teaching of Augustine of Hippo, contributed to the disarray into which the empire plunged over the next three hundred years. Together with the dominance of Monophysite belief in the wedge of territory from Alexandria to Abyssinia and Yemen, across the Red Sea from each other; in Syria and in Armenia, it provided the stimulus for the divinely inspired prophetic ministry of Muhammad. The Prophet's primary roles were to call the church and its Christians back to the simple uncluttered worship of God and to call the Jews to recognize that the Messiah, the person Jesus, had already appeared among them. However it soon became apparent to Muhammad that the establishment of Islam as a separate and militant religious force was required as a consequence of the rejection by both mainstream Christians and Jews of the call which he had been divinely instructed to convey to both of them. The trouble in the triangle was soon in full swing.

Muhammad received and transmitted the inspired Qur'anic prophesy of the Night Journey, but at that time the Jewish community, being scattered far and wide after the 'final' dispersion of 135 CE, was in no position to transgress against anyone and had no national home which could be attacked by an aggressor, so very few people took the prophecy seriously. (Chapter 7.) The Jews were naturally reluctant to do so and certainly the dominant church leadership did not because it regarded Muhammad as simply an Arab Nationalist fiend who deserved no recognition at all. And after all they were God's exclusive representatives on earth and if anyone knew, they would. So Islam just continued to expand and conquered or threatened many lands of the Christians, but it had its ups and downs due to the same sort of internal disputes and divisions which had wracked the church and it ran out of steam.

The church - or at least the church in Rome - thought it had thrown off that challenge but it watched, aghast, while the Khazar Khanate adopted Judaism. Then, sixty years later, Pope Leo III engineered his Holy Roman Empire at the expense of Charlemagne. He and his successors were free to defiantly expand their program of Mariology as they ravaged their way through the Christianization of much of the balance of Europe. But then they were foiled in their bid to do the same to Russia, and the Vatican had to watch while the Russian princes destroyed the Khazar Khanate in 1016, scattering converts to Judaism throughout eastern and central Europe in their bid to built stronger alliances against a possible take over by Rome. (Chapter 8.)

Then Christendom suffered its Eastern Schism with the mutual patriarchal excommunications in 1054 and, although there were two 'bodies of Christ' instead of one, the Western world's affairs were dominated by the papacy. Rome thought it could recover the Holy Land and eliminate Islam by a military campaign and in 1095 it set about a program of crusades which ran on and off in bloody and disgraceful turmoil for nearly four hundred years. It was at one of the high points of its program, gloating over the temporary recovery of Jerusalem through negotiation by Emperor Frederick II instead of by the sword, that it was confronted in 1232 by the works of Maimonides, author of the second of the two great challenges to Christian self-understanding.

Maimonides, who had died in 1204, had written that Judaism was a rational religion, that Moses performed miracles out of necessity and not to prove a divine connection, that Israel had lost its prophetic capacity because it had become impaired, and that there was a place for each of Christianity and Islam in the Divine Plan as well as Judaism. (Chapter 8.) Conservative rabbis in the south of France pronounced an excommunication against anyone who read The Guide for the Perplexed. When supporters of Maimonides' views retaliated with a counter-excommunication the 'anti' group appealed to the Christian Inquisition (which had been established only the year before) to intervene on the grounds that The Guide was heretical. But when the Inquisitors obliged by arranging public burnings the 'anti' group fell into disgrace. Then when a cardinal in Paris joined the fun of the burnings interfaith relations plummeted, but interest in Maimonides' work rose sharply among Christians throughout France and Spain.

Maimonides disputed the church's view that the world was the centre of the universe but he maintained that humanity was the ultimate piece in creation, that God would not use or would not allow a change in natural law to bring about the unnatural destruction of the world, and that these situations were quite consistent with a non-eternal universe in a state of continuous change. The church was especially angered by his belief that any person who wanted to add to or abrogate any of the biblical commandments or regard them as only temporary enactments for the Israelites was a false prophet. It could not reconcile the fact that while both Jesus and Muhammad insisted that their tasks were to interpret the law and not change or annul it, the church, claiming to be Jesus' representative, overrode that position and regarded Judaism - and therefore its enactments - as no longer valid. Maimonides was welcome to criticize Muhammad if he wished, but not Christ. Neither could the church reconcile the fact that while Maimonides rejected the proposition that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah of Jewish understanding (because he had not survived to establish his Messiahship) Jewish understanding allowed for the subsequent (or consequent) recognition or affirmation of the Messiah once his Messianic promise had been fulfilled.

But Maimonides major contention, based on his interpretation of the Hebrew Prophets and set out in the final chapters of his monumental Mishneh Torah, was that the Messianic Age would be heralded by a war of Gog and Magog in association with which the King Messiah would restore the kingdom of David to its former position and dominion, rebuild the Temple and gather the dispersed of Israel. He believed that the Messianic Age would not differ greatly from ‘the current age’ except that Israel would be emancipated from subjugation by the gentile nations which would return to the true faith (of Yahwism) and live in peace with Israel, that the whole world would then live in peace and that, led by the scholars of Israel, they would devote their efforts to the knowledge and service of God. It was then, he believed, that prophetic capacity would return to the people of Israel. To that extent he was wrong. His own contention was the most significant prophetic utterance since Muhammad’s Night Journey. But as far as the church was concerned that was anathema. The prophet could not say who Gog and Magog were and in any case it was not interested in assessing the reasoning behind the prophecy. The Messiah had already arrived, been rejected by the Jews who were therefore relegated to permanent irrelevance, and he had appointed the church as his sole successor.

The fact that Maimonides accepted Muhammad as a divinely inspired prophet and both Islam and Christianity as having roles in the Divine Plan but rejected the proposition that Christ was the Messiah of Hebrew expectations identifies an understandable inconsistency in Maimonides’ reasoning. He knew that Muhammad accepted Jesus as the foreshadowed Messiah while he rejected the church’s definition or interpretation of Jesus as Messiah, and he therefore reasoned that Islam arose directly from Judaism. It does not appear to have occurred to him that Muhammad’s inspired ministry was a consequence of the church’s erroneous definitions and self-understanding coupled with its massive abuse of the imperial authority which it enjoyed.

However the unsettling impact of Maimonides’ writing and the questioning of the church’s dogma during the following years was such that the church had to go into damage control. One of its foremost scholars, Thomas Aquinas, was instructed to counter it.⁴ His attempt to do so is the Summa Contra Gentiles, a text book for missionaries and a manual and systematic defence of Christian Doctrine. (Chapter 8.) So the church stumbled on. Rome refused to intervene to support the Eastern Church and stood by why Constantinople fell to the Muslim Ottoman Empire. Then, fearful of the loss of influence and trade which it was suffering as a consequence, and fearful of the impact of rising populations in Europe, the Pope decided to mount one more major crusade to the Holy Land, dangling the carrot of control of whatever lands they might ‘discover’ in Africa, Asia or elsewhere in front of his authorized papal standard bearers in the Bull Rominus Pontifex, (chapter 9). That crusade was never carried out, but in the rush to exploit colonial spoils which resulted, those authorized papal standard bearers and their unauthorized competitors did a lot of damage. They destroyed civilizations, oppressed the people to whom they were supposed to be bringing salvation, exploited resources in a most irresponsible manner, superimposed arbitrary boundaries and European economic and cultural systems on long-standing cultures, and established massive but fragmented empires spanning every continent, three of which were not even known to them until the papal standard bearers set sail.

But while that rush was getting under way the church fell to such a level of depravity and introduced such abuses of its sacraments and liturgy - justifying them by its distorted theology - that internal rebellion was assured. The Reformation was triggered just a generation after the first papal standard bearers set sail for the East via Africa, (chapter 10). As a consequence, the network of Christian explorers, exploiters, mercenaries and the church which enveloped the globe soon had representatives of a gaggle of Reformed churches as well as papal standard bearers. At the same time the church pursued anti-Semitic policies with ever increasing vigour so that, coincidental with the extremes of colonial exploitation by the European powers, towards the end of the nineteenth century the Jews of Europe were struggling in the face of great trauma to organize and to find themselves a new homeland free of Christian oppression. For many that could only mean a return to Palestine. They did not know that they were preparing a safety valve which would, when it was triggered, change world relationships profoundly and challenge the self-understanding of the church.

And at the same time challenges were building up from other directions. The scientific challenge was spearheaded by Galileo and Darwin. The philosophical and political challenge was spearheaded by Karl Marx. (Chapter 14.) And the theological challenge was multi-pronged with leadership coming from the Society of Friends followed by numerous non-sacramental and non-Trinitarian groups within the Christian family, the Wahhabi Movement in Islam, the Reform Movement in Judaism, the Baha'i Movement, the Theosophical Movement, and a host of people within mainstream Christianity who saw a new way ahead through the Ecumenical Movement.

But few people seemed to be conscious of the fact that there were two great prophetic challenges hanging over their heads as the Great Powers of Europe sent their armies marching into battle in 1914 to determine a few territorial claims. Certainly the Great Powers were not, and especially Great Britain or it would never have gone down the path of competitive exploitation of faiths which it did in that Great War. Everything was on a great scale - except their motives. Britain's empire was the greatest the world had ever known. It exemplified assumptions which people made about 'the great Christian powers'. Any justification for exploitation was adequate. Especially the responsibility which the church insisted it had to Christianize the world. But unlike earlier empires which had grown by simple peripheral expansion, it had unwieldy and exposed lines of communication that required either enormous goodwill or enormous naval and military might to sustain it. But goodwill and colonialism are contradictory concepts. Empires exist to be exploited in the interests of the 'mother' country.

Britain confirmed its lack of understanding of interfaith relations and lack of concern for them when it responded to approaches from the World Zionist Organization by issuing the Balfour Declaration which assisted the Jewish communities throughout the Diaspora towards their great hope: their return to Palestine even if it was against the wishes of the people of that country. (Chapter 16.) Britain had a complex set of aims in issuing that declaration but basic to most of them was unadulterated self interest. Its aim was to perpetuate and to expand its colonial power base and to secure as much of the resources of the Middle East as possible. In doing so it was compounding the hurt done to the people of the Third World and expanding the list of 'black marks' in the book hanging around its corporate neck for the day of judgement or divine retribution. (Chapter 6, The Night Journey) Complications were triggered immediately in Germany, Russia the United States, the Vatican and across Europe. (Chapter 16.)

Warning bells were soon ringing clearly in the Middle East, but the loudest warning bell of all was sounding in Europe. It was Hitler's inspired parody of the Western Christian World : Mein Kampf. (Chapter 18.) Hitler did not realize that he was writing a parody. Neither did he appreciate its place in history. But it was a mocking parody of the Christian West and an archive for all of the misguided ideas which had evolved as a consequence of the church's self-understanding and its collaboration with the powers of the West. Hitler was a product of the church and its influence. Make no mistake about it. The virus of so-called 'scientific anti-Semitism' grew in an anti-Semitic religious culture. As he said repeatedly, he was simply setting out to achieve the aims which the church had failed to achieve. Ten years after it was written the church and its collaborators sought to distance themselves from Mein Kampf. But they could not and they cannot. There was absolutely nothing in Mein Kampf which was new. Everything - including race based immigration laws and euthanasia as well as his colonial policies and of course his anti-Semitism - had been implemented by one or more of the Christian Western powers.

In the meantime Britain set out to implement the declared purpose of the Balfour Declaration, supremely confident that it could negotiate its way through the minefield of conflicting promises and religious tensions which it had laid. It did not realize that it had concurrently triggered the two great prophecies of the Qur'an and Maimonides. How could it? The church was steadfastly refusing to recognize either the validity of their faiths or that prophecy could be generated through them. Its self-understanding, based on the creeds, doctrines and dogma which it had formulated and imposed on the world had it firmly tied in a knot. The knot could have been unraveled and the subsequent course of world history could have been modified if the religious and political leaders involved had heeded the warning bells and given those prophecies some thought. But they did not and the plot therefore had to be acted out.

In order:

- Palestine was thrown into crisis by moves to implement the Balfour Declaration.
- The philosophical challenge to the amorphous Christian gel from Karl Marx became a more direct political and economic challenge when the Russian monarchy fell and the Bolshevik Soviet Union was established.
- Gog and Magog (the Western Alliance plus Russia in one camp and the Tripartite Alliance in the other) went to war in terms of Maimonides' expectation; (chapter 22).

- Hitler acted out the role of the Scourge in the Night Journey, (chapter 25); and the awful truth gradually began to dawn on the amorphous Christian gel that it had to at least share the responsibility for that crisis.
- Western Christian powers, led by the United States, imposed the re-establishment of the State of Israel on the people of Palestine in 1948 (chapter 27), in spite of opposition from the Vatican, the body which was still proclaiming itself to be the Messiah's exclusive representative on earth. Thus phase two of Maimonides' expectation was in place, even if it was not in the manner which Jews may have hoped for.
- Concurrent with that action, and as a consequence of relationships and factors which it did not understand, Britain and the other European colonial powers were quite quickly edged out of their colonies and trust territories. However foreign economic imperialism and globalization replaced them and the circumstances of many Third World countries did not improve. The United States manipulated the Cold War for its own benefit as the world floundered from one regional war to another, including a succession of four wars in the Middle East which directly involved Israel, plus three others in which its involvement was less direct, all within the time span of one generation.

Each of those wars involving Israel and its neighbours was, as we have seen, of great importance in reshaping world relationships, but the one which had the greatest impact was the Yom Kippur War with which was associated the oil embargo and a dramatic change in the financial fortunes of many Muslim countries. Its influence in reshaping the relationships between the people and the systems of the amorphous Christian gel and its partner faiths, Judaism and Islam, was readily recognizable and assessable immediately the embargo was imposed,⁴ but the church's self-understanding, coupled with its members' supreme confidence in the dominance of the West's economic system, inhibited its capacity to accept the fact. The rigidity of the church's self-understanding was critical at that point and greatly inhibited its ability to influence the course of the new relationships. But as already noted (chapter 30), the leaders of dār al-islām began to do their planning and responded responsibly to their new circumstances.

First, there were their own needs for economic development with provision for social planning and enhanced physical infrastructure. Then there was investment to protect their future when their oil would run out. And overlaying the whole lot were the responsibilities which were part of a religious commitment. Help for those less fortunate. Protection and preservation of the environment. And propagation of one faith. It was the Muslim's turn to wonder whether there was a touch of Divine intervention in their changing circumstances, just like the Jews after their salvation in the Six Day War. It was their chance "to get out from under the heel of the Christian West."⁵ They were going to put their faith into action. And they were going to spread the word and support their fellow Muslims wherever they lived. Dār al-islām was about to blossom! Enormous, inspiring mosques began to spring up and beckon the faithful not only in the mainstream Muslim world but in countries where there were only small populations of Muslims. So did international Islamic universities, schools and colleges, and hospitals. Where there were small Islamic societies, they began to flourish. Where there were none, they began to sprout.

And that process of spiritual renewal and religious awakening involved a yearning for a return to dār al-islām: a yearning for way of life to be linked to be linked with faith and belief in a manner which was not possible in the cultural environment, or the cultural malaise, of the amorphous Christian gel. Therefore, as another consequence of the conduct and permissiveness of the amorphous Christian gel, dār al-islām increasingly became linked to the ideas of political independence for significant homogenous populations of Muslims, and fair treatment for minority populations enmeshed in either a multicultural milieu, or under the domination of the amorphous Christian gel, with recognition of their religious practices and cultural needs. It was a natural process and a natural development - no different to the expectations of minority Christian populations in alternative religious environments. Where the dominant community was understanding and accepting, and both able and prepared to provide that recognition and accommodate those needs there was harmony and no disruption. But where that was not the case, agitation for independence, cession, or the establishment of an Islamic State, disputation and disruption began to surface. The thicker the overlay of Christian arrogance, mistrust, intolerance or antagonism, the more likely was the development of an independence movement. And the thickness of the overlay was influenced by history, cultural heritage and denominational patterns.

- And also, concurrent with those developments, the church began to see its influence and the level of support which it had enjoyed begin to fall, community social and ethical values in the Western world began to drift, and there was a rapid rise in the number and influence of community-based organizations which were neither directly church-linked nor government sponsored.

Subsequently the United States succeeded in isolating and undermining the Soviet Union so that the major challenge to the West from atheistic Communism appeared to dissipate. However, because of the policies which it pursued for a period of a generation following the Second World War, the United States has made itself dependent on three diverse parties in the Middle East for its stability: the State of Israel; the Palestinians and their allies; and the petroleum industry. Consequently, with the competitive rise of Muslim influence in many countries; with the growing push for independence and with the world staggering from civil wars or civil turmoil in countries dotted around the globe - every case of which appears to have a religious component - the United States has been able to represent Islam, in isolation, as the major challenge to the position of the West in succession to Soviet Communism. There had been a period of relative calm in the Middle East for several years and - because of the number of distractions around the world and the impact of the irrepressible, unavoidable and grossly irresponsible electronic media competing and pounding them for their constant attention and their expendable consumer dollars - people had tended to forget about it. Hadn't the Americans solved it all at Camp David anyway? To pick up the threads we must step back a few years, to Camp David, and move forward again with the Jews, the Muslims and the Christians. But first, this is the time to look briefly at the factors which contributed to the decline in the influence of the churches and support for them, and the linked issues of the impact of globalization and the growth of civil society organizations, CSOs, and non-governmental organizations, NGOs. They are all, either directly or consequentially, products of the churches self-understanding and doctrinal development, and they all became apparent and have increased in significance in the wake of the Second World War.

THE FALL AND FALL OF THE CHURCH'S INFLUENCE

Simply living and relating to other people in the constantly changing passing parade gradually became more complicated for people after the Second World War. The dramatic surge in population which is illustrated in chart three, above, provided a host of new opportunities but a host of new challenges as well. Some of these have already been discussed (chapter 27, ... and postwar social change) from the point of view of issues which the churches had to cope with, especially in relation to social and family disintegration and postwar foreign development, and they helped to encourage a drift away from church attendance. But attendance at church is little more than an indicator of the influence of the church and the scale of the challenges which it faces, and it is the factors which affect that influence which are now our concern.

Perhaps the most important factor was the growing awareness, once the smoke of battle settled, of the way in which the church had been fundamentally associated with the causes of the war; the rise and support of both Fascism and Nazism; anti-Semitism; and racism - especially in providing the warped basis for institutional Apartheid in South Africa. When the church had got it so wrong in these issues, its teaching authority was thrown into doubt on other issues, especially social issues, of which human sexuality, marriage, birth control and related issues were seen by the church to be most important. They were seen as so important that the pope of the day, Pius XI, had made the Social Encyclicals the centre piece of his papacy. (Chapters 17,18.) Now, in the aftermath of the war, people were finding them unnecessarily restrictive and an impediment to human fulfilment. When the Kinsey Report (chapter 27) demonstrated what the reality of life was and showed that the church's teachings had the potential to do real harm to people, especially during their critical and formative adolescence, they shied away in droves. The practice of young people living together before marriage and then marrying outside the church, either from choice or because the church condemned their practice and, at times, even refused them the sacrament of marriage, raised a barrier between them and the church which they preferred not to try to breach. The attempt to do so was often met with demeaning and very hurtful rejection or, at the very least, constant reminders that they had fallen below the "proper" standards of conduct for Christians.

The release of the Kinsey Report marked a watershed in the issue of human sexuality. It did not cause the watershed: it coincided with it, explained it and provided an opportunity and a challenge for the church to do something about it. The church failed lamentably: especially in the matter of homosexuality. It had taught for so long that it was a sin, on the same basis as masturbation, fornication, adultery and buggery, that it found it impossible to change direction, and carried on regardless. It was not prepared to recognize that buggery was the one act of the five which was universally condemned, and that in the case of homosexuality there was a natural physiological dimension to it and that, for a small percentage of the population, heterosexual practice was not an alternative. Those people were ostracized, forced to accept that they were subhuman and criminal, only fit to be excluded from mainstream life, and that they had automatically forfeited any chance of salvation. Why should they bother?

The church should have been able to recognize and distinguish between the constraints of human sexuality - providing support and pastoral counselling in situations in which they may have been appropriate - and deliberate perversion, promotion of the practice as an alternative lifestyle, and exploitation of those who were caught up in that net. There were the stumbling blocks strewn along the way: promotion and exploitation. Similarly it failed to distinguish between sex before marriage between lovers, and licentiousness and adultery, and wrapped them all up in the same condemnation, proscribing them, tying them up in the ropes of canon law and making them subject to the church's disciplinary system and penance instead of doing what Jesus of Nazareth had done. He placed his teaching firmly in the 'guidelines' box, leaving the matter as one of conscience to be determined between the individual and God at the appropriate time, saying of a woman who was found in the act of adultery: "If there is one of you who has not sinned, let him be the first to throw a stone at her," and, to the woman; "Has no one condemned you? ... Neither do I condemn you; go away and don't sin any more." (John 8:7,10,11 Jerusalem translation.) However it was not only the church's teaching and canon laws on sexuality which turned people away, but its double standards in the conduct of its clergy and religious. As the number of reports and disclosures of deviant conduct by clergy and religious increased, the pedestals on which they had always been placed or on which they sought to perch came crumbling down. Lost respect led to lost influence.

Then came the impact of scientific research and technological development. The sexual revolution coincided with and was encouraged and facilitated by the development of chemical contraceptives and techniques for the termination of pregnancy. Instead of seeing them as aids to human fulfilment, understanding and communal self-management, the church, or the greater proportion of it, could only see the way in which they could be abused. Their condemnation was lifted above the level of social teaching and canon law to the level of a divine obligation. More people walked. The same applied to matters of mental health and the stress brought on by the pressure of business and employment practices. Instead of placing more effort into developing and encouraging non-exploitative workplace practices, the church was caught up in the closed cycle of support for unrestricted Capitalism and the condemnation of socialism and other alternative approaches to socio-economic policy. However in this case, while some people walked away, others came in from the cold to make sure that the church continued along that favourable path, and to discourage, or to sideline, research and education in matters of social change and social responsibility such as investment practices, resource exploitation, environmental protection and armament development and sales. These matters were almost invariably relegated to committees which were understaffed and under-resourced. The church had to, according to the dominant view, concentrate on matters of personal salvation rather than an effort to enable people to better understand their relationship with God and to develop relationships such that people could live in peace and harmony. There were always a few exceptions, where service to humanity, human rights and welfare came first, and we have already noted the rise of the Liberation Theology Movement in Latin America.

Related to these matters was the impact of the Cold War and the nuclear arms race which undermined the confidence of many people in not only the capacity of their governments to protect them, but also encouraged them to question the existence or power of a God who would permit the world to rush headlong in the direction of self-destruction. Coupled with the feeling that “if governments don’t care about the future of the world community why should I” and the feeling that Divine intervention had to be a myth, there were the developments in astronomy which amounted to a frontal attack on the church’s credibility, even though, for some, they demonstrated more clearly than a month of Sunday sermons that God was, in fact, in control.

Related to all of those issues was the development, exploitation and overwhelming influence of the electronic media. Coming very soon, in historical or generational terms, after the telegraph and radio, television brought a revolution in communications. But the revolution went well beyond the simple question of transmission of information. People’s life styles changed dramatically. Membership of lodges, community service clubs and other community self-help and activity groups, such as theatrical societies and craft clubs, fell sharply. So did church attendance. People became transfixed by, and dependent upon their television set so that the producers of programs - and advertisements - displaced parents and school teachers as the principal ethical and educational influences on children and adolescence. So pervasive and persuasive was the impact of television that whatever was “seen on TV” was taken as Gospel truth and became the norm for personal conduct. It mattered not what the source or origin of the material was, or the motive of the producer: the impact and acceptance was the same. Cultural integrity was a thing of the past. Manipulation of every decision, every want, and every desire was subjugated by the commercial motive to extract the last dollar out of every pocket within viewing range of a television set. Stimulation of emotions became the way into every pocket, and because there is no more easily aroused emotion than sexual desire, sex became the principal selling tool in the armoury of the advertiser, producer, presenter and licensee.

Responsibility was soon thrown to the wall - or into the system of “industry self-regulation” which means exactly the same thing. The mainstream churches felt powerless to compete. Ethical standards were reduced to the lowest common denominator; gambling, alcohol and tobacco companies took full advantage of it, to such good effect that governments saw them as ‘milking cows’ for tax revenue. Then, becoming dependent on them for a significant proportion of their revenue, they made the tax system and the licence system into major planks of the government budget system rather than a means of control and regulation of things socially questionable or distinctly disadvantageous. Governments and their people were trapped and there was no incentive to rein in the abuses of such advertisers. Social problems increased. The need for offsetting services and rehabilitation services increased. Some churches set up Christian television services to very good, but very limited, effect. Some became more permissive in their attitudes and their teaching in order to accommodate people who fell under such influences. The Catholic Church tightened the reins still further in some respects and loosened them in others. And a completely new breed of animal of very questionable influence and, in some cases, motives, leapt out of the jungle. The television evangelist. The profile of 'religion' was lifted, but the influence of the church as an instrument to lead the mass of humanity towards a better understanding of its relationship with God and into an environment of stability, peace and harmony certainly was not.

And amid all of that, the church, overall, has been unable to redefine the purpose of its ministry or to adapt its structures, methods and staffing to the actual demands upon Christian ministry. However, the Reformed churches of the Western world have been among the foremost supporters of responsible migration and refugee policies and since the Second World War they have taken the lead in the battle to overcome racism in programs initiated and led by the World Council of Churches. That has been greatly to their credit, but when these programs are implemented they steadily change the nature of the community, and the balance between faiths, and the church's role within that changing milieu. At that point the church cannot cope. It faces increased contact with, or "competition" from, other faiths and because of its theological stance and its self-understanding, it is seldom able to relate to the people of those faiths in a proper and socially productive manner. On both counts the church faces an ever-increasing challenge to reassess its self-understanding and the theology which underpins it.

THE GROWTH OF CIVIL SOCIETY ORGANIZATIONS (CSOs) AND NGOS

Also, during those years, a number of churches took a leading role in the development and provision of community welfare services and new forms of chaplaincy. Not all. Some wanted to withdraw and concern themselves only with the concept of personal salvation for those who, in their view, had already found the doorway to heaven and were inside, waiting for the climactic event of their lives, or deaths, depending on their particular point of view, as "We, the people of God," sipped wine from common cups or grape juice from individual ones. That development was very pleasing in the eye of government. Governments had always been keen to keep a good symbiotic relationship going with the churches, with or without concordats according to their history and heritage, as long as they did not rock the political boat. It was a variation on the Constantinian theme that political stability was achieved through religious conformity. "Cooperation" was simply substituted for "conformity." And in addition, the system saved governments money because they only had to top up the costs with subsidies or grants. They did not have to fund the entire programs because the people in the pews found much of it, either out of a commitment to the "Christian" principle of charity - as if the concept was exclusive to the Christian Gospels and did not occur in the Torah, the Qur'an or the holy books of the non-Abrahamic faiths - or as a part of their penance or their advance payment for a ticket through the Pearly Gates.

However during those years the churches' resources did not grow as quickly as the demands of expanding post-war populations, either on a gross volume basis or in terms of the kinds of services required. These gradually became both more varied and more specialized. The churches could not cope. Neither did they have all the expertise which was required, and governments were reluctant to expand their welfare program budget lines. There was always competition for the taxation dollar. Stalemate. Fortunately, where there is a serious need there is usually someone with the initiative and the will to find a solution, who will find a way. As a result, that period saw a gradual expansion of the network of non-governmental organizations, NGOs, some of which are better described as civil society organizations, CSOs. But even that posed problems for the churches, and tested their self-understanding, because a high proportion of the people who supported such initiatives once they were established were church members. Their time, and the money which they had available for such purposes was generally not a bottomless well, so they had to determine their priorities and apportion their resources of time and money. Debates galore took place in synods, bishops' conferences and assemblies about whether it was proper for church members to support such causes or whether they should devote their entire efforts to "Christian" good works. In the more progressive churches the consensus was usually reached that all such programs were consistent with a Christian commitment. But in the more conservative churches the debates could become quite acrimonious and the decision was not always to support an "outside" organization.

CSOs and NGOs were not new to that period, and while it is not easy to define them, their origins can all be traced to the need to provide a service or a facility which was not being provided by either the churches or the governments of the time. They therefore all represent, in one sense or another, an unfulfilled challenge to society at large and the church in particular. They can be grouped into three broad areas. Perhaps the first should be the charities. These were generally started by churches or in association with churches or other faith groups until after WWI, when governments began to accept some responsibility. Second, come the movements. The Anti-slavery and universal suffrage movements were among the first ones to show the early stages of centralized organization and promotion. The third were the professional, trade and labour groups. These were often regarded as pressure, self interest or pseudo political groups, and they were not regarded as NGOs until after WWII. In every case the stimulus for the introduction of the service was the failure of the existing power structures of state, church, and community to provide for identified or perceived needs. Most notably, the need was the relief of suffering for victims of war, or of neglect (such as of children), oppression (of prisoners), or of economic failure (homelessness).

The pattern of development can be traced to the infamous Crusades when the first field hospitals were established. (Chapter 8) There was a long gap then until the mid-nineteenth century wars. Organized nursing began when the Red Cross was established in 1863 and then given international recognition under the Geneva Convention of 1864. The early twentieth century saw the establishment of the first major community support organization, Rotary International, in Chicago, in 1905. Then a British initiative led to the next major move, after the First World War: the establishment of Save the Children, in 1919, and it was followed by Reconstruction Assistance, Service Civil International, in France in 1920.

The needs generated by the deaths, injuries, dislocation and destruction of the Second World War were enormous. British and American Jewish communities established a number of specialized relief organizations, but among the best known are the World Council of Churches Refugee Service and the British-based emergency relief organization, OXFAM. Then, in the wake of that war, churches took a number of initiatives in development aid programs, and the ones which broke new ground were the Quakers, the French Catholic organization Pax Christi 1945, and Catholic Grail, in 1947. A major new concept, volunteer overseas aid, took root when the Australian Volunteers Abroad program was established in 1950, and there was soon a host on similar organizations operating from a number of countries.

Eleven years later, in 1961, under the influence of one postwar crisis or development after another a whole series of new initiatives were taken. A politicized version of the volunteer concept of development aid was introduced when President Kennedy established the US Peace Corps as a means of extending American influence into developing countries through a large scale volunteer aid worker program. Non-government initiatives to give substance and structure to the United Nations Human Rights Charter took shape with assistance for prisoners of conscience, and legal aid, through Amnesty International. At the same time, prompted by the scourge of religious conflict around the world, the first regular programs on the interfaith front were introduced with the establishment of the World Conference on Religion and Peace, WCRP. And by that time many people were becoming concerned at the abuse of the environment by virtually uncontrolled and undisciplined resource extraction and industrial contamination, and the World Wildlife Fund for Nature was established. Another major initiative in the environmental field came ten years later when Greenpeace was established.

In the meantime population pressures and ethnic conflict had encouraged the establishment of a range of community protection and education programs. Major ones were the Population Institute, 1969; Racial Discrimination, 1969; and Habitat during the 1970s.

Every one of these initiatives had a major impact on the planning and provision of human services world wide by encouraging complementary services and a high level of community involvement, and they were not only in the 'normal' welfare field. They soon gained international recognition and attracted government support either through grant funding or taxation incentives for donors. But a vital consideration is that they were all either church, individual or community initiatives, not initiatives of governments, and they were all, in some sense, the product of the trouble in the triangle. The fact that they became necessary is therefore a reflection of the conduct and self-understanding of each of the religious communities involved in those conflicts and consequential developments. They therefore represent a challenge to the people of each of those faiths to reflect on how they relate to the situation, but to the Christian church in particular because its self-understanding has been the basis of the trouble in the triangle.

However they also represent a challenge to governments because, having recognized them and helped them financially in the early stages, they have come to see them as either another instrument which they can manipulate for their own purposes, or call on to do some of their dirty work including, in some cases, manipulation of the communities among whom they work and intelligence intervention which is quite contrary to the perceived roles of CSOs or NGOs. In some cases they have even become involved in exploitation, commercialization of their enterprises in a manner which raises concerns about their legitimacy, corrupt practices to maintain their established position, and competition for available funds with other CSOs and NGOs. Government financial support has become a double edged sword. Taxation disincentives can be applied to discourage their work if it becomes an embarrassment to a government, and pressure for political control of their programs can often be recognized in the programs which they either undertake, or decline to undertake out of fear of the withdrawal of government support for their core programs.

Internationally the CSOs and NGOs can exercise substantial influence through their accreditation to bodies of the United Nations, and that can also be a double edged sword. Some governments fear the influence of foreign-based NGOs operating in their country, and there can also be conflicts of interest in policy making. There is a clear need to be able to isolate those NGOs which can be deemed to represent a 'grass roots' planning or development concern and those which have virtually unlimited funds available to influence decision making in the interests of particular special interest groups whose interests may be in conflict with the real needs of Third World countries or the broad needs of their home-base countries.

In view of the way in which the ultimate resolution of the trouble in the triangle can be influenced or affected by "peace operations" of one kind or another, and by the motives of the NGOs which are involved with government forces in those operations, it is important that the relationship between NGOs and the United Nations which is put in place when a new structure for the UN is decided, will have been thought through very carefully. This issue is highlighted by the report of the Global Governance Reform Project, Reimagining the Future. The report is not primarily concerned with CSOs and NGOs. In fact they are peripheral to its focus of democratic governance of world affairs through the United Nations. But they have an important role in the process of democratic resolution of conflict through the processes of the United Nations. The report notes:

Democratic reform of global governance means increasing democratization at all levels. It means greater participation, transparency and accountability by states and non-state actors in international decision-making, not least in the structures and processes of the United Nations.

Ensuring balanced access to mass media and communication is vital to creating an informed public, and therefore to democratizing governance.

Given that inequalities of wealth and income lead to unequal access to knowledge and influence, democratizing governance both requires and promotes distributive justice.⁶

What is particularly important from a global governance perspective is the relationship that has emerged between the United Nations and the various multilateral peace operations. Both during and since the Cold War the UN's normative authority over multilateral peace operations has been continually challenged.

During the UN's first 40 years, few peace operations took place. Extra-UN multilateral peace operations were even fewer. The challenge to the UN's authority had two manifestations. At times the major powers managed to get the organization to act in the way they wanted (e.g. the United States during the Korean crisis). At other times they shaped the UN's response by ensuring inaction (e.g. the Soviet Union during the Hungarian crisis).

In the post-Cold War period, challenges to the UN's authority were at first thought to be at an end. Yet before long it emerged that the challenge would continue unabated. By the late 1990s the full dimensions of the UN's authority crisis had become clearly visible. In the Kosovo crisis a Cold War alliance took independent enforcement action with almost no reference to the UN.

Evaluating UN peace operations is no easy task. Success or failure of individual missions is of course important, but no more so than the overall success or failure of the UN peace operations mechanism as a whole.⁷

GLOBALIZATION: ENMESHED IN THE TROUBLE IN THE TRIANGLE

Evaluating UN peace operations is certainly no easy task, and neither is the evaluation of the effects of globalization. But they must both be understood if we are to be successful in dismantling the trouble in the triangle, and a few paragraphs to review critical issues which we have already noted will help to clarify the two matters and the way they interlock. Conflicts are being generated by the processes of globalization which will continue to get worse until radical action is taken to offset them and that radical action must go right to the fundamental reassessment of Messianic theology which, as we have seen, is at the base of the contradictory self-understandings of the three Abrahamic faiths.

At present the world is focussed on Islam, and in the West the focus has become a preoccupation. Islam is widely perceived as the only threat to the global hegemony of the United States and therefore to the stability and economic well-being of the whole of the white Western Christian world. Attention is glued to anti-West terrorist attacks by 'radical Islamists' and the Islamization of whole regions, either by evangelism or by political action. The Christian Church sat astride the fabric of international relationships for so long that its adherents were persuaded to accept its self-understanding that it was by divine authority that it so sat. We have noted that that self-understanding was shaken a bit by the events and consequences of the Great War followed promptly by World War II and that the church changed direction to some extent but that it did not undertake a thorough reassessment of itself or of its relationships with other faiths, and that over the next eighty years there were a series of international shocks which each should have precipitated such a reassessment.

We have also noted that the central fact of the Christian Era occurred in 1948: the establishment of the State of Israel and a remarkable rebirth of Jewish intellectual endeavour. That was followed by a similar and equally remarkable rebirth of Muslim intellectual endeavour in two bursts. The first followed the Six Day War in 1967. The second followed in 1973 in the wake of the Yom Kippur War and the imposition of the oil embargo by the friends of the Palestinians against the principal supporters of Israel. And Russia's Glasnost and Perestroika in 1985, coupled with China's Tiananmen Square massacre in 1989, prompted more attention to the over-arching relationships between politics, religion, personal conduct, community cohesion and international relations, with renewed interest in the major Oriental religions.

Concurrent with those developments there were technical and social developments in the Western world which weakened and questioned the authority of, and undermined support for, the mainstream church. The church has been assailed from many directions and it is struggling to maintain its influence. It rode into the modern world as a major factor in colonialism and it now faces the consequences of that relationship.

The year 1933, with Hitler's rise to power on the back of his parody of the church - Mein Kampf - was a dramatic wake up call for the church. It shook its head once or twice, pressed the slumber button and went back to sleep. A generation later, 1948, with the establishment of the World Council of Churches as well as the State of Israel, provided both a challenge and an opportunity. A couple more nods of the head and the church pressed the slumber button again. Another generation later and in 1973 the combined consequences of its actions and inaction, and the new direction which it had to take, involving a comprehensive reassessment of its self-understanding and its theology, should have been apparent to its leaders. The slumber button was pressed yet again.

YUGOSLAVIA: A CASE STUDY

Now, in 2000, (yes, another generation), the events in Asia, Yugoslavia and the former Soviet Union, have led us into another period of challenge. On one hand the church is under growing pressure to achieve reconciliation between its "separated parts" and Rome, (although the Vatican is not only resisting any significant change to its theology, it is re-stating it), and on the other hand there have been predictions of the end of the Ecumenical Movement. At the same time there has been a further stimulus to social activism and intellectual renewal within Islam. If the church simply presses the slumber button this time it might as well stay asleep. It is in the process of forfeiting the leadership of world religious thought to its partners in the triangle of Abrahamic messianic faiths, Judaism and Islam, and it will be left wallowing in their wake. Yugoslavia's continuing crisis illustrates the way in which the historical tensions and conflicts erupt from time to time, but it has also introduced a new phase in the conflict, requiring urgent consideration of the steps to initiate the reconciliation process.

Yugoslavia sits on a triple divide. The first divide is that between the Eastern and Western Roman Empires which became the frontier between Roman Catholicism and Orthodoxy. The second is that between the former Ottoman Empire of Islam and the Holy Roman Empire of Christianity. It was at that divide that the threat of Islam dramatically influenced relations between the pope and the princes on whom he relied for military support against Islam and thus enabled the survival of both Martin Luther and the Reformation, and the recuperation of the Orthodox Church. The third divide is that between the Western Capitalist bloc (with its intimate links with the church) and the Communist bloc (with its philosophical basis in atheism triggered by revolt against the church's cosy relationship with the excesses of Capitalism). Yugoslavia has shared with Poland the role of the knot in the ongoing multiple tug-of-wars. NATO's recent intervention in its affairs is a reflection of that role and of Western fear of the eruption of a major war, rather than a consequence of NATO's humanitarian instincts and its want to redress some of the wrongs perpetrated against the people of Islam over a long period. The way in which that intervention occurred indicates that humanitarian concern has yet again provided the justification for intervention, not the motive.

The boundaries which defined post-World War II Yugoslavia contained nations which have been kneaded like potting clay during the 600 years since the Ottoman victory against the Serbs at Kosovo, but notably during and since the two world wars. The proportion of peoples of each of the three major faiths - Christian Orthodoxy, Roman Catholicism and Sunni Islam - plus Europe's largest concentration of Gypsies - and the territories in which they have been dominant, have changed with repeated waves of battle, refugees and migration. However throughout that turmoil, mythology and continuity of religious teaching has prevented any merging or unification of communities. Intermingling, yes. Unification, no. An indication of the religio-ethnic mix in recent years is set out in a footnote.⁸

The present phase of the crisis can be said to begin with the constitution drawn up under the Communist regime in 1974 which the various ethnic communities claimed enshrined inequalities. Following the death of Tito in 1980 the internal pressures for independence were soon manifest from within each of the religio-ethnic communities except that in the case of the Serbs the pressure was for the restoration of a Serbian Empire. The Muslim minority community, growing in numbers as immigrants from near-derelict Albania sought a new life in Yugoslavia, staked its claim for an autonomous republic in Kosovo with the right to eventual self-determination. The discrimination which they saw as pushing them in that direction was well set out by Abdullah Dedic in January 1987.⁹ His statement could well have been a response to the publication a few months earlier of the Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences' "Memorandum 1986" which amounted to an ambit claim for a Greater Serbia incorporating each of the autonomous regions. An overview of the period from the Serbian Academy's 'Memorandum 1986' to 1996 is set out in end note¹⁰. It illustrates that in the Balkans Christian attitudes to Muslims were of precisely the same nature of Nazi Germany's attitudes to Jews and that their plans for ethnic cleansing of Greater Serbia actually predate the development of Germany's worst excesses.

During the peak of the Kosovo crisis the Churches were at pains to maintain the impression that Yugoslavia's wars, and particularly the Kosovo crisis, have not been religious wars. However it is indisputable that religious belief and affiliation have been a major influence. In fact the crisis has aggravated strains between the faiths and between the churches of the East and the West. It has also aggravated strains within the World Council of Churches which was already considering closely the future of the entire Ecumenical Movement. The WCC now faces a bigger challenge than ever.

Some of the steps taken by the World Council of Churches prior to and during the Kosovo crisis, and factors which have impinged upon it are set out in the end notes¹¹. Special note should be taken of the moves to establish a Special Commission of the World Council of Churches to resolve theological conflicts between the Reformed and Orthodox wings of the Council and proposals to expand the Ecumenical Movement beyond Trinitarian Christian Churches. In addition, the appointment to the Council's staff of three people from Eastern Europe was announced on October 2, 2000, following its Executive Committee meeting a few days earlier. Fr. Dr. Ioan Saucă of the Romanian Orthodox Church was appointed director of the Ecumenical Institute at Bossey. Dr. Tamara Grdzeliidze from the Orthodox Church of Georgia, and Rev. Kersten Storch, Lutheran from the former East Germany, were appointed to the Faith and Order team.¹²

When the major war between NATO and Serbia (a mere state within Yugoslavia) was over everyone was still trying to make believe that it was not a religious war. But a little squabble in a small territory which happened to sit on the triple divide (between Orthodox East and Catholic West; Socialist East and Capitalist West; and Christian North and Muslim South) had left the church in a very invidious position indeed. In the West, very few people outside the churches' leadership structure had taken much notice. The churches were not worth getting too worried about anyway. And probably even fewer people in the West took any notice of what was happening in the Muslim world. Why should they? They didn't understand it. They should have taken more notice.

The intolerable aggression against yet another Muslim community at the hands of the dominant Christian West - and right in the middle of Christian Europe - provided a stimulus to Muslim social welfare, political and educational activity probably second only to (but a long way short of) the stimulus of the Yom Kippur War and the oil embargo of 1973. The effect was felt especially in the United States where the added political clout of the six-million-strong Muslim community (half of Arab extraction and half of other ethnic background) has reshaped the troubled triangle just a wee bit more. But it was felt in every country which has either a significant Muslim minority in a dominant Christian environment or vice versa. End note ¹³ gives an indication of the impact of the Kosovo crisis on the Muslim communities in the United States and Canada.

There have been several clear indications of the Muslim community's new influence and its determination to defend itself against the oppressive majority Christian influence and authority. They include the appointment of a Muslim as an Ambassador for the United States for the first time and the close collaboration which is developing between Arab and Muslim umbrella organizations within the United States. But perhaps the clearest indication is the fact that first-ever invitations were promptly extended for leaders from those two communities to meet privately with Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs Martin Indyk.

At the same time Israel, the senior partner in a troubled triangle of Abrahamic Messianic faiths, recognized its dependence on US aid, international criticism of its conduct towards the Palestinians, and the similarity between the conduct of the Serbian campaign and Nazi Germany's treatment of the Jews. It promptly offered substantial humanitarian aid while neither condemning Serbia or NATO. The Kosovo crisis coincided with a critical stage in the final status negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian authorities, and there was real fear among Israeli Jews of a spin-off effect. And, quite understandably, Muslim leaders called for the long-running Palestinian refugee crisis to be settled on the same basis as the Kosovo refugee crisis. The predominantly Muslim Palestinians demanded not only an end to new Israeli settlements in the occupied territories but a prompt return to their homeland and to their own homes for all Palestinians still in neighbouring countries. They also wanted talks aimed at compensation for losses suffered. The Palestinian line was simple. If the Kosovars can return home with compensation why can't we?

So: a touch of 'ethnic cleansing' in Yugoslavia was very significant in shaping the course of future religious dialogue - together with accelerating globalization. Globalization - the intermingling of people, their ideas and their practices - was already occurring as a function of population growth, migration, and the development of transport and communications systems as a matter of course. Chart 3, page 1835, indicates the relationship between the evolution of faiths, population growth and some other factors. It highlights the establishment of Islam through the inspired ministry of the prophet Muhammad as a reaction and a challenge to the development of certain Christian doctrines and dogma, the excesses which resulted from them, and the vital role of the Spanish Jewish scholar Maimonides.

GLOBALIZATION: UNDERSTANDING THE PROBLEM

It is not globalization per se which is the problem that the world has to resolve. Neither is it solely a matter of territorial conquest. The current phase of globalization is not directly linked to territorial conquest. It is linked to economic conquest and the abuses of capital transfer and communications. Those abuses can be reversed but it will require a substantial change in attitude among those who dominate and steer the system - or their demise as a consequence of conflict generated as a result of the abuses. And religion, or conflict generated between them because of the way they are linked into the system, will play a major part in bringing about those changes.

The impact of globalization has been most dramatic in recent years, in the era of electronic communications, when we have been able to read about, hear about and even see episodes of interfaith conflict before the third shot is fired. It takes two shots to confirm that conflict exists. But the process is as old as humanity. Therefore, because religious conflict is central to the late twentieth century crises of globalization, and because religion was fundamental to the process of globalization, the necessary starting point for our thinking is the post-exilic period of Yahwism when people such as the writer of Jonah began to think more assertively of Yahweh as God-universal, or global, and not specific to the people of Abraham, and of an ongoing responsibility to convey that understanding to all humanity.¹⁴ The process assumed more definite character at the very beginning of the Christian era with the injunction by Jesus of Nazareth that his followers were to “Go out to the whole world (to) proclaim the Good News to all creation.”¹⁵

The process of Globalization and the process of territorial conquest to satisfy the demands of population expansion could have proceeded quite independently, in parallel. However the successors of the followers whom Jesus sent forth to proclaim the Good News began to modify, confuse and codify the message within the framework of a self-indulgent, power-seeking, empire-building institution known as ‘the church’ and from that point the processes of globalization and territorial conquest became irrevocably intertwined and progressively more painful. And because the message then being proclaimed diverged further and further from the original divinely inspired message, additional divinely inspired messages were introduced into the processes of proclamation and globalization in order to bring the church and its confused messages back into line with the original.

We have considered at length the relationship between Hitler’s parody of the amorphous Christian gel, Mein Kampf, and the convergence of critical prophecies generated within the troubled triangle. That is one of the critical stages in the globalization of the trouble in the triangle which have already been discussed, but which are briefly noted by way of an aide memoir in another end note,¹⁶. That complex of events leads us directly to the current phase of globalization. It is a phase characterized by confrontation between the White Western Judeo-Christian World under the domination of the United States (the ‘North’) and the countries of the so-called Developing or Third World (the ‘South’) with the people of Islam, pejoratively labelled ‘activists’ but with a very strong base of academics, providing a strong core of leadership.

The same mechanisms which tied the church to the colonial powers as they set out to exploit the rest of the world also merged the abuse of people and resources with the church in the amorphous Christian gel. That gel cannot possibly be separated into its constituent parts. Therefore the church’s denigration of the beliefs and practices of people of other faiths; the doctrine and dogma which the church maintains and to which the people of other faiths object as erroneous or unjustifiable; and the patterns of personal or social conduct which are contrary to the standards which they maintain are all equally subject to criticism when they are associated with political or economic exploitation and abuse.

If those things have all been imposed at the point of a gun as well; and if they have been imposed against the will of the people; and if they have involved the degradation or undermining of stable community structures and systems of ethics which have long sustained the people - even if at a low level of economic activity - the level of frustration which the people feel and their level of determination to overturn those abuses, and to retaliate for them, becomes even more intense. Similarly, if the religions and systems of ethical belief are linked and held with tenacity, the determination to overturn those imposed will exhibit equal tenacity.

If the amorphous Christian gel happens to satisfy the majority of people for a time; if the apparent benefits of materialism and consumerism outweigh the disadvantages and the environmental and social destruction for a time; or if the personal benefits for those in power encourage them to maintain the system by oppressing their own people, then some degree of stability may also be maintained for a time. This leads to the antagonistic minority being labelled as terrorists, pushed underground and suppressed. They can be kept there until the pressure becomes sufficient or their numbers grow large enough or some factor weakens the grip of the amorphous Christian gel, and then the retaliation begins.

It will inevitably take on an anti-Christian aspect, even if the present Christian community, their clergy or leaders, have no direct links with those who have imposed the disadvantage or been responsible for the oppression. Those people may be working to very good effect and well within the guidelines of the Gospel and enlightened church policy. That does not matter. They are labelled. They are part of the oppressive gel. They will suffer the consequences. In present circumstances it is the people of Islam who have been most affected by the history of Christian oppression and who are providing much of the leadership for the anti-globalization-anti-Christian reaction and they hold their faith and maintain the associated ethics with tenacity not equaled by the people of any other faith.

So: as the great investment houses of the West, their bankers and money manipulators shift massive funds from one country to another, hold governments to ransom for better investment and taxation benefits, and boost consumption of non-essentials for greater profit in preference to producing staple foods, essential clothing and shelter the governments of the host countries may tolerate it for a time, until they face real domestic opposition because the social fabric of the nation and its ethical standards are being shredded. And in present circumstances key ethical and social factors relate to the abuse of human sexuality and the extended family, alcohol, gambling, community responsibility, degradation of the environment and profiteering, each of which relate to articles of faith of Islam as well as to ethics.

The benefits of Western style investment and money moving can seldom provide the infrastructure and employment base which an under-resourced nation requires to progress in line with population growth, let alone to offset the social costs of the policies being pursued.

Therefore, when the crunch comes the backlash is against those who are seen to be associated with the amorphous Christian gel. However it is no longer that simple. The United States, the superpower of the White Christian Western World, is no longer a Christian country. It prides itself on being Judeo-Christian. It is home to the largest proportion of the world's Jewish community, and it provides the protective umbrella for the State of Israel. Therefore as anti-globalization pressure increases, the Jewish community will also have to face some of the backlash. That is most likely to be directed at the State of Israel because that state is seen to be the principal beneficiary of the great exploiter as well as the focal point of the crises in the Middle East; its adherents are perceived to control a disproportionate amount of US investment and policy decision making; and it is more easily got at than the United States - especially if the umbrella becomes less effective or becomes unwelcome because of the consequences of its policies.

Therefore the Jewish community, highly endowed with intellectual talent as well as political capacity in the United States, will not sit idly by as the Christian church tries to distance itself from the faults of the amorphous gel which has coalesced around it. This will be especially the case if the third partner in the triangle of Abrahamic faiths, Islam, continues on its perceived path of confrontation with the West and the disruption which the West fears becomes a reality. It does not matter around what point the great reassessment begins. It can be a finer point of theology or a matter of social or political practice. Once it begins it must inevitably involve all three partners in the triangle and it must embrace the most fundamental issues of theology because it is around them that the amorphous Christian gel has coalesced. Once that fundamental reassessment begins, reconciliation is just around the corner.

The rejection of reconciliation because of resistance to sacrificing a position of dominance and privilege are too horrific to contemplate. The West must soon realize that it cannot maintain dominance and privilege by ever increased defence capacity. Rome and Spain have both taught us that the destruction of one's suppliers and one's markets leads very quickly to the destruction of one's own capacity. Historically divine judgement and retribution have been administered through the consequences of broken human and international relations. It is no different today. And in any case the West simply cannot maintain enough gunboats, rockets, and local-impact nuclear weapons and spy satellites to simultaneously subdue the "terrorists" in every country which might care to bring it down by concerted cooperative action - unless it chooses to defy reality and plunge the world to the depths of Armageddon. But that is jumping ahead. We are still at the Camp David accords.

THE CAMOUFLAGE: OR AN ATTEMPT TO BUY PEACE

In April 1977, while most people had their minds on Soweto and the UN arms embargo against South Africa, or the nuclear armed ballistic missiles which the great powers were aiming at each other, or the death throes of China's Cultural revolution, Anwar Sadat was traveling to Washington. He wanted to find out whether Jimmy Carter, the new president whose style and philosophy were so much different to the Nixon-Ford-Kissinger style, was as serious about making the achievement of peace in the Middle East his administration's top foreign policy objective as he had said during his campaign for office. He was encouraged by Carter telling him that in ten years time Washington's economic, military, and political ties with Egypt might be as strong as the ties between the United States and Israel, and that he would be interested to meet Yasir Arafat. The diplomatic footwork started. In September, responding to signals from both Washington and Cairo, Moshe Dayan, foreign minister in the new Begin government, visited King Hassan II in Morocco to ask for his help in arranging high level contact with the Egyptian government. After some further exchanges the outcome was a visit to Jerusalem by Sadat on November 19-20, when he addressed the Israeli Knesset. He told the nation that he did not want a separate peace between Israel and Egypt, saying that any peace settlement required Israel's complete withdrawal from Arab territories captured in 1967. He insisted that "there is no peace that could be built on the land of others" but that such a withdrawal would bring acceptance by the Arab world and that it was logical that Israel should live in security and safety among its Arab neighbours. Begin made a return visit to Cairo on Christmas Day, but high hopes for progress were not realized, and when work began on four new Jewish settlements in Sinai only a few days later the strains between them were exacerbated.¹⁷

In spite of that setback diplomatic activity continued and the two leaders accepted Carter's invitation to meet with him at Camp David in September, 1978. The talks were near breakdown point after ten days, but they continued talking and a couple of days later, having been assured by the Americans that they would pay for the construction of alternative bases in the Negev Desert at a cost of $3 billion (chart: The Widening Gap, chapter 30), the Israelis agreed to relinquish their military bases in the Sinai and to construct no more settlements there. It was agreed that Egypt would ensure free passage for Israeli shipping through the Gulf of Aqaba and the Suez Canal; that all Israeli troops would be withdrawn from Sinai within three years; and that the rights of Palestinians, and the future of Gaza and the West Bank would be determined within "A Framework for Peace in the Middle East," based on UN Resolution 242, after a five year transitional period of full autonomy.¹⁸ However progress was slow, each government accusing the other of dragging its feet and, only two weeks after the signing of those agreements, Israel published a five-year master plan, the Drobles Plan, for the development of Jewish settlements in the West Bank. It provided for the number of settlers to be increased to 27,000 families, some located in enlarged existing settlements and others in fifty new settlements.¹⁹

In fact, although the Camp David Accords were hailed and promoted as the nearest thing to peace in the Middle East they could be nothing of the kind. Carter knew, and his administration knew, that the United States was in an increasingly difficult position because of its commitment to satisfy each of the three groups identified previously: the State of Israel, its Arab neighbours and the Palestinians, and the oil industry. This step involved only one of the Arab states and it did not take account at all of the most fundamental issues: the resettlement of refugees who were dispossessed to establish the Jewish State, a territory for the Palestinians to call home, and the future of the City of Jerusalem. It also introduced new complications because of the fact that Israel was dealing with only one neighbour and was seen to be playing one off against the others, and the agreement was left so loose that the Israeli government could interpret UN Resolution 242 in any number of ways. It therefore increased the tension between Egypt and the other Arab states which claimed that it was abandoning the Palestinian cause in order to recover the Sinai Peninsula. The United States was providing further evidence of what should have been self-evident to the world. It was buying peace, piecemeal. The only peace treaty which can ever be fully effective is one made freely between parties which have struggled with the issues and have both reached the conclusion that they are taking the right steps to the peace which they want. When a third party intervenes and provides inducement out of desperate self interest for warring parties to sign a document and call it peace, it can never be stable because the underlying issues have not been resolved. Camp David was a classic 'bought peace.'

The United Nations knew that, even though people did not talk about it in such terms and the Western media made no mention of such a concept. No one was expecting a quick fix, and a Secretariat, later renamed the Division for Palestinian Rights, was established to extend and enhance the work of the UN Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People which had been established in 1974, but which had previously been dependent on staff and facilities of the UN General Secretariat. Its 1976 report had noted that the question of Palestine is "at the heart of the Middle East problem" and it had drawn up a two-phase plan for the return of the Palestinians to their homes and property, and a timetable for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from the occupied territories by June 1, 1977, fifteen months before the Camp David conference.²⁰

And only a short distance away another aspect of the crisis in the Middle East, or the trouble in the triangle, was building up. On the same day that the Drobles Plan was published, Ayatollah Khomeini was forced to leave Iraq because his constant and very effective campaigning against the Shah and his pro-American policies was causing unrest in Iran and friction between Iraq and Iran. His campaigning was so effective that within a few more weeks open rebellion was occurring in Iran and on January 16, 1979, the Shah fled, the Ayatollah returned to a tumultuous welcome on February 1, appointed a Provisional Government, and began planning towards the reorganization of the nation. Iran's Islamic Revolution had been effective.

Now the pace quickened even more. On March 26 Israel and Egypt signed a separate peace treaty based on the Camp David Accords. Egypt's membership of both the Arab League and the Islamic Conference was suspended and Sadat ceased to be the de facto leader of the Arab world. The world should have taken note that the crisis was not simply a matter of territory or politics, or refugees. It was a very deeply held matter of religious belief. On April 1, Iran was proclaimed an Islamic Republic and its leaders set about drafting a new constitution and reversing the former Shah's pro-Western policies. In October, about the time that the Shah arrived in the United States, on the 22nd, for medical treatment and safe asylum, the profile, legitimacy and nature of dār al-islām was raised by the establishment of the international organization 'Islam and the West' with its headquarters in Geneva. By the end of the month

Israel handed its Sinai oil field back to Egypt under a guarantee from the United States that its supplies would be secure. Those supplies were drawn from Kuwait. On November 4, Iranian forces invaded the United States Embassy in Teheran, captured 50 hostages, located evidence of US interference in Iran's affairs, and demanded the Shah's extradition. The United States did not oblige, so the hostages remained as 'guests' of the Iranian government, and the Carter administration found it wise to encourage the deposed Shah to make his home elsewhere. He was granted asylum in Egypt by Sadat - a decision which further undermined his standing with the aroused radical Muslim section of his population.

In Iraq, Saddam Hussein assumed the dual roles of head of state and head of government upon the resignation of President Ahmad Hassan al-Bakr, and sought to assume the leadership of the Arab community which had effectively been left vacant when Sadat's influence waned with Egypt's suspension from the two peak bodies, and to establish Iraqi hegemony over the Gulf Region. On December 1, a referendum in Iran approved the country's new constitution with Ayatollah Khomeini as Supreme Religious Leader. He was then clearly the leader of the Shia Muslim world community and very eager to extend his influence across the Sunni Muslim world as well. A few days later Saudi Muslim extremists who wanted a more militant Islamic regime in Saudi Arabia, moved in revolt against the Sa'udi dynasty and seized the Great Mosque at Mecca, but Saudi authorities soon dealt with them decisively. A new element of competition had been introduced into the affairs of the Muslim Arab world with Hussein and Khomeini in neighbouring countries and sharing a common boundary through the vital Shatt Al-'Arab waterway with major oil facilities on either side. There was deep animosity between them because of Khomeini's expulsion from Iraq just as the revolution in Iran was getting under way, and the broadly Sunni-based Iraqi government was fearful that the substantial majority of Shi'ite Muslims in the south would either seek to secede to Iran or rise in revolt against its own government.

Early in 1980, Israel and Egypt exchanged ambassadors, opened the border between them, and welcomed a steady flow of both trade and tourists. But with its hand strengthened by the peace agreement with Egypt, Israel became more belligerent towards the Palestinians, and on May 8, Sadat recognized the reality of the continuing Jewish settlement and the introduction of legislation to annex East Jerusalem, and suspended negotiations towards autonomy in Gaza and the West Bank. Soon after, in June, the European Council, acting on behalf of its nine member countries, recognized the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and the PLO as their negotiating body. One by one, a number of countries granted formal diplomatic recognition to the PLO as it undertook a massive international diplomatic initiative, but this was undermined to some extent, and Islamic solidarity took a battering when Iraq invaded Iran in September to claim the disputed oil-rich border province of Khuzestan - and the oil centre of Abadan. It succeeded in seizing the religious centre of Khorramshahr but it could not capture the well defended refinery port of Abadan. Saudi Arabia openly assisted Iraq financially with its war effort; it was also supported or encouraged by a number of other moderate Arab countries; it had the tacit support of both the United States and the Soviet Union, and Kuwait, also a member of the Arab League, acted as a side-door conduit for Iraq's supplies while military action made the direct approach impossible. Iran received support from Syria and Libya.

The National Council of Churches of Christ in the USA, which had an active interfaith unit, chose that time to issue a comprehensive 18-page statement on the Middle East which explained the situation very clearly and indicated a marked improvement in the overall Christian perception of the church's partners in the increasingly troubled triangle. It included an overview of the Middle East and statements on relations among the churches, between Christians and people of other faiths, the rights of religious minorities, the nature of the arms race and some security implications, and an appendix of key documents including the Camp David Accords. Extracts from the statement on relations between Christians and people of other faiths illustrate the extent to which the attitudes of church leaders had evolved under the influence of the establishment of the State of Israel and the crisis in the Middle East.

The Middle East is the spiritual homeland of three major monotheistic religions: Judaism, Christianity and Islam. In the past few decades the attention of the whole world has been drawn in an unprecedented way to the vitality of all three faiths. At the same time these religions have encountered one another in new ways, both in context of peace and in the midst of violence. ...

Nevertheless, deep tensions have arisen out of Christian and Muslim convictions that the revelation granted them is a corrective fulfillment of that which was given to those before them, and out of the sue of theological expression by all three faiths in their struggle for power. ... Theological differences which produce tensions among Jews, Christians and Muslims today are concepts of land, mission, and the relation between religion and state. ...

The relations of Christians with Jews and Muslims are often complicated by the variety of theological positions held by differing Christians about people of other faiths. These positions vary all the way from the claims of some Christians that all other faiths are false to those who claim that all are true. Depending on the particular theological position, a variety of missionary efforts have been carried out with respect to Muslims and Jews, some of which have alienated both. The theological diversity found among Christians is paralleled by the diversity found among Jews and Muslims. ...

Today there is evidence of the necessity of responding to opportunities for new openness to each other by Jews, Christians and Muslims. It is urgent that the moment not be lost, but that people of different faiths seek new contacts, relationships, and ways of working together. ...

People of all faiths must be aware of how theological and religious understandings and differences are affected by political, economic, cultural, ethnic and social concepts. The search of peoples in the Middle East for national identities and boundaries, for economic viability and autonomy, and for cultural distinctiveness as opposed to the impact of western culture on the region is supported by religious affirmations. The national pride of the USA, its readiness to use the nations of the region to further its own national security, and its need for oil shape the attitudes of everyone involved including Christians, Muslims and Jews, both in the USA and in the Middle East. An awareness of the implications of all these factors will help Christians, Muslims and Jews to deal justly with such important issues as the sacredness of land, the nature of liberty, the rights of religious minorities, the relationships between religion and state, and the purpose and structure of mission. ...

The 1978 Camp David Framework for Peace provided new hope and evidence that the negotiations can bring an end to hostilities of long standing. ...

While the Camp David Framework has provided a new climate of trust between Egypt and Israel, this has not been the case throughout the entire Middle East. This agreement has isolated Egypt from the other Arab states and has not brought Israel closer to peace agreements with other Arab states or with the Palestinian people.^{xxi}

Early in 1981, as a consequence of Kuwait's support and assistance for Iraq, Iran began shelling a Kuwaiti refinery complex, and inspired acts of terrorism and sabotage against the interests of the ruling clan. In response, in March, the Gulf Cooperation Council was established by Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar, Oman, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates in order to coordinate economic and defensive arrangements. But world attention was soon focussed on Israel again when, in May and June, it undertook a series of aerial attacks, mainly on missile sites which Syria had installed in the Beqaa Valley of southern Lebanon. However on June 7 it made one audacious long-distance attack into Iraq which was linked to a continuing crisis in relations between the two countries and which reflected the continuing potential for a major war between Israel and its Arab neighbours. That raid was the fourth major action in a campaign which began four years earlier, in 1977, when Iraq had begun planning and construction of an Osiraq nuclear power plant with French assistance and technology. The Iraqi government claimed that the plant was intended purely for power generation but Israel was not convinced. It claimed to have evidence that the plant was also intended to produce weapons grade plutonium for a small stockpile of weapons which would be used against Israel in due course. On that basis, Israel persuaded the French government to reduce the grade of fuel which it would provide for the reactor, to make it more difficult to upgrade it for weapons use. Then in April 1979 Israeli agents broke into a warehouse in France and destroyed casings which had been constructed for the Iraqi reactor, and in June 1980, the Egyptian-born physicist who was directing Iraq's nuclear research program was assassinated. Next, the June 7, 1981, attack raised the stakes and the level of bitterness between the two countries higher still. The Israeli government directed a flight of F-16 and F-17 jets to fly more than a thousand miles to Iraq and back to destroy altogether the power plant under construction. The Osiraq reactor was devastated and a French technician working on the site was killed. The reactor may have been liquidated, but Hussein's determination to develop nuclear weapons capacity certainly was not. It was reinforced, together with the foundations for a major international crisis a few years later.

Back on the conventional war front, in July Israel intensified its attacks in Southern Lebanon and when, in response to those attacks the PLO began shelling northern Israel, the IDF extended its attacks beyond the PLO field positions in that region to its headquarters in Beirut as well.

The war briefly escalated in spite of American efforts to contain it. Then, in a direct spin-off reaction to the signing of the Camp David Accord, Sadat was assassinated while reviewing a military parade in Cairo on October 6, the anniversary of the outbreak of the Yom Kippur war in 1973. The bishop of Public Affairs for the Coptic Orthodox Church, who was among those with the president, was also killed in the attack. In December Israel followed its annexation of East Jerusalem with the annexation of the Golan Heights, justified by the fact of Syria's missile bases sited further west.. Bitterness towards Israel among the Arab countries over each of these issues naturally increased, but the government had to contend with internal opposition and violence as well, when, in accordance with its agreement with Egypt, it moved to implement the final phase of its one territorial concession to date, the withdrawal from Sinai.

The war of words between the PLO and Israel gradually aggravated the tension along the border until, in April 1982, coincidental with the IDF's forced removal of Jewish settlers from Sinai, Israel massed troops along the border with Lebanon in preparation for an invasion. The opportunity to invade came on June 3 when a Palestinian shot and wounded the Israeli ambassador to Britain as he left a function in London. The campaign began on the 4th with major air strikes against PLO positions and, after the PLO responded with more shelling into northern Israel, the military invasion by several thousand troops began on the 6th. After three days it had achieved its stated aim of clearing the PLO artillery positions from southern Lebanon but, instead of stopping, it pushed on towards Beirut. Syria was drawn directly into the war on the 7th, the advance Israel forces reached the outskirts of Beirut on the 8th and began pounding hell out of the PLO headquarters. An American cease fire proposal was agreed to on June 11th, after Israel had ignored a UN Security Council resolution calling for it to halt the invasion on the 6th. Then, at the end of June, 1982, Reagan, unhappy with the performance of his pro-Israeli secretary of state, Alexander Haig, replaced him with a person well connected with the Arab world, George Shultz. It appears that Haig had to take the blame for Israel's rejection of the Security Council resolution and for its advance to Beirut. The American proposal called for Israel to withdraw; for UN Peace Keeping forces to occupy the critical wedge along Israel-Lebanon border; and for the PLO to leave Beirut with their protection guaranteed by the United States. The United States was also to guarantee the security of the people in the refugee camps.. But the front was not quiet for very long. The city of Beirut was under siege through most of July and August, and on August 11, without cabinet approval, Defence Minister Sharon ordered the IDF to totally clear the PLO from Beirut. Devastating air attacks were made against refugee camps as well as PLO headquarters, with very heavy civilian casualties. The last of the PLO forces were repatriated under the cease fire plan by road to Syria.

REAGAN'S VOLTE FACE: REACHING FOR THE SKY

At that point, on September 1, Reagan took two broad linked initiatives. The first was to announce solid support for Israel; to place the blame for the crisis on the Palestinians; and to pursue his unique solution which was to write them out of the immediate scenario of conflict with Israel altogether. He guaranteed safe passage for all PLO forces right out of the theatre of war - at the expense of the United States. It was his variation on Carter's Camp David theme of a bought peace. The second initiative was to announce the Star Wars program.

The PLO's very successful diplomatic campaign for support and recognition around the world had strengthened its hand very considerably and, in doing so, made it much more likely that there would be strong support for, and from, the Arab countries in the event that push again came to shove between the Palestinians and Israel. Israel had so far come through four wars in quick succession - 1948, 1956, 1967 and 1973 - more or less unscathed, but there was a growing feeling within the country that this might not be the case again if support for the Palestinians continued to rise, and some of the Arabs were already showing increased frustration and becoming much more belligerent since the signing of its peace treaty with Egypt. Israel was increasingly aware of its isolation and that its only defensive shield was the United States. If that shield happened to 'walk' Israel would have no hope. The PLO had to be written out of the plot and the security umbrella, or shield, had to be strengthened.

At the beginning of June, when the invasion was launched, Reagan and the Security Council told the Israelis that they had to stop and withdraw to the border. At the end of June he sacked his secretary of state for being too sympathetic to Israel. But now he was speaking as if he was the world's staunchest Zionist and always had been. Reagan, or his advisers, must have come under intense diplomatic and political pressure to make them realize the parlous situation which the United States was in and to make a change of stance of such magnitude. When he broadcast to the nation on September 1, Reagan told America that he was proud that the US Marine contingent had helped in the successful evacuation of the PLO from Beirut which had been completed that day and that "Our young men should be out of Lebanon within two weeks." He said that over the previous two weeks US diplomats had traveled through Middle East capitals "to map out an American peace initiative for the long-suffering peoples of the Middle East, "Arab and Israeli alike," and he was determined to seize that moment because "In the words of scripture, the time had come to 'follow after the things which make for peace'."

"Our involvement in the search for Mid-East peace is not a matter of preference," he said, "it is a moral imperative. The strategic importance of the region to the United States is well known. But our policy is motivated by more than strategic interests. We also have an irreversible commitment to the survival and territorial integrity of friendly states. Nor can we ignore the fact that the well-being of much of the world's economy is tied to stability in the strife-torn Middle East. Finally, our traditional humanitarian concerns dictate a continuing effort to peacefully resolve conflicts." He was being very reassuring. He told the world, in effect, that Chile, Vietnam, Korea and even the extension of the Second World War to ensure that a couple of atomic bombs could be tested in real life-and-death situations were all a part of America's "continuing effort to peacefully resolve conflicts." A lot of people had not previously realized that!

He said that: “with respect to the Arab-Israeli conflict we have embraced the Camp David Framework as the way to proceed ... [and a little later] ... The evacuation of the PLO from Beirut is now complete. And we can now help the Lebanese to rebuild their war-torn country. ... The Lebanon War, tragic as it was, has left us with a new opportunity for peace in the Middle East. ... In the aftermath of the settlement in Lebanon we can now face an opportunity for a broader peace. ...[and]... the opportunities for peace do not begin and end in Lebanon.” He noted that the military losses of the PLO “have not diminished the yearning of the Palestinian people for a just solution of their claim.” [Emphasis added] Were they, perhaps, intended to? He also noted that: “while Israel’s military successes in Lebanon have demonstrated that its armed forces are second to none in the region, they alone cannot bring just and lasting peace to Israel and her neighbours.” He omitted to say that it was largely due to America’s largesse with military hardware that they were second to none in the region. He then noted that Israel’s legitimate security concerns had to be reconciled with the legitimate rights of the Palestinians. “The departure of the Palestinians from Beirut dramatizes more than ever the homelessness of the Palestinian people. Palestinians feel strongly that their cause is more than a question of refugees. I agree.” He unwittingly gave an excellent illustration of the parody of Der Judenstaat. The establishment of Israel had enabled the Jews to regain a national home as well as a national identity, but in doing so it had deprived the Palestinians of a national home, and forced them into a situation corresponding to the Diaspora while they retained a national identity.

Then Reagan exposed the lack of logic in the position which the United States had adopted and the fact that its aims were irreconcilable. He referred to the need for Israel to accept that the five-year transition period was to enable the transfer of authority from Israel “to the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza,” then said: “... it is clear to me that peace cannot be achieved by the formation of an independent Palestinian state in those territories. Nor is it achievable on the basis of Israeli sovereignty or permanent control over the West Bank and Gaza. So the United States will not support the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, and we will not support annexation or permanent control by Israel.” The firm view of the United States was “that self-government by the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza in association with Jordan offers the best chance for a durable, just and lasting peace.”

Jerusalem must remain undivided, he said, with its final status decided through negotiations. But everything else that he said revolved around the key element of his plan: continuing American support for Israel.

*I have personally followed and supported Israel’s heroic struggle for survival ever since the founding of the state 34 years ago ... the bulk of Israel’s population lived within artillery range of hostile Arab armies ... [prior to 1967, and] ... I am not about to ask Israel to live that way again ... America’s commitment to the security of Israel is ironclad. And I might add, so is mine.*²²

The State of Israel is an accomplished fact; it deserves unchallenged legitimacy within the community of nations ... [and it] ... has a right to exist in peace behind secure and defensible borders. ... [and I call on the Arab States to recognize this right and] ... to accept the reality of Israel and the reality that peace and justice are to be gained only through hard, fair, direct negotiation.²³ ... [Emphasis added.]

The dreadful truth had hit home. The United States did not have on-site or nearby forces to guarantee that security, even with its powerful navy, air force and the ability to transport ground forces in great numbers very quickly. Those existing capacities were geared for intervention, offensive action and invasion. They were not geared for defence from within an existing perimeter: especially one as small as Israel's. Massive new capacity was required which would enable accurate intervention as if from within a defensive perimeter. The Star Wars concept of orbiting satellites, constantly available, which could direct and deliver controlled and substantial destructive force against any form of offensive action, whether missiles, other airborne equipment or ground forces was required. But, naturally, there was no mention of any of any of this in Reagan's address to the nation on September 1. He could not say "we do not yet have this capacity: we will now set about developing it." Such an exercise would take years and a frightening amount of money. The Arabs would be incited to strike while they had the opportunity.

Reagan's program therefore had to be presented separately and sold as an extension of America's defence against the Soviet Union. That would fit comfortably into his existing pattern of anti-Communist rhetoric and the Western world would be easily convinced that it was justified. Quite clearly the Soviet Union was already trying to lead the world along a down-sizing program. It had taken a number of such initiatives, and to announce a program of this nature, now, could set back the program of détente and lead to another round of arms escalation. In fact it did just that (chapter 30), but to do nothing, thereby leaving the United States exposed to such a critical situation in the Middle East, was not an option. The risk had to be taken. If a few astute American observers realized what the situation was, they would be sufficiently astute not to draw attention to it. The facade had to be kept intact. Reagan was taking a leaf out of Chamberlain's book. (Chapters 20-21) He launched the largest peacetime military buildup in United States history and budgeted in 1993 for the design and construction of a US Strategic Defence System, Star Wars, which undermined his capacity for arms-control negotiations with the Soviet Union which he then had to approach "with reluctance and extreme caution." The domestic result, when it was coupled with promised tax cuts, was massive budget deficits and the doubling of the national debt between 1981 and 1986.²⁴ Reagan knew no more about the nature of the trouble in the triangle than any of his colleagues or other leaders in the amorphous Christian gel and the world was therefore condemned to heightened tension and undermined relationships until such time that they woke up to it. However the need for further changes in strategy in the Middle East to secure the interests of both Israel and the United States was not satisfied simply by the promise of further high-tech defence initiatives. There were the questions of ensuring permanent disengagement by removing the PLO from the cycle of action, and satisfying the demands of the Arabs as well.

However Reagan was to be sorely disappointed. The interests of Israel and the United States were poles apart. They were both using each other when it suited them and Israel was in the much stronger position. The government knew - and the US administration also knew - that while Israel could, if it achieved a political consensus to negotiate, dump its umbrella and go its own way, the United States could not dump Israel. Whether Reagan thought his diplomats had reached an understanding with Israel in advance of his broadcast there was certainly none in place. The Likud-led government was firmly committed to the eventual imposition of Israeli sovereignty over both the West Bank and Gaza and it issued a communique the day after the president's broadcast, saying "the Government of Israel has resolved that on the basis of these [American] positions it will not enter into any negotiations with any party." It noted that in spite of Reagan's declared opposition to a Palestinian state based on Gaza and the West Bank "there would be nothing to prevent King Hussein from inviting his new found friend, Yasir Arafat, to come to Nablus and hand rule over to him, [and] it is inconceivable that Israel will ever agree to such an 'arrangement' whose consequences are inevitable."²⁵ It announced a further acceleration in its settlement plans to put more than one million Jews in the West Bank and Gaza in new towns and cities over a period of thirty years, and three days later it allocated $18.5 million for three new settlements and approved plans for another seven.²⁶

Then on September 9, still only eight days after Reagan's broadcast to America, the leaders of the Arab world, meeting at their Twelfth Summit meeting, in Fez, Morocco, issued a final statement which showed that they did not care much for what they had heard either. They wanted greater United States involvement in the processes of peace negotiations; they wanted to show that the gap between them and Israel was bridgeable; and that they were prepared to recognize Israel within the boundaries of 1967; but rather than discuss the Reagan plan directly, they issued an alternative proposal of their own.²⁷ They "greeted the steadfastness of the Palestine revolutionary forces, the Lebanese and Palestinian peoples and the Syrian Arab Armed Forces and declared [their] support for the Palestinian people in their struggle for the retrieval of their established national rights," and they adopted a series of principles on which a settlement must be based. They were:

*Israel's withdrawal from all Arab territories occupied in 1967, including Arab Jerusalem; the removal of settlements established since then; guarantees of the freedom of worship and the performance of religious rites at all holy places; the right of Palestinians to self-determination and the exercise of their inalienable national rights under the leadership of the PLO, their sole legitimate representative, and compensation for those who do not wish to return; UN supervision of Gaza and the West Bank during a transitional period of not more than a few months; the creation of an independent Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital; and Security Council guarantees for the implementation of these principles and the peace of all states in the region.*²⁸

Diplomats and governments were still digesting the likely consequences of the conflicting approaches taken by Reagan, the Israeli Government and the Arab Summit Conference when, in mid-September, whatever remained of interfaith goodwill in Lebanon was torn to shreds by the Phalange Party, an organization dedicated to the principle of Maronite Christian primacy in Lebanon. It carried out a massacre of Palestinian men, women and children in the adjacent refugee camps of Sabra and Shatilla on the outskirts of Beirut. The massacre was only possible through the permissive collaboration of the IDF who were actually responsible for guarding the camps, but the murder in cold blood of not less than 700 people shocked even the battle hardened Israeli officers and troops. Some witnesses contended that the number of people slaughtered was between 1,500 and 2,000, but whatever the number, that operation made even Deir Yassin (chapter 27) seem like a pallid imitation of genocide.²⁹ The Phalange was suddenly an international pariah and Israel's standing, for being associated with the action, took a battering.

However, while that massacre was in progress, and with the support of the Arab Summit leaders, Arafat and Hussein were holding discussions about the Reagan plan in the hope that it might lead to an acceptable level of autonomy and that it would be a lot better than total rejection of any change, and creeping annexation by Israel. By November they agreed to sponsor a confederation of two equal states, and by January 1983, they had agreed in principle to form a joint negotiating team for talks with Israel.³⁰ But in February Reagan pressed Hussein to revert to his original proposal and again dangled the carrots of military assistance and other specific project inducements if Hussein would dump the PLO and take part in reactivated autonomy talks. This Hussein would not do without the agreement of both the PLO and the Arab League, and he knew that the more radical elements of the PLO would never endorse it.

Even the fact that Arafat was prepared to talk federation with Hussein was causing problems for him and Fatah was split by mutiny only a few months later and the radical factions declared open war against the moderates, led by Arafat. The conflict between the major religious communities in Lebanon had also erupted when the IDF eventually withdrew, and the country was in turmoil with two overlays of civil war and Syrian military involvement as well. By November the Fatah moderate wing, with Arafat, was hemmed down under siege in Northern Lebanon, and it was not relieved until Saudi Arabia intervened and negotiated a settlement under which the moderate wing, with about 4,000 troops, would leave Lebanon for re-settlement in new PLO camps in Tunisia, North Yemen, Iraq, Algeria and Sudan. That did not please Israel which would have preferred the Palestinians to continue pounding each other to pulp in Northern Lebanon, and the Israeli navy blockaded the coast to prevent the Greek ships which had been arranged by Saudi Arabia from taking the PLO passengers on board. It was not until the United States intervened that Israel agreed to lift the blockade and permit the embarkation of the Palestinians on December 21.³¹

The Israeli government had realized that the effect of spreading the PLO camps over several countries would be to strengthen support for the Palestinian cause more uniformly and more firmly through the Arab world. It was quite right. Immediately he was able to leave Lebanon,

Arafat visited Cairo and that visit proved to be the beginning of rapprochement between Egypt and Jordan which reestablished diplomatic relations in October 1984, and Egypt's isolation from the Arab League began to crumble. In addition Hussein reconvened the Jordanian parliament which had been suspended at the time of the crisis ten years earlier, and this enabled Palestinians to gain direct representation again. The next step, in February 1985, was a formal pact between Jordan and the PLO, and the Middle East was, indeed, moving into a period of relative calm - before another storm. Israel mounted a very long distance air attack on the PLO's headquarters in Tunis, 2,500 km distant, on October 1. Its pilots struck with precision, killing sixty persons, wounding many more, and damaging a number of buildings. The US government failed to condemn the raid, but many others made up for it. There were then a series of border incidents and killings in quick succession, but the situation led to a major international diplomatic crisis a week later. Four members of the Palestine National Front responded by hijacking the cruise liner Achille Lauro in Egyptian waters and demanding the release of a number of Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails. When their demands were not met they murdered one American tourist and maintained control of the liner for some time before surrendering to Egyptian officers on being promised safe passage to Tunis for trial there. However US planes intercepted the Egypt Air plane and forced it to land at a NATO base in Sicily where the four were arrested. Further negotiations were deferred for a time, and demonstrators in Cairo called for the abrogation of the Camp David Accords.³²

The Iran-Iraq War was still in progress, although Saddam Hussein had proposed an armistice in 1982, and withdrawn Iraq's forces from the territory they had occupied. Because Iran had rejected the peace overture there was something approaching a deadly stalemate along the border which flared from time to time and Iran sought to disrupt shipping in the Gulf, launching attacks on Kuwait in 1983 and 1986. On that second occasion Kuwait appealed to both the United States and the Soviet Union to intervene, and for a time the United States authorized it to fly the US flag on its ships, implying that there would be a direct response if one was attacked.

The situation was incredibly complicated because every major party to the series of Middle East crises, but especially Israel and the United States, was trying to manipulate Jordan, Lebanon, the Palestinians and Kuwait to suit their own ends. In February 1986 King Hussein, frustrated by Arafat's ambiguity regarding the PLO's recognition of Israel and the renunciation of terrorism, which in turn confirmed Israeli intransigence, repudiated the Amman agreement with Arafat and broke off negotiations with the PLO. He did not try to expel the PLO as he had done once before, even though he was embarrassed by an increase in guerrilla violence in the West Bank, but he did order the closure of the PLO offices in Amman a few weeks later, in March. In a complete turnaround in the Jordanian policy that had been followed since the Arab summit in Rabat (1974), he declared that he would now be responsible for the economic welfare of the West Bank Palestinians and that the West Bank would be included in the new five-year plan for Jordan to be announced in August, 1986. The king also approved an increase in the number of Palestinian seats (to about half) in an enlarged National Assembly. His aim was to establish a Jordanian-Palestinian-Israeli administration so that the West Bank would not be dependent on the PLO and so that he could reach a settlement with Israel in which he would regain at least partial sovereignty of the area.

AN OPPORTUNITY LOST: IDF VIOLENCE, THE INTIFADA AND HAMAS

By April 1987 Hussein and Israel's foreign minister, Shimon Peres, agreed to a UN-sponsored conference involving all parties to the conflict to seek a comprehensive peace. The Palestinian representatives would be part of a Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. That proposal was endorsed by Reagan, but the Israeli prime minister Shamir wanted a conference with only Jordan. He resisted American pressure for a more comprehensive peace conference and relentlessly pursued a policy aimed at isolating and demeaning the PLO.

Of course the UN Security Council had other things on its mind, too, and on July 20, it unanimously passed Resolution 598, urging Iraq and Iran to accept a cease-fire, to withdraw their forces to internationally recognized boundaries, and to settle their frontier disputes by negotiations held under the auspices of the United Nations. Iraq agreed to abide by the terms of the resolution if Iran would also do so. Iran, however, neither accepted nor rejected the resolution but demanded amendments condemning Iraq as the aggressor in the war and calling on all foreign navies to leave the gulf. When military operations in the gulf promptly resumed Iraq recaptured the Fao peninsula and the districts of Salamcha and Majnun, and it was soon clear that Iran's military position in the gulf was becoming untenable.

Israel had lapsed into an almost relaxed confidence about its relations with Jordan and tended to play down the strength of the Palestinians for a couple of years, but that was shattered by an incident on December 8, 1987, at the northern checkpoint between Gaza and Israel. An IDF tank transport crashed into a row of cars and vans bringing workers home. Four men were killed and seven injured. Many people who witnessed the incident did not believe it was an accident. They believed it was a deliberate act of slaughter, and the funeral for the victims brought a spontaneous outburst against the IDF.

However it proved to be more than just another incident in a history of inter-communal violence. It released a mass of suppressed or latent hatred towards the IDF, it resulted in two years of open rebellion which became known as the intifada and changed the landscape permanently, and it greatly aggravated the religious dimension of the Palestinian saga. The initial spontaneous reactions led to the establishment in January, 1988, of an Islamic Resistance Movement, Hamas, which was soon adopted by the Muslim Brotherhood as its military wing and the resistance to Israeli occupation took on a militant religious character instead of a more diffuse ethnic character. Hamas dedicated itself to the destruction of Israel and the establishment of an Islamic Palestinian state. This raised further divisions because the Palestinian National Charter provided for a multi-religious community; the PLO's membership and the National Council included both Muslims and Christians, and there had never been any move for an Islamic State.

The Muslim Brotherhood as it had operated in Palestine and Israel was a wing of the wider pan-Arab Muslim Brotherhood Movement. It had been founded and was led by Islamic activists; it had established a network of charities, clinics, and schools in Gaza, and it was active in many mosques; but its activities in the West Bank were generally limited to the universities. To that time its activities in the occupied territories had been generally nonviolent, but a number of small groups began to agitate for a jihad, or holy war, against Israel when the December 8 incident triggered the intifada. As a result, the new body, Hamas (meaning 'zeal' in Arabic) quickly acquired a broad following when it issued its charter which maintained that Palestine is an Islamic homeland that can never be surrendered to non-Muslims, and that waging jihad to liberate Palestine is the duty of Palestinians. The intifada took a number of different forms: boycotts of Israeli goods, attacks against Israeli civilians and settlers, demonstrations to show public support for Palestinian nationhood, and rock throwing by youths against Israeli soldiers. Israel's reaction was one of armed suppression of the revolt, including the use of rigorous tactics by the Israeli military, whose severity was condemned not only by the Palestinians but also by many Israelis.

The spontaneous uprisings which followed each successive incident in which the IDF were involved gave way to organized and systematic terrorist attacks. King Hussein quickly realized that the uprising was directed in part against his rule as well as against the Israelis. His immediate response was to support the intifada publicly and to offer aid to families of victims of Israeli reprisals in an effort to deflect hostility to his regime. But the intifada leaders (known as the Unified Command) renounced the king's overtures. The intifada brought Jordanian and Israeli plans for an economic path to peace to a halt. Hussein canceled the five-year plan for the West Bank, and, with liberalization on his mind, he did not wait for the Israeli government to make concessions to the force of the intifada. He announced on July 31, that Jordan was renouncing its official claims to the West Bank and East Jerusalem, and this provided an opportunity for the PLO to stake its claims again. Arafat quickly assumed the role of spokesman for the revolt. An important factor in the sustained unrest was a steady increase in unemployment among the Palestinians. However neither Israel or the United States were sufficiently disturbed by the intifada to think it necessary to soften their policies or make concessions to the Palestinians. And while Israel's Labour and Likud parties were deadlocked on peace proposals and many other issues, they agreed that the intifada must be suppressed before changes could take place in the status of the occupied territories. The overall effect was therefore a general hardening of attitudes on all sides, which the IDF displayed with even more heavy handed repression, and to which the Arab world reacted with greater sympathy for the Palestinians and determination that after so many years the problem finally had to be confronted.

About the same time, Iranian leaders, fearing an internal uprising in the face of looming military defeat, impressed on Khomeini the importance of accepting the UN cease-fire in order to save the new Islamic regime from collapse. Iran then formally declared its acceptance of Resolution 598 on August 20, 1988. When its foreign minister met his Iraqi counterpart for the first time in Geneva soon after, (and again later in 1989), there was no immediate progress on how Resolution 598 was to be implemented. Iraq demanded the full exchange of prisoners as the first step, while Iran insisted that withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Iran should precede the exchange of prisoners. It was not until almost two years later that both Iraq and Iran finally agreed to settle their differences on the basis of the earlier, 1975, agreement and to carry out the terms of UN Resolution 598. However, immediately after the cease-fire, Saddam Hussein began a program of reconstruction, concentrating on the areas that had suffered most during the war, and he promised to liberalize the regime. At the same time Arafat was being advised, or pressured, by the head of the Arab Studies Society in Jerusalem, Faycal Husayni, to make a declaration of Independence based on the partition plan which the United Nations had adopted. The "Husayni Document" was a comprehensive blueprint for the establishment of a state with the PLO Executive Committee constituting its government at the time of formation.³³ The combined effects of these developments placed Israel under a lot more pressure to make concessions to the Palestinians because it faced a much more unified Arab world, but instead of talking concessions it made the repression of the intifada even tougher, and leaned on the United States for more support.

Saddam Hussein of Iraq, a strong supporter of the Palestinian cause, was a key leader who thought it was time for coordinated action. In a number of public statements he made it clear that it was time for Israel to take the consequences of its policies and, soon after the intifada erupted, he directed that work was to begin on construction of a nuclear reactor - for strictly peaceful production of energy, of course! That was the situation in August 1988 when the deteriorating state of Iran's economy, coupled with an upsurge in fighting which saw Iraq make some gains, had led Iran to accept a UN mediated cease fire which it had previously resisted.

Within weeks, Arafat, visiting European capitals, issued repeated calls for a peace conference which would include both Israel and the PLO in determining a two-state settlement based on UN Resolution 242 and subsequent resolutions. In the absence of any positive response from Israel, Arafat met with King Hussein and Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak in late October at Aqaba, on the eve of elections in Israel, and they agreed to work together to find a solution. An immediate outcome was that on November 15, the PLO National Council voted to declare the establishment of "a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital;" then it followed that with an equally dramatic move a week later when it voted overwhelmingly to accept UN Resolutions 242 and 338, calling for Israel to evacuate the occupied territories and for all countries in the region "to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries." Reference to Resolution 242 and the use of the expression "to evacuate the occupied territories" clearly implied that some of its territory was not "occupied" but legitimate, and that the PNC was acknowledging Israel's right to exist.

However, because of the powerful influence of Hamas in the Palestinian coalition and the vigour of its opposition to the presence of Israel, Arafat was reluctant to put that into direct words. When he declined to do so the United States - contrary to established practice - denied him a visa to make a trip to the UN.³⁴ However, more than one can play constitutional antics, and in a sharp rebuff to both the United States and Israel, the UN resolved to adjourn its meeting and to reconvene in Geneva to enable Arafat to address members. At first he again avoided being explicit until he faced a news conference the following day, when he both recognized Israel's right to exist, and renounced terrorism as well. Secretary of State Schultz immediately announced that the United States would conduct "open dialogue" with the PLO. In contrast, the Israeli government, caught in a cabinet crisis, could not respond, but it was surrounded by a sea of Hamas supporters who were eager for it to be known what they thought of Arafat's announcement: conflict between the PLO and Hamas soon followed and the armed wing of Hamas, the 'Izz al-Din al-Qassam Forces, began a campaign of terrorism against Israel. Soon afterwards, the next regular meeting of the PNC confirmed the intention of a declaration of independence and called for Israel to evacuate its forces from all occupied territories, and within two weeks some fifty five UN member states had recognized the Palestinian State. They included the Soviet Union, China, India, Greece, Yugoslavia, Sri Lanka, Malta and Zambia. The United States could no longer say that it was only the former colonial states of Africa which were supporting the Palestinian cause, and by mid-November it had to agree to substantive discussions with the PLO.

In January 1989, consistent with his promise to liberalize Iraq's Constitution, Saddam Hussein announced that a committee had been appointed to draft a new constitution that would establish a multiparty system as well as freedom of the press. Then to enhance Iraq's position in the Arab world, Saddam Hussein began to negotiate a set of bilateral agreements with his neighbours. He concluded nonaggression pacts with Saudi Arabia and Bahrain, and he established the Arab Cooperation Council with Jordan, Egypt, and North Yemen to promote economic and cultural development. He had again developed close ties with every country in the circle around Israel except its northern neighbours, Lebanon and Syria, and he began lobbying for closer cooperation in the vital area of Palestinian rights. About the same time, Shamir proposed that elections be held in the occupied territories to select delegations which would negotiate arrangements for self-government during an interim period. While Bush gave it "cautious support" the Palestinians wanted nothing to do with it because they already had the body they wanted: the PLO. The Likud liked it even less: it may have meant making significant concessions and that, they had no intention of doing. The party imposed conditions which they knew would be totally unacceptable.

Saddam Hussein's call also received some very valuable support from an unexpected quarter. A group of prominent Israeli academics, attorneys, journalists and Knesset members were so concerned at their government's brutal suppression of Palestinian human rights that they formed B'Tselem, an organization dedicated to educating the Israeli public and policy makers about human rights violations in the occupied territories and combating the "phenomenon of denial prevalent among the Israeli public [in order to] help create a human rights culture in Israel" and to change Israeli policy in the occupied territories to ensure that the government "protects the human rights of residents there and complies with its obligations under international law." Its members had a tough and risky job in front of them, but their efforts earned the organization almost immediate recognition and, later in the year, the Carter-Menil Award for Human Rights.³⁵

Then in late July, in an effort to break the diplomatic stalemate, Mubarak presented a fresh ten-point plan which required Israel to accept the results of an election overseen by international observers; that all Israeli troops be withdrawn from balloting areas during the election which would be conducted with complete freedom of speech; East Jerusalem Palestinians would be included in the ballot; further Israeli settlements were to be frozen; Israel was to accept the principle of trading land for peace; and a date would be set for the start of final status talks. The Mubarak plan received a mixed reception from the Israelis, but the Palestinians, while they appreciated his efforts to help, objected that there was no automatic role for the PLO. They need not have worried. On October 6, all six Likud ministers in the inner cabinet voted against the plan, and it was dead.

AN INTERLUDE IN THE DESERT

A little to the east, in the Gulf region, working on the basis that Iran had not yet signed a peace agreement as the basis for a lasting settlement in the Gulf, Iraq continued to purchase weapons. But Israel, which had destroyed the Ozirak nuclear reactor eight years earlier and had reason to think that Iraq might be preparing to retaliate, and the United States which had been helping Saddam Hussein in the war with Iran, now found his want for arms, especially chemical and biological weapons, “a matter of concern.” It had not been of concern when he was helping to sedate one of their declared enemies, or when he had used them to clear one of the disputed regions to the north where Iran, Iraq and Turkey abut - Kurdistan - but consistent with the ‘selective’ representation of foreign affairs which we have noted so often, when he had served his purpose, criticism began to build up in the Western press, attributed to ‘informed government sources’ about Iraq’s record in human rights and the country’s acquisition of sensitive technology. No mention of Israel, or the Palestinian question. They were not entitled to ‘human rights.’ That growing barrage of planted reports prompted Hussein to make highly inflammatory speeches about the hostile Western attitude. He did not hesitate to mention Israel by name. He warned that if Israel ever again attacked Iraq (as it had attacked and destroyed Iraq’s nuclear plant in 1981 and assassinated its director of nuclear research), he would retaliate with chemical weapons.

Hussein’s cards were all on the table, but the United States was playing another concealed hand. It had no idea what the trouble in the triangle was all about: no more idea than Britain when it had been master of the Middle East. It only knew that it was in a highly vulnerable position and that it did not have forces in the region which could be used in Israel’s defence. It only had its arsenal of offensive equipment. There was a real war of nerves in progress. The United States knew, as did Israel, that Iraq had canvassed the idea that the time was ripe for a concerted Arab coalition push against Israel to force it to negotiate a settlement of the Palestinian question. But they all knew that if push came to shove and a war broke out - or was mounted quite deliberately - they could not rely on Soviet support either with the supply of arms or with political support sufficient to dissuade the United States from intervening. The Soviet Union was in fact in complete disarray. It had negotiated a series of agreements with the United States; some on disarmament and some on trade and further discussions were continuing towards the establishment of a complete market economy. Earlier in the year Lithuania had withdrawn from the Union; each of Poland, Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria had renewed diplomatic relations with Israel, and the newly appointed Czechoslovak ambassadors to the Soviet Union and the United States were both Jews.³⁶ The Soviet Union had not only lost all of its leverage over the United States, it had become beholden to it virtually to the point of dependence.

Together with the Soviet Union, the Israeli government was also in disarray. When the Mubarak plan lapsed the United States offered an alternative and told the Israeli government that it had to be more flexible in its attitude. Likud rejected the American plan. Labor wanted to accept it. Cabinet split, and on March 15 the Knesset voted by 60 to 55 to dissolve the government. Some of the small religious parties voted against Likud even though they were opposed to the plan, because they saw the opportunity to appoint an even more hard-line government. They were right.³⁷ In contrast, the Arab states had recovered much of their cohesion with their progressive rapprochement with Egypt, to such an extent that in March 1990, the Arab League had moved its headquarters back to Cairo from Tunis where it had been for eleven years. But they were not confident that, in the prevailing circumstances, the United States would restrict its activities to organizing a system of arms re-supply for Israel if they went to war with Israel. They did not believe the time was appropriate for a push against Israel. In addition, both the United States and Britain were in a very belligerent mood after Iraqi agents had been foiled in an attempt to ship unspecified nuclear devices or components to Iraq, and they were both experts in the game of divide-and-rule. The Palestinians were becoming very discouraged. All that the intifada seemed to have brought was further repression, not concessions.

However Saddam Hussein was in no mood to wait. He was annoyed that the Arab states had, broadly, been cowed into submission. He was also annoyed that Israel's oil supplies were being drawn from the Gulf States under US protection; he accused Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates of depressing oil prices by allowing excessive production; and he warned them to cut production or face intervention. He cleared the decks for such "intervention" by ensuring that Iran would not take advantage of such a distraction. Talks resumed between Iran and Iraq towards a formal peace treaty. He then had reason to believe that by marching into Kuwait he could cut oil supplies to Israel; enforce a small cut in production and thus push the price up a touch; and that by demonstrating Iraq's determination to solve the Palestinian question he would bolster the confidence of the other Arab states and have his coalition in place for swift action against Israel. Iraq's southern army was already in place at the head of the Gulf, having been there during the long drawn out hostilities with Iran, so they barely had to move to be in position to close the pipelines from the Gulf through Jordan to Israel and the Mediterranean, or to rattle their sabres at Kuwait.

At that point Saddam Hussein made his big strategic blunder. If he had done nothing and just waited, Israel would have come under gradually increased pressure over its oppression of the Palestinians and, even with no backing from the Soviet Union, the Arab states may have achieved their aim with or without an invasion of Israel. If he had ignored the other Arab states and attacked Israel directly, by air initially, with the expectation that a joint land invasion would develop, the United States would have been in the position which its strategists feared. It had no ground forces available in the region to defend Israel. If either it or Israel had joined battle with Iraq either by aerial bombardment or ground invasion from the Gulf, public reaction in the front line Arab states would have forced their governments to come to Iraq's aid. They did not have to join the battle. They simply had to close the pipelines. The United States could not possibly have invaded every country at once, and even if it tried, it could not have achieved control of the oil fields quickly enough to prevent them being put out of action, and the international ramifications would have been horrendous. The United States would have been forced to negotiate a settlement of the Palestinian question, either with a very widespread embargo in place or under threat of one. But the domestic political consequences of deserting Israel - of "doing a Britain" and throwing away the umbrella - would have thrown the United States into turmoil. It still did not understand the trouble in the triangle, but it understood very well indeed the consequences if it could not prevent that particular war.

AN ERROR OF STRATEGY

But the United States was in luck. On Aug. 2, 1990, Iraqi forces marched into Kuwait. Saddam Hussein had converted himself from an ally against a common enemy into a demonic monster in one simple move. He had invaded an innocent Arab neighbour! Israel could be kept out of the equation. The situation could be isolated from the ongoing crisis in relations in the Middle East. There need be no discussion of interfaith relations. This was a one-off isolated incident in which a tyrannical dictator had to be brought to heel: or eliminated. No one need even be told that the turmoil of the previous few years in Iraq, and the circumstances in which Saddam Hussein had come to power at the head of the Revolutionary Command Council, were the product of long running Western interference and resource exploitation. Neither did they need to know that the draft of a revised and liberalized constitution which had been prepared in 1989 had already been scrutinized by the RCC and the National Assembly, and that it was about to be submitted to a public plebiscite.³⁸ No one need know that, and the present constitution would certainly continue in operation at least for the duration of any pending action.

Hussein could be shown to be the tyrant at the heart of the Middle East crisis; he could be represented as the new Hitler and there could be a sympathy spin-off which could only do Israel a bit of good, even though it had to be kept out of the discussion, and Hussein's motives could be shown to be sheer greed for a neighbouring country's oil and territory, or imperial expansion to rule the Arab world. If he could be kept in Kuwait for a while without doing any damage - and he was most unlikely to go voluntarily - and if the other Arab countries could be persuaded that he was a danger to them, it would provide the opportunity to mount a coalition against him; to push him back; and for the United States to be seen to be the hero. But the real prize was the fact that the United States had been handed the opportunity to place very large ground and air forces into the region to protect its twin strategic vital interests - its grip on the region's oil supplies and Israel's security. Once they were placed there, they would stay there. Permanent Bases. Not short term regional war requirements. Further crises involving Israel and its relations with its neighbours were bound to arise but they could not get out of hand if the United States already had forces on the ground, especially in a country which might otherwise be belligerent. Or could they? It might be necessary to take steps to "neutralize" one or two countries by other methods.

However, overall, Hussein's action had reversed completely the situation in which the United States had found itself as a consequence of its decisions and actions in the 1950s, 1970 and 1973. It could now manoeuvre itself into complete control of the region without the need for a sky full of Star Wars hardware, and it need never admit what the motive behind the Star Wars program had been. The planned development of the program had been justified, for public consumption, by the need for enhanced protection against Soviet Communism, and now the program could be quietly dropped on the grounds that the Soviet Communist threat was no more, that it would relieve the American voters of a big budget and tax item, and that a sympathetic government was responding to the widespread American perception that it was security over-kill. The Palestinian question had effectively been defused because none of the other Arab countries would be at all keen to press the Palestinian cause while the United States was hovering so close at hand. In addition there would be sufficient local tensions arising from time to time which could be exploited so that the recovery of strong regional cohesion within the Arab world, bringing with it the possibility of a serious political threat, could be avoided.

In a nutshell, Hussein's ill-advised intervention had very possibly destroyed his chances of leading a future push against Israel; and enabled United States forces to go into the Middle East in sufficient strength to "protect" all of the vital oil fields and Israel at the same time. To establish a case was going to be easy.

On the same day that the UN Security Council passed Resolution 660, condemning the invasion and demanding Iraq's unconditional withdrawal, it also called on Iraq and Kuwait to begin immediate negotiations, and the United States froze all Iraqi assets. The high pressure lobbying began immediately to persuade Kuwait's neighbours, and especially Saudi Arabia, that they were in dire straits because Saddam Hussein was not going to stop at Kuwait: according to the Americans he wanted the whole of the Arabian Peninsula. Bush told the world on August 5 that the Iraqi invasion "would not stand" and that only its complete withdrawal was acceptable. Next day the Security Council passed another resolution, 661, imposing economic sanctions against Iraq. That was not a new experience for the Iraqis: Britain had done it back in the 50s, and the United States had done it in 1973 at the time of the oil embargo.

AN OPPORTUNITY GRASPED

On August 7, having “received” an invitation from Saudi Arabia in circumstances which caused serious tension within its government, Bush ordered combat aircraft and troops to “protect” Saudi Arabia. Turkey, America’s NATO and CENTO ally, closed the pipelines from Iraq. Next day Iraq proclaimed the annexation of Kuwait, but, as expected, the UN Security Council declared the annexation void.

As Hussein showed no sign that he was prepared to withdraw from Kuwait, US President George Bush and various allies, considering Iraq’s action a threat to Western interests, decided that the status quo ante must be reestablished. American troops began arriving in Saudi Arabia on August 9, the same day that the Security Council declared Iraq’s annexation of Kuwait void. Saddam Hussein agreed to withdraw from Kuwait provided that Israel also agreed to withdraw from the West Bank, and if Syria withdrew from Lebanon. The Syrian withdrawal was a possibility once Israel withdrew from the West Bank and the Palestinian question was thus resolved. No such luck. No one really expected Israel to withdraw from the West Bank and so the United States piled on the propaganda that Iraq was trying to involve Israel in the crisis. Israel’s imposed presence was the crisis. The double standards were palpable. Israel was occupying sections of three countries - Egypt, Jordan and Syria - plus territory allocated for the establishment of a fourth: Palestine. But because it was able to blackmail the United States, it could not be forced by international pressure to quit. On the other hand Iraq was occupying one country but it was doing it in such a matter that it had the potential to redraw the political map of the Middle East and, in doing so, to critically undermine the position of the United States. It had to be crushed, not just made to quit the area it occupied.

The Arab League met in emergency session next day, August 10, to consider a United States request to endorse the presence of its troops in Saudi Arabia and to provide units to join a multinational force against Iraq.

On the other hand, by agreeing to all of Iran’s demands in their peace settlement negotiations on the 16th, Iraq ensured its big non-Arab neighbour’s non-intervention. About 6,500 British and American nationals were rounded up and held as prisoners of war the same day, but four days later, Bush, referring to them as “hostages,” demanded that the Americans be released. Nevertheless, the figures do not tell the complete story. In several countries which endorsed the request, the governments faced unrest from the majority of their ordinary people whose sympathy lay with the Palestinians and Iraq, and who believed that blatant foreign interference was driving the process. They had good reason for their belief. A few days after the Security Council authorised the imposition of a total economic embargo against Iraq, August 25, the US Congress was asked to “forgive” or waive Egypt’s $7 billion military debt to the United States. That would seem to be a very high price to pay to ensure Egypt’s endorsement and token involvement. And after a meeting in Helsinki, Bush and Gorbachev jointly warned Iraq to leave Kuwait, and then announced US assistance for the Soviet Union to change to a market economy over 18 months.

However there was another complication. Once Iraq quit Kuwait and agreed to mind its own business, there would be no justification for the United States to remain in the Middle East, except pure self-interest, and that would not be a good enough reason for the Arab countries to say: "Please stay, we love having you." Basically the dominant presence of a foreign power was not welcome, but especially the one which was propping up Israel. The United States would be asked to leave, quickly, so that the countries of the region could get on with their own living, trading and social organization. The United States would have to find a reason to justify staying. If there was not one, then it would have to engineer one. It was not about to go voluntarily. And in the new circumstances the countries of the region and their allies definitely had the means of forcing the United States to go home. They did not have to fire a shot. Trade sanctions would do it very nicely. But once the United States was gone, it would be back to square one. Israel had to make peace through a settlement of the Palestinian question. If it did not, there would be war. Then what would the United States do? It still did not have its Star Wars hardware. So it would have to come back in force, or apply pressure on Israel to accept an appropriate settlement. But the position had not changed. Take away the umbrella and the political stability of the United States would be torn to shreds. The spiral, or the vortex, of the trouble in the triangle was getting tighter and tighter.

THE WRONG CHOICE OF SOLUTION

The only apparent solution was for the United States to be able to maintain the peace. But if it could not satisfy the aspirations of the people of the region - all of the people - the situation would develop in such a way that the friction caused by its unwelcome presence became a key factor in the dismantling of its pseudo-colonial power, or its system of economic imperialism. It had chosen to go down exactly the same course as Britain: to take advantage of the people of the Covenant at the seat of their faith for no reason other than economic and political power. There was no sense in which Britain or the United States were correcting an historical abuse of the Covenant of Sinai by the Jewish community in the manner which applied when Nebuchadrezzar destroyed the city in 597 BCE, (Ezekiel chapters 20, 22, 26). Pompey had done it for Rome in 64 BCE (Chapter 1). The popes had tried it many times between 1095 and 1464 (chapter 8). Britain had tried it in 1917 (chapter 16). And finally the United States tried it in 1948 (chapters 27, 28). Its politicians should have read their history a little more carefully first.

In fact there was an alternative solution. Dismantle the triangle. But the United States did not understand the triangle. Its self-understanding was that it was the divinely ordained world policeman, a bit like a political Vatican, with the role of directing world political and economic affairs and with the opportunity that went with the role, of taking advantage of the world and its resources as a successor to all of Europe's "old" or "failed" Christian pace-setters. Its political understanding of the three Abrahamic faiths when it assumed its role of world policeman was no better than Britain's at its peak. They were simply tools to be manipulated to advantage, playing one off against the others at will. But, like Britain, by its own decisions and actions it had now lost the capacity to manipulate one of them. The interesting question was: “How will it try to do it?”

On August 28, Iraq declared that Kuwait had become the 19th province of Iraq. A 28-member coalition, including several Middle Eastern states and led by the United States, mobilized sufficient military and political support to enforce the Security Council’s sanctions, including the use of force. However it took a great deal of diplomatic footwork to get that alliance in place, and in spite of all the American bluster about the crisis having nothing to do with Israel, Saddam Hussein made it clear that it was, and Bush was forced to acknowledge this. On September 23, Hussein threatened to attack oil installations in Saudi Arabia and the other Gulf States - and Israel - if the West tried to “strangle” the people of Iraq. Then Bush told the United Nations General Assembly on October 1, that after the Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait steps could be taken “for all the states and the peoples of the region to settle the conflicts that divide the Arabs from Israel.” He ought to have said “... to settle all the conflicts related to the trouble in the triangle,” because the situation was becoming unbelievably complex. Only days earlier, the Syrian-backed Christian Lebanese President had ordered the predominantly Muslim Lebanese Army to blockade the competing army of the pro-Israeli Christian General Aoun, who operated a competing administration in an adjacent enclave, in a bid to seize power. Then, in October, Syria took advantage of the turmoil caused by Iraq’s occupation of Kuwait to “accept” an invitation from the president (which was a bit like Saudi Arabia’s ‘invitation’ to the United States) to help eliminate Aoun. The consequences of the divide-and-rule religion-based constitution which France had imposed on Lebanon to ensure continuity of Christian domination were bursting out everywhere.

During the weeks since Saudi Arabia’s “invitation” Bush had rapidly boosted the number of US ground troops in Saudi Arabia. During August-September 240,000 troops were deployed; 100,000 followed in October, and at the beginning of November he ordered an additional 150,000 to lift the total to 490,000. Responding to that build-up, the National Council of Churches of Christ in the USA, which had published its remarkable astute assessment of the situation ten years earlier, passed a resolution calling for the immediate withdrawal of US troops from the Persian Gulf, and criticized Bush for “reckless rhetoric” and “imprudent behaviour,” and a precipitous military buildup. It linked the Persian Gulf crisis to the Israeli-Palestinian issue, accused the US administration of double standards, and called for an international conference to resolve the crises.⁴¹ It was a bold and very responsible initiative which did not win very many friends in the US where people were much happier when they heard their president tell their troops, during a visit to the Gulf, that they were doing God’s work.

THE HAND OF OPPRESSION PEOPLE WILL REMEMBER

By the end of November the Bush administration was satisfied that it had enough firepower and troops on the ground to “roll” Iraq’s forces before them like a carpet - if they were not all left dead on the side of the roads. On November 29 the compliant Security Council, with Yemen reluctantly acquiescing, authorized the use of force against Iraq unless it withdrew from Kuwait by Jan. 15, 1991. By that date the multinational coalition forces had risen to a strength of 700,000 troops, including 77 per cent or 540,000 US personnel and small numbers of British, French, Egyptians, Saudis and Syrians, plus token representation from the other five Arab League members. Hussein steadfastly refused to withdraw his 300,000 troops from Kuwait, which he maintained would remain a province of Iraq. When he was still defiant on January 15, the US command ordered the most intense bombing blitz in history to begin next morning. It was determined to show that Star Wars or no Star Wars the United States was master in everyone's backyard. It was a clear warning that if anyone else wanted a military confrontation in the Middle East over the question of Israel it could expect the same treatment. Iraq was to be the example extraordinary. It was not an exercise in recovery of territory. It was an exercise in total humiliation. Over the next few weeks, this sustained aerial bombardment, which had been named Operation Desert Storm, destroyed Iraq's air defenses before attacking its communications networks, government buildings, weapons plants, oil refineries, and bridges and roads. By mid-February the US shifted its air attacks to Iraq's forward ground forces in Kuwait and southern Iraq, destroying their fortifications and tanks. Then Operation Desert Sabre, a massive ground offensive, was launched on February 24, and by February 27 most of Iraq's elite Republican Guard units had been decimated. Bush declared a cease-fire for February 28. Iraq was swept by US activated uprisings against the government of Saddam Hussein, who managed to survive.

Kuwait's independence was restored, but the UN-sanctioned trade embargo on Iraq remained in force and a UN special commission was set up to oversee the destruction of Iraq's medium-range missiles and its chemical and nuclear weapons research facilities. There are no official figures for the Iraqi military operation. Estimates of the number of Iraqi troops in the Kuwait theatre range from 180,000 to 630,000, and estimates of Iraqi military deaths range from 8,000 to 100,000.⁴²

The United States at large seems totally oblivious to the blood bank of hatred which it generated during that exercise. Nine years later it wears its self-understanding on its sleeve as it still refuses to lift sanctions on humanitarian grounds, confident that by such an awesome demonstration of power it has eliminated any threat to Israel and therefore to its own stability through a domestic political backlash. It has confirmed repeatedly that it has no intention of withdrawing its forces. It is determined to rewrite history: to be the first imperial exploiter to grab Jerusalem and hang on to it. On April 10, 2000, a spokesperson for Defense Secretary William S. Cohen said reports that troop levels at Prince Sultan Air Base would be reduced were "complete hogwash." Spokesman Ken Bacon said: "We have no plans to reduce the number of airmen or planes at Prince Sultan Air Base," and Prince Sultan "expressed a strong desire for a continued US presence in Saudi Arabia at current levels."⁴³

In August 1996 the former Defense Secretary, William J. Perry, told the American Bar Association:

America is the world's sole remaining superpower. Our economic and political philosophy is ascendant worldwide. Our culture is the world's most influential, and the very openness of our society makes us a relatively easy target for those who do not like these facts or who disagree with what we stand for.⁴⁴

In a statement to the US Senate Arms Services Committee a month earlier he had said:

The gulf is the world's energy storehouse, home to two-thirds of the globe's proven oil reserves. At the same time, it is a volatile region. It is the reason we fought Desert Storm and the reason we sent forces to deter Saddam's [Hussein] threatened aggression in October 1994.

Our nation has vital interests in the Middle East and the Gulf. ... [A terrorist attack] ... does not change this reality. We cannot withdraw, for doing so would reward terrorists and endanger our nation. We must remain engaged in the region, take responsible action to ensure the safety of our servicemen and women abroad, and focus on accomplishing our mission.

During the five years since Desert Storm, we have maintained an increased military presence ... Yet even then we knew that the mission we are conducting in Saudi Arabia, so vital to us, is opposed by others. Certainly it is opposed by Iraq and Iran, since our forces in the region deter them from actions they might otherwise take. And our very presence in Saudi Arabia is opposed by some religious extremists in that country, some of whom are willing to use violent measures to drive us out.⁴⁵[Emphasis added.]

WAITING FOR THE NEXT MOVE: OSLO

So: back to Palestine. In spite of having actual police and army control over the territory claimed for the new state, after 1989 Israel was only able to suppress but not eliminate much of the disruption and some of the violence associated with the intifada, and it increasingly involved Palestinian violence against other rival Palestinian groups because of their unfulfilled expectations. Although the negative impact of the uprising on the economy was lessened, the measures needed to cope with the uprisings, combined with the budgetary cutbacks needed to reduce inflation, led to substantial unemployment among the Palestinians.

When Iraq invaded Kuwait in August 1990, the balance of power within the Middle East, already affected by the decline of the Soviet Union, was totally upset. The United States feared that the precarious coalition of countries that it had tied to it would fall apart if Israel aggravated the situation either by heavy handed tactics against the Palestinians or by provoking, or responding to provocation by Iraq. If it was going to isolate Iraq, the US had to be able to maintain the facade that the ultimate aim of Iraq's program was not to apply pressure on Israel, but territorial expansion. Israel responded very carefully and avoided direct involvement in the diplomatic manoeuvring. Hussein's policy at the outbreak of war was to try to break the unity and resolve of the US-led coalition. He decreed a holy war against the United States, called on all Muslims to unite against the Satanic enemy, and warned that in this "mother of all battles" the Americans would drown in “pools of their own blood.” He carried out his threat that if Iraq was attacked Soviet-made Scud surface-to-surface missiles would be launched at Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. Most fell harmlessly, none contained the poison gas warheads Hussein had threatened to use, and after the first days many were destroyed in flight by American Patriot antimissile missiles. If Israel had responded in the heavy handed manner which was its usual practice, the public reaction in several of the Arab countries would most likely have caused the US coalition to fall apart, with Syria and Egypt likely to have been the first countries to mount an attack on Israel.

Late in 1991, when a new round of peace talks was set in motion, negotiations seemed to be ending in deadlock. In the circumstances that was only to be expected, but soon after his Labour-dominated coalition won power in the summer of 1992, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin embarked on a personal mission to redraw the political map of the Middle East, strengthening the negotiating teams which met with Arab representatives from time to time. However the stalemate continued into 1993 despite the ongoing “peace process” talks that were launched in October 1991 in Madrid and later moved to Washington.

In the mean time the interfaith crisis in the cauldron of the Balkans was beginning to simmer again. A referendum on the question of independence in Bosnia in March 1992 was boycotted by the Serbian minority who then declared their own republic in April; the United Nations admitted Bosnia-Herzegovina as a member in May and applied sanctions against Serbia soon after. The program of ethnic cleansing in which both Croats and Bosnians were replaced by Serb settlers began in that region in July, and a proposal prepared by the Vance-Owen negotiators for ten provinces (three each for the Muslims, Croats and Serbs and one mixed) was published in October, as one of a number of peace plans in quick succession;

Then, by late February 1993, Rabin realized that no real progress was being made in Washington in discussions with the Syrians and the Palestinians. An agreement had nearly been reached with Jordan, but King Hussein was not prepared to settle with Israel until parallel agreements had been made with Syria and the Palestinians. Rabin and his Foreign Minister, Shimon Peres, therefore decided, together with a small number of trusted officials, that it was time to open secret backdoor negotiations with Arafat. Rabin reasoned that since decisions were being made by Arafat in Tunis and not by the Palestinian leaders in Jerusalem, it made more sense to deal with him directly, especially at a time when he was being written off by many of his former friends and supporters because his administration had been able to show very little progress towards statehood. The Israelis expected that in such a situation he would be more pliable and likely to make less demands.

With peace at stake, Rabin and Arafat both sought a credible third party, and contact was made with the Norwegian Foreign Minister Johan Jorgen Holst. Rabin delegated Peres to oversee the Israeli interests, and Arafat nominated one of his veteran political advisers, Mahmoud Abbas. Neither the US nor other members of the Israeli government were aware of the talks. The Palestinian, Arab, and Israeli delegations, deadlocked in negotiations in Washington, had no inkling either until rumours appeared in the Israeli and Palestinian media. For five months, from April to the end of August, Israeli and Arab politicians and diplomats continued talks in Washington while the Norwegian-hosted talks took place secretly in Oslo. The rumours led the pro-Iranian Hezbollah fundamentalists to launch rocket attacks, possibly with Syrian support, against northern Israel with the aim of derailing an Israeli-Palestinian agreement. Rabin ordered a fearsome retaliation in kind. Some 300,000 southern Lebanese were temporarily displaced and fled north before returning to their villages.

The Oslo talks were officially revealed in late August, and on September 13, in Washington, with President Clinton as host, Rabin and Arafat met and shook hands. Peres and Abbas signed the Declaration of Principles, which outlined the process and timing of self-rule for the Palestinians. By the end of October, detailed negotiations for the implementation of the Gaza-Jericho agreement and phased Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank were under way. Discussions for Palestinian autonomy, including the civilian takeover of municipal and policing functions, were held in Taba, Egypt. When the accords went into effect on October 13, Israel pledged to release more than 10,000 Palestinians still held in Israeli jails. Later that month Israel eased long-standing travel restrictions, allowing Palestinians in the occupied territories to enter Israel, Jerusalem in particular. In December the last 200 Palestinians exiled to Lebanon in 1992 were allowed to return. However tensions increased in the occupied territories following the signing of the September 13 accords, and three moderate Palestinians were assassinated. Riots followed in both the West Bank and Gaza Strip. On November 9, Rabin met with three leaders representing the settlers. He promised not to abandon them when Palestinian self-rule took effect.

The international response to the Israeli-Palestinian accords was dramatic and swift. The US pledged $2 billion; $400 million was promised by EC donors; and the World Bank vowed to raise $475 million annually for 10 years. However efforts to meet the December 13 deadline for implementing the accords were unsuccessful. Key issues included Israel's insistence on controlling the borders with Jordan and Egypt and the size of the Jericho area to be under Palestinian control. Talks continued, but progress was slow until the end of the year.

In March, 1994, Benymin Netanyahu, a vociferous opponent of the Israeli-Palestinian accords, took office as leader of Likud but in spite of that Israel began to reap the dividends of making peace with the PLO, although very little of the benefit was apparent to the Palestinians. The economy lifted as various economic boycotts were lifted: first by India, then China, and new relations were established with Indonesian President Suharto in Jakarta. That was a significant development because Indonesia has the largest Muslim population in the world. Negotiation began with important European-US multinationals and with several Arab Gulf states. In mid-November Peres announced that a peace agreement with Jordan was close to being initialed. At the opening of the 1993 UN General Assembly, for the first time since Israel became a member of the United Nations, no Arab delegation challenged its membership. It was the Christians of Yugoslavia who were about to be challenged instead. An international conference held in Istanbul in April, 1994, called for condemnation of Serbian aggression against its Muslim population.

On November 7, 1994, some 500 years after the expulsion of Jews from Spain by King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, Spain's King Juan Carlos and Queen Sophia visited Israel as part of a program of reconciliation, and on December 29 the Vatican and Israel announced that they would establish diplomatic relations. However Hamas opposed the peace accords. Israel had imprisoned its founder, Sheikh Ahmad Yasin, in 1991 and arrested hundreds of Hamas activists. It denounced the agreement and, with the Islamic Jihad group, subsequently intensified its terror campaign by using suicide bombers. The PLO and Israel responded with even harsher security and punitive measures, but Arafat sought to include Hamas in the political process by appointing Hamas members to some leadership positions in the Palestinian Authority.

The political temperature between Israel and the Palestinians has since soared as deadlines for successive stages of development have passed without results, and especially as Israel has continued establishing new villages on occupied land. When Arafat, reflecting the community frustration, threatened to declare an independent state without waiting for Israeli agreement it looked as if a critical situation might develop, but he came under a lot of pressure from foreign governments not to act, and the situation remained reasonably stable.

However a crisis soon erupted from a different quarter. When the Soviet Union ceased to exist in 1991, the new state, called the Russian Federation, set off on the road to democracy and a market economy without any clear conception of how to complete such a transformation in the world's largest country. Like most of the other former republics, it entered independence in a state of serious disorder and economic chaos, and it was for that reason that Iraq could not call for any political support when the United States wanted it out of Kuwait. The country emerged with formidable ethnic problems owing to the fact that it had formed an empire before 1917 and many of the autonomous ethnic regions that were part of the empire no longer wished to be under Russian hegemony. The Russian Orthodox church has reestablished itself as a force in the moral guidance of reborn Russia, but there are many other religions among the minority groups, particularly Islam, which are becoming strong again after decades of Soviet repression. There has been a decentralizing flow of power to the periphery of Russia that accelerated after the union's breakup. In the early 1990s it became clear that Russia would have difficulty ruling its numerous ethnic minorities as many of them sought to take advantage of the new political freedoms of the era. Tartarstan and Chechnya proved particularly difficult to accommodate. Moscow agreed to an advantageous treaty that gave Tartarstan considerable economic and political autonomy, but immediately after the 1991 elections Chechnya, under Premier Dudayev, preferring recognition as a Muslim state, and yearning to be an effective part of dār al-islām, declared its independence.⁴⁶

However Dudayev's aggressively nationalistic, anti-Russian policies soon began to undermine the republic's economy and, Russian observers claimed, transformed the region into a gangsters' paradise. In 1993 the Chechen parliament attempted to organize a referendum on public confidence in Dudayev on the grounds that he had failed to consolidate Chechnya's independence. He retaliated by dissolving parliament and other organs of power. Then, beginning in early summer 1994, About the time of the Istanbul conference on Serbia, armed Chechen opposition groups with Russian military and financial backing tried repeatedly, but without success, to depose Dudayev by force. In late November, Russian President Boris Yeltsin issued an ultimatum to Dudayev and the opposition to lay down their arms. Russian tanks and troops entered Chechnya to quell the rebellion in December but found the tough mountain people an even match.⁴⁷ Fierce fighting, most of it centred in Grozny, continued, for five years, until Russian forces, still under periodic heavy attack, secured the area. The people of the Muslim world community were divided over how to handle the crisis while it was a civil war, but once the Russians invaded it was a different matter. The international Muslim community rallied and vigorously supported the Chechnyan defenders. Large numbers of volunteers soon arrived from the countries of the Middle East and North Africa. From Russia's point of view, access to the large oil reserves of the region had been put at risk. From the United States point of view its dealings with the new free enterprise capital-hungry Russian Federation were far more important than the human rights of a Muslim community, and the US supported Russia in the conflict. That irritated Muslim communities in America, but there was little they could do except protest.

In the meantime, a new constitution for Bosnia-Herzegovina was introduced in 1995. Some 15,000 fighters from Saudi Arabia and Iran who went to the support of the embattled Bosnians but they were soon forced out by United States pressure. On October 14, Velika Srbija, the Greater Serbia Journal, Belgrade, published a lengthy statement by the Serb Deputy Prime Minister, Voislav Seselj setting out a blueprint for Cleansing Kosovo. It was very ominous indeed. Then the Dayton Peace Accord, to be enforced by 60,000 IFOR troops, was signed in December. In spite of Holbrooke-Milosevic talks in February, 1996, the program of oppression against the Muslims, who were always referred to as "Ethnic Albanians," backed up by propaganda in which some Orthodox clergy were involved, continued. In March a consortium of eleven Arab and nine European Union countries agreed to arm the Bosnian Federal Army to offset the power of the well-armed Serbian army, the fourth biggest in Europe, and a few weeks later mass graves of 8,000 Bosnian Muslims were discovered.

In view of the continuing turmoil in the adjacent regions of the Middle East and the Balkans, the United States was eager to strengthen its position with additional bases, and in April 1996, only a few months after entering into agreements with both the PLO and Egypt to support Palestinian demands for autonomy, Jordan agreed to permit the use of its bases for surveillance flights over Iraq. However Jordan's relations with Israel were severely strained in June because of an incident involving attacks on Jordanians, and a major incident on the Temple Mount on September 27, in which three Palestinians were killed by police gunfire and more than one hundred were wounded, strained relations to the point that Hussein threatened to withdraw from the peace process in October. However, subsequently, in December, he played a key role in negotiating Israel's withdrawal from Hebron and a month later Clinton agreed to upgrade the US-Jordan defence relationship, and approved a $300 million military aid package. Relations seemed to be on an even keel for a time, but in January 1997 Israel insisted on approving new Israeli settlements in East Jerusalem, then in March it reneged on a land transfer agreement and relations soured again. A series of suicide bomb attacks were carried out by Palestinians against Israel in July, and that became the justification for Israel to withhold a tax revenue payment from the Palestinian Authority. The situation could not be described as other than a state of mistrust from then until October 23, 1988, when the Wye River Accords were signed and Palestine was promised 40 per cent of the West Bank under an autonomy arrangement. But factions which wanted nothing less than independence and rejected the Wye River agreement caused another deferment six days later, with another suicide bomber attack. In spite of that Israel agreed in November to proceed with the hand over of ten small towns and 18 villages.

In continuing information manipulation much like that of the 1930s Chamberlain era, the US and its NATO allies were desperately trying to isolate each of the interfaith crises which were running in the region which covers the Balkans, the Caucasus and the Middle East to avoid the world at large recognizing the common threads running through them. From March 16-18, 1999, a summit meeting of Kosovo's religious leaders, the first ever, was convened by the US-based Interfaith Appeal of Conscience Foundation in an effort to find a solution to the crisis without the need for NATO intervention. Leaders of the Serbian Orthodox, Roman Catholic and Muslim communities and a representative of the WCC participated.

On March 24, acting on the basis that Yugoslavia had refused to sign the Rambouillet Agreement and that negotiations had therefore reached the end of the track, NATO began its bombing campaign. That was in spite of the fact that many observers believed that for Yugoslavia to sign it was tantamount to surrendering national sovereignty, and that there was still room for negotiation. The Russian Orthodox Church immediately expressed its support for Serbia and its sister Orthodox Church. The from May 26-26, with the war dragging on and masses of Muslims in Kosovo being converted into refugees, an Ecumenical Consultation was held in Budapest, Hungary, at which the Catholic Bishops' Conferences of Europe was also represented. In its report the WCC was again at pains to stress that it was not a religious war and, in line with virtually all Western media reporting, it used the expression "ethnic cleansing" to describe the slaughter and forced refugee marches, and its references to Christians reaching out to assist Muslim refugees seemed rather laboured.

A few days later, on May 31, the head of the Greek Orthodox Church condemned the NATO bombing and said the West thinks that civilization ends where the Orthodox Church begins. Then, on June 3: came the first signs of an admission from the Serbian Orthodox Church that it had actually supported the Serbian forces in the Bosnian war, but there was no reference to the war in Kosovo and, on the same day, Russian church officials repulsed moves by the Pope to arrange a visit to Russia. The, immediately after the NATO bombing stopped in June, the Serbian Church expressed concern that its holy sites in Kosovo were to be left 'unprotected' after the withdrawal. That meant, in effect, that they were in areas to be controlled by the Kosovo forces and may be subject to retaliation. In fact they were not, in spite of the fact that mosques of major significance had been razed by Serbian forces.

Subsequently, with the three crises running in parallel, progress on the question of Palestine has been a matter of fits and starts, with factions on both sides of the divide equally eager to undermine every new agreement. If a Palestinian group does not take action to undermine the present process in an attempt to steer it back to full independence, an Israeli group does, in an effort to prevent any hand-over at all. But in October 2000, with talks stalled between the PNC and Israel on a number of issues: the exact areas to be transferred to Palestinian control, access from one zone to another, the right of return and compensation for refugees, and the final status of the Old City of East Jerusalem, the Leader of the Israeli Opposition, Ariel Sharon, has lifted the crisis to new heights. There is fear of all out war between Israel and at least Lebanon and Syria, and possibly other states as well, after Sharon made a highly provocative visit to the Temple Mount on September 28, tightly guarded by an Israeli security cordon reported to be about 60 police. The right-wing Israeli opposition leader who may soon join the Israeli government in coalition, led a group of Israeli legislators onto the bitterly contested Temple Mount to assert Jewish claims to the area which is critical to both faith communities. Prior to 1967 it had been under Muslim administration for about 1,400 years. His visit, described as a “photo opportunity”, triggered a renewal of the intifada with devastating casualties among the Palestinian demonstrators which led the Security Council to urge that such brutal repression should not be used, and to a round of shuttle diplomacy by the UN Secretary General, Koffi Anan, and Clinton in a bid to prevent a slide to war.

The new millennium has hardly started – on the basis of Bede’s dating system, anyway – and Maimonides’ vision of the Messianic Age seems to be receding further and further in to the distance, and with a dynamically increasing world population many people despair of the way ahead. It certainly calls for clear-headed consideration and a special effort to ensure that no power in the Western world – the amorphous Christian gel – takes precipitate political, economic or military measures in the middle of the crisis in a bid to secure its position of privilege.

The United States has very few options. It is still tied firmly to all three competing parties in the crisis. More firmly than ever. It has forces in Saudi Arabia and in Jordan but it cannot deploy them against the Arab parties to the present crisis or all hell will let loose. The 1973-74 oil embargo will be made to look like a mere curtain-raiser. In fact all three interest groups which are dependent upon the insecurity of the United States to achieve their aims have got the tiger by its tail and will not let it go. Clinton is quite unable to force Israel to make concessions which will satisfy the Arabs only four weeks from an American Presidential election in which he is not a contestant, but in which his anointed successor, Al Gore, is vigorously waving his Christian banner, supported by a running mate who is equally blatantly waving his Jewish banner. They are ranged against the son of the man who, as president, told American troops in the Gulf War that they were doing God’s work in subjugating Saddam Hussein and Iraq. Similarly Clinton and his aides cannot suppress the demands of the Palestinians because the pressure cooker is now at such pressure that it will blow its top if he tries to use force, and it will almost certainly take with it all of the oil supplies in Arab and other Muslim controlled countries. His only option is to very promptly take steps to dismantle the trouble in the triangle, and in the circumstances that is not going to be a quick process. So to another chart.

THE CHALLENGE OF TOMORROW

Six generations ago, in 1850, the total world population was 1.2 billion. It is now 6 billion, and in another six generations, when it is leveling off to the expected long term plateau, there will probably be about 11 billion. We are little more than half way to that point. Even two generations ago, in 1950, the population was only 2.5 billion.

It is too easy to think of finding solutions to today's series of crises just for today. If we think and plan that way, we think and plan only in terms of preserving or improving on our present level of economic and social privilege, and that is not a basis from which we will leave future generations a legacy to be proud of. Sheer weight of numbers will ensure that the world's broken relationships are not repaired and the world will be left to blunder from one worsening crisis to another. The world was, relatively, a sleepy little hollow during the two thousand years that it took for the evolution of all of the world's major religions, and in particular the three parallel Abrahamic partner-faiths which now comprise the very troubled triangle. From the facts of history which we have traced it may not seem to have been very sleepy, but everything is relative. Even if we extend that period of development by another five hundred years, to take in the life and times of Maimonides whose contribution to our understanding of the triangle was of such importance, and take in the Crusades as well, it was still relatively sleepy, with only 360 million people scattered unevenly over our world. Humanity has learned a lot about how to be inhuman, and inhumane, since that time.

Planning, either for the present or the future, was not an issue our forebears thought they had to bother much about. We have got to do better. As we have seen, serious economic and social planning in the Western world only began during the years of the Great Depression, in the 1930s, and there was great resistance even then. And cooperation across community or international boundaries didn't bother them much either. Their most serious concern was to get ahead of the other fellow. To compete. To preferentially grab all of the available resources to protect their own bailiwick. And they did not do a very good job of reflecting their religious beliefs in the preparations they made for their successors to inherit the Messianic Age, either. They are both matters which we must give a lot more attention, and they are closely linked. They are the two issues above all others which will determine whether humanity can live in peace and harmony when the world approaches its population plateau or not.

Twenty five years ago the infant Group of 77, at only its third meeting of ministers, issued the Manila Declaration calling for the world's great powers to work together with the smaller powers through the United Nations to develop a New International Economic Order (NIEO) as had been promised at the peak of the 1973-74 oil crisis. The effects of the manipulation of the oil embargo were just beginning to wane after having devastated the economies of many struggling countries, and they were in urgent need of funds for basic requirements including food and shelter – quite apart from capital for infrastructure development or income generating projects. They enjoyed cooperation from some western countries, notably Australia and Canada, and from the Soviet Bloc, but they were excluded from virtually all trade and finance forums because of the policies of the great and powerful of the Western world, and they were simply expected to welcome every resource extractor who came knocking on their doors offering a minimum return for whatever lay below the surface of their ground. The declaration showed their frustration at getting a raw deal and implied that they were prepared to act together to force realistic trade and financial adjustments. There is, in reality, little that they could have done then, or can do now, except withhold their resources on a coordinated basis until it hurts.

The G77 statement noted the economic situation of the developing countries and the results achieved since the adoption of the International Development Strategy for the Second United Nations Development Decade which contrasted with the Declaration and Programme of Action adopted by the Non-Aligned Countries, and expressed “deep disappointment” that there had been very few concrete results and that “the developed countries have generally not implemented the policy measures and fulfilled the commitments undertaken [which were] designed to improve the situation of the developing countries,” especially the least developed and most seriously affected countries whose position had worsened during this period. It declared that international economic conditions – particularly world inflations, monetary disorders, recession in the highly industrialized regions, the appearance of new forms of economic discrimination and coercion, certain forms of action by trans-national corporations and the revival of protectionist trends in the developed countries – have seriously affected the economies of all developing countries:

It noted that some developing countries, the oil producers, had continued to make major efforts to provide other developing countries with financial and other assistance, including their food and energy, and deplored the unjust and discriminatory trade regulations and the obstacles which developed countries imposed on developing countries, especially in regard to access to modern technology. It stressed the urgent need to bring about radical changes in economic relations in order to establish new relations based on justice and equity, “principally through the exploitation and marketing of their natural resources and wealth.”

The G77 reaffirmed its conviction that “the implementation of a new international economic order is essential for the promotion of justice and the maintenance of peace and international co-existence, owing to the ever-increasing interdependence of nations and peoples;” and emphasized “the close solidarity of all the developing countries which has made it possible for them to evolve a unified position, as well as the importance of harmonizing positions which help to enhance the irreversible process they have created in international economic relations and to consolidate and strengthen their unity and solidarity through joint concerted action, thus laying the foundation for the new international economic order and for the adoption of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.”

A NEW ECONOMIC ORDER, BUT WHOSE VERSION?

The G77 also declared again that “international economic relations should be based on full respect for the principle of equality among States and non-intervention in internal affairs, on respect for different economic and social systems and on the right of each State to exercise full and permanent sovereignty over its natural resources and all its economic activities.”⁴⁸ Of course the group also threatened to use its coordinated muscle through withholding resource supplies, but it could have saved its breath. Its members were so dependent on the major Western powers in other respects that if they tried it, at that stage, they would have been more seriously affected, and there was no end to the divide and rule mechanisms which could be used against them. Nothing happened. Since then, as already noted, the capacity of the commodity groups which had already been established has been weakened and channelled through the World Trade Organization.

But in addition, in 1995 the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) began drafting highly restrictive proposals which were intended to be obligatory for any country trading internationally or accepting any foreign investment. The Multilateral Agreement on Investments, MAI, would have seriously undermined the sovereignty of the governments of small nations, making it virtually impossible for them to obtain redress for damages, losses or disability caused by the activities of a foreign investor. It would have required them to provide guarantees of certain services, to forfeit normal rights of control and intervention, and required them to grant a foreign investor the right to sue the government for any action which the investor deemed to have undermined its profits, and it would have been binding for twenty years. The preparation of the draft agreement was not disclosed to non-member governments until a very advanced stage of planning by the OECD group, representing only 29 countries, and it was only aborted due to sustained campaigns by major consumer protection groups and lobbying by developing countries. It was an incredible attempt by the major OECD trading nations to permanently subjugate small countries to the will of foreign investors and prevent future cooperation between resource producer countries. It would have aggravated the problem of capital flows from one country to another and the repatriation of disproportionate profits, and it would have exacerbated the crisis of economic and cultural globalization. The authorities and the countries which were involved in the proposal either totally disregarded the antagonism which it would have generated, together with industrial disputation and social dislocation in the countries affected, or, if they took it into account they must have assumed their ability to crush any such dissent. Hardly a basis for stability and harmony between nations as the world approaches that population plateau.

If the Western powers were serious about a review of the international economic order, about making room for mixed economies or any alternative to the existing system of investment and capital control, or the redistribution of wealth for infrastructure and services development, or about the sharing of technology and the enhancement of food production and industrial capacity with the aim of encouraging more uniform economic and social development they could have demonstrated it years ago. They have had the examples of OPEC's profit sharing programs, joint investment, alternative funding programs such as those offered by the Islamic banking system, plus, of course, the barter programs undertaken by the Soviet Bloc, China, Japan and a number of other countries. However every effort is made by the major powers to prevent the operation of such programs or to undermine and seek to have terminated those which already exist. And at the same time every effort is made to justify a continuation of the existing relationships, in relative terms. This is illustrated by the release of a World Bank report on economic growth research which purports to show that income for the poor rises on a one-to basis with overall growth using recognized funding procedures. Even if that is accepted at face value it ignores the consequences of gap-widening in overall growth. An abstract of the report read:

Income of the poor rises one-for-one with overall growth. This general relationship between income of the bottom fifth of the population and per capita GDP holds in a sample of 80 countries covering four decades. Although there is a fair amount of variation around this general relationship, a number of popular views about the poverty-growth relationship are not true. The effect of growth on income of the poor is no different in poor countries than in rich ones. Incomes of the poor do not fall more than proportionately during economic crises.

The poverty-growth relationship has not changed in recent years. We also show that policy-induced growth is as good for the poor as it is for the overall economy. Openness to foreign trade benefits the poor to the same extent that it benefits the whole economy. Good rule of law and fiscal discipline are other factors that benefit the poor to the same extent as the whole economy. Avoidance of high inflation in fact is “super-pro-poor”: that is, high inflation is more harmful to the income of the poor than to GDP overall. In contrast we find no evidence that formal democratic institutions or public spending on health and education have systematic effects on incomes of the poor. These findings leave plenty of room for further work, because they emphasize the fact that we know very little about what systematically causes changes in the distribution of income.⁴⁹

That report, which has the effect of further entrenching the existing economic order, was released only three months after the release of joint proposals for poverty relief, A Better World for All, by the OECD, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) with the endorsement of the UN General Secretary, which had drawn trenchant criticism from a consortium of 80 international Non-Government Organizations. They said “the document is presented as a new consensus between the United Nations, the OECD, the IMF and the World Bank, thereby reinforcing Northern perspectives and disempowering the South while undermining the concept of political inclusiveness that defines the UN.” It promotes an image of poor people living only in the South who will be grateful for assistance, as opposed to empowering people living in poverty to demand their rights, and social development can only be achieved in an enabling economic and political environment, and it proposes to eradicate poverty with more of the same medicine – despite the recent failure of these very same policies in East Asia.

Taking a positive approach, the NGOs called on UN Member States to analyze the root causes of poverty and gender inequality within the current macro-economic framework of globalization, to reverse the decline in development assistance, to set a target date of 2005 to meet the UN target of 0.7 per cent of national budgets, to pledge immediate and full debt cancellation for the poorest countries so that resources can be released for investment in social development, and to introduce a Currency Transfer Tax (CTT) to counter the instability of global capital transactions and to mobilize further resources for social development. They said that goals already set cannot be achieved if developing countries are marginalized in the decision-making process of international institutions, and that national efforts to eradicate poverty cannot succeed without “an international enabling environment.”⁵⁰ They were quite right, but they could have also said that if the major trading nations were serious about overcoming famine and serious food shortages, or about equity of trading, and about security of relationships – peace – they could adopt a preferential weighted resource trading scheme which would guarantee minimum basic supplies of essential food and raw materials for every country, while retaining the opportunity for competitive free trade in the remaining areas of commodity supplies. Such a scheme would operate within the framework of an internationally managed barter scheme, preferably the United Nations. It would require a moderately large organization to implement it, but that is hardly a problem. The World Trade Organization or the UN Development Program could be easily adapted to meet its requirements. The major consideration is that such a scheme would virtually eliminate the need for a World Food Aid Program, except in the worst of emergency situations; and it would narrow the gap progressively between the most privileged countries and the most disadvantaged ones referred to in the Manila Declaration. But: it would require the major trading nations to sacrifice a sliver of their trading privileges.

A proposal for one such initiative was drawn up by the author in 1975 and circulated on a restricted basis. It was sufficiently well received for the author to be invited to present it at the Fourth Assembly of the World Conference on Religion and Peace, in Nairobi, 1984. However, the threat to their country's position of privilege was of sufficient concern to certain participants that they threatened to withdraw if the proposal was referred by the commission which considered it to the plenary session. It was not referred. It is set out, in its untouched form, as an appendix at the end of this chapter.

LET'S LOOK AHEAD

Surely, in such circumstances it is vital that we think about the role or purpose of systematic religion because the attitude which religious communities take to that question greatly influences their ability to live in harmony with others and affects whether the world will ever be able to enjoy either Maimonides' expectation of a world living in harmony and in homage to God or the vision splendid of the Revelation and the New Jerusalem.

Relationships and conduct are the key considerations in religious development. Not liturgy and ritual. Not adherence to doctrine and dogma. The first relationship is that between God and humanity. The second is that between one human or community of humans and another human or community of humans. The third is the relationship between humanity and all other units of creation whether living organisms or inanimate substances – broadly speaking, resources. Broken relationships have brought us to the point at which the church's self-understanding must be dismantled if justice, harmony and world peace and stability are ever to be achieved.

Challenges to the church's theology and self-understanding have been building up ever since their evolving Christology led to Christians being ejected from the synagogue about two generations after Christ's ministry. The way in which the challenges have built up to the present time is the best demonstration that people can look for of the nature of divine intervention, guidance and judgment in the affairs of humanity. Why has this not become apparent before? Because the church's self-understanding has involved an obstinate refusal to recognize prophecy which was generated anywhere other than within the church and an equally obstinate determination to reject all challenges to that self-understanding. All that the church could generate was a din so oppressive and so repressive that it further undermined human capacity and inter-religious relations and strengthened its resistance in such a manner that to crack it required the cumulative weight of each of the progressive challenges. To understand how we have finally reached that point we must go back to Abraham or beyond and work forward.

We must examine the primary purpose or the role of systematic religion. Is it to achieve ‘personal salvation or redemption’, ‘communal salvation or redemption’ or ‘a system of ethics or conduct which will enable us to live together in peace’? I believe history shows us that the first is strictly a matter between each individual who each carry a “book” slung around their necks - no one can carry someone else’s for them - and God. I also believe that a person or a community is most unlikely to achieve, or to receive by the Grace of God, either the first or second without a deliberate effort to achieve the third. So to our two books of history summarized in the three charts on pages 1833, 1834 and 1835.

Several factors have to be noted.

First. Although it was the World Zionist Organization, as the precursor of the State of Israel, which actually transgressed against the people of Palestine and triggered the fulfilment of the Qur’anic prophecy of the Night Journey, it did so under enormous pressure from the church and the Western Christian powers. However it is now the people of Israel who sit there, totally unrepentant for the trauma caused by their continuing transgression, determined to retain the privileges which they sees as just, and due to it both as a measure of the Covenant of Sinai and in recompense for its history of subjugation.

The cause of that pressure was the church’s self-understanding and the policies which have been pursued as a consequence of it, which had, as already noted, precipitated Muhammad’s ministry, the establishment of Islam and the prophecy of the Night Journey which has now been fulfilled. Go back one step and they, in turn, are a consequence of the Trinitarian creeds which the church formulated and imposed on the world.

The church is therefore primarily responsible, together with the most influential nations of the Western Christian world, for the fact that the people of the two faiths are in bitter conflict in the most critical region in the world.

Second. Although the world expects the State of Israel and the world wide Jewish communities which support it to resolve the impasse by settling the territorial questions of Palestine and Jerusalem, it is the church and the countries of the Christian world which must acknowledge responsibility for the impasse and take the initiative to resolve it.

Third. When certain essential steps have been taken Maimonides’ vision will start to come into focus.

Step one is for the church to acknowledge that it was a major factor in the abuses of the colonial era and Europe’s anti-Semitism which led to the rise of Zionism and the crisis in the Middle East.

Step two is for the church to announce a series of acknowledgements:

1. that the ministry of the Prophet Muhammad and the establishment of Islam were the consequence of divine inspiration;

2. that there are continuing joint roles for Judaism, Christianity and Islam in achieving the reality of the Messianic Age as anticipated by Maimonides;
3. that all three faiths are parallel streams of Yahwism which came into separate existence because of errors in the formulation of the church's early theology and the consequences of its self-understanding;
4. that the Doctrine of the Trinity therefore is not and never has been valid; and
5. that it is prepared to reassess Messianic theology in collaboration with Jewish and Muslim scholars.

In addition the church must recognize that there are two - not one - covenants in place together with as special charge, or task. The first covenant clearly places corporate or community responsibility squarely on the shoulders of the Jewish community to perpetually guide humanity towards a clearer understanding of its relationship with God and that in doing so it has acted, and will continue to act, as a catalyst in whatever function God may require of it. The second covenant places personal responsibility on all people of the book - all three books - to respond in their personal conduct and in the way in which they exercise all of their rights and take advantage of all of their opportunities in accordance with the guidelines of the Gospel. That responsibility applies equally to Muslims as to Christians in view of the Qur'anic confirmation that Jesus is Messiah and that the Gospel was given to him so that all might live by it. It would be inconsistent with that Islamic teaching if the Gospel were to be relegated to a lesser status. Similarly it will apply equally to Jews when, in Maimonides' understanding the Messiah is recognized, and it takes its place alongside, and complements the Torah, which it was never intended to supersede.

Furthermore, both covenants involve a "penal clause" component as well as a promise and an obligation. The penal clause of the New Covenant has already been put into effect through the dismantling of the imperial colonial system which we have traced from chapter 20 onwards. It is now being invoked again, through the catalytic process of the crisis in the Middle East, for which Israel is the focal point, in the dismantling of the current system of economic imperialism which was "perfected" by the United States. The special task with which Islam was charged is to lead, all believers in the first and second stage expositions of the Book back to strict adherence to the worship of God as such.

Step three, concurrent with the second, is for the church to set about campaigning to redress the abuses which have been noted in step 1. This must involve initiating or supporting proposals for a New International Economic Order with the aim that reports of regional famines, perpetual poverty and mass refugee marches will in future be found only in history books. Three initiatives can be taken very promptly which do not even require the time to plan and implement the restructuring of global capital. They can each be put into effect promptly and without touching the structure of global capital. The first is the Tobin Tax on international currency transactions which was proposed in 1978 and which is widely supported by Third World countries and responsible CSOs and NGOs.⁵¹ The second is the introduction of a modified or needs-weighted resource trading scheme such as that set out in appendix A. The third is the cancellation of Third World debt which has been the subject of intense discussions for two or three years and to which the Western Powers have paid much lip service but nothing more. Those three measures would stabilize world currencies, which is exactly what currency manipulators do not want, ameliorate the effects of chronic capital instability, and facilitate equality of trade opportunities. They are all principles to which the Western powers say they subscribe, but which, when it pleases them, they simply ignore. With those three basic programs in place the world's leaders can then devote the energy required to restructure the global capital system - if the rest of the world can bring sufficient pressure to bear to force them.

This straightforward series of steps will totally reshape relations in the Middle East. First, they will reassure the world Jewish community that anti-Semitism is no longer an issue and they will therefore enable the State of Israel to resolve the territorial questions. Second, for the mainly Muslim Arab community they will offset a history of economic exploitation backed up by military might and end an era of anti-Western bitterness. With all three Abrahamic faiths then on the same wavelength humanity will be enabled to move towards Maimonides' vision of the Messianic Age.

But the whole process has got to be out in the open under the gaze of the whole world. The church cannot quietly engineer a subtle shift in emphasis by a few theologians working in a back room and hoping for the trickle down theory to work. Neither can it try restating the Doctrine of the Trinity in terms of modalism or different manifestations of God, even if such thinking has regained some currency in recent years under the influence of the trouble in the triangle. It was, after all, condemned as a heresy about 260 CE!

But what happens if the church declines to go along this path?

Well, this is where we come to the Book of Revelation. A careful reading of Revelation 21:9-14, 22:1-5 shows quite clearly that the achievement of the vision splendid requires the collaboration of Jews and Christians.

It appears to have been written about the time that Christology was taking on the forms which were progressively enshrined in doctrines, creeds and dogma and while the northern Hellenizing Christians were smarting from being expelled from the Synagogues. It gives us an appreciation of the vision splendid for humanity which is possible if Christians deliberately work in collaboration with Judaism and, by implication, Islam as parallel instruments of God's Will to achieve the relationships illustrated by the Law and the Gospel. But it also gives us an appreciation of the contrasting degradation of humanity which will result from broken relationships if we reject God's Will and continue on the divisive basis of the church's long-established self-understanding.

Every indication is that if the church and the amorphous Christian gel of the Western World continue along their present paths we shall very soon see the vision horrible triggered by the crises in the Middle East. If we allow that to happen interfaith relations will be dragged through the mud and the rest of the world will gang up on Christian countries which are currently intimately linked to the US-Israeli Alliance. The consequences of that scenario would obviously be dramatic. The church would become irrelevant and it would be left to the Jewish and Muslim communities to work their way towards a new Messianic understanding out of the rubble of the Middle East and the trauma that has been imposed on them. That new understanding would result from enlightened study of the Qur'an, the Hebrew Prophets, the Gospels and Maimonides' teaching, but not contemporary Christology.

However there is an alternative.

While the church may decline to act or be unable to act because of its self-generated inertia there is every possibility that the people of the State of Israel and their supporters world wide may not wish to experience the vision horrible. Certainly there are extremist religious groups pushing the nation to the edge of the precipice because of an understanding of the State of Israel which is just as erroneous as mainstream Christian self-understanding. They believe that the Covenant of Sinai is still in place, that their return to Israel is in accordance with God's promise, and that it is. They overlook the fact that the Covenant of Sinai is like any other covenant in the sense that it is a two-way contract: a promise from God and an obligation to God, and that it has a penal clause as well as an umbrella. (Chapter 6.) It has already been applied a few times - most recently in the 1940s - but there is no reason why it should not be applied again. A careful reading of Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Zechariah and Malachi should not leave any of us in any doubt about that. And the consistency between Zechariah and Revelation is remarkable. However there is reason to be optimistic that responsible Jewish leadership in the Diaspora, acknowledging the critical situation and the continuing role of The People Israel as the principal vehicle for revelation of the Divine Intention, will intervene before the crisis reaches the level of degradation of the vision horrible. Logic dictates that they will finalize and implement negotiations towards the territorial and citizenship agreements which are necessary, join with the Muslim World in pressing for action on a new world order, and pick up the question of Messianic theology in collaboration with Muslim scholars.

Immediately the world Jewish community collaborates in setting up a new world economic order the State of Israel will forfeit its special relationship with the United States, including the American military umbrella, because of the economic, social and political consequences of such a move for the Western Christian World and the United States in particular. However at that point the umbrella will no longer be required. It will have been made redundant by the steps already taken.

The world outside the triangle of Abrahamic faiths will benefit as new relationships are worked out within the triangle. The world at large will at last catch a glimpse of Maimonides' vision of the Messianic Age, or the vision splendid of the Book of Revelation. The relationship between Yahwism and the other major systems of ethics and religious belief which were inspired concurrently will then become apparent, as will the mechanism by which Divine Will has been revealed and implemented through the interlocking prophecies of Judaism and Islam.

If responsible leadership of the world wide Jewish community does not arise in this manner until the world is well down the path to the vision horrible the process must be much more traumatic, especially for the Western World, but the situation will still be retrievable and the process can be expected to follow broadly the same pattern.

Whether the church formally repudiates the Doctrine of the Trinity and initiates the reassessment of Messianic theology with Christian, Jewish and Muslim scholars working in collaboration, or whether it fails to do so and the world is forced to take the more traumatic path, all three partners in that triangle of Abrahamic faiths will ultimately reach a series of common understandings and points for action.

I anticipate that they will:

- acknowledge the Jewish community as the continuing primary instrument of God's will, living and working in a community covenant relationship through which the Messiah will enable all humanity to better understand its relationship to God;
- acknowledge Muhammad as a divinely inspired prophet whose role was to confirm that Jesus of Nazareth is the fulfilment of Old Testament prophecy and to call the people of The Book to acknowledge and to worship God, the Supreme Being whose authority is absolute;
- adopt a basic statement of faith along the lines of the Columbus Platform of Reform Judaism (chapter 20);
- adopt the Qur'anic understanding that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the ultimate exemplification of God's will, conceived in virgin birth by Divine intervention as a guide to all humanity (but not in the sense of a son and heir or earthly ruler) and risen in glory to confirm the absolute power and authority of God the Creator;
- recognize Gospel teaching as the norm for human conduct within a philosophical framework drawing on the accumulated experience and spirituality of all major world faiths whether they pre-date or post-date Hebrew Messianism;
- acknowledge that the establishment of the State of Israel is consistent with prophecies generated within all three Abrahamic faiths and in particular those of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Zechariah and their successors; Muhammad's vision of The Night Journey; and Maimonides' teaching on The Laws of Kings and Their Wars concerning the manner of the return of the people Israel to the state Israel; and the ongoing relationship between all three faiths as partners in a common stream.

These outcomes will not be a matter of syncretism or adaptation for convenience. There are many scholars and authorities within each of the three streams who are prepared to acknowledge that the beliefs which they each hold dear as absolutes of revealed truth are so contradictory that they cannot all be right, and these people are prepared – even eager – for the process to begin. But there are many others, often among those known as Extreme Orthodox or Fundamentalist, who are earnestly persuaded that their particular position is exclusively correct and who will oppose the process.

The process is therefore likely to be both slow and traumatic, but the present situation is so critical that it cannot be deferred. It is both vital and inevitable, and it will be a matter of real theological and spiritual growth for all three partners. The nature of the crises and the origins of the conflict within the triangle are such that world peace and stability cannot be attained until and unless the collaborative reassessment of messianic faith takes place. But as it proceeds:

- the State of Israel will assume a new significance in the understanding of people of all faiths;
- the City of Jerusalem will become the focal point of faith for all believers;
- the stone which the builders rejected will be seen in all His glory as the main cornerstone;
- the people of each of the three streams of Abrahamic faith will be seen to have acted on their divinely inspired obligations; and
- people of all faiths will be enabled to focus more clearly on their relationship with God, with their fellow human beings, with the totality of creation, and on the way forward towards a stable, harmonious future for humanity in the terms of Maimonides' understanding of the Messianic Age.

It is catastrophic that throughout the twentieth century CE the leaders of the church-universal made successive decisions and determined additional dogma and doctrine on the basis of previous erroneous decisions and that they firmly rejected the possibility that these may have been flawed. They acted as if their filtered information was absolute and total, and insisted that it was.

It is a damning indictment of the church that its conduct, based on its flawed theology, was the trigger for, first, the establishment of the triangle of Messianic faiths instead of a single stream of Yahwism; second, the generation of critical prophecies within its partner streams; and third, the fulfilment of the Night Journey and the partial fulfilment of Maimonides' vision. The willingness or unwillingness of the churches to acknowledge their errors, to reassess their self-understanding and to repudiate the Doctrine of the Trinity is now critical. The position which the churches adopt and the conduct of the Western Christian World will now determine whether phase three of Maimonides' vision – the Messianic Age – comes into view because of their readiness to reassess their theology, or through the agency of their partner faiths because of their unreadiness to act.

The coincidental fulfilment of the two critical prophecies demonstrates clearly the role of the Jewish community as the continuing primary instrument of God's Will. The trauma suffered by the European colonial powers in retribution for their oppressive colonial policies (by way of subversive activities, wars, rebellion, overthrow or economic decline) pales into insignificance compared with the severity of the scourging meted out to the Jewish community when it pursued a similar colonial policy in its transgression against the people of Palestine. Yahweh demands a higher standard of conduct from them than is expected from the rest of humanity as an indication of the Divine Intention for all humanity. This is fully consistent with the consequences of the covenant relationship which have been recorded throughout their history. It is also fully consistent with that relationship that they became the trigger for the dismantling of the European colonial era and that they are now pivotal to the unfolding of the Messianic Age. Their suffering was at the hands of the same church and the same Christian powers which first committed massive transgressions against them and the non-Christian world, then provoked them to transgress, left them to be scourged for their trouble, and finally propelled them back to Palestine.

In due course, as they act upon their covenant responsibility in the years ahead, their realization of the roles which they and the ‘messengers’ of the ‘King Messiah’ have played in bringing phase three of Maimonides’ vision of the Messianic Age into focus will lead to their affirmation of Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah. Yes. Maimonides was right on that one, too. As he indicated (The Laws of Kings and Their Wars, chapter 11 Halachah 4, and chapter 12 Halachah 1,2) the Messiah will be recognized once he has gathered the dispersed; compelled all Israel to walk in the way of the Torah; ensured Israel’s security, and peace is established in the world. His Messianic promise will have been fulfilled. Indeed there is a remarkable relationship between that contention of Maimonides and the words attributed to Jesus of Nazareth (Matthew 23:37-39 and Luke 13:35) that: “You shall not see me till the time comes when you say ‘Blessings on him who comes in the name of the Lord’.” Fulfillment of Messianic promise and recognition of Messianic status are inexorably linked. And in this sense Christians have to reflect carefully on whether to expect the physical return of Christ or whether the seeing, or the coming, are consistent with the recognition of him as Messiah. Does it really matter? Let’s not waste time arguing about it. Let’s get on with the task of living our theology and acting on our obligations under the New Covenant.

A glance at chart four makes it quite apparent that we must approach a solution to the present crisis on the basis that we are responsible for planning a long term future for humanity which has a lot of living to do, and not as if we were intent on securing and even more privileged position for ourselves. The words which Jesus used when he asked his disciples to share a cup in communion and in remembrance of him should be sufficient for us to realize that we are recognizing an additional covenant and not a replacement for Sinai. Basically they mean the same: respond responsibly to the Law and the Gospel and in homage to God - or take the consequences. The promise of salvation is subject to the book (of conduct) hanging around everyone’s neck in accord with the Night Journey.

Muhammad and Islam were given quite a specific task: to drag both Jews and Christians back onto the track. The Prophet’s early successors tried, and in due course ran out of steam. Now his later resurgent successors, since 1973, are having another go. And if we are in the middle of a period of Divine retribution or judgement for which the establishment of the State of Israel is the catalyst, then we should reflect in what way we ran off the track and for what conduct, recorded in the book around our corporate neck, we are being judged. We do not have to look very far. Seeing that the United States is the country most directly affected by the present situation we need only glance at the extent of its exploitation of other countries under its program of economic imperialism or neo-colonialism. Intimately associated with that has been its use of the CIA to subvert governments in many countries, some Third World, some Western, some democratic and some totalitarian. In Killing Hope, William Blum details 55 such interventions. I have drawn heavily on his work to illustrate only four or five instances. Similarly, in The Rationale for US Military Intervention After the Cold War, Naseer Aruri notes that: "During President Clinton's first term alone, the United States imposed new unilateral economic sanctions, or threatened legislative actions to do so, sixty times in 35 countries that, taken together, make up about 42 percent of the world population."⁵² How does one reconcile that with a policy of free trade and non-intervention in the domestic policies of other countries?

In a number of situations the United States has combined the techniques of direct military intervention, trade embargoes and electoral manipulation in one package. The Institute for Public Accuracy attributes to Marjorie Cohn, Associate professor at Thomas Jefferson School of Law in San Diego, the statement that : "For months before the September 24 election in Yugoslavia, the US and its NATO allies poured millions of dollars and technical support into the opposition movement. They also bankrolled pre-election polls which showed Kostunica leading Milosevic. Many people in Yugoslavia oppose Milosevic but they also despise NATO, which subjected them to a ruthless 11-week bombing campaign. Yugoslavia remains crippled by economic sanctions imposed by the West. The US interference has tainted the election.... They must be able to choose their own leadership, free from Western domination.... The long-term question is who will run Yugoslavia once Milosevic is ousted — Kostunica or NATO? Members of the opposition have been meeting in Bulgaria with representatives from the International Monetary Fund, World Bank and NATO."⁵³ One wonders how the cost of that exercise compared with funding and staffing Boris Yeltsin's election campaign.

The situation into which the United States has now blundered because of the policies it has pursued over many years which we have traced, and from which it cannot not extricate itself without substantial loss of status and authority - and significant impact on the rest of the amorphous Christian gel - is one matter, but it is more important to consider the way ahead. In chapter 6, I wrote:

The outcome of the transgressions and the failures of the dominant white Christian Western World – the amorphous Christian gel – coupled with the Jewish community's transgression in the terms of the Qur'anic Night Journey, was the establishment of the State of Israel in circumstances of great bitterness and trauma for both its neighbours and Israel. Now: through the antagonism generated against them by their transgression against the people of Palestine – which they were forced to make in self defence – they have acted, and will continue to act, as a catalyst or a 'lightning conductor' in a number of responses which flow from the continuing three-way confrontation between communities linked to Judaism, Islam and Christianity. That situation will continue until and unless the three streams of faith act together on their joint and individual obligation to lead humanity towards the Messianic Age. For that to happen there is a major precondition. To enable the three faiths to move forward in that way, the Christian church must rethink its self-understanding and its relationship with its two partners because that is the fundamental cause of the trouble in the triangle and the massive transgressions by the powers of the amorphous Christian gel. That requires the development of a common messianic understanding by the three faiths. And that, in turn, requires the church to repudiate the Doctrine of the Trinity on which its self-understanding has been built and because of which Muhammad was called to his prophetic ministry. Clearly that process and that end can only be achieved by scholars of the three faiths working together.

While that precondition is being met there are three results, or effects, which we can anticipate from the situation which the world has blundered into. First: ultimately and inevitably the confrontation between the three faiths must bring benefit to those peoples who have been exploited, either currently or previously, by the amorphous Christian gel which has been acting on the basis of Christian self-understanding. Second: and with equal inevitability, the confrontation must result in substantial loss of privilege or detriment – judgement and discipline if you like – for the amorphous Christian gel. The extent of the detriment or discipline will be determined by the resistance of either Christians or Jews, or both, to the negotiation of proper settlements for the transgressions in which they have both been involved. Third: both of those aspects of the situation will inevitably contribute towards a clearer understanding of the Messianic message and humanity's relationship with God. The State of Israel and the City of Jerusalem will be seen in quite a different light – a unique light – and will assume a unique status in human understanding. The entire process is being triggered through the interaction of prophesy which has been generated within all three partner faiths in the triangle: Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

These three points raise a host of questions. Why? Why? And why? We shall consider them after we have traced the history of the trouble in the triangle. But briefly, it is a matter of the consequences, or the effects, of continuing conflict within the triangle of Messianic faiths and the progressive loss of the capacity to exploit the rest of the world at its whim by the amorphous Christian gel. This can be either by the conscious decisions of Western leaders to relinquish the position of privilege which they have imposed and cling to by force, or, by the collapse of the system which they impose and dominate, brought about by concerted action with collaboration between those who have been exploited by the amorphous Christian gel in the process of achieving its privileged position.

That is the point we have reached.

As noted above, even though it now has land and air forces in Saudi Arabia and Jordan, the United States cannot use its military might to fight its way out of the crisis in the Middle East in October 2000 by going to the defence of Israel. If the Israeli government acts on its threat to strike at Lebanon and Syria unless the renewed intifada subsides, it must be assumed that several other Arab governments, under great pressure from their people, will declare war as well. The level of bitterness generated by the brutal oppression of the Palestinians is at a higher level than it has previously been, and the Palestinian authorities have appealed for Arab governments to help prevent the Holy City from falling totally under Israel's control. If that occurs it will not be a minor war. It could involve the use of nuclear weapons which Israel is known to possess. But even in that case the United States would be very unlikely to intervene. To do so would precipitate a resources embargo which could go well beyond petroleum. Appendix B indicates the relationships between the world's resource producers and consumers, and although it was prepared in 1975, and it is therefore not accurate in respect of current organizational memberships, it indicates the religious affiliations, political and trade relationships of each country. It is quite apparent that a series of embargoes or trade sanctions would have an enormous impact well beyond the United States. The United States and the European powers cannot afford that. There is most unlikely to be any real support for the United States in the circumstances, in view of the experience of other countries in 1973-74. (Chapter 30)

If the United States is not prepared to make political and trade concessions of the kind discussed above, then it is likely that the friends of Israel overseas, who do not want to see Israel embroiled in a major war without an "umbrella" will take matters into their own hands, in consultation with Israel. They would certainly counsel Israel to avoid precipitate action. The likely outcome would then be compromise territorial arrangements to satisfy the Palestinians, coupled with economic arrangements which, by offsetting the impact of Western exploitation over many years, would result in completely new relationships between the Third World and Israel. Israel would again be a catalyst in events of great significance: we would be edging a little closer to Maimonides' understanding of the Messianic Age. Any arrangements which the supporters of Israel in the Diaspora make will, naturally, involve very substantial transfer of capital from the amorphous Christian gel to the Third World in circumstances such that technology and trading strength will flow too. That means a significant drop in the economic status of the Western world concurrent with a rise in the status of the Third World. That means the progressive narrowing of the gap, with the countries of the Third World in a better position to control their own destinies. The ramifications are enormous.

But such a process would not automatically mean the dismantling of the trouble in the triangle. The processes of economic adjustment and theological reassessment must go in parallel. That being the case, who should initiate it and be invited to participate?

The preferred answer is a consortium of all of the peak church bodies, basically the Vatican, the World Council of Churches and the principal Orthodox Patriarchates, acting as the hosts to the peak bodies of World Jewry and the peak bodies of the dār al-islām, coordinated through the World Muslim League and the Islamic Conference. Is that achievable? In present circumstances the Vatican, having issued the document Dominus Jesus, and in doing so having snubbed other churches by re-confirming its self-understanding as the sole successor to Peter and therefore the chosen representative on earth of the Triune God; and having re-consecrated the world (or perhaps only the Catholic Church, depending on which reports one reads) to Mary the Mother of God, appears unlikely to want to grasp the nettle. In addition, its relations with the Russian Orthodox Church and a number of other organizations are currently under severe strain. The Jewish community of Italy has broken off dialogue because of the pope's decision to proceed with the beatification of Pope Pius IX; the Ecumenical Coalition of Hawaii has asked the pope to repeal the 500-year old decree under which Pope Alexander VI divided the New World between Portugal and Spain; and while the Vatican is insisting on the independence of East Timor as two enclaves of Catholicism in an ocean of Indonesian Islam, it rejects appeals for a Muslim state in the Philippines and a Catholic bishop has called for a ban on Muslim migration to Italy.

In the circumstances the World Council of Churches must be regarded as the logical host or initiator for a program of theological reassessment in collaboration with Jewish and Muslim authorities and scholars. It has restored its relations with the Orthodox Churches in the wake of the Yugoslavian crisis; moved to establish a very broadly based Global Christian Forum involving many churches not currently involved in the Council; and achieved a remarkably wide 'spread' of member churches on all continents. The pattern of its membership is set out in the end notes.⁵⁴

The range of concepts, doctrine and dogma which will automatically come under scrutiny is enormous, and a massive effort spanning quite some years will be required. The partner faiths, having agreed to take part in the reassessment will have a great deal of soul searching to do, with complete openness and honesty between them in considering the way in which traditions and beliefs have evolved. There is no doubt that the very idea will be threatening to many people of each faith. The foundation of their beliefs, their self-understanding and their relationships will seem to be at risk. But that is only a problem when people focus on the statement of belief or the act of worship rather than on the ultimate object of belief and worship: God.

I envisage a Council of people drawn from all three faiths determining a basic agenda and a method by which to proceed, probably through teams of scholars, again of all three faiths, gathered to plan their research on particular matters, exchanging discussion papers, meeting from time to time and then progressively pooling their work as the process continues. There is no dearth of scholars available. Each of the faiths have well staffed universities, training centres, and centres of retreat and worship dotted around the world. Concurrently with that process the work of congregations, mosques and synagogues must continue - and be expanded - with dialogue programs also expanded, but concentrating on local and regional reconciliation. Leave the deep research and debate to the scholars. But why not try worshipping together at times, and acknowledging each others special feast days? There will be a few stumbles from time to time. That's inevitable too, in a process which has got to cover as much ground as this. There is plenty of room for the several major interfaith bodies, such as WCRP, and the Council for a Parliament of the World's Religions each having a role in the ongoing program of dialogue. But I doubt they would want to be directly involved in the early stages of the consultation process. They will certainly be observers. Critical observers no doubt, to be drawn in as the process advances, but initially it is only the Christians, Muslims and Jews who can unravel the trouble in the triangle.

Certainly the church will never be the same once the process begins. But it will be much more effective as an instrument through which humanity can be enabled to understand its relationship with God, with their neighbours and with their environment. The Muslim community will have much the same concerns. If its people recognize the Gospel as the basis for personal conduct, what role will there be for Sharī'a? Are some of its cultural traditions which are regarded as basic to Islam necessarily so, anymore than some of the traditions of the church? In my view the faith group which will be least affected in terms of its belief base will be the Jewish community. They anticipate a Messiah. It is only a matter of recognition. But its big problem will be the question: "How do we relate to Jerusalem and how does Jerusalem relate to the two partner faiths – and to the world community which is to be served by the People of the Book? Is it too much to hope that the Dome of the Rock will remain, perpetually, the symbol of faith in Jerusalem and that in another generation we might be able to worship, all together, in a new temple on an appropriate site in Jerusalem to which the people of the world will have contributed?

Having said all that, let's talk logic for a moment.

The quantum shift in relationships between powers and faiths around the world which has been hovering around for a generation, since the Yom Kippur War and the oil embargo, and which is now becoming a reality, has occurred in the context of the trouble in the triangle. And that occurrence is consistent with the convergence of the prophecy of the Qur'anic Night Journey (chapter 6), Maimonides' inspired understanding of the circumstances in which the Jewish community would return to the land of their forefathers, and the Revelation of John (chapter 8). In the process, the Jewish community has been, and still is, a reluctant catalyst and that is consistent with its obligations under the continuing Covenant of Sinai. Could anyone among those who wear their Christianity as a badge of political correctness during election campaigns argue that this convergence does not fit their expectations of Divine intervention? If they were prepared to, they would probably say that there was a burning bush or a Pentecostal flame or two missing. Or perhaps they might be waiting for the roll of thunder which comes with an atomic blast-flash to imitate the circumstances of Sinai. After all, that is the power which their predecessors introduced to help them exercise the divine authority delegated to them as the new chief unit of the amorphous Christian gel in association with those who claimed to be the anointed successors of Peter and therefore the sole representative on earth of the Triune God.

Humanity, with its absolute discretion in decision making and freedom of action, and America with the level of conceit, arrogance, greed and determination to sit astride the human pile which is reflected in some of the statements already quoted, would not surrender its position of privilege without a big fight – unless its leaders realized that the result of a big fight would be more debilitating than no fight at all. If they decide that the risk involved is worth it, they may yet through caution to the winds and embark on that big fight. But all the circumstances which we have considered indicated that the consequences of such a fight would be an even greater shift in relationships. Israel's role as a reluctant catalyst is therefore amply illustrated. It is reluctant because, with its blinkers firmly in place, it saw the US umbrella as vital to its national welfare, and the difference between 'security' and oblivion. At first the umbrella was political and military, but the emphasis changed somewhat, as we have seen, with the US oil policy change in 1970. Having lost confidence in America's determination to stand by it after that policy change (when the US committed its own security to an ongoing stable relationship with the Arabs in return for more oil), the emphasis shifted to politics and military aid grants so that it had control of its own firepower. Now, with another shift in circumstances, we can anticipate that it will very quickly acknowledge – and the world will soon realize – that stable relationships, goodwill and the absence of oppressive domination are the basis of real security, not military hardware and star wars.

And what is security? As the world approaches the population saturation-plateau, arms will be increasingly pointless. We can forget about empires and super powers. They are approaching their 'use by' date. The needs of populations and the role of government is changing. What is "defence" all about? In the case of major powers it is a matter of sitting on, or expanding upon, a position of privilege. No more, no less. With the world approaching saturation the emphasis must shift – will shift –to distributive equality. If a country is prepared to share and not to dominate, then it has no need for systems designed to manipulate, to undermine other governments, and to play one country against another, constantly undermining relationships and generating conflicts on a divide-and-rule basis. And if it is not happy to go down that track? Under the evolving relationships, power will not save it. Economic isolation will see to that, as the United States has demonstrated to very good effect, in Africa and Latin America as well as in Yugoslavia and the former Soviet Union, ad nauseam. In its own interests it must now say: "Enough is enough. Star wars are unnecessary and we will totally disband our strategic defence system, retaining only coastal surveillance and domestic policing."

In the matter of population: we are better off without migration barriers. We should have no need for Evian Conferences either, provided we put in place a proper resource distribution scheme (such as the proposal in appendix A) and couple it with a world population council which would work with governments to assess population pressure points and to negotiate resettlement programs. Who do we manage planet earth for? What is the divine authority's wish? Certainly not a debilitating, soul destroying scramble for crumbs. We need understanding, respect, and concern, which brings us back to the issue of church authority. If human conduct and human interaction is a matter between each person and God, with a system of civil law to guard against abuse, there is no need for a church or any other body to dictate in the matter of personal conduct. We need guidelines.

A church which claims to be the sole path to salvation, a church which proscribes conduct and usurps the role of civil law by applying rules and enforcing them, (or tempting people to suppress their honesty to avoid discovery), through threats and sanctions, places stumbling blocks along the path or a barrier between its people and God. A church which claims absolute authority and infallibility faces the prospect of making itself irrelevant. A church which establishes a system of binding concordats and then uses its political weight to subvert the freewill of people who do not even subscribe to it, is perilously close to being a political organization masquerading as a vehicle for salvation. If people act in freewill in the knowledge that they have to answer to God, and to God alone, they will decide the burning social issues with a view to human fulfilment, not with a view to avoiding the suppression of their humanity. If a church pursues these policies it may attract and bind a core church community, but in doing so it deepens the trench separating it from people of other faiths.

On that basis, for so long as the Roman Catholic Church maintains its stance that it is the infallible sole pathway to salvation it cannot be taken seriously as the initiator or host in genuine theological reassessment. It could only be welcome as a participant in the process alongside other Christian churches or the peak Ecumenical body, the World Council of Churches, and even that would pose problems until after it had taken steps to annul such claims. Therefore, at this time, it may even be an impediment to the process. This places the focus directly on the World Council of Churches, or the Global Christian Forum which has now been established, as the appropriate ecumenical body to initiate the process and to invite the participation of Jewish and Muslim partners.

Furthermore, when a process of serious reflection and interfaith theological reassessment is at hand, if the Roman Catholic Church cannot feel able to participate on that basis, it may even be better that the parallel process of dialogue and rapprochement between the Roman Catholic Church and the Ecumenical Movement be left in abeyance until it has cleared itself of that impediment. If it is not, then the World Council of Churches or the Global Christian Forum would have to go into the process of interfaith reassessment with one hand tied behind their backs. That raises the question of Christian unity. Christian unity is not an end in itself. To the extent that it was approached in the early stages with a siege mentality, to strengthen the church's competitive position in evangelism for the hearts and minds of the uncommitted or - even worse - from the point of view of proselytism, it is a concept which may have been better not adopted. Cooperation, acknowledgement of another church's legitimacy and participation in ecumenical affairs is one thing. An attempt to induce unity is quite another. It could only, and has only, lead to theological compromise and regression towards acknowledgement and acceptance of concepts and practices which were contentious at the time of the reformation, quite apart from being fundamental to the establishment of the triangle of faiths during earlier periods.

Immediately we take seriously the unity of humanity rather than the unity of Christianity, we can begin to dismantle the barriers erected either to protect the amorphous Christian gel or to restrict its spread. At that point we can approach world coordination or governance on a totally new basis. Democratization can move towards reality rather than being a concept to trot out and use as a bargaining chip in trade negotiations or in a bid to exclude a country from world forums. The bias in favour of the amorphous Christian gel which was built into the United Nations (chapter 27) ensured its dominance for a time, but it then began to fail and, with the acceleration of the decolonization process, representation and participation progressively improved and, with that, the opportunities for coercive evangelism began to decline. The world cannot afford any more exercises in imposed Christianization such as those which were attempted in Japan which was subjected to formal coercive constitutional change, or even the less formal but often more oppressive ventures in Latin America, India, Burma, China and a host of other countries - with or without swords. We now have an opportunity to ensure that no such bias is possible in future by adopting the democratizing proposals of the Global Governance Reform Project.

Turning to another matter: as the new relationships become more apparent the concept of Star Wars becomes totally irrelevant. If the world wants to know more about creation, let there be exploration by all means – cooperatively and not in competition. And if nations are serious about developing the peaceful uses of space as opposed to the military uses, they will do it cooperatively as well. The United States spends billions on staying in front in the space race at the same time that it declines to bring its contributions to the United Nations up to date and insists on maintaining sanctions which condemn millions of people to deprivation, death and distress in countries such as Iraq. And all the time it pleads that it is the most Christian country on God's earth.

If the world is on the verge of substantially adjusted relationships, and if we are serious about questions of governance, then now is the time to think about the future of empires, superpowers and conglomerate nation states. To the extent that they preferentially attract capital and then control its distribution and use they are an impediment to the democratization process and to the most effective use of available capital and the rational distribution and use of resources. And experience during the past two generations has shown that attempts to retain national borders which were drawn on maps at a distance without regard to population dynamics, ethnicity, language and natural physical barriers have condemned many countries to civil wars and to disputes over the allocation of government resources and the provision of services. These situations have simply increased the opportunities for speculative intervention by the major powers, as has been noted in instances such as West Papua. Small nations are just as viable as large ones, if they are given the opportunity to run their own affairs. Their security is only at risk when larger nations take an interest in their resources. That highlights an important reason for establishing a system for rational trading in food and resources: to help ensure the right of self determination for people irrespective of the size of their prospective nation. If the decision makers did not believe that, then why did they support independence for East Timor in circumstances which, very predictably, increased the pressure and agitation for independence in a host of other minority or subject communities which, so far, neither the existing governments nor foreign powers have not been prepared to recognize. East Timor's situation was a classic case of a community and its neighbours being caught up in the trouble in the triangle. Similarly, the disintegration of the former Soviet Union and the crises in both Yugoslavia and Chechnya illustrate the challenges ahead for many other composite nations which also have complex ethnic and religious communities.

TO GOD BE THE GLORY!

Wherever we turn we come face to face with the trouble in the triangle, so it inevitably leads us back to the question of whether to take a deliberate step to dismantle it through fundamental theological reassessment, starting with the doctrine of the Trinity.

What is the alternative? To decide not to proceed would condemn the world to the continuation of the trauma of recent years, but on an ever increasing scale. There should be no doubt about that. Is that what the believers in each of the faith communities want? I hardly think so. Surely no one would regard the present circumstances as the first stepping stone on the path to salvation. And because it all started with a definition of the Messiah, it cannot be dismantled without starting at the same point. We are at a turning point in world history. Humanity hasn't been around for very long, but its got a long time to go! Its history is still before us. The past is only something to help us understand the future. Let us pray that our successors, up there on the eleven billion plateau, will be able to look down - or back - and say: "Golly! Didn't they make a botch of things around the turn of the millennium! At least they found their way forward." It is time to stop the action, do some thinking, and move off in a new direction. It's time to have the Reformation. The real thing. So that then we can all cry out, together:

"To God be the Glory!"

Appendices

APPENDIX A

A PROPOSAL

A PROPOSAL TO ACCELERATE DEVELOPMENT THROUGH INTERNATIONAL RESOURCE TRADING IN ACCORDANCE WITH REAL NEEDS.

AIMS:

- To ensure that the governments of developing countries receive funds consistent with their contribution to the economies of the world community, more consistent with their development requirements and more consistent with the aspirations of their people.
- To increase world food production, to ensure adequate food supplies for all mankind, to ensure more equitable distribution of food supplies and to provide for an international and famine and emergency relief scheme.
- To minimize competition for resources and thereby to reduce tension between nations and the likelihood of armed conflict.

GENERAL

The scheme resembles a giant barter system. It envisages all essential international trade in basic commodities being under the control of each sovereign government through a central international agency, with supplies obtained and adjusted so that funds flow preferentially from highly developed countries to developing countries. Developed countries would be encouraged to produce food for export to balance their international trade. The scheme does not reduce the domestic sovereignty of any government or presuppose any particular political or economic system. However it does anticipate greater government control over the private sector.

OPERATION

1. The scheme would operate as a programme of the United Nations with an international 'central agency' established by and responsible to, the United Nations General Assembly for its administration

2. Commodities to be traded through the agency would be determined by the UN from time to time but it is envisaged that the scheme would cover:

- exhaustible resources, including energy and metals.
- unprocessed foodstuffs.

other unprocessed primary products such as rubber and fibres and other economically strategic materials.

3. All trading through the agency would be on account of the national governments.

4. The requirements of each country for each commodity would be determined by two factors:

- basic requirements
- additional requirements

Both factors would be carefully defined but, in general terms, a country's basic requirements would be:

- foodstuffs: sufficient to ensure an adequate diet for the entire population.
- other materials sufficient to satisfy achievable development programmes and to ensure stability in the country's economy, but not to provide for the luxury consumer market or for re-export of goods.
- Additional requirements would include supplies for the luxury market, processing for re-export and stockpiling.

5. All basic requirements would be supplied and obtained through the agency. Additional requirements could be obtained or supplied either through the agency or by direct negotiation with another country except that no country could obtain or supply additional requirements of a commodity until it had honoured its obligations in respect of basic supplies.

6. The proportion of supplies which would be obtained from each supplying country would be determined by the agency according to criteria such as:

- each country's need for funds.
- ability and willingness to supply.
- relative dependence on one or a series of exports.

7. The relative level of prices at which the agency would buy from and sell to each country would be determined by criteria established by the UN and would be weighted in favour of developing countries. A mean price would be determined for each commodity and each country would be charged or paid at the price determined for it within the range of mean price minus one quarter to mean price plus one quarter.

8. The price levels or classification for each country would be determined each year according to agreed criteria.

9. The disbursement of funds paid to it by the agency would be at the discretion of each government. Payments by a government to its producers need not be based on the same unit value as the payments by the agency to it. A government could therefore, – within the limits acceptable to its electorate, encourage one industry relative to another according to world needs for particular commodities, such as food grains, or according to its own national planning.

10 Supplies and their availability would be kept under constant review, but allocations would be made annually at least a full year in advance when the scheme became fully operational.

11. Finance. Net movements in national accounts would be adjusted quarterly and not against individual shipments of individual commodities.

12. Transport. Source of supply and basic arrangements would be determined and accounts for commodities would be handled through the central agency on an FIS basis but shipping or other transport arrangements would be determined by negotiation between the agency, supplying and receiving governments and shippers.

In case of dispute the agency would make appropriate arrangement and determine charges. No change of ownership or control of shipping or other forms of transport is necessarily envisaged.

13 Discipline within the scheme would be relatively easily because of the ease of supervision and because of the ease with which economic embargoes could be applied by the majority against a country which set out to bypass the scheme.

14 Criteria for determining supplies and pricing would be based on specific readily assessed factors which are indicative of the needs of a country and not on standard economic indicators. A system is envisaged in which groups of factors would be weighted to give each country a rating related to the world mean in each of three categories. The categories, or 'groups', and the factors proposed in each are:

Category I. Current economic activity:

- national import/export ratio.
- energy consumption.
- personal income levels.

Category II. Current level of community advancement:

- availability of education.

- workforce employed.
- population growth rate.

Category III. Current level of personal fulfilment:

- protein consumption.
- health status.
- housing and/or mobility.

15 The ratings could be determined by a variety of methods, but it is envisaged that the statistics collected by the UN and published in a statistical yearbook each year would provide the basis. For any single factor the statistics for each country accordingly. The ratings would be given a plus or minus value according to whether a high assessed factor indicates an advanced stage of development or otherwise.

16 An amount would be debited to the trading account of each national government to provide for the operation of the scheme and for the establishment of a food stockpile for famine relief and other emergencies. It is envisaged that this amount would be determined as a percentage of the total trade transacted through the agency by each country, say one half of one percent to the food stockpile, plus the actual costs of operating the scheme, but a range of alternatives is available.

17 Foodstuffs for the stockpile would be purchased at the basic exports price. They would be stored in facilities established on the seaboard of the exporting countries, or elsewhere as appropriate in the case of land-locked countries. They would be rotated with annual export supplies in line with good practice for each commodity and they would be distributed by the agency at the direction of the United Nations.

TABLE A

An illustration of the method of weighting commodity buying and selling prices proposed in the scheme of International Resource Trading

- In this table ratings for the criteria proposed have been set out for three countries from statistics published by the United Nations. Country "A" is a Western country, highly developed and technically advanced. Country "B" is a middle ranking European country. Country "C" is one of Africa's poorest nations.

The overall trade ratings have been translated directly into commodity buying and selling prices except that in the case of Country "C", for which the ratings are outside the range of mean value plus or minus 25% the buying price has been set at the proposed minimum of mean minus 25 % and the selling price has been set at the proposed maximum of mean plus 25 %. *

Categories and Factors

Relative Country Country Country

A PROPOSAL

	Weight	A	B	C
Group I: Economic
Import/Export ratio	3	+3	+1	-3
Energy consumption	3	+3	+2	-3
Personal income levels	3	+3	+2	-3
	9	+9	+5	-9
Group II: Community Advancement
Education	4	+2	+2	-3
Workforce employed	4	-4	+2	-3
Population growth	4	+2	-1	-4
	12	0	+3	-10
Group III: Personal Fulfilment
Protein consumption	5	+4	+3	-3
Health status	4	+3	+2	-3
Housing and/or Mobility	3	+3	+1	-2
	12	+10	+6	-8
Overall trade rating		+19	+14	-27
Assessed buying price as % of mean:		119%	114%	73%
Adjusted buying price				75%
Assessed selling price, % of mean:		81%	88%	127%
Adjusted selling price				125%

(* As the calculations were made in 1975 from the 1973 Statistic Yearbook and other sources the ratings, being no longer current, can only be taken as indicative and the countries are therefore not named)

Discussion

1. The resources trading scheme proposed can be very readily related to the operations of existing world financial institutions including the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.
2. There may be conflict between the proposed scheme and certain aspects of the EEC's operations but there is no reason why these cannot be resolved. In this respect the negotiations between the EEC and OPEC governments for oil and gas supplies should be examined.
3. There is obvious conflict between this proposal and free trading practices of certain Western countries. However as the main aims of the scheme are to increase essential food supplied, to accelerate development by channelling capital funds and to reduce international tension by compensating for past exploitation, it is hoped that countries currently adopting those practices will recognize their responsibility and change in the interests of long term peace and world development.

4. Because of the scheme's stimulating effect on selected aspects of their domestic economies it would not have the tendency, which highly advanced countries would obviously fear, to retard essential technical development or to reduce them to the present material level of less developed countries. On the contrary, it would tend to encourage the re-deployment of other resources away from non-productive sectors of the economy, such as war preparation, and towards new and productive fields, and in doing so it would tend to increase total world productive economic activity and to progressively raise the status of the less technically advanced countries with the "highest common factor" effect and not the reverse.

5. The proposal is obviously in accord with the basic aims of such associations of governments as OPEC, CIPEC, IBA. The International Rubber Association and APEF, (to ensure proper returns for resources, equitable market sharing and market stability). Such bodies can continue to operate while relinquishing some of their functions to the central agency.

6. Selling price differentials between international customers and between domestic and export markets are commonplace. However to minimise disruption to existing marketing arrangements and to encourage more ready acceptance of the proposal, the range of buying and selling prices above and below the mean export levels could be phased in over two or three years,

Say: Year one, maximum variation, plus or minus 12.5%.

Year two, maximum variation, plus or minus 25%.

Or: Year one, plus or minus 8.5%.

Year two, plus or minus 17%.

Year three, plus or minus 25%.

It can be expected that over a period of years, as the preferential flow of funds enables governments to put development plans into effect, the buying and selling price differentials will tend to be reduced but the speed of reduction will depend on many factors. Among the most important are the extent of the differentials set at the commencement of the scheme, the criteria by which they are determined and the effectiveness of development plans implemented by the governments concerned.

7 Additional requirements traded outside the central agency arrangements would presumably be bought and sold at premiums to the disadvantage of the party initiating the transaction. Any substantial price variations would usually be the result of a shortage in world supplies above "basis requirements" or the desire of a country to increase its export earnings from a particular sector. Pressure for such transactions is most likely to come from a laissez-faire developed economy in the early stages of the scheme.

8 In markets in which raw material quality determines suitability for processing in particular plants, or price differentials, these would be taken into account by the central agency in determining supply sources or price variations.

9 The scheme allows each sovereign government to relate its current domestic political environment and resource ownership patterns to the proposed international trading relationships with a minimum of disruption but places emphasis on reducing competition between countries. It will assist governments to respond to the aspirations of their people and facilitate adjustments to domestic commodity prices and profits in any particular industry.

10 The scheme may tend to encourage advanced countries to use their own resources rather than those of other countries and therefore it may reduce the volume of raw material flowing in world trade. The extent of the incentive to reduce imports will depend largely on the gap between the cost of domestic extraction and the cost of imports. In many cases this will depend on labour costs rather than geographic factors, but many other factors are involved, not least of which is the influence of those who have private capital invested in off-shore extractive industries.

11 The proposal for the adjustment of national trading accounts quarterly rather than on the basis of each shipment would significantly reduce the international flow of funds. This would help to improve currency stability, especially for small countries, by reducing the capacity of interested parties to manipulate the international monetary system for capital gain.

12 The influence of vertically integrated multi and trans-national corporations would be greatly appreciated as decision making about utilisation of resources is taken out of the hands of purely profit-oriented groups which are most resident in, or ultimately responsible to, the countries from which the resources are being extracted. This should mean that while such corporations are able to operate in a country by arrangement with its government on a proper basis, their capacity to manipulate world resource supplies, to play one government against another to apply political pressure on particular governments, or to avoid responding to the legitimate demands of such governments, would be greatly curtailed.

13 Balanced extraction of resources should replace the situation in which corporations can determine whether to preferentially extract from one country or another, to its long term disadvantage, and whether to ignore resources available in another, for whatever reason, to its disadvantage.

14 A national government, having sought and been granted a future market allocation for a particular resource by the central agency with the authority of the United Nations, would be assured of the capacity to negotiate for either loan funds to finance a government owned and operated industry or for a private corporation to establish and operate it, according to national policy.

15 The pressure for settlement of resource questions by military means and the tendency for corporate interest in extractable resources to develop into national territorial conflict would be substantially reduced.

16 More realistic nutrition levels for people in all countries should be achievable with a minimum of delay. Security of pre-planned markets and prices, together with the need to increase export earnings to offset otherwise reduced export income and increased import costs, would encourage developed countries to increase food production. The domestic adjustment which accompanies this could also help to stabilise or increase rural populations in those countries.

17 Similarly, export industries in unregulated fields would be stimulated and this, together with the impact on rural production, would tend to offset the fall in emphasis on domestic consumer production and employment. The rating system could actually be used as an international device to take the emphasis off rampant consumerism.

18 The proposal is not intended to displace any schemes for development assistance which currently operate, whether loans, grants, concessional arrangements, training, health or educational programmes arranged through governments, the United Nations, international institutions, private aid agencies, religious bodies or privately. However, it is based on the principle which is most likely to be effective in the long-term in accelerating development in such a way that the aspirations of the people of developing countries can be achieved. It should enable their governments to utilise increased income from export trade generated from domestic production.

The majority of governments are now involved in import/export trading to some extent. Many are actually trading through statutory bodies or wholly or partly state-owned companies while others are involved only through supervisory or agency authorities. An increasing number are becoming involved in domestic trading as well. There would be little real difficulty for governments to adjust their operations to participate in this proposal.

APPENDIX B

SELECTION OF ALLIANCES, AGREEMENTS & ORGANISATIONS

A SELECTION OF MAJOR INTERNATIONAL ALLIANCES, AGREEMENTS AND ORGANISATIONS INDICATING THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN RELIGIOUS AFFILIATION, PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION PATTERNS AS AT 1975.

SELECTION OF ALLIANCES, AGREEMENTS & ORGANISATIONS

	Religious	Political	Military	Economic	Development	Regional Trade	Commodity Trade
GROUP I AFRICA Algeria Cameroon Chad Egypt Gabon Gambia Guinea Guinea-Bissau Libya	Islamic Conf	Non-Aligned	O.A.U.	Arab League	Brit. Com	O.A.S.	NATO	CENTO	Warsaw Pact	Nordic C.	ANZUS	ASEAN	OECD	EFTA	EEC	Group of Ten	COMECON	IEA	C.I.E.C.	OPEC	OAPEC	OLADE	OCAS	LAFTA	CARIFTA	COLOMBO	CACM	UDEAC	EAC	CEAO	RDC	Bauxite	Iron	Copper	Phosphate	Tin	Peanuts	Rubber	Cocoa	Coffee	Cotton	Lead/Zinc	Olive Oil	Sugar	Wheat	Bananas	Wool
	X	X	X	X											A			X	X	X	X						X						X

SELECTION OF ALLIANCES, AGREEMENTS & ORGANISATIONS

	Religious	Political	Military	Economic	Development	Regional Trade	Commodity Trade
	Islamic Conf
	Non-Aligned
	O.A.U.
	Arab League
	Brit. Com
	O.A.S.
	NATO CENTO
	Warsaw Pact
	Nordic C.
	ANZUS ASEAN
	OECD
	EFTA
	EEC
	Group of Ten
	COMECON
	IEA
	C.I.O.E.C.
	OPEC OAPEC OLADE
	OCAS
	LAFTA
	CARIFTA
	COLOMBO
	CACM UDEAC EAC
	CEAO
	RDC Bauxite
	Iron
	Copper
	Phosphate
	Tin
	Peanuts
	Rubber
	Cocoa
	Coffee
	Cotton
	Lead/Zinc
	Olive Oil
	Sugar
	Wheat
	Bananas
	Wool
GROUP I AFRICA
Upper Volta	X
Zaire	X
Zambia	X
Mezambique	X
Tanzania	X
Kenya	X
Ethiopia	X
Rwanda	X
Burundi	X
Malawi	X
Angola
Congo	X
Central African Rep.	X
Ghana	X
Togo	X
Dahomey	X
Ivory Coast	X
Liberia	X
Sierra Leone	X
Malagasy Rep.	X

SELECTION OF ALLIANCES, AGREEMENTS & ORGANISATIONS

	Religions	Political	Military	Economic	Development	Regional Trade	Commodity Trade
	Islamic Conf
	Non-Aligned
	O.A.U.
	Arab League
	Brit. Com
	O.A.S.
	NATO CENTO
	Warsaw Pact
	Nordic C.
	ANZUS ASEAN
	OECD
	EFTA
	EEC
	Group of Ten
	COMECON
	IEA
	C.I.O.E.C.
	OPEC OAPEC OLADE
	OCAS LAFTA CARIFTA
	COLOMBO
	CACM UDEAC
	EAC
	CEAO
	RDC
	Bauxite
	Iron
	Copper
	Phosphate
	Tin
	Peanuts
	Rubber
	Cocoa
	Coffee
	Cotton
	Lead/Zinc
	Olive Oil
	Sugar
	Wheat
	Bananas
	Wool GROUP I AFRICA
Swaziland	X
Botswana	X
Lesotho	X
Mauritius	X
Cabo Verde	X
Equatorial Guinea	X
South Africa
GROUP II
Asia Pacific
Oceania
Afghanistan	X
Bahrain	X
Bangladesh	X
Indonesia	X
Iran	X
Iraq	X
Jordan	X
Kuwait	X
Lebanon	X
Malaysia	X
Oman	X
Maldives	X

SELECTION OF ALLIANCES, AGREEMENTS & ORGANISATIONS

[illegible]

	Religions	Political	Security	Economic	Development	Regional Trade	Commodity Trade
	Islamic Conf
	Non-Aligned
	O.A.U.
	Arab League
	Brit. Com
	O.A.S.
	NATO CENTO
	Warsaw Pact
	Nordic C.
	ANZUS ASEAN
	OECD
	EFTA
	EEC
	Group of Ten
	COMECON
	IEA
	C.I.O.E.C.
	OPEC OAPEC OLADE
	OCAS LAFTA CARIFTA
	COLOMBO
	CACM UDEAC
	EAC
	CEAO
	RDC
	Bauxite
	Iron
	Copper
	Phosphate
	Tin
	Peanuts
	Rubber
	Cocoa
	Coffee
	Cotton
	Lead/Zinc
	Olive Oil
	Sugar
	Wheat
	Bananas
	Wool
GROUP II Asia Pacific Oceania
Nauru
Tonga
Fiji
Kmer Rep.
Laos
Bhutan
Korea, Rep.
Nepal
Vietnam, Rep.
Korea, P.D.R.
Vietnam, P.D.R.
China, P.R.
China, Nationalist
Israel
GROUP III The Americas Caribbean
Ecuador
Venezuela
Colombia
Guyana
Surinam

SELECTION OF ALLIANCES, AGREEMENTS & ORGANISATIONS

	Religious	Political	Military	Economic	Development	Regional Trade	Commodity Trade
	Islamic Conf
	Non-Aligned
	O.A.U.
	Arab League
	Brit. Com
	O.A.S.
	NATO CENTO
	Warsaw Pact
	Nordic C.
	ANZUS ASEAN
	OECD
	EFTA
	EEC
	Group of Ten
	COMECON
	IEA
	C.I.O.E.C.
	OPEC OAPEC OLADE
	OCAS LAFTA
	CARIFTA
	COLOMBO Plan
	CACM UDEAC
	EAC
	CEAO
	RDC
	Bauxite
	Iron
	Copper
	Phosphate
	Tin
	Peanuts
	Rubber
	Cocoa
	Coffee
	Cotton
	Lead/Zinc
	Olive Oil
	Sugar
	Wheat
	Bananas
	Wool
GROUP III The Americas Caribbean
French Guyana
Brazil
Uruguay
Paraguay
Argentina
Chile
Bolivia
Peru
Panama
Costa Rica
Nicaragua
El Salvador
Guatemala
Mexico
Trinidad and Tobago
Jamaica
Canada
United States
Cuba

[illegible]

SELECTION OF ALLIANCES, AGREEMENTS & ORGANISATIONS

[illegible]

SELECTION OF ALLIANCES, AGREEMENTS & ORGANISATIONS

	GROUP IV EUROPE U.S.S.R.	Cyprus	Malta	Vatican City		Religious	Political	Military	Economic	Development	Regional Trade	Commodity Trade
Islamic Conference					Islamic Conf
Non-Aligned National Movement		X	X		Non-Aligned
Organisation of African Unity					O.A.U.
The League of Arab States		X	X		Arab League
The (British) Commonwealth of Nations					Brit. Com
Organisation of American States					O.A.S.
North Atlantic Treaty Organisation					NATO
Central Treaty Organisation					CENTO
The Warsaw Pact		X			Warsaw Pact
The Nordic Council					Nordic C.
ANZUS Pact					ANZUS
Association of Southeast Asian Nations					ASEAN
Organisation for Economic Cooperation and					OECD
European Free Trade Association					EFTA
European Economic Community		A	A		EEC
The Group of Ten					Group of Ten
Council for Mutual Economic Assistance		X			COMECON
International Energy Agency					IEA
Conference International Economic					C.I.O.E.C.
Organisation of Petroleum Exporting					OPEC
Organisation of Arab Petroleum Exporting					OAPEC
Latin American Energy Organisation					OLADE
Organisation of Central American States					OCAS
Latin American Free Trade Association					LAFTA
Caribbean Free Trade Association					CARIFTA
Colombo Plan for Cooperative Economic					COLOMBO Plan
Central American common Market					CACM
Central African Economic and Customs					UDEAC
East African Community					EAC
West African Economic Community					CEAO
Regional Cooperation for Development					RDC
International Bauxite Association					Bauxite
Association of iron Ore Exporting Countries					Iron
Intergovernmental Council of Copper					Copper
International Phosphate Club					Phosphate
International Tin council		C			Tin
African Peanut Council					Peanuts
Association of Natural Rubber Producing					Rubber
International Cocoa Council					Cocoa
M - Café Mondial Ltd. L = L.A. Coffee					Coffee
International cotton Advisory committee		C			Cotton
International Lead and Zinc Study Group		P			Lead/Zinc
International Olive Oil Council					Olive Oil
International Sugar Organisation		X			Sugar
International Wheat Council		E		I	Wheat
Union of Banana Exporting Countries					Bananas
International Wool Study Group					Wool

Notes

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

CHAPTER 1: GROWING PAINS: FROM A MINI-SECT TO A MAJOR COMPETITOR

- 1 Revill, J. C. World History [London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1953] pp. 85–86.
- 2 Josephus. The Jewish War [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1970] p. 41.
- 3 ibid., introduction, JERUSALEM: strictly for the faithful, p. 6R.
- 4 Flannery, Austin P. [Ed.] Documents of Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation [Grand Rapids: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1975] chapter 1, clause 10. p. 755.
- 5 ibid., clause 9.
- 6 Wells, H.G. The Outline of History [London; Cassell, 1951] p. 538.
- 7 Fljannery, op.cit., pp. 350–358, Chapter 1, clauses 2, 6, 7, 8.
- 8 Dimont, Max I. Jews, God and History [New York: Signet/New American Library, 1962] p. 134.
- 9 Since the trauma of the Reformation years the church has made much of the exchange between Jesus and his disciples over the question “Who do you say I am?” in Matthew 16: 13–20. It is used to justify its Trinitarian theology and, in the case of the Roman Catholic Church, to justify its claims to be the one true church. This will be discussed further in the final section Reflections in a wine glass.
- 10 Hick, John [Ed.] The Myth of God Incarnate [London: SCM Press, 1977] p. 88.
- 11 Bornkamm, Gunther, Paul [London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1971] pp. 5–6.
- 12 ibid., p. 9.

- 13 Stoicism is generally defined as a philosophical belief [Macquarie] or a school of philosophy and a form of materialistic pantheism [Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church]. During the third and second centuries BCE it had been decidedly revolutionary and internationalist, promoting human brotherhood and denouncing slavery but by late in the first century BCE it had lost its revolutionary fervour and become the dominant philosophy of the Roman ruling elite. [Hutchinson 20th Century Encyclopedia] However, because it involved belief that “God was the immanent all-pervading energy by which the world was created and sustained” and “the world reason or ‘Logos’ which manifests itself in the order and beauty of the world” [Oxford, p. 489] it is more properly regarded as a religion.
- 14 Corbishley, T. contrib. Christianity: the Catholic Church Since the Reformation in The Concise Encyclopedia of Living Faiths (Ed. R.C. Zaehner) [London: Hutchinson, 1977] pp. 162–163.
- 15 Bornkamm, op. cit., pp. 26–29.
- 16 Furnish, Victor Paul, contributing Commentary on the Letter of Paul to the Galatians in The Interpreter’s One Volume Commentary on the Bible (Ed. Charles M. Laymon) [Nashville: Abingdon, 1971] discusses dates as early as 48 or 49 CE but offers the hypothesis that Galatians was written from prison between 57–62 CE.
- 17 Hinnells, John R. (Ed.) Penguin Reference: Who’s Who of Religions [London: Penguin, 1996] p. 322.
- 18 Some translators attribute words such as “the God of our fathers hath glorified His son Jesus” to Peter the Apostle in Acts 3:13, [such as in the King James, Domestic and Knox translations], but the majority of translations in English use the word ‘servant’ in place of ‘son’, [as in the Revised Standard, Modern Language, Living Bible, Jerusalem, New English, Moffat, New World and American translations].
- 19 Ling, Trevor A History of Religion East & West [London: Macmillan, 1968] provides insights into this period in his chapter Creeds and Conformity, pp. 167–186.
- 20 Criticism of the New Testament for inconsistencies and omissions does not suggest that there are no such inconsistencies and omissions in the Old Testament. One such situation has already been noted – the influence of Zoroastrianism on Hebrew worship during the Babylonian exile which only became apparent as a result of relatively recent scholarship. However by their nature the New Testament inconsistencies had a significant bearing on the subsequent development of Christology and thus the course of history.
- 21 Dating of events during that period is extremely difficult and authorities differ in the dating of the calendar, but it is most likely that at that time, about two years before Jesus’ first visit to the temple in Jerusalem, Paul was a babe in arms and Jesus was about ten.
- 22 Ling, op. cit., pp. 159–160.
- 23 Stirling, John F. Philips’ Atlas of the New Testament [London: George Philip & Son, 1961] pp. 21, 26, indicates 64 CE as the year of Paul’s martyrdom, but other authorities give the year as 67/68 CE, ie, after the fire of Rome, and the Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 242, suggests either 64 or 67 CE. As both dates are after Nero’s reign and before the fall of Jerusalem the divergence is not of consequence.
- 24 Dimont, op. cit., p. 101.
- 25 Gilbert, Martin Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] p. 16.
- 26 Borchsenius, Paul The Son of a Star Trans. F.H. Lyon [London: George Allen & Unwin, 1960] p. 18.
- 27 Dimont, op. cit., p. 105.
- 28 Wells, H. G. The Outline of History [London: Cassell] p. 480.
- 29 Borchsenius, op. cit., pp. 23–27.
- 30 Gilbert, loc. cit.
- 31 Dimont, op. cit., p. 106.
- 32 Werblowsky, R.J. Zwi contrib. Judaism, or the Religion of Israel in The Concise Encyclopedia of Faiths (Ed. R.C. Zaehner) [London: Hutchinson, 1977] p. 18–19.
- 33 Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church, pp. 272, 400.
- 34 Dentan, Robert C. contrib. Commentary on Proverbs in The Interpreter’s One-Volume Commentary on the Bible (Ed. Charles M. Laymon) [Nashville: Abingdon, 1971] pp. 304–310.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- ³⁵ Dentan, Robert C. contrib. Commentary on The Wisdom of Solomon in The Interpreter's One-Volume Commentary on the Bible, pp. 545–546.
- ³⁶ Hinnells, op. cit., pp. 325–326.
- ³⁷ Davies, J.G. contrib. Christianity: the Early Church in The Concise Encyclopedia of Faiths (Ed. R.C. Zaehner) p. 51.
- ³⁸ Hinnells, loc. cit.
- ³⁹ Dentan, (Wisdom), op. cit., p. 546.
- ⁴⁰ Stirlig, op.cit., pp. 1–29.
- ⁴¹ Furnish, op.cit., p. 826.
- ⁴² Phillips, J.B. Letters to the Young Churches [London: Collins/Fontana, 1955] pp. 110–111.
- ⁴³ Ling, op. cit., pp. 159–160.
- ⁴⁴ ibid., p. 170.
- ⁴⁵ Matthew 23: 37–38; 24: 15; Mark 13: 14–23; Luke 13: 35; 17: 26–37; 19: 41–44; 21: 20–24.
- ⁴⁶ Dimont, op. cit., p. 104.
- ⁴⁷ Jones, Alexander, [Ed.] the Introduction to the Synoptic Gospels, The Jerusalem Bible, [London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1968] suggests that Mark's Gospel can be dated before AD 70, perhaps about 64.
- ⁴⁸ Matthew 23:38–39, Jerusalem translation.
- ⁴⁹ Neill, Stephen A History of Christian Missions [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1966] p. 25.
- ⁵⁰ Ling, op. cit., p. 174.
- ⁵¹ Neil, op. cit., p. 32.
- ⁵² Ling, op. cit., p. 176, with reference to J.H. Stawley The Early History of the Liturgy [Cambridge, 1947].
- ⁵³ Epstein, Isadore Judaism [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1973] p. 113.
- ⁵⁴ ibid., p. 112.
- ⁵⁵ ibid., p. 113.
- ⁵⁶ Dimont, op. cit., p. 108.
- ⁵⁷ Epstein, op. cit., p. 118.
- ⁵⁸ ibid., p. 119.

CHAPTER 2: AN INSTRUMENT OF STATE: FROM PERSECUTION TO POWER

- ¹ Wells, H. G. The Outline of History [London: Cassell, 1951] p. 538.
- ² Franzen, August A Concise History of the Church [New York: Herder & Herder, 1969] p. 50.
- ³ Epstein, Isidore Judaism [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1959] p. 118.
- ⁴ Dimont, Max I. Jews, God & History [New York: Signet/New American Library, 1962] p. 121.
- ⁵ ibid., p. 123.
- ⁶ ibid., p. 113.
- ⁷ Epstein, op. cit. p. 121.
- ⁸ Dimont, op. cit., p. 122.
- ⁹ Hurlbut, J.L. The Story of the Christian Church [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970] p. 47.
- ¹⁰ Hinnells, John R. (Ed.) Who's Who of Religions [London: Penguin, 1996] pp. 258–259.
- ¹¹ Filson, Floyd V., contrib. The Unity Between the Testaments in The Interpreter's One-Volume Commentary on the Bible, Charles M. Laymon (Ed.) [Nashville: Abington, 1971] p. 989.
- ¹² Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 321.

- 13 Ling, Trevor. A History of religion East and West [London: Macmillan, 1968] p. 174.
- 14 Franzen, op. cit., p. 32.
- 15 Neuner, J. and J. Dupuis The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church [Bangalore: Theological Publications, 1978] p. 222, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church of Christ, The Institution and Foundation of the Church, chapter II, The Perpetuity of St. Peter's Primacy in the Roman Pontiffs.
- 16 Ling, loc. cit.
- 17 Catholic Almanac, 1975, p. 128.
- 18 Ling, op. cit., p. 175.
- 19 Franzen, op. cit., p. 27.
- 20 Roth, Cecil A History of the Jews [New York: Schocken, 1970] p. 143.
- 21 ibid, p. 139.
- 22 Catholic Almanac, op.cit., p. 156.
- 23 Gilbert, Martin Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] pp. 2–8.
- 24 Ling, op. cit., pp. 78, 182.
- 25 Brown, Peter Augustine of Hippo [London: Faber & Faber, 1975] pp. 43–44.
- 26 Wells, op. cit., p. 542.
- 27 Barrow, R. H. The Romans [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1976] pp. 177–178.
- 28 ibid, p. 182.
- 29 Franzen, op. cit. p. 55.
- 30 Gilbert, op. cit., pp. 12, 18.
- 31 ibid, p. 17.
- 32 Roth, op. cit., p. 138.
- 33 ibid, p. 129.
- 34 Wells, op. cit., p. 544, quotes extracts from Gibbon's translation of the edict.
- 35 The edict of toleration of 311 carried the names of Constantine and Licinius as well as Galerius. Another colleague of the emperor, Maximin Daza, ruler of Egypt ad Syria, refused to sign it.
- 36 Bettenson, Henry (Ed.) Documents of the Christian Church [Oxford: 1977] p. 15.
- 37 Brown, op. cit., p. 215.
- 38 Franzen, op. cit., p. 58. Franzen points out that the statement of the new policies was in the form of a rescript sent to the governors of the eastern provinces and that it was not an edict. It may have been prompted by a question from one of those governors in view of Constantine's further rise in power and his well known support for Christianity in the western provinces.
- 39 Bettenson, op. cit., p. 16.
- 40 ibid, pp. 17–18.
- 41 Franzen, op. cit., p. 59.
- 42 Ling op. cit., p. 180.
- 43 Catholic Almanac, p. 156.
- 44 Wells, op. cit., pp. 358–359.
- 45 Hurlbut op. cit., pp. 68–69.
- 46 Wells, op. cit., p. 541.
- 47 O'Grady, Joan. Heresy [Longmead: Element, 1985] p. 76, citing Eusebius' History of the Emperor.
- 48 O'Grady, loc. cit.

- 49 Franzen, op. cit., pp. 71–72.
- 50 Bettenson, op. cit., p. 25.
- 51 Neuner, J. and J. Dupuis, op. cit., pp. 6–7. [The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church carries the Imprimi potest of the Delegate of the Superior General S.J. for the Indian Assistancy and the Imprimatur of the Archbishop of Delhi.] The Symbol of Niceae includes the following expressions. (1) “... Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the only-begotten generated from the Father, that is, from the being of the Father ...” (2) “... one in being with the Father ...” (3) As for those who say “... He was made from nothing...” [This implies an act of making on the part of God, in contrast to “He came into being from what-is-not” which implies spontaneous existence without action on the part of God the Father.] (4) Such persons, the church “condemns” [this implies subject to excommunication which is the reversible exclusion from the sacraments, in contrast to “anathematizes” which implies irreversible exclusion and separation from the life of the church under ceremonial curse.]
- 52 Catholic Almanac 1997, p. 199.
- 53 Neuner and Dupuis, op. cit., p. 12.
- 54 An Australian Prayer Book (Sydney: The Standing Committee of the General Synod of the Church of England in Australia, 1978) p. 625.
- 55 Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 307.
- 56 Shepherd, Massey H. contrib. Commentary on The Gospel According to Saint John in The Interpreter’s One-Volume Commentary on the Bible, Charles M. Laymon (Ed.) [Nashville: Abington, 1971] pp. 707–709.
- 57 Baird, William, contrib. Commentary on The Acts of the Apostles in The Interpreter’s One-Volume Commentary on the Bible (Ed. Charles M. Laymon) [Nashville: Abington, 1971] p. 729.
- 58 Hinnells, op. cit., pp. 325–326.
- 59 Davies, J.G. contrib. Christianity: the Early Church in The Concise Encyclopedia of Faiths (Ed. R.C. Zaehner) p. 51.
- 60 Shepherd, op. cit., p. 708.
- 61 Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 307.
- 62 Shepherd, op. cit., p. 709.
- 63 Some translations, based on alternative early manuscripts, use other words: ‘the Son of Man who is in heaven’ (Jerusalem); ‘even the Son of man which is in heaven’ (King James); ‘the Son of Man whose home is in heaven’ (NEB).
- 64 Some manuscripts read ‘How can Abraham have seen you?’
- 65 Advocate’ is also rendered as ‘counsellor’, ‘comforter’ or ‘protector’ in some translations, and ‘Issues’ is rendered as ‘proceeds’ in some translations. ‘Issues’ implies either an involuntary response by the Spirit or a positive act of sending by the Father, while ‘proceeds’ implies an independent or positive action by the Spirit.]
- 66 Greeley, Andrew M. The Mary Myth: On the femininity of God [New York: Seabury, 1977] pp. 88–89, 98.
- 67 ibid., pp. 96–97.
- 68 ibid., p. 73, 81.
- 69 Gibbon, Edward (Ed. Dero A. Saunders) The Portable Gibbon: The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1977] p. 548.
- 70 Greeley, op. cit., p. 42.
- 71 At the time of publishing The Mary Myth: On the femininity of God [New York: Seabury, 1977] Fr Andrew M. Greeley was director of the Center for the Study of American Pluralism at the National Opinion Research Center, University of Chicago. The author of at least seven previous books, he was described as “one of the most popular Catholic writers and sought after lecturers in the country today” and in 1972 he was a joint recipient of the Thomas More Award for “the most distinguished contribution to Catholic literature.” [From jacket cover notes.]
- 72 Greeley, op. cit., p. 75.
- 73 ibid., p. 77.

- 74 An Australian Prayer Book (Sydney: The Standing Committee of the General Synod of the Church of England in Australia, 1978) p. 625.
- 75 Matthew 23: 13, 23, 24. Jerusalem Bible [London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1968].
- 76 Wells, loc. cit.
- 77 Hurlbut, op. cit., p. 68.
- 78 Wells, loc. cit.
- 79 Barrow, op. cit., p. 99.
- 80 Zaehner, R. C. (Ed.) The Concise Encyclopaedia of Living Faiths [London: Hutchinson, 1977] p. 239.
- 81 Grant, Michael Gladiators [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1971] from chapters one and two, pp. 13–54.
- 82 ibid., p. 115.
- 83 ibid., p. 116.
- 84 ibid., pp. 117–11.

CHAPTER 3: TO HUNT A HERETIC

- 1 The Jerusalem Bible, (Edit.) Alexander Jones Introduction to the Letters to All Christians [London: Darton Longman & Todd, 1968] p. 294.
- 2 “So then, as the body without the spirit is dead, so also faith without actions is dead.” James 2: 26. The Good News Bible Translation [London: The British & Foreign Bible Society, Collins/Fontana, 1976] p. 286.
- 3 Diaspora is a term which is taken to refer to the scattering of the Jewish people from Palestine generally. But it refers more particularly to people of Jewish faith living in separated communities in an alien religious environment, waiting for the restoration of the Temple in Jerusalem and their right to worship there.
- 4 It is difficult to define a theocratic state in terms of the thinking of the day because religious argument was confused with the politics of the empire and personal ambitions which knew no bounds. It is reasonable to think of either a state governed by God through ordained or predestined leaders, or a state governed by leaders according to their interpretation of God’s will.
- 5 Franzen, August (Trans., J. P. Dolan) A Concise History of the Church [New York: Herder & Herder, 1969] p. 57.
- 6 ibid., p. 59.
- 7 Ling, Trevor A History of Religion East & West [London: Macmillan, 1968] p. 181.
- 8 Bettenson, Henry Documents of the Christian Church [Oxford, 1967] p. 16.
- 9 Roth, Cecil A History of the Jews [New York: Schocken, 1970] p. 143.
- 10 Franzen, op. cit., p. 60.
- 11 ibid., p. 72.
- 12 Neill, Stephen A History of Christian Missions [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1964] p. 44.
- 13 Franzen, op. cit., p. 72.
- 14 Bettenson, op. cit., p. 19.
- 15 Ling, op. cit., p. 180.
- 16 Franzen, op. cit., p. 60.
- 17 Bettenson, op. cit., p. 16.
- 18 Dimont, op. cit., p. 154.
- 19 Neill, op. cit., p. 48.
- 20 Bettenson, op. cit., pp. 19–20.
- 21 ibid.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 22 Gibbon, Edward The Decline & Fall of the Roman Empire (Ed. Dero A. Saunders, The Portable Gibbon) [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1977] pp. 463–466.
- 23 Gibbon, op. cit., chapter xi, pp. 436 ff.
- 24 Brown, Peter Augustine of Hippo [London: Faber & Faber, 1975] p. 215.
- 25 Roth, loc. cit.
- 26 Dimont, op. cit., p. 152.
- 27 Neill, op. cit., p. 55.
- 28 Dimont, Max I. Jews, God & History [New York: Signet/New American Library] p. 154.
- 29 Hurlbut, J. L. The Story of the Christian Church [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970] p. 68.
- 30 ibid., p. 69.
- 31 Quotations from the Authorized King James translation of the Bible.
- 32 Zarnecki, G. The Monastic Achievement [London: Thames & Hudson, 1972] p. 11.
- 33 Gibbon, op. cit., p. 466.
- 34 Kellett, A Short History of Religions [London: Victor Gollancz, 1933] p. 221.
- 35 Franzen, op. cit., p. 62–63. It appears that both joint-emperors acted on the edict, but that it was issued in the name of Theodosius only.
- 36 Fisher, H.A.L. A History of Europe [London: Arnold, 1955] p. 112.
- 37 Neill, op. cit., p. 37.
- 38 Gibbon, op. cit., p. 547.
- 39 ibid.
- 40 McEvedy, Colin Atlas of Medieval History [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1977] pp. 16–18.
- 41 Catholic Almanac, 1975, p. 166.

CHAPTER 4: CALL IT A CITY OF GOD

- 1 Brown, Peter Augustine of Hippo [London: Faber & Faber, 1975] p. 142.
- 2 Hurlbut, J. L. The Story of the Christian Church [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970] p. 49.
- 3 Wells, H.G. The Outline of History [London: Cassell, 1951] p. 191.
- 4 Gilbert, Martin Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] pp. 6, 7.
- 5 Roth, Cecil A History of the Jews [New York: Schocken, 1970] p. 90.
- 6 Wells, H. G. The Outline of History, Revised: Raymond Postgate [London: Cassell, 1951] p. 192.
- 7 ibid., p. 449.
- 8 Barrow, R. H. The Romans [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1949] p. 106.
- 9 Roth, op. cit., p. 70.
- 10 ibid., p. 91.
- 11 Wells, op. cit., p. 433.
- 12 ibid., p. 445.
- 13 Roth, op. cit., p. 82.
- 14 Gilbert, op. cit., p. 13.
- 15 Grollenburg, L.H. Shorter Atlas of the Bible [Edinburgh: Nelson, 1959] p. 135.
- 16 Roth, op. cit., p. 82.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 17 ibid., p. 90.
- 18 Wells, op. cit., p. 460.
- 19 ibid., pp. 444, 460.
- 20 Barrow, op. cit., p. 40.
- 21 Gilbert, loc. cit.
- 22 Barrow, op. cit., p. 106.
- 23 Wells, op. cit., p. 462.
- 24 Revill, J.C. World History [London: longmans Green, 1953] p. 107.
- 25 Barrow, op. cit., p. 141.
- 26 ibid., p. 143.
- 27 See above, chapter 3, An Instrument of State.
- 28 Brown, op.cit., p. 21.
- 29 See above, chapter 3, To Hunt a Heretic.
- 30 Brown, op. cit., pp. 20–24.
- 31 Augustine Confessions (Trans. J.K. Ryan) [New York: Image/Doubleday, 1960] p. 216 (Book 9, chapter 8, p. 17).
- 32 ibid., p. 19.
- 33 ibid., p. 21.
- 34 ibid., p. 22.
- 35 ibid. Notes to Book II, chapter 3. P. 375.
- 36 ibid., p. 67 (Book II, ch. 3).
- 37 ibid., p. 66 (Book II, ch. 2).
- 38 ibid., p. 65 (Book II, ch. 2).
- 39 ibid., p. 66 (Book II, ch. 2).
- 40 Brown, op. cit., p. 41.
- 41 ibid., p. 43.
- 42 See above, chapter 3, To Hunt a Heretic.
- 43 Brown, op. cit., p. 69.
- 44 Hurlbut, op.cit., p. 76.
- 45 Brown, op. cit., p. 70.
- 46 ibid., p. 63.
- 47 ibid., p. 81.
- 48 ibid., p. 151.
- 49 See above, chapter 3, To Hunt a Heretic.
- 50 ibid.
- 51 Brown, op. cit., pp. 139, 203.
- 52 ibid., p. 139.
- 53 See above, chapter 3, To Hunt a Heretic.
- 54 Brown, op. cit., p. 203.
- 55 ibid., p. 143.
- 56 See above, chapter 3, To Hunt a Heretic.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 57 ibid.
- 58 ibid.
- 59 Brown, op. cit., p. 231.
- 60 Revill, op.cit., p. 117.
- 61 See above, chapter 3, To Hunt a Heretic.
- 62 Franzen, August A Concise History of the Church [New York: Herder & Herder, 1969] p. 88.
- 63 Brown, op. cit., p. 334.
- 64 Fisher, H.A.L. A History of Europe [London: Edward Arnold, 1936] p. 112.
- 65 Brown, op. cit., p. 236.
- 66 McEvedy, Penguin Atlas of Medieval History [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1961] p. 18.
- 67 Brown, op. cit., p. 336.
- 68 ibid., p. 341, 345, 353, 357.
- 69 ibid., p. 357.
- 70 Wells, H.G. The Outline of History [London: Cassell, 1951] p. 511.
- 71 McEvedy, op. cit., p. 20.
- 72 Brown, op. cit., p. 524.
- 73 Parrinder, Geoffrey Africa's Three Religions [London: Sheldon, 1969] p. 109.
- 74 Bourke, Vernan J. Introduction to City of God (New York, Image, Doubleday & Company, 1958) p. 7.
- 75 Brown, op.cit., p. 142.
- 76 ibid., p. 147.
- 77 ibid., p. 197.
- 78 ibid., p. 154.
- 79 ibid., p. 196.
- 80 ibid., p. 199.
- 81 ibid., pp. 210, 212.
- 82 ibid., p. 222.
- 83 ibid., p. 209.
- 84 ibid., p. 223.
- 85 ibid., p. 405.
- 86 ibid., p. 222.
- 87 ibid., p. 336.
- 88 ibid., p. 350.
- 89 Augustine City of God, Book III, Trans. G. G. Walsh et.al. (New York: Image, Doubleday & Co, 1858) chapter 1.
- 90 ibid., Book XXII, chapter 24.
- 91 Quotations from Deuteronomy and the Letter of Jude: The Jerusalem Bible (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1968) pp. 193 (O.T. section) & 319 (N.T. section).
- 92 Augustine, op.cit., Book I, chapter 1.
- 93 ibid., Book XIII, chapter 5.
- 94 ibid., Book XIII, chapter 15.
- 95 ibid., Book VII, chapter 11.
- 96 Gilson, Etienne, Foreword to City of God (New York: Image, Doubleday & Co, 1958) p. 31.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 97 Franzen, op.cit., p. 89.
- 98 Ling, Trevor A History of Religion East and West [London: Macmillan, 1968] p. 282.
- 99 Graef, Hilda Devotion to the Blessed Virgin (London: Burns & Oates, 1963) p. 11.
- 100 Hurlbut, op.cit., p. 72.
- 101 Graef, op.cit., p. 18.
- 102 ibid., p. 22.
- 103 Franzen, op.cit., p. 77.
- 104 Kellett, E. E. A Short History of Religions (London: Victor Gollancz Ltd, 1933) pp. 219, 220.
- 105 Franzen, op.cit. pp. 76–78.
- 106 Wells, op.cit., p. 564.
- 107 Hurlbut, op.cit. p. 169.
- 108 Catholic Almanac 1975; Felician A. Foy, Ed. (Huntington, Ind., USA: 1974) Our Sunday Visitor, Inc., p. 326.
- 109 Graef, op.cit., p. 35.
- 110 Catholic Almanac 1975, op.cit., p. 348.
- 111 ibid., p. 305.
- 112 ibid., p. 348.
- 113 Catholic Almanac 1990; Felician A. Foy, Ed. (Huntington, Ind., USA: 1989) Our Sunday Visitor, Inc., p. 148.
- 114 Gibbon, Edward, Ed. D. A. Saunders The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1977] p. 483.
- 115 Brown, op.cit., pp. 398–400.
- 116 Catholic Almanac 1990, op.cit., p. 198.
- 117 Wells, op.cit., p. 515.
- 118 Franzen, op.cit., p. 78.
- 119 Catholic Almanac 1975, op.cit., pp. 163, 323.

CHAPTER 5: THE LOST OPPORTUNITY: FROM ROME TO MEDINA

- ¹ Johanson, Donald (Cleveland Museum of Natural History, press conference, Jan 1979).
- ² Gibbon, Edward. The Decline & Fall of the Roman Empire (Ed. Dero A. Saunders, The Portable Gibbon) [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1977] p. 621.
- ³ ibid., p. 622.
- ⁴ ibid., p. 623.
- ⁵ Mark 16:16 The Jerusalem Bible (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1968).
- ⁶ Wells, H. G. The Outline of History [London: Cassell, 1951] pp. 175–179.
- ⁷ Topping, Audrey National Geographic Vol 153, No. 4, April 1978.
- ⁸ Ling, Trevor A History of Religion East and West (London: Macmillan, 1968) p. 101.
- ⁹ ibid., p. 83.
- ¹⁰ Brownlee, W. H. contrib. The Interpreter's One-Volume Commentary on the Bible (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971) p. 411.
- ¹¹ Catholic Almanac 1975, op.cit., p. 157.
- ¹² Franzen, op.cit., p. 117.

- 13 Three authors put the date of the adoption of Roman Christianity by Clovis at 496, immediately after his victory over the Alemanni at Alsace. They are: Fisher, H. A. L. A history of Europe (London: Edward Arnold, 1955) p. 121; Revill, J. C. World History (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1953) p. 121; and Neill, Stephen A History of Christian Missions (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1964) p. 58, who dates his “conversion” as Christmas Day, 496, and links it to his marriage to a Christian Burgundian princess three years earlier.
- 14 McEvedy, op.cit., pp. 24, 26.
- 15 Franzen, op.cit., p. 121.
- 16 Revill, op.cit., p. 22. Theodoric arranged a series of diplomatic marriage alliances. He married a sister of Clovis, and two of his sisters and two of his daughters each married kings (of the Vandals, Thuringians, Visigoths and Burgundy).
- 17 Keen, Maurice The Pelican History of Medieval Europe (Harmondsworth: Penguin-Pelican, 1975) p. 29.
- 18 Franzen, op.cit., pp. 119–121.
- 19 Bettenson, Henry Ed. Documents of the Christian Church (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1967) p. 22.
- 20 Franzen, op.cit., pp. 121–122.
- 21 Zarnecki, George The Monastic Achievement (London: Thames & Hudson, 1972) p. 19.
- 22 Wells, op. cit., pp. 556–558.
- 23 Fisher, op. cit., p. 175.
- 24 Von Grunebaum, G. E. Classical Islam (London: George Allen & Unwin Ltd, 1970), p. 19.
- 25 ibid., pp. 21, 22.
- 26 ibid., pp. 22–23.
- 27 Gilbert, Martin Jewish History Atlas (London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976) p. 29.
- 28 ibid., p. 11.
- 29 Revill, op.cit., p. 127.
- 30 Lewis, Bernard The Arabs in History (London: Hutchinson University Library, 1966) p. 32.
- 31 Fisher, op.cit., p. 133.
- 32 von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 19.
- 33 McEvedy, Colin The Penguin Atlas of Medieval History (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1961) p. 30.
- 34 Franzen, op.cit., pp. 80, 81.
- 35 Lewis, op.cit., p. 34.
- 36 Lewis, op.cit., p. 30–31.
- 37 Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 22.
- 38 Data available on this period of Arabia’s history is limited and unreliable and historians have difficulty in dating many events such as Abraha’s bid to gain control of Mecca. Information in each of von Grunebaum, ibid, Lewis, ibid, and Watt, Montgomery Muhammad – Prophet and Statesman (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1964) is helpful.
- 39 McEvedy, op.cit., p. 28.
- 40 ibid., p. 32.
- 41 Franzen, op.cit., p. 32.
- 42 Livingstone, Elizabeth A. Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977) p. 507.
- 43 ibid., p. 430.
- 44 von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 19.
- 45 Watt, W. Montgomery Muhammad: Prophet and Statesman [London: Oxford, 1961], p. 5.

- ⁴⁶ Roth, Cecil A History of the Jews (New York: Schocken, 1970) pp. 145–46.
- ⁴⁷ Hurlbut, op.cit., p. 83.
- ⁴⁸ Catholic Almanac 1975, op.cit., p. 244.
- ⁴⁹ ibid., p. 373.
- ⁵⁰ ibid., p. 381.
- ⁵¹ Smith, G. D. contrib. Faith and Revealed Truth, The Teaching of the Catholic Church (London: Burns, Oates & Washbourne, 1949) p. 31.
- ⁵² Franzen, op.cit., p. 92.
- ⁵³ Avi-Yonah, Michael, contrib. Byzantine Jerusalem in Jerusalem, (Jerusalem: Keter Publishing, Israel Pocket Library, 1973) p. 47.
- ⁵⁴ ibid., pp. 38, 43.
- ⁵⁵ McEvedy, op.cit., p. 34.
- ⁵⁶ Hurlbut, op.cit., p. 91.
- ⁵⁷ Graef, op.cit., p. 34.
- ⁵⁸ Roth, op.cit., pp. 146–148.
- ⁵⁹ Wells, op.cit., p. 565.
- ⁶⁰ Catholic Almanac 1975, op.cit., p. 298.
- ⁶¹ I Samuel 5: 1–6, The Jerusalem Bible.
- ⁶² I Kings 8: 6–9, The Jerusalem Bible.
- ⁶³ Josephus, Flavius Antiquities of the Jews, trans. Wm. Whiston in The Complete Works of Flavius Josephus (London: Thomas Nelson, undated) pp. 220–223.
- ⁶⁴ Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 42.
- ⁶⁵ Wells, op.cit., p. 570.

CHAPTER 6: TURN BACK THE CLOCK

- ¹ Von Grunebaum, G.E. (trans. Katherine Watson) Classical Islam [London: George Allen & Unwin, 1970] p. 42.
- ² Wells, H.G. (Revised, Raymond Postgate) The Outline of History [London: Cassell, 1951] p. 570.
- ³ Watt, W. Montgomery Muhammad: Prophet and Statesman [London: Oxford, 1961] p. 231.
- ⁴ Kellett, A Short History Religions [London: Victor Gollancz, 1933] p. 333.
- ⁵ Hurlbut, J. L. The Story of the Christian Church [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970] p. 91.
- ⁶ Neill, Stephen. A History of Christian Missions [Harmondsworth: Penguin / Pelican, 1964] p. 14.
- ⁷ Davenport, R. A., publisher's note, The Life of George Sale, The Qur'an [London: William Tegg, 1869] pp. x–xi.
- ⁸ Sale, George, letter of inscription to Lord Carteret, The Koran, trans. by George Sale [London: William Tegg, 1869] p. iii.
- ⁹ Davenport, R. A., op.cit., pp. xi–xii.
- ¹⁰ The date of Muhammad's birth cannot be verified but it must have been within a few years of 570.
- ¹¹ Guillaume, Alfred. Islam [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1976] pp. 14–15.
- ¹² ibid., p. 16.
- ¹³ Von Grunebaum, op.cit., pp. 18–19.
- ¹⁴ Watt, op.cit., p. 7.

- 15 Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 29, refers to Khadija as “a rich merchant’s widow” and his wording indicates that her marriage to Muhammad was her second.
- Watt, op.cit., p. 12, refers to her as a “woman with property and independence who had already had two husbands.” Both writers say the evidence suggests that she may have been somewhat younger than the 40 years which Muslim tradition accepts.
- 16 ibid., p. 12.
- 17 Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 22.
- 18 The Qur’an, translation checked and revised by Mahmud Y. Zayid and approved by the Supreme Sunni and Shii Councils of the Republic of Lebanon [Beirut: Dar Al-Choura, 1980].
- 19 In his English translation of the Qur’an N.J. Dawood uses the word ‘religion’ in place of ‘brotherhood’, and in the verse referring to worshippers returning to their Lord he uses the word ‘salvation.’ and says “these vie with each other for salvation and are the first to attain it.”
- 20 George Sale retains the word ‘religion’ but in the second instance uses the words “these hasten unto good and foremost to obtain the same.”
- 21 Livingstone, Elizabeth A. Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977] pp. 27, 283, 343.
- 22 Jeffery, Arthur (Ed) Islam: Muhammad and His Religion [Indianapolis, USA Bobbs-Merrill Co Inc, The Library of Liberal Arts, 1958] p. 147.
- 23 ibid., p. 35.
- 24 The Qur’an. Trans. Zayid.
- 25 The way in which translators attempt to present a work in a second language (say, to maintain the literal meaning of the original, to interpret the author’s presentation so that it is more understandable in another culture, or to simplify language to present the work in a contemporary idiom) may lead to significant differences in emphasis or interpretation and can influence the readers’ understanding of the work or cause confusion, even if the translators have approached the work with essentially the same understanding of it. In view of that, and in view of the importance of The Night Journey, extracts from the three translations which have been used in the present work are set out here to show how the translators have presented two key phrases. The translations are by Zayid (approved by the Supreme Sunni and Shii Councils of the Republic of Lebanon, first published 1980); Sale (see above, first published 1734); and Dawood (Iraq State Scholar, London University 1945, first published 1956, fourth edition 1974).
1. Allah’s response in the event of a third transgression.
Sale: Peradventure your Lord will have mercy on you hereafter: but if ye return to transgress a third time, we also will return to chastise you; and we have appointed hell to be the prison of the unbelievers.
 [Sale notes that Muslims interpret this passage to refer to the contemporary Jewish rejection of Muhammad as a prophet and the ‘extermination’ of the tribe of Koreidha, etc.]
Dawood: We said: Allah may yet be merciful to you. If you again transgress, you shall again be scourged. We have made Hell a prison house for the unbelievers.
Zayid: It may be that Allah will have mercy upon you. But if you return (to mischief) We will return (with punishment). We have made Hell a prison-house for the unbelievers.
2. The matter of predestination or judgement.
Sale: The fate of every man have we bound about his neck; and we will produce unto him, on the day of resurrection, a book wherein his action shall be recorded: it shall be offered to him open, and the angels shall say unto him, Read thy book; thine own soul will be a sufficient accountant against thee, this day.
 [Sale notes that a literal translation would be the bird in place of fate, and this, to the Arabs, would signify a person’s fortune or success.]
Dawood: The fate of each man We have bound about his neck. On the Day of Resurrection We shall confront him with a book spread wide open, saying: ‘Here is your book: read it. Enough for you this day that your own soul should call you to account.

Zayid: The works of each man We have bound about his neck. On the Day of Resurrection, We shall confront him with a book spread wide open, (saying): 'Read your book. Enough for you this day that your own soul should call you to account.'

These translations involve considerable change in emphasis and the thrust is not the same in each case. As noted in the text, if one is using Dawood's translation it is more difficult to appreciate the relationship between the Night Journey, the Covenant of Sinai, Maimonides' understanding and expectations, and twentieth century events which have been referred to in the text and which will be dealt with in later chapters.

- ²⁶ Dawood, N. J. (Trans) Footnotes to the Qur'an [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1974] p. 234.
- ²⁷ Barnavi, Eli (Ed.) A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People [London: Kuperard, 1994] pp. 4–5.
- ²⁸ Meiseles, Meir. Judaism: Thought and Legend [New York: Feldheim, 1964] pp. 481–482.
- ²⁹ Dawood, loc. cit.
- ³⁰ Von Grunebaum, op. cit., p. 31.
- ³¹ Watt, op.cit., p. 68.
- ³² Hurlbut, op.cit., p. 90.
- ³³ Von Grunebaum, op.cit., pp. 36–45.
- ³⁴ Watt, op.cit., pp. 218–219.
- ³⁵ Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 46.
- ³⁶ ibid., p. 48.
- ³⁷ Watt, op.cit., p. 222.
- ³⁸ Guillaume, op. cit., p. 19.
- ³⁹ Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 54.
- ⁴⁰ ibid., p. 55.
- ⁴¹ ibid., p. 54.

CHAPTER 7: ON THE ROMAN ROAD

- ¹ Wells, op.cit., p. 610.
- ² ibid., p. 612.
- ³ Roth, op.cit., p. 146.
- ⁴ Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 67.
- ⁵ Wells, op.cit., p. 580.
- ⁶ ibid., p. 581.
- ⁷ Guillaume, op.cit., p. 111.
- ⁸ Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 58.
- ⁹ Hinnells, John R. (Ed.) Who's who of Religions (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1996) p. 18.
- ¹⁰ Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 48.
- ¹¹ Guillaume, op.cit., p. 116.
- ¹² Franzen, op.cit., pp. 81–82. According to Franzen it was the Sixth General Council, summoned by Emperor Constantine III.

- 13 Neuner, J. & J. Dupuis (Eds.) The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church (Bangalore: Theological Publications in India, 1978) pp. 165–166. According to Neuner it was the Third Council, convoked by Emperor Constantine VI “with the full consent of Pope Agatho.” He notes that there was correspondence between the Pope and the Emperor in March 1990 which formed the basis of doctrinal statements acclaimed at the fourth session of the council in November 680; the then Patriarch of Constantinople, Macarius, was condemned at the ninth session for promoting the “monothelistic tendency”; and the statements noted above were approved at its 18th and last session on September 16, 681.
- 14 Bettenson, Henry Documents of the Christian Church [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1967] pp. 92–93, The Third Council of Constantinople.
- 15 Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 63.
- 16 Franzen, op.cit., p. 122.
- 17 Livingstone, op.cit., p. 384.
- 18 Franzen, op.cit., p. 123.
- 19 ibid., p. 123.
- 20 Livingstone, op.cit., p. 384.
- 21 Wells, op.cit., p. 638.
- 22 McEvedy, Colin The Penguin Atlas of Medieval History (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1961), pp. 22–26.
- 23 Franzen, op.cit., p. 128.
- 24 Livingstone, op.cit., p. 374.
- 25 Dimont, Max I. Jews, God and History (New York: New American Library/Signet, 1962) p. 191.
- 26 Kellett, op.cit., p. 255.
- 27 Franzen, op.cit., p. 124.
- 28 ibid., p. 125.
- 29 ibid., p. 131.
- 30 Livingstone, op.cit., p. 70.
- 31 Franzen, op.cit., p. 130.
- 32 Wells, op.cit., p. 637.
- 33 von Grunebaum, op. cit., p. 66.
- 34 Franzen, op.cit., p. 132.
- 35 Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 371.
- 36 Bettenson, op.cit., p. 94.
- 37 Livingstone, op.cit., p. 254.
- 38 von Grunebaum, op.cit., pp. 78–80.
- 39 Franzen, op.cit., p. 145

CHAPTER 8: A CHALLENGE WITH A DIFFERENCE

- 1 Gambling systems run by Totalisator Agency Boards.
- 2 World Council of Churches.
- 3 Franzen, op.cit., pp. 154–155.
- 4 Wells, op.cit., p. 647.
- 5 Bettenson, op.cit., p. 184.

⁶ Livingstone, op.cit., p. 505.

⁷ Dillenberger, John Martin Luther (New York: Doubleday, 1961), introduction p.xx.

⁸ See the final section of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, The Laws of Kings and Their Wars, [New York/Jerusalem: Moznaim, 1987], notably chapters 5, 6 and 8 and commentary by Rabbi Eliyahu Touger.

Chapter 6 reads, in part:

Halachah 1. "War, whether a milchemet hareshut (fought to expand the boundaries of Eretz Yisrael) or a milchemet mitzvah (fought against Amalek or one of the seven idol-worshipping Canaanite nations) should not be waged against anybody until he is offered the opportunity of peace as [Deuteronomy 20:10] states: 'when you approach a city to wage war against it, you must propose a peaceful settlement.' If [the enemy] accepts the offer of peace and commits itself to the Seven Mitzvot that were commanded to Noah's descendants, none of them should be killed. Rather, they should be subjugated, as [ibid:11] states: 'They shall be your subjects and serve you.' If they agree to tribute, but do not accept subjugation, or if they accept subjugation, but do not agree to tribute, their offer should not be heeded. [They must] accept both. ...

Halachah 3. It is forbidden to lie when making such a covenant or to be untruthful with them after they have made peace and accepted the Seven Mitzvot.

Halachah 4. If they do not agree to a peaceful settlement, or if they agree to a peaceful settlement, but refuse to accept the Seven Mitzvot, war should be waged against them.

⁹ Grollenberg, Luc. H. Shorter Atlas of the Bible [London: Thomas Nelson, 1959] p. 135 (quoting Jewish historian Josephus).

¹⁰ Franzen, op.cit., p. 164.

¹¹ McEvedy, op.cit., p. 52.

¹² Franzen, op.cit., p. 167.

¹³ Wells, op.cit., p. 654.

¹⁴ Franzen, op.cit., p. 178.

¹⁵ Catholic Almanac 1975, pp. 171, 173.

¹⁶ Neill, op.cit., p. 88.

¹⁷ Pipes Richard, Russia under the old regime (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1977) pp. 35–36.

¹⁸ Neill, op. cit., p. 89.

¹⁹ Pipes, op. cit., p. 157.

²⁰ Gilbert, op.cit., p. 26.

²¹ McEvedy, op.cit., p. 38.

²² Lilienthal Alfred M. What Price Israel? (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1953) pp. 220, 222.

²³ Gilbert, op.cit., p. 26.

²⁴ ibid., p. 25.

²⁵ The Khazar Khanate is not the only example of a population with no ancestral linkage with Abraham having adopted Judaism en masse, but it is the classic example of such an event since the beginning of the Christian Era. Another example, (the use of an army of pagan mercenaries by John Hyrcanus to force the Idumaeans to adopt Judaism and to accept the practice of circumcision), has been referred to in footnote ⁶, page 4 above. However, because that incident took place during the pre-Christian consolidation of Eretz Yisrael no distinction is generally made between the descendants of the Idumaeen converts and the descendants of Abraham who formed the basis of the Jewish community when the Christian Era dawned. The Torah includes specific provision for the acceptance of converts into the community and, as noted in earlier chapters, there have been periods of active proselytizing during the Christian Era with acceptance of the converts on a similar basis.

²⁶ Gilbert, op.cit., pp. 26, 31, 32.

²⁷ Lilienthal, op.cit., p. 222.

- 28 Roth, Cecil. A history of the Jews (New York: Schocken Books, 1974) pp. 158–162.
- 29 McEvedy, op.cit., pp. 54–84.
- 30 Heschel, Abraham Joshua Maimonides [New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1982] p. 9.
- 31 Gribetz, Greenstein & Stein. The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster/Touchstone, 1993] pp. 115–120.
- 32 Heschel, op. cit., p. 196.
- 33 Gribetz, op. cit., p. 121.
- 34 Heschel, op. cit., p. 97.
- 35 Barnavi, op. cit., p. 103.
- 36 Touger, Eliyahu introduction to Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, final volume, The Laws of Kings and Their Wars [New York/Jerusalem; Moznaim, 1987] pp. vii–ix.
- 37 A paraphrase of the Jerusalem English language translation.
- 38 Touger, op. cit., p. 234.
- 39 ibid., p. 236.
- 40 Touger, loc. cit.
- 41 See also Minkin, Jacob S. The Teachings of Maimonides [Northvale, New Jersey: Jason Aronson, 1993] pp. 398–401. Minkin devotes four pages to the issue of the Messiah and the Messianic Age. He interprets the Rambam's teaching as referring to two Messiahs: "the first, namely, David, who saved Israel from the hand of their enemies; and the later Messiah, a descendant of David, who will achieve the final salvation." The (later) Messiah will be a mortal human being who will die and will be succeeded by his son who will reign after him. He will excel in wisdom and learning and the fear of God. The world will continue in its usual course; there will be rich and poor, strong and weak, no change in the order of nature or man, except that, freed from oppression, the Jews will be able to devote themselves more completely to the service of God and knowledge of the Torah."..."He who does not believe in the restoration or does not look forward to the coming of the Messiah denies not only the teachings of the prophets but also those of the Law of Moses ..." Minkin does not make any reference to Gog or Magog or to the way in which the Messianic Era will be ushered in. He moves straight to his interpretation of Maimonides' teaching about the Messianic Age. He notes that the world will continue in its normal course except that independent sovereignty will be restored to Israel, oppression and servitude will cease, and Israel will live securely among the wicked of the heathens who will all "accept the true religion, and will neither plunder nor destroy, and together with Israel earn a comfortable living in a legitimate way."
- 42 Rowley, H.H. Dictionary of Bible Personal Names [London; Nelson, 1968] p. 121.
- 43 John H. Marks contributing commentary on The Book of Genesis in The Interpreter's One-volume Commentary on the Bible [Nashville: Abingdon, 1971] p. 9.
- 44 Gribetz, op. cit., pp. 2, 6.
- 45 Barnavi, op. cit., p. 2.
- 46 Phillips, J. B. The Book of Revelation [London: Collins/Fontana, 1957] p. 13.
- 47 Barclay, William The Revelation of John, Vol II, in The Daily Study Bible series [Edinburgh: Saint Andrew Press, 1959] p. 269.
- 48 From the Koran, Sura 18: 83–110, English translation approved by the Sunni and Shii Councils of the Republic of Lebanon, checked and revised by Mahmud Y. Zayid, [Beirut: Dar Al-Choura, 1980] pp. 217–219. Paragraphing omitted.
- 49 Heschel, op. cit., p. 183.
- 50 ibid., p. 185.
- 51 ibid., p. 199.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 52 Maimonides, Moses. The Guide of the Perplexed Trans. Chaim Rabin (New York: Hebrew Publishing Co., East & West Library, 1978) p. 85.
- 53 ibid., p. 135.
- 54 ibid., book III, pp. 151 f.
- 55 Epstein, Isidore. Judaism (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1959) pp. 208–216.
- 56 Maimonides, quoted by Meir Meiseles Judaism, Thought and Legend Trans. Rebecca Schonfeld-Brand and Aryeh Newman (Jerusalem: Feldheim Publishers, 1964) p. 575.
- 57 Barnavi, op. cit., p. 103.
- 58 A systematic attack on the Talmud was first mounted in 1144 by Peter the Venerable, the Abbot of Cluny, but that does not appear to have involved confiscation and destruction. [Barnavi, op. cit. P. 106.] The same man arranged for the Koran to be translated into Latin and attacked Islam in his writings. [Livingstone, Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 396.]
- 59 Maimonides, Yesodei ha'Torah, quoted by Meir Meiseles, op.cit., pp. 476–477.
- 60 Graef, op.cit., p. 60.
- 61 Maimonides, quoted by Meir Meiseles, op.cit., p. 575.
- 62 ibid., p. 573.
- 63 Dimont, Max I. The indestructible Jews (New York: Signet, 1973) pp. 205–207.
- 64 Graef, op.cit., p. 36.
- 65 ibid., pp. 53–54, 42–43, 49.
- 66 ibid., pp. 46–47.
- 67 Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 366.
- 68 Graef, op.cit., p. 77.
- 69 Ignaz Goldziher, Introduction to Islamic Theology and Law, Trans. Andras and Ruth Hamori (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1981), pp. 122–123. Muhammad insisted that the married state was the norm for Muslim community life, he expected Muslim leaders to be drawn from the ranks of married men, and he was scornful of those who neglected their normal duties to spend more time than required in devotions. Goldziher describes several situations to illustrate this point. The Prophet is reported to have rebuked a man named 'Akkaf ibn Wada al-Hilali, who had decided upon an unmarried life, with the words: "So you have made up your mind to be one of the brethren of Satan! If you want to be a Christian monk join them openly. If you are one of us, you must follow our sunna; and our sunna is married life."
- 70 Von Grunebaum, op.cit., pp. 64–79, The Umayyads.
- 71 Guillaume, Alfred. Islam (Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1956) pp. 82–83.
- 72 Von Grunebaum, op.cit., pp. 80–85.
- 73 Goldziher, op.cit., p. 32.
- 74 ibid., p. 46.
- 75 Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 83 and chronology, p. 205.
- 76 Goldziher, op.cit., pp. 44, 49.
- 77 Mian Rashid Ahmad Khan, Islamic Jurisprudence (Lahore: Sh. Mohd Khalil, Premier Book House, 1983) pp. 6–8.
- 78 Von Grunebaum, op.cit., p. 83.
- 79 Goldziher, op.cit., p. 50.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 80 For a long time the concept of ijma' had a stabilizing but conservative influence throughout Dar al Islam which Western Christian authorities and colonizers were quick to take advantage of. However in recent years, as a result of the twentieth century development of mass media with its immeasurable impact on public opinion and enormous power as an instrument of propaganda, the ijma' has had a very radicalizing influence, leading to the adoption, or acceptance, of some extreme social and political positions. This will be discussed in later chapters.
- 81 Goldziher, op.cit., pp. 97–98.
- 82 Von Grunebaum, op.cit., pp. 92, 205.
- 83 Goring, Rosemary (Ed.) The Wordsworth Dictionary of Beliefs & Religions (Ware, Herts.: Wordsworth Editions, 1995) p. 354.
- 84 Roth, op.cit., p. 154.
- 85 Barnavi, Eli (Ed) A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People (London: Kuperard, 1994) p. 88.
- 86 Roth, op.cit., p. 153.
- 87 Livingstone, op.cit., pp. 137, 406.
- 88 Franzen, op.cit., pp. 194–198.
- 89 Lewis, Brenda Ralph The Crusades (London: Transworld Publishers, 1975) pp. 8–11.
- 90 Wells, op.cit., pp. 665–673.
- 91 Franzen, loc.cit.
- 92 Wells, loc.cit.
- 93 Barnavi, loc.cit.
- 94 ibid., p. 106.
- 95 Lewis, loc.cit.
- 96 Livingstone, op.cit., p. 505.
- 97 Neill, op.cit., pp. 110–112.
- 98 ibid., p. 111.
- 99 ibid., p. 115.
- 100 Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 165.
- 101 Livingstone, op. cit., pp. 13, 69, 95.
- 102 Wells, op.cit., p. 671.
- 103 McEvedy, op.cit., p. 76.
- 104 Franzen, op.cit., p. 217.
- 105 Catholic Almanac 1975, page 167.
- 106 Livingstone, op.cit., pp. 13, 158, 260.
- 107 Roth, op.cit., p. 177.
- 108 Clark, Mary T. An Aquinas Reader (New York: Doubleday/Image, 1972) pp. 535, 541.
- 109 Roth, op.cit., p. 200.
- 110 Aquinas, Thomas. Foreword to Summa Theologiae. Trans. Thomas Gilby (New York: Doubleday/Image, 1969).
- 111 Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 165.
- 112 Bettenson, op.cit., p. 147 f.
- 113 Clark, op.cit., introduction, chronology, pp. 23, 39.
- 114 Aquinas, quoted by Clark, op.cit., p. 111.
- 115 Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, quoted by Clark, op.cit., pp. 436–437 & 442/443.

¹¹⁶ Livingstone, op.cit., p. 261.

¹¹⁷ The New Hutchinson 20th Century Encyclopedia, Australian Edition, 1977, p. 660.

¹¹⁸ Bettenson, op.cit., quoting Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, Pt II, Q XI, article 3, pp. 133/134.

¹¹⁹ Hutchinson, op.cit., p. 64.

Hutchinson Encyclopedia, op.cit., p. 64, notes that in 1879 Leo XIII “directed that Aquinas’ teaching should be the basis of the theology of the Catholic Church.”

The Catholic Almanac 1997, notes, p. 128, that in the encyclical Aeterni Patris of August 4, 1879, Leo XIII “ordered a renewal of philosophical and theological studies in seminaries along scholastic, and especially Thomistic, lines, to counteract influential trends of liberalism and Modernism. On p. 198 it also notes that Aquinas was “named patron of Catholic schools and education, 1880.”

Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from Thomas Aquinas, Assessment, notes:

Thomas Aquinas was canonized a saint in 1323, officially named doctor of the church in 1567, and proclaimed the protagonist of orthodoxy during the modernist crisis at the end of the 19th century. This continuous commendation, however, cannot obliterate the historical difficulties in which he was embroiled in the 13th century during a radical theological renewal—a renewal that was contested at the time and yet was brought about by the social, cultural, and religious evolution of the West. Thomas was at the heart of the doctrinal crisis that confronted Christendom when the discovery of Greek science, culture, and thought seemed about to crush it. William of Tocco, Aquinas’ first biographer, who had known him and was able to give evidence of the impression produced by his master’s teaching, says:

Brother Thomas raised new problems in his teaching, invented a new method, used new systems of proof. To hear him teach a new doctrine, with new arguments, one could not doubt that God, by the irradiation of this new light and by the novelty of this inspiration, gave him the power to teach, by the spoken and written word, new opinions and new knowledge.

¹²⁰ Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 245.

¹²¹ Pope Benedict XV, Canons Nos. 589 and 1366, 1917.

¹²² Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, Pt I, Q. 1.

¹²³ Aquinas, Exposition on the Lord’s Prayer, quoted in Clark, op.cit., p. 528.

¹²⁴ Clark, op.cit., pp. 535, 541 f.

¹²⁵ Maimonides, Moses. The Guide of the Perplexed. 80, and Guttman’s commentary, p. 211.

¹²⁶ Clark, op.cit., introduction pp. 21, 24.

¹²⁷ Hutchinson, loc.cit.

¹²⁸ Clark, op. cit., p. 20.

¹²⁹ Guttman, Julius. Introduction to Maimonides’Guide of the perplexed.’

¹³⁰ Minkin, Jacob S. Preface to The Teachings of Maimonides [Northvale, New Jersey: Jason Aronson, 1993] p. 6.

¹³¹ Hertzberg, Arthur Contributing the introduction to Minkin, The Teachings of Maimonides, pp. ii, vi.

¹³² The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization.

¹³³ Hertzberg, op. cit., pp. i, ii.

¹³⁴ In fact those links had been weakened, (some may say severed), by earlier programs of proselytizing in Arabia, the Persian Empire, Ethiopia, North Africa and Europe, and the establishment of the Jewish Kingdoms of Mahaza and the Yemen are especially noteworthy in this regard. However in terms of scale and impact on the thinking of both the Jewish community and the Christians of Europe it is the formation and destruction of the Khazar Khanate which must be regarded as an historic beacon.

CHAPTER 9: WHEN THE COFFER RINGS

¹ Keen, op.cit., p. 187.

- ² Roth, op.cit., p. 266.
 - ³ Synan, Edward A. The Popes and the Jews in the Middle Ages (London: Macmillan, 1967) pp. 110–111.
 - ⁴ ibid., p. 116.
 - ⁵ Hurlbut, op.cit., p. 87.
 - ⁶ Synan, op.cit., p. 85.
 - ⁷ Bettenson, op.cit., p. 112.
 - ⁸ ibid.
 - ⁹ Franzen, August. A Concise History of the Church [New York: Herder & Herder, 1969] pp. 222–223.
 - ¹⁰ Paul, Leslie A Church by Daylight [London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1973] pp. 9–10.
 - ¹¹ Livingstone, Elizabeth A. Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977] p. 13.
 - ¹² Bettenson, op. cit., pp. 132–133.
 - ¹³ Roth, op.cit., pp. 192–195.
 - ¹⁴ Pipes, Richard. Russia under the old regime (Harmondsworth: Penguin-Peregrine, 1977) chapter 2.
 - ¹⁵ Synan, op.cit., p. 118.
 - ¹⁶ Gilbert, Martin. Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] p. 41.
 - ¹⁷ Synan, op.cit., pp. 121–122.
 - ¹⁸ Gilbert, op.cit., pp. 45–46.
 - ¹⁹ Bettenson, Henry Documents of the Christian Church (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1967) p. 115.
 - ²⁰ Hurlbut, J. L. The Story of the Christian Church [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970] pp. 86–87.
 - ²¹ Ling, Trevor. A History of Religion East and West [London: Macmillan, 1968] pp. 282–283.
 - ²² Catholic Almanac, 1975, p. 160.
 - ²³ Barnavi, Eli (Gen. Ed.) A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People [London: Kuperard, 1994] pp. 110–111 and Demographic Introduction.
- The population of the world is estimated to have been 442 million a few years prior to the Black Death and to have fallen by 15 percent to 375 million in 1400. During the same period the world Jewish population is estimated to have fallen from one and one third million to one million, a drop of 25 percent. However, considering that the Jewish population was concentrated into only three regions, North Africa and the Middle East where they enjoyed relative security provided by Muslim governments and where the plague was of little consequence, and Europe, and that there were very few Jews elsewhere, the percentage drop in Europe was clearly far greater than that average of 25 percent. A reasonable estimate would be 50 to 60 percent. As indicated previously, (chapter seven, pp. 10, 13.) the Jewish community could be expected to suffer lower mortality rates because of its strict dietary and hygiene codes than the general population. Thus, if the average mortality rate for the whole population was between 25 and 33 percent, or about half of the rate for the Jewish community, the scale of the church's atrocities is quite clear.
- ²⁴ Synan, op.cit., pp. 131–134.
 - ²⁵ Roth, op.cit., pp. 214–215.
 - ²⁶ Catholic Almanac 1990, p. 127.
 - ²⁷ Johnson, Paul. A History of Christianity (London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976) p. 259.
 - ²⁸ McEvedy, Colin The Penguin Atlas of Modern History (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972) p. 2.
 - ²⁹ Keen, Maurice The Pelican History of Medieval Europe (Harmondsworth: Penguin-Pelican, 1969) pp. 233–237.
 - ³⁰ Franzen, op.cit., p. 231.

- 31 Ample correspondence and extracts from speeches remain to show the extent of the resentment and intrigue between the church and the civil or secular authorities, but a note from Marsiglio's Defensor pacis indicates the depth of feeling and fear about the papacy's intentions. He argued that the ambitions of the papacy had become the prime cause of war and the dissolvent of Christian social unity saying: "The singular cause which in the past has produced civil discord in princedoms and communities, and which will soon spread to other states unless checked, is the belief, the desire and the efforts by means of which the Roman bishop and his clerical associates, in particular, aim to seize each secular sovereignty and so gain possession of its temporal wealth." (Paul Johnson. A History of Christianity. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976. P. 202.)
- 32 Franzen, op.cit., p. 230.
- 33 Livingstone, op.cit., p. 323.
- 34 Catholic Almanac 1990, p. 117.
- 35 Livingstone, op.cit., p. 555.
- 36 Catholic Almanac 1990, p. 129.
- 37 Seven cardinals were not present, but considering that six of them were at Avignon and only one was in Italy it is hardly conceivable that the ratio could have changed in favour of Rome.
- 38 Franzen, op.cit., p. 232.
- 39 Harney, Martin P. The Catholic Church through the Ages (Boston: Daughters of St. Paul, 1974) pp. 205–206.
- 40 Harney, op.cit., p. 212.
- 41 Bettenson, op.cit., p. 135, uses the title 'Sacrosancta' but as other authors consulted use the title 'Haec Sancta' that title is used here.
- 42 Hurlbut, J. L. The Story of the Christian Church (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970) pp. 111–112.
- 43 Deane, David J. Two Noble Lives (London: S. W. Partridge & Co., undated) p. 103.
- 44 Bettenson, op.cit., p. 135.
- 45 Franzen, op.cit., p. 238.
- 46 Neill, Stephen A History of Christian Missions [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1964] p. 130.
- 47 Ling, Trevor A History of Religion East and West [London: Macmillan, 1968] pp. 228–230.
Ling lists Mahmud's invasion as the third phase of Muslim contact with India, the missionary work of the Sufis as the fourth, and the Turkish invasion which led to the setting up of the Mughal Empire as the fifth.
- 48 Von Grunebaum, G. E. Classical Islam [London: George Allen & Unwin Ltd, 1970] p. 152.
- 49 Neill, op.cit., p. 131.
- 50 Von Grunebaum, op. cit., p. 152.
- 51 Neill, op.cit., pp. 128–129.
- 52 Firm dates can not be given for this incident because the information available is inadequate and historians differ in the years quoted for this and related matters.
- 53 Barnavi, op.cit., pp. 114–115.
- 54 McEvedy, op.cit., p. 82.
- 55 Other dogmatic statements, notably those relating to purgatory and the use of alternative hosts in the mass were modified to accommodate different practices and understandings in the east and the west, but these were relatively minor matters. See The Decree for the Greeks, Neuner, pp. 107, 215, 388, 625.
- 56 Pastor, Ludwig (Ed. F. I. Antrobus) The History of the Popes from the close of the Middle Ages (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co. Ltd; 1923) Vol II, pp. 248–251.
- 57 Pastor, op.cit., pp. 74–86.
- 58 Barnavi, loc.cit.
- 59 Pastor, op.cit., pp. 267–268.

- 60 ibid., pp. 268–269.
- 61 Pipes, op.cit., pp. 71–73.
- 62 The Hutchinson 20th Century Encyclopedia pp. 1022, 581, 349.
- 63 Hurlbut, op.cit., p. 118.
- 64 Wells, op.cit., p. 193.
- 65 Bruce, Neil. Portugal: The Last Empire (London: David & Charles, Newton Abbot; 1975) pp. 47–48.
- 66 Scannell, T. B. (transcribed, D. J. Potter) “Pope Nicholas V” [The Catholic Encyclopedia. Source: <http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/11058a.htm> as at May 14, 2000].
- 67 Bruce, loc.cit.
- 68 Fisher, H.A.L. A History of Europe [London: Arnold, 1936] p. 485.
- 69 King Alfonso of Castile and his supporters, who deposed Alfonso’s half brother, Henry IV, on June 5, 1465, had demanded that the Inquisition be reinforced at that time, so it took some years to get it fully operational. (Barnavi, loc.cit.)
- 70 Catholic Almanac 1990, p. 118.
- 71 Roth, op.cit., p. 224.
- 72 Barnavi, loc.cit.
- 73 Whether these instructions were before the Toledo Statute incident or at the time that he approved the tightening of the Inquisition is not clear. (See page 31 above.)
- 74 Roth, op.cit., p. 225.
- 75 Synan, op.cit., p. 141.
- 76 Revill, J. C. World History [London: Longmans, Green, 1953] p. 275.
- 77 Roth, op.cit., p. 226.
- 78 Gilbert, op.cit., p. 45.
- 79 Barnavi, op.cit., pp. 120–121, 130–131.
- 80 Wells, op.cit., p. 772.
- 81 Gilbert, op.cit., p. 47.
- 82 Pendle, George. A History of Latin America (Harmondsworth: Penguin-Pelican, 1978) p. 34.
- 83 Synan, op.cit., p. 145.
- 84 Fisher, op.cit., p. 489.
- 85 Franzen, op.cit., p. 251.
- 86 Chadwick, Owen. The Reformation (Harmondsworth: Penguin-Pelican, 1977) pp. 31–39.
- 87 Livingstone, op.cit., p. 176.
- 88 Franzen, op.cit., pp. 260–263.
- 89 Menen, Aubrey. Upon This Rock (New York: Saturday Review Press, 1972) p. 88.
- 90 Pastor, op.cit., vol. III, pp. 402–403.
- 91 ibid., loc.cit.
- 92 Chadwick, op.cit., pp. 41–42.
- 93 ibid., p. 43, footnote.

CHAPTER 10: THE ONE THAT GOT AWAY

- ¹ St. Peters was not in fact reconstructed to the first grandiose plans drawn up, because of limitations imposed by the site available, structural capacity of the soil and foundations and finances.
 - ² McEvedy, Colin & R. Jones Atlas of World Population History (Harmondsworth: Penguin-Pelican, 1978) p. 353, give their estimate of 415 million and refer to other authorities estimates of 427 million (Clark) and 446 million (Bennett). Barnavi, Eli, A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People [London: Kuperard, 1994] (introduction) gives a higher estimate of 461 million.
 - ³ Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 365.
 - ⁴ Franzen, op. cit., pp. 130, 140.
 - ⁵ Pendle, op. cit., pp. 24–25.
 - ⁶ McEvedy, Colin. The Penguin Atlas of Modern History (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972) p. 8.
 - ⁷ Chadwick, Owen. The Reformation [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1972] p. 42.
 - ⁸ Dillenberger, John. Martin Luther (New York: Doubleday/Anchor, 1961) p. 407, extract quoted from Martin Luther's An Appeal to the Ruling Class of Germany.
 - ⁹ Kuhner, Hans. Encyclopedia of the Papacy (London: Peter Owen, 1959) pp. 118–122.
 - ¹⁰ Pastor, Ludwig (Ed. F. I. Antrobus) The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages [London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co. Ltd; 1923] vol II.
 - ¹¹ Franzen, op. cit., pp. 254–256.
 - ¹² Dillenberger, op. cit., pp. 417–431.
 - ¹³ ibid.
 - ¹⁴ Franzen, op.cit., p. 248.
 - ¹⁵ Livingstone, Elizabeth A. Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977] p. 14.
 - ¹⁶ Pastor, Ludwig, The History of the Popes, from the close of the Middle Ages, Vol VIII. Ralph Francis Kerr (Ed.) [London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1923]. 96–97.
 - ¹⁷ ibid., pp. 122–123.
 - ¹⁸ ibid., pp. 406–407.
 - ¹⁹ ibid., pp. 410–411.
 - ²⁰ Kuhner, op.c it., p. 145.
 - ²¹ O'Grady, Joan. Heresy (Longmead: Element Books, 1985) pp. 4–6.
 - ²² ibid., p. 52.
 - ²³ When his disciples asked Jesus to explain the parable of the darnel he said: 'The sower of the good seed is the Son of Man. The field is the world; the good seed stands for the children of the Kingdom, the darnel for the children of the evil one. The enemy who sowed the darnel is the devil. The harvest is the end of time. The reapers are angels. As the darnel, then, is gathered up and burnt, so at the end of time the Son of Man will send out his angels, who will gather out of his kingdom whatever makes men stumble, and all whose deeds are evil, and these will be thrown into the blazing furnace, the place of wailing and grinding of teeth. And then the righteous will shine as brightly as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. If you have ears, then hear. ...
- ‘Again the kingdom of Heaven is like a net let down into the sea, where fish of every kind were caught in it. When it was full, it was dragged ashore. Then the men sat down and collected the good fish into pails and threw the worthless away. That is how it will be at the end of time. The angels will go forth, and they will separate the wicked from the good, and throw them into the blazing furnace, the place of wailing and grinding of teeth.

‘Have you understood all this?’ he asked; and they answered, ‘Yes.’ He said to them, ‘When, therefore, a teacher of the law has become a learner in the kingdom of Heaven, he is like a householder who can produce from his store both the new and the old.’

Matthew 13: 37–43, 47–52. The New English Bible translation.

²⁴ O’Grady. op. cit., p. 4.

²⁵ ibid., p. 49.

²⁶ Franzen, op. cit., pp. 249–250.

²⁷ O’Grady, op. cit., pp. 45–46, quoting from Eusebius’ Church History 2, i.(4).

²⁸ Definition of heresy from the Code of Canon Law, English translation, (London: Collins, 1983), p. 138, Canon 751.

²⁹ ibid., Canon 750.

³⁰ Chadwick, op. cit., pp. 78–79.

³¹ ibid., p. 97.

³² This was partly because of England’s isolation and partly because of English resistance to the French connection with the papacy, fear of French intervention in English affairs, and the effect of laws restricting the popes’ authority to direct English bishops, beginning with the statute of Praemunire in 1393.

³³ Catherine was betrothed to Arthur when she was two and they were married in 1501 when she was 16. Arthur died the next year and Catherine was then betrothed to Henry who was then 11 years of age. Their marriage took place in 1509 when Henry became king, aged 18, and she was 24.

³⁴ Franzen, op. cit., pp. 249, 251.

³⁵ The election of a new emperor developed into a straight contest between Francis I of France and Charles V in which Pope Leo X agitated against Charles and in favor of Charles. In spite of that, or perhaps because of it, Charles was elected unanimously by the princes in June 1519. He was crowned in October 1520. See below, p. 17R re bribes paid to princes.

³⁶ Often referred to as On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church.

³⁷ Dillenberger, John. Martin Luther: Selections from his writings edited and with an introduction [New York: Doubleday, 1961] pp. 5, 3–4. Extracts from Martin Luther’s preface to his Latin Writings.

³⁸ Wendel, Francois. (Trans. P. Mairet) Calvin (London: Collins/Fontana, 1976) p. 86.

³⁹ ibid., p. 92.

⁴⁰ Luther never deviated from that view but in later years he went even further. In the preface to his Latin Writings, referring to that early crisis in his relations with Rome, he wrote: “Finally ... I had already defended the proposition publicly that the Pope is not the head of the church by divine right. Never-the-less, I did not draw the conclusion, namely, that the Pope must be of the devil. For what is not of God must of necessity be of the devil.” Dillenberger, op. cit., p. 9.

⁴¹ Luther’s reply to the summons to appear before the Diet at Worms gives another illustration of his view of the church, his self-understanding and humility, and his determination. He wrote that he was providing a simple answer because that was what the emperor and the bishops had asked for, then he said: “Unless I am convinced by the testimony of the Scriptures or by clear reason (for I do not trust either in the Pope or in councils alone, since it is well known that they have often erred and contradicted themselves), I am bound by the Scriptures I have quoted and my conscience is captive to the Word of God. I cannot and I will not retract anything, since it is neither safe nor right to go against conscience. ... May God help me. Amen.” Dillenberger, op. cit., introduction p. xxii.

⁴² Chadwick, op. cit., p. 80.

⁴³ Wendel, op. cit., p. 21.

⁴⁴ ibid., p. 20.

⁴⁵ This draconian regulation was based on Matthew 16:19, the very passage on which Rome relies to justify its ecclesiastical authority.

- 46 Wendel, op. cit., p. 79.
- 47 ibid., pp. 93–102.
- 48 ibid., p. 97.
- 49 ibid., p. 98.
- 50 ibid., p. 101.
- 51 Hurlbut, op. cit., p. 132.
- 52 Wendel, op. cit., p. 101.
- 53 Sources of biographical material include the Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, the Penguin Reference Who's who of Religions, and the Wordsworth Dictionary of Beliefs and Religions as well as Chadwick, Dillenberger and Wendel.
- 54 Franzen, ibid.
- 55 Dillenberger, op. cit., pp. 3–12, quoting M. Luther, Preface to Latin Writings.
- 56 Chadwick, op. cit., p. 49.
- 57 Ninety thousand ducats went to secure the vote of the prince Archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg whose offices carried one of the seven German votes in imperial elections and whose sale of indulgences to finance his mere 40,000 ducats papal dispensation had triggered the Reformation two years before.[30] (See page 1/XII/41).
- 58 McEvedy, Modern, op. cit., p. 30.
- 59 Chadwick, op. cit., p. 266.
- 60 ibid., pp. 267–271.
- 61 Kuhner, op. cit., p. 165.
- 62 Chadwick, loc. cit.
- 63 Kuhner, op. cit., p. 174.
- 64 Fisher, op. cit., pp. 611–631.
- 65 Livingstone, op. cit., p. 19.

CHAPTER 11: FOLLOW THE LEADERS

- 1 The term 'church' must be qualified by the term 'Roman' at this stage because the trigger for the process of reformation within the Western Church was only then being set, the papacy was exclusively involved in the arrangements being made, and neither the Greek wing of the church nor the fragments of it which would later coalesce into the Russian Orthodox Church were in a position to be involved in such adventures.
- 2 Neill, Stephen. A History of Christian Missions [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1964] p. 170.
- 3 Pipes, Richard. Russia Under the Old Regime (Harmondsworth: Penguin-Peregrine, 1977) pp. 80–83.
- 4 Pendle, George. A History of Latin America [Harmondsworth: Penguin-Pelican, 1978] pp. 39–42.
- 5 Kuhner, Hans. Encyclopedia of the Papacy [London: Peter Owen, 1959] p. 150–f.
- 6 Pendle, op. cit., pp. 42–46.
- 7 Kuhner, op. cit., pp. 153–154.
- 8 Harris, Joseph E. Africans and their History [New York: New American Library/Mentor, 1972] pp. 65–69.
- 9 Von Grunebaum, G. E. Classical Islam [London: George Allen & Unwin Ltd, 1970] p. 117.
- 10 Harris, op. cit., pp. 43, 68.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 11 The religion of the Norsemen had been established in Iceland by Viking settlers during the previous two hundred years while Rome was trying to subdue or Christianize Scandinavia. Papal Christianity was also enforced in Iceland from 1030, as far as possible, but it was later superseded by Lutheran Christianity at the same time as in Denmark. In spite of those impositions the Norse religion survived and was officially recognized by the Icelandic government in 1973. Livingstone, Elizabeth A. Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977] p. 361. The Hutchinson 20th Century Encyclopedia p. 923.
- 12 McEvedy, Colin. Atlas of Medieval History [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1977] p. 60.
- 13 Livingstone, Elizabeth A. Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977] p. 23.
- 14 Hutchinson, op. cit., pp. 606, 804, 1302.
- 15 Von Grunebaum, op. cit., p. 149.
- 16 Harris, op. cit., p. 53.
- 17 ibid., p. 54.
- 18 ibid., pp. 68–69.
- 19 ibid., p. 56.
- 20 McEvedy, Colin. The Penguin Atlas of Modern History [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972] pp. 34, 43.
- 21 Harris, op. cit., p. 56.
- 22 McEvedy (Modern), pp. 16, 30, map 17.
- 23 Harris, op. cit., pp. 131–132.
- 24 Neill, op. cit., p. 143.
- 25 ibid., p. 150.
- 26 ibid., p. 152.
- 27 Wells, op. cit., pp. 720–724.
- 28 Neill, op. cit., p. 145.
- 29 ibid., pp. 180–181.
- 30 Aykroyd, W. R. Sweet Malefactor [London: Heinemann, 1967] p. 19.
- 31 Columbus' father-in-law owned a sugar plantation on Madeira.
- 32 Aykroyd, op. cit., p. 15.
- 33 Harris, op. cit., p. 72.
- 34 Pendle, op. cit., p. 72.
- 35 Harris, op. cit., p. 73.
- 36 Aykroyd, op. cit., p. 21.
- 37 ibid., p. 22.
- 38 Various laws or instructions can be found in the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Bible, and they can be readily identified and located by the use of a reference such as Nave's Topical Bible, [Chicago: Moody Press, 1973] p. 1260.
- 39 Aykroyd, op. cit., pp. 34–38.
- 40 Harris, op. cit., pp. 76–78.
- 41 Von Grunebaum, op. cit., p. 80.
- 42 This was the very year Leo crowned Charlemagne as Holy Roman Emperor. The caliphate continued for about 500 years, until 1258, when it fell to the Mongols, although after 946 it was "relieved" of any political authority and had only limited religious influence.

⁴³ Roth, Cecil. A History of the Jews [New York: Schocken Books, 1974] pp. 153–155.

⁴⁴ Gilbert, Martin Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] p. 29.

⁴⁵ Von Grunebaum, op. cit., pp. 105–106.

⁴⁶ ibid., p. 116.

⁴⁷ ibid., p. 124.

⁴⁸ ibid., p. 170.

⁴⁹ ibid., p. 193

CHAPTER 12: LET’S MAKE A NEW START

¹ The London Times, November 20, 1975, reporting the Second Reith Lecture by the Librarian of Congress.

² McEvedy, Colin. The Penguin Atlas of Modern History [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972] p. 8.

³ The question of the nature of the universe related to the question of the nature of the earth: whether it was flat or spherical. European scholars had generally accepted that the Earth was spherical in shape ever since the spread of the popular Etymologies of St. Isidore of Seville, produced in Spain in the early 7th century, but this did not stop some authorities from clinging to the belief that the earth was flat. The two issues became interwoven with superstition and religious mystique in the question of how one object rotated around the other in space and the dangers of pursuing treasure under the rights granted by Pontifex Maximus.

⁴ Kuhner, Hans. Encyclopedia of the Papacy [London: Peter Owen, 1959] p. 137.

⁵ Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 130.

⁶ See above, chapter 13, p. 20L.

⁷ McEvedy (Modern), p. 34.

⁸ Church of England Book of Common Prayer, [Cambridge: University Press, undated] pp. 345–358, or other authorised Anglican prayer books such as the 1978 Australian edition.

⁹ The first text of the 39 Articles was agreed on by the clergy of Canterbury and York in 1562 and issued in 1563 but with some amendments the final version was issued in 1571, the year following Elizabeth’s excommunication by Pius V. The dogmatic status of the 39 Articles was modified in 1865 so that clergy are now required only to affirm general assent to them.

¹⁰ Aykroyd, W. R. Sweet Malefactor [London: Heinemann, 1967] p. 18.

¹¹ The Hutchinson 20th Century Encyclopedia, p. 447.

¹² Kuhner, op. cit., p. 166. See also chapter 13, p. 19R, above.

¹³ Catholic Almanac, 1990, p. 300. Some exceptions are now made in cases in which married ordained clergy from other denominations are accepted into Roman Catholic orders and permitted to retain their married status.

¹⁴ Bettenson, Henry. Documents of the Christian Church [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1967] p. 240.

¹⁵ Graef, Hilda, Devotion to the Virgin Mary [London: Burns & Oates, 1963] p. 70.

¹⁶ ibid., p. 71.

¹⁷ Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 446, et.al.

¹⁸ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000.

¹⁹ Hurlbut, J. L. The Story of the Christian Church [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1970] p. 134.

²⁰ Extracts from The Confession of Faith [Edinburgh: Wm. Blackwood & Sons, 1907]

From Chapter III: (On predestination) “Wherefore they who are elected ... are redeemed by Christ, are effectually called unto faith in Christ by his Spirit ... are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power through faith unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ ... and saved, but the elect only.

“The rest of mankind, God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth ... to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonour and wrath for their sin ...”

From Chapter VI: “Works done by unregenerate men, although ... they may be things which God commands ... because they (come from a heart not) purified by faith; nor are done in a right manner ... are ... sinful, and cannot please God, or make a man meet to receive grace from God. And yet their neglect of them is more sinful, and displeasing unto God.”

²¹ Hurlbut, op. cit., p. 160.

²² Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 202.

²³ Ling, Trevor. A History of Religion East and West [London: Macmillan, 1968] p. 320.

²⁴ Kuhner, op. cit., p. 194.

²⁵ Pascal, Blaise. Pensees, trans. A. J. Krailsheimer [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1977] p. 177.

²⁶ ibid., p. 172.

²⁷ ibid., p. 176.

²⁸ ibid., pp. 205–206.

²⁹ ibid., p. 125.

³⁰ Gilbert, Martin. Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] pp. 39, 48.

³¹ Hutchinson, op. cit., p. 787.

³² Kuhner, op. cit., p. 195.

³³ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000.

³⁴ Not all of Europe and Scandinavia bowed to the Holy Roman Emperor at that stage but the entire Baltic Seaboard was controlled by current or former Catholic monarchies with their love-hate relationships. When Peter’s army was humiliated by the Lutheran Swedes in Estonia in 1700 it was a toss up whether the Swedes would push south against Catholic Poland or east to Moscow. They went south. McEvedy (Modern) p. 52.

³⁵ Ibid., (Medieval) pp. 82–88.

³⁶ ibid., (Modern) pp. 22–23.

³⁷ These figures do not account for the Jews and although reliable figures are hard to find it appears unrealistic to put the total Jewish population at less than two million and it could have been nearer double that in spite of continuous harassment, wholesale slaughter and official Inquisitions. That means the Jewish population was between three and six percent of Europe’s total population.

³⁸ De Rachewltz, Igor Papal Envoys to the Great Khans [London: Faber & Faber, 1971] pp. 87, 213, 214.

³⁹ ibid., pp. 144–159.

⁴⁰ Pipes, Richard Russia under the old Regime [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Peregrine, 1977] p. 222.

⁴¹ ibid., pp. 227–228.

⁴² ibid., p. 229.

⁴³ ibid., pp. 231–232.

⁴⁴ ibid., p. 226.

⁴⁵ ibid., pp. 234–236.

⁴⁶ McEvedy (Modern) p. 52.

⁴⁷ Pipes, op. cit., p. 240.

⁴⁸ ibid., p. 241.

⁴⁹ Pope Benedict XIV, encyclical A Quo Primum, Castelgandolfo, June 14, 1751, sourced from New Advent Catholic Website –<http://www.knight.org/advent> as at November 21, 1999.

⁵⁰ Pipes, op. cit., pp. 243–244.

- 51 ibid., p. 38.
- 52 ibid....
- 53 Chadwick, op. cit., pp. 199–203.
- 54 Pipes, op. cit., p. 119.
- 55 ibid.
- 56 Chadwick, op. cit., pp. 402–402.
- 57 Kuhner, op. cit., pp. 211–212.
- 58 Cragg, Gerald R. The Church and the Age of Reason 1648–1789 [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1977] p. 220.
- 59 Kuhner, op. cit., p. 218. What a wonderful description of a person credited with being infallible.
- 60 Dillenberger, John. Martin Luther [New York: Doubleday/Anchor, 1961] pp. 81–83.
- 61 Roth, Cecil. A History of the Jews [New York: Schocken Books, 1974] p. 245.
- 62 Kuhner, op. cit., p. 165.
- 63 Roth, op. cit., pp. 273–288.
- 64 ibid., p. 293.
- 65 Chadwick, op. cit., p. 354.
- 66 Roth, op. cit., p. 294.
- 67 ibid., p. 280.
- 68 Cragg, Gerald R. The Church and the Age of Reason 1648–1789 [Harmondsworth: Pelican/Penguin, 1977] pp. 220–221.
- 69 They were secondhand dealers of course, because Jews were prohibited from trading in new goods.
- 70 Barnavi, Eli, (Gen. Ed.) A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People [London: Kupreard, 1994] pp. 146–147.
- 71 Gilbert, Jewish History Atlas, and Roth, A History of the Jews, both say over 100,000; Barnavi, A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People, notes that in the town of Nemirov 6,000 Jews were massacred on June 10th alone.
- 72 Barnavi, op. cit., pp. 148–149.
- 73 Roth, op. cit. P. 313.
- 74 Barnavi, op. cit., p. 172.
- 75 ibid.
- 76 Epstein, Isidore Judaism [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1973] pp. 275–280.
- 77 Roth, op. cit., p. 314.
- 78 Epstein, op. cit., p. 281.

CHAPTER 13: PADDLE YOUR OWN CANOE

- ¹ The Declaration of Independence [US Information Service, Publication No. 72–314(25)].
- ² Two items were deleted from the draft before it was adopted by Congress. One was a denunciation of the slave trade and Britain’s interference in bids to stop it, and the other was a reference to former good relations with Britain. The Declaration was signed on July 4th, 1776; sovereignty was recognized in 1783; the Federal Constitution was drafted in 1787 and took effect in 1788; Washington was elected President in 1791; and the Civil War erupted in 1860.
- ³ Hacker, Louis M. The Course of American Economic Growth and Development [New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1970] p. 19.
- ⁴ McEvedy, Colin. The Penguin Atlas of Modern History [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972] p. 60.
- ⁵ Hacker, op. cit., p. 18.

- ⁶ ibid., p. 25. An exception was also made of trade with Europe south of Cape Finisterre on the northwest coast of Spain so the American colonists avoided English duties, cargo charges, commissions and warehousing by dealing as much as possible through Spain, Portugal, Madeira and the Canaries.
- ⁷ ibid., p. 26. The benefit to England of these arrangements from manufacturing mark-ups, freights, taxes, and market manipulation, and the retarding effect which they had on the colonies can be seen from the case of tobacco. England consumed only 3.7 percent of the total crop of 100.5 million pounds imported in 1773 and re-exported the rest. Its imports fell to 45.5 percent of the crop in 1779 (the middle of the war), and to 22.7 percent by 1840.

⁸ ibid., pp. 27–29.

⁹ Fisher, H.A.L. A History of Europe [Great Britain: Arnold, 1955] pp. 751–761.

¹⁰ ibid., p. 762.

¹¹ Franzen, op. cit., pp. 384–384.

¹² Hacker, op. cit., p. 42.

¹³ Total English overseas trade increased by 134 percent during the three generations spanning the period from 1701–10 to 1761–70. But while trade with Europe rose by only 53 percent trade with the colonies and Ireland rose by 351 percent. The comparison for the latter half of that period, 1731–40 to 1761–70, is even more significant and England's dependence on its colonies and re-export of their products to Europe is quite striking. Trade with Europe rose by only 11 percent while trade with the colonies and Ireland rose by 120 percent.

Average Annual import/export trade (in thousands of pounds Sterling) between England and the regions listed for the periods shown:

	1701–10	1731–40	1761–70
Colonies and Ireland	2,802	5,751	12,651
Total Europe	7,673	10,555	11,740
All other (by deduction)	594	2,613	1,539
Total Trade	11,069	18,919	25,930

By the end of the Seven Years War England's trade with its empire was greater than its trade with Europe and was barely less than its total trade outside the empire.

Source of figures: Louis M. Hacker, The Course of American Economic Growth and Development quoted from David Macpherson, "Annals of Commerce, Manufactures, Fisheries and Navigation." Vol. 3, 1805.

¹⁴ Hacker, op. cit., pp. 42–43.

¹⁵ Franzen, op. cit., pp. 382–384.

¹⁶ Wells, H. G. The Outline of History [London: Cassell, 195] p. 881.

¹⁷ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000.

¹⁸ ibid.

¹⁹ US Information Service, Publication No. 72–314(25) pp. 1, 2, 5.

²⁰ The Hutchinson 20th Century Encyclopedia p. 361.

²¹ Liddle, William D. A Patriot King or None [Organization of American Historians: Journal of American History, Vol. LXV No. 4, March 1979] pp. 969–970.

²² Wells, op. cit., p. 877.

²³ Franzen, op. cit., p. 372.

²⁴ Liddle, op. cit., pp. 958–959.

²⁵ Fisher, op. cit., pp. 794–795.

²⁶ Franzen, op. cit., p. 373.

²⁷ Wells, op. cit., pp. 886–887.

²⁸ Fisher, op. cit., p. 797.

²⁹ Cragg, op. cit., pp. 222–223.

- 30 Kuhner, Hans. Encyclopedia of the Papacy [London: Peter Owen, 1959] p. 219.
- 31 Vidler, Alec R. The Church in an Age of Revolution [Harmondsworth: Pelican/Penguin, 1976] p. 15.
- 32 Fisher, loc.cit.
- 33 Wells, op. cit., pp. 890–892.
- 34 Vidler, op. cit., p. 15.
- 35 Kuhner, op. cit., p. 219.
- 36 Franzen, op. cit., pp. 344–345.
- 37 Vidler, op. cit., pp. 15–16.
- 38 Von Aretin, Karl Otmar The Papacy and the Modern World [London: World University Press/Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1970] p. 25.
- 39 Vidler, op. cit., p. 17, accepts these estimates while Franzen, op. cit., p. 355, says about two thirds refused to sign (nonjurors).
- 40 Wells, op. cit., p. 903.
- 41 ibid., pp. 909–910.
- It points out that the executions and slaughter during the French Revolution for crimes against the state were far less numerous than such fates for crimes against property in Britain and America during the same period. The reign of terror in Paris could only happen because of persistent treacherous disloyalty by the royalists, including nonjuring clergy, which incited the extremists and discouraged the moderates from intervening.
- 42 Kuhner, op. cit., p. 219.
- 43 Beales, Derek. The Risorgimento and the Unification of Italy [London: George Allen & Unwin, 1971] pp. 2–38.
- 44 Markham, Felix. Napoleon and the Awakening of Europe [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1975] p. 43.
- 45 ibid., p. 44.
- 46 Minus a detachment left to secure Malta after it had been captured on route on June 10.
- 47 Markham, op. cit., p. 46.
- 48 ibid., pp. 179–180.
- 49 Von Aretin, op. cit., pp. 30–32.
- 50 Franzen, op. cit., p. 356.
- 51 Vidler, op. cit., p. 42.
- 52 Revill, J. C. World History [London: Longmans, Green, 1953] pp. 454–455.
- 53 Markham, op. cit., pp. 79–80.
- 54 ibid., p. 10.
- 55 Toleranzpatent, January 2, 1782, ten years after the first partition of Poland had brought a large population of Jews under Austrian authority and only months after his earlier Patent of Toleration.
- 56 Roth, Cecil. A History of the Jews [New York: Schocken Books, 1974] p. 318.
- 57 ibid., pp. 322–323.
- 58 Dimont, Max I. Jews, God and History [New York: New American Library/Signet, 1962] pp. 301–302.
- 59 King Boleslav's model charter for the protection of liberties for Jews in Poland in 1264 can not be viewed in the same light because his policy was designed to counteract specific religious oppression and to encourage religious harmony through arrangements which provided development benefits for Poland as well as relief and employment or business opportunities for Jewish settlers.
- 60 Gilbert, Martin Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] p. 57.
- 61 Roth, loc.cit.
- 62 Gilbert, loc.cit.

⁶³ Von Aretin, op. cit., pp. 38–40.

⁶⁴ Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 313.

⁶⁵ Beales, op. cit., p. 42.

⁶⁶ Dimont, op. cit., p. 304.

CHAPTER 14: LET'S TRY ANOTHER REVOLUTION!

¹ Cipolla, Carlo M. The Economic History of World Population [Harmondsworth: Penguin; 1975] p. 111.

² McEvedy, Colin. The Penguin Atlas of Modern History [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972] pp. 8, 9.

³ ibid., pp. 84–86, and Cipolla op. cit., p. 114, both suggest in excess of 900 million in the early 1800's. Cipolla then suggests between 1,100 and 1,300 million by 1850 and that range corresponds with figures used by Meadows et al. The Limits to Growth [London: Potomac Associates for the Club of Rome, 1972] p. 33.

⁴ Wells, H. G., The Outline of History [London: Cassell, 1951] p. 939.

⁵ Kinder, Hermann & Werner Hilgemann, The Penguin Atlas of World History, Trans. E. A. Menze [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1978] Vol. II, p. 39.

⁶ Wells, loc. cit.

⁷ Cipolla op. cit., pp. 24–28.

⁸ Bonar, Horatius, The Church Hymnary of the Church of Scotland and associated Presbyterian Churches, Revised Edition [London: Oxford University Press, 1927] hymn 356.

⁹ Adapted from Coghill, Anna Louisa, The Church Hymnary, Revised Edition, hymn 357.

¹⁰ Docker, Edward Wybergh The Blackbirders [Melbourne; Angus and Robertson, 1970] p. 47.

¹¹ Cipolla, Carlo M. The Fontana Economic History of Europe: The Industrial Revolution [London: Collins/Fontana, 1976] pp. 192–197.

¹² Aykroyd, W. R. Sweet Malefactor [London: Heinemann, 1967] p. 42.

¹³ ibid., p. 46.

¹⁴ ibid., p. 67.

¹⁵ ibid., p. 63.

¹⁶ Malthus, Robert The Principle of Population as it affects the Future Improvement of Society, with Remarks on the Speculations of Mr. Godwin, M. Condorcet, and other Writers. 1798.

¹⁷ Cowles, Virginia. The Rothschilds [London, Futura, 1975] p. 23.

¹⁸ ibid., pp. 15–16. Prince William's father, Frederick II, a reconvert to Catholicism, had conscripted one out of every three able-bodied youths in his realm and hired them to George III of England to throw into the fray against the rebellious American colonies. His grandfather had once hired a Hessian regiment to George II who then loaned them to the Duke of Brunswick who used them to defend their own Hessian villages against the French.

¹⁹ ibid., pp. 24.

²⁰ The bill to outlaw slavery in Denmark had been passed in 1792 in the wake of France's Declaration of the Rights of Man and the slave rebellion on Saint Domingue but there was to be a delay in promulgation of the act to provide for a period of adjustment. It may be that the date for promulgation had arrived coincidentally but in any case the king took full advantage of it at this time.

²¹ Ward, W. E. F. The Royal Navy and the Slavers [London: George Allen & Unwin, 1969] pp. 13–18.

²² Hacker, Louis M. The Course of American Economic Growth and Development [New York: John Wiley, 1970] pp. 65–66.

²³ Pendle, George. A History of Latin America [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1978] p. 67.

²⁴ ibid., p. 68.

- 25 ibid., p. 80.
 - 26 ibid., pp. 84, 100.
 - 27 Latin Americans of Spanish parentage, usually excluded from administrative and church positions because of long-standing arrangements between the church and the monarchy.
 - 28 Pendle, op. cit., p. 90: quoting Fortescue, J. W. History of the British Army [London: 1910, Vol. V, p. 435.]
 - 29 Ward, op. cit., pp. 19–21.
 - 30 Harris, Joseph E. Africans and their History [New York: New American Library/Mentor, 1972] p. 22.
 - 31 Cowles, op. cit., p. 40.
 - 32 ibid., pp. 27–29.
 - 33 ibid., p. 31.
 - 34 ibid., p. 60.
 - 35 ibid., pp. 84, 89, 90.
 - 36 ibid., p. 83.
 - 37 Von Aretin, Karl Otmar The Papacy and the Modern World [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, World University Library, 1920] p. 39.
 - 38 ibid., p. 57.
 - 39 Beales, Derek The Risorgimento and the Reunification of Italy [London: George Allen & Unwin, 1971] p. 48.
 - 40 Von Aretin, op. cit., p. 64.
 - 41 Cowles, op. cit., p. 82.
 - 42 ibid., p. 147.
 - 43 Ward, op. cit., pp. 120–121.
 - 44 Hacker, op. cit., p. 68, quotes estimates by Stanley Lebergott [American Economic History, edited by Seymour Harris, 1961] thus: In 1800 the work force of the United States was made up of 1,190,000 self-employed persons (57 percent), 170,000 wage earners (12 percent) and 490,000 slaves (31 percent). Hacker notes further, pp. 166–167, that in spite of legislation in 1808 and 1820 aimed at preventing further imports, a further 270,000 Negro slaves were smuggled in between 1808 and 1860, largely to service the cotton trade. After the trade with Britain was reopened with the Peace of Ghent in 1814 production doubled by 1822, then again by 1826 and again by 1837. By 1860, when Lincoln was campaigning for the presidency, the peak concentrations of slave labour were in parts of Central Alabama and Arkansas with 66 percent of the total population in slavery, Louisiana with 86 percent and the Yazoo Delta of Mississippi with 89 percent.
 - 45 ibid., p. 70.
 - 46 ibid., pp. 162–166.
 - 47 Ward, op. cit., p. 127.
 - 48 Hacker, op. cit., p. 137.
 - 49 Cowles, op. cit., pp. 94–97, 109.
 - 50 Leviticus 25: verses 44–46.
- Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land; and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen for ever....
- (From the Authorized (King James) version which was the English language translation most widely used at the time.)

The deliberate or inadvertent misinterpretation of passages of very early laws such as this one from a situation which was so different historically, socially and geographically, clearly shows the consequences of canonizing such writings. Attributed to priestly traditions of the period after Moses and the Exodus, Leviticus probably dates from between 1100 and 1200 BCE. The passage quoted cannot be understood in isolation from the larger section of which it forms a part and it must be set against the circumstances of the day.

⁵¹ Franzen, August (Trans. J. P. Dolan), A Concise History of the Church [New York: Herder & Herder, 1969] p. 377.

⁵² Cowles, op. cit., p. 109. Lionel Rothschild adopted a somewhat more enlightened approach to the suffering of Christians than his Jewish community was accustomed to when their roles were reversed. He established the British Relief Association Fund in 1846 to provide aid for victims of the Irish famine. The following year, waiving his commission, he joined with Barings to raise eight million pounds Sterling for the Irish Famine Loan.

⁵³ Wells, op. cit., pp. 1053–1058.

⁵⁴ Franzen, op. cit., p... 375–377.

⁵⁵ The potato famine did not start mass migration from Ireland. Systematic emigration had been in progress for about fifty years at an average rate of about 30,000 persons each year since 1800. Of those, about one third, or 500,000 persons, had settled in England and Scotland and two thirds, or one million persons, had gone to the New World. Significant arrivals in the United States date from about 1820. In spite of that rate of emigration Ireland's population still rose from 5.25 million in 1800 to 8.5 million in 1845 immediately before the disaster struck. Famine induced deaths (the number in excess of the normal death rate) in the years from 1846 to 1851 are estimated at 750,000 and more than one million people emigrated during the same period. But emigration did not stop when the famine ended. It continued at a rate averaging 60,000 per year, totaling three million during the next fifty years to 1900. The impact of the famine on Ireland was thus very great indeed, but the level of impact of associated Irish immigration on the United States as the principal recipient country is indicated by the following figures. In 1800 the total population within the boundaries of modern-day USA was six million, comprised of 4.3 million 'whites' (Europeans), one million Africans (almost entirely slaves), and about 0.7 million American Indians and Alaskans. Fifty years later, with the Irish famine rush tapering off, the US population of 24 million was made up of about 20.2 million whites, about 3.5 million Africans and a mere 0.3 million American Indians and Alaskans. The increase in whites (about 15.9 million or almost four-fold) represents both natural increase and migration. The increase in Africans, (about two and a half fold), of whom 90 per cent were still slaves, represents almost all natural increase because slave imports stopped in 1808. The fall in American Indian population of about 0.4 million, (more than half of the 1800 population), represents the impact of oppression and deaths in the wars of land acquisition.

⁵⁶ Based on data in the Penguin Atlas of World Population History, (1978), pp. 46–48, 286–290.

⁵⁷ Samkange, Stanlake African Saga [New York: Abingdon Press, 1971] pp. 179–182.

⁵⁸ Enclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000.

⁵⁹ Irving, R. E. M. Christian Democracy in France [London: George Allen & Unwin, 1973] pp. 20–23.

⁶⁰ Gregory, J. S. Church and State [Australia: Cassell, 1973] pp. 5, 53, 68, 133, 221, 232. In the British colonies in Australia the schools question emerged very early as an important issue, along with the closely related issue of whether there should be a constitutional link between the establishment Church of England and the various colonial or state structures. Secularism then took a firm hold in the 1850's when Victoria, being constituted a colony separate from New South Wales, inherited the older colony's church-state links. The controversy was spawned by the arrival of large numbers of rebellious Irishmen as non-fare-paying 'guests' of Her Majesty, accompanied by Church of England clergy. It was then fueled by the disruption of the gold rushes and it was kept on the boil by the arrival of large numbers of ordinary people who aimed to make a fresh start, free from religious persecution, together with a few wealthy settlers from England, Scotland, Ireland and Germany and smaller numbers from other countries. During the 1870's the Syllabus of Errors and papal infallibility then helped to push Victoria and the other colonies towards the withdrawal of all state aid for church schools and towards insistence that state funded education should be free and secular. Arrangements stayed basically that way until conservative state Governments needed a touch of anticommunist support to stay in office in the 1950's and the Menzies federal government turned the clock back, and also stepped firmly into an area of state responsibility, with its state aid promises of 1963.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 61 Irving, op. cit., pp. 26–28.
- 62 ibid., pp. 29–31.
- 63 Vidler, Alec R. The Church in an Age of Revolution [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1976] pp. 73–77.
- 64 McLellan, David Karl Marx: His life and Thought [U. K.:Paladin/Granada, 1976] p. 31.
- 65 ibid., p. 88.
- 66 ibid., pp. 423–424.
- 67 Bottomore & Rubel, op. cit., p. 69.
- 68 ibid., pp. 89–90.
- 69 ibid., pp. 94–95.
- 70 ibid., pp. 70–72.
- 71 ibid., p. 98.
- 72 ibid., p. 101.
- 73 Zaehner, R.C. Ed., contributing ‘Dialectical Materialism’ in The Concise Encyclopaedia of Living Faiths [London: Hutchinson, 1977] pp. 393, 402–405, 395. Roth, Cecil. A History of the Jews [New York: Schocken Books, 1974] p. 331.
- 74 Roth, op. cit., pp. 337–343.
- 75 Gilbert, Martin. Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] pp. 337–343.
- 76 ibid., p. 51.
- 77 Roth, op. cit., pp. 334–335.
- 78 Von Aretin, op. cit., p. 51.
- 79 Cowles, op. cit., pp. 97, 127.
- 80 Cipolla, Carlo M. The Industrial Revolution [London: Collins/Fontana, 1976] pp. 38–49.
- 81 Kuhner, Hans. Encyclopedia of the Papacy [London: Peter Owen, 1959] p. 223.
- 82 Taylor, A. J. P. Introduction to the Communist Manifesto [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1976] p. 24.
- 83 ibid., p. 23.
- 84 Von Aretin, op. cit., pp. 83, 97.
- 85 Beales op. cit., pp. 54–59.
- 86 Gandhi, Mahatma All Men are Brothers [Paris: UNESCO, 1969] p. 46.
- 87 Encyclopedia Britannica, Deluxe CD 2000.
- 88 Wells, op. cit., pp. 964–969.
- 89 Marx, Karl Kritik des Hegelschen Staatsrechts, quoted by Bottomore & Rubel Karl Marx: Selected writings in Sociology and Social Philosophy [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1976] p. 41.
- 90 Franzen, op. cit., pp. 377–379.
- 91 Pendle, op. cit., p. 57.
- 92 ibid., pp. 59–63.
- 93 ibid., pp. 72–73.

- 94 Intermarriage didn't worry the Portuguese in Brazil at all. This may have been linked with the high degree of religious and racial tolerance which the monarchy had shown in open opposition to the Inquisition (see p. 1/XII/35) but some writers suggest it was a matter of survival and they point to the racist laws of Portugal's later African colonies to support their case. In any case the degree of intermarriage and the racial harmony which had developed made the transfer of the monarchy from Portugal to Brazil a relatively smooth operation and subsequently also smoothed the path to independence and the end of the Brazilian slave trade. (Pendle, op. cit., pp. 75, 121, 123.) In contrast the Spanish generally rejected intermarriage and racism tended to go hand in hand with feudalism along the eastern half of the continent. (Niedergang, Marcel The Twenty Latin Americas [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1971] p. 8.)
- 95 Pendle, op. cit., p. 125.
- 96 Cipolla, C. M. The Economic History of World Population [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1975] p. 116.
- 97 Pendle, op. cit., pp. 138–139.
- 98 Niedergang, op. cit., p. 12.
- 99 Niedergang uses United Nations figures for the period 1959–1963 to show continuing heavy dependence on single product exports as follows: 1) Venezuela, petroleum 91.9 percent; 2) Colombia, coffee 71.7 percent; 3) Chile, copper 66.3 percent; 4) Guatemala, coffee 61.8 percent; 5) Bolivia, tin 61.4 percent; 6) Ecuador, bananas 61.2 percent; 7) Uruguay, wool 54.9 percent; 8) Brazil, coffee 54.2 percent; 9) Haiti, coffee 50.4 percent; 10) Honduras, bananas 46.6 percent; 11) Dominican Republic, sugar 46.4 percent; 12) Argentina, cereals, meat and leather 44 percent.
- 100 Meyer, Michael A. Response to Modernity: A history of the Reform Movement in Judaism [Detroit: Wayne State Uni., 1995] p. 6.
- 101 Gribetz, Greenstein & Stein. The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster/Touchstone, 1993] pp. 165, 167, 171.
- 102 Meyer, op. cit., pp. 7, 8.
- 103 Jacobs, Louis The Jewish Religion: a companion [New York: Oxford, 1995] pp. 218–223.
- 104 Meyer, op. cit., p. 16.
- 105 Hinnells, John R. [Ed.] Who's Who of religions [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1991], p. 266.
- 106 Jacobs, op. cit., pp. 223–226.
- 107 ibid., p. 226.
- 108 ibid.
- 109 ibid.
- 110 Meyer, op. cit., pp. 21–23.
- 111 McEvedy (Modern), op. cit., pp. 68–72.
- 112 Barnavi, Eli A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People [London: Kuperard, 1994] pp. 134–135, 154–155.
- 113 ibid., p. 154.
- 114 McEvedy (Modern), op. cit., p. 87.
- 115 Meyer, op. cit., pp. 27–28.
- 116 ibid., pp. 36–37.
- 117 ibid., p. 64.
- 118 ibid., p. 29.
- 119 ibid., pp. 64–65.
- 120 The Wordsworth Dictionary of Beliefs and Religions, 1995, p. 278.
- 121 The Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, 1977, p. 285.
- 122 Who's Who of Religions, Penguin, 1991, p. 208.

- 123 Meyer, op. cit., p. 69.
- 124 ibid., pp. 34–43.
- 125 ibid., pp. 43–54.
- 126 ibid., p. 59.
- 127 ibid., pp. 53–61.
- 128 ibid., pp. 63–64.
- 129 ibid., pp. 68–69.
- 130 ibid., pp. 70–71.
- 131 ibid., pp. 72–74.
- 132 ibid., pp. 121–123.
- 133 ibid., pp. 125–131.
- 134 ibid., pp. 146, 151.
- 135 ibid., pp. 144–145
- 136 ibid., pp. 164–170.
- 137 ibid., pp. 162–163.
- 138 ibid., p. 164.
- 139 Meyer, op. cit., p. 172, quoting from D’Israeli’s Genius of Judaism, published anonymously, pp. 265–266.
- 140 ibid., pp. 171–178.
- 141 Gribetz, op. cit., pp. 260, 265, 267.
- 142 The New Hutchinson 20th Century Encyclopedia, pp. 135, 401.

CHAPTER 15: LET’S FIND A NEW HOME

- 1 Cowles, Virginia. The Rothschilds [London, Futura, 1975] p. 88.
- 2 ibid., p. 113.
- 3 From the opening lines of Marx’ introduction to the Communist Manifesto. He went on to say that the pope, the czar, Metternich and Guizot, French Radicals and German police spies had entered into a holy alliance to exorcize the spectre. (Marx K. & Engels F. The Communist Manifesto [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1976] p. 78.)
- 4 Pipes, Richard. Russia under the Old Regime [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Peregrine, 1977] p. 148.
- 5 Wells, H. G., The Outline of History [London: Cassell, 1951] p. 988.
- 6 Graef, Hilda Devotion to the Blessed Virgin [London: Burns & Oates, 1963] pp. 27–37.
- 7 Tibawi, A. L. British Interests in Palestine 1800–1901 [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961] pp. 4, 5.
- 8 The Jewish community then at Jerusalem is so described by Virginia Cowles. (Cowles, op.cit., p. 192.)
- 9 The impression that Christian mission involvement in the Holy Land during the nineteenth century was harmonious, productive and uplifting to the extent of correcting the misdeeds of the Crusaders is soon corrected by a reading of A. L. Tibawi’s “British Interests in Palestine 1800–1901”, Oxford University. Press 1961.
- 10 Tibawi, op. cit., pp. 10–12.
- 11 Vidler, Alec R. The Church in an Age of Revolution [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1976] p. 225.
- 12 Fisher, H. A. L. A History of Europe [Great Britain: Arnold, 1955] p. 881.
- 13 Pipes, op. cit., pp. 250 & 340.
- 14 Von Aretin, Karl Otmar. The Papacy and the Modern World [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, World University Library, 1920] p. 108.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 15 Vidler, op. cit., pp. 225–227.
- 16 Revill, J. C. World History [London: Longmans, Green, 1953] p. 563.
- 17 Tibawi, op. cit., pp. 31–33.
- 18 Roth, Cecil. A History of the Jews [New York: Schocken Books, 1974] pp. 344, 345.
- 19 Tibawi, op. cit., pp. 45–56.
- 20 ibid., p. 45.
- 21 ibid., pp. 75–77.
- 22 The notion dies hard and is still promoted in some Christian mission enterprises.
- 23 Tibawi, op. cit., p. 71.
- 24 ibid., p. 13.
- 25 Encyclopedia Britannica, Vol. 17, p. 767.
- 26 Revill, op. cit., pp. 562–564.
- 27 Fisher, op. cit., pp. 919–923.
- 28 Von Aretin, op. cit., p. 83.
- 29 Tibawi, op. cit., pp. 20–23.
- 30 ibid., citing a C.M.S. handbook “Christian Researches in the Mediterranean from 1815–1820”.
- 31 Revill, op. cit., p. 565.
- 32 Pipes, op. cit., pp. 160–163.
- 33 Gilbert, op. cit., p. 89.
- 34 Cowles, op. cit., pp. 109, 122–123.
- 35 ibid., pp. 162–163.
- 36 ibid., p. 119.
- 37 Dimont, Max I. Jews, God & History [New York: New American Library/Signet, 1962] p. 307.
- 38 Pipes, op. cit., p. 144.
- 39 ibid., pp. 162–166.
- 40 Dimont, op. cit., p. 308.
- 41 Pipes, op. cit., p. 165.
- 42 One aspect of this, the Rothschild loans to the Confederate States has already been mentioned.
- 43 Fairbank et al, East Asia: The Modern Transformation [London: George Allen & Unwin, 1967] p. 31.
- 44 ibid., pp. 32–34.
- 45 Neill, op. cit., p. 160.
- 46 Fairbank, op. cit., pp. 200–225.
- 47 Ling, Trevor. A History of Religion East and West [London: Macmillan, 1968] p. 405.
- 48 Parrinder, Geoffrey. The World’s Living Religions [London: Pan, 1974] pp. 115–118.
- 49 Buss, Claude A. Asia in the Modern World [London: Collier-Macmillan, 1964] p. 158.
- 50 ibid., p. 282.
- 51 Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church, 1977, p. 156.
- 52 Woodard, William P. The Allied Occupation of Japan 1945–52 and Japanese Religions [Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972] p. 250, citing Hirobumi Ito, Commentaries on the Constitution of Japan [Tokyo: Government Printing Office, 1899] translated by Miyoji Ito.
- 53 Buss, op. cit., p. 152.

- 54 ibid., p. 320.
- 55 Neill, op. cit., pp. 408, 409.
- 56 ibid., pp. 195–196.
- 57 Fairbank, op. cit., pp. 437–438.
- 58 Neill, op. cit., p. 346.
- 59 Fairbank, op. cit., p. 457.
- 60 ibid., pp. 451–452.
- 61 Yule, George. The Theological Differences behind the Varieties of Patterns of Reformation in the 16th Century [The Reformed Theological Review: Vol. XXVIII, Sept/Dec 1969, No. 3] pp. 81–90.
- 62 Schild, Maurice. “On Luther’s Understanding of the Word and History” in The Reformed Theological Review: Vol. XXVIII, Sept/Dec 1969, No. 3, pp. 90–99.
- 63 Paul, Leslie. A Church by Daylight [London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1973] p. 27.
- 64 The Westminster Confession of Faith [Edinburgh: Wm. Blackwood & Sons, 1957] pp. 3–6.
- 65 Lindsell, Harold The Battle for the Bible [Michigan: Zondervan, 1976] p. 210.
- 66 Meir Meiseles. Judaism [Jerusalem/New York: Feldheim, 1977] pp. 472–480 & 142–171.
- 67 Burrow, J. W. Introduction to The Origin of Species [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1977] pp. 20–21.
- 68 ibid., p. 41.
- 69 Paul, Leslie, A Church by Daylight [London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1973] p. 39.
- 70 ibid., pp. 101–102.
- 71 ibid., pp. 44–49.
- 72 In 1795, four years after John Wesley’s death, Methodism had been formally “pacified” through agreements reached with the hierarchy while the shadows of Robespierre’s last guillotine and the final partition of Poland still hung over Europe and while the London Missionary Society was being established.
- 73 Franzen, op. cit., pp. 370–371.
- 74 By way of example: in Australia, (then the colony of New South Wales), the Church of England was to be endowed permanently and finally as the established church with complete responsibility for public education. The Church and Schools Corporation was set up under Imperial Charter in 1826. One seventh of all crown lands in the colony were vested in the corporation and the revenue was to be used to maintain and support the clergy of the Established Church of England, schools and schoolmasters. Opposition to the charter came first from the Roman Catholic Church then later from the Presbyterian Church. The Corporation was dissolved after only a few years and annual endowments were paid to those churches. In 1833 the Church of England received 11,500 pounds Sterling; the Roman Catholic Church 1,500 pounds Sterling; and the Presbyterian Church 600 pounds Sterling. Other churches received only grants of land on which to build chapels. (Gregory, J. S. Church and State [Australia: Cassell, 1973] pp. 9–14.) The colonial authorities had hoped to avoid carrying denominational dissent to Australia by richly endowing one established church to do two jobs at once. The questions of denominational preference or theological emphasis probably did not arise. It was a case of “we are starting from scratch let’s have stability through religious conformity.” The established church of the colonizing power was a logical starting point.
- 75 Paul, op. cit., p. 108.
- 76 Other changes, including greater lay involvement in the local affairs of the church, followed within a few years but they did not affect the status or security of the Church of England.
- 77 The Papal Encyclical and Syllabus Translation reprinted from the Daily News [London: Bradbury, Agnew, 1875].
- 78 Meir, op. cit., pp. 562, 572.
- 79 Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (1977) p. 394.

- 80 Not all writers accept this. Von Aretin says Pius discussed it in secret with the cardinals immediately after releasing the syllabus, although he had “entertained” the idea beforehand.(Von Aretin, op. cit., p. 99.)
- 81 Franzen, op. cit., p. 388.
- 82 Archbishop Henry Edward Pastoral Letter to the Clergy [New York: D. & J. Sadlier, 1871] pp. 7–46.
- 83 The council intended to issue a more comprehensive “constitution” at a later session but it couldn’t. Events caught up with it. (Neuner, J. & J. Dupius The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church [Bangalore, India: Theological Publications/St. Peter’s Se,minary, 1978] pp. 220–221.)
- 84 Edward, Henry, The Vatican Council and its Definitions [New York: D&J Sadlier, 1871] P. 65.
- 85 ibid., p. 74.
- 86 From a pastoral letter by the Archbishop of Westminster, Henry Edward, to the clergy explaining and interpreting the Council’s decisions. Prepared soon after the Council, it reviewed the public debate and controversy and attempted historical justification for the decisions. It was published in full in 1871.
- 87 In 1893, (twenty two years after Darwin’s “Descent of Man”, and twenty six years after Vol. I of Marx’s “Capital”), Alfred Loisy was removed from his post at the Paris Institut Catholique for denying Biblical inerrancy. However he continued to publish and was excommunicated for his trouble on the Feast of St. Thomas Aquinas, March 7th 1908. Eventually his work gained wide recognition among Catholic theologians and not just those of the radical fringe. (von Aretin, op. cit., pp. 139–140.)
- 88 Neuner & Dupius The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church [Bangalore: Theological Publications in India, 1978] p. 220. From the introduction to The Institution and Foundation of the Church, Dogmatic Constitution on the Church of Christ, First Vatican General Council, fourth session, 1870.
- 89 ibid., p. 248
- 90 Kuhner, Hans. Encyclopedia of the Papacy [London: Peter Owen, 1959] p. 229.
- 91 The Franco/Prussian war continued without Napoleon III. His prestige was in tatters after the Mexican adventures and few people missed him. Paris was besieged in the first week of October and a fearful end was in sight when the main French army surrendered at Metz on October 27th. But a second army was already being raised in an effort which proved unsuccessful to relieve the capital. Prussia agreed to an armistice on January 1st 1871 so that French elections could be held and a peace treaty negotiated with a new government. Bismarck demanded Alsace and part of Lorraine. It was a material success but a great political blunder. He was fomenting trouble for the twentieth century. But success in France encouraged other German states to join the Confederation and Bavaria soon followed. The German Empire was a reality and by the end of 1871 Bismarck dominated Europe.
- 92 von Aretin, op. cit., pp. 910–92.
- 93 ibid. When Garibaldi entered Rome with his army for the second time the Jews were more jubilant than ever. He had to dismantle the Roman ghetto again. After the ‘48 Republic had been crushed the pope had re-established it. He must have taken pride in having the last ghetto in Europe. But it was only part of the chaos in social affairs, public utilities and government administration which the Curia’s anti-liberal, anti-progress and reactionary policies had left for the Piedmontese occupation troop to clean up.
- 94 Franzen, op. cit., pp. 394–396.
- 95 ibid., p. 359.
- 96 ibid., pp. 396–398.
- 97 Von Aretin, op. cit., p. 105.
- 98 J. S. Gregory sets out a comprehensive study of the situation in Australia in Church and State, [Cassell, Australia 1973].
- 99 Fisher, op. cit., pp. 985–988. This was actually the mechanism by which Bismarck manoeuvred Napoleon III into the war which brought down both him and the papal states.
- 100 Franzen, op. cit., p. 367.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 101 Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 34.
- 102 Handbook: Member Churches. Ed. Ans J. van der Bent. World Council of Churches, 1982, pp. 168–169.
- 103 Dimont: Jews, God & History, p. 305.
- 104 Gribetz, Greenstein & Stein. The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster/Touchstone, 1993] p. 282.
- 105 Two incidents in quick succession gave the Mortara affair an American perspective and indicated how quickly one incident might become a precedent and trigger an avalanche. In the first a Jew, Paulson Dietrich, was buried in a Catholic cemetery after being involuntarily baptized in hospital on his death bed. Eventually his body was exhumed and reburied in a Jewish cemetery. In the second, a Jewish child was secretly baptized by his nurse and forcibly taken from its parents by Catholic authorities for adoption. He was returned to his parents by court order.
- 106 Gribetz, op. cit., pp. 283–284.
- 107 Roth, op. cit., pp. 345–346.
- 108 Simon Halkin Modern Hebrew Literature [New York: Schocken Books, 1970] p. 34.
- 109 Cowles, op. cit., pp. 139–142.
- 110 Roth, op. cit., pp. 347–348.
- 111 Kuhner, op. cit., p. 230.
- 112 Franzen, op. cit., p. 390.
- 113 Catholic Almanac, 1975, p. 688.
- 114 Roth, op. cit., pp. 348–349.
- 115 Pipes, op. cit., p. 156.
- 116 Roth, op. cit., p. 351.
- 117 Barnavi, Eli A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People [London: Kuperard, 1994] pp. 220–221, 224–225.
- 118 Pipes, op. cit., pp. 305–309.
- 119 Barnavi, op. cit., p. 180.
- 120 Gilbert, op. cit., pp. 71–72.
- 121 Consistent and reliable figures for the flow of refugees are difficult to obtain because of the relatively elementary census and statistical methods of the period and because authorities use different periods for the presentation of data. Sources available include the following.

Source 1 Barnavi, p. 191

Emigration from the Pale of Settlement

Destination	Years	Number
America, W. Europe	1881–1906	1,500,000

Source 2 Penguin Atlas of World Population History p. 80.

Emigration from Russia

Destination	Years	Number
Siberia	1870–1914	5,000,000 (1)
New World–		3,000,000 (2)

Source 3 Gilbert (Jewish History Atlas) pp. 71, 81

Destination	Years	Number
All countries from 1880		>2,000,000 (3)
United States 1880–1914		2,000,000

Source 4 Barnavi, pp. 194–195

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

Emigration from:	The Pale of Settlement		Eastern Europe		Europe		All Jewish Migration
Destination	Years	Number	Years	Number	Years	Number	Years	Number
Canada	1881–1914	450,000	1915–1931	N/A	1932–1948	N/A	1948–1976	100,000
United States	–	2,040,000	–	465,000	–	260,000	–	270,000
Argentina	–	115,000	–	80,000	–	35,000	–	30,000 *
Brazil	–	15,000	–	65,000	–	75,000	–	30,000 *
Europe	–	30,000	*	–	30,000	*	–	30,000 *
South Africa	–	5,000	–	15,000	–	10,000	–	10,000
Australia	–	15,000	–	30,000*	–	30,000*	–	10,000
Palestine	–	65,000	–	115,000	–	300,000	–	730,000 (4)
		.	–	–	–	–	–	915,000 (5)
Other countries	–	55,000	–	20,000	–	160,000	–	65,000
Total, all countries.		2,430,000	–	820,000	–	900,000	–

Notes to migration tables

* Mid point of range from 10,000 to 50,000 shown graphically. (1) Total emigration of peasants, not only Jews, from Russia to Siberia. (2) Total emigration of peasants, not only Jews, from Russia to the New World. (3) Jews from the Pale of Settlement to United States, Britain, Europe, South America and Palestine. (4) Migration to the State of Israel from Eastern Europe and USSR combined. (5) Migration to the State of Israel from all other countries.

¹²² Dimont, Jews, God & History, pp. 323–327.

¹²³ Dimont, Max I. The Indestructible Jews [New York: New American Library/Signet, 1971] pp. 3909–391.

¹²⁴ Meyer, Michael A. Response to Modernity: A History of the Reform Movement in Judaism [Detroit: Wayne State Uni., 1995] p. 226.

¹²⁵ Isaacs, Ronald & Olitzky, K. M. Critical Documents of Jewish History [Northvale: Jason Aronson, 1995] p. 5.

¹²⁶ Meyer, op. cit., p. 227.

¹²⁷ Gilbert, Jewish History Atlas, pp. 61, 70 and the Penguin Atlas of World Population History, p. 77. Estimated Jewish population in the US: 2,000 in 1800, rising to 6,000 in 1826. That represents a mere 0.04 percent compared with 30 percent in ‘Congress Poland’ (the Pale of Settlement) at about that time, (an estimated 1,200,000 Jews in a total population of about four million).

¹²⁸ Meyer, op. cit., p. 229.

¹²⁹ Isaacs. Op. cit., pp. 53–54 (Charleston Creed) & pp. 179–18 (Maimonides’ Thirteen Principles of Faith).

¹³⁰ Meyer, op. cit., pp. 233, 234.

¹³¹ ibid.

¹³² At the time of the Cleveland Conference the Jewish population in the United States was probably about 100,000. By 1860 it had reached 150,000 and in the next ten years it almost doubled, reaching 280,000 in 1880 as the majority of a wave of 150,000 refugees arrived from Germany and Poland during those years. Then the flood gates opened as Russia’s pogroms and resettlement policies in the Pale of Settlement, coupled with simple over population, led to the exodus of millions of Jews as already noted. The Jewish community increased from 0.04 percent of the US population in 1825 to 0.34 percent in 1858 when President Buchanan made his infamous non-intervention decision, to 0.56 percent in 1880, then leapt to 3.9 percent in 1925, since when it has settled back to an estimated 2.9 percent in 1975 and 2.2 percent in 1997. (Calculations based on figures in Fishman, Priscilla The Jews of the United States [Jerusalem: Keter, 1974] pp. 32–33, 285. Penguin Atlas of World Population history, op. cit., pp. 286–290. Gilbert, op. cit., pp. 61, 81.)

¹³³ Meyer, op. cit., p. 241.

- 134 ibid., pp. 259–263.
- 135 ibid., pp. 264–270.
- 136 Isaacs, op. cit., p. 58: a comment on the Pittsburgh Platform by the editors.
- 137 ibid., pp. 58–59. All extracts from the Pittsburgh Platform are from Isaacs pages 58 and 59.
- 138 Meyer, op. cit., p. 270.
- 139 Sources: The Wordsworth Dictionary of Beliefs and Religions, pp. 52–56; Penguin Who's Who of Religions pp. 41, 43; Ling, op. cit., pp. 388–389; Basic Facts of the Baha'i Faith, The National Spiritual Assembly of the Bah'a'is of Australia Inc.
- 140 Gribetz, op. cit., p. 309.
- 141 ibid., p. 314.
- 142 Meyer, op. cit., p. 265.
- 143 ibid., p. 292–293.
- 144 Katz, Jacob (contributor) 'Zionism' in [Jerusalem: Keter Books/Israel Pocket Library, 1973] p. 66.
- 145 Locker, Berl. Introduction to the 50th anniversary edition of The Jewish State, quoting conversations and letters from Herzl to Baron Hirsch, pp. 22–23.
- 146 Dimont, Jews God & History, p. 397.
- 147 Hertzberg, Rabbi Arthur (contributor) 'Zionism,' p. 23.
- 148 Kressel, Getzel, (contributor) Zionism, p. 1.
- 149 Locker, op. cit., pp. 15–16, 153–156.
- 150 Herzl, Theodore, The Jewish State [Tel Aviv: M. Newman Publishing House, 1954] pp. 38 ff.
- 151 ibid., p. 66.
- 152 Meyer, loc. cit.
- 153 Gabler, Neal, An Empire of Their Own [New York: Crown, 1988] from the introduction, p. 2., and biographical notes forming part one, chapters one to five, and chapter eight.

CHAPTER 16: NEXT YEAR IN JERUSALEM

- ¹ Dimont, Max I. The Indestructible Jews [New York: New American Library/Signet, 1971] p. 391.
- ² Jacobs, Louis The Jewish Religion: a Companion [New York: Oxford, 1995] p. 342.
- ³ Katz, Jacob, Contributing 'Forerunners of Zionism' Zionism p. 5.
- ⁴ Dimont, Max I. Jews, God & History [New York: New American Library / Signet, 1962] p. 397.
- ⁵ Laqueur, Walter. A History of Zionism [New York: Schocken Books, 1976], pp. 70–74.
- ⁶ Tessler, Mark A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994] pp. 201–202.
- ⁷ Tessler, loc. cit.
- ⁸ Dimont. Jews, God & History p. 396.
- ⁹ Herzl, Theodor The Jewish State [Tel Aviv: Newman Publishing House, 1954] p. 139.
- ¹⁰ ibid., p. 149.
- ¹¹ Kuhner, op. cit., p. 231.
- ¹² Minerbi, Sergio I. The Vatican & Zionism [New York: Oxford University Press, 1990] p. 96, quoted from Civiltà Cattolica, 1897.
- ¹³ Wilson, Collin. Rasputin and the fall of the Romanovs [Granada: Panther, 1977] pp. 77–83.

- ¹⁴ Medzini, Moshe. Contributing “Zionist Policy” [Zionism], pp. 84–85.
- ¹⁵ Roth, op. cit., p. 353. A pogrom thought to have been triggered with semi official sponsorship broke on April 19th at Kishinev, about 100 miles inland from Odessa and close to the border with Rumania. Even Jew-baiting Europe was shocked by the sheer savagery of three days of nonstop rioting and bloodshed which exceeded any previous pogroms.
- ¹⁶ Minerbi, op. cit., p. 100, quoted from Herzl’s Diaries.
- ¹⁷ von Aretin, op. cit., pp. 152, 164–165.
- ¹⁸ Tessler, op. cit., pp. 202–203.
- ¹⁹ Wilson, op. cit., p. 86.
- ²⁰ Roth, loc. cit. and Pipes, op. cit., pp. 168–169. The ‘Bloody Sunday’ plan backfired. Unrest, looting, burning and attacks on the landlord class increased. By October 1905 liberal pressure had forced the tsar to agree to a constitution and, by November 1906, the beginnings of real land reform and power sharing. In retaliation, reactionary groups, calling themselves the “Genuine Russians” set up terrorist branches (“The Black Hundreds”) in the main provincial centres in an effort to make sure the constitution didn’t work. Jewish repression was an integral part of their program. In the next four years massacres in 284 towns (roughly one each week), accounted for an estimated 50,000 victims at an average of 175 murders in each ‘event’, although certainly not all the victims were Jewish.
- ²¹ The Hutchinson 20th Century Encyclopedia, p. 1025.
- ²² Dimont, Jews, God & History p. 321.
- ²³ Neill, op. cit., pp. 384–385, 432.
- ²⁴ Laqueur, op. cit., p. 131.
- ²⁵ Medzini, op. cit., pp. 84–85.
- ²⁶ Laqueur, op. cit., pp. 129–130.
- ²⁷ Kressel, Getzel, contributing Zionist Utopias [Zionism] p. 243.
- ²⁸ Laqueur, op. cit., p. 138.
- ²⁹ Laqueur, loc cit.
- ³⁰ Figures before the note marker are from Laqueur, op. cit, p. 56. Figures after the marker are a compilation of data from Laqueur, Barnavi, Gilbert and Fishman, Priscilla The Jews of the United States [Jerusalem: Keter Publishing, 1974].
- ³¹ Genesis chapter 1 verse 28, Jerusalem Bible translation.
- ³² Hacker, op. cit., pp. 139–148.
- ³³ ibid., pp. 132–138.
- ³⁴ The influence of migration across the Atlantic is evident from figures for population growth and Gross National Product of selected countries for the period between the American Civil War and World War II, even though it cannot be isolated from other factors.

Country	Period	[——— Rates of Growth for each factor (%) ———]
		Population	GNP	GNP/Capita
USA	1869–78 to 1904–13	22.3	56.0	27.5
Canada	1870–79 to 1905–14	17.8	47.1	24.7
Germany	1860–69 to 1905–14	11.5	35.6	21.6
UK	1860–69 to 1905–14	11.1	25.0	12.5
France	1841–50 to 1901–10	1.9	18.6	16.3
Japan	1878–87 to 1903–12	11.6	49.2	33.7

Comparison of figures for Japan, with a population growth rate directly comparable with Germany and the UK, shows clearly the economic consequences of Britain, France and the US having combined to force Japan into world trade.

Source: SS Kuznets Economic Development and Social Change, October 1956 p. 13; quoted by L. M. Hacker, The Course of American Economic Growth and Development (Wiley, 1970).

- 35 Scott, E. A short history of Australia [Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1947] pp. 39–45; 191–202. Transportation of convicts from Britain to the Australian colonies officially ceased in 1868 after more than thirty years of steadily increasing opposition from the colonies and in spite of the warped morality of people like Lord Grey, British Secretary of State for the Colonies. In 1853, while Britain was trying to sort out the relationship between the state and its established church, while it prepared to prop up the sultan against Russia and while it breathed a sigh of relief at having avoided the round of rolling revolutions in Europe, he wrote his book Colonial Policy. In it he claimed that Britain was perfectly justified in continuing to transport convicts to the colonies in the interests of its own stability. The colonies were only entitled to ask that their interests and welfare were consulted as far as possible while arrangements were being made, he wrote. He lauded the system of depriving Britain's criminals of the right to return to their homes after they had served their sentences, as a deterrent, and he decried the prospect of thousands of them being released and turned loose on English society. During eighty years of the system 160,663 convicts had been dumped in Australia compared with some 50,000 in the American colonies during the sixty years before the War of Independence.
- 36 Hacker, op. cit., pp. 234–239. Between 1850 and 1860 when petroleum production began in earnest about 21,000 miles of railways were built in the USA, taking the total tracks in use to 30,626 miles. Three subsequent railway construction boom periods took the total US railway system to 176,500 miles by 1893. (1866–1873, 30,000 miles; 1879–1883, 40,000 miles; 1886–1892, 50,000 miles). There was little system in the expansion program as private capitalists, (not government agencies), built competing systems in dog-eat-dog competition which recalled the stupidity of competing parallel systems in Austria and also on either side of the River Seine from Paris to the Channel. But the cost of moving commodities fell dramatically (in the case of wheat from 65 cents per 100 pounds from Chicago to New York in 1866 to 20 cents in 1897, and provided an added stimulus to development.
- 37 ibid., 136, 145. In 1826, 92.5 percent of US foreign trade was carried in American owned ships. The proportion stayed very high until the 1850's when new and advanced British ships made quicker turn around times and cut the US shipping market to ribbons. The British ships were steam powered, with iron- hulls, required smaller crews and were built with government subsidies. Even fast clippers built especially for the California-Asia trade could only hold the share of America's foreign trade which was carried in American shipping to 66.5 percent in 1860 when competitive conversion began.
- 38 A small refinery was built to refine "coal oil" the next year but the British Colonial administration did little to encourage production and it was not until 1908, fifty years later, that oil production began in earnest in Trinidad.
- 39 Significant commercial production did not begin in Canada until 1862.
- 40 Production figures are apparently not available for the Baku fields during that period.
- 41 US Bureau of Mines figures.
- 42 Gossett, T. F. Race: The history of an idea in America [New York: Schocken, 1971] p. 179.
- 43 ibid., pp. 228–252.
- 44 Hacker, op. cit., pp. 172–173.
- 45 ibid., pp. 193–197.
- 46 Gossett, op. cit., pp. 253–264.
- 47 Gossett, loc. cit.
- 48 ibid., pp. 264–286.
- 49 Gabler, Neal An Empire of Their Own [New York: Crown, 1988] pp. 59, 117, 132.
- 50 ibid., pp. 273, 274.
- 51 ibid., p. 271.
- 52 ibid., p. 129.
- 53 ibid., p. 130.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

54 ibid., p. 119, 125.

55 ibid., p. 277.

56 ibid., p. 195.

57 ibid., Intro. P. 6.

58 ibid., p. 131.

59 Edwardes, Michael. A History of India [Thames & Hudson, 1961] p. 269.

60 Relative population growth in Europe and India between 1483 and 1815.

Region	Area (mil Km2)	[——— Population Estimates ———]			Density increase a	b	c
Year >		1483	1648	1815	c/a
Europe (to the Dnieper)	4.9	70	93	150	2.1
Russia (to the Urals)	5.6	3	7	50	16.6
Total Europe	10.5	73	100	200	2.7
India	4.4	110	130	190	1.7

Sources:

Areas; UN Statistical Year Book, 1975.

Populations; C. McEvedy Penguin Atlas of Modern History.

61 Edwardes, op. cit., p. 188.

62 ibid., pp. 144–145. In the early days of the Portuguese spiritual outpost of Goa the emphasis in administration was on the promotion of papal Christianity and trade took second place. Hindus were allowed to practice their religion but Islam was suppressed ruthlessly. Then the priorities began to change in several respects. Trade and piracy took the upper hand and tolerance towards Hindus fell away. The Inquisition was introduced in 1540. Hinduism was banned from Portuguese settlements as well as Islam, and great numbers of Hindus left the territory rather than undergo ritual baptism.

63 ibid., pp. 128–129; 190–191; 226–227.

64 Ling, op. cit., pp. 323–330.

65 Edwardes, op. cit., pp. 240–242.

66 ibid., p. 259.

67 ibid., p. 249.

68 ibid., pp. 224–225.

69 The visit of the “negotiators” had been delayed while Britain put down the Indian Mutiny and Queen Victoria prepared her own declaration of religious tolerance.

70 They linked with Chinese traders in the Philippines which was rapidly and almost totally Christianized by some 400 Spanish Roman Catholic missions almost free of competition from anything other than Animist religions, faith healers and quite remarkable psychic medicine men, all of whom were either suppressed or absorbed in the Philippines version of Roman Catholicism by the well-trodden path of syncretism. The church’s doctrines left no room for the influence of the Holy Spirit outside the church and therefore successful psychic medicine men who survived were portrayed as gaining their supernatural powers through the church by some mystical means. However their existence and their success were generally decried outside the Philippines, (as with such practices as Acupuncture in China), thereby retarding cooperation and development in medical practice in both the West and the non-Western world. At the same time Christianity in the Philippines took on highly mystical and superstitious overtones, partly because it was not until 1873 that any part of the Bible was translated into the Philippine language. This increased tension even more than usual in the Sulu Archipelago, extending from the island of Mindanao, which was the one region where competition with Islam did occur. Bitter inter-faith conflict soon erupted and has never abated completely. It remains a major consideration in Philippines affairs even after the granting of autonomy for a Muslim province of Mindanao in 1996, with strong resistance from the Christian minority in the area.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 71 Amoy, Foochow, Ningpo and Shanghai in addition to Canton.
- 72 Reischauer E. O., Fairbank Craig East Asia: The Modern Transformation [London: George Allen & Unwin, 1967] pp. 136–146.
- 73 The British troops included Sikh cavalry from the Punjab which had not joined the Indian mutiny.
- 74 Reischauer et.al., op. cit., pp. 169–171.
- 75 Ice breakers now keep it open continuously.
- 76 Reischauer et.al., op. cit., pp. 168–169.
- 77 Franzen, op. cit., pp. 365–369.
- 78 The Sacred Edict. 1. Perform with sincerity filial and fraternal duties in order to give due importance to social relations. 2. Behave with generosity to your kindred to demonstrate harmony and affection. 3. Cultivate peace and concord in your neighborhoods in order to prevent quarrels and litigations. 4. Recognize the importance of husbandry and the culture of mulberry trees in order to insure a sufficiency of food and clothing. 5. Hold economy in estimation in order to conserve money and goods. 6. Extend the schools of instruction in order to make correct the practice of scholars. 7. Reject false doctrines in order to honor learning. 8. Explain the laws in order to warn the ignorant and obstinate. 9. Manifest propriety and courtesy in order to make manners and customs good. 10. Work diligently at your proper calling in order to give settlement to the aims of the people. 11. Instruct your sons and younger brothers in order to guard them from evildoing. 12. Put a stop to false accusations in order to protect the innocent and good. 13. Abstain from the concealment of fugitives in order to avoid being involved in their punishment. 14. Pay your taxes fully in order to dispense with official urging. 15. Combine in the paochia* in order to suppress thieves and robbers. 16. Resolve animosities in order to value your lives duly.
- * Mutual guarantee groupings of 100 (chia) and 1,000 (pao) households.
- 79 Reischauer et al., op. cit., pp. 82–85.
- 80 ibid., pp. 11–12.
- 81 Wiedner D. L. A History of Africa South of the Sahara [Random House/Vintage, 1962] pp. 67–70.
- 82 Estimates for the number of Africans shipped to North and South America vary widely and almost all commercial and government statistics have been destroyed at some time or another. D. L. Wiedner gives sound support for his estimates of between 3.5 and 5.5 million arriving at their markets out of between 4.0 and 6.5 million shipped. He says that British and Portuguese ships each carried one third of the total number, Dutch about 18 percent, French 12 percent and United States (after independence) 5 percent. (43) By a peculiarity of Spanish morality its ships were prohibited from carrying slaves but its authorities and nationals were quite at liberty to exploit them after they had arrived.
- 83 Wiedner, op. cit., pp. 116–117. The Portuguese chose to reprovision in Brazil to give their ships a good sweep south of the African coast; British ships stood off the Cape and sent hunting parties ashore; and the Dutch settled St. Helena as a compromise until 1652 when they established a servicing station at Capetown.
- 84 ibid., p. 128.
- 85 ibid., pp. 130–132.
- 86 ibid., pp. 138–139.
- 87 ibid., pp. 150.
- 88 Charles Darwin's follow-up to The Origin of Species, The Descent of Man, had just been published. All the old issues and misconceptions had been aired again, plus a lot more, and controversy reached a new peak. Darwin's works became known as "the monkey theory" and this led to the widespread idea that everyone other than a white Anglo-Saxon was somewhere between a monkey and a true man. On that basis they were said to be fit only to serve the white man. Efforts to achieve racial understanding, harmony and emancipation took a pounding. In Africa and Australia, where the Aborigines were considered especially primitive, a white man had to be either very courageous or a trifle mad to openly proclaim racial equality.

- 89 Britain had established Freetown, Sierra Leone, as a home for freed slaves who wanted a chance to establish their own community much earlier, in 1773. The United States found its sponsorship of Liberia in 1820 both a commercial and political success and it therefore decided to persevere with it even though its mass recolonization proposals lapsed. France followed with Libreville, Gabon, in 1849.
- 90 Cowles, op. cit., pp. 146–147. Apart from its paranoia over Russia gaining easy access to the East and its fear of a concentration of its own shipping through a single foreign-controlled point, Britain was jealous of the competitive position which Mediterranean nations gained from the opening of the Suez Canal. Although the voyage from Southampton to Bombay had been cut from about 10,600 nautical miles to 6,300, that from Marseilles had been cut from 10,400 to 4,700, and that from Athens from 11,200 to 3,600. On top of that it was obvious that future East African trade would have to go to Europe via the Suez and as the depressing effect on Capetown could not be avoided the British government decided it was better to have joint control of Suez than to be a customer paying in future political favours for access to the canal. It was the Rothschilds, (with one eye on their vast new investments in South and East Africa no doubt), who raised a short term loan of four million pounds Sterling, in secret, at the personal request of their close friend Benjamin Disraeli, then Britain's prime minister.
- 91 Oliver R. & Atmore A. Africa since 1800 [Cambridge University Press, 1972] p. 103.
- 92 Wiedner, op. cit., p. 282.
- 93 Oliver et. al., op. cit., pp. 112–113.61. Eventually Britain and Germany settled in 1890. Germany got a narrow wedge of country running into the mineral-rich heart of the Zambezi basin, (almost separating Northern Rhodesia from Bechuanaland), plus the North Sea island of Heligoland which is strategically placed between Holland and Denmark opposite the Elbe estuary. Britain gained Bismarck's recognition of its claims to Zanzibar, Kenya, Northern Rhodesia, Bechuanaland, Eastern Nigeria and Uganda.
- 94 Petroleum Gazette [Melbourne: Australian Institute of Petroleum Ltd., vol. 21, No. 4, December 1979].
- 95 The use of wood for structural timber, pressed board, paper and packaging materials or even garden mulch is not dependent on the rate of its use as fuel. In a highly integrated plant such uses may be complementary but in general terms they are competitive. Wood may be used for either one purpose or another. Similarly coal may be coked for steel production, or used for synthetic oil, chemical and fibre production but, as with wood, it is essentially one thing or the other: fuel or non-fuel use. Uranium has its peaceful uses other than energy production, but they are in no way dependent on it being used for energy production, even in those instances in which byproducts of the energy cycle can be used for other purposes instead of specifically producing them for such purposes.
- 96 Six countries shared the remaining two percent. (Year of first commercial production in brackets.) Poland 465,000 barrels (1874); Canada 250,000 (1862); Rumania 193,000 (1857); Germany 41,000 (1880); Japan 30,000 (1875); Italy 2,000 (1860). Source: American Petroleum Institute. Centennial edition, "Petroleum Facts and Figures" (1959). Authority: US Bureau of Mines.
- 97 Cowles, op. cit., pp. 147–148.
- 98 Cowles, loc. cit. The concession came into production in 1886. It proved highly successful, and soon made the Rothschilds' B'nito Petroleum Company the chief export competitor of the Rockefeller Standard Oil conglomerate. They sold it in 1911 to Shell.
- 99 The Nobel brothers commissioned the first ever oil tanker, built in Sweden in 1877, to serve the European market from their Baku fields. A refinery had been established the previous year but it was not until 1883 that a pipeline linked Baku with the Black Sea port of Batum. Standard Oil did not introduce tankers on the US/Europe run until 1887 when the Rothschilds' fields had made competition much tougher. It followed that with the establishment of its first foreign subsidiary, the Anglo-American Petroleum Company Ltd., in Britain in 1888 for the same reason.
- 100 Stocking, G. W. Middle East Oil [Allen Lane/The Penguin Press, 1971] pp. 7–8.
- 101 The rivalry continued unabated. It led Britain into another totally unjustified and abortive war with Afghanistan five years later in which it used three Indian armies and succeeded in forcing an alliance between Afghanistan and Russia. It also led to that fateful British intervention, at about the same time, when Russia tried to force Turkey to grant full Rumanian independence and Britain grabbed Cyprus in return for its 'support' for Turkey.

- 102 The Philippines was immediately rushed by Protestant missions with all the prestige of a conquering power and the divisiveness of Protestant evangelical fervour in conflict with the long-established Catholic mysticism.
- 103 Wiedner, op. cit., pp. 300–303.
- 104 Gandhi, M. All men are brothers [Paris: UNESCO, 1958] p. 25.
- 105 Fisher, op. cit., pp. 1068–1069.
- 106 Reischauer et al., op. cit., pp. 394–404.
- 107 ibid., p. 403. The Boxer Protocol was signed on September 7, 1901 by China and eleven foreign powers. It required the execution of ten high officials and punishment of 100 others; suspension of the civil government examination system in 45 cities; fortification and garrisoning of the foreign legation quarters; destruction of 25 Chinese forts; steps to secure foreign railway access to Peking; and increases in import duty levels to help pay foreign indemnities (compensation) of $US333 million (which was doubled by interest payments) over 40 years. To its credit, the China Inland Mission, and one or two others, declined to accept compensation.
- 108 ibid., p. 616. By 1905 Protestant missions were operating 2,200 kindergartens and primary schools with 42,000 pupils plus 389 other schools and colleges with 15,000 students. By 1907 they were able to report 3,500 missionaries from 70 societies working in 632 stations to minister to 250,000 Chinese Christians.
- 109 Fisher, op. cit., p. 1074.
- 110 Tibawi, op. cit., pp. 219–228.
- 111 Revill, op. cit., p. 569. Having been relieved of much of what had remained of his dominantly Christian European provinces by the Christian powers at the Congress of Berlin in 1878 the Sultan was constantly made aware of the fanatical Armenian Christian enclave deep inside his otherwise Muslim Asian territory. They had links with both Constantinople and the Russian Orthodox Church, but little in common with either. And because their theology and their practices reflected the history of the region, they were a constant thorn in the Sultan's side. In 1894 he decided to take the simple way out and eliminate them. The world was horrified by two years of massacre, destruction of property and refugee status for those who could escape. It brought disgrace to Islam at a time when Muslim morale was badly shaken by the domination of imperialist Christian European powers all around the world. It also triggered struggles for control of Macedonia and Crete. Macedonia suffered chaos which the great powers did little to relieve, but Crete gained a degree of self government and (in 1913) union with Greece.
- 112 Stocking, op. cit., pp. 9–11.
- 113 Pipes, op. cit., pp. 168–169.
- 114 Stocking, op. cit., pp. 17–19.
- 115 Scott, op. cit., pp. 294–305. Britain repudiated the annexation by its colonial government at first on the grounds of little return for the cost involved and because it already had "too many blacks" in its empire. It was only after Germany had occupied the north east sector that Britain agreed to establish a protectorate over the south east portion with the Australian colonies responsible for its administration.
- 116 A glance at a globe shows the remarkable continuity of that oil belt across Europe. It extends via Rumania and Poland (where production was already in full swing), the Ukraine and White Russia out into the great North Sea fields of Britain and Norway which were only recognized much later when petroleum technology had developed into a complex of modern sciences.
- 117 Marriott, J. A. R. A History of Europe 1815–1939 [Methuen, 1966] p. 491.
- 118 In addition to the Jerusalem and Jaffa settlements which had been initiated in 1855 by Sir Moses Montefiore there were settlements of Russians (1882), Rumanians (1882), Poles (1883), and Bulgarians (1896). In 1876 the Turkish authorities had refused to make land available in the Jordan Valley but generally their attitude was one of understanding and sympathy in the face of growing opposition from local Arab communities and provincial authorities. Steps had been taken to prevent refugees from being admitted through Haifa, Jaffa and Beirut in 1882, and attacks by bands of Arab tribesmen during the 1880's and 1890's stimulated the development of protected communities and the commune concept.

- 119 Gribetz, Greenstein and Stein. The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster/Touchstone, 1994] p. 350.
- 120 Kressel, G. contributing Zionist Congresses in Zionism, pp. 243–245.
- 121 Gilbert, op. cit., p. 77. Vienna's mayor, Karl Lueger, had pushed ahead with his anti-Semitic programme, dismissing all Jews from civic employment and offices, segregating schools and distributing anti-Jewish literature. In Linz, Schonener had declared the removal of all Jewish influences from all sections of public life to be indispensable.
- 122 Precise figures are not available. Gilbert gives these figures while Dimont suggests Jewish immigration into Palestine during that period of 115,000. This suggests a much higher net population at the end of the 32 year period. (Gilbert, op. cit., p. 83: Dimont, op. cit., p. 400).
- 123 Gilbert, op. cit., p. 81.
- 124 Fishman, P. The Jews of the United States [Jerusalem: Keter, 1974] pp. 33–36. That figure does not take into account resettlement within Europe, but neither does it allow for other influences in the mass migration pattern, nor the numbers who returned to Europe. Between 1800 and 1900 the Jewish population of Eastern Europe had increased from an estimated 1,500,000 to about 6,800,000 which greatly exceeds the overall population growth rate. The complex pressures pushing Jews from West to East, family norms and a high standard of hygiene (which reduced mortality rates compared with the general population) are all reflected in that increase. In view of that population increase there was much more economic pressure on Jews to migrate even without oppression. However as the period of intense persecution in Russia continued unabated the natural tendency for a certain percentage of migrants to re-emigrate fell steadily. Of those who sailed to the USA during the 1880's about twenty five percent returned to Europe. By 1908 the figure had fallen to eight percent and by 1919 it was as low as one percent.
- 125 Rouse, Ruth contributing Voluntary Movements and the Changing Ecumenical Climate in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948 [Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1993] p. 346.
- 126 Brandreth, Henry R. T. contributing Approaches of the Churches Towards Each Other in the Nineteenth Century in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948, p. 274.
- 127 In this context 'Puseyism' is taken to refer to proposals that the Church of England should seek a merger with the Eastern Churches in a manner which implied submission to Rome, the divinity of the Church of England and adoption of high church practices, including individual confession, which were promoted by the Oxford Movement and its leaders, notably Professor Edward Pusey.
- 128 Rouse, op. cit. pp. 318, 319.
- 129 The American delegation actually considered withdrawing when the issue of whether slave-holders could be admitted to membership was raised by British delegates.
- 130 Rouse, op. cit., pp. 320–323.
- 131 ibid., p. 347.
- 132 Brandreth, op. cit., pp. 264–265.
- 133 ibid., p. 266.
- 134 ibid., pp. 266–267.
- 135 ibid., p. 267.
- 136 Brandreth, loc. cit.
- 137 Rouse, Ruth Contributing "Other Aspects of the Ecumenical Movement 1910–1948" in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948 [Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1993], p. 615.
- 138 ibid., p. 338.
- 139 ibid., p. 341.
- 140 Yoder, Don H. contributing "Christian Unity in Nineteenth-Century America" in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948 [Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1993] pp. 256–257.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 141 Brown, H. B. Mormonism [Deseret, 1962] pp. 10, 12, 38, 55.
- 142 Wordsworth Dictionary of Beliefs and Religions, Rosemary Goring (Ed.) [Hertfordshire: Wordsworth, 1995, p. 104.
- 143 ibid., p. 258.
- 144 Mankind's Search for God [New York: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, 1990] pp. 350–354.
- 145 Wordsworth Dictionary, op. cit., p. 526.
- 146 Basham, A. L. contrib. "Hinduism" in The Concise Encyclopedia of Living Faiths [London: Hutchinson, 1979] p. 249.
- 147 Hinnells, John R. (Ed) Who's Who of Religions [London: Penguin, 1991] p. 57.
- 148 Rouse, op. cit., p. 327.
- 149 Boegner, M. The long road to Unity [London: Collins, 1970] p. 58.
- 150 Rouse, Ruth & Stephen Neill (Eds.) A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948 [Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1993] pp. 246, 256.
- 151 Franzen, op. cit., p. 400.
- 152 Neuner & Dupius The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church [Bangalore: Theological Publications in India, 1978] p. 51–54.
- 153 Pope Leo XIII, Encyclical Letter Octobri Mense, reproduced in Neuner & Dupius, p. 197.
- 154 Pope Pius X, Encyclical Letter Ad Diem Illum, reproduced in Neuner & Dupius, p. 198.
- 155 Rouse & Neill, op. cit. p. 257.
- 156 Sawyerr, Harry. Contributing "The First World Missionary Conference: Edinburgh 1910," International Review of Missions [Geneva: WCC, 1979] pp. 257–258.
- 157 ibid., p. 269–271.
- 158 ibid., p. 268.
- 159 ibid., p. 259.
- 160 Boegner, op. cit., p. 34.
- 161 von Aretin, op. cit., pp. 145–147.
- 162 von Aretin, loc. cit. The Secret Service's campaign succeeded in forcing the closure of several liberal Catholic journals and in aggravating division within the church. Bitter reaction in Germany forced the pope to release professors of theology at German universities from the obligation to take the oath and eventually some of the leading secret servicemen either left the church or were dismissed. Benigni turned informer for Mussolini and "supervised" Vatican mail for the state secret service.
- 163 Webster, Richard A. Christian Democracy in Italy 1860–1960 [Hollis & Carter, 1961] pp. 26–31.
- 164 After World War I Sayyid Ahmad retained his religious role as head of the Sanusi Brotherhood but moved to Turkey. His nephew, Sayyid Idris, stayed in Cyrenaica to exercise temporal authority and later accepted the Western-sponsored Libyan throne.
- 165 Oliver & Atmore Africa since 1800 pp. 182–183.
- 166 Webster, loc. cit.
- 167 Webster, op. cit., pp. 31–43.
- 168 Zernov, N. The Russians & their Church [SPCK, 1978] pp. 137–139.
- 169 Wilson, Colin Rasputin & the fall of the Romanovs [Panther/Granada, 1977] pp. 77–86.
- 170 Zernov, op. cit., pp. 149–150.
- 171 Wilson, op. cit., p. 59.
- 172 Ling, op. cit., p. 379.

- 173 ibid., p. 380.
- 174 Enayat, Hamid, Modern Islamic Political Thought [London: Macmillan, 1982] p. 41.
- 175 It appears that the abolition of the fee was a matter of economics rather than of enlightened religious understanding. The new steamship operators were in need of any paying passengers.
- 176 Algerians could even have full citizenship rights and a vote for the Algerian deputy in the French National Assembly if they adopted Christianity.
- 177 Oliver & Atmore, op. cit., pp. 171–174.
- 178 Ling, op. cit., p. 385.
- 179 Hart, Liddell History of the First World War [London: Cassell, 1970] p. 29.
- 180 Trotsky, Leon The Russian Revolution [New York: Doubleday, 1959] pp. 14, 241.
- 181 Zeman, Z.A.B. A Diplomatic History of the First World War [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1971] p. 89, citing Die deutschen Dokumente zum Kriegsausbruch, 11, no, 401, pp. 130 ff. quoted by Fritz Fischer, 1962.
- 182 Webster, op. cit., p. 44.
- 183 Zeman, loc. cit.
- 184 Zeman, op. cit., p. 331.
- 185 ibid., p. 49, citing FO800/29: Sir Edward Grey's private papers.
- 186 Moses, John A., Dietrich Bonhoeffer's Prioritization of Church Unity (Oekumene) [forthcoming Journal of Religious History, May 2000] citing Barth, Karl Nachwort to Schleiermacher-Auswahl, (Munich/Hamburg: Siebenstern Taschenbuch Verlag) 1968, 293.
- 187 Zeman. Op. cit., p. 60.
- 188 Moses, op. cit., pp. 3–4.
- 189 ibid., p. 4.
- 190 Who's who of religions, John R. Hinnells, ed. [London: Penguin, 1996] p. 147.
- 191 Moses, op. cit., pp. 5–6.
- 192 A catch cry coined by Dr. John R. Mott for his missionary recruiting campaigns in the 1880's but still in vogue at the Edinburgh Conference in 1910.
- 193 Webster, op. cit., p. 51.
- 194 Zeman, loc. cit. For just a little while Japan even ceased to be "the yellow peril" and became "a chivalrous and honourable people upholding the principles of civilization in the Far East" according to a London "Times" columnist. It had just broken China's neutrality and occupied the German territory of Tsingtau with its naval harbour which supported the German Pacific fleet. This had been a threat to Britain's trade and Far Eastern "possessions." Japan went on to annex several other German Pacific colonies, thus sharing the territorial spoils with Australia and New Zealand.
- 195 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 88–89.
- 196 Allen, Richard Imperialism & Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1974] pp. 224–225.
- 197 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 61–62. The Austrian Ambassador to Constantinople tried hard to persuade the Turkish Government not to issue the German-inspired Holy War call at all. He feared not only a backlash from Muslims in the Balkans and the Austrian Empire itself but also from the Italian Government which had a big task keeping a grip on Libya. It was soon apparent that the call had helped Russia's Pan-Slavic drive in Bulgaria.
- 198 ibid., p. 332, citing Elizabeth Monroe, Britain's Moment in the Middle East 1914–1956, London, 1963, p. 27.
- 199 ibid., p. 91.
- 200 ibid., p. 97.
- 201 von Aretin, op. cit., pp. 135–136.

- 202 von Aretin, loc. cit. Agreed at the London Conference, April 26, 1915, in the Treaty of London to which Britain, France, Russia and Italy were parties. Also: Marriott, op. cit., p. 511. Italy declared war against Austria on May 24 1915, against Turkey on August 21, but not against Germany until August 27 1916. Germany had actually succeeded in persuading Austria to transfer the Trentino to Italy on May 10 but by the time the necessary signatures had been obtained and arrangements made for an Austro-Italian Commission to supervise the transfer the Italian cabinet had approved the London pact and its decision had carried Italy past the point of no return. Also: Zeman, Z. A. B. A Diplomatic History of the First World War [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1971] p. 38.
- 203 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 97–101.
- 204 Laqueur, Walter & Barry Rubin [Eds.] The Israel-Arab Reader [New York: Bantam, 1976] Document 6, Sir Henry McMahon's letter to the Sharif of Mecca, October 24, 1915. pp. 15–17.
- 205 ibid., Document 5, Sir Edward Grey's 2nd letter to Paul Cambon, May 16, 1916, p. 15.
- 206 Zeman, op. cit., p. 32. Losses were heavy against determined Turkish resistance and reinforcements were brought in from India. At Kut the force was besieged and starved into submission in April 1916. Of the 8,000 troops captured 6,000 were Indian. Kut was not recaptured until February 1917.
- 207 Hart, op. cit., p. 218.
- 208 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 15–45.
- 209 Allen, op. cit., p. 228.
- 210 ibid., p. 231.
- 211 Laqueur, op. cit., Document 6, pp. 15–17.
- 212 Litvinoff, Barnett Weizmann: Last of the Patriarchs [New York: Putnam's Sons, 1976] p. 85.
- 213 ibid., p. 84.
- 214 ibid., p. 86.
- 215 ibid., p. 87.
- 216 Hertzberg, Arthur The Jews of the United States [Jerusalem: Keter, 1974] p. 55.
- 217 Zeman, op. cit., p. 169. A survey of 367 newspaper proprietors in the US just after the outbreak of the war showed that 105 were sympathetic to the Allies, 20 to the Central Powers and 242 had no preference.
- 218 In 1908 John D. Rockefeller had been accused of "intervention" in the presidential election while the anti trust row was in the air. Two years later he tried, unsuccessfully, to obtain a federal charter to establish a charitable foundation before Supreme Court action could result in the dissolution of Standard Oil of New Jersey under new laws.
- 219 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 179–181, 186–188.
- 220 Marriott, op. cit., pp. 529–530.
- 221 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 183–185.
- 222 ibid., pp. 182, 185, 187, 209, 210.
- 223 Wilson, op. cit., pp. 179–195.
- 224 Zeman, op. cit., p. 188.
- 225 ibid., pp. 189, 202–203, citing Official German Documents, II, 1337.
- 226 ibid., pp. 191–195.
- 227 Litvinoff, op. cit., p. 100.
- 228 ibid., p. 110.
- 229 Zeman, op. cit., p. 202, citing Foreign Relations of the United States of America (FR) 1917, supplement I: Page to Lansing, II.ii.1917.
- 230 ibid., pp. 132–135.
- 231 Litvinoff, op. cit., p. 102–104.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 232 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 204–205, citing James Brown Scott (ed.), President Wilson's Foreign Policy: Messages, Addresses, Papers, New York, 1918, pp. 278 f.
- 233 Marriott, op. cit., p. 523. The United States learned very quickly that Germany was serious about cutting trade lines to Britain. In January a total of 181 British flag merchant ships with a gross tonnage of 298,000 tons had been sunk. Losses jumped to 259 ships (468,000 tons) in February, 325 (500,000 tons) in March, and 423 (849,000 tons) in April. Much of the increase was in American ships.
- 234 Minerbi, Sergio I., The Vatican and Zionism trans. Arnold Schwarz [New York: Oxford, 1990] p. 16.
- 235 Zeman, op. cit., p. 334.
- 236 Minerbi, op. cit., p. 17.
- 237 ibid., p. 100, citing Herzl, Diaries, pp. 1591–1606.
- 238 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 61–62.
- 239 Minerbi, op. cit., p. 111–112, citing documents of the Central Zionist Archives and his own earlier work L'Italie et la Palestine 1914–1920 [Paris, 1970].
- 240 ibid., pp. 16–17.
- 241 ibid., pp. 112–113, citing L. Stein The Balfour Declaration [London: 1961] pp. 409–410.
- 242 Zeman, op. cit., p. 336, citing Leonard Stein, The Balfour Declaration, London, 1961, p. 125.
- 243 ibid., p. 336, citing Stein, op. cit., p. 523.
- 244 ibid., citing W.R. Louis, Great Britain and Germany's Lost Colonies 1914–1919, Oxford, 1967, p. 2.
- 245 Zeman, loc. cit., citing Stein, op. cit., p. 518.
- 246 Minerbi, op. cit., p. 17.
- 247 Hart, op. cit., pp. 449–456.
- 248 Marriott, op. cit., p. 512. Between the middle of October and November 12 the Second and Third Italian Armies lost nearly 800,000 men killed, wounded or as prisoners and 1,800 field guns to a much smaller Austrian force. British and French forces were rushed from France, at serious risk to the western front, to bolster the Fourth Italian Army's defence of Venice and to keep Italy in the war.
- 249 Watt, D. C. notes to Hitler's Mein Kampf [London: Hutchinson, 1976] p. 176.
- 250 Litvinoff, op. cit., p. 109.
- 251 Zeman, op. cit., p. 339, citing David Lloyd George, The Truth about the Peace Treaties, vol. 2, p. 1137.
- 252 ibid., p. 338, citing Stein, op. cit., p. 544.
- 253 Laqueur, op. cit., Document 7, p. 18.
- 254 Balfour's "Defence of Philosophic Doubt" (1879) attempts to show that the ultimate convictions of mankind rest on the non-rational ground of religious faith. He followed it with "Foundations of Belief" in 1895 and his Gifford Lectures in 1914 (under the shadows of the war clouds) published as "Theism and Humanism."
- 255 Boegner, op. cit., p. 33.
- 256 Hutchinson, op. cit., p. 118.
- 257 Allen, op. cit., p. 242.
- 258 Fishman, op. cit., p. 234.
- 259 Spiegel, Steven L. The Other Arab-Israeli Conflict [Chicago: Uni. Chicago Press, 1985] p. 11.
- 260 Blumberg, H. M. Weizmann: His life and times [St. Martin's Press/Robson, 1975] p. 56.
- 261 Spiegel, loc. cit.
- 262 Allen, op. cit., pp. 240–243.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 263 Spiegel, op. cit., p. 12, citing Frank E. Manuel, The Realities of American-Palestine Relations [Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press, 1949] p. 72, and Peter Grose, Israel in the Mind of America [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1983] p. 6.
- 264 Blumberg, op. cit., pp. 15–52.
- 265 ibid., p. 56.
- 266 Cowles, op. cit., p. 178.
- 267 Trotsky, Leon The Russian Revolution [New York: Doubleday/Anchor, 1959] pp. 489–491.
- 268 Kochan, Lionel The Jews in Soviet Russia since 1917 [Oxford: Oxford University Press for the Institute of Jewish Affairs, 1978] p. 47.
- 269 Less than two months before the final revolution Dr. Weizmann wrote to a newspaper editor friend saying that the revolutionary Soviets were not constructive. They were, he wrote, narrow-minded and fanatical, and it was Russia's misfortune to possess a small group of intellectuals, inexperienced in statescraft, with a huge mass of inert peasants who can be swayed by political demagogues.
- 270 Blumberg, op. cit., p. 54.
- 271 The head of the Eastern Department of the British Foreign Office, Sir Ronald Graham, advised Cabinet on October 24 1917 that almost every Russian Jew was a pro German Zionist. His advice was that if they could be convinced that the fulfillment of their ambitions depended on Allied support, an important section of the Russian people would swing behind the Allies.
- 272 Zeman, op. cit., p. 338.
- 273 Kochan, op. cit., pp. 34–35, 78.
- 274 Trotsky, loc. cit.
- 275 Zeman, op. cit., p. 296.
- 276 Minerbi, op. cit., pp. 18–19.
- 277 ibid., pp. 20–21, citing C. Loiseau, Politique romaine et sentiment francais [Paris, 1923] pp. 73–74, and H. F. Kock, Der Vatikan und Palastina [Vienna, 1973].
- 278 ibid., p. 20.
- 279 ibid., p. 23, citing Van Den Heuvel (Rome) to Foreign Minister Hymans, February 4, 1918, no. 45/16, ABRE, St. Siege 1918.
- 280 Zeman, op. cit., p. 297, citing Richard J. Ullman, Intervention and the War (Anglo-Soviet Relations, 1917–1921: vol. I), Princeton, N.J./London, 1961, p. 52.
- 281 Zeman, loc. cit.
- 282 Hertzberg, loc. cit.
- 283 Marriott, op. cit., p. 519.
- 284 In the closing stages of the war the highseas fleet of the German navy did mutiny against an order to put to sea in the face of overwhelming odds. Industrial strikes and local rebellions against the wartime administration also increased sharply.
- 285 Marriott, op. cit., p. 524.
- 286 Lilienthal, Alfred M. What Price Israel? [Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1953] p. 21, quoting Lloyd George from the Palestine Royal Commission Report, p. 23.
- 287 Allen, op. cit., p. 246.
- 288 It was very old in the sense that its civilizations predated those of Europe. It had then been occupied by both Greek and Roman powers before being swept free of European influence by Arab Nationalism, as a vehicle for the junior partner, until the trouble in the triangle began to approach its climax and Napoleon paid it a visit.

- 289 One of the titles conferred on British sovereigns ever since Pope Leo X conferred it on King Henry VIII in recognition of his treatise against Luther. That was before he broke with Rome over the issue of supremacy and began executing Catholics as well as Protestant heretics.
- 290 The established Church of England and in particular its missions in Palestine.
- 291 Lapidé, Pinchas E. The last three Popes & the Jews [Souvenir Press, 1967] p. 83.
- 292 Gandhi, op. cit., p. 46.
- 293 Afghanistan and Tibet were among the few countries which Christian missionaries could not penetrate. They were denied access by the deliberate decisions of the rulers of the day.
- 294 A very debatable expression coined by Prof. K. S. Latourette to describe the nineteenth century expansion of Christian influence.

CHAPTER 17: IT'S TIME TO DESIGN THE PERFECT SOCIETY

- ¹ Zeman, Z. A. B. A Diplomatic History of the First World War [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1971] p. 265.
- ² ibid., p. 116.
- ³ Simpson, Christopher. The Splendid Blond Beast: Money Law And Genocide In The Twentieth Century [New York: Grove Press, 1993] p. 17.
- ⁴ Laqueur, Walter The Terrible Secret [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1980] p. 8.
- ⁵ Zeman, op. cit., pp. 343–344.
- ⁶ ibid., p. 242.
- ⁷ Lockyer, Herbert. The Man Who Changed the World [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1966] p. 308, citing Arthur Link, Contrib. Woodrow Wilson: Christian in Government in Christianity Today, July 3, 1964.
- ⁸ Lockyer, loc. cit., citing personal correspondence from Woodrow Wilson to a friend.
- ⁹ Latourette, Kenneth Scott. Christianity in a Revolutionary Age, Volume V, The Twentieth Century Outside Europe. [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969], p. 12.
- ¹⁰ Zeman, op. cit., pp. 162–164.
- ¹¹ Spiegel, Steven L. The Other Arab-Israeli Conflict [Chicago: Uni Chicago Prs, 1985] p. 11.
- ¹² Lockyer, op. cit., p. 307.
- ¹³ Spiegel, loc. cit.
- ¹⁴ Zeman, op. cit., p. 339.
- ¹⁵ Zernov, Nicolas The Russians and their Church [London: SPCK, 1978] pp. 148–149.
- ¹⁶ Trotsky, Leon The Russian Revolution Trans. M. Eastman, Ed. F.W. Dupee [New York: Doubleday/Anchor, 1959] pp. 56–59.
- ¹⁷ ibid., p. 16.
- ¹⁸ ibid., p. 57.
- ¹⁹ Zernov, op. cit., pp. 151–153.
- ¹⁹ ibid., op. cit., pp. 154–157.
- ²⁰ Delegates came from all over Russia for both the State Conference and the Council of the Russian Church. As it was the first such Council ever held it is reasonable to assume that the two functions were planned with collaboration between the respective government ministries to run one function after the other. It is therefore quite possible that many delegates were common to both bodies.
- ²¹ Trotsky, op. cit., pp. 488–489 (chronological tables).
- ²² Zernov, op. cit., p. 152.

- 23 From this point dates relating to the Russian Revolution will be stated according to the old calendar unless otherwise indicated.
- 24 Zernov, op. cit., p. 156.
- 25 Zeman, op. cit., p. 251.
- 26 ibid., p. 262.
- 27 In Paris 23 soldiers were actually executed out of 150 condemned to death for their part in a mutiny in May 1917.
- 28 Zeman, op. cit., p. 261.
- 29 ibid., pp. 247–251, 293.
- 30 ibid., pp. 292–297.
- 31 Zernov, op.cit., p. 157.
- 32 Trotsky, op. cit., p. 4.
- 33 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 254–258.
- 34 Marriott, J.A.R. A History of Europe 1815–1939 [Methuen, 1966] pp. 532–533.
- 35 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 262–263.
- 36 ibid., pp. 263–265.
- 37 ibid., pp. 262–263.
- 38 ibid., p. 149.
- 39 The Greek King, Constantine, had already been caught in the crossfire and been forced to abdicate in June 1917 for collaborating with his near neighbours in Austria and Bulgaria. Earlier in the war he had the audacity to refuse the “gift” of Cyprus from Britain (which was still very good at giving away other peoples’ territory) in return for joining the Allied cause.[Zeman, op. cit., p. 349] Then in 1923, after another round of atrocious war with Turkey, (triggered by the Great War settlements), eliminated the problem of an Orthodox Christian minority in Smyrna and sent one million refugees scrambling to Greece, the Greek monarchy was replaced with a republic. [Fisher, H.A.L. A History of Europe [Guildford: Edward Arnold, 1936] pp. 1178–1181] But the game of musical thrones had not been played out by any means.
- 40 Zeman, op. cit., p. 266.
- 41 ibid., pp. 274, 297–298.
- 42 ibid., p. 295.
- 43 ibid., p. 303.
- 44 ibid., op. cit., p. 304.
- 45 Bottomore & Rubel Karl Marx: Selected writings in Sociology and Social Philosophy [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1976] pp. 404–405.
- 46 Kaiser Wilhelm had refused the young Emperor Karl’s proposal to open peace negotiations jointly in May 1918. It is problematical whether he knew much about Karl’s abortive peace overtures of the previous year but there was a level of mistrust between the two monarchs, their ministers and staffs, which arose in part from the Austrian Hapsburg links with many other European royal houses.[Zeman, op. cit., pp. 124–127.]
- 47 Notably the Poles and the Czechoslovaks who had received encouragement from Woodrow Wilson.[ibid., pp. 352–358].
- 48 Marriott, op. cit., p. 534.
- 49 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 313–317.
- 50 Marriott, loc. cit.
- 51 President Woodrow Wilson addressing the US Congress, January 22nd 1917.
- 52 Zeman, op. cit., p. 128.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 53 ibid., p. 354.
- 54 ibid., p. 360
- 55 ibid., p. 362.
- 56 Marriott, op. cit., p. 534.
- 57 Italy signed a separate armistice with Austria on November 3rd after a bit more parleying over Trentino.
- 58 The British Foreign Office apologized to the leader of the Czech self-styled National Council in exile, Benes, and from November 4th he was invited to conferences of Allied heads of governments.
- 59 Zeman, op. cit. pp. 358–359.
- 60 ibid., pp. 362–363.
- 61 Toland, John Adolph Hitler [New York: Ballantine, 1977] p. 98.
- 62 Watt, D.C. Editor's notes to Hitler's Mein Kampf [London: Hutchinson, 1976] p. 188.
- 63 Zeman, loc. cit.
- 64 Ross Alf, The United Nations: Peace and Progress [New Jersey, Bedminster, 1966] pp. 6, 17–18.
- 65 Ross, op. cit., p. 19.
- 66 Ross, loc. cit.
- 67 Covenant of the League of Nations, Article 22.
- 68 ibid.
- 69 Covenant of the League of Nations, from Articles 5, 8, 12, 13, 14, 16, 18, 23 and 25.
- 70 Covenant of the League of Nations, Article 10.
- 71 Covenant of the League of Nations, Article 5.
- 72 Blum, William. The CIA: A Forgotten History [London: Zed Books, 1986] Introduction, pp. 2, 3, citing Frederick Lewis Schuman, American Policy Toward Russia since 1917 [New York, 1928] p. 125.
- 73 Wilson, Woodrow. 65th US Congress, Third session, Senate Document No. 389, pp. 12–15, source: <http://www.Mtholyoake.edu/acad/intrel/ww38.htm> as at October 24, 1999.
- 74 Simpson, C., op. cit., pp. 18–19.
- 75 ibid., pp. 16–26.
- 76 Zeman, op. cit., p. 265.
- 77 ibid., pp. 154, 188.
- 78 Cowles, Virginia The Rothschilds: A Family of Fortune [London: Futura, 1973] p. 68.
- 79 Allen, Gary None dare call it Conspiracy [Rossmore: Concord, 1972] pp. 79–81.
- 80 League of Nations Fight – A Chronology, source: <http://ac.acusd.edu/History/text/versaillestreaty/vercontents.html> p. 2.
- 81 League of Nations Fight – A Chronology, op. cit., p. 1.
- 82 The Estonians were routed, as were the Allied-supported reactionaries in Siberia whose leader, Koltchak, was captured and shot. Those in the south were rescued from Black Sea ports by British and French ships in the early months of 1920. But they had hardly reached the safety of the sea before the Vatican-supported Polish push was mounted against Russia in April 1920 and the French were back again in support of the Poles (who had used France as their Great War base) by July. (See p. 1 / /).
- 83 Wells, H.G. The Outline of History [London: Cassell, 1951] p. 1109.
- 84 Kimball, Warren F. The Most Unsordid Act: Lend-Lease, 1939–1941 [Baltimore: John Hopkins Press, 1969] p. 1.
- 85 Zeman, op. cit., p. 319.

- 86 Grants to the reactionary Russian generals and other subversive elements were additional. They included two highly secret lump sums of ten million pounds Sterling and many lesser amounts and regular support payments.
- 87 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 297, 307.
- 88 Total deaths attributable to the Great War have been estimated at 25 millions.
- 89 Fisher, op. cit., p. 1156.
- 90 The shortage of houses in Britain alone during the months following demobilization have been variously put at between 250,000 and one million.
- 91 Wells, op. cit., p. 1092.
- 92 Marriott, op. cit., pp. 575–577.
- 93 Allen, op. cit., pp. 99–100.
- 94 Zeman, op. cit., p. 255.
- 95 France had pushed a claim for Sterling 4,000 million pounds and was not happy with its share of about Sterling 3,800 million pounds, (58 percent of the total).
- 96 Marriott, op. cit., p. 572.
- 97 To repay Stg.920 million pounds which it had borrowed progressively for the duration of the war, Britain was to make fifty annual payments from 1933 to 1984. Interest was to be three percent with each payment of Stg. 34 million pounds, making total payments in excess of Stg.1,700 million pounds.
- 98 See above, chapter 16.
- 99 Marriott, op. cit., pp. 574–577.
- 100 Marriott, loc. cit.
- 101 Latourette, op. cit., Vol V, p. 7.
- 102 Latourette, Kenneth Scott. Christianity in a Revolutionary Age, Volume IV, The Twentieth Century In Europe. [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969] pp. 246–248.
- 103 ibid., Vol. IV, pp. 253–254. Averages and percentages have been computed from the raw data provided.
- 104 ibid., Vol. IV, pp. 246.
- 105 Tatlow, Tissington contributing The World Conference on Faith & Order, Rouse, Ruth & Neill, Stephen Ed. A History of the Ecumenical Movement [Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1993; first published, London, SPCK, 1954] pp. 407, 408.
- 106 Tatlow, Tissington op. cit., pp. 410–413.
- 107 Boegner, M. The Long Road to Unity [London: Collins, 1970] p. 56.
- 108 Latourette. op. cit., Vol. IV, pp. 247–248, citing Rouse and Neill, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1948, pp. 530–532.
- 109 Possibly anticipating that such a Conference would result from the Lambeth Conference in 1920 or even referring to the Lambeth Conference itself.
- 110 Boegner, op. cit., p. 58.
- 111 Tatlow, Tissington op. cit., pp. 414–416.
- 112 Boegner, op. cit., p. 57.
- 113 Bettenson, H. (Ed.) Documents of the Christian Church [London: Oxford, 1967] pp. 327–329 (Lambeth Conference Appeal); pp. 329–330, (The Orthodox Church re Anglican Orders).
- 114 Concise Oxford, p. 293.
- 115 Latourette. op. cit., Vol. IV, p. 248.
- 116 Pearson, Michael N. Legitimacy and Symbols: The South Asian Writings of F. W. Buckler [University of Michigan, 1985] author's introduction.

- 117 Buckler, F. W. The Oriental Despot, first read under the title A neglected feature of Eastern Kingship before the Oriental section of the Fifth International Congress of Historical Studies, Brussels, April 9, 1923, printed in the Anglican Theological Review, Vol. 10, No. 3, January 1928, and reprinted in Pearson, Legitimacy and Symbols, p. 176. (Note: page references are to Pearson, not to the ATR.)
- 118 ibid., p. 177.
- 119 ibid., pp. 178–185.
- 120 ibid., pp. 185–186.
- 121 Ritual dances, originating in Hinduism, in which the believing worshipper seeks unity with the divine being which is the focus of the worship.
- 122 Buckler's use of the term 'shatter' is somewhat surprising in view of Matthew 10:17–19, referred to earlier, in which Jesus is quoted as saying "Do not imagine that I have come to abolish the Law of the Prophets. I have come not to abolish but to complete them."
- 123 From a summary of Buckler's lectures, (writer not identified), in The Oberlin Alumni Magazine, Vol. 22, No. 6, March 1926, reprinted in Pearson Legitimacy and Symbols, pp. 191–193. (Note: page references are to Pearson, not to the OAM.)
- 124 Ehrenstrom, Nils, contributing Movements for International Friendship and Life and Work 1925–1948 in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1968 [London: SPCK, 1993, for the World Council of Churches, Geneva] Vol. I, p. 546.
- 125 Boegner, op. cit., pp. 62–64.
- 126 Ehrenstrom, op. cit., pp. 547, 549.
- 127 According to Karl Adams, quoted by David L. Mueller in "Karl Barth", Word Books, 1976, p. 23.
- 128 Both grandfathers, his father, a brother and a son.
- 129 Mueller, David L. Karl Barth [Waco: Word Books, 1976] pp. 18–22.
- 131 Barth, Karl The Epistle to the Romans [London: Oxford, 1968] From the author's preface to the English translation of the revised edition, 1933, Trans. Edwyn C. Hoskyns.
- 130 ibid., pp. 477–478.
- 131 ibid., p. 481.
- 132 ibid., p. 487.
- 133 ibid., p. 482–484.
- 134 ibid., p. 418–419.
- 135 ibid., p. 520.
- 136 ibid., p. 525.
- 137 ibid., p. 79.
- 138 ibid., p. 75.
- 139 ibid., p. 396.
- 140 ibid., p. 398–399.
- 141 O'Grady, Colm. The Church in the theology of Karl Barth [London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1970] p. 35.
- 142 Barth, op. cit., p. 344.
- 143 ibid., p. 382–383.
- 144 Moses, John A., Dietrich Bonhoeffer's Prioritization of Church Unity (Oekumene) [forthcoming Journal of Religious History, May 2000] citing Eberhard Bethge, Dietrich Bonhoeffer – A Biography, (London: Collins, 1970), p. 52.
- 145 ibid.

- 146 ibid.
- 147 Jerusalem Bible translation, John 17:23.
- 148 Passelecq, Georges and Bernard Suchecky, The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI [New York: Harcourt Brace/Harvest, 1997] pp. 96–97, citing; Pax Super Israel (1926, 4 p.); Opus sacerdotale: Amici Israel (1926, 2 p.); Status Operis (1927, 4 p.), Pax super Israel (I, 1927, 36 p.; II, June 1927, 31 p.; III, January 1928, 18 p.); Nouvelle Revue theologique 40 (July, 1928): 533–35. Also; the article “Amici Israel” in Lexikon fur Theologie und Kirche (1930), which gives a different date for the founding, June 6, 1926.
- 149 Webster, Richard A. Christian Democracy in Italy 1860–1960 [London: Hollis & Carter, 1961] pp. 84–86.
- 150 ibid., pp. 76–89.
- 151 Pope Pius XI; declaration on the occasion of a visit by Italian Catholic students; September 8th 1924; quoted by R. A. Webster; Christian Democracy in Italy: 1860–1960 [Hollis and Carter 1961] pp. 96–97.
- 152 Webster, op. cit., pp. 94–97.
- 153 ibid., pp. 99–100.
- 154 Boegner, op. cit., pp. 64–65.
- 155 The sections were: 1. The call to unity; 2. The church’s message to the world – the Gospel; 3. The nature of the church; 4. The church’s common confession of faith; 5. The church’s ministry; 6. The sacraments; 7. The unity of Christendom and the place of the different churches in it. See A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1968, [London: SPCK, 1993, for the World Council of Churches, Geneva] Vol. I, p. 420.
- 156 Tatlow, op. cit., p. 424.
- 157 This attack was probably prompted by a memorandum prepared by Bishop J. H. Oldham early in 1927 which helped to prepare the ground for dialogue between Christians and people of other faiths at a later stage. He suggested that mission groups should recruit non-Christians to help them to understand and to interpret the faiths to which they belonged and to discover and compare the values which they experienced, without attempting theological definition. Although that can be interpreted as giving ground to other faiths, the Oldham plan was basically aimed at contrasting Christian and non-Christian values so that the overriding wealth of Christian revelation would become still more apparent. Even so, it was a vital starting point for dialogue rejected out of hand by the Vatican.
- 158 Gort, Jerald D. contributing Jerusalem 1928: Mission, Kingdom and Church [International Review of Mission], pp. 274–276.
- 159 From about this time Pius XI even discouraged the Belgium-based conversations with the Church of England which had been initiated by Cardinal Mercier and Lord Halifax under Benedict XV and which he had encouraged as a move towards corporate reunion in the first year or two of his reign. He offended the Church of England hierarchy and rebuffed Lord Halifax by receiving him in audience and then refusing to discuss church union.
- 160 Anderson, Robin Between Two Wars [Franciscan Herald Press, 1977] p. 94.
- 161 Livingstone, Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 229.
- 162 Neuner & Dupois The Christian Faith in the Documents of the Catholic Church [Bangalore: Theological publications in India, 1978, pp. 250–251.
- 163 Franzen, August & Dolan, A. Concise History of the Church [New York: Herder & Herder, 1969] p. 409.
- 164 The Oriental Institute was established in 1917 after the Balkans had fallen to Austria/Germany and while the Palestine and Iraq campaigns were at a critical stage. The Union monastery Amay Chevetogne was established in Belgium in 1925; then followed Istina, 1927, and Russicum, Rome, 1929.
- 165 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 97–98; citing Nouvelle Revue theologique, July 1928, pp. 532–33, and quoting the decree of suppression against Opus sacerdotale Amici Israel.
- 166 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 98–100; citing Nouvelle Revue theologique, July 1928, pp. 532–33; and a commentary signed by Fr. Jean Levie, S.J.
- 167 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., p. 100.

- 168 Gort, op. cit., pp. 274–276.
- 169 Latourette, Kenneth Scott contributing “The International Missionary Council,” in A History of the Ecumenical Movement [Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1993] p. 366.
- 170 Gort, op. cit., p. 273.
- 171 Toland, John, Adolf Hitler [New York: Ballantine, 1977] p. 302.
- 172 Tessler, Mark A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994] p. 195; citing Real Jean Isaac, Party and Politics in Israel: Three Visions of a Jewish State [New York: Longman, 1981], p. 183.
- 173 Latourette, contributing “The International Missionary Council,” op. cit., p. 367.
- 174 Gort, op. cit., pp. 278–280.
- 175 The Qur’an, Penguin Classics English translation by N.J. Dawood; a, passage 19:29; 3:45; b, 19:12; c, 5:45; d, 5:45; 61:6; e, 23:45; f, 5:62; 3:55; (these references are not exhaustive).
- 176 The wording adopted for the Council’s “Christian Message” is made even more significant because the draft was prepared by Bishop William Temple, later Archbishop of Canterbury. His conformist Church of England includes the traditional form of the Nicene Creed in its regular services and also retains the Creed of Athanasius. Such a radical draft might have been expected from a nonconformist churchman but it would then have been less readily accepted by Orthodox churchmen.
- 177 Some translations substitute “of” for “from”, and “through” for “By”, and omit the word “Begotten.”
- 178 Gort, op. cit., p. 273.
- 179 The conference buildings on the Mount of Olives had been made unsafe by an earthquake in 1927. With the organizers determined to hold the conference in Jerusalem, Dr. Mott arranged for five temporary wooden barracks and 23 large tents to be provided. The campground atmosphere helped to introduce an atmosphere of equality between delegates and could well have helped to bridge “the deep chasm dividing them along theological lines” according to Dr. Jerald Gort.
- 180 Gort, op. cit., p. 289.
- 181 The flush of growth and success which followed the suppression of the Boxer Rebellion and the signing of the Boxer Protocol with its additional privileges for Christian missions and schools (and with a continuation of the system of extraterritorial rights) had wilted somewhat for all the churches. However while Protestant numbers increased by nearly fourfold between the Boxer Rebellion and the end of the Great War, the Catholic increase has been put at only about threefold in a longer period, from the end of the Rebellion to 1930.
- 182 Goyau, Georges Trans. Rev F. M. Dreves Missions and Missionaries [Sands, 1932] p. 259.
- 183 Reischauer, E. O., Fairbank, J. K. & Craig, A. M. East Asia: The Modern Transformation [London: George Allen & Unwin, 1967] pp. 704–706.
- 184 Goyau, op. cit., pp. 229 ff.
- 185 ibid., pp. 231 ff.
- 186 The appointment to Indochina was actually of an Apostolic Visitor for the first two years.
- 187 Goyau, op. cit., pp. 233 ff.
- 188 Reischauer, op. cit., p. 660.
- 189 A novel variation on mass baptism techniques previously used by Portuguese priests in India, pier-bound bishops with their boat loads of slaves in Angola (see above, chapter 11); or Manoel’s pre-Reformation bid to save the Jews and Muslims in Portugal (chapter 10).
- 190 Reischauer, op. cit., pp. 656–657.
- 191 ibid., pp. 658–659.
- 192 ibid., p. 665.

- 193 ibid., pp. 674–675.
- 194 ibid., pp. 678–680.
- 195 The World Student Christian Federation meeting in Peking in 1922 provoked an anti-Christian counter movement among students.
- 196 Reischauer, op. cit., p. 668.
- 197 ibid., pp. 636–637 & 681–683.
- 198 Goyau, op. cit., pp. 232 ff.
- 199 Reischauer, op. cit., p. 682.
- 200 The budget for all Protestant missionary enterprises which was published about that time called for Stg.495.8 million from all sources. (See footnote this chapter p. 32.)
- 201 Goyau, op. cit., p. 282.
- 202 China was not his only interest. His Apostolic Delegates had also been busy with a Japanese National Council and a Council of Missionaries in South Africa in 1924. The Anglican Church still dominated “the mission fields” of South Africa and Pius called for a special effort to lift Catholic membership from only 64,000 in a total population of 4.5 million.
- 203 Goyau, op. cit., pp. 231 ff.
- 204 ibid., pp. 236–237.
- 205 Seen in the context of the circumstances in which he spoke, “civilization in its sublimest comprehension” can only be interpreted to mean a papal version of European culture with autocratic clerical domination of community life. (See also the pope’s address on the signing of the Lateran Treaty, p. 28 following.)
- 206 Goyau, op. cit., pp. 237–238.
- 207 Goyau, op. cit., pp. 239–249.
- 208 Neuner & Dupuis, (Eds.) The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Faith [Bangalore, India: Theological Publications in India, 1978] pp. 297–299.
- 209 ibid., op. cit., p. 298.
- 210 This was not the first time that a pope had called for native clergy to be appointed in mission fields. Popes Alexander VII (1659) and Benedict XV (1919), at the two ends of the colonial era, are noteworthy. That their calls had not really been taken seriously is a further indictment of the church and its attitudes. The number of non-European priests rose from 2,600 to over 7,000 while Pius XI was in office, (1922–1939).
- 211 Neuner & Dupuis, op. cit., pp. 283–297.
- 212 Catholic Almanac 1980, p. 177.
- 213 “Religious Congregations” in this sense refers to those who have taken simple vows, (in contrast to the solemn binding vows required of members of the church’s major orders), and who are under the authority of a Superior or Provincial in a group of monasteries or some other dedicated community.
- 214 Goyau, op. cit., p. 246.
- 215 Mott had used it as the title of a book which was having an immense impact in China.
- 216 Reischauer, op. cit., p. 704.
- 217 Goyau, op. cit., pp. 240–241.
- 218 ibid., pp. 249–251.
- 219 Goyau, loc. cit.

²²⁰ It was only in 1908 that the Propaganda was relieved of its responsibility for the operations of the Catholic Church in both Britain and the United States which had been administered as mission fields. The national hierarchies then assumed full responsibility for their affairs under the church's "common law." The Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America was founded three years later. When the US entered the Great War in 1917 a National Catholic War Council was set up. After the war, on the urging of the pope, Benedict XV, it became the National Catholic Welfare Council. (A National Conference of Catholic Charities had already been set up in 1910.) In 1922 it was changed again, by Pius XI, to a purely consultative body.

²²¹ Catholic Almanac 1980, p. 163.

²²² Franzen, August A Concise History of the Church (Ed. Dolan; trans. Becker) [London: Burns & Oates, 1969] pp. 379–380.

²²³ Before the final collapse of the Ch'ing Dynasty the Christian missions had generally taken full advantage of their extraterritorial treaty rights to foster Western individualism, thus undermining Chinese family ties and interdependence, and to set a revolutionary example. They refused to have their students pay homage to the emperor and Confucius, the founder of their system of ethics, as required in government schools but, in the case of Catholics, they had not only to pay recognition to prophets, apostles and "doctors" of their faith but also pray to them as their saints. Back home their counterparts had to salute their own national flags and show subservience to their monarchs or heads of state almost to the point of adulation. But of course that wasn't emperor-homage, it was only living-leader veneration. The Divine Right of Kings had been scrapped in favour of the omnipotent elected leader.

²²⁴ Reischauer, op. cit., pp. 403, 616.

²²⁵ ibid., pp. 688–689.

²²⁶ Neill, Stephen. A History of Christian Missions. [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1964] pp. 465–467.

²²⁷ According to available figures, both Catholic and Protestant membership continued to increase in China during the years of persecution. However it is very difficult to apportion "credit" to the various influences at work or to compare figures for "total Catholics" with figures for "Communicant Protestants."

China: Year	1914	1924	1929	1936	1937
Total Catholics	1,581,430	2,208,880	2,486,841		2,934,175
Communicant Protestants	257,431	402,539	–	567,390	–

Source: Latourette, K. S. A History of Christianity, pp. 1446, 1447.

Increases:

Catholics:	from 1914 to 1924,	40%	from 1924 to 1937,	33%
Protestants:	from 1914 to 1924,	56%	from 1924 to 1936,	41%

Alms collected by principal Roman Catholic mission groups.

	1922	1928	1929
Association for Propagation of the Faith*	24m lire	55m lire	–
Holy Childhood Association #	9m francs	–	27m francs
Association of St. Peter the Apostle #	2m lire	11m lire	–

The Missions Holy Year exhibition ran from December 1924 to February 1926.

Dates of transfers to papal control: * May 1922; # June 1929.

Source: Goyau, G. Missions & Missionaries, (trans. by F.M. Dreves) Sands 1932 p. 268.

²²⁸ Gort, op. cit., p. 291.

²²⁹ ibid., p. 293.

²³⁰ ibid., p. 280.

²³¹ Altogether some 150 concordats have been negotiated since the first, Worms, in 1122. Many of the powers with whom they have been made no longer exist and many others are no longer in effect. Their purposes and relative emphases changed dramatically after the Reformation, again after Napoleon, and again after Versailles.

²³² Von Aretin, Karl Otmar The Papacy and the Modern World [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, World University Library, 1920] p. 182.

- 233 The system of papal representation to the world's governments under concordats was criticized severely during the period of the Second Vatican Council, 1962–1965, especially because it deprived branches of the church of independence and tied them to the affairs and opinions of a foreign authority. The pope, Paul VI, subsequently issued an explanatory document in 1969 but the system has not been changed in any significant respect.
- 234 Catholic Almanac 1980, pp. 211–212.
- 235 ibid. P. 148.
- 236 ibid., p. 324.
- 239 ibid., pp. 321–325.
- 237 Zeman, op. cit., p. 325.
- 238 Reischauer, op. cit., p. 513.
- 239 President Wilson had offended the Allies by saying, during his own peace initiatives, that the causes of the war were unclear and it was known that German diplomats regarded him as sympathetic to their position. During the pre-armistice jockeying he gave Britain further cause for concern when he said the Allies should be content with “peace without victory” and “no annexations or indemnities.” If Britain had not already intended to fight on for Mosul without regard to the Turkish armistice those statements could well have inspired her to do so.
- 240 Marriott, op. cit., p. 534.
- 241 Zeman, op. cit., p. 325.
- 242 Zeman, op. cit., pp. 155, 341–347, 351–354.
- 243 Franzen, op. cit., p. 412.
- 244 Marriott, op. cit., pp. 539–540.
- 245 Kuhner, Hans. Encyclopedia of the Papacy (London: Peter Owen, 1959) p. 328.
- 246 Minerbi, Sergio I. The Vatican and Zionism trans. Arnold Schwarz [New York: Oxford, 1990], p. 121, citing Sykes (Rome) to Sokolow in L. Stein, The Balfour Declaration [London: 1961] p. 282.
- 247 ibid., pp. 122–123, citing Bourne (Jerusalem) to Prime Minister and Balfour (London), January 25, 1919, FO 371/4179, quoted in D. Ingrams, Palestine Papers, 1917–1922 [London: 1972] pp. 60–61.
- 248 ibid., p. 127, citing [Amette] Second conversation with Cardinal Gasparri, March 7, 1919, AAE, St. Seige, June 1918–September 1920, vol. 13/Z, pp. 54–55.
- 249 ibid., p. 129.
- 250 ibid., p. 131, citing Osservatore Romano, March 14, 1919; also Acta Apostolicae Sedis, March 12, 1919, pp. 100–101; the English translation is in The Tablet, March 22, 1919, pp. 353–354.
- 251 ibid., p. 131–132, citing Pierre van Zuylen (Rome) to Foreign Minister Hymans, March 16, 1919, no. 57/26, ABRE, St. Seige 1919–20.
- 252 ibid., p. 136, citing “L’Orient ed il miraggio di Sion” Osservatore Romano, April 10, 1919.
- 253 ibid., p. 32.
- 254 ibid., pp. 145–146, citing Osservatore Romano, October 15, 1920 and May 30–31, 1921.
- 255 ibid., p. 134, citing cable from de Salis, no. 35, March 13, 1919, PRO, FO 371/4179; see minute by S.K., March 15, 1919.
- 256 ibid., p. 48.
- 257 ibid., pp. 48–51, 63, 67–80.
- 258 ibid., p. 148, citing “Allocutio ‘Causa Nobis’,” Osservatore Romano, June 25, 1921; Acta Apostolicae Sedis, June 18, 1921, pp. 281–283; Oriente Moderno 1 (1921): 81–82; English translation in The Tablet, June 25, 1921, pp. 821–822.

- 259 Six weeks later the pope told the Protestant secretary of an Arab delegation (whom he presumed were all Catholics) that he would write to all governments advising them that “the Holy Land cannot be allowed to fall into the hands either of the Jews or the Protestants, to both of whom he objected to the same degree.” The Foreign Office decided against submitting a formal protest. Minerbi, op. cit., pp. 154–155, citing Young of the Colonial Office, London, to the Foreign Office undersecretary, August 10, 1921, PRO FO 371/6396, E 9154/8364/88, and Sthamer (London) to Ministry for Foreign Affairs (Berlin), no. 902, September 1, 1921, AA Palastina-Zionismus, Rom/Vat 157/1, no. 69, et al.
- 260 Extracts from Pope Pius XII’s statements of February 11th 1929 (to the parish priests and Lenten preachers of Rome) and of February 13th 1929 (to a delegation of professors and students from Milan University) are from the English translation published as “The Settlement of the ‘Roman Question’” by the Australian Catholic Truth Society, reference H4, No. 551.
- 261 Webster, op. cit., pp. 110–111.
- 262 ibid., p. 109.
- 263 Kuhner, op. cit., p. 240.
- 264 On seizing control of the Russian government in November 1917 the Bolsheviks promptly arranged an armistice with Germany and its allies which took effect on December 5th. Firm peace negotiations began on December 22nd and the Treaty of Brest Litovsk was signed on March 3rd 1918. Russia gave up all rights to Poland, Courland and Lithuania; evacuated Estonia, Livonia, the Ukraine and all occupied Turkish territories; and agreed to demobilize its army. The Central Powers and Turkey agreed to refrain from agitation (or subversion) against Russia, its government or the system under which it existed.(39) The Bolsheviks have since been criticized for so readily surrendering the Jewish communities of Poland, Lithuania (50 percent of the urban population), and the Ukraine (30 percent of the total population) to German control.* However quite apart from the fact that they didn’t have any option (see p. 1/XX/57), short of continuing the war, there were the firm promises previously given by both the Central Powers and the Allies that Poland would be guaranteed independence either as a monarchy or as a republic. The safety of the Jews in that situation was therefore not a major factor, especially with the Balfour Declaration thrown in for good measure.
- 265 Marriott, op. cit., p. 515.
- 266 Population estimates: Ettinger, S. The Jews in Russia at the outbreak of the Revolution [London: Oxford, 1978] Chapter 1 The Jews in Soviet Russia since 1917, p. 15.
- 267 Marriott, op.cit., p. 566.
- 268 Franzen, op. cit., p. 412.
- 269 Catholic Almanac, 1975, p. 295.
- 270 Anderson, op.cit., pp. 74–75.
- 271 Neuner & Dupuis, op. cit., p. 325.
- 272 Anderson, loc. cit.
- 273 Latourette, K. S., A History of Christianity [Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1964] p. 1371.
- 274 It was not a coincidence that Mortalium Animos had the ring of the Inquisition backed by totalitarian regimes. The pope felt quite at home in that setting. In fact when Mussolini dropped his mask in January 1925 and began his rule by dictatorship he had very good reason to expect the support of the Vatican. It is only surprising that they took four years to finalize the details of their Lateran Treaty and Italian Concordat.
- 275 Von Aretin, op. cit., pp. 205–206.

CHAPTER 18: HITLER’S BLUEPRINT WINS SUPPORT

- ¹ Toland, John Adolf Hitler [New York: Ballantine, 1977] pp. 2–13.
- ² ibid., pp. 45–65.

- ³ ibid., p. 73.
- ⁴ Hitler's summons arrived via the Munich police on January 18. Planned expansion of the Austrian army by conscription had therefore begun at least as early as January. Archduke Ferdinand was not assassinated in Serbia until June 28. It took Austria less than four weeks to issue an ultimatum and then, on Germany's urging, (without waiting to negotiate over Serbia's reply and having rebuffed peace initiatives by both Britain and Russia), she invaded Serbia just five weeks later. The army build up before the assassination and the speed of subsequent events tends to support the contentions that there was an inside conspiracy behind the assassination, that Austria had been looking for a justification to jump its claims in the Balkans and that Germany was quick to take advantage of other people's worries to try to extend its Eastern interests. The Archduke's dying words are said to have been that "the fellow (the assassin) will get the Golden Cross of Merit for this". The Kaiser was then quick to remind the Austrian Emperor that Germany, (his ally) was ready for war but Russia was not.
- ⁵ Toland, op. cit., p. 74.
- ⁶ Marriott, J.A.R. A History of Europe 1815–1939 [Methuen, 1966] pp. 487–488.
- ⁷ Toland, op. cit., p. 76.
- ⁸ ibid., p. 77.
- ⁹ See chapter 14, "Let's try another Revolution," pp. 14, 18 ff.
- ¹⁰ Bottomore & Rubel Karl Marx: Selected writings in Sociology and Social Philosophy [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1976] pp. 404–405.
- ¹¹ Bavaria retained sovereign independence with its own monarchy until 1918 even though it was an integral part of the German Empire. Other dual sovereignties also existed in both the British and French empires.
- ¹² Toland, op. cit., p. 95.
- ¹³ The Iron Cross (2nd class) in November 1914; the Military Cross (3rd class with swords) in September 1917; the Regimentsdiplom (for outstanding bravery) in May 1918; the Verwundetenabzeichen (Medal for the wounded) also in May 1918; the Service Medal (3rd class) in August 1918 and the Iron Cross (1st class) also in August 1918.
- ¹⁴ Toland, op. cit., p. 91.
- ¹⁵ ibid., pp. 48, 61, 83, 90.
- ¹⁶ ibid., p. 92.
- ¹⁷ The German philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer believed his views to be consistent with those of Christian mystics but the church regards them as one of the chief anti-Christian systems of the nineteenth century and as deeply pessimistic.[Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church.] He wrote that will was the ultimate reality and that the evils of existence could be remedied by suppressing will with pity and mortification of the passions. English translations of his works appeared in the 1880's (25 years after he died).
- ¹⁸ Toland, op. cit., p. 93.
- ¹⁹ Zeman Z. A. B. A Diplomatic History of the First World War [London : Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1971] p. 360.
- ²⁰ Toland, op. cit., p. 96.
- ²¹ ibid., pp. 97–98.
- ²² Hitler, Adolf Mein Kampf (Ed.) D.C. Watt [London: Hutchinson, 1976] p. 47.
- ²³ This was not Hitler's first visionary experience. As a youth aged 17, only weeks before he learned of his mother's terminal cancer, he and a friend had attended a performance of Wagner's Rienzi. Visibly affected, he insisted that they walk to a nearby hilltop instead of going home. "Feverish with excitement" and in "a state of complete ecstasy and rapture" Hitler ranted to his friend about a call from the people to lead them to freedom which would one day be entrusted to him as a special mission. His family had to put up with a period of moodiness and rhetorical lectures for some time after that experience.[Toland, op. cit., pp. 28–29].
- ²⁴ ibid., prologue pp. xvii–xviii.
- ²⁵ Hitler, op. cit., pp. 185–187.

- 26 Hitler put the date of the pastor's visit as November 10. Toland puts it as the 9th.
- 27 Professor Edmund Forster, chief of Berlin University's Nerve Clinic.
- 28 Watt, D.C. (Ed.) Introduction to Hitler's Mein Kampf [London: Hutchinson, 1976] p. 55.
- 29 Hitler discussed the impact of syphilis on German family and national life at great length in Mein Kampf.
- 30 These notes are extracted from D.C. Watt's Introduction to Hitler's Mein Kampf, [London: Hutchinson, 1976] pp. xxvi-xxviii, John Toland's Adolph Hitler, and Bullock, Alan, Hitler and Stalin: Parallel Lives [London: HarperCollins/Fontana, 1993] pp. 73–76. The details in these sources do not correspond in all respects but they were no doubt based on the best available sources at the time of their respective publication. These notes are an attempt to relate, chronologically, some of the key events noted in those sources.
- 31 The Holocaust History Project, Short Essay, What are 'The Protocols of the Elders of Zion?' source: www.holocaust-history.org/short-essays/protocols.shtml as at January 12, 2000.
- 32 Roemer, Nils, a review of Benjamin W. Segel, A Lie and a Libel: The History of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, (ed., trans., Richard S. Levy, [Lincoln & London: Uni. Nebraska Press, 1995], source: www.h-net.msu.edu/~german/books/reviews/roemer1.html as at January 13, 2000.
- 33 Toland, op. cit., pp. 102–112.
- 34 Watt, D. C. Introduction to Mein Kampf Trans. Ralph Mannheim [London: Hutchinson, 1974], p. xxvii.
- 35 Toland, op. cit., pp. 117–119.
- 36 ibid., p. 122.
- 37 Bullock, Alan, Hitler and Stalin: Parallel Lives [London: HarperCollins/Fontana, 1993] p. 75, citing Ernst Deuerlein, in VfZ (Vierteljahresheft für Zeitgeschichte, Munich) (1959), 2, pp. 201 ff.
- 38 Toland, op. cit., pp. 131–132.
- 39 Watt, op. cit., intro p. xxviii.
- 40 Toland, op. cit., pp. 136–137.
- 41 ibid., p. 130.
- 42 The date March 31 is from Toland, op. cit. p. 135. Bullock, op. cit., p. 76, gives the date as April 1, but according to Watt, op. cit., p. xxvii, it was March 21, 1920.
- 43 Watt, op. cit., intro., p. xxviii.
- 44 Toland, op. cit., p. 121.
- 45 Watt, op. cit., intro. p. xxviii.
- 46 One of the children later became a Carmelite nun, Sister Lucy. She wrote an account of her experience of July 13, 1917 in three parts. The first was of a vision of hell and the second about the conversion of the Russian people. The third, thought to have been a prophecy of dire events, became known as "the secret" and was not to be opened until after her death or until 1960 (which ever came first). Its contents have not yet been made public. The Vatican acted on part two in 1942.
- 47 Catholic Almanac, 1980, p. 320.
- 48 Mary is supposed to have appeared to an Indian, Juan Diego, in 1531 to tell him to relay a message to Bishop Zumarraga about building a church (later a basilica) on Tepeyac Hill, Mexico City.[Catholic Almanac, 1980, p. 320.] It very conveniently helped to offset the efforts of Dominican priest Bartolome de Las Casas to expose the cruelty, exploitation and land-grabbing to which the Indians had been subjected. [Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 295] [Pendle, George, A History of Latin America [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1963] p. 58].
- 49 The proposal passed the lower house but was rejected by the upper house and church/state relations entered another rough period. The fall of the government was followed by new treaties two years later.
- 50 Von Aretin, Karl Otmar The Papacy and the Modern World [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, World University Library, 1920] pp. 174, 197–198.

- 51 Toland, op. cit., pp. 137–138.
- 52 ibid., p. 329.
- 53 ibid., pp. 138–139.
- 54 ibid., p. 137.
- 55 The Times, London, Saturday, May 8, 1921.
- 56 Cornwell, John Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII [London: Penguin/Viking, 1999] pp. 94–95, citing Vatican Secretariat of State Archives (SRS), Germania, 1921, Fasc. 902, folio 9 RV and folios 20 ff.
- 57 ibid., p. 95, citing US House Joint Resolution 433, 1920.
- 58 The League of Nations agreed to a British mandate in April 1920, subject to acceptable terms being drawn up. A leading British Jew, Zionist, banker's son and cabinet minister, Sir Herbert Samuel, took up his appointment as High Commissioner for the Defender of the (Christian) Faith in succession to the military administration three months later. An agreed text for the mandate was approved by the League in July 1922 and it officially took effect in September 1923.
- 59 Laqueur, Walter The Israel Arab Reader [New York: Bantam, 1976] notes to document 11, the British Mandate, p. 34.
- 60 Blumberg, H. M. Weizmann: His Life and Times [New York: St. Martin's Press, 1975] pp. 80–81.
- 61 Lapidé, Pinchas E. The Last Three Popes and the Jews [London: Souvenir Press, 1967] pp. 84–85.
- 62 Allen, Richard Imperialism and Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [London: Oxford, 1974] pp. 262–271.
- 63 France relinquished its claims to represent all Catholics in 1922 after the terms of the mandates had been agreed.
- 64 The results of the Upper Silesian plebiscite on March 20, 1921, were:
Popular vote: Germany 706,000; Poland 479,000. Vote by communes: Germany 792; Poland 682. The uprising occurred in May, and was only ended on October 20 when the Allied Powers endorsed the inclusion of southeastern Upper Silesia in Poland. Source: Encyclopaedia Britannica, Multimedia CD Edition, International Version, 1999.
- 65 Lapidé, loc. cit.
- 66 Allen, op. cit., p. 263.
- 67 Before the war Sir Mark Sykes, then a junior member of Parliament and a supporter of the British policy of propping up the Ottoman Empire, had written in scathing terms of the Arab Community. He saw them as an inferior race, incapable of ruling themselves and one of the most deplorable pictures to be seen in the East. The Bedouins were, he said, a rapacious, greedy, ill-mannered set of brutes. And before he was appointed to represent Britain in dividing up the Ottoman empire between Britain, France and Russia he had already written in a travel book that while even Jews had their good points the Armenians had none and were the lowest of the low. It is therefore little wonder that Britain did not deem it necessary to tell the Arabs of the Balfour Declaration.
- 68 Zeman, op. cit., p. 330.
- 69 Blumberg, op. cit., p. 65.
- 70 Allen, op. cit., pp. 263–269.
- 71 Toland, op. cit., pp. 250–251.
- 72 New Catholic Encyclopaedia, Vol. V [McGraw-Hill, 1967] pp. 627–628.
- 73 Schapiro, Leonard contributing the introduction to The Jews in Soviet Russia Since 1917 [London: Oxford, 1978] p. 11.
- 74 Abramsky, Chimen contributing chapter 4, The Jews in Soviet Russia Since 1917, pp. 64–68.
- 75 Toland, op. cit., p. 152.
- 76 Marriott, op. cit., p. 540.
- 77 Toland, op. cit., p. 155.
- 78 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 97.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 79 Cornwell, loc. cit.
- 80 Cornwell, loc. cit.
- 81 ibid., pp. 98–99.
- 82 Toland, op. cit., pp. 172–178.
- 83 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 99–100, citing BelgFO, Allemagne, 17, Aspeslaugh to General de Guffory, Chief of the Belgian Delegation at the Inter-Allied Military Commission, July 12, 1923, previously cited in Stehlin, Weimar and the Vatican, 256.
- 84 ibid., p. 112.
- 85 ibid., p. 100.
- 86 Cornwell, loc. cit.
- 87 NOTES: All references to Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf are to the English translation by Ralph Manheim, published by Hutchinson of London, 1974/76, with an introduction by D.C. Watt.
- 88 Toland, op. cit., pp. 302, 316.
- 89 Watt, op. cit., intro., pp. xxxvii–xl.
- 90 Bernstein, Herman The Truth About the Protocols of Zion [New York: Covici Friede, 1935].
- 91 Watt, op. cit., intro., p. xxxvii.
- 92 Gossett, Thomas F. Race: The History of an Idea in America [New York: Schocken, 1965] pp. 346–350.
- 93 ibid., p. 254.
- 94 ibid., p. 152.
- 95 Hitler was ripe for such propaganda from his experience in Vienna even without the impact of the Allies' subversive propaganda aimed at ethnic groups and the church's anti-Semitism. He later had a couple of tragic love affairs but apparently he took a deliberate decision not to produce children from fear that he had a Jewish ancestor himself and that something might go wrong. [Toland, op. cit., pp. 316, 344–350, 372–373].
- 96 Forsthoefel, P.F. contributing, New Catholic Encyclopaedia Vol. V, p. 627.
- 97 Gossett, op. cit., pp. 340–371.
- 98 ibid., pp. 263–269.
- 99 ibid., pp. 353–361.
- 100 They took to nineteen the total number of states with such laws.
- 101 Gossett, op. cit., p. 371.
- 102 ibid., p. 404.
- 103 ibid., p. 403.
- 104 ibid., pp. 398–399.
- 105 ibid., p. 402.
- 106 ibid., p. 401.
- 107 ibid., p. 400.
- 108 ibid., p. 406.
- 109 New Catholic Encyclopaedia Vol V, p. 628.
- 110 Gossett, op. cit., p. 453.
- 111 ibid., p. 405.
- 112 Toland, op. cit., pp. 199–200.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 113 The new restrictions proved difficult to administer and the target of 150,000 per year was not imposed until the economic collapse of 1929. Until then the average annual intake was almost double the target, at 287,000, and the US continued to reap the economic benefits. [Gossett, op. cit., pp. 406–407].
- 114 Gossett, loc. cit.
- 115 Hitler, op. cit., pp. 399–400.
- 116 ibid., p. 134.
- 117 ibid., numerous references, including pp. 195, 224, 258, 263–265, 269–297.
- 118 ibid., pp. 583, 622.
- 119 ibid., p. 582.
- 120 ibid., p. 607.
- 121 ibid., p. 123.
- 122 ibid., pp. 122–129.
- 123 ibid., pp. 165–180, 527–539.
- 124 ibid., p. 409.
- 125 ibid., pp. 286, 581.
- 126 ibid., pp. 417–418.
- 127 ibid., pp. 100–107, 243, 278–279.
- 128 ibid., p. 393.
- 129 ibid., pp. 366–367.
- 130 In Nazi Germany between 1933 and 1945 more than 200,000 people were sterilized and about 50,000 were put to death in gas chambers for being insane, feeble-minded or physically deformed.* For comparison, in the United States between 1927 (when the Supreme Court upheld the validity of state sterilization laws) and 1958 about 60,000 Americans were sterilized. (*The Holocaust is discussed in later chapters.)
- 131 New Catholic Encyclopaedia, loc. cit.
- 132 Gossett, op. cit., pp. 446–449.
- 133 Gossett, loc. cit.
- 134 Encyclopaedia Britannica International Multimedia Edition 199, Italy: History since 1870, The Fascist Era.
- 135 Hitler, op. cit., pp. 106–107.
- 136 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 105–106, citing P. Hoser, “Hitler und die Katholische Kirche”, 485ff.
- 137 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 115.
- 138 Hacker, Louis M. The Course of American Economic Growth and Development [New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1970] pp. 285–287.
- 139 ibid., pp. 279–282.
- 140 ibid., pp. 291–293.
- 141 Professor Walter Rauschenbush, a Baptist minister teaching at Rochester Theological Seminary, wrote a series of books of which Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907) was probably best known. He criticized the church and the role of the clergy during the previous couple of generations while America’s commercial and industrial ethic had developed, and called for a series of reforms. He wanted social justice and economic democracy with public ownership of land and utilities and worker participation in management. President Theodore Roosevelt managed to show enthusiasm for his call while he also managed to avoid both social and monetary reforms. [Hacker, op. cit., pp. 261–262.]
- 142 The Bank of England’s support for the new German bank related both to Locarno and American insistence on a new gold standard policy.

- 143 Marriott, op. cit., pp. 578–579.
- 144 ibid., pp. 579–581.
- 145 Hacker, op. cit., pp. 292–299.
- 146 ibid., p. 287.
- 147 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 102–103.
- 148 ibid., p. 104.
- 149 ibid., p. 117.
- 150 ibid., op. cit., p. 111.
- 151 ibid., p. 117, citing Scholder, The Churches and the Third Reich, Vol. I, 149; Bergen to Foreign Office, June 2, 1930, Archive AA Bonn, Botschaft Rom-Vatican, Vol. 143, quoted in Scholder.
- 152 ibid., pp. 108–109, citing a number of publications in which the correspondence has been published.
- 153 ibid., p. 109.
- 154 Von Aretin, op. cit., p. 222.
- 155 Pius XI, Encyclical letter Divini Illius Magistri (On Christian Education) [Australian Catholic Truth Society: 1930] p. 26.
- 156 Anderson, Robin Between two wars: The story of Pope Pius XI [Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1977] p. 106.
- 157 The description of sex education comes from Casti Connubii in which it was contrasted with instruction in marriage.
- 158 Halberstam, David The Fifties [New York: Fawcett Columbine, 1993] pp. 282–287.
- 159 Pius XI, Pope, Encyclical letter on Christian Marriage Casti Connubii [The Australian Catholic Truth Society, March 30, 1931] p. 19.
- 160 ibid., pp. 21, 32.
- 161 ibid., p. 24.
- 162 ibid., pp. 32–34.
- 163 ibid., pp. 25–28.
- 164 In his personal conduct as well as in his efforts to impose the church's authority in civil affairs.
- 165 Anderson, op. cit., p. 111.
- 166 Barker, C.E. The Church's Neurosis and Twentieth Century Revelations [London: Hutchinson/Rider, 1975] pp. 13–16, 24, 37–38, 54.
- 167 ibid., pp. 16, 55.
- 168 ibid., p. 20.
- 169 Pius XI, op. cit., pp. 22–23.
- 170 ibid., p. 19.
- 171 ibid., pp. 29–31.
- 172 ibid., p. 20.
- 173 ibid., pp. 27–28.
- 174 Hitler, op. cit., pp. 120–123.
- 175 ibid., p. 229.
- 176 ibid., p. 367.
- 177 Pius XI, op. cit., p. 39.
- 178 ibid., pp. 51–53.
- 179 ibid., p. 54.

¹⁸⁰ ibid., p. 30.

¹⁸¹ ibid., p. 29.

¹⁸² ibid., p. 26.

¹⁸³ Pius XI later produced a separate encyclical dealing with films and other mass media.

¹⁸⁴ In 1979, almost 50 years later, the Synod of Bishops did take a completely different approach in its expanded paper on “The Role of the Christian Family in the Modern World”. It divided the theme into three parts: a description of the contemporary situation of the family in various parts of the world; a statement of some factors affecting the state of the family and teaching about it in the modern world, and a pastoral section dealing with practical aspects of the role of the family. In its only reference to Casti Connubii the Synod paper says, “the encyclicals of Pius XI on education and the family, and the frequent talks of Pius XII ... propounded a sufficiently complete teaching, which was then taken up again and fitted to new circumstances in the documents of the Second Vatican Council.” It takes those documents as its starting point and proceeds to contradict much of Casti Connubii by means of numerous references to Bible passages. References to the Doctors and Fathers of the church are conspicuous by their absence. In particular the Synod paper repudiates sexual discrimination in schools and the prohibition on Catholic youths attending non-church schools. It says that parents can and indeed should send their children to the various school institutions in order that they may acquire an education suited to the demands of modern social life. “They have the inalienable right to choose a school that can satisfy their own aspirations and those of their children.” [Synod of Bishops The Role of the Christian Family in the Modern World (Vatican City, 1979) English translation; The Australian Catholic Truth Society Publications, Melbourne, pp. 3, 29, 30.]

¹⁸⁵ Sigmund Freud was born to Austrian parents of Jewish faith and lived in Vienna for 78 of his 83 years. He was 51 and a widely recognized psychologist and writer (The Interpretation of Dreams, 1900; The Psychopathology of Everyday Life, 1901) when Hitler arrived there as an impressionable 18 year old youth to face poverty with a monastery school education, a rejected secret love and his first experience of a vision behind him. It was in Vienna’s environment of classic anti-Semitic Catholic bigotry, (possibly even more acute than that which Karl Marx had experienced), that Freud developed both his methods of psychoanalysis (which revolutionized his profession) and his ideas about childhood development, the effect of sexual inhibition on youth, and that religious belief was an unhealthy delusion. His last major work, Civilization and its Discontents, was published in 1930 shortly before Casti Connubii which could hardly have been designed to conflict more sharply with Freud’s work. Hitler’s occupation of Austria in 1938 forced him to flee to Britain. He died the following year.

¹⁸⁶ Don Cupitt, Dean of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, discussed the change from rejection of the church’s dogma to rejection of its moral standards and authority in Crisis of Moral Authority, Lutterworth Press, 1972.

¹⁸⁷ C. Edward Barker, Methodist minister and analytical psychotherapist, traced the sources and effects of the church’s neurosis in The Church’s Neurosis and Twentieth Century Revelations, Rider, 1975. In his conclusions (pp. 246, 247) he calls for the church to dissociate itself from the Pauline theory of “redemption by the blood of Christ” and says it must repudiate “the neuroticism endemic in its traditional gospel” or dwindle to a small minority “chained to moral masochism and obsession, preferring the restricting compensations of suffering and ‘wilderness experience’ to the challenge and vigour of health, maturity and well-being.”

¹⁸⁸ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 102–103.

¹⁸⁹ ibid., pp. 119–120.

¹⁹⁰ ibid., pp. 120–122, citing references drawn from: Scholder, The Churches and the Third Reich, Vol. I, pp. 152 & 153; Bruning, Memoiren, pp. 358 & 359; I. Kershaw, Hitler, 1889–1936 (London, 1998) p. 339.

¹⁹¹ Ehler & Morrall, Divini Redemptoris, translation by the Catholic Truth Society, London, clause 6 p. 546.

¹⁹² Cornwell, op. cit., p. 123, citing Bruning, Memoiren, p. 360.

¹⁹³ ibid., p. 124, citing Bruning manuscript, memoirs, 351–52: Harvard University Archive FP 93.4, quoted in Patch, Heinrich Bruning, 295–296.

¹⁹⁴ Walsh, Warren B. Russia and the Soviet Union [University of Michigan Press, 1958] pp. 455 ff, 474 ff.

¹⁹⁵ Mankind’s Search for God [New York: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society, 1990], p. 358.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 196 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 125, citing a report from the Bavarian envoy, Baron von Ritter, to Munich, December 20, 1931, cited in Scholder, The Churches and the Third Reich, Vol. I, 154.
- 197 ibid., p. 131.
- 198 ibid., pp. 127–128, citing Scholder, The Churches and the Third Reich, Vol. I, 154.
- 199 ibid., p. 128, citing Scholder, ibid.
- 200 ibid., pp. 128–129, citing Ludwig Kaas, “Der Konkordatstyp des faschistischen Italien”, Zeitschrift für ausländisches öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht, III. 1, 1933, pp. 488–522.
- 201 Toland, op. cit., p. 378.
- 202 Lewy, Guenter The Catholic Church and Nazi Germany [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1964] p. 27.
- 203 Toland, op. cit., p. 404.
- 204 Lewy, op. cit., p. 43.
- 205 ibid., p. 30.
- 206 Patterson, James T, contrib. a biography of Franklin D. Roosevelt, Encyclopedia Americana [source: <http://gi.grolier.com/presidents/ea/bios/32proos.html>].
- 207 Roosevelt, Franklin D, inaugural address, Saturday, March 4, 1933. Congressional Archives. [Source: <http://www.nscds.pvt.k12.il.us/nscds/us/apushist/roosevelt/inaug.html>].
- 208 The National Recovery Administration and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.
- 209 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 133–134.
- 210 Cornwell, loc. cit., citing Scholder, Vol. I, pp. 240, 243.
- 211 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 136–137, citing Scholder, Vol. I, pp. 246, 299; and p. 138.
- 212 ibid., p. 137, citing Helmreich, The German Churches under Hitler, p. 239.
- 213 ibid., p. 138, citing Helmreich, ibid.
- 214 ibid., pp. 139–140, citing S. Friedlander, Nazi Germany and the Jews, Vol. I: The Years of Persecution, 1933–39 (London, 1997), p. 42.
- 215 ibid., p. 140, citing Friedlander, ibid., 42; in turn citing Helmreich, The German Churches under Hitler, pp. 276–277.
- 216 Nafi, Basheer M. The Arabs and the Axis: 1933–1940 [Arab Studies Quarterly, Vol. 19, No. 2, Spring 1997] distributed by MSANEWS <http://msanews.mynet.net/> July 31, 1999. The author cites: Y. Porath, The Palestinian Arab National Movement (London: Frank Cass, 1977) vol. 2, 76; Francis Nicosia, The Third Reich and the Palestine Question (London, I.B Tauris: 1985) 85–86.
- 217 Brenner, Lenni Zionism in the Age of the Dictators (London: Croom Helm, 1983) p. 61.
- 218 ibid., p. 62. Cohen proved useful in other ways. Soon afterward, on behalf of the Jewish National Fund (the World Zionist Organization’s Palestine land fund), he arranged for the release of JNF funds frozen in Germany on the grounds that the cash was need to buy land for Jews whom Hitler would be pushing out.
- 219 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 142.
- 220 ibid., p. 144, citing Scholder, Vol. I. p. 387.
- 221 Lewy, op. cit., p. 51.
- 222 Hitler, op. cit., pp. 60, 512.
- 223 ibid., p. 318.
- 224 ibid., pp. 412–413.
- 225 ibid., p. 103.
- 226 ibid., pp. 106–107.
- 227 ibid., p. 513.

- 228 ibid., p. 624.
- 229 Lewy, op. cit., p. 52.
- 230 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 143.
- 231 Von Aretin, op. cit., p. 207.
- 232 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 143.
- 233 ibid., pp. 144–145, citing Scholder, Vol. I., pp. 393, 394, 395.
- 234 Lewy, op. cit., p. 31, 32, 36–37. [The sequence of events and dates suggested by Lewy do not correspond directly with those given by Cornwell.]
- 235 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 145–146, citing Scholder, Vol. I., p. 395.
- 236 Conway, J.S. The Nazi Persecution of the Churches: 1933–1945 [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1968] p. 20.
- 237 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 147, citing L. Volk, Kirchliche Akten über die Reichskonkordatsverhandlungen, 1933 (Mainz, 1975), 82–85.
- 238 ibid., p. 148, citing L. Volk, Das Reichskonkordat vom 20. Juli 1933 (Mainz, 1972), 231.
- 239 ibid., p. 148 citing Patch, Bruning, 302–3.
- 240 ibid., pp. 148–149.
- 241 ibid., p. 149, citing R. Leiber, “Pius XII as I knew him”, The Tablet, December 27, 1958.
- 242 Lewy, op. cit., sets out the progress of negotiations from 1919 to 1933 with special attention to the final stages after Hitler became chancellor]. ‘Consultations’ continued even after the concordat was signed, on July 20, in an effort to improve security for the church which was already being harassed even before final ratification on September 10.
- 243 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 152.
- 244 Lewy, op. cit., p. 44.
- 245 Von Aretin, op. cit., p. 209.
- 246 Lewy, op. cit., pp. 79, 84.
- 247 ibid., p. 85.
- 248 Conway, op. cit., pp. 40–41.
- 249 Ehler & Morrall, op. cit., p. 493.
- 250 Lewy, loc. cit.
- 251 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 155–156. Broken in health and spirit and threatened by the Nazis, Bruning was eventually forced to slip across the border into Holland as a refugee. After the Second World War he returned and played an influential role in the formation of the Christian Democratic Party.
- 252 ibid., pp. 159–160.
- 253 Shirer, William L. The Rise & Fall of the Third Reich [London: Pan, 1964] pp. 264–265.
- 254 The strength of that public support must have amazed even Hitler and helped to strengthen his self-understanding as Germany’s “Saviour”. The oath of allegiance which Catholic bishops had been required to take under Article 16 of the Concordat said, in part, “I swear and promise to respect the Government established according to the constitution and to cause the clergy of my diocese to respect it. In the due solicitude for the welfare and the interests of the German Reich, I will endeavour, while performing the spiritual office bestowed on me, to prevent anything which might threaten to be detrimental to it.” [Ehler & Morrall, op. cit., p. 491] It was therefore virtually automatic that they unanimously endorsed a call by Cardinal Faulhaber for a ‘yes’ vote so that Catholics would profess anew their loyalty to people and Fatherland and their agreement with the Führer’s farsighted and forceful efforts to spare the German people the terror of war and the horrors of Bolshevism, to secure public order and to create work for the unemployed. [Toland, op. cit., p. 438].
- 255 Berkouwer, G.C. A Half Century of Theology [Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1977] pp. 12–13, 25–26.
- 256 Paul’s letter to the Church in Rome (‘Romans’), 13:12, Jerusalem Bible translation.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 257 Berkouwer, op. cit., p. 183.
- 258 Conway, op. cit., pp. 9, 10, 410–411.
- 259 ibid., pp. 11–13.
- 260 ibid.
- 261 Moses, John A., Dietrich Bonhoeffer's Prioritization of Church Unity (Oekumene) [Journal of Religious History, May 2000] (draft, pp. 8–12).
- 262 ibid., draft, pp. 12–13, citing Bonhoeffer, The Church and the Jewish Question in No Rusty Swords, [Letters, lectures and notes 1928–1936, ed. E.H. Robertson, (London: Collins, 1974)] p. 225.
- 263 ibid., draft, p. 13.
- 264 Theological Existence Today.
- 265 Berkouwer, op. cit., p. 186.
- 266 Noakes, J & G. Pridham Eds., Nazism 1919–1945 Vol. I [New York: Schocken, 1983] p. 523.
- 267 Noakes, op. cit., p. 522.
- 268 Yahil, Leni The Holocaust: The Fate of European Jewry [Oxford: Oxford Uni. Press, 1991] pp. 62–63; and Noakes, op. cit., p. 524.
- 269 Yahil, Leni, op. cit., p. 95.
- 270 Brenner, Lenni Zionism in the Age of the Dictators (London: Croom Helm, 1983) p. 57.
- 271 ibid., pp. 45–6.
- 272 ibid., pp. 46–7.
- 273 Yahil, op. cit., p. 60.
- 274 Noakes, op. cit., p. 524.
- 275 Yahil, op. cit., p. 63.
- 276 Noakes, op. cit., p. 525, 526.
- 277 ibid., p. 528.
- 278 Noakes, loc. cit.
- 279 Noakes, loc. cit.
- 280 quoted in Brenner, op. cit. pp. 48–9.
- 281 quoted in Brenner, op. cit., pp. 48–9.
- 282 Brenner, op. cit., p. 58–59. See also Yahil, op. cit., p. 96.
- 283 Brenner, op. cit., p. 58. Yahil, op. cit., p. 96.
- 284 Brenner, op. cit., pp. 62–3.
- 285 Allen, op. cit., pp. 308–310.
- 286 Yahil, op. cit., p. 101.
- 287 Brenner, op. cit., p. 49.
- 288 Yahil, op. cit., p. 96.
- 289 Brenner, op. cit., p. 58.
- 290 ibid., p. 63.
- 291 Yahil, op. cit., p. 99.
- 292 Brenner, op. cit., pp. 63–4.
- 293 ibid., p. 64.
- 294 Yahil, op. cit., p. 102.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 295 Brenner, op. cit., p. 64.
- 296 Yahil, op. cit., p. 102.
- 297 Brenner, op. cit., pp. 66–7.
- 298 ibid., p. 68.
- 299 ibid., p. 65.
- 300 Nafi, op. cit., p. 5.
- 301 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 160–161.
- 302 ibid., pp. 161, citing M. Faulhaber, Judentum, Christentum, Germanentum. Adventspredigten, gehalten in St. Michael zu Munchen, 1933 (Munich, 1934).
- 303 Cornwell, loc. cit., citing Scholder, Vol. I. Pp. 518–519; S. Friedlander, Nazi Germany and the Jews (London, 1997) pp. 47–48.
- 304 Cornwell, loc. cit., citing Helmreich, op. cit., p. 262; D.J. Goldhagen, Hitler's Willing Executioners (London, 1996) p. 109.
- 305 Cornwell, loc. cit., citing Scholder, Vol. I, p. 519.
- 306 Noakes, op.cit., p. 58.
- 307 Gabler, Neal, An Empire of Their Own [New York: Crown, 1988] p. 351.
- 308 ibid., pp. 351–352.
- 309 ibid., p. 317.
- 310 ibid., p. 322.
- 311 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 166, citing J. S. Conway, The Nazi Persecution of the Churches, 1933–45 (London, 1968), pp. 90–92.
- 312 Allen, op. cit., pp. 308–310.
- 313 Blumberg, op. cit., p. 142.
- 314 For a description of the orchestration of Pacelli's emotional departure, his quarters in the "floating cathedral", his demeanor and staffing for the trip see Cornwell, op. cit., p. 168.
- 315 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 167–168.
- 316 Noakes, op.cit., p. 547.
- 317 Brenner, op. cit., p. 68.
- 318 Brenner, loc. cit.
- 319 Yahil, op. cit., p. 69.
- 320 Noakes, op. cit., p. 547.
- 321 Yahil, op. cit., pp. 71–2.
- 322 ibid., pp. 72–3.
- 323 Gabler, op. cit., p. 328–331, 342–343.
- 324 Brenner, op. cit., pp. 64–5. See also Yahil, op. cit., pp. 101–03.
- 325 Kochan, Lionel The Jews in Soviet Russia Since 1917 [Oxford: Oxford/Inst. Of Jewish Affairs, 19778] p. 79.
- 326 ibid., pp. 66–69.
- 327 ibid., pp. 79–81.
- 328 Walsh, op. cit., pp. 450–455.
- 329 Kochan, op. cit., p. 74.

- 330 Sources such as Gilbert, (The Jewish History Atlas, p. 90) and Chimen Abramsky, (contributing chapter 4, “The BiraBidzhan Project”, in “The Jews in Soviet Russia Since 1917” p. 73) differ in their migration figures, but the figures given by Abramsky for 1935 appear well supported.
- 331 Kochan, op. cit., p. 91.
- 332 Walsh, op. cit., pp. 486–488.
- 333 ibid., p. 493.
- 334 Kochan, op. cit., p. 119 J.B. Schechtman, contrib.
- 335 Noakes, op. cit., p. 547.
- 336 Sampson, Anthony The Seven Sisters [Sevenoaks: Hodder & Stoughton/ Coronet, 1977] pp. 96–97.
- 337 Roth, Cecil, A History of the Jews [New York: Schocken, 1954] p. 389.
- 338 Watt, op.cit., p. xvi. The complete work was not published in an English translation for another two years.
- 339 Barth, Karl The Doctrine of the Word of God Trans. G.T. Thomson [Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1936] Vol I, pp. 431–433.
- 340 Barth, Karl. The Epistle to the Romans [London: Oxford, 1968] p. 344. Emphasis added.
- 341 ibid., p. 337.
- 342 O’Grady, Colm. The Church in the Theology of Karl Barth [London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1970] p. 35.
- 343 Barth, The Doctrine of the Word of God, p. 435.
- 344 Mueller, David L. Karl Barth in the series Makers of the Modern Theological Mind (Bob E. Patterson, Ed) [Waco: Word Books, 1976] p. 142.
- 345 ibid., p. 143.
- 346 ibid., p. 147.
- 347 ibid., p. 150.
- 348 Barth, The Doctrine of the Word of God p. 440.
- 349 Not all of Hitler’s opponents were radical Protestants. However most of the documented opposition from the two main churches was directed at particular issues and laws and not at the existence of the regime or the totality of Hitler’s philosophy.
- 350 Watt, op. cit., pp. xv-xvi.
- 351 Lewy, op. cit., p. 93.
- 352 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 157–161.
- 353 ibid., pp. 165–166.
- 354 ibid., p. 179, citing E.C. Helmreich, The German Churches under Hitler (Detroit, 1979), p. 276.
- 355 ibid., p. 180–181.
- 356 ibid., pp. 181–182. Cornwell cites six references which deal with the matter of Cardinal Pacelli’s involvement in the editing and production of the encyclical. Their individual contributions as source material are not noted and this author has not sought to consult them directly to ascertain the extent of Pacelli’s editing. However, while Cornwell’s understanding is supported by Garry Wills in his introduction to Passelecq and Barnard Suchecky, The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI [New York: Harcourt Brace/Harvest, 1997], p. xviii, it does not correspond with the details provided by Passelecq and Suchecky themselves which follow.
- 357 Ehler & Morrall, op. cit., p. 520. Clause 4 of Mit Brennender Sorge.
- 358 Lapide, Pinchas The Last Three Popes and the Jews [London: Souvenir Press, 1967] p. 100–112.
- 359 Ehler & Morrall, op. cit. pp. 524–525. Clause 16 of Mit Brennender Sorge.

- 360 The euthanasia programme had been planned and the facilities and procedures had been organized progressively from 1935 but Hitler had deferred its full scale operation until the outbreak of his premeditated war in order to avoid a major backlash from the churches. [Conway, op. cit.]
- 361 Ehler & Morrall, op. cit., p. 534. Clause 42 of Mit Brennender Sorge.
- 362 In August 1934, following the death of President Hindenburg, leaders of the Reich Church had campaigned strongly in support of Hitler's plebiscite which resulted in the merging of the roles of Fuhrer, Chancellor and President. In eager anticipation of Hitler's support it also campaigned for the enforced amalgamation of the Confessing Church and other provincial resisters with the Reich Church. It began to use the Gestapo to enforce amalgamation, it urged the breaking of links with Rome and it urged the establishment of a single integrated church structure. The result was such an international reaction that even Hitler was forced to pause. But not for long. He was confident that he could destroy the "hollow and rotten" structure of the church with its priests who were "notorious (for their) greed and self-indulgence" with one push. However it was "something really big" and useful. "Now we are its heirs. Its day has gone". [Conway, op. cit., pp. 97–103] A year later he established the Ministry for Ecclesiastical Affairs to pull the whole disruptive lot into order. [Conway, op. cit., pp. 128–139.]
- 363 The World Alliance of Reformed Churches, although with a more restricted base, is often ranked alongside them and Marc Boegner adds the Central Office of Inter-Church Aid for the Protestant Churches of Europe [Boegner, Marc The Long Road to Unity London: Collins, 1970, p. 100.] but this might better be described as a joint activity of the member churches rather than as a "thrust" of the ecumenical movement.
- 364 Passelecq, Georges and Barnard Suchecky, The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI [New York: Harcourt Brace/Harvest, 1997] p. 45.
- 365 ibid., p. 102, note 10, citing Monsignor Georges Roche and Philippe Saint-Germain, Pie XII devant l'histoire (Paris: Lafont, 1972), p. 68.
- 366 Passelecq & Suchecky, loc. cit. [In addition to Kaas, Pacelli's co-workers on the draft were three Jesuit priests; Robert Leiber, H. Heinrich, and Augustin Bea who later became confessor to Pacelli during his papacy as Pius XII and first president of the Vatican Secretariat for Christian Unity.]
- 367 ibid., op. cit., p. 45.
- 368 ibid., pp. 94–95.
- 369 Pius XI, pope. Divini Redemptoris, encyclical, English translation. [Melbourne: The Australian Catholic Truth Society, 1937], p. 1.
- 370 Ehler & Morrall, op. cit., p. 545, Divini Redemptoris, clauses 1, 2, 3.
- 371 ibid., p. 546, Divini Redemptoris clause 6.
- 372 Kuhner, op. cit., p. 238.
- 373 Pius XI, pope. Divini Redemptoris, loc. cit.
- 374 Pius XI, pope. Divini Redemptoris, loc. cit.
- 375 Ehler & Morrall, op. cit., p. 548, Divini Redemptoris, clause 12.
- 376 In Moscow the new divorce laws had a spectacular impact. In July 1936 there were only 215 divorces compared with 2214 in the previous month. In Leningrad the drop was from 10,313 for January-June 1936, to 3,860 for the same six months in 1937.
- 377 Walsh, op. cit., pp. 463–464.
- 378 Ehler & Morrall, op. cit., pp. 549–550, Divini Redemptoris clauses 14–15.
- 379 ibid., pp. 550–552, Divini Redemptoris clauses 18–27.
- 380 ibid., p. 557, Divini Redemptoris clauses 42–43.
- 381 ibid., p. 558, Divini Redemptoris clauses 44–45.
- 382 ibid., p. 559, Divini Redemptoris clauses 48.
- 383 ibid., p. 557, Divini Redemptoris clauses 42.

- 384 ibid., pp. 563–564, Divini Redemptoris clauses 62–63.
- 385 ibid., p. 566, Divini Redemptoris clauses 70.
- 386 ibid., pp. 570–578, Divini Redemptoris clauses 84, 87, 102, 112.
- 387 ibid., p. 543.
- 388 Latourette, Kenneth Scott. Christianity in a Revolutionary Age, Volume IV, The Twentieth Century In Europe. [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969] p. 499.
- 389 ibid., Vol. IV, pp. 498–499.
- 390 Gribetz, Judah, Edward L. Greenstein & Regina Stein The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Touchstone/Simon & Schuster, 1994] from entries for the period 1900 to 1939.
- 391 Meyer, Michael A. Response to Modernity: A history of the Reform Movement in Judaism [Detroit: Wayne State Uni., 1995] pp. 218–219, 221, 235–237.
- 392 ibid., pp. 339–340.
- 393 ibid., pp. 318–320.

CHAPTER 19: WHO DOES OWN THE MIDDLE EAST?

- ¹ Allen, Richard Imperialism & Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford, 1974] p. 248.
- ² ibid., p. 246.
- ³ ibid., pp. 275–276.
- ⁴ ibid., p. 247.
- ⁵ ibid., pp. 244–245.
- ⁶ Apparently on the urging of the legendary T.E. Lawrence who later declined a decoration for his work in Arabia.
- ⁷ Allen, op. cit., p. 249.
- ⁸ This is confirmed by Faisal's letter to Felix Frankfurter, an American Zionist leader, dated in Paris on March 3, 1919, but signed two days later. That letter, and the agreement referred to in the next note, are both reproduced in full in Laqueur & Rubin, The Israel-Arab Reader: A Documentary History of the Middle East Conflict [New York: Penguin, 1984] pp. 21–22.
- ⁹ Laqueur, Walter The Israel Arab Reader [New York: Bantam, 1976], pp. 21–22, Document 8(2), the Faisal-Weizmann Agreement. This agreement was signed in London on January 3, 1919. However Faisal held sufficient reservations to add a note to the end of the agreement which reads: "Reservation by the Emir Feisal. If the Arabs are established as I have asked in my manifesto of January 4th addressed to the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I will carry out what is written in this agreement. If changes are made, I cannot be answerable for failing to carry out this agreement. Feisal Ibn-Hussein."
- ¹⁰ ibid., pp. 18–20, Document 8 (1).
- ¹¹ ibid., pp. 23–33, Documents 9 & 10.
- ¹² The King/Crane Report had actually gone to the US President on or soon after August 28th and had been made available to the other governments involved, but it was very conveniently suppressed and did not become generally known for three years.
- ¹³ Allen, op. cit., p. 255.
- ¹⁴ Stocking, George W. Middle East Oil [London: Allen Lane/Penguin Press, 1970] p. 22.
- ¹⁵ ibid., p. 26.
- ¹⁶ Simpson, Christopher The Splendid Blond Beast : Money, Law And Genocide In The Twentieth Century [New York: Grove Press, 1993], p. 33.

- 17 ibid., p. 34 quoting Allen Dulles to Mark Bristol, April 21, 1922, Bristol Papers, RG 45, National Archives, Washington DC.
- 18 ibid., pp. 35–36.
- 19 Chester could not raise the funds to proceed, probably because Britain would never have agreed to the Colby Chester group plan, and Turkey annulled the concession six months later. Iraq would also have been unlikely to agree because of the implications of it overlapping the two territories in a way which could have weakened Iraq's independence.
- 20 The Treaty of Alliance between Britain and Iraq was cut from 20 years to four years from the date of ratification of the peace treaty. Turkey was relieved of all reparations; Foreign Capitulations were abolished; control of the Straits reverted to Turkey, and Atatürk pushed ahead with modernization.
- 21 Simpson, C., op. cit., p. 36.
- 22 ibid., p. 76, quoting Richard Breitling (Eduard Calic, ed.) Secret Conversations with Hitler. The Two newly Discovered 1931 Interviews [New York: John Day, 1971] p. 81.
- 23 U.S., Office of United States Chief of Counsel for Prosecution of Axis Criminality, Nazi Conspiracy and Agression, vol. 3 Washington DC: USGPO, 1946, p. 753, quoted in Simpson, C., op. cit., p. 76.
- 24 Laqueur, op. cit., pp. 45–50, Document 12.
- 25 The council was enlarged from two Jews, two Muslim Arabs and two Christian Arabs, all appointed, to three from each faith.
- 26 As Minister of War Kitchener was a near legendary figure. He had been a key piece in the jigsaw puzzle of the Sudan, commanded Britain's Indian forces before becoming Agent in Egypt, and received an earldom in 1914.
- 27 Zeman, Z.A.B. A Diplomatic History of the First World War [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1971], p. 332.
- 28 Karl Barth could not have known of that letter at the time that he was haranguing the church in Germany for supporting Kaiser Wilhelm's war plans and drafting his interpretation of 'Romans'.
- 29 Ibn Saud and his forces did not join the Arab uprising against the Turks during the Great War and in fact in 1919 Britain had to restrain him from overthrowing Hussein and his British-sponsored kingdom of the Hejas. Britain would have been completely incapable of fulfilling its promise to establish a unified single Arab kingdom under Hussein as its nominee. In 1920, when British and French political intrigue over mandates was hotting up, Ibn Saud overthrew the Rashid dynasty which had continued to support Turkey in the region to his north. That action was clearly aimed at strengthening his own position rather than at weakening Turkey's position.
- 30 Encyclopaedia Britannica, CD 2000 Deluxe.
- 31 Stocking, op. cit., pp. 51–52.
- 32 ibid., p. 68.
- 33 Syria was granted the same status four years later.
- 34 The Wall St. collapse has been attributed to many factors but eminent American economist J. K. Galbraith put his finger on the main ones very neatly. He said they were unequal income distribution linked to bad corporate and banking structures, the poor state of economic intelligence and the state of foreign money balances. To say simply that the US economy was "fundamentally unsound" would be quite inadequate. We have already noted the unbridled greed which went hand in hand with the modified Protestant work ethic during the Reconstruction period in the United States (between the Civil War and the Great War) and the fantastic manipulation of the period of the Great War and the years which followed. They provided the ingredients of the "fundamentally unsound" US economy and they were the result of irresponsible attitudes and actions taken in conflict with the Christian Gospel on which they were all supposed to be based. In the three years after panic struck investors on the New York stock exchange, the market value of registered stocks fell by 78 percent; national income fell by 52 percent; and unemployment in the civilian labour force rose to about 25 percent.
- 35 Hacker, Louis M. The Course of American Economic Growth and Development [New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1970], p. 299–301.

³⁶ Census figures for Jerusalem.

Year	Jews	Muslims	Christians
1922	33,971	13,413	14,699
1931	51,222	19,894	19,335
1936(Est.)	76,000	(49,000)
1944	92,143	32,039	27,849

³⁷ The Catholic Church of All the Nations was built in 1924 and the Jesuit Pontifical Biblical Institute in 1927. The Scottish St. Andrew's Church was also built in 1927, the church of St. Peter in Gallicantu in 1931, and the Y.M.C.A. (complete with Jerusalem's first swimming pool) in 1933.(397).

³⁸ Hyman, Semah Cecil contributing Under British Rule in Jerusalem [Jerusalem: Keter Books, 1973] p. 151.

³⁹ Allen, op. cit., pp. 297–300.

⁴⁰ Kressel, Getzel contrib. Zionist Congresses in Zionism [Jerusalem: Keter, 1973] p. 250.

⁴¹ Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1981] p. 180.

⁴² Hinnells, John R. (Ed) Who's who of Religions [London: Penguin, 1996] pp. 63–64. Buber also taught that "The Jew carries the burden of the unredeemed world in the knowledge that redemption is not an accomplished fact and that history has not yet known a caesura in which a redeemer appeared." Although Buber's credentials as a Jewish thinker were often queried (see Louis Jacobs, The Jewish Religion, Oxford 1995, p. 59) and his work was more widely accepted in the Christian world than among Jews, that sharp contradiction of a basic tenet of Christian faith must have retarded the acceptance of his work within the Christian churches.

⁴³ Tessler, Mark A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994] p. 182.

⁴⁴ Kressel, loc. cit.

⁴⁵ Hyman, op. cit., p. 155.

⁴⁶ Ibn Saud had actually ruthlessly suppressed the Ikhwan a couple of years earlier when it embarrassed his relations with Britain by turning from the Hejas to invade Iraq. Their puritanical reforming zeal was no longer either required or welcome. Multiple marriage was a much more acceptable weapon with which to achieve unification than the sword – especially when it provoked retaliation from superior forces. The religious fanatics of the Ikhwan had exceeded their authority, outlived their usefulness and become expendable.

⁴⁷ Stocking, op. cit., pp. 73–77.

⁴⁸ Sampson, Anthony The Seven Sisters [Sevenoaks: Hodder & Stoughton/Coronet, 1977] p. 87.

⁴⁹ I.C. Farben was one of the companies which financed Hitler into power and its agreement with Exxon became the centre of a political storm fifteen years later, after World War II had erupted.

⁵⁰ Sampson, op. cit., pp. 84–85.

⁵¹ ibid., pp. 87–90.

⁵² Stocking, op. cit., pp. 84–87.

⁵³ Sampson, op. cit., p. 91–92.

⁵⁴ Sampson, loc. cit.

⁵⁵ Stocking, op. cit., pp. 73–75.

⁵⁶ Sampson, op. cit., pp. 105–106.

⁵⁷ ibid., p. 93.

⁵⁸ ibid., pp. 107–109.

⁵⁹ Stocking, op. cit., pp. 34–37.

⁶⁰ Aarons, Mark & John Loftus The Secret War Against the Jews [Melbourne: Heinemann, 1994] pp. 21, 35–37, 40.

⁶¹ ibid., pp. 43–44.

⁶² Sampson, op. cit., p. 93.

⁶³ Stocking, op. cit., pp. 83, 85, 87.

⁶⁴ Aarons, op. cit., p. 44.

⁶⁵ ibid., pp. 51–52.

⁶⁶ ibid., pp. 47–48.

CHAPTER 20: JERUSALEM NOW!

¹ Calvocoressi, P., Wint, G., and Pritchard, J. Total War: The Causes and Courses of the Second World War, [London: Penguin, 1989] two volumes, Vol 1. p. 43.

² Simpson, Christopher The Splendid Blond Beast: Money, Law and Genocide in the Twentieth Century [New York: Grove Press, 1993] pp. 45–46.

³ Calvocoressi, op. cit. pp. 44–45.

⁴ ibid., p. 61.

⁵ ibid., p. 62–68.

⁶ They had been designated Dominions instead of colonies in 1907 and they had taken part in regular Imperial Conferences from that time.

⁷ Buss, Claude A. Asia in the Modern World [London: Collier/Macmillan, 1964] p. 342.

⁸ ibid.

⁹ ibid., p. 320.

¹⁰ Parrinder, Geoffrey The World's Living Religions [London: Pan, 1974] p. 116.

¹¹ Ling, Trevor A History of Religion East & West [London: Macmillan, 1968] pp. 108, 413.

¹² Elmessiri, Abdelwahab M. Zionist Apologetics and the White Man's Burden, a contribution to Israel & South Africa, Stevens R.P. & A.M. Elmissiri [New York: North American Inc, 1977] p. 18.

¹³ Post, Gaines (Jr.) Dilemmas of appeasement: British Deterrence and Defence, 1934–1937 [Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1993] pp. 31–32.

¹⁴ Howard, Michael, The Continental Commitment: the Dilemma of British Defence Policy in the Era of the Two World Wars, [London: Temple Smith, 1972], p. 104.

¹⁵ Post, G., op. cit., pp. 33–4.

¹⁶ ibid., p. 36.

¹⁷ Lamb, Richard The Ghosts of Peace, 1935–1945 (London: Michael Russell, 1987) p. 4.

¹⁸ Von Schuschnigg, Kurt Austrian Requiem : [London: Victor Gollancz, 1947] For Schuschnigg-Mussolini discussions see p. 98; British, French and Italian adherence to the multi-lateral treaty system, p. 123; discussion on Czechoslovakia being an “unnatural state” and Austria being “an idea”, p. 102; Schuschnigg's London conference, p. 132.

¹⁹ ibid., pp. 139–141.

²⁰ ibid., p. 142.

²¹ ibid., p. 139.

²² Post, op. cit. p. 41.

²³ Von Schuschnigg, K., op. cit.; for the disintegration of Austria's triangle of support, the London-Rome breach and Rome-Berlin rapprochement, see p. 108; the British government's difficulty with public opinion, p. 139; British moral support but no guarantee, p. 140; British intelligence apparently briefed by Hitler's entourage, p. 35.

²⁴ Cockett, Richard. Twilight of Truth: Chamberlain, Appeasement and the Manipulation of the Press [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1989] p. 4.

²⁵ ibid., pp. 5, 7.

- 26 ibid., pp. 8–10.
- 27 ibid., pp. 8–10.
- 28 ibid., p. 12.
- 29 ibid., p. 13.
- 30 Kinder, Hermann & W Hilgemann The Penguin Atlas of World History Vol II [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1980] p. 161.
- 31 See Latourette, Kenneth Scott. Christianity in a Revolutionary Age, Volume 1V, The Twentieth Century In Europe. [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969] pp. 158–165 for a discussion on changing relations between the Catholic Church and the Spanish government during the Fascist period.
- 32 Kimball, Warren F. The Most Unsordid Act: Lend-Lease, 1939–1941 [Baltimore: John Hopkins Press, 1969] p. 2.
- 33 Churchill, Winston The Gathering Storm, The Second World War, Volume I [London: Reprint Society, 1953] p. 156.
- 34 Lamb, op. cit., pp. 1–4.
- 35 Post, op.cit. pp. 84–85.
- 36 ibid., pp. 91–92.
- 37 ibid., pp. 93–94.
- 38 ibid., p. 96.
- 39 Latourette, K.S., Christianity in a Revolutionary Age, Vol. V, p. 285.
- 40 Cornwell, John Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII [London: Penguin/Viking, 1999], P. 175, citing a quotation in J. Ridley, Mussolini (London, 1997), p. 263.
- 41 Churchill, Vol.1 op. cit., p. 155.
- 42 Gilbert, Martin Churchill: A Life [London: Mandarin/Minerva, 1991] p. 546.
- 43 Cockett, op. cit., pp. 10–12.
- 44 Howard, op. cit., p. 113.
- 45 Pratt, Lawrence R. East of Malta, West of Suez: Britain's Meditteranean Crisis, 1936–39 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1975) p. 32.
- 46 Post, op.cit. p. 98.
- 47 Best, Antony, Britain, Japan and Pearl Harbor: Avoiding war in East Asia, 1936–41 [London: Routledge LSE, 1995] p. 7, citing Documents on British Foreign Policy (DBFP) Second Series Vol. XX doc.450 CP12(36) 'The Importance of Anglo-Japanese Friendship' Duff Cooper memorandum 17 January 1936, pp. 752–6.
- 48 Best, op. cit., pp. 7–8.
- 49 Lamb, op. cit. p. 37.
- 50 Kimball, op. cit., p. 2.
- 51 Howard, op.cit., p. 114.
- 52 Parker, R.C.A. Chamberlain and Appeasement [London: Macmillan, 1993] pp. 58–61.
- 53 Toland, John Adolph Hitler [New York: Ballantine, 1977] p. 526.
- 54 Parker, op. cit., pp. 61–65.
- 55 Porath, Y. The Palestinian Arab National Movement: From Riots to Rebellion [London: Frank Cass, 1977] p. 140.
- 56 ibid., pp. 143–159.
- 57 ibid., p. 129.
- 58 ibid., p. 159.
- 59 ibid., pp. 162–166.
- 60 ibid., pp. 178–186.

- 61 ibid., pp. 193–195.
- 62 ibid., pp. 199–201.
- 63 ibid., p. 205.
- 64 Toland, op. cit., p. 541.
- 65 ibid., p. 548.
- 66 Cowles, Virginia The Rothschilds: A Family of Fortune [London: Futura, 1973] p. 208.
- 67 According to biographer Virginia Cowles, the legal proceedings exploited the fact that a minority shareholder, another Jewish family named von Gutmann, needed cash and wished to sell its holding. That was taken as justification for revising the company's corporate structure.
- 68 Cowles, op. cit., p. 209.
- 69 The Times, London, July 6 & 10, 1936, reports and letters.
- 70 Mussolini's change of attitude towards the church and his manipulation of it for political purposes are discussed in chapter 17. In 1935, midway between the church's abortive bid to overthrow the Spanish government with Mussolini's help and the full scale civil war which began in 1936, Mussolini discussed his attitude to the church with Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg of Austria. According to Schuschnigg he said: "You are quite right to cement your relations with the Holy See. That is very necessary. I do the same; and Austria, like Italy, will always be a Catholic State. Apart from that, I personally have the highest opinion of the present pope." Von Schuschnigg, Kurt Austrian Requiem : [London: Victor Gollancz, 1947] p. 104.
- 71 Parker, op. cit., pp. 80–81.
- 72 Britain's Foreign Secretary, Anthony Eden, and France's Premier Leon Blum, shared a common sympathy for Spain's elected Republican Loyalists and the conviction that Anglo French solidarity was crucial in the uncertain state of Europe. However the French cabinet favoured nonintervention and Prime Minister Baldwin had directed Eden that on no account, French or other, must he bring Britain into the fight on the side of the Russians. Eden later told cabinet that Europe's future danger spots of Memel, Danzig and Czechoslovakia would be threatened if the Nazi-Fascist adventure in Spain was not checked.
- 73 Aster, Sidney Anthony Eden [Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] pp. 42–44.
- 74 Thomson, David Europe Since Napoleon [London: Longmans, 1963] pp. 673–678.
- 75 The response of the Church of England was quite consistent with the attitudes of Bishop William Temple, (by then Archbishop of York) and J. H. Oldham at the International Missionary Conference in Jerusalem eight years earlier. (See above, chapter 17).
- 76 The Times, London, Thursday, July 16, 1936, p. 9.
- 77 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 175, citing quotations in H. Daniel-Rops, A Fight for God, pp. 332–335.
- 78 Encyclopaedia Britannica, International Multimedia CD Edition, 1999.
- 79 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 167, citing a quotation in D. Tardini, Pio XII (Rome, 1959) p. 105. [Monsignor Domenico Tardini was Deputy for Extraordinary Affairs, or foreign relations.]
- 80 Kimball, op. cit., pp. 2–3.
- 81 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 176–177.
- 82 Parker, op. cit., p. 80.
- 83 Thomson, op. cit. p. 671.
- 84 Hay, Malcolm The Prejudices of Pascal [London: Neville Spearman, 1962] p. 80.
- 85 Porath, op. cit. pp. 198–199.
- 86 Toland, op. cit., p. 542.
- 87 Nafi, Basheer M. The Arabs and the Axis: 1933–1940 [Arab Studies Quarterly, Vol. 19, No. 2, Spring 1997] distributed by MSANEWS <http://msanews.mynet.net/> July 31, 1999., p. 4.

- 88 Porath, op. cit. pp. 212–214.
- 89 Taylor, Telford Munich: The Price of Peace [London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1979] p. 168.
- 90 Best, op. cit., pp. 24–28.
- 91 Post, G., op. cit. pp. 261 ff.
- 92 Pratt, op. cit. p. 47.
- 93 Allen, Richard Imperialism & Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford, 1974] pp. 311–312.
- 94 Post, G., op. cit., p. 264 ff.
- 95 ibid., p. 263.
- 96 Taylor, Telford, op. cit. pp. 260–261.
- 97 Best, op. cit., pp. 28–29, citing: CAB56/2 JIC13 ‘Far Eastern Appreciation’ JIC report 7 October 1936; DBFP Series 2 volume XVII appendix II C8998/8998/18 ‘The World Situation and British Rearmament’ Vansittart memorandum 16 December 1936 p. 776; Chatfield notes on Vansittart memorandum 5 January 1937, Chatfield Papers, National Maritime Museum, Greenwich, CHT3/1.
- 98 Lamb, Richard The Drift to War, 1922–1939 [London: W.H. Allen, 1989] pp. 203–204.
- 99 Best, op. cit., p. 29, citing Chatfield notes on Vansittart memorandum 5 January 1937, Chatfield Papers, National Maritime Museum, Greenwich, CHT3/1.
- 100 Lamb, R. Drift to War op. cit., pp. 203–204.
- 101 Laqueur, Walter A History of Zionism [New York: Schocken, 1976] pp. 514–517.
- 102 Nafi, op. cit., pp. 5–6, citing Melka, Nazi Germany and the Palestine Question, Middle Eastern Studies, 5, 3, 1969, 221–2; Grobba’s reports of 17 July and 9 November 1937, Documents on German Foreign Policy: 1918–1945, Washington, US Govt. Printing Office, Series D, Vol. V. pp. 756–757, 769–772.
- 103 Donaldson, Frances Edward VIII [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1974] p. 179.
- 104 While he was still Prince of Wales, Edward had been accused of being Pro-Nazi. Records which have been published in recent years show the extent to which he was under government surveillance and confirm his links with Hitler’s regime. This became a public issue during the abdication crisis and his detractors made much of Hitler’s eagerness to use his influence to change British Government policy and to re-establish good relations between Britain and Germany. The methods he used to try to force a change in government policy, and Hitler’s undertaking to restore him to the throne if the British government fell, may have led to him being tried for treason in other circumstances. However there is evidence that he did not favour centralizing power in government on the Fascist model.
- 105 Ponting, Clive Churchill [London: Sinclair-Stevenson, 1994] pp. 382–385.
- 106 Two days later he began an extended stay at Schloss Enzesfeld, a castle near Vienna, as the guest of Baron Louis’ brother Eugene von Rothschild, where the Nazis enjoyed relatively convenient and intimate access to him.
- 107 Morton, Frederick The Rothschilds [London: Secker & Warburg, 1962] p. 219.
- 108 Best, op. cit., pp. 33–34, citing PRO FO371/21215 W6363/5/50 Eden to Chamberlain 24 March 1937.
- 109 Best, op. cit., p. 36, citing S. Endicott, Diplomacy and Enterprise: British China Policy 1933–1937, Manchester University Press, 1975, pp. 166–170.
- 110 Best, op. cit., p. 31, citing DBFP 2/XXI doc. 86 T9200/226/384 Imperial Conference 4th meeting 22 May 1937 pp. 126–131; PRO FO371/21025 F3281/597/61 Craigie minute 3 June 1937.
- 111 Best, loc. cit., citing PRO T188/162 Ashton-Gwatkin (FO Economic Section) memorandum 20 February 1937.
- 112 Best, op. cit., p. 32, citing PRO CAB16/182 DP(P)3 ‘New Standard of Naval Strength’ Hoare memorandum 29 April 1937, and CAB 16/181 DP(P) 2nd meeting 11 May 1937.
- 113 Lamb, R. Drift to War, op. cit. p. 204; Post, G., op. cit., p. 272.
- 114 Kilzer, Louis C. Churchill’s Deception [New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994] p. 122.

- 115 ibid., p. 112.
- 116 Parker, op. cit., p. 67–68.
- 117 Taylor, Telford, op. cit. pp. 472–474.
- 118 ibid., op. cit. pp. 474–476.
- 119 Parker, op. cit., pp. 72–73.
- 120 Pratt, L. R. op. cit., p. 75., citing C.I.D. minutes, 11 February 1937. C.P. 65(37). Cab. 24/268.
- 121 Parker, op. cit., pp. 73.
- 122 Post, G., op. cit. p. 276.
- 123 Lewy, Guenter, The Catholic Church and Nazi Germany [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1964] p. 70, citing Papen, Memoirs, 279, and noting a conversation between Pope Pius XI and von Papen and Göring, April 10, 1933.
- 124 Lewy, op. cit., p. 73, citing report of Papen to the Cabinet on July 14, 1933, Documents on German Foreign Policy, C, I, doc. 362, p. 652.
- 125 Lewy, op. cit., p. 86, quoting from the text of a speech by Vice Chancellor von Papen to the Association of Catholic Acedamecians on July 22, 1933, which was published under the title “Zum Reichskonkordat” in the quarterly of the association, Der katholische Gedanke, VI (1933), 331–336.
- 126 Hitler, Adolf. Mein Kampf. Translated by Ralph Manheim, [London: Hutchinson, 1974] pp. 60, 278, 279.
- 127 Word in parenthesis are the author’s interpretative insertion.
- 128 Pius XI, Pope, Mit Brennender Sorge [English translation: Melbourne: the Australian Catholic Truth Society, 1937] pp. 10, 11.
- 129 Lewy, Guenter. The Catholic Church and Nazi Germany [London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1964] p. 158.
- 130 Lewy, op. cit., p. 160, citing Berning to Hitler, May 5, 1934, BA Koblenz, R 43 II/175.
- 131 Lewy, loc. cit., citing Hirtenbriefe der deutschen, österreichischen und deutsch-schweizerischen Bischöfe 1934 (Paderborn, 1934), p. 89.
- 132 That paragraph from Mit Brennender Sorge, loc. cit., reads as follows.

The climax of revelation reached in the Gospel of Jesus Christ is definite, is obligatory for ever. This revelation knows no addition from the hand of man, above all, knows no substitution and no replacement by any arbitrary “revelations” that certain speakers of the present day wish to derive from the myth of blood and race. Since Christ, the Anointed, accomplished the work of redemption, broke the dominion of sin, and merited for us the grace of becoming children of God – since “there is no other name under heaven given to men whereby we must be saved” but the name of Jesus. No man, though all knowledge, all power, all outward might on earth should be embodied in him, can lay any other foundation but that which is laid; which is Christ Jesus. He who, sacrilegiously disregarding the yawning abyss of essential distinction between God and creature, between the God-Man and the children of men, dares to place any mortal, were he the greatest of all times, beside Christ, or worse, above Him and against Him, must be told that he is a false prophet, in whom the words of Scripture find terrible application: “He that dwelleth in heaven shall laugh at them.”
- 133 Hitler, op. cit., pp. 103, 123, 125, 412–3.

- ¹³⁴ Hitler appears to have misinterpreted some aspects of Protestant history in Germany, but he would certainly have been aware of the way in which Luther's attitude to the Jewish community had changed during the progress of his reforming campaigns and he should have been aware of the influence which this had over a long period. Shirer, The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich, [London: Pan, 1960] p. 294–5, cites Neumann, Behemoth, p. 109, who in turn refers to a research project on Antisemitism of the Institute of Social Research, published in Studies in Philosophy and Social Science, 1940, to illustrate Luther's attitude. He says that Luther was "both a passionate anti-Semite and a ferocious believer in absolute obedience to political authority." He says that Luther "wanted Germany rid of the Jews and when they were sent away he advised that they were to be deprived of 'all their cash and jewels and silver and gold' and, furthermore, 'that their synagogues or schools be set on fire, that their houses be broken up and destroyed ... and they be put under a roof or stable, like the gypsies ... in misery and captivity as they incessantly lament and complain to God about us'.
- ¹³⁵ Pius XI, Pope, encyclical Divini Redemptoris English translation, [Melbourne: Australian Catholic Truth Society, 1937] Note 8, p. 4.
- ¹³⁶ ibid., notes 50, 31, 45, 46, pp. 25, 15, 22, 23.
- ¹³⁷ ibid., note 30, p. 18.
- ¹³⁸ Ehler, Sidney Z. & J. B. Morrall Church and State through the Centuries [London: Burns & Oates, 1954] p. 543.
- ¹³⁹ S. D. Stein, Web Genocide Documentation Centre, compiled for the Kosovo Crisis Centre, A Final Solution (The New Republic), sourced from <http://www.alb-net.com/kcc/052499e.htm#6> published as <http://www.ess.uwe.ac.uk/Kosovo/Kosovo-Background18.htm>, as at September 26, 1999.
- ¹⁴⁰ Cockett, op. cit., p. 27.
- ¹⁴¹ Pratt, loc. cit.
- ¹⁴² FO minutes quoted by Gilbert in Winston S Churchill, Vol 5, 1922–1939, William Heinemann, 1976, p. 639.
- ¹⁴³ Kilzer, op. cit., pp. 123, 124.
- ¹⁴⁴ Aden was also severed from India and placed under a separate colonial administration in April 1937, partly to strengthen it in view of Italy's greater ability to control access to the Suez Canal from Eritrea (which it had controlled with British support since 1885) because of the greater forces which it had in the area as a consequence of its invasion and annexation of Ethiopia, and partly in a bid to isolate it from the Palestinian question and the Arab rebellion.
- ¹⁴⁵ Open rebellion broke out in Burma in 1938–39 while in Siam, which was officially an independent monarchy under dominant British influence, pressure increased for the expulsion of both the British authorities and the Chinese minority.
- ¹⁴⁶ James, Lawrence The Rise and Fall of the British Empire [London: Little Brown/Abacus, 1995] pp. 470–471.
- ¹⁴⁷ Taylor, op. cit., pp. 772–773.
- ¹⁴⁸ James, op. cit., pp. 471–472.

CHAPTER 21: NO. WE MUSTN'T RISK AN EMPIRE

- ¹ Margach, James. Abuse of Power [London: W.H. Allen, 1978].
- ² Pratt, L. R. East of Malta, West of Suez [London: Cambridge, 1975] p. 77.
- ³ ibid., p. 76.
- ⁴ Best, Antony Britain, Japan and Pearl Harbour: Avoiding War in East Asia, 1936–41 [London: Routledge, LSE, 1995] p. 36, citing PRO CAB23/88 24(37) Cabinet conclusions 17 June 1937.
- ⁵ ibid., pp. 34–35, citing PRO CAB27/626 FP(36)34 'The "Open Door" in the Colonies' Interdepartmental Committee on Trade Policy report 7 June 1937; PRO CAB 27/622 FP(36) 12th meeting 11 June 1937, and 13th meeting 16 June 1937.

- ⁶ Allen, Richard Imperialism & Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford, 1974] pp. 311–312.
- ⁷ ibid., pp. 315–319.
- ⁸ Nafi, Basheer M. The Arabs and the Axis: 1933–1940 [Arab Studies Quarterly, Vol. 19, No. 2, Spring 1997] distributed by MSANEWS <http://msanews.mynet.net/> July 31, 1999. p. 6.
- ⁹ Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1981] p. 210.
- ¹⁰ Passelecq, Georges and Bernard Suchecky, The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI [New York: Harcourt Brace/Harvest, 1997] pp. 124–126, citing; an unsigned article “La rivoluzione mondiale e gli ebrei,” La Civiltà cattolica 4, quad. 1736 (12 October 1922), 111–21; unsigned, “La questione giudaica,” La Civiltà cattolica 4, quad. 2071 (25 September 1936), 37–46; Leon de Poncins, la Mysterieuse Internationale juive (Paris: Beauchecsnes, 1936), 207–11; Joseph Bonsirven, S.J., Sur les ruines du temple (Paris: Grasset, 1928), quoted by La Civiltà cattolica, op. cit., 46.
- ¹¹ Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., p. 126, citing; Hilaire Belloc, The Jews (London: Constable, 1922); Italian trans., Gli Ebrei (Milan: Vita e pensiero, 1934).
- ¹² Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 126–127, quoting from the first of the series of articles referred to in note 10, above.
- ¹³ Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 127–128, quoting from the third of the series of articles referred to in note 10, above.
- ¹⁴ The World Alliance of Reformed Churches, although with a more restricted base, is often ranked alongside them and Marc Boegner adds the Central Office of Inter-Church Aid for the Protestant Churches of Europe [Boegner, Marc The Long Road to Unity London: Collins, 1970, p. 100.] but this might better be described as a joint activity of the member churches rather than as a “thrust” of the ecumenical movement.
- ¹⁵ Visser ‘T Hooft, Willem Adolf contributing The Genesis of the World Council of Churches in A History of the Ecumenical Movement [Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1993] p. 703, and pp. 702–707 generally.
- ¹⁶ Conway, J.S. The Nazi Persecution of the Churches 1933–1945 [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1968] p. 166 provides a variation on the usual story that Pius XI closed the Vatican and went to his country residence during Hitler’s state visit. He says the Fuhrer refused to pay the usual courtesy call on the Vatican as part of his response to Mit Brennender Sorge (another part of which was the closing of Catholic printing houses) and as a gesture of contempt towards its author.
- ¹⁷ Best, op. cit., p. 39, citing diary entries by Captain Malcolm Kennedy, August 27 and 28 1937, Kennedy Papers, Sheffield University Library, Diary 4/31.
- ¹⁸ Best, op. cit., p. 40, citing PRO FO371/20956 F7318/9/10 Craigie to Eden 3 October 1937 tel.479.
- ¹⁹ Best, op. cit., p. 39.
- ²⁰ There is irony in the fact that Peel should have even considered a ‘bought peace’ factor in his Commission’s proposal in view of the disastrous consequences of many such arrangements on previous occasions. These included the ravaging of Macedonia and Greece by the Goths when Arcadius defaulted on grants to them in the fourth century, and the desertion of the armies of the Arab vassal states when Heraclius and his host of icon waving priests had to confront Khalid in the Battle of the River Yarmuk. (See above, chapter 3, and chapter 7) In view of the fact that Theodore Herzl made proposals for financial collaboration with the Ottoman Empire in Der Judenstaat, and in view of Herzl’s discussions with the Sultan in 1901*, and even though his report was rejected by the World Zionist Organization it is reasonable to assume that the proposal for grants by the Jewish State to the Arab State arose from discussions between the Peel Commissioners and the Zionist Commission rather than from Lord Peel personally. (Chapter 20.)
- ²¹ Kimball, Warren F. The Most Unsordid Act: Lend-Lease, 1939–1941 [Baltimore: John Hopkins Press, 1969] p. 3.
- ²² Cockett, Richard. Twilight of Truth: Chamberlain, Appeasement and the Manipulation of the Press [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1989]p. 25. [Quoting letter of Sept 12, from Chamberlain papers 18/1/1014 and 18/1/1020.]
- ²³ Allen, op. cit., pp. 318–321.

- 24 Yahil, Leni, The Holocaust: The Fate of European Jewry [Oxford: Oxford, 1991] p. 105, citing Eichmann Trial, T/124; Eichmann's own story, police interrogations, Dept. o6, vol. 1, cols. 87–94; Heinz Höhne, The Order of the Death's Head: The Story of Hitler's SS (London, 1969), pp. 336f.
- 25 Best, op. cit., p. 43, citing PRO CAB27/634 FES (37)4 'Reinforcement of British Naval Forces in the Far East', Chatfield memorandum 23 September 1937.
- 26 Pratt, op. cit., pp. 124–125.
- 27 Best, op. cit., p. 40.
- 28 ibid., pp. 42–43, citing PRO FO371/20969 F9511/311/10 Eden minute undated [November 1937]; DBFP 2/XXI doc. 291 Cabinet conclusions 6 October 1937 p. 317.
- 29 Bryan J. III & Charles Murphy The Windsor Story [London: Granada, 1981] pp. 451–453.
- 30 Pratt, op. cit., p. 130, citing Chiefs of Staff, 'Situation in the Mediterranean and the Middle East', 19 October 1937. C.P. 259(37) Cab. 24/272.
- 31 Bullock, Alan, Hitler and Stalin: Parallel Lives [London: Fontana/Harper Collins, 1993] p. 584, citing Cinano's Diplomatic Papers (Ed. Malcolm Muggeridge, London, 1948, p. 146.)
- 32 ibid., p. 586.
- 33 Best, op. cit., pp. 44–45, citing PRO FO371/21015 F8143/6799/10 Interdepartmental meeting 13 October 1937; DBFP 2/XXI doc.334 'Economic Sanctions Against Japan', ATB Committee report 5 November 1937 pp. 432–446; DBFP 2/XXI doc.345 British Shipping in the Far East Cabinet Committee, 2nd meeting, 9 November 1937 pp. 460–464; PRO FO 371/21028 F10334/26/23 Thomas minute, 2 November 1937; PRO FO371/20959 F9536/9/10 Craigie to Eden 13 November 1937 tel.669. On the German mediation; J.P.Fox, Germany and the Far Eastern Crisis 1931–1938: A Study in Diplomacy and Ideology, Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1982, pp. 260–290.
- 34 Cockett, op. cit., p. 38.
- 35 Best, op. cit., p. 45, citing DBFP 2/XXI doc.369 Cabinet conclusions 17 November 1937 pp. 500–503.
- 36 Cockett, op. cit., pp. 31, 35.
- 37 Kilzer, Louis C. Churchill's Deception [New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994] p. 125.
- 38 Shirer, William L. The Rise & Fall of the Third Reich [London: Pan, 1964] p. 373.
- 39 Cockett, op. cit., p. 39.
- 40 ibid., p. 46, 47. Chamberlain advised Lord Astor of this decision (and the nobbling of the FOND) at a luncheon attended by Dawson, Halifax and Lord Inskip at Cliveden on December 15, but it was not announced publicly until January 1, 1938, after the Commons had risen, in order to avoid debate.
- 41 Cockett, loc. cit.
- 42 Buss, Claude A. Asia in the Modern World [London: Collier/Macmillan, 1964] p. 403.
- 43 Eden, Anthony, Memoirs, Vol. II, Facing the Dictators [London: Cassell, 1962] pp. 518–519.
- 44 Eden, Memoirs, Vol. II loc. cit.
- 45 ibid., p. 516.
- 46 Howard, Michael, The Continental Commitment: The dilemma of British defence policy in the era of the two world wars. [London: Temple Smith, 1972] p. 115–116, citing Sir Maurice Hankey, Memorandum CAB 21/53, 23 November 1937.
- 47 Pratt, op. cit., p. 131, citing Inskip, 'Defence Expenditure in Future Years', December 1937. C.P. 316 (37). Cab. 24/273; Cab. Conclusions, 22 December 1937. Cab. 23/90.
- 48 Best, op. cit., p. 46, citing FO837/527 Ryan (CID) to Morton (IIC) 28 December 1937.
- 49 ibid., pp. 46–47, citing DBFP 2/XXI doc. 450 F11749/4880/10 Cadogan minute 28 December 1937 p. 616.
- 50 Cockett, op. cit., pp. 7, 8.
- 51 ibid., pp. 12.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 52 Churchill, Winston The Gathering Storm, The Second World War, Vol I. [London: Reprint Society, 1953] p. 231.
- 53 Manhattan, Avro Catholic Imperialism and World Freedom [London: Watts & Co., 1952] p. 284.
- 54 Toland, John Adolph Hitler [New York: Ballantine, 1977] p. 582.
- 55 In Volume I of his W.W. II memoirs, The Gathering Storm, Sir Winston Churchill makes no reference to the proposals attributed to Eden for Hitler to be bribed with Belgian and Portuguese colonies in Africa. However he supports Eden and describes Chamberlain as “imbued with a sense of a special and personal mission to come to friendly terms with the Dictators of Italy and Germany” and adds that “to Hitler he was prepared to offer colonial concessions.” This tends to suggest that the bribe plan may have been initiated by Chamberlain and not Eden.
- 56 Churchill, Memoirs, Vol. I, p. 205.
- 57 Howard, op. cit., p. 119, citing ‘Comparison of the strength of Great Britain with that of certain other nations as at January 1938.’ CID Paper 1366–B.
- 58 Toland, op. cit., p. 582.
- 59 Gilbert, Martin Churchill: A Life [London: Mandarin/Minerva, 1991] p. 586.
- 60 Dilks, David. (Ed.) The Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan O.M. 1938–1945 [London: Cassell, 1971] p. 42.
- 61 Eden, Memoirs Vol. II, pp. 599–600.
- 62 Eden, Anthony Memoirs, Vol III The Reckoning [London; Cassell, 1965] p. 16.
- 63 Aster, Sidney Anthony Eden [Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] pp. 1–39.
- 64 Cockett, op. cit., pp. 111, 46.
- 65 Cabinet had approved the Hoare-Laval proposal, (drafted by the British and French Foreign Ministers jointly), for the partition of Abyssinia between the Emperor and Italy on December 8, 1935. It was placed before the League of Nations on December 13 but then abandoned by Cabinet on December 18. Sir Samuel Hoare resigned immediately.
- 66 Nafi, op. cit., pp. 6–7.
- 67 Eden, Memoirs, Vol III p. 5.
- 68 Pratt, op. cit., p. 57, citing Eden to Chamberlain, 9 January 1938. Premier 1/276. Same to same, 31 December 1937. Premier 1/314. Eden to Sir A. Cadogan, 9 January 1938, F407/84/10. (22106).
- 69 ibid., pp. 57–58.
- 70 Toland, op. cit., p. 582.
- 71 Aster, op. cit., p. 47.
- 72 Eden, Memoirs, Vol II, pp. 513–516.
- 73 Pratt, op. Cit., p. 131, citing Hore-Belisha, ‘The Organization of the Army for its Role in War’, 10 February 1938. C.P. 26(38). Cab. 24.274.
- 74 Best, op. cit., p. 50, citing PRO FO371/22107 F1679/84/10 Craigie to Eden 9 February 1938 tel.179.
- 75 Best, op. cit., pp. 52–53, citing DBFP 2/XXI doc. 517 F1788/78/10 Interdepartmental meeting 11 February 1938 pp. 695–697; PRO FO371/22102 F1788/78/10 (same meeting); DBFP 2/XXI doc.570 F5039/15/10 Craigie to Halifax 10 May 1938 p. 766.
- 76 Churchill, Memoirs, Vol. I, pp. 220–221.
- 77 Best, op. cit., p. 52, citing PRO PREM1/308 Ministerial Conference 14 February 1938.
- 78 Evidence of this comes from Shirer, op. cit., p. 422 and Dilks, op. cit., p. 47.
- 79 Bond, Brian. British Military Policy between the two World Wars [Oxford: Clarendon, 1980] p. 270.
- 80 Pratt, loc. cit., citing C.I.D./310th meeting, 17 February 1938. Cab.2/7; Chiefs of Staff, ‘Defence of Egypt.’ C.O.S. 686, 14 February 1938, enclosure in C.P. 41(38). Cab 24/275.
- 81 Cockett, op. cit., pp. 49–50.
- 82 Churchill (Volume I), op. cit., p. 222.

- 83 Toland, op. cit., p. 597.
- 84 Cockett, op. cit., pp. 12, 46.
- 85 Gilbert, op. cit., p. 588.
- 86 Cockett, op. cit., p. 51.
- 87 ibid., p. 52.
- 88 Shirer, op. cit., p. 422.
- 89 Dilks, op. cit., pp. 57, 58.
- 90 Eden's resignation was over the state of affairs in Europe and Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain's direct intervention in two related issues. The first was his rejection of an offer by US President Roosevelt to arrange a Washington conference of the governments involved, thereby forcing him into a more isolationist stance. The second concerned recognition of Italy's sovereignty in Abyssinia and the withdrawal of its "volunteers" from the Spanish Civil War.(30)(43).
- 91 Churchill, Memoirs Vol I, pp. 203–217.
- 92 Eden, Memoirs Vol II, pp. 547–606.
- 93 Bullock, op. cit., p. 606.
- 94 Shirer, op. cit., p. 433.
- 95 Churchill, Memoirs Vol I, p. 228.
- 96 The Times, London, Thursday March 17, 1938, p. 7.
- 97 The Times, London, Friday, March 18 1938, p. 16.
- 98 Cowles, op. cit., p. 210.
- 99 Taylor, Telford Munich: The price of Peace [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1979] p. 773.
- 100 The Times, London, May 8, 1938, p. 11.
- 101 Dilks, op. cit., pp. 64–65.
- 102 ibid., p. 63.
- 103 Passelecq, Georges & Bernard Suchecky, The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI [New York: Harcourt Brace/Harvest, 1997] pp. 51–52, citing La Documentation catholique, Vol. 39, no. 870 (20 April 1938), p. 453. [A few days later Osservatore Romano tried to offset the impact of that declaration, but to little effect.]
- 104 Irving, David Churchill's War (Vol. I) The Struggle for Power [Bullsbrook, Australia: Veritas, 1987] pp. 99–100, 103–104.
- 105 Lapide, Pinchas E. The Last Three Popes and the Jews [London: Souvenir, 1967] p. 276.
- 106 Yahil, op. cit., pp. 105–106.
- 107 Nafi, op. cit., p. 7.
- 108 Dilks, op. cit., p. 29.
- 109 It is not practical in this work to list all of the oppressive and degrading restrictions which were imposed on Jews in Germany and in countries under Hitler's influence from 1933 to 1939, especially during 1938–39, which have been well documented progressively since World War II. Nor is it practical to detail the rabble rousing attacks on Jews in the Catholic press during that period. For more detail, works which can be consulted include Leni Yahil, The Holocaust: The Fate of European Jewry, [Oxford, 1990]; Grosser, Paul & Edwin Halperin, Anti-Semitism: The Causes & Effects of a Prejudice [Secaucus: Citadel, 1979], or The Timetables of Jewish History, Gribetz et al [New York; Touchstone, 1994].
- 110 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., p. 57.
- 111 ibid., p. 113, citing; Osservatore Romano, 3 May 1938; La Documentation catholique 39 (no. 873, 5 June 1938): 690; and other publications including La Croix, May 11, 1938, which published the full text in the form of a letter addressed to His Eminence Cardinal Baudrillart, rector of the Catholic Institute of Paris.

- 112 ibid., op. cit., pp. 113–114; quotations from the letter cited in note 108, above.
- 113 ibid., op. cit., pp. 114–115, citing: La Documentation catholique, loc. cit.
- 114 Bullock, op. cit., p. 614.
- 115 Shirer, op. cit., p. 430.
- 116 Frederick Morton expresses the “offer” as ransom terms of 200,000 dollars, plus all the assets of the Austrian House of Rothschild including Vitkowitz. He says Eugene and Alphonse acted as negotiators in Zurich and Paris.
- 117 Eden, Memoirs, Vol. III., p. 15.
- 118 Bullock, op. cit., p. 616.
- 119 Toland, op. cit., p. 629, says five trains; Bullock, op. cit., p. 615, says four trains.
- 120 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., p. 113, note 32, citing La Documentation catholique 39 (no. 873, 5 June 1938), 690, quoting a report in Osservatore Romano of May 2, 1938.
- 121 Shirer, op. cit., p. 440, citing Documents on German Foreign Policy (DGFP) II, p. 255.
- 122 Toland, op. cit., p. 633.
- 123 ibid., p. 632.
- 124 Dilks, op. cit., pp. 74, 75.
- 125 Best, op. cit., p. 53, citing PRO FO371/22108 F4582/84/10 Halifax to Simon 9 May 1938.
- 126 ibid., p. 54, citing DBFP 2/XXI doc. 584 CAB27/623 FP(36) Cabinet Foreign Policy Committee 30th meeting 1 June 1938 pp. 785–794. Craigie’s telegram was circulated at that meeting as an enclosure to a Foreign Office memorandum.
- 127 Best, loc. cit., citing DBFP 2/XXI doc.570 F5039/15/10 Craigie to Halifax 10 May 1938 p. 766; Churchill, Memoirs, Vol. I, pp. 220–221.
- 128 Visser ‘T Hooft, op. cit., pp. 704–705.
- 129 ibid., pp. 706–707.
- 130 Cockett, op. cit., p. 69.
- 131 Dilks, op. cit., pp. 78, 79.
- 132 The Sudetan fringe was of far greater importance to Czechoslovakia, being its defensive shield, until Hitler gained control of Austria and the ability to bypass it if he wished.
- 133 Eden, Vol. II, pp. 516–517.
- 134 Taylor, op. cit., p. 774.
- 135 Eden, Vol II, pp. 530–546.
- 136 Bethell, Lord Nicholas The Palestine Triangle [London: Andre Deutsch, 1979] p. 44.
- 137 Toland, op. cit., pp. 635–636.
- 138 Shirer, op. cit., p. 432.
- 139 Cowles, op. cit., p. 211.
- 140 Eden, Memoirs Vol. III The Reckoning pp. 9, 15, 21, 24.
- 141 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., p. 115, citing Pinchas E. Lapide, Rome et les Juifs (Paris: Seuil, 1967), 137.
- 142 Best, op. cit., p. 54, citing DBFP 2/XXI doc. 584 CAB27/623 FP(36) Cabinet Foreign Policy Committee 30th meeting 1 June 1938 pp. 785–794. Craigie’s telegram was circulated at that meeting as an enclosure to a Foreign Office memorandum.
- 143 ibid., p. 54, citing PRO Prem1/303 Fisher to Simon and Chamberlain 18 June 1938.
- 144 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 24–34, citing LaFarge, The Manner is Ordinary, pp. 233, 234.
- 145 Cornwell, John Hitler’s Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII [London: Penguin/Viking, 1999], p. 190.

- 146 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 35, 36, citing a memorandum from LaFarge to Fr. Joseph A. Murphy, July 3, 1938.
- 147 Passelecq & Suchecky, loc. cit., citing LaFarge, The Manner is Ordinary, p. 235.
- 148 ibid., p. 37, citing LaFarge to Fr. Joseph A. Murphy, ibid.
- 149 ibid., op. cit., p. 38, citing LaFarge to Fr. Joseph A. Murphy, ibid.
- 150 ibid., op. cit., p. 128. The unsigned review of Dr. Rudolph Laemmel's Die Menschlichen Rassen: Eine popular-wissenschaftliche Einfuhrung in die Grundprobleme der Rassentheorie (Zurich, 1936) appeared as "Rivista della stampa: La 'Teoria moderna delle razze' impugnata da un acattilica," La Civilita cattolica 3, quad. 2113 (24 June 1938), 62–71.
- 151 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 189, citing G. Passelecq and B. Suchecky, L'encyclique cachée de Pie XI: Une occasion manquée de l'Eglise face à l'antisémitisme (Paris, 1995); R. Hill, The Lost Encyclical, The Tablet, November 8, 1997; and S. Friedlander, Nazi Germany and the Jews, Vol. I, 250ff.
- 152 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., various references, incl. pp. 41–44.
- 153 Best, op. cit., p. 55, citing DBGP 2/XXI doc.597 Cabinet conclusions 6 July 1938 p. 815.
- 154 Allen, op. cit., pp. 323–324.
- 155 At the time of the conference about 57 percent of the world's total Jewish population of about 16.6 million, (or about 9.5 million) lived in Europe, 33 percent (5.5 million) in the Americas, 6 percent 1 million) in Asia, 4 percent in Africa 0.6 million), and a mere 0.1 percent (say, 25,000) in Oceania (Australia, New Zealand and the Pacific). However, about 12.5 percent, or one in eight, of the world's Jews (about 2 million) lived in only one city, New York, and made up more than one quarter of the city's population of about 7.4 million. Therefore while it is not surprising that the United States took the initiative to sponsor the Evian Conference, it is surprising that the self-proclaimed 'New Israel' was reluctant to agree to a substantial boost in Jewish migrant and refugee arrivals, and that the Jewish representatives at the conference did not press for it to do so. Their response was conditioned by the same fear that they would undermine their demands for a National Home in Palestine and play into Britain's hands if the Americans had offered unrestricted Jewish access. [These estimates are rounded from figures for 1939 in Gribetz et al, op. cit., p. 426].
- 156 Noakes, op. cit., p. 552. About 30,000 commercial travellers lost their jobs during the next few months under the tightened citizenship laws. Jewish doctors had been banned from treating Aryan patients a few weeks earlier.
- 157 Australia's position is discussed further in chapter 25.
- 158 Encyclopaedia Judaica, Macmillan, Vol 14, 1971, p. 988.
- 159 Yahil, op. cit., p. 117.
- 160 See above, chapter 18.
- 161 Fishman, Priscilla Ed. The Jews of the United States [Jerusalem: Keter Publishing, 1974] p. 69.
- 162 Best, op. cit., pp. 54–55, citing PRO PREM 1/315 Wilson (T) minute 28 June 1938.
- 163 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 115–118, quoting from Dichiarazione della Razza after Il Messaggero, July 15, 1938, and the complete translation published in La Documentation catholique 39 (n. 879, 5 September 1938).
- 164 Best, op. cit., p. 55, citing DBGP 2/XXI doc.599 Cabinet conclusions 13 July 1938 pp. 819–822.
- 165 Yahil, op. cit., p. 422.
- 166 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 118–119, citing a report of the pope's address in Osservatore Romano, 17 July 1938, to which Ledochowski referred in a letter to LaFarge of the same date, and which was translated and published in La Documentation catholique 39, 5 September 1938, cols. 1054–1055.
- 167 Toland, op. cit., pp. 637–638.
- 168 Churchill, Vol. I., pp. 242–243.
- 169 Yahil, op. cit., p. 110, citing Kurt Ball-Kaduri, "Die Vorplanung der Kristallnacht," Zeitschrift für die Geschichte der Juden (Tel Aviv), no. 4, (1996): 211–218.

NOTES TO VOLUME I & II

- 170 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 119–120, quoting from Osservatore Romano, 23 July 1938: translation in La Documentation catholique, loc cit.
- 171 Cockett, op. cit., p. 70.
- 172 Eden, Memoirs, Vol. III, p. 24.
- 173 Cockett, op. cit., pp. 66, 67, quoting Memorandum by Baron von Welch ... on a conversation with Baron Hahn, Member of the D.N.B. office in London”, DGFP, vol 11, Series D, p. 624.
- 174 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 120–121, citing a “very detailed overview” of the Pope’s declaration on the first page of Osservatore Romano, 30 July, 1938.
- 175 ibid., p. 121.
- 176 ibid., pp. 122–123, citing and quoting from the unsigned article “Cronaco contemporanea,” La Civiltà cattolica 3, quad. 2115 (29 July 1938), 277–78.
- 177 Shirer, op. cit., p. 460.
- 178 Bond, op. cit., p. 268, citing Pownall’s diary entry for August 29, 1938.
- 179 Pratt, op. cit., pp. 60, 125.
- 180 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., p. 136.
- 181 Best, op. cit., p. 58, citing PRO FO371/22092 F7944/62/10 Craigie to Halifax 26 July 1938 tel.894, and F8151/62/10 Craigie to Halifax 26 July 1938 tel.902; DBFP Series 3 Volume VIII doc.5 F8378/16/10 Halifax to Clark Kerr 4 August 1938 p. 4–5; DBFP 3/VIII doc. 12 F8751/16/10 Craigie to Halifax 12 August 1938 pp. 13–14.
- 182 ibid., p. 59, citing PRO WO208/847 Ronald minute 23 August 1938 on BJ.072044 Tokyo to Paris undated [August 1938].
- 183 Toland, op. cit., p. 640.
- 184 Churchill made no mention of Kleist-Schmenzin’s visit or his letter in “The Gathering Storm.” Unfortunately the discovery of his letter by the Nazi high command contributed to a death sentence carried out against Kleist-Schmenzin only two weeks before the end of World War II.
- 185 Shirer, op. cit., p. 465.
- 186 Churchill, Memoirs Vol. I, p. 252.
- 187 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., p. 131, citing “Un tremendo atto di accusa,” Il Regime fascista, 30 August 1938, quoted by Enrico Rosa, “La questione giudaica e La Civiltà cattolica,” La Civiltà cattolica 4, quad. 2119 (22 September 1938), 5.
- 188 ibid., pp. 63–64, citing Ledochowski to LaFarge, Frascati, 1 September 1938, from the microfilm by Professor Thomas Breslin of documents in the LaFarge archives at Loyola Seminary, New York.
- 189 ibid., p. 64, LaFarge to Talbot, September 18, 1938.
- 190 The Times, London, Thursday, September 15, 1938, p. 10.
- 191 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 138–139, citing th record of Monsignor Picard. References which the pope alluded to were from Hebrews 7:1–15; Galations 3:16; Genesis 14:18; and Psalms 109:4.
- 192 Passelecq & Suchecky, loc. cit.; the complete report of the pope’s address was published in La Libre Belgique for 14 September 1938, and reproduced in La Documentation catholique 39, no. 885 (5 December 1938), cols. 1459–1460.
- 193 Taylor, Telford, loc. cit.
- 194 James, Lawrence The Rise and Fall of the British Empire [London: Little Brown/Abacus, 1995] p. 472.
- 195 James, op. cit., pp. 478–479, citing Documents on Australian Foreign Policy, 2, 257.
- 196 Bethell, op. cit., p. 45.
- 197 Cockett, op. cit., p. 74.
- 198 Bethell, op. cit., p. 46.

- 199 If these dates are correct, and if MacDonald did advise the Zionist leaders informally on September 19, 1938, that the Partition of Palestine would not proceed, then the conspiracy of silence becomes even more complex. It suggests that the decision had been made six weeks before the Woodhead Commission Report with its modified partition plan was tabled in the House of Commons on November 9. MacDonald spoke in favour of that plan on November 24, and the White Paper withdrawing support for partition was tabled two days later, on November 26. It could therefore be concluded that the announcement of the decision was delayed to avoid complicating even further the final stages of the process of forcing the dismembering of Czechoslovakia and that the modified partition plan was tabled in that form (which the government must have realized would be unacceptable) as a 'softening up process' before moving into the Round Table discussions in February 1939.
- 200 "Della questione giudaica in Europa," published in three installments, La Civiltà cattolica 14, vol. 9, 5, 385, 641, and 1890; quoted by E. Rosa and subsequently by Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 132–136.
- 201 Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 131–136 and note #63, citing and quoting from Enrico Rosa, "La questione giudaica e La Civiltà cattolica," La Civiltà cattolica 4, quad. 2119 (22 September 1938), 5.
- 202 ibid., pp. 65–66, citing LaFrage, The Manner is Ordinary, pp. 237–238.
- 203 Bullock, op. cit., p. 633.
- 204 Churchill, Memoirs, Vol I., pp. 264–265.
- 205 Even during the 1980's that story was being repeated in history books prescribed for secondary school students in Australia as an explanation of the Balfour Declaration.
- 206 Bethell, op. cit., pp. 50–51.
- 207 Ibid., p. 16.
- 208 Taylor, A.J.P. The Origins of the Second World War [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1974] p. 251.
- 209 ibid., pp. 234–235.
- 210 Dilks, David (Ed) The Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan [London: Cassell, 1971] p. 161.
- 211 Czechoslovakia had between 20 and 30 fully equipped divisions ready to fight.
- 212 Bethell, op. cit., p. 44.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

Chapter 22: Gog and Magog go to war

- ¹ Cowles, Virginia, The Rothschilds: A Family of Fortune [London: Futura, 1975] p. 211.
- ² Best, Antony Britain, Japan and Pearl Harbour: Avoiding War in East Asia, 1936–41 [London: Routledge, LSE, 1995], p. 59, citing DBFP 3/VIII doc. 107 F10125/62/10 Craigie to Halifax 22 September 1938 pp. 96–97; R Craigie, Behind the Japanese Mask, London, Hutchinson, 1946, p. 62.
- ³ Cockett, Richard Twilight of Truth: Chamberlain, Appeasement and the Manipulation of the Press [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1989], pp. 83–84.
- ⁴ ibid., p. 88.
- ⁵ ibid., p. 94.
- ⁶ Bethell, Lord Nicholas The Palestine Triangle [London: Andre Deutsch, 1979], p. 55.
- ⁷ Yahil, Leni Holocaust: The Fate of European Jewry [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991], p. 109.
- ⁸ ibid.
- ⁹ Toland, John Adolf Hitler [New York: Ballantine, 1977], pp. 637–638.
- ¹⁰ Churchill, Winston S. The Second World War [London: Reprint Society, 1948] Vol. I The Gathering Storm, pp. 242–243.
- ¹¹ Yahil, op. cit., p. 110, citing Kurt Ball-Kaduri, “Die Vorplanung der Kristallnacht,” Zeitschrift für die Geschichte der Juden (Tel Aviv), no. 4, (1996): 211–218.
- ¹² ibid., pp. 105–107 and 108–109, citing Carl Ludwig, Die Flüchtlingspolitik der Schweiz in den Jahren 1933–1955 (Bern, 1957), p. 56. Joseph Tenenbaum, “The Crucial Year, 1938,” YVS Studies, 2 (1958), pp. 52, 55.
- ¹³ Passelecq, Georges and Bernard Suchecky, The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI [New York: Harcourt Brace/Harvest, 1997] pp. 171–175. The authors draw on many sources, discuss the complexity of the drafting process, and conclude that the final “abridged” French version was “inspired by Gundlach up to paragraph 76” (of a total of 179) and that the balance “probably resulted from discussions and compromises among the three writers,” (LaFarge, Gundlach and Desbuquois) although they could not establish what contribution Desbuquois made. (p. 175).
- ¹⁴ ibid., p. 171, citing microfilm #62 by Professor Thomas Breslin of documents in the LaFarge archives at Loyola Seminary, New York.
- ¹⁵ ibid., pp. 131–136 and note #63, citing and quoting from Enrico Rosa, “La questione giudaica e La Civiltà Cattolica,” La Civiltà Cattolica 4, quad. 2119 (22 September 1938), 5.
- ¹⁶ ibid., pp. 71–72, citing an obituary notice in La Civiltà Cattolica; Giuseppe De Luca in Osservatore romano for 27 December 1936, quoted by D. Mondrone, S.J., “Il Padre Enrico Rosa D.C.D.G. In Memoriam Patris,” La Civiltà Cattolica, vol. 4, quad. 2124, 9 December 1938, 481–496.
- ¹⁷ ibid., pp. 68–70, citing letter from Gundlach to LaFarge, Rome, 16 October 1938, microfilm 43. Original in English.
- ¹⁸ James, Lawrence The Rise and Fall of the British Empire [London: Abacus/ Little Brown, 1995] p. 475.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁹ ibid.
- ²⁰ ibid., p. 465.
- ²¹ Yahil, op. cit., p. 108, citing Genschel, Die Verdrängung der Juden, p. 172.
- ²² Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 68–71, citing letter from Killen to LaFarge, 27 October 1938, microfilm 41.
- ²³ Dilks, David [Ed] The Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan [London: Cassell, 1971], p. 122.
- ²⁴ Shirer, William The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich [London: Pan, 1964], p. 535.
- ²⁵ ibid., pp. 555–556.
- ²⁶ Allen, Richard Imperialism & Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford University Press, 1974], p. 324.
- ²⁷ Cockett, op. cit., p. 29.
- ²⁸ ibid., p. 101.
- ²⁹ ibid., p. 56. (Beaverbrook Papers, c/152.).
- ³⁰ Best, op. cit., p. 62, citing DBFP Third Series Volume Viii doc. 233 F11989/84/10 Clark Kerr to Halifax 7 November 1938 pp. 216–218, and doc.234 F11991/84/10 Clark Kerr to Halifax 11 November 1938 pp. 218–219.
- ³¹ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 109–110.
- ³² Data from both Yahil, op. cit., pp. 110–111 and Gribetz, Judah, E. Greenstein & R. Stein, The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster-Touchstone, 1994] pp. 418, 420.
- ³³ Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., p. 137 and note #65.
- ³⁴ ibid., pp. 141–142.
- ³⁵ ibid., p. 144. It is not clear whether this refers to Mussolini or to the prime minister.
- ³⁶ ibid., pp. 144–147 and note #79, citing Osservatore Romano, November 14–15, and La Civiltà Cattolica, November 25, 1938.
- ³⁷ ibid., pp. 139–140, citing a speech delivered in November, 1938, to priests on ecclesiastical retreat by Cardinal Joseph-Ernest Van Roey and reported in La Documentation catholique.
- ³⁸ Roth, Cecil A History of the Jews [New York: Shocken, 1970], pp. 392–393.
- ³⁹ Conway, J.S. The Nazi Persecution of the Churches 1933–1945 [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1968], p. 223.
- ⁴⁰ Boegner, Marc The Long Road to Unity [London: Collins, 1970] pp. 126–127.
- ⁴¹ Yahil, op. cit., p. 119.
- ⁴² Bethell, op. cit., p. 52.
- ⁴³ Cockett, op. cit., pp. 58, 87.
- ⁴⁴ Shirer, op. cit., p. 535.
- ⁴⁵ Best, op. cit., p. 64, citing PRO FO371/22164 F13875/11783/10 Craigie to Halifax 30 November 1938 no. 958.
- ⁴⁶ Dilks, op. cit., page 122.
- ⁴⁷ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 117–118.
- ⁴⁸ Cockett, op. cit., p. 9.
- ⁴⁹ ibid., p. 85.
- ⁵⁰ Dilks, op. cit., p. 127.
- ⁵¹ Cockett, op. cit., p. 42.
- ⁵² Best, op. cit., p. 65, citing PRO CAB24/280 CP266(38) ‘Assistance to China’ Halifax memorandum 25 November 1938, and CP268(38) ‘Assistance to China’ Simon memorandum 25 November 1938, and CAB23/96 57(38) Cabinet conclusions 30 November 1938.
- ⁵³ Best, loc. cit., citing DBFP 3/VIII doc.323 F13739/11783/10 Craigie to Halifax 12 December 1938 pp. 304–306.
- ⁵⁴ Yahil, op. cit., p. 118.
- ⁵⁵ Russell, Lord Bertrand, Why I am not a Christian Ed. Paul Edwards [London: Unwin, 1975] pp. 25–26.
- ⁵⁶ ibid., pp. 166–167.
- ⁵⁷ Sources consulted for Albert Einstein’s biographical details include the following five end notes, 58 to 62.
- ⁵⁸ Clark, Ronald W. Einstein: The Life and Times [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1975].
- ⁵⁹ Hoffmann, Banesh & Dukas Albert Einstein, Creator & Rebel [London: Hart-Davis MacGibbon, 1973].
- ⁶⁰ Reid, R.W. Tongues of Conscience: War & the Scientists’ Dilemma [London: Constable, 1969].
- ⁶¹ Yass, Marion Hiroshima [London: Wayland, 1971].
- ⁶² Levitan, Tina The Laureates [New York: Twayne, 1960].
- ⁶³ Visser ‘T Hooft, Willem Adolf, contributing The Genesis of the World Council of Churches in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948, Eds. Ruth Rouse & Stephen Neill [London: World Council of Churches/SPCK, 1973] Vol I, p. 706.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁶⁴ ibid.
- ⁶⁵ LaTourette, Kenneth Scott, contributing Ecumenical Bearings of the Missionary Movement and the International Missionary Council in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517 — 1948 (Eds. Rouse & Neill) Vol. I, op. cit. pp. 399–400, citing The Madras Series, IV, The Life of the Church, pp. 376 ff.
- ⁶⁶ ibid., p. 370.
- ⁶⁷ Latourette, Kenneth Scott. Christianity in a Revolutionary Age, Volume V, The Twentieth Century Outside Europe. [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969] p. 285.
- ⁶⁸ Schoonhoven, E.J. contributing Tambaram 1938 in International Review of Mission, 1539/79 p. 314.
- ⁶⁹ ibid., p. 306.
- ⁷⁰ An expression used by a Pacific Islands theologian at the 1979 Victorian Synod of the Uniting Church in Australia to illustrate the need to make the church's sacraments and liturgy relevant for people in Pacific Islands.
- ⁷¹ Neill, Stephen, A History of Christian Missions [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1964] p. 519, citing Tambaram Series, Vol. IV (1939), p. 199.
- ⁷² Schoonhoven, op. cit., p. 311.
- ⁷³ Penguin Reference Who's Who of Religions, John Hinnells (Ed.) [London: Penguin, 1991] p. 223.
- ⁷⁴ LaTourette, contrib. Ecumenical Bearings of the Missionary Movement and the International Missionary Council, op. cit., p. 373.
- ⁷⁵ Schoonhoven, op. cit., pp. 304–305.
- ⁷⁶ ibid., p. 315.
- ⁷⁷ Best, op. cit., p. 66, citing DBFP 3/VIII doc.382 F44/44/10 Craigie to Halifax 1 January 1939 pp. 359–360.
- ⁷⁸ Kimball, Warren F. The Most Unsordid Act: Lend-Lease, 1939–1941 [Baltimore: John Hopkins Press, 1969] p. 6.
- ⁷⁹ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 117–118.
- ⁸⁰ Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 151–152, citing the testimony of Fr. Walter Abbott as reported in the National Catholic Reporter, 22 December 1972, 3, 4.
- ⁸¹ Kimball, op. cit., p. 3.
- ⁸² ibid., pp. 6–7.
- ⁸³ Dawidowicz, Lucy S. The War Against the Jews: 1933–1945 [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1977] p. 142.
- ⁸⁴ Toland, op. cit., p. 699.
- ⁸⁵ Taylor, Telford Munich: The Price of Peace [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1979] p. 911.
- ⁸⁶ Best, op. cit., p. 67, citing PRO WO208/859 BJ.073458 Tokyo to Berlin 9 January 1939 decrypted 26 January 1939, and DBFP 3/VIII doc.467 C1500/421/62 Halifax to Mallet 4 February 1939 pp. 437–9 and other diplomatic exchanges.
- ⁸⁷ Yahil, op. cit., p. 115, citing Norman H. Baynes ed., The Speeches of Adolf Hitler, pp. 738–741; DOH, pp. 132–135.
- ⁸⁸ Boegner, op. cit., p. 128. (Boegner places the meeting at the beginning of February. Visser 'T Hooft, op. cit., p. 707, places it in late January. The discrepancy is of no consequence.)
- ⁸⁹ Visser 'T Hooft, loc. cit.
- ⁹⁰ Cockett, op. cit., p. 88.
- ⁹¹ Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., p. 73, letter from Gundlach to LaFarge, 18 November 1938, microfilm 44.
- ⁹² ibid., pp. 151–152, citing Cardinal Tisserant, whose remarks were reported by the National Catholic Reporter, 15 December 1972, 13, with no indication of the source.
- ⁹³ ibid., p. 5; citing Fr. Burkhardt Schneider, an official of the Vatican archives, in the German weekly edition of Osservatore romano, 5 April 1973, p. 7.
- ⁹⁴ ibid., pp. 72–74.
- ⁹⁵ The description 'the hidden encyclical' is used by authors Georges Passelecq & Bernard Suchecky to describe Humani Generis Unitas and provides the title for their book in which they detail its history and preparation, op. cit.
- ⁹⁶ ibid., p. 175.
- ⁹⁷ ibid., p. 5.
- ⁹⁸ ibid., p. 3.
- ⁹⁹ Humani Generis Unitas, clauses 2, 3 and 4. All references and quotations are from the full text in English translated from the Authentic and Complete (French) Text in Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 176–275.
- ¹⁰⁰ ibid., clause 5.
- ¹⁰¹ ibid., clauses 6 to 22.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁰² ibid., clause 26.
- ¹⁰³ ibid., clauses 31 to 33.
- ¹⁰⁴ ibid., clauses 34 to 38.
- ¹⁰⁵ ibid., clauses 39 to 49.
- ¹⁰⁶ ibid., clauses 50 to 66.
- ¹⁰⁷ ibid., clauses 67 to 76.
- ¹⁰⁸ ibid., clauses 77 to 79.
- ¹⁰⁹ ibid., clauses 89 to 92.
- ¹¹⁰ Cardinal Robert Bellarmine, a Jesuit, was a leading anti-Protestant apologist for the Roman Catholic position during the Counter Reformation crisis, being Archbishop of Capua, Italy, from 1602–1605, but he clashed with the reigning pope, Sixtus V, because of his contention that papal authority in temporal affairs was indirect and not direct. Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 57.
- ¹¹¹ Professor Francisco de Vitoria established a new school of theology based on Aquinas' Summa Theologica at Salamanca, Spain, in 1526, also during critical years of the Reformation. He sought to define conditions for a 'just war.' Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 542.
- ¹¹² Francisco de Suarez was also a theologian and formulator of natural and international law during the Counter Reformation period, teaching at Rome, Alcalá and Coimbra from 1597 to 1616. Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church, p. 491.
- ¹¹³ Humani Generis Unitas, op. cit., clauses 93 to 94.
- ¹¹⁴ ibid., clause 94.
- ¹¹⁵ ibid., clauses 95 to 98.
- ¹¹⁶ ibid., clauses 99 to 100.
- ¹¹⁷ ibid., clauses 101 to 107.
- ¹¹⁸ ibid., clauses 108 to 119.
- ¹¹⁹ ibid., clauses 120 to 122.
- ¹²⁰ ibid., clauses 123 to 130.
- ¹²¹ ibid., clauses 131 to 132.
- ¹²² ibid., clause 133, first paragraph.
- ¹²³ ibid., clauses 134 to 136.
- ¹²⁴ ibid., clause 136, final paragraph.
- ¹²⁵ ibid., clauses 137 to 146.
- ¹²⁶ ibid., clause 148.
- ¹²⁷ ibid.
- ¹²⁸ ibid., clauses 149 to 152.
- ¹²⁹ BBC News, March 14, 2000, reported that Lord Greville Janner, chairman of the Holocaust Educational Trust, had called on Pope John Paul II to open the Holocaust archives following the Pope's apology on March 12 for the wrongdoings of Roman Catholics. [http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/english/uk/newsid_675000/675201.stm].
- ¹³⁰ Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 9–10, citing letter Watelet to Passelecq, 18 September, 1976.
- ¹³¹ ibid., p. 88, citing letter McCormick to LaFarge, 31 October 1939, microf. 56, original in English.
- ¹³² Tomkins, Oliver Stratford, contributing The Roman Catholic Church and the Ecumenical Movement 1910–1948, in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948 (Eds. Rouse & Neill) op.cit. Vol I, p. 686.
- ¹³³ Reid, op. cit., p. 68.
- ¹³⁴ Cowles, op. cit., p. 212.
- ¹³⁵ Morton, Frederick The Rothschilds [London: Secker & Warburg, 1962], p. 224, gives a somewhat lower estimate of the prewar market value of Vitkowitz: about Stg.0.5 million pounds.
- ¹³⁶ Aarons, Mark & John Loftus, The Secret War Against the Jews [Melbourne: William Heinemann/Reed, 1994] p. 48, citing Monroe, Philby of Arabia, p. 219.
- ¹³⁷ Nafi, Basheer M. The Arabs and the Axis: 1933–1940 [Arab Studies Quarterly, Vol. 19, No. 2, Spring 1997] distributed by MSANEWS <http://msanews.mynet.net/> July 31, 1999, p. 8.
- ¹³⁸ Kimball, op. cit., p. 20, citing Summary of Strategic Situation, March 3, 1939, Franklin D. Roosevelt Papers, President's Secretary File, Gt. Britain, Kennedy (Franklin D. Roosevelt Library, Hyde Park, N.Y.).
- ¹³⁹ O'Carroll, Michael. Pius XII: Greatness Dishonoured [Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1980] pp. 48–50 citing Actes et Documents, I, intro. pp. 3–94; II, pp. 20–22; appendices V, VIII; II, p. 413: minutes of the meeting between

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- Pius XII and the German and Austrian Cardinals. Text of letter p. 435; cf. W.M. Harrigan, Pius XII's efforts to effect a detente in German-Vatican relations, 1939-1940, Cath. Historical Rev., 49 (1963), p. 173-191.
- ¹⁴⁰ Cockett, op. cit., p. 104.
- ¹⁴¹ Bullock, Alan Hitler and Stalin: Parallel Lives [London: Harper Collins/Fontana, 1993], pp. 650-651.
- ¹⁴² Cornwell, John Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII [London: Penguin/Viking, 1999], pp. 210-215.
- ¹⁴³ Sixty two cardinals met in a conclave on March 2 to elect a successor to Pope Pius XI. The conclave shattered convention in two ways: in the speed with which a result was reached, and in breaking with recognized constraints on the election of the pope. It had been an accepted convention since the first Vatican Council that the incumbent Secretary of State would not be elevated to the office of pope because a great deal of corruption had previously been associated with the practice. However there had been open talk for several years that Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli was heir apparent to Pius XI because of their virtually joint conduct of the Vatican's political affairs, and because Pacelli was responsible for the concordat negotiations with Hitler's regime. On January 13 1939 Pius XI received Prime Minister Chamberlain and Lord Halifax to discuss the world situation. In failing health he then worked with Pacelli on the draft of an address which he planned to deliver on February 12. He died on February 10. The election procedure required 42 votes for a result. Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli was elected in the third ballot. He received 35 votes in the first ballot, 40 in the second and 61 in the third.
- ¹⁴⁴ Dilks, op. cit., p. 157.
- ¹⁴⁵ ibid., op. cit., p. 160.
- ¹⁴⁶ Yahil, op. cit., p. 118.
- ¹⁴⁷ The Times, London, March 23, 1939, p. 7.
- ¹⁴⁸ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 562-563.
- ¹⁴⁹ Dilks, op. cit., p. 167.
- ¹⁵⁰ Gilbert, Martin Churchill, A Life [London:Minerva, 1992], p. 612.
- ¹⁵¹ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 222-223.
- ¹⁵² Best, op. cit., pp. 68-70, citing DBFP 3/VIII appendix 1 enclosure in doc.(ii) F3147/471/61 Phillips (Admiralty) to Howe 29 March 1939 pp. 549-550; PRO FO371/23576 F3732/982/23 Cambon/Ronald conversation 17 April 1939, and F4827/982/23 Howe to Corbin 2 June 1939.
- ¹⁵³ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 209, 226.
- ¹⁵⁴ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 572-579.
- ¹⁵⁵ Nafi, op. cit., p. 8, citing Norman H. Baynes (ed.) The Speeches of Adolf Hitler, April 1922-August 1939 (London: Oxford Uni. Press, 1942) 1648.
- ¹⁵⁶ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 555-557.
- ¹⁵⁷ Cockett, op. cit., pp. 109,110.
- ¹⁵⁸ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 224-225, citing a letter, Orsenigo to the Vatican, ADSS, I (Records and Documents of the Holy See Relating to the Second World War), Vatican, 1965-1981, (English ed.), 120ff.
- ¹⁵⁹ Encyclopaedia Judaica, Vol 14, [London: Macmillan, 1971] pp. 338-339.
- ¹⁶⁰ Cowles, op. cit., p. 212. The formal terms of purchase were agreed two months later, in July, but a contract was never signed and payment was never made. However the Rothschild family eventually received one million pounds Sterling as compensation from the Communist government of Czechoslovakia.
- ¹⁶¹ Laqueur, Walter & Barry Rubin (Eds) The Israel-Arab Reader, 3rd. edition [New York: Bantam, 1969] Document 18, The Zionist Reaction to the White Paper: Statement by the Jewish Agency for Palestine (1939) [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1984] pp. 76-77.
- ¹⁶² Bullock, op. cit., p. 661.
- ¹⁶³ Bullock, loc. cit.
- ¹⁶⁴ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 589-595.
- ¹⁶⁵ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 229-230, citing O. Chadwick, Britain and the Vatican during the Second World War (Cambridge, 1986), pp. 70, 72; FO (Foreign Office Papers in the Public Record Office, Kew), 371/23790/283.
- ¹⁶⁶ Kimball, op. cit., p. 9.
- ¹⁶⁷ Best, op. cit., p. 74.
- ¹⁶⁸ ibid., pp. 75-77, citing DBFP 3/IX doc. 227 F6017/1/10 Clark Kerr to Halifax 14 June 1939 p.168; PRO PREM1/316 Runciman to Chamberlain 19 June 1939, and other diplomatic correspondence.
- ¹⁶⁹ Visser 'T Hooft, op. cit., p. 707.
- ¹⁷⁰ Best, op. cit., pp. 79-80, citing DBFP 3/IX doc. 325 F7347/6457/10 Craigie to Halifax 15 July 1939 p. 279.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- 171 ibid., p. 80, citing DBFP 3/IX doc.327 Craigie to Halifax 15 July 1939 p. 290; DBFP 3/IX doc.337 Halifax to Craigie 17 July 1939 p. 290.
- 172 Kimball, op. cit., p. 8.
- 173 Best, loc. cit., citing DBFP 3/IX doc. 353 F7645/6457/10 Craigie to Halifax 21 July 1939 pp. 304–5.
- 174 Bullock, op. cit., p. 662, citing Schnurre's report: Documents on German Foreign Policy, 1918–1945, Series D, vol. VI, No. 729.
- 175 Best, op. cit., pp. 80–81, citing PRO CAB23/100 39(39) Cabinet conclusions 26 July 1939.
- 176 ibid., p. 82.
- 177 Cockett, op. cit., pp. 112, 118.
- 178 When Britain's ambassador to Warsaw, Sir Howard Kennard, was negotiating proposals for an Anglo-French mutual assistance pact with Poland he was ordered by telegram not to involve Russia. The message read, in part, that "...our attempts to consolidate the situation will be frustrated if the Soviet Union is openly associated with the initiation of the scheme. Recent telegrams from a number of His Majesty's Missions abroad have warned us that the inclusion of Russia would not only jeopardize the success of our constructive effort but also tend to consolidate the relations of the parties to the Anti-Comintern Pact, as well as excite anxiety among a number of friendly governments." [Shirer, op. cit., p. 567 footnote].
- 179 Morton, op. cit., p. 227. According to Morton the price actually agreed to was Stg. 2,900,000 pounds.
- 180 Shirer, op. cit., pp. 595–659. The first overtures passed between Berlin and Moscow at the end of May, only a few days after Hitler briefed his military leaders on his plan to go to war, but there was, naturally, such a level of distrust that progress was slow until mid August. Hitler then ordered that a final settlement be reached with Russia promptly, with Foreign Minister Ribbentrop to go to Moscow for personal talks with Molotov and Stalin if necessary. Shirer also indicates, op. cit., pp. 624–626, that the Russians felt a lot more secure with the idea of a treaty with Hitler, in view of Mein Kampf, than they did with the British. Britain's foreign policy was in such disarray that it couldn't make a meaningful military decision as a consequence, and its geographic isolation from eastern Europe made military intervention very difficult in any case. However Hitler's trump card was that he could offer Russia a deal to divide eastern Europe between them, Sykes-Picot style, while Britain had no such territorial option either on Russia's western or eastern flank. There was the Middle East of course, and India, but they were not negotiable.
- 181 Irving, David Churchill's War, Vol I, The Struggle for Power [Australia: Veritas, 1987] p. 69.
- 182 Two letters were actually written. The longer version was entrusted to Sachs. The shorter version was sent by Szilard, together with a letter of introduction from Einstein, to a Colonel Lindbergh who was asked to convey it to the president. It was never delivered to the president and Lindbergh later disclaimed any knowledge of it.
- 183 Clark, op. cit., pp. 522–523.
- 184 Visser 'T Hooft, op. cit., p. 708.
- 185 Best, loc. cit., citing DBFP 3/IX doc.444 F8245/6457/10 Craigie to Halifax 1 August 1939 p. 382; PRO CAB23/100 40(39) Cabinet conclusions 2 August 1939.
- 186 O'Carroll, op. cit., p. 50.
- 187 Churchill, The Second World War Vol. I, The Gathering Storm, op. cit., p. 318.
- 188 Kimball, op. cit., pp. 19–20.
- 189 Best, op. cit., p. 85.
- 190 ibid., p. 87.
- 191 Bullock, op. cit., p. 670. The author notes that although it was forbidden to take notes at Hitler's briefings several officers did so. He then refers to several sources without indicating from which source this particular quotation is drawn.
- 192 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 230.
- 193 Churchill, The Second World War Vol 1 The Gathering Storm op. cit., pp. 320–321.
- 194 Shirer, op. cit., p. 660.
- 195 ibid., pp. 663–664.
- 196 Best, loc. cit., citing DBFP 3/IX doc.584 F9421/87/10 Craigie to Halifax 24 August 1939 p. 496.
- 197 Lewy, Guenter The Catholic Church and Nazi Germany [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1964], p. 226.
- 198 Taylor, Telford op. cit., p. 12.
- 199 O'Carroll, op. cit., p. 51.
- 200 Shirer, op. cit., pp. 662–674, 688.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ²⁰¹ ibid., p. 609.
- ²⁰² ibid., pp. 691–692.
- ²⁰³ Cockett, op.cit., p. 119.
- ²⁰⁴ Shirer, op. cit., p. 693.
- ²⁰⁵ Dilks, op. cit., pp. 202–203, confirms the thrust of these talks but records that Cadogan managed to ‘kill’ a proposal by Halifax and Henderson that Hitler be offered a Non-Aggression Pact, and that pressure was applied to Poland to agree to direct negotiations with Hitler on Danzig and the corridor, in other words, to surrender them.
- ²⁰⁶ Best, op. cit., p. 86, citing PRO FO371/23532 F9583/6457/23 Edwardes/Butler conversation 26 August 1939, and DBFP 3/IX doc.598 F9601/176/23 Halifax to Craigie 26 August 1939 pp. 507–8.
- ²⁰⁷ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 631–656.
- ²⁰⁸ The same protocol provided for the northern frontier of Lithuania to mark the spheres of interest of Germany and Russia in the event that the Baltic States of Finland, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania should also undergo a “transformation.”
- ²⁰⁹ Shirer, op. cit., p. 655.
- ²¹⁰ Hitler actually issued top secret orders on April 3rd 1939 for the preparation of plans for an invasion of Poland under the code name “Case White”. In those orders he said preparations were to be made in such a way that the operation could be carried out at any time from September 1 1939 onwards. [ibid., p. 571.] However he later changed this to September 1st at the latest because of the enormous problems of military operations in a Polish winter and the possibility of early autumn rains. By the time of his May conference, September 1 had become the firm deadline. He later tried to bring the invasion date forward but the political situation prevented him from doing so and if it could not have been mounted by September 2 the invasion would have been called off indefinitely. [ibid., p. 714].
- ²¹¹ ibid., p. 695.
- ²¹² ibid., p. 699.
- ²¹³ The Times, London, Wednesday, September 6, 1939, p. 8.
- ²¹⁴ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 230–231, citing ADSS, I, 242–43.
- ²¹⁵ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 712–713.
- ²¹⁶ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 231.
- ²¹⁷ ibid., pp. 231–232, citing ADSS, I, 262–63.
- ²¹⁸ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 684–686.
- ²¹⁹ ibid., pp. 728–734.
- ²²⁰ Conway, op. cit., p. 234, quoting Niemoller.
- ²²¹ Bethell, op. cit., p. 44.
- ²²² Gribetz, op. cit., p. 426; and Penguin Atlas of World Population, pp. 42–43. The population of the UK was approximately 40 million and included about 400,000 Jews.
- ²²³ Shirer, op. cit., p. 737.
- ²²⁴ Toland, op. cit., p. 786.
- ²²⁵ ibid., pp. 786–787.
- ²²⁶ Churchill, The Second World War Vol I The Gathering Storm, op. cit., pp. 327–331.
- ²²⁷ Eden, Anthony Memoirs, Vol. III The Reckoning [London: Cassell, 1965], pp. 61–63.
- ²²⁸ Toland, op. cit., p. 788.
- ²²⁹ ibid., pp. 788–790.
- ²³⁰ Cockett, op. cit., pp. 123, 129.
- ²³¹ Buss, Claude A Asia in the Modern World [New York: Macmillan, 1964], pp. 485–486.
- ²³² The Times, London, Monday, September 4, 1939, p. 4.
- ²³³ The Times, loc. cit.
- ²³⁴ The Times, London, Monday, September 4, 1939, p. 10.
- ²³⁵ The Times, London, Tuesday, September 5, 1939, p. 7.
- ²³⁶ The Times, London, Monday, September 5, 1939, p. 7.
- ²³⁷ Conway, loc. cit., quoting Lewy.
- ²³⁸ Some writers, such as Reuben Ainsztein, saw this as part of Stalin’s battle with Trotsky and his effort to consolidate his position as absolute dictator while conceding that it also reflected the reassertion of ‘Russian’ cultural imperialism’. Ainsztein points out, for example, that Muslims in Southern Russia who had previously been - forced to change from Arabic to Latin script under Tsarist Russia, and primitive Siberian tribes for whom a written language was a new development were both required to adopt the Cyrillic alphabet. That policy, although obviously questionable from some points of view, was consistent with the policies of almost all imperial powers whether Western or Eastern, modern or ancient, based on the assumption that political stability was more easily achievable with a common national language — just as with a common national religion.

- ²³⁹ Ainsztein, Reuben contributing chapter 13, Soviet Jewry in the Second World War, in The Jews in Soviet Russia since 1917 [Oxford, 1978] pp. 281–282.
- ²⁴⁰ Some German authorities at the time and some historians attributed Stalin's reluctance to invade Poland concurrently with Germany to his wish to minimize casualties while his new found partner deflected the Polish defence but that assessment does not give sufficient weight to the influence of domestic factors in the Soviet Union. (131).
- ²⁴¹ Toland, op. cit., p. 796.
- ²⁴² Lash, Joseph P. Roosevelt and Churchill 1939–1941 [London: Andre Deutsch, 1977]., p. 22.
- ²⁴³ ibid., p. 23.
- ²⁴⁴ Laqueur, Walter A History of Zionism [New York: Schocken, 1976] p. 533.
- ²⁴⁵ Yahil, op. cit., p. 128.
- ²⁴⁶ Bullock, op. cit., p. 669.
- ²⁴⁷ Buss, op. cit., pp. 426–427.
- ²⁴⁸ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 128–129, citing TWC, 2, pp. 447ff; Helmut Krounsnik, "Denkschrift Himmlers uber die Behandlung der Fremdvolkischen im Osten (Mai 1940)," VJHZ, 5, no. 2 (1957), 194–198.
- ²⁴⁹ ibid., pp. 146–147.
- ²⁵⁰ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 232.
- ²⁵¹ Churchill, The Second World War Vol I The Gathering Storm p. 336.
- ²⁵² Buss, op. cit., pp. 421–423.
- ²⁵³ Some indication of the strength of that support, the connections and the friendships which were associated with it is given by another incident related by biographer Virginia Cowles. When the government of Newfoundland needed private development capital on a mammoth scale in 1951 the premier, Mr. Smallwood, approached Winston Churchill for advice shortly after he had become British Prime Minister for the second time. After being briefed on the essentials of the proposal Churchill spontaneously referred the matter to Anthony Rothschild, then head of the British-based bank. A consortium of twenty nine major companies, Brinco, was formed and headed by N.M. Rothschild and Sons. Over the next twenty years more than Sterling 1,000 million pounds was earmarked for development. One of the biggest development schemes of all times had fallen into Anthony Rothschild's lap without his having so much as lifted a finger for it and Churchill later referred to the incident in a letter to a member of the family. Having mentioned the close relations between their respective families he wrote "I am very glad to feel that the connection is not broken in my old age."
- ²⁵⁴ Cowles, op. cit., pp. 231–232.
- ²⁵⁵ On November 12, 1938, three days after Crystal Night, Lord Rothschild wrote to The Times to draw British public attention to the effects of Hitler's policies in Europe. He said that although some people warned against criticism of the treatment of Jews from concern that it would only increase their torments he had no fear of doing this "because their torments cannot be increased except by such refinements of torture as would create general horror in Germany itself ..." However when he launched Lord Baldwin's Fund for German Refugees only a few weeks later he admitted that he had been wrong. Tortures had been invented and inflicted, he said, such that the use of the word medieval to describe them was an insult to the past. Hitler was outdoing the church's Inquisition and he wasn't even trying to save souls.
- ²⁵⁶ Cowles, op. cit., p. 207.
- ²⁵⁷ Gabler, Neal, An Empire of Their Own [New York: Crown, 1998] p. 343.
- ²⁵⁸ Buss, op. cit., p. 426.
- ²⁵⁹ Gilbert, Martin Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976] p. 90.
- ²⁶⁰ Best, op. cit., p. 88.
- ²⁶¹ ibid., p. 89, citing PRO FO371/23556 F10710/176/23 Butler minute 22 September 1939.
- ²⁶² Best, loc. cit., citing PRO CAB66/2 WP(39)56 'Sino-Japanese Hostilities' COS report 28 September 1939.
- ²⁶³ ibid., pp. 92–93, citing PRO FO837/519 vol. 1 COIS Singapore to DNI (Admiralty) 19 September 1939 tel.1901/1; PRO FO371/23567 F10500/1054/23 Edwardes (Japanese Embassy) to Harrison (FO) enclosing

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- memorandum from Y. Shudo 23 September 1939; PRO FO837/519 vol. 1 Wellesley (MEW) minute 28 September 1939, and other diplomatic exchanges.
- ²⁶⁴ Shirer, op. cit., p. 760.
- ²⁶⁵ Toland, op. cit., p. 798.
- ²⁶⁶ Lewy, op. cit., p. 227.
- ²⁶⁷ Kimball, op. cit., p. 17, citing U.S. Congressional Record, 76th Cong., 2nd sess., LXXXV, pt. 1, Oct. 2, 1939, p. 73.
- ²⁶⁸ Aarons & Loftus op. cit., p. 168.
- ²⁶⁹ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 18–19.
- ²⁷⁰ ibid., p. 23, citing Frederic J. Fleron, Jr., The Isolationists and the Foreign Policy of FDR: A Study in Executive Leadership, [Master's Thesis, Brown University, 1961] pp. 224–229.
- ²⁷¹ Shirer, op. cit., p. 1124, citing Nazi Conspiracy and Aggression (NCA) Part of the Nuremberg Documents, VII, pp. 420–21 (N.D.s EC-344–16 and -17).
- ²⁷² Aarons & Loftus, op. cit., p. 48, citing H. Stj. B. Philby, Arabian Jubilee (London: Robert Hale, 1952) pp. 212–213. The authors note that other authorities report the plan with variations. Philby's biographer suggested that the Jews were to get Western Palestine apart from a 'Vatican City' in the Old City of Jerusalem, in return for a subsidy of 20 million pounds paid to Ibn Saud and help in ensuring that Arab independence was secured under Ibn Saud. And according to Weizmann the plan involved "considerable transfers of Arab population." [Monroe, Philby of Arabia, pp. 221–222].
- ²⁷³ Lewy, op. cit., pp. 227–229.
- ²⁷⁴ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 770–772.
- ²⁷⁵ Best, loc. cit., citing F10691/69/10 Craigie to Halifax 11 October 1939 tel.1366.
- ²⁷⁶ Hacker, op. cit., pp. 317–319.
- ²⁷⁷ Harold Lasswell is quoted by George Gerbner thus: "It is generally recognized that the scientific study of communication has made giant strides in recent decades. An important date in the growth of the field was the early 1930's, when the Humanities Division of the Rockefeller Foundation and the Social Science Research Council interested themselves in the state of knowledge regarding propaganda and communication ... The most successful step (to initiate research) was taken by political scientists. They provided a unified map of the field that brought specialists of many kinds to sudden awareness of a common frame of reference. The step was taken because political scientists were increasingly aware of the strategic significance for arenas of power of the control of communication..."
- ²⁷⁸ Lasswell, Harold The Future of political Science [1964] pp. 161–162.
- ²⁷⁹ Gerbner, George contrib. Mass Media and Human Communication Theory in Sociology of Mass Communications Ed. Denis McQuail [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972] p. 44.
- ²⁸⁰ Hacker, op. cit., pp. 314–319.
- ²⁸¹ In 1939 US production was 1,333 million barrels or just under two thirds of total world production, (2,100 million barrels). Production from all other sources was 767 million barrels or 36.5 percent.
- ²⁸² The DuPont Corporation, which held controlling interest in General Motors, apparently warned against the release of information on the grounds that it might impair military security but the interests of Standard and General Motors, which each held about half of the German markets in their fields, won out. (144)
- ²⁸³ Engler, Robert The Politics of Oil [New York: Macmillan, 1961] p. 102
- ²⁸⁴ ibid., pp. 96–112.
- ²⁸⁵ Gilbert, Martin, Second World War 2nd Edition [London: Fontana, 1990] p. 20.
- ²⁸⁶ Shirer, op. cit., p. 773.
- ²⁸⁷ ibid.
- ²⁸⁸ Best, op. cit., p. 93, citing PRO FO371/23568 F11195/1094/23 Craigie to Halifax 20 October 1939 tel.1404.
- ²⁸⁹ Best, loc. cit., citing PRO FO837/519 vol. 1 Wellesley minute 6 November 1939; an undated MEW memorandum; an undated FO draft memorandum in FO371/23568 F11899/1054/23; and Treasury and Board of Trade files.
- ²⁹⁰ ibid., p. 94, citing PRO CAB67/2 WP(G)(39)90 'Seizure of Exports from Germany' Cross memorandum 15 November 1939.
- ²⁹¹ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 129, 14–149, 154–155.
- ²⁹² Gilbert, Second World War, p. 19.
- ²⁹³ Reid, op. cit., p. 103.
- ²⁹⁴ Toland, op. cit., pp. 786–787.

²⁹⁵ ibid., p. 784.

²⁹⁶ ibid., p. 783.

Chapter 23: A Pause to regroup ... or cause for reflection?

¹ Taylor A.J.P. The Origins of the Second World War [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1974] p. 251.

² ibid., pp. 234–235.

³ Dilks, David (Ed) The Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan [London: Cassell, 1971] p. 161.

⁴ Cochrane, Arthur C. The Church's Confession under Hitler [Philadelphia: Westminster Press] Foreword p. 14.

⁵ Catholic Encyclopaedia, [McGraw Hill, Vol.] p. 416.

⁶ Cornwell, John Hitler's Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII [London: Penguin/Viking, 1999], p. 234, citing R. Graham, "Summi Pontificatus", Civiltà cattolica (October 1984), 139–140.

⁷ Except where specific references are made to other publications, all quotations from Summi Pontificatus are from the Catholic Truth Society, London, edition S 151, October 1956, translated by Right Rev. Mgr. Ronald A. Knox M.A. Emphasis has been added when shown.

⁸ Passelecq, Georges and Bernard Suchecky, The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI [New York: Harcourt Brace/Harvest, 1997] p. 5.

⁹ Cornwell, loc. cit.

¹⁰ Passelecq & Suchecky, op. cit., pp. 3, 5, 9, 15, 88, 166.

¹¹ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 233.

¹² Fisher, Desmond Pope Pius XII and the Jews [Glen Rock: Paulist Press, 1963] p. 4.

¹³ Von Aretin, Karl Otmar The Papacy and the Modern World [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1970] p. 213.

¹⁴ Webster, Richard A. Christian Democracy in Italy 1860 – 1960 [London: Hollis & Carter, 1961] preface, p. vi.

¹⁵ ibid., pp. 146–147.

¹⁶ ibid., p. 156.

¹⁷ ibid., p. 160.

¹⁸ Eden, Anthony (Volume III) The Reckoning [London: Cassell, 1965] pp. 69–70.

¹⁹ ibid., pp. 67–68.

²⁰ Ehler & Morrall Church and State through the Centuries [London: Burns & Oates, 1954] p. 146.

²¹ Von Aretin, op. cit., p. 213–214.

²² Pope Pius XII, Sertum Laetitiae, promulgated November 1, 1939. Source:

<http://www.knight.org/advent/docs/pi12sl.htm> as at October 31, 1999.

²³ Memorandum Wells to Roosevelt, May 16, 1939, The Franklin D. Roosevelt Library and Museum, Diplomatic Correspondence with the Vatican and Myron Taylor, Box #51 [source: <http://www.fdrlibrary.marist.edu/andyc/fdr/boxlisti.html> as at May 25, 2000].

²⁴ Letter Celler to Hull, July 24, 1939, The Franklin D. Roosevelt Library and Museum, Diplomatic Correspondence with the Vatican and Myron Taylor, Box #51 [source: <http://www.fdrlibrary.marist.edu/andyc/fdr/psfi464/t464c02.htm> as at May 25, 2000].

²⁵ Memorandum Hull to Roosevelt, October 20, 1939, The Franklin D. Roosevelt Library and Museum, loc. cit.

²⁶ O'Carroll, Michael, Pius XII: Greatness Dishonoured [Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1980] p. 42.

²⁷ Kimball, Warren F. The Most Unsordid Act: Lend-Lease, 1939–1941 [Baltimore: John Hopkins Press, 1969] pp. 28–29, citing Hadley Cantril, ed., Public Opinion, 1935–1946 [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1951] pp. 969, 1101.

²⁸ O'Carroll, op. cit., p. 59.

²⁹ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 234–236, citing H. Deutsch, The Conspiracy Against Hitler in the Twilight War (Oxford, 1968), p. 115; British Foreign Office and Cabinet papers for January and February 1940; and referring to five additional published works.

³⁰ Yahil, Leni Holocaust: The Fate of European Jewry [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991] p. 135.

³¹ Toland, John, Adolf Hitler [New York: Ballantine, 1977] p. 807.

³² ibid., pp. 808–812.

³³ Yahil, op. cit., p. 154.

³⁴ Aarons & Loftus, The Secret War Against the Jews [Melbourne: Heinemann, 1994] p. 89, citing Anthony Cave Brown, C. The Secret Life of Sir Stewart Menzies (New York: Macmillan, 1987) p. 215n; Higham, American Swastika, p. 186.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³⁵ Best, op. cit., p. 91, citing PRO FO371/23559 F12088/347/23 Craigie to Halifax 22 November 1939 tel.1532; PRO FO371/23559 F12108/347/23 Seeds to Halifax 25 November 1939 tel. 471; F12189/347/23 Roche (French Embassy)/Denning (FE Dept) conversation 24 November 1939.
- ³⁶ Yahil, op. cit., p. 160.
- ³⁷ ibid., pp. 159–161, citing Phil Friedman, "The Lublin Reservation and the Madagascar Plan: Two Aspects of Nazi Jewish Policy during the Second World War," in Roads to Extinction: Essays on the Holocaust, ed. Ada J. Friedman (New York & Philadelphia, 1980) pp. 35–37.
- ³⁸ Gilbert, Second World War, 2nd Edition [London: Fontana, 1990] p. 35. Hans Frank's diary entry was dated December 19, 1939.
- ³⁹ Best, op. cit., p. 95, citing Medlicott W.N. The Economic Blockade, vol. 1, (London: HMSO, 1952) pp. 393–395; PRO CAB65/2 WM 96(39) War Cabinet conclusions 27 November 1939; PRO CAB65/3 WM 104(39) War Cabinet conclusions 4 December 1939; W.H. Heinrichs, American Ambassador: Joseph C. Grew and the American Diplomatic Tradition, New York, Oxford University Press, 1966, pp. 295–297.
- ⁴⁰ Sir Winston Churchill's description in his history of the Second World War.
- ⁴¹ Churchill, Sir Winston S. The Second World War, Volume I, The Gathering Storm, Book II. [London: The Reprint Society, 1953].
- ⁴² Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 18.
- ⁴³ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 236.
- ⁴⁴ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 34.
- ⁴⁵ Best, op. cit., p. 97, citing PRO FO371/23551 F12625/4027/61 Lothian to Halifax 9 December 1939 tel.883.
- ⁴⁶ Best, loc. cit., citing PRO F371/22836 A8712/6041/45 Lothian to Halifax 12 December 1939 tel.894, et. al.
- ⁴⁷ ibid., p. 95, citing PRO FO371/23535 F12663/7457/10 Clark Kerr to Halifax 13 December 1939 tel. 1364.
- ⁴⁸ Shirer, William The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich [London: Pan, 1964] p. 791–792.
- ⁴⁹ Taylor, Telford Munich: The Price of Peace [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1979] p. 903.
- ⁵⁰ Churchill, The Second World War Vol. I The Gathering Storm, op. cit., p. 439.
- ⁵¹ Best, op. cit., p. 100, citing PRO FO371/23698 N7134/57/38 Sargent to Ismay (COS Secretariat) 22 December 1939.
- ⁵² Morgan, Ted. FDR: A Biography [New York: Simon and Schuster, 1985] pp. 325, 403.
- ⁵³ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 236–237.
- ⁵⁴ Cornwell, loc. cit., citing FO, 800/318/6 and CAB, 65/II/159.
- ⁵⁵ Halecki, Oskar & Murray, J.F. Pius XII- Eugene Pacelli, Pope of Peace Revised edition, 1954, p. 161.
- ⁵⁶ ibid., p. 159.
- ⁵⁷ ibid., p. 160.
- ⁵⁸ Lash, Joseph P. Roosevelt & Churchill 1939–1941 [London: Andre Deutsch, 1977] p. 23.
- ⁵⁹ Neuner & Dupius The Christian Faith [Bangalore: Theological Publications of India, 1978] p. 557.
- ⁶⁰ Catholic Almanac 1980, p. 475.
- ⁶¹ Halecki, op. cit., p. 161.
- ⁶² From April 1938 Taylor had been Roosevelt's nominee on the Intergovernmental Committee on Political Refugees and as the president's personal emissary he had been chairman of the 31-nation Evian Conference. In November 1938, only a few months after the virtual failure of that conference and as a reaction to the continuing officially sponsored pogroms against Jews, Roosevelt had withdrawn the United States' Ambassador from Berlin. Hitler naturally responded by withdrawing Germany's ambassador from Washington and trade between the two countries had slumped sharply as a consequence.
- ⁶³ Shirer, op. cit., p. 832.
- ⁶⁴ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 237, citing CAB, 65/II/159.
- ⁶⁵ Best, op. cit., pp. 96–98, citing PRO FO371/24731 F330/103/23 Craigie to Halifax 13 January 1940 tel.39.
- ⁶⁶ ibid., p. 99, citing PRO FO371/25108 W1281/31/49 Criagie to Halifax 23 January 1940 tel. 110.
- ⁶⁷ Kimball, op. cit., p. 32, citing Lord Stamp, Treasury estimates, Hancock and Gowing, British War Economy pp. 106n, 115 and Hall, North American Supply p. 114.
- ⁶⁸ Best, op. cit., p. 97, citing PRO CAB67/4 WP(G)(40)14 'Possibility of United States Cooperation in Preventing Certain Vital Commodities From Reaching Germany, Russia and Japan.' Halifax/Cross memorandum 19 January 1940.
- ⁶⁹ ibid., pp. 98, citing PRO CAB65/5 WM21(40) War Cabinet conclusions 23 January 1940.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁷⁰ Lash, op. cit., p. 22.
- ⁷¹ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 238, citing FO, 800/318/25.
- ⁷² ibid, citing FO, 800/318/36.
- ⁷³ ibid, citing FO, 800/318/34.
- ⁷⁴ ibid.
- ⁷⁵ Stinnett, Robert B., Day of Deceit: The Truth about FDR and Pearl Harbour [New York: Simon & Schuster/The Free Press, 1999] pp. 15–16.
- ⁷⁶ Halecki, op. cit., pp. 131, 148.
- ⁷⁷ Best, op. cit., p. 100, citing PRO WO193/646 COS(40)252 'Military Implications of Hostilities with Russia in 1940' COS memorandum 8 March 1940; PRO FO371/23556 F13005/176/23 Shigemitsu/Butler conversation 21 December 1939, F)371/24724 F2072/23/23 Shigemitsu/Butler conversation 18 March 1940, and FO371/24724 F3017/22/23 Sgigemitsu/Halifax conversation 26 April 1940.
- ⁷⁸ ibid., pp. 100–101, citing PRO FO371/244708 F1429/193/61 Craigie to Halifax 26 February 1940 tel.354; PRO FO371/24843 N3363/30/38 Sargent minute 24 March 1940 and Seymour minute 25 March 1940; and ibid Cadogan minute 25 March 1940 and Halifax minute 27 March 1940, and FO371/24846 N3485/40/38 Butler minute 29 March 1940.
- ⁷⁹ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 238–239, citing, J.S. Conway, "The meeting between Pope Pius XII and Ribbentrop", Historical Papers of the Canadian Historical Association, 1968, 222 and 224.
- ⁸⁰ Yahil, op. cit., p. 161.
- ⁸¹ Best, op. cit., pp. 103–105, citing PRO CAB67/5 WP(G)(40)72 'Soviet-German Trade' Cross memorandum 11 March 1940; CAB65/6 WM68(40) War Cabinet conclusions 14 March 1940; PRO FO371/24732 F2162/103/23 Waley (T) to Howe 29 March 1940, and F2336/103/23 Waley to Leith-Ross (MEW) 29 March 1940.
- ⁸² ibid., p. 168.
- ⁸³ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 239.
- ⁸⁴ Visser 'T Hooft, loc. cit.
- ⁸⁵ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 35–37, citing Blum, From the Morgenthau Diaries, II, 117–20; Breckinridge Long, The War Diary of Breckinridge Long, 1934–1944, ed. Fred Israel (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1966), entry for April 28, 1940, p. 86; and Alsop and Kintner, American White Paper, p. 81.
- ⁸⁶ Best, op. cit. p. 107, citing Barnhart, M., Japan Prepares for Total War: The Search for Economic Security 1919–1941, Ithaca, Cornell Unibversity Press, 1987, p. 183.
- ⁸⁷ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 17.
- ⁸⁸ Roth, Cecil A History of the Jews [New York: Shocken, 1970] p. 395.
- ⁸⁹ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 242, citing O. Chadwick, Britain and the Vatican during the Second World War (Cambridge, 1986), 110.
- ⁹⁰ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 18, citing Richardson, James O., On the Treadmill to Pearl Harbour [Washington, DC, Naval History Division, Department of the Navy, 1973] pp. 324, 326, 327.
- ⁹¹ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 242–243, citing ADSS, I, 442–47.
- ⁹² Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. I The Gathering Storm op. cit., p. 532.
- ⁹³ Twice, in 1926 and again in 1928 Churchill's view that there was no foreseeable threat from either Germany or Japan had persuaded the government to apply its 'ten year rule' that policy making should be based on the assumption that no major war was likely within 10 years. However he changed his attitude towards Germany when Hitler began his climb to power. In October 1930 he told a German diplomat that although Hitler had declared that he had no intention of making a foreign war he (Churchill) was convinced that Hitler or his supporters would seize the first opportunity to resort to arms again. He went on to say that Germany, Britain and France should take concerted action under German leadership against Soviet dumping on the world markets and that he sorely regretted that his proposal for a joint offensive immediately after World War One had not been approved by the British cabinet.
- ⁹⁴ Irving, David Churchill's War (Volume I) The Struggle for Power [Australia: Veritas, 1987] p. 10, 16.
- ⁹⁵ Churchill, Sir Winston S. The Second World War Vol. II Their Finest Hour [London: Reprint Society, 1949] pp. 25–32.
- ⁹⁶ Gilbert, Second World War op. cit., p. 63.
- ⁹⁷ Eade, Charles Churchill by his Contemporaries [London: Hutchinson, 1953] pp. 17–23.
- ⁹⁸ Irving, Churchill's War op. cit., p. 8.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁹⁹ See earlier reference above, chapter 22. David Irving details the development of this relationship in Vol. I of Churchill's War, 'The Struggle for Power', op. cit.
- ¹⁰⁰ Gilbert, Martin Churchill: A Life [London: Heinemann, 1991] p. 165.
- ¹⁰¹ ibid., p. 181.
- ¹⁰² ibid., pp. 429, 434–435.
- ¹⁰³ Irving, Churchill's War, op. cit., pp. 54–61.
- ¹⁰⁴ ibid., p. 405.
- ¹⁰⁵ Eade, op. cit., p. 482, C.E.M. Joad contrib. Churchill the Philosopher.
- ¹⁰⁶ Irving, Churchill's War op. cit., p. 84.
- ¹⁰⁷ ibid., p. 69 & footnote.
- ¹⁰⁸ Bryan, J. III & Charles Murphy The Windsor Story [London: Granada, 1979] p. 356.
- ¹⁰⁹ Irving, Churchill's War op. cit., pp. 14–20.
- ¹¹⁰ Churchill, The Second World War Vol. II Their Finest Hour op. cit., p. 36.
- ¹¹¹ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 243–245, citing The Tablet, August 30, 1941; Chadwick, Britain and the Vatican, 114; and information provided by J.F. Pollard in his paper, "The Vatican and the Wall Street Crash: Bernardino Nogara and Papal Finances in the Early 1930s."
- ¹¹² Churchill, The Second World War Vol. II Their Finest Hour op. cit., pp. 35–36.
- ¹¹³ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 32–33, 42.
- ¹¹⁴ Stinnett, loc. cit.
- ¹¹⁵ Churchill, The Second World War Vol. II Their Finest Hour op. cit., p. 112.
- ¹¹⁶ Churchill, loc. cit.
- ¹¹⁷ Gilbert, Churchill: A Life op. cit. p. 647.
- ¹¹⁸ Gilbert, Second World War op. cit. p. 69.
- ¹¹⁹ Churchill, The Second World War Vol. II Their Finest Hour op. cit., pp. 60–61.
- ¹²⁰ Kimball, op. cit., p. 58.
- ¹²¹ Churchill, The Second World War Vol. II Their Finest Hour op. cit., pp. 62–63.
- ¹²² Irving, Churchill's War op. cit., p. 282.
- ¹²³ Gilbert, Second World War op. cit., p. 70.
- ¹²⁴ ibid., p. 73.
- ¹²⁵ Churchill, The Second World War Vol. II Their Finest Hour op. cit., pp. 112–113.
- ¹²⁶ ibid., pp. 87–89.
- ¹²⁷ ibid., pp. 108–109.
- ¹²⁸ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 44–46.
- ¹²⁹ ibid., pp. 49–51.
- ¹³⁰ Best, op. cit., p. 112, citing PRO FO371/24655 F3392/16/10 Craigie to Halifax 11 June 1940 tel.792.
- ¹³¹ Buss, Claude A. Asia in the Modern World [New York: Macmillan, 1964] p. 422.
- ¹³² Best, op. cit., pp. 107–108, citing PRO FO371/24725 F3284/23/23 Shigemitsu/Butler conversation 11 June 1940, and FO 837/524 vol. 4 Okamoto/Keswick (MEW) conversation 12 June 1940.
- ¹³³ Gilbert, Second World War op. cit. p. 93.
- ¹³⁴ Kimball, op. cit., p. 49.
- ¹³⁵ Gilbert, Second World War op. cit. p. 94.
- ¹³⁶ Kimball, op. cit. p. 75, citing Duncan H. Hall, North American Supply, [London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office and Longmans Green & Co, 1955] pp. 168–169.
- ¹³⁷ Dilks, op. cit., p. 299.
- ¹³⁸ Churchill, The Second World War Vol. II Their Finest Hour, op. cit., p. 182.
- ¹³⁹ Irving, Churchill's War, op. cit., p. 332
- ¹⁴⁰ Kimball, op. cit., p. 57, citing Ickes, The Lowering Clouds, entry for June 15, 1940, p. 209.
- ¹⁴¹ ibid., pp. 52–53.
- ¹⁴² James, Lawrence The Rise and Fall of the British Empire [London: Abacus/Little Brown, 1995] p. 485.
- ¹⁴³ Best, op. cit., p. 112, citing PRO FO371/24725 F3432/23/23 Craigie to Halifax 19 June 1940 tel.1032.
- ¹⁴⁴ ibid., pp. 113–114, citing PRO FO371/24725 F3432/23/23 Craigie to Halifax 22 June 1940 tel.1068.
- ¹⁴⁵ ibid., p. 111.
- ¹⁴⁶ ibid., pp. 114–115.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁴⁷ ibid., p. 108, citing PRO FO837/524 vol. 4 Okamoto/Leith-Ross conversation 28 June 1940.
- ¹⁴⁸ ibid., p. 114, citing PRO FO371/24725 F3465/23/23 Halifax to Lothian 25 June 1940 tel.1262, and Lothian to Halifax 28 June 1940 tel.1163.
- ¹⁴⁹ Kimball, op. cit., p. 57–58, citing Forrest Davis & Ernest K. Lindley, How War Came: An American White Paper: from the Fall of France to Pearl Harbour (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1942), p. 52; and Fleron, The Isolationists and the Foreign Policy of FDR, pp. 224–229, graphs 1–4.
- ¹⁵⁰ The Papal Encyclical and Syllabus, and Dogmatic Decrees of the Vatican Council [London: Bradbury, Agnew; 1875] chapter 4, para. 3, p. 45; chapter 2, para. 1, p. 41.
- ¹⁵¹ Hawes & White, (Editors,) Resistance in Europe 1939 – 1945 [London: Allen Lane, 1975] p. 210. Foot, M.R.D. Contrib. What good did Resistance do?
- ¹⁵² Hitler, Adolf Mein Kampf Trans. Ralph Manheim [London: Hutchinson, 1974] p. 607.
- ¹⁵³ Dawidowicz, Lucy S. The War Against the Jews 1933–1945 [Harmondsworth: Pelican/Penguin, 1977], op. cit., p. 150.
- ¹⁵⁴ Koestler, Arthur Promise and Fulfilment: Palestine 1917–1945 [London: Macmillan, 1983] p. 80.
- ¹⁵⁵ Various sources give different figures. Allen says 136,000 registered and 23,500 served. Gilbert says 26,000 served and provides additional figures thus: USA 555,000; Canada 16,550; South Africa 10,000; Australia and New Zealand 4,222; Britain (additional to those from Palestine) 60,000; France 80,000; the USSR 500,000; Greece 8,000; Yugoslavia 5,000; and Poland 150,000.
- ¹⁵⁶ Allen, Richard Imperialism & Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford, 1974] p. 334.
- ¹⁵⁷ Gilbert, Martin Jewish History Atlas [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1976].
- ¹⁵⁸ Fishman, Priscilla The Jews of the United States [Jerusalem: Keter, 1974] p. 234.
- ¹⁵⁹ Laqueur, Walter A History of Zionism [New York: Schocken, 1976], p. 551.
- ¹⁶⁰ Koestler, op. cit., p. 81.
- ¹⁶¹ Balfour, Michael Propaganda in War 1939–1945 [London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1979] p. 12.
- ¹⁶² ibid., p. 17.
- ¹⁶³ ibid., p. 53.
- ¹⁶⁴ ibid., p. 72.
- ¹⁶⁵ ibid., p. 75.
- ¹⁶⁶ ibid., pp. 148–150.
- ¹⁶⁷ News releases included the first mass execution of Jews in Poland in 1940, the ‘deportation’ of children from Poland in 1943, the trial of 600 Communists in Hungary in 1943, the attempted ‘deportation’ of Jews from Denmark August 1942, horrors uncovered in slaughter camps during the last few weeks of the war, and the murder of Heydrich in 1942.
- ¹⁶⁸ Balfour, op. cit., pp. 299–301.
- ¹⁶⁹ ibid., p. 300.
- ¹⁷⁰ ibid., pp. 148–150.

Chapter 24: Cause for reflection

- ¹ Toland, John Adolf Hitler [New York: Ballantine, 1977] p. 543.
- ² Yahil, Leni. The Holocaust: The Fate of European Jewry, translated Friedman & Galai [New York: Oxford, 1990] pp. 15, 21, 23.
- ³ ibid., p. 26.
- ⁴ ibid., pp. 60, 95–96.
- ⁵ ibid., p. 97.
- ⁶ Gribetz, Judah E., Greenstein, E., & Stein, R. The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994], p. 320.
- ⁷ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 99–101.
- ⁸ Dilks, David (Ed) The Diaries of Sir Alexander Cadogan [London: Cassell, 1971] p. 219.
- ⁹ Zweig, Ronald W. Britain and Palestine during the Second World War [Woodbridge, UK: Boydell, 1986] pp. 57–58, citing C.R.P. (39) 6th meeting, Minutes, CO 733/396/75113/47 (39).
- ¹⁰ ibid., pp. 221–222.
- ¹¹ Cab:6513 wm(40), 139th conclusions, confidential annex cited in Lukacs, The Duel, p. 92, and cited in turn by Kilzer, Churchill's Deception, p. 217.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹² Kilzer, Louis C. Churchill's Deception [New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994] pp. 217.
- ¹³ Churchill, Winston S. The Second World War [London: Reprint Society, 1949] Vol. I, The Gathering Storm, p. 392.
- ¹⁴ Pearl, Cyril The Dunera Scandal [Sydney: Angus & Robertson, 1983] p. 4.
- ¹⁵ ibid., p. 12.
- ¹⁶ ibid., p. 5.
- ¹⁷ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 160–161.
- ¹⁸ Churchill, Winston S. The Second World War [London: Reprint Society, 1949] Vol. II Their Finest Hour, p. 60.
- ¹⁹ ibid., p. 27.
- ²⁰ Zweig, op. cit., pp. 64–67.
- ²¹ ibid., pp. 58–59.
- ²² Lilienthal, Alfred M. The Zionist Connection: what price peace? [New York: Middle East Perspective Inc, 1979] p. 21, quoting Parliamentary Debates, House of Commons, Vol. 326, col. 23330.
- ²³ ibid. quoting The American Zionist, February 5th, 1953.
- ²⁴ ibid. quoting Professor William E. Yale, Document 763.7211/1741, Diplomatic Branch (NNFD) National Archives and Record Service.
- ²⁵ ibid. quoting J.W.V. Temperley, History of the Peace Conference, IV, p. 170.
- ²⁶ ibid., p. 22, quoting David Lloyd-George The Truth about the Peace Treaties [London: Victor Gollancz, 1938] p. 1137.
- ²⁷ ibid.
- ²⁸ ibid., quoting British Command Paper No. 1700, A Survey of Palestine 1945–1946, Vol. I pp. 87–90.
- ²⁹ ibid., p. 23, quoting House of Lords, June 27, 1923, O.R., col. 676.
- ³⁰ Churchill, op. cit. Vol II Their Finest Hour, pp. 116–117, citing Graziani, Ho Difeso la Patria, p. 189.
- ³¹ ibid., p. 108, gives 338,226 troops, the number from Admiralty records, as the total of all British and Allied troops landed in England after evacuation from Dunkirk between May 27 and June 4, 1940. A War Office figure was about 2,000 fewer. During the whole operation about 34,000 British soldiers were captured as prisoners of war, [Gilbert, Martin Second World War [London: Fontana/Collins, 1990], p. 83] and 243 of the 861 ships which ferried troops during the operation were sunk, [Churchill, Volume II, p. 97], some of them crowded with troops, but loss of life was relatively light. The POWs included a few thousand troops who remained as a rearguard to protect the evacuation and then surrendered, on Churchill's orders, to avoid a slaughter if an effort was made to evacuate them under fire at close range. [Gilbert, op. cit., p. 80.] If the evacuation had not been attempted and if Hitler had not ordered the pause in the assault, almost the entire force would have been forced to surrender.
- ³² Shirer, W. L. The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich [London: Pan, 1964], pp. 877–882.
- ³³ ibid., p. 881, citing Liddell Hart, The German Generals Talk, pp. 114–115 (soft cover edition).
- ³⁴ Gilbert, loc. cit., Second World War.
- ³⁵ Churchill, op. cit. Vol II Their Finest Hour pp. 76–77.
- ³⁶ Shirer, op. cit., p. 889, citing Ciano Diaries, p. 266.
- ³⁷ Kilzer, op. cit., pp. 210–214. See also Churchill, Vol II, Their Finest Hour, pp. 76–78 for his perspective.
- ³⁸ ibid., p. 221.
- ³⁹ Pearl, op. cit., p. 8.
- ⁴⁰ Kimball, Warren F. (Ed) Churchill and Roosevelt: The Complete Correspondence [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1964] Vol I, pp. 58, 79.
- ⁴¹ ibid., p. 67.
- ⁴² ibid., p. 58.
- ⁴³ Shirer, op. cit., p. 897.
- ⁴⁴ Irving, David Churchill's War, Vol. I The Struggle for Power [Australia: Veritas, 1987] p. 334.
- ⁴⁵ Kilzer, loc. cit.
- ⁴⁶ Shirer, op. cit., p. 887.
- ⁴⁷ At the time of writing the author understands that the contents of the 'flash' message have still not been released.
- ⁴⁸ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 62–63, 71.
- ⁴⁹ Best, Antony Britain, Japan & Pearl Harbour: Avoiding War in East Asia 1936–1941 [London: Routledge, 1995], p. 108, citing PRO FO837/524 vol. 4 Okamoto/Leith-Ross conversation 28 June 1940.
- ⁵⁰ ibid., p. 115, citing PRO CAB66/9 WP(40)234 'Policy in the Far East' Halifax memorandum 29 June 1940.
- ⁵¹ Churchill, op. cit., Vol II Their Finest Hour, p. 151.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- 52 Stinnett, Robert B., Day of Deceit: The Truth about FDR and Pearl Harbour [New York: Simon & Schuster/The Free Press, 1999] p. 16.
- 53 Best, op. cit., p. 116, citing PRO CAB79/5 COS(40) 207th meeting 4 July 1940; CAB65/8 WM194(40) War Cabinet conclusions 5 July 1940; PRO CAB79/5 COS(40) 209th meeting 5 July 1940 Annex 2 Ismay to Bruce 4 July 1940.
- 54 Best, loc. cit., citing PRO FO371/24666 F3544/43/10 Craigie to Halifax 3 July 1940 tel.1149, and 4 July tels. 1154, 1156, 1158.
- 55 ibid.
- 56 Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel: from the rise of Zionism to our time. [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1981] p. 228.
- 57 Nafi, Basheer M. The Arabs and the Axis: 1933–1940 [Arab Studies Quarterly, Vol. 19 No. 2, Spring 1997], source: MSA News July 31, 1999, <http://msanews.mynet.net/> citing Salah al-Din al-Sabbagh (Rabat: Tanit li al-Nashr, 1994) 131.
- 58 ibid., p. 14
- 59 Kilzer, op. cit., pp. 229–234.
- 60 Kimball, op. cit., p. 75.
- 61 Stinnett, op. cit., p. 18, citing Richardson, James O., On the Treadmill to Pearl Harbour [Washington, DC, Naval History Division, Department of the Navy, 1973] pp. 319, 384.
- 62 Kimball, op. cit., p. 58, citing Harold D. Smith Papers (Franklin D. Roosevelt Library, Hyde Park, New York) July 9, 1940.
- 63 Bryan J & Charles Murphy The Windsor Story [London: Granada/Panther, 1979] pp. 450–458.
- 64 ibid., p. 483.
- 65 ibid., p. 492.
- 66 ibid., p. 495.
- 67 ibid., pp. 498–508.
- 68 ibid., pp. 524–525.
- 69 ibid., p. 526.
- 70 ibid., pp. 530–532.
- 71 Irving David Hitler's War Vol I [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1977] p. 144.
- 72 Best, op. cit., p. 121, citing PRO FO371/24725 F3465/23/23 Craigie to Halifax 14 July 1940 tel.1241.
- 73 Best, loc. cit., citing Churchill to Halifax 20 July 1940, in Winston Churchill papers, Churchill College, Cambridge, CHAR20/13.
- 74 Irving, Hitler's War, Vol I, op. cit., pp. 146–147.
- 75 Best, op. cit., p. 118, PRO CAB65/8 WM199(40) War Cabinet conclusions 10 July 1940, and FO371/24667 F3606/43/10 Craigie to Hailifax 17 July 1940 tel.1277.; K. Sato, Japan and Britain at the Crossroads 1939–1941: A Study in the Dilemmas of Japanese Diplomacy, (Tokyo, Senshu University Press, 1986) pp. 65–6.
- 76 Kimball, op. cit., p. 63, citing James F. Byrnes, All in One Lifetime (new York: Harper and Brothers, 1958), p. 113; Hall, North American Supply, pp. 247–248.
- 77 Best, op. cit., p. 119, citing PRO FO371/24667 F3606/43/10 Lothian to Halifax 16 July 1940 tel. 1402, and Gage (FE Dept) minute 20 July 1940.
- 78 ibid., pp. 119–120, citing PRO FO371/24741 F3634/677/23 Lothian to Halifax 19 July 1940 tel.1425; Ashley Clarke (FE Dept) minute, and Churchill minute to Ismay 21 July 1940.
- 79 Irving loc. cit.
- 80 Irving, Churchill's War, Vol I, op. cit., p. 369.
- 81 Shirer, op. cit., p. 904.
- 82 Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit.
- 83 Shirer, loc. cit.
- 84 Toland, op. cit., p. 850.
- 85 Irving, Churchill's War, Vol I, loc. cit.
- 86 Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 111.
- 87 Toland, op. cit., p. 851.
- 88 Best, op. cit., p. 122, citing PRO FO371/24708 FO3633/193/61 Butler minute 25 July 1940.
- 89 Kimball, op. cit., p. 67.
- 90 Bryan & Murphy, op. cit., p. 538.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁹¹ Shirer, op. cit., p. 954.
- ⁹² Churchill, op. cit., Vol. II Their Finest Hour, p. 412.
- ⁹³ Boegner Marc The Long Road to Unity [London: Collins, 1970] p. 156.
- ⁹⁴ ibid., pp. 176–177.
- ⁹⁵ ibid., p. 157.
- ⁹⁶ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 108.
- ⁹⁷ Ministers from each of the former Czechoslovak, Polish and Dutch governments set up provisional governments in exile in London following German occupation of their countries.
- ⁹⁸ Best, op. cit., pp. 123, 124, citing PRO FO371/24738 F3680/653/23 Craigie to Halifax 30 July 1940 tel.1373, and CAB65/8 WM217(40) War Cabinet conclusions 1 August 1940.
- ⁹⁹ Churchill, op.cit., Vol II Their Finest Hour, pp. 218–219.
- ¹⁰⁰ Best, op. cit., p. 124, citing PRO CAB65/8 WM220(40) War Cabinet conclusions 6 August 1940; PRO FO371/24733 F3900/103/23 Interdepartmental meeting 14 August 1940.
- ¹⁰¹ Churchill, op. cit., Vol. II Their Finest Hour, pp. 328–329.
- ¹⁰² Irving, Churchill's War, pp. 394–395.
- ¹⁰³ Churchill, op. cit., Vol II Their Finest Hour, pp. 414–415.
- ¹⁰⁴ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 253–254.
- ¹⁰⁵ Irving, Hitler's War, p. 147.
- ¹⁰⁶ Nafi, op. cit., p. 16 citing: Haddad, Harakat Rashid Ali, 29–31, and noting textual differences between two versions of the proposed declaration; Edmonds to Newton, 3 February 1941, enclosure of Newton to Baxter, 10 February 1941, FO 371/27062/E 815; Haddad, Harakat Rashid Ali, 37–49; Hirszowicz, The Third Reich and the Arab East, 86–90.
- ¹⁰⁷ Irving, Churchill's War, pp. 406–407.
- ¹⁰⁸ Best, op. cit., p. 126, citing PRO CAB81/98 JIC(40)263 'Exchange of Information with the United States Authorities' Edwards (JIC Secretary) note 1 September 1940.
- ¹⁰⁹ Irving, Churchill's War, p. 397.
- ¹¹⁰ ibid., p. 394.
- ¹¹¹ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 17.
- ¹¹² Gabler, Neal An Empire of Their Own [New York: Crown, 1998]., p. 345.
- ¹¹³ ibid., p. 344.
- ¹¹⁴ 'The Dunera Scandal' is the title of Cyril Pearl's record of the incident published by Angus and Robertson, Sydney, 1983.
- ¹¹⁵ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 24.
- ¹¹⁶ Irving, Churchill's War, op.cit., p. 418.
- ¹¹⁷ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 40.
- ¹¹⁸ Irving, Churchill's War, loc. cit.
- ¹¹⁹ Kimball, op. cit., p. 75, citing Wayne S. Cole, America First: The Battle Against Intervention, 1940–1941 (Maddison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1953) pp. 39–42.
- ¹²⁰ Best, op. cit., p. 126, citing PRO FO371/24709 F4290/193/61 Lothian to Halifax 16 September 1940 tel.2027.
- ¹²¹ Churchill, op.cit.,Vol II Their Finest Hour, p. 415.
- ¹²² Best, op. cit., p. 154, citing Hankey affidavit for Shigemitsu, Defence Exhibit 3547, in R.J. Pritchard and S.M. Zaide (eds), The Tokyo War Crimes Trials, Vol. XIV (22 vols), New York, Garland, 1981, pp. 34512–3.
- ¹²³ Irving, Churchill's War, op. cit., pp. 308, 383.
- ¹²⁴ ibid., p. 309.
- ¹²⁵ ibid., p. 383.
- ¹²⁶ Allen, Richard Imperialism & Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford, 1974] p. 336.
- ¹²⁷ Best, op. cit., p. 128, citing PRO FO371/24710 F4770/193/61 Butler minute 18 September 1940, and F4772/193/61 'The Possibility of a general Far Eastern settlement' Sterndale Bennett memorandum 25 September 1940.
- ¹²⁸ Shirer, op. cit., p. 954.
- ¹²⁹ ibid., p. 960.
- ¹³⁰ Gribetz, et. al., op. cit., p. 434.
- ¹³¹ Yahil, op.cit., pp. 615–617.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹³² Tokayer, Marvin & Mary Swartz The Fugu Plan [New York: Paddington Press, 1979] pp. 52–53. The name Fugu Plan was coined from the name of a Japanese blow fish with poisonous glands which must be removed very carefully in the preparation of an especially tasty dish.
- ¹³³ ibid., p. 51.
- ¹³⁴ ibid., p. 53.
- ¹³⁵ ibid., pp. 52–56.
- ¹³⁶ ibid., p. 62.
- ¹³⁷ ibid., p. 56.
- ¹³⁸ ibid., pp. 56–59.
- ¹³⁹ ibid., p. 60.
- ¹⁴⁰ ibid., p. 73.
- ¹⁴¹ ibid., pp. 68–69.
- ¹⁴² ibid., p. 66.
- ¹⁴³ ibid., p. 77.
- ¹⁴⁴ ibid., p. 67, 76.
- ¹⁴⁵ ibid., p. 78.
- ¹⁴⁶ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 253–254.
- ¹⁴⁷ Best, op. cit., pp. 126–127.
- ¹⁴⁸ ibid., p. 127, citing PRO FO371/24729 F4634/60/23 Churchill to Halifax 4 October 1940 M.161.
- ¹⁴⁹ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 10, citing message Churchill to Roosevelt, October 4, 1940, quoted in Kimball, op.cit., p. 74.
- ¹⁵⁰ Churchill, op.cit.Vol. II Their Finest Hour, p. 416.
- ¹⁵¹ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 28, citing The New York Times, October 4, 1940, an article by Herbert L. Matthews.
- ¹⁵² ibid., pp. 8–14.
- ¹⁵³ McCollum, Arthur, Memorandum to the Director, the Office of US Naval Intelligence, October 7, 1940, located in Box 6 of a special US Navy collection in RG 38 in the Military Reference Branch of Archives II, January 24, 1995, and reproduced in full in Stinnett, op. cit., Appendix A, pp. 262–268. The number of the clause from which each extract is taken is placed in [brackets] at the end of each extract.
- ¹⁵⁴ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 10, citing the New York Times, October 9, 1940, p. 1.
- ¹⁵⁵ ibid., pp. 10–11, citing Richardson, Treadmill, pp. 427, 435.
- ¹⁵⁶ Churchill, op. cit.,Vol. II Their Finest Hour, p. 422, quoting from Hitler and Mussolini: Letters and Documents, p. 61.
- ¹⁵⁷ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 262, cites M. Carroll (sic), [Michael O'Carroll] Greatness Dishonoured (Dublin, 1980), p. 14. Although the subject of Tisserant's comment may be disputed it is reasonable to accept that he was referring to the Vatican policy of gratuitously supplanting other Christian churches wherever the opportunity arose, as in Ethiopia previously and now in Eastern Europe.
- ¹⁵⁸ ibid.
- ¹⁵⁹ ibid., p. 248.
- ¹⁶⁰ Churchill, op.cit., Vol. II Their Finest Hour, p. 423.
- ¹⁶¹ Nafi, op. cit., p. 16, citing DGFP, Series D, vol. X, pp. 320–1.
- ¹⁶² Best, op. cit., pp. 132–137.
- ¹⁶³ Kimball, op. cit., p. 87.
- ¹⁶⁴ Allen, op. cit., p. 339.
- ¹⁶⁵ Churchill got his way on both issues and the dire consequences which Wavell anticipated did not eventuate.
- ¹⁶⁶ Zweig, op. cit., pp. 70–75.
- ¹⁶⁷ Grosser, Paul, & Edwin Halperin Anti-Semitism: the causes and effects of a prejudice [Secaucus, NJ: Lyle Stuart/Citadel Press, 1979] p. 262, citing Martin Broszat et.al. Anatomy of the SS State [Cambridge: Wm. Collins and Sons, 1968] pp. 55–57.
- ¹⁶⁸ Churchill, op. cit., Vol. II Their Finest Hour; p. 439, quotes the Republican psidential candidate, Wendell Wilkie, as saying on November 2, 1940: "All of us – Republicans, Democrats and Independents – believe in giving aid to the heroic British people. We must make available to them the products of our industry."
- ¹⁶⁹ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 84, 94.
- ¹⁷⁰ ibid., p. 85, citing FR, 1940, III, 16–18.
- ¹⁷¹ Gribetz, et.al., op. cit., p. 435.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁷² After the war an effort was made to revive the BiraBidzhan scheme, with 6,326 Jewish migrants arriving in the three years 1946–48.* In fact some refugees from Poland and the three Baltic States may have been placed there against their wishes in 1939 because Yahil notes that some of the 300,000 Jewish refugees from the occupied territories “were evacuated immediately by the Russians to the interior of Russia and to distant regions.” She does not name the regions. She then notes that: “The great majority rejected the alternative held out to them, namely, to accept Soviet nationality, which would have obliged the younger men to enlist in the Red Army. They feared being banned in perpetuity from leaving the Soviet Union and returning to their homes in Poland.”# * Kochan, Lionel (Ed) The Jews in Soviet Russia Since 1917 [London: Oxford University Press, 1978] pp. 74,75. # Yahil, op. cit., p. 260.
- ¹⁷³ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 160–169.
- ¹⁷⁴ McEvedy, Colin and Richard Jones, Penguin Atlas of World Population History [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1978] p. 288.
- ¹⁷⁵ Compiled from tables in Ellis, John World War II: A Statistical Survey [New York: Facts on File, 1993] pp. 227–228.
- ¹⁷⁶ Irving, Churchills War, op. cit., p. 449.
- ¹⁷⁷ Toland, op. cit., p. 886.
- ¹⁷⁸ Churchill, op.cit., Vol II Their Finest Hour, p. 423.
- ¹⁷⁹ Best, op.cit., p. 137, citing PRO FO371/24674 F4817/57/10 Clark Kerr to Halifax 19 October 1940 tel.141, and F4999/57/10 Clark Kerr to Halifax 4 November 1940 tel.165.
- ¹⁸⁰ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 92–93, citing Ickes, The Lowering Clouds, entry for Nov. 9, 1940, p. 367, and indicating related references.
- ¹⁸¹ ibid., pp. 94–95, citing Matloff and Snell, Strategic Planning, p. 28; and Leighton and Oakley, Global Logistics, p. 43.
- ¹⁸² Toland, op. cit., pp. 883–884.
- ¹⁸³ Best, op. cit., p. 137, citing PRO FO371/24674 F5210/57/10 Clark Kerr to Halifax 19 November 1940 tel.202.
- ¹⁸⁴ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 29–30.
- ¹⁸⁵ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 246–248.
- ¹⁸⁶ Toland, op. cit., p. 884.
- ¹⁸⁷ Best, op. cit., p. 136, citing Churchill to Alexander and Pound 22 November 1940 M.333, Winston Churchill Papers, Churchill College, Cambridge, CHAR20/13.
- ¹⁸⁸ ibid., pp. 135–136, citing PRO FO371/24711 F5359/193/61 Halifax to Alexander 26 November 1940, and Alexander to Halifax 29 November 1940. [In the text Best dates Halifax’ note as November 23, while the date given for the document cited is three days later. As the discrepancy does not affect the sequence of events, it appears to be of no significance.].
- ¹⁸⁹ Kimball, op. cit., p. 96, citing Wheeler-Bennett, King George VI, p. 521.
- ¹⁹⁰ ibid., pp. 97–103.
- ¹⁹¹ Best, op. cit., pp. 138–139.
- ¹⁹² ibid., p. 138, citing P. Lowe, Great Britain and the Origins of the Pacific War: A study of British Policy in East Asia, 1937–1941, Oxford, Clarendon, 1977, pp. 208–216; and PRO FO371/24693 F5415/230/10 Halifax to Clark Kerr 9 December 1940 tel.294.
- ¹⁹³ Ike, Nobutaka (Ed) Japan’s Decision for War, Records of the 1941 Policy Conference [Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1967] p. xx.
- ¹⁹⁴ ibid., p. xxi.
- ¹⁹⁵ Zweig, op. cit., p. 124.
- ¹⁹⁶ Best, op. cit., p. 154, citing PRO FO371/27901 F234/27/23 Halifax to Lloyd 17 December 1940.
- ¹⁹⁷ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 90–93, with the Acting Consul-General’s message in de-coded form reproduced in full on p. 93. Source: Pearl Harbour Report Part 12, p. 255.
- ¹⁹⁸ Kimball, op. cit., p. 191.
- ¹⁹⁹ Best, op. cit., p. 140, citing PRO WO208/892 COIS Singapore to DNI 23 January 1941 tel.0826Z/23.
- ²⁰⁰ Gilbert, Second World War, p. 154.
- ²⁰¹ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 30–32, citing: letter Bishop to Stinnett, September 19, 1988; telegram # 125 Grew to State Department, received 6.38 AM Monday, January 27, 1941 (EST) in PHPT 14 (Pearl Harbour Report part No.), p. 1042; the McCollum despatch, approved by Captain Jules James, interim ONI Director, dictated January 31, 1941, and transmitted to Admiral Kimmel on February 1, 1941; confidential file, serial 09716, OP16–F2 in RG 38, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ²⁰² ibid., p. 33, citing Richardson, Treadmill, pp. 402–403, 420.
- ²⁰³ ibid., p. 23.
- ²⁰⁴ ibid., pp. 28–29 and Appendix D, citing a “Foreign Office Secret” memorandum dated January 30, 1941, Station US Papers, RG 38, Modern Military Branch, Archives II, reproduced in full on page 299.
- ²⁰⁵ Nafi, op. cit., pp. 16–17.
- ²⁰⁶ Best, op. cit., p. 141, citing PRO CAB81/100 JIC(41)55 ‘Japanese Intentions’ JIC Report 5 January 1941.
- ²⁰⁷ Best, loc. cit., citing PRO WO208/855 Summary of Intelligence 5 February to 25 February 1941, entries for 5 and 6 February, MI2c undated report; PRO CAB66/15 WP(41)28 ‘The Asaka Maru’ Eden memorandum 8 February 1941.
- ²⁰⁸ Dilks, op. cit., p. 353, entry for February 6, 1941.
- ²⁰⁹ Best, op. cit., p. 143, citing PRO WO208/855 Chapman and Mackenzie (MI2c) minutes 16 May 1941.
- ²¹⁰ ibid., pp. 143–148.
- ²¹¹ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 9–10, citing PHPT 16–2150 and PHPT 33, p. 1203; B. Mitchell Simpson, III, Admiral Harold R. Stark (University of South Carolina Press, 1989), pp. 101, 102.
- ²¹² ibid., p. 9., citing memorandum Stark to Kimmell, February 10, 1941, PHPT 33–1197; and Kimmell to Stark, February 18, 1941, PHPT 33–1199.
- ²¹³ ibid., citing Simpson, Admiral Harold R. Stark, pp. 101–102.
- ²¹⁴ Toland, op. cit., p. 891.
- ²¹⁵ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 38, citing Kimmel to Stark and Stark to Kimmel, PHPT 4, p. 1792.
- ²¹⁶ ibid., p. 80, citing OPNAV Secret 281500, March 25, 1941, RG 38, Station US papers, MMRB Archives II.
- ²¹⁷ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 224–225.
- ²¹⁸ Churchill, op. cit., Vol. II Their Finest Hour, p. 452.
- ²¹⁹ Roosevelt’s earlier promise to Churchill, noted by Kimball, op. cit. p., 220.

²²⁰ Lend Lease Bill voting patterns (including absent members on the basis of their stated voting intentions)

House	Yes	Per cent	No	Per cent	Total
Democrats	236	90	25	10	261
Republicans	24	15	135	85	159
Others	0	0	5	100	5
Total	260	61	165	39	425
Senate
Democrats	51	78	14	22	65
Republicans	10	36	18	64	28
Other	1	50	1	50	2
Total	61	66	32	34	95

[Source: Kimball, op. cit., pp. 207, 217.]

- ²²¹ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 233, 241.
- ²²² Toland, op. cit., pp. 887–888.
- ²²³ Shirer, op. cit., p. 993, citing Halder affidavit, November 22, 1945, at Nuremberg, NCA, VIII, pp. 645–646.
- ²²⁴ Tokayer, op. cit., pp. 139–143.

²²⁵ Refugee movements at Kobe

Month	Arrivals	Departures	Increase in Kobe	Net in Kobe
Dec ‘40	198	91	107	107
Jan ‘41	356	236	120	227
Feb ‘41	969	147	822	104
Mar ‘41	805	182	623	1672
Apr ‘41	285]
May ‘41	114] [three months: 464]
Jun ‘41	65]
Three-month departures: Somewhat more than total arrivals of				464
Three-month increase				about 836
Net balance in Kobe				1300

[Figures extracted from Tokayer, op. cit., pp. 165, 183, 187, 188. Note: the figures do not tally due to the circumstances of the time. The earlier figures may be reasonably accurate but the later figures are vague and indicative only.]

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ²²⁶ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 248.
- ²²⁷ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 1040–1046.
- ²²⁸ Toland, op. cit., pp. 893–896.
- ²²⁹ Best, op. cit., pp. 155–157.
- ²³⁰ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 249–250, citing a quotation in C. Falconi, The Silence of Pius XII, Eng. Trans. (London, 1970), 266.
- ²³¹ ibid., pp. 248–249.
- ²³² ibid., pp. 250, 253, quoting from Falconi, Silence, 273.
- ²³³ ibid., pp. 250–251.
- ²³⁴ ibid., p. 250, citing J. Steinberg, All or Nothing (London, 1990), 179–80.
- ²³⁵ Bullock, Alan. Hitler and Stalin: Parallel Lives [London: HarperCollins/Fontana, 1993] p. 775, citing documents on German Foreign Policy, 1918–1945, (DGFP), D.XII, no. 333.
- ²³⁶ Buss, Claude A. Asia in the Modern World [New York: Macmillan, 1964], p. 428.
- ²³⁷ Shirer, op. cit., footnote to p. 1047, citing Robert E. Sherwood, Roosevelt and Hopkins, p. 291.
- ²³⁸ ibid., pp. 1050–1, citing Fuhrer Conferences on Naval Affairs (FCNA), 1941, p. 47 (April 20, 1941).
- ²³⁹ ibid., p. 1047, citing FCNA 1941, pp. 47–48.
- ²⁴⁰ ibid.
- ²⁴¹ Ike, op. cit., p. xxii.
- ²⁴² Sachar, op. cit., p. 228.
- ²⁴³ Best, op. cit., p. 147.
- ²⁴⁴ Best, op. cit., p. 146, citing PRO CAB69/2 DO(41) 21st meeting 30 April 1941 and 22nd meeting, May 1941.
- ²⁴⁵ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 79.
- ²⁴⁶ Tokayer, op. cit., pp. 167–181.
- ²⁴⁷ Irving, op. cit., Churchill's War, pp. 554–556.
- ²⁴⁸ Basra was also the site proposed by the United States for a direct supply base for Lend Lease equipment, and no doubt with an eye to future interest in the region, even though it was still officially neutral.
- ²⁴⁹ Irving, op. cit., Churchill's War, p. 551.
- ²⁵⁰ Bullock, op. cit., p. 775, citing Schulenburg to Berlin, 7 and 12 May 1941, DGFP,D.XII, nos 468 and 505.
- ²⁵¹ Kilzer, op. cit., p. 257.
- ²⁵² Dिल्s, op. cit., pp. 376–388, entries for May 11 to June 17.
- ²⁵³ Controversy was subsequently triggered by conflicting evidence which suggests quite strongly that it was not Hess who faced the court but a person who had been substituted for him to help ensure that the facts would never become public. See Kilzer, op. cit., pp. 287–290.
- ²⁵⁴ Best, op. cit., pp. 147–148, citing CAB81/102 JIC(41)207 'Rumours of a Military Nature Intended to Mystify and Mislead the Enemy' Secretary's note 12 May 1941; PRO HSI/333 D/Q9 to A.D/Ai 3 June 1941; and HSI/340 SOE to Craigie 23 July 1941 tel.723.
- ²⁵⁵ Bullock, op. cit., p. 775.
- ²⁵⁶ Manhattan, Avro, Catholic Imperialism and World Freedom [London: Watts, 1952] p. 264.
- ²⁵⁷ Shirer, op. cit., p. 1009, citing Nazi-Soviet Relations, documents from the files of the German Foreign Office (NSR) p. 330.
- ²⁵⁸ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 252.
- ²⁵⁹ Best, op. cit., p. 158, citing PRO FO371/27833 F4345/1732/61 Craigie to Eden 22 May 1941 tel.842.
- ²⁶⁰ ibid., p. 168, citing PRO FO371/27880 F4187/12/23 Halifax to Eden 17 May 1941 tel.2221, Eden to Halifax 21 May 1941 tel.2727, and FO371/27909 F4430/86/23 Halifax to Eden 24 May 1941 tel.2343.
- ²⁶¹ Sachar, op. cit., p. 233.
- ²⁶² Irving, Churchill's War, op. cit., p. 566.
- ²⁶³ Buss, op. cit., p. 434.
- ²⁶⁴ Churchill, Winston S. The Second World War Vol III The Grand Alliance [London: Reprint Society, 1950] pp. 204–215.
- ²⁶⁵ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 178.
- ²⁶⁶ Irving, Hitler's War, op. cit., p. 259.
- ²⁶⁷ Best, op. cit., pp. 155–157, citing PRO FO371/28020 F4737/4564/23 Shigemitsu/Butler conversation 30 May 1941.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- 268 Dilks, op. cit., pp. 381–382 Cadogan's entry for May 30, 1941.
- 269 ibid., entry for May 31, 1941.
- 270 ibid., p. 385, diary entry for June 2.
- 271 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 266.
- 272 Engler, Robert The Politics of Oil [New York: Macmillan, 1961] pp. 199–201.
- 273 O'Connor, Richard The Oil Barons [Boston: Little Brown, 1972] p. 340.
- 274 Lewy, Guenter, The Catholic Church & Nazi Germany [New York: McGraw Hill, 1964], p. 297.
- 275 Dilks, op. cit., pp. 386–387.
- 276 Bullock, op. cit., p. 777.
- 277 ibid., p. 778.
- 278 Stinnett, op. cit., p. 69, citing Oshima message number 691 to Tokyo, Saturday, June 14, 1941, in The Magic Background of Pearl Harbour, Vol. II, p. A-335, item 659 and item 660 of June 18, 1941. According to the White House Usher Book, FDRL, Beardall saw Roosevelt at 11.38 AM.
- 279 Best, op. cit., p. 158, citing: for Churchill, CAB69/2 DO(41) 30th meeting 15 May 1941; for Sugiyama Gen, Ike, Japan's Decision for War, op.cit., pp. 53–56.
- 280 O'Carroll, Michael Pius XII Greatness Dishonoured [Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1980] p. 16, (reference to statements by Freidrich Heer in 'The Commonweal', February 28th, 1964).
- 281 Toland, op. cit., p. 917.
- 282 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., pp. 298–299.
- 283 Best, op. cit., p. 163, citing PRO ADM199/1474 DNI to C/S Singapore 21 June 1941. Tel. 2313B/21.
- 284 Bullock, op. cit., p. 785, quoting a reference to General Voronov, Deputy Commissar of Defence.
- 285 Kilzer, op. cit., p. 223.
- 286 Lewy, op. cit., p. 253.
- 287 Lapidé, Pinchas The Last Three Popes and the Jews [London: Souvenir Press, 1967], p. 240.
- 288 Manhattan, op. cit., pp. 264–265.
- 289 Conway, J.S. The Nazi Persecution of the Churches 1933–45 [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1968], p. 277.
- 290 Ultramontanism and the Vatican's political influence became an important factor again in East-West relations in 1997 with the framing of new Freedom of Religion laws in Russia and the failure of talks between the Russian Orthodox Church and the Vatican. But this time the reigning US President, Clinton, and his administration found it to their advantage to support the Vatican.
- 291 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 264–265.
- 292 Bullock, op. cit. p. 782.
- 293 Shirer, op. cit., pp. 1047–1048, citing N.D. NG-3437, Document Book VIII-B, Weizsacker Case.
- 294 Best, op. cit., p. 162, citing PRO WO193/866 DMI to CIGS 25 June 1941, and CAB79/12 COS(41) 224th meeting 25 June 1941.
- 295 Bullock, op. cit., p. 786, citing Alex de Jonge, Stalin, p. 460.
- 296 ibid., pp. 785–786, citing Mikoyan's Memoirs in Politicheskoe obrazovanie 1988, no, 9., p. 75, gives the date of Ribbentrop's appeal to Matsuoka as July 1, three days later than the date given by Shirer. It could be that there were approaches made on both dates because there was certainly a later approach as well.
- 297 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 314.
- 298 Gilbert, op. cit., Second World War, pp. 205, 207.
- 299 ibid., pp. 204–205.
- 300 Shirer, op. cit., pp. 1047–1048, citing N.D. NG-3437, Document Book VIII-B, Weizsacker Case.
- 301 Best, op. cit., p. 162, citing PRO ADM199/1474 DNI to C/S Singapore 4 July 1941 tel.2222B/4.
- 302 ibid., p. 160.
- 303 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, loc.cit.
- 304 ibid., pp. 315–316.
- 305 Gilbert, op. cit., Second World War, p. 206.
- 306 Best, op. cit., p. 163, citing PRO FO371/27881 F6101/12/23 Eden to Halifax 13 July 1941 tel.4016.
- 307 Shirer, op. cit., p. 1048, citing Text of telegram, NCA, VI, pp. 564–65 (N.D. 2896–PS).
- 308 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 308, from his memo to the First Lord of the Admiralty and the First Sea Lord, July 10, 1941.
- 309 ibid., p. 309, from his draft declaration set out in a memo to Ambassador Cripps for Stalin, July 10, 1941.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³¹⁰ ibid., p. 317–318.
- ³¹¹ ibid., p. 299.
- ³¹² Bullock, op. cit., pp. 528–529, citing Robert Conquest, The Great Terror: A Re-assessment [London, 1990] p. 450. The top ranking officers, administrators and policy makers purged were: Soviet marshals, 3 of 5; army commanders, 13 of 15; fleet admirals and admirals grade I, 8 of 9; corps commanders, 50 of 57; divisional commanders, 154 of 186; army political commissars, 16 of 16; corps commissars, 25 of 28; divisional commissars, 58 of 64; vice-commissars of defence, 11 of 11; members of the Supreme Military Soviet, 98 of 108.
- ³¹³ Bullock, op. cit., pp. 529–530.
- ³¹⁴ ibid., p. 543, citing Robert Conquest, Excess Deaths and Camp Numbers, in Soviet Studies, Vol. 43, No. 5, 1991.
- ³¹⁵ McEvedy & Jones, op. cit., p. 82. The annexations lifted the population of the Soviet Union to 194 million, and by the time of the invasion it had risen by natural increase and refugee migration to 200 million.
- ³¹⁶ Ellis, op. cit., p. 253.
- ³¹⁷ Zernov, Nicolas The Russians and Their Church [London: SPCK, 1978] p. 163.
- ³¹⁸ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III, The Grand Alliance, op. cit., Chapter XX The Soviet Nemesis.
- ³¹⁹ ibid., p. 301.
- ³²⁰ Conway, op. cit., p. 279.
- ³²¹ ibid., p. 285, quoting Table Talk.
- ³²² Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 340.
- ³²³ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 250–251, citing a quotation in J. Steinberg, All or Nothing (London, 1990), p. 276.
- ³²⁴ ibid., p. 261, quoting from W. Jochmann, ed., Adolf Hitler: Monologue in Führerhauptquartier, 1941–1944 (Hamburg, 1980), 41.
- ³²⁵ Gilbert, op. cit., Second World War, p. 212.
- ³²⁶ Best, op. cit., p. 163, citing PRO FO837/534 Vol. 4 Leith-Ross (MEW) minute 14 July 1941; PRO CAB79/12 COS(41) 246th meeting 15 July 1941; and FO371/27764 F6606/9/61 Churchill to Eden and Ismay 16 July 1941 M.745/1.
- ³²⁷ According to Churchill (Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 341), while the Japanese landing was in progress on the 24th, Roosevelt asked the Japanese government to “neutralise” Indochina and withdraw its troops as a prelude to a general settlement. However in his comprehensive treatment of the crisis, Antony Best make no mention of such an approach and Churchill does not indicate the Japanese government's response.
- ³²⁸ Bullock, op. cit., p. 788, citing Volkogonov, D.A., Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, trans. Harold Shukman [London, 1991] pp. 412–413; and referring to statements by Mikoyan, Khrushchev and Stramenov.
- ³²⁹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 316.
- ³³⁰ ibid., pp. 316–317.
- ³³¹ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 1121.22.
- ³³² Yahil, op. cit., pp. 254–255, citing IMT, 26, PS-710, pp. 266f; DOH, p. 233.
- ³³³ ibid., pp. 254–256.
- ³³⁴ ibid., p. 130, citing Urteil gegen Karl Wolff, 30.9.1964, YVSA, TR-10/636, pp. 68ff.
- ³³⁵ Toland, op. cit., p. 961.
- ³³⁶ Dawidowicz, Lucy S. The War Against the Jews 1933–1945 [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1987], p. 152.
- ³³⁷ ibid., p. 164.
- ³³⁸ Yahil, op. cit., p. 249, citing Hans A. Jacobsen, “Kommissarbefehl und Massenexekutionen sowjetischer Kriegsgefangener,” in Helmut Krausnick et al., Anatomie des SS Staates (Olten, Switz., 1965), vol.2, pp. 198–201. See also DOH, p. 375.
- ³³⁹ Dawidowicz, op. cit., p. 142.
- ³⁴⁰ Hawes, & White (Eds.) Resistance in Europe 1939–1945 [London: Allen Lane, 1975], p. 149, Contribution by Williams, Anthony: Resistance & Opposition Among Germans.
- ³⁴¹ Lewy, op. cit., p. 266.
- ³⁴² Toland, op. cit., p. 959.
- ³⁴³ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 10, citing US Naval Attaché Tokyo Confidential Serial 220230 of August 23, 1941, RG 38, Station US papers release of January 1995, Archives II. A copy of Japan's protest was forwarded to Roosevelt. Also, the Bungo Strait Report, Serial 220230, loc cit.
- ³⁴⁴ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 263, citing Falconi, Silence, pp. 125–126.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- 345 Best, op. cit., p. 167, citing PRO CAB69/2 54th meetings 5, 7, and 8 August respectively, CAB 120/25 Atlee to Churchill 9 August 1941 tel.23 (Abbey), and Menzies to Churchill 12 August 1941 tel.34 (Abbey).
- 346 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 346.
- 347 Wilmot, Chester The Struggle for Europe [London: Collins, 1967].
- 348 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., pp. 252–253.
- 349 Wilmot, op. cit., p. 635.
- 350 Davis, Lynn Etheridge The Cold War begins: Soviet-American Conflict in Eastern Europe [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1974] pp. 11–12; Gaddis, John Lewis The United States and the Origins of the Cold War, 1941–1947 [New York: Columbia University Press, 1972] pp. 12–14.
- 351 Quoted in Kolko, Gabriel The Politics of War; the World and United States Foreign Policy, 1943–1945 (New York: Random House, 1968) p. 244.
- 352 In that respect, the desire to get the American public internationally engaged was reflected in the form the Atlantic Charter took, since Roosevelt also feared that anything beyond a declaration of broad principles would create controversy and opposition in the US. Thus British suggestions to include references to immediate issues such as criticism of Hitler's policies, as well as more direct reference to the creation of an international organization at the end of the war, had been deleted at US insistence. Davis, op. cit., pp. 16–17; Loth, Wilfried The Division of the World, 1941–1955 (London: Routledge, 1988) pp. 19–20
- 353 Halecki, Oskar and Murray, J.F. Pius XII – Eugene Pacelli, Pope of Peace, revised edition, 1954, pp. 166–167.
- 354 Best, op. cit., p. 174, citing PRO CAB122/577 Turner/Danckwerts conversation 19 August 1941, and PREM4/27/9 Halifax to Churchill 11 October 1941.
- 355 Stinnett, op. cit., p. 130, citing CNO dispatch serial 142155 with information copies to COM 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, in FOAI, Naval Security Group Command release.
- 356 ibid., pp. 130 ff.
- 357 Best op. cit., p. 168, citing PRO FO371/27909 F7883/86/23 Halifax to Eden 17 August 1941 tel.3823.
- 358 Best, loc. cit., citing W.H. Heinrichs, Threshold of War: Franklin D. Roosevelt and the American Entry into World War II [New York: Oxford, 1988] pp. 161–163.
- 359 Churchill, op. cit. Vol. III, p. 350, Churchill's telegrams to both Eden and Atlee, August 11, 1941.
- 360 Best, loc. cit., citing PRO FO371/27977 F8195/1299/23 'Freezing of Japanese Assets' Ashley Clarke (FE Dept.) minute 18 August 1941.
- 361 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., pp. 380–382.
- 362 Yahil, op. cit., pp. 308–309.
- 363 Hawes & White (Eds.) op. cit., p. 150. Williams contributing.
- 364 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 256–257, citing ADSS, viii, 250ff.
- 365 Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 98–101, citing Hoover-Berle correspondence, August 7, 1941 in RG 59, State Department Decimal File 702,941 1A/35, Diplomatic Branch, Archives II, and wiretapped conversations of August 21–23, 1941, in FBI File 65–414, copies in Stinnett's files, with a note that Attorney General Janet Reno and her public affairs chief, Carl Stern, declined to declassify a particular message in the series for those dates, Serial 399, and labelled it a B-1 National Defense Secret under the provisions of the FOIA act.
- 366 ibid., pp. 90–94, citing PHPT 10, p. 4914; RG 38, Station US papers, Folder 5830/30, MMRB, Archives II; and PHPT 36, p. 67.
- 367 ibid., p. 125, citing: Admiral Koga's message, September 1, 1941, in Station H intercept file, RG 457, MMRB, Archives II, SRN 117554; RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II; and the 39 volumes of the report of the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbour Attack, 1945–46.
- 368 Ike, loc. cit.
- 369 ibid., p. 135.
- 370 ibid., p. 154.
- 371 ibid., p. 152.
- 372 ibid., p. 161.
- 373 ibid., p. 153.
- 374 Best, op. cit., p. 170, citing Ike, op. cit, pp. 133–151.
- 375 Wilmot, op. cit., p. 633.
- 376 Best, op. cit., p. 169, citing PRO FO371/27616 F9109/60/10 Clark Kerr to Eden 8 September 1941 tel. 454, and Churchill to Eden 10 September 1941 M885/1, W. Churchill papers, Churchill College, Cambridge, CHAR20/36.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³⁷⁷ ibid., p. 170 citing PRO FO371/27883 F9164/12/23 Craigie to Eden 8 September 1941.
- ³⁷⁸ ibid., p. 173, citing PRO FO371/27883 F9164/12/23 Craigie to Eden 8 September 1941 tel.1637.
- ³⁷⁹ Wilmot, loc. cit.
- ³⁸⁰ Ike, op. cit., p. 152.
- ³⁸¹ Toland, op. cit., p. 948.
- ³⁸² Fishman, Priscilla, Ed. The Jews of the United States [Jerusalem: Keter, 1974] pp. 70–71.
- ³⁸³ Best, op. cit., p. 171, citing PRO HW1/64 BJ 095427 Tokyo to Berlin 10 September 1941 decrypted 13 September 1941.
- ³⁸⁴ ibid., p. 172, citing PRO FO371/27981 F9615/1299/23 Eden to Churchill 12 September 1941.
- ³⁸⁵ ibid., p. 173, citing K. Usui, 'A consideration of Anglo-Japanese Relations: Japanese Views of Britain, 1937–1941.' In I. Nish (ed.), Anglo-Japanese Alienation 1919–1952, Cambridge, Cambridge Uni Press, 1982, p. 95.
- ³⁸⁶ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 384.
- ³⁸⁷ Best, op. cit., p. 172, citing PRO FO371/27883 F9172/12/23 Eden to Craigie 18 September 1941 tel.1187.
- ³⁸⁸ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 360, including his memorandum to Beaverbrook, August 30, 1941.
- ³⁸⁹ ibid., pp. 364,365 relating the discussion between him and Eden and the Russian Ambassador M. Maisky on September 4, 1941, and Churchill's memorandum to Stalin of the same date.
- ³⁹⁰ Lewy, op. cit., p. 231.
- ³⁹¹ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 278–279.
- ³⁹² Gilbert, op. cit., Second World War, p. 239.
- ³⁹³ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., pp. 370, 372, citing Beaverbrook's telegram to Churchill, October 4, 1941.
- ³⁹⁴ Gilbert, op. cit., Second World War, p. 242.
- ³⁹⁵ The first convoy of British military supplies for Russia had left Iceland for Archangel two days earlier, September 28.
- ³⁹⁶ Bullock, op. cit., p. 792, indicates that there is confusion over whether this was a second approach for an armistice or whether there was only one approach, reported by different sources to have been made on different dates. However the two reports involve different people. The October report is based on the personal account of General Zhukov who had been sent to take command of the south western front shortly after the invasion and was not recalled to Moscow until October. It therefore appears most likely that two separate approaches were made.
- ³⁹⁷ ibid., loc. cit.
- ³⁹⁸ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 102–107, citing messages from Tokyo to Morimura dated September 24, 1941 and Morimura to Tokyo dated September 29, 1941, published in PHPT, 12, pp. 261 and 262, and reproduced in Stinnett pp. 102 and 104. Also quoting from an exchange between Miles and Gesell in PHPT 2, pp. 787, 794, 795, 797.
- ³⁹⁹ ibid., pp. 105–107 and note 11, citing: the White House Usher Book for October 14, 1941, FDRL; cable Sarnoff to Roosevelt dated November 13, 1941; PHPT 20, p. 4468 ff.
- ⁴⁰⁰ ibid., pp. 14–15. Rochefort was one of three officers in a Japanese language class conducted by McCollum in Tokyo for the US Navy in 1928. Subsequently they all trained and worked in intelligence.
- ⁴⁰¹ ibid., p. 107, citing Rochefort's discussion of Sarnoff's visit to Honolulu, in PHPT 23, p. 686, given on January 2, 1942 during testimony before the Roberts Commission in Honolulu.
- ⁴⁰² ibid., p. 111, that the Roosevelt-Sarnoff deal was hardly necessary because US intercept operators had already ignored federal interception laws and were obtaining 84 per cent of Japanese messages and their interception rate for Morimura's messages over five months was 94.4 per cent, or 34 of 36 messages. In any case Rochefort failed to decode and translate the remainder.
- ⁴⁰³ Best, op. cit., p. 175, citing PRO FO371/27906 F10942/33/23 Eden to Churchill 16 October 1941 PM/41/142.
- ⁴⁰⁴ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 374.
- ⁴⁰⁵ Gilbert, op. cit., Second World War, p. 251.
- ⁴⁰⁶ Best, op. cit., pp. 178–179, citing PRO FO371/27911 F11672/86/23 Craigie to Eden 1 November 1941 tel.2186.
- ⁴⁰⁷ Concerning the leak to Grew and his report: Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 142–143, citing PHPT 14, p. 1057; PHPT 2, pp. 560, 561, 679; Joseph Grew, Ten Years in Japan (Simon & Schuster, 1944), pp. 470, 497; and The Magic Background of Pearl Harbour (US Department of Defense, USGPO), Vol. IV, pp. N 11–13, items 14–17.
- ⁴⁰⁸ Ike, op. cit., p. 237.
- ⁴⁰⁹ ibid., pp. 209, 210

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁴¹⁰ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 464.
- ⁴¹¹ ibid., p. 465.
- ⁴¹² Bullock, op. cit., pp. 792–793.
- ⁴¹³ Best, op. cit., p. 178, citing PRO CAB65/24 WM(41)112 Secretary's Standard File 12 November 1941.
- ⁴¹⁴ ibid., p. 180, citing PRO FO371/27911 F11672/86/23 Eden to Craigie 15 November 1941 tel. 1523.
- ⁴¹⁵ Ike, op. cit., p. 246.
- ⁴¹⁶ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 157–158 and notes 1 and 2, cites and quotes from a memorandum written by Time journalist Robert Sherrod for his editor. After the war Marshall acknowledged that the gist of the report was “apparently correct.” Stinnett also refers to Larry Bland, ed., The Papers of George Catlett Marshall (John Hopkins University Press, 1986), Vol. 2, p. 676 ff.; and PHPT 7, p. 2960. In note 2 he discusses a search of intercepts which could have been the basis of Marshall’s assertion that he was using intercepted messages in his assessment of the likely timing of the outbreak of war.
- ⁴¹⁷ ibid., p. 144, citing Grew’s testimony to the Pearl Harbour enquiry, PHPT 14, p. 1059.
- ⁴¹⁸ Jenkins, David, The Sydney Morning Herald, November 5th, 1990, p. 13, reporting declassified State Department files on microfiche at Cornell University, New York.
- ⁴¹⁹ Best, op. cit., p. 181, citing PRO HW 1/240 BJ.097993 Tokyo to Hong Kong 14 November 1941 decrypted 21 November 1941.
- ⁴²⁰ ibid., pp. 180–182, citing PRO FO371/27912 F12654/86/23 Campbell to Eden 18 November 1941 tel. 5233, and Eden to Halifax 21 November 1941 tel. 6355; F12655/86/23 Halifax to Eden 22 November 1941 tel.5353; F12654/86/23 Halifax to Eden 22 November 1941 tel. 5352.
- ⁴²¹ ibid., p. 182, citing PRO FO371/27912 F122813/86/23 Churchill to Eden 23 November 1941, F12655/86/23 Eden to Halifax 24 November 1941 tel.6424, and F12766/86/23 Halifax to Eden 25 November 1941 tel.5380.
- ⁴²² Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 148–150.
- ⁴²³ ibid., pp. 150–151, citing PHPT 5–2438 and quoting from Ingersol’s message.
- ⁴²⁴ ibid., citing letter Stark to Kimmel, September 23, 1941, setting out Roosevelt’s policy on active engagement, and Kimmels’ comments on it; PHPT 33, p. 1168.
- ⁴²⁵ ibid., p. 178–179, citing and quoting from the original Stimson diary notes in PHPT 11, pp. 5433–5434, and an elaboration of the diary provided to the Joint Congressional Investigating Committee in 1945–46, pp. 5421–5427.
- ⁴²⁶ ibid., p. 46, quoting directly from Yamamoto’s radio message as published in Wallin, Homer N., Pearl Harbour (Naval History Division, US Government Printing Office, 1968), p. 86, and reproduced by Stinnett as Appendix D, p. 292.
- ⁴²⁷ ibid., p. 137 and note 30; p. 188 and note 32, citing: an order bearing McCollum’s initials as initiator which were dropped from later reprints of the message, in Secret serial 242239, 10.39 pm, GMT or 5.30 pm US EST, both November 24, 1941, PHLO, RG 80, Archives II; and Presidential Monograph file, PHLO, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II.
- ⁴²⁸ ibid., pp. 46–51, 124 and notes 16, 17, 18, 19 to chapter four. In his notes Stinnett discusses the tracking and the fate of those and other messages in detail with extensive references and citations. He says, specifically: “Yamamoto’s thirteen missing radio messages can easily be documented by retrieving his SMS message numbers from the intercept file of Station H in RG 45, MMRB, of Archives II.
- ⁴²⁹ ibid., pp. 162–163, citing an undated written report of Commander W. J. Sebald, COMINT aide to Fleet Admiral Ernest J. King, Chief of Naval Operations, folder 5830/6, RG 38, Station US papers; declassified January 28, 1995, MMRB, Archives II.
- ⁴³⁰ ibid., p. 46 and note 16. Yamamoto’s key messages of November 25 (November 24 US EST) stripped of all Japanese communication data and lacking the source of the intercept, can be found in two US naval histories: Pearl Harbour, by Vice Admiral Homer N. Wallin, and The Campaigns of the Pacific War prepared by the Naval Analysis Division of the United States Strategic Bombing Survey.
- ⁴³¹ ibid., pp. 164–167, citing: Rochefort’s testimony of submarine tracking, daily Communications Summary, November 24,25,26, 1941 under sub-heading Fourth Fleet and Mandates, PHLO, RG 80, MMRB, Archives II; the priority dispatch in RG 80, PHLO, MMRB, Archives II.
- ⁴³² Best, op. cit., p. 185, citing PRO ADM223/231 OIC Special Intelligence Summary no. 429 25 November 1941.
- ⁴³³ ibid., p. 184, citing PRO HW1/259 BJ.098151 Tokyo to European capitals 20 November 1941 decrypted 25 November 1941.

- ⁴³⁴ ibid., p. PRO FO371/27912 F12818/86/23 Churchill to Roosevelt 26 November 1941 T.871.
- ⁴³⁵ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 469.
- ⁴³⁶ ibid., p. 470.
- ⁴³⁷ Best, op. cit., p. 186, citing PRO FO371/27767 F12823/9/61 Meiklereid (Saigon) to Eden 26 November 1941 tel. 226.
- ⁴³⁸ ibid., citing PRO ADM223/494 NIDvol. 40 Far East and Pacific 1, History, Pearl Harbour and the loss of Prince of Wales and Repulse (undated 1945?), FO371/27694 F13068/523/23 C/S Singapore to DNI 27 November 1941 tel.0532Z/27, ADM199/1477 Admiralty to Senior Officer Force G 28 November 1941 tel. 2355A/28, and WO193/869 DDMI Singapore to WO 29 November 1941 tel. 26338.
- ⁴³⁹ Churchill, loc. cit.
- ⁴⁴⁰ ibid.
- ⁴⁴¹ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 170–175. Stark's revised message to Kimmel is set out in full on page 172 and the series of war alerts are reproduced in Appendix C, pp. 281–291.
- ⁴⁴² Irving, Hitler's War, op. cit., p. 346.
- ⁴⁴³ Best, op. cit. p. 187, citing PRO HW1/264 BJ.098178 Bangkok to Rome 24 November 1941 decrypted 26 November 1941, HW1/272 BJ.098255 Bangkok to Rome 24 November 1941 decrypted 28 November 1941, and BJ.098276 Bangkok to Tokyo 21 November 1941 decrypted 28 November 1941.
- ⁴⁴⁴ ibid., citing PRO CAB81/105 JIC(41)449 'Possible Japanese Action' JIC Report 28 November 1941.
- ⁴⁴⁵ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 179.
- ⁴⁴⁶ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 471.
- ⁴⁴⁷ For comprehensive details see Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 180 ff.
- ⁴⁴⁸ Lash, Joseph P. Roosevelt and Churchill 1939–1941 [London: Andre Deutsch, 1977] p. 412.
- ⁴⁴⁹ ibid., p. 415.
- ⁴⁵⁰ ibid., p. 411.
- ⁴⁵¹ Ike, op. cit. p. 257.
- ⁴⁵² Best, op. cit., p. 187, citing PRO ADM199/1477 Thomas (Straits Governor) to C in C China 29 November 1941 tel.1140/29, and CAB 107/3 Ad-hoc meeting 30 November 1941; PRO AIR20.291 WO to C in C FE 25 November 1941 tel.FE43.
- ⁴⁵³ ibid., pp. 187–188, citing PRO FO371/27913 F13053/86/23 Churchill to Roosevelt 30 November 1941 T.902.
- ⁴⁵⁴ Sachar, op. cit., p. 229.
- ⁴⁵⁵ Gilbert, op. cit., Second World War, p. 265.
- ⁴⁵⁶ Ike, op. cit., pp. 264–272.
- ⁴⁵⁷ Best, Britain, Japan and Pearl Harbour, op. cit., extensively quoted and cited in these chapters.
- ⁴⁵⁸ All references and extracts from Togo's report to the Imperial Conference are from Ike, Japan's Decision for War, op.cit., pp. 264 ff.
- ⁴⁵⁹ ibid., p. 266.
- ⁴⁶⁰ ibid., p. 268.
- ⁴⁶¹ ibid., p. 270.
- ⁴⁶² ibid., p. 272.
- ⁴⁶³ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 181.
- ⁴⁶⁴ Best, op. cit., pp. 187–188 citing PRO FO371/27913 F13144/86/23 Halifax to Eden 1 December 1941 tel.5519.
- ⁴⁶⁵ ibid., p. 188, citing PRO FO371/27913 F13144 /86/23 Churchill to Eden 2 December 1941 M.1072/1.
- ⁴⁶⁶ ibid., p. 191 citing PRO ADM223/494 NID vol. 40 Far East and Pacific 1, History, Pearl Harbour and the Loss of Prince of Wales and Repulse (undated 1945?).
- ⁴⁶⁷ ibid., citing PRO FO371/27914 F13219/86/23 Halifax to Eden 3 December 1941 tel.5577, HW1/290 BJ.098509 Tokyo to London 1 December 1941 decrypted 3 December 1941, HW1/294 'C' to Churchill 4 December 1941 C/8238, and HW1/288 BJ.098452 Tokyo to Berlin 30 November 1941 decrypted 2 December 1941.
- ⁴⁶⁸ ibid., citing PRO ADM223/494 NID vol. 40 ibid.
- ⁴⁶⁹ Gilbert, op. cit., Second World War, p. 270.
- ⁴⁷⁰ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 212–213, citing: operator logs, Station H, pp. 100 (Garstka), 120 (LF), December 6, 1941 Tokyo time; RG 38, MMRB, Archives II, with a note that the English translation of Inoue's declaration of war message, with omissions, is in RG 457, SRN 115368, MMRB, Archives II; and Station H operator log, December 6, 1941, p. 120, as RI RO 00, NR 951; Station US papers, RG 38, MMRB, Archives II.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁴⁷¹ ibid., pp. 213–214 and note 29, citing Station H operator log, December 6, 1941, 11.20 pm (Tokyo time); Station US papers, Station H operator log, pp. 101, 92, 124 in RG 38, Archives II; and RG 457, SRN series, SRN 115370 (Rescript), 115371, MMRB, Archives II.
- ⁴⁷² ibid., pp. 214–216, citing letter Dyer to Stinnett, June 4, 1983, in Stinnett's files.
- ⁴⁷³ ibid., p. 109.
- ⁴⁷⁴ On December 5 the Japanese Foreign Ministry transmitted two messages which disclosed that war between Japan and the United States would start on December 7. Three stations (US, CAST and FIVE) obtained intercepts in the Purple Code without difficulty but neither message was decoded until after the attack. See Stinnett, op. cit., p. 226 with a message from Tokyo to Bangkok dated December 6, 1941 which was translated on December 8, reproduced from PHPT 12, p. 247.
- ⁴⁷⁵ Best, op. cit., p. 189, citing PRO ADM199/1475 DNI to COIS Singapore 2 December 1941 tel.0024A3, HW1/303 BJ.098583 Bangkok to Tokyo 25 November 1941 decrypted 6 December 1941, BJ.098606 Bangkok to Tokyo 28 November 1941 decrypted 6 December 1941, and PREM3/158/6 COS to Churchill 6 December 1941.
- ⁴⁷⁶ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 179–180, citing Grew, Joseph, Ten Years in Japan (Simon and Schuster, 1944), p. 486; and Roosevelt's message to Hirohito in PHPT 11, p. 4870.
- ⁴⁷⁷ Best, op. cit., pp. 189–190, citing PRO AIR20/291 C in C FE to WO 7 December 1941 tel.1605Z/7. PREM3/158/6 COIS Singapore to DNI 7 December 1941 tel.0611Z/7; PRO FO371/12789 F13503/1299/23 C in C FE to WO 7 December 1941 tel.2300/7, and WO106/2514 C in C FE to WO 8 December 1941 tel.1412Z/8.
- ⁴⁷⁸ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 229.
- ⁴⁷⁹ ibid., pp. 225–230, citing documents and testimonies in PHPT 12, pp. 239–245; PHPT 33, pp. 843 ff; Station SAIL December 1941 report, p. 2, RG 187, A-6 secret file, National Archives, Seattle; Lt. Lester Schulz' testimony to the Joint Congressional Investigating Committee in 1946, PHPT 10, p. 4663; and PHPT 9, p. 4043.
- ⁴⁸⁰ ibid., pp. 232–233 and notes, citing Stark's testimony before the Joint Congressional Investigating Committee on December 31, 1945 and January 2,3,4 and 5, 1946, in PHPT 5, p. 2096; April 9 and 11, 1946, PHPT 11, p. 5153; and PHPT 11, pp. 5543, 5546, 5557. Stark denied any memory of a phone conversation with the president at midnight after his return from the theatre until his flag secretary contradicted him, and Stinnett describes him as repeatedly evasive and defensive during his testimony.
- ⁴⁸¹ ibid., pp. 233–234 and notes, citing the testimony of Colonel Rufus Bratton to the Joint Congressional Investigating Committee, February 1946 PHPT 10, p. 4615 ff.
- ⁴⁸² ibid., p. 237–238.
- ⁴⁸³ ibid., pp. 231–232 and note 7. The English translation of the full text of Japan's composite reply, comprising what are referred to as 'part two' and 'part three' is published in PHPT 12, pp. 239 ff.
- ⁴⁸⁴ ibid., pp. 231–232 and note 10. The English translation of the fourth part, recorded as message 381, is in PHPT 12, p. 245.
- ⁴⁸⁵ ibid., pp. 231–233, citing testimony by Captain Beardall, PHPT 11, pp. 5287 ff., White House Usher books, FDRL. Neither Lt. Schulz' visit to deliver the earlier parts of the Japanese intercept nor Capt. Beardall's visit to deliver the final parts are recorded in the Usher book. However it shows that the Chinese ambassador arrived at 11 am and that lunch was served to Roosevelt and Hopkins at 1.15 pm.
- ⁴⁸⁶ Averell Harriman, from the US Office of Production Management, had been sent by Roosevelt to Britain and the Soviet Union in 1941 to expedite U.S. lend-lease aid.
- ⁴⁸⁷ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., pp. 475–476.
- ⁴⁸⁸ ibid., pp. 479–480.
- ⁴⁸⁹ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 3, citing diary notes by William J. vanden Heuvel of conversations between him and Donovan for whom he served as executive assistant when he was US Ambassador to Thailand in 1953, and subsequent phone conversations. The British official, T. North Whitehead was an influential member of the Foreign Office and an adviser to Churchill on matters affecting US aid to Britain.
- ⁴⁹⁰ Encyclopedia Britannica CD 2000 Deluxe Edition; also Stinnett, op. cit., p. 244.
- ⁴⁹¹ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 254, citing Senator Robert Taft, December 19, 1941: "Perhaps the fault at Hawaii was not entirely on the admirals and the generals."
- ⁴⁹² ibid., pp. 255–257. On December 11, 1941 a policy of 54-year censorship was imposed on all pre-Pearl Harbour Japanese intercepts and related directives, then two weeks after Japan surrendered in August 1945 those intercepts were classified TOP SECRET and a strict censorship program was overseen by Admiral Ernest King. All cryptographers and radio intercept operators who had worked on that material were gagged and reminded of their binding oath of secrecy.

⁴⁹³ ibid., pp. 235–236.

⁴⁹⁴ ibid., p. 220.

⁴⁹⁵ Yahil, op. cit., p. 310, and Gilbert, op. cit., Second World War, p. 267.

⁴⁹⁶ ibid., pp. 320–321.

⁴⁹⁷ Stinnett, op. cit., pp. 4 and 252, citing a report by United Press in the Honolulu Advertiser, December 16, 1941.

⁴⁹⁸ The Qur'an. Trans. Dawood, op. cit., p. 233–234.

⁴⁹⁹ The way in which translators attempt to present a work in a second language (say, to maintain the literal meaning of the original, to interpret the author's presentation so that it is more understandable in another culture, or to simplify language to present the work in a contemporary idiom) may lead to significant differences in emphasis or interpretation and can influence the readers' understanding of the work or cause confusion even if the translators have approached the work with essentially the same understanding of it. In view of that, and in view of the importance of The Night Journey, extracts from the three translations which have been used in the present work are set out here to show how the translators have presented two key phrases. The translations are by Sale (see page 3 above, first published 1734), Dawood (Iraq State Scholar, London University 1945, first published 1956, fourth edition 1974) and Zayid (approved by the Supreme Sunni and Shii Councils of the Republic of Lebanon, first published 1980).

1. Allah's response in the event of a third transgression.

Sale: Peradventure your Lord will have mercy on you hereafter: but if ye return to transgress a third time, we also will return to chastise you; and we have appointed hell to be the prison of the unbelievers.

[Sale notes that Muslims interpret this passage to refer to the contemporary Jewish rejection of Muhammad as a prophet and the 'extermination' of the tribe of Koreidha, etc.]

Dawood: We said: Allah may yet be merciful to you. If you again transgress, you shall again be scourged. We have made Hell a prison house for the unbelievers.

Zayid: It may be that Allah will have mercy upon you. But if you return (to mischief) We will return (with punishment). We have made Hell a prison-house for the unbelievers.

2. The matter of predestination or judgement.

Sale: The fate of every man have we bound about his neck; and we will produce unto him, on the day of resurrection, a book wherein his action shall be recorded: it shall be offered to him open, and the angels shall say unto him, Read thy book; thine own soul will be a sufficient accountant against thee, this day.

[Sale notes that a literal translation would be the bird in place of fate, and this, to the Arabs, would signify a person's fortune or success.]

Dawood: The fate of each man We have bound about his neck. On the Day of Resurrection We shall confront him with a book spread wide open, saying: 'Here is your book: read it. Enough for you this day that your own soul should call you to account.'

Zayid: The works of each man We have bound about his neck. On the Day of Resurrection, We shall confront him with a book spread wide open, (saying): 'Read your book. Enough for you this day that your own soul should call you to account.'

While these translations suggest varying emphases the thrust in each case is generally the same and provides the same relationship to the prophesies of Maimonides and twentieth century events which have been referred to in the introduction and which will be dealt with in later sections.

⁵⁰⁰ The Jerusalem Bible, (Gen. Ed., Alexander Jones), [London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1968] p. 1174.

⁵⁰¹ Sachar, op. cit. p. 237.

⁵⁰² Lewy, op. cit., p. 250, and Cornwell, op. cit., p. 287, citing a conversation between Pius XII and Mother Pasqualina, in Teste (Testimonies for the Beatification process of Pius XII, in the keeping of the Society of Jesus at the Borgo Santo Spirito, Rome), p. 85

Chapter 25: Gog and Magog regroup

¹ Glasgow, George Diplomacy and God [London: Longmans Green, 1941] Letter to the London Times, dated December 21, 1940, signed by the four church leaders, republished as an appendix, pp. 233–235.

² ibid., pp. 2–3.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

3. ibid., p. 12.
4. ibid., p. 22.
5. Churchill, Sir Winston S. The Second World War, Vol. III, The Grand Alliance, [London: Reprint Society, 1950], pp. 497–498.
6. Piccigallo, Philip R. The Japanese on Trial [Austin: University of Texas, 1979] p. 3.
7. Meyer, Michael A. Response to Modernity. [Detroit: Wayne State University, 1988] p. 353.
8. Tanaka, Yuki. Rape and War: the Japanese Experience [Melbourne: Japanese Studies Centre, Monash University, 1995] pp. 2–17.
9. ibid., pp. 25–34.
10. ibid., pp. 18–24.
11. Kinsey, Alfred C., et al., Sexual Behavior in the Human Male [Philadelphia: W. B. Saunders, 1948] p. 222.
12. Ernst, Morris L. and David Loth, Sexual Behaviour and the Kinsey Report [London: Falcon, 1949] pp. 125–142.
13. Walker, Allan S. Clinical Problems of War, Volume I of Series 5 (Medical) in the series Australia in the War of 1939–1945 [Canberra: Australian War Memorial, 1952] pp. 264–267. The quotation is attributed to Colonel H. G. Furnell, A.D.M.S., 9th Division A.I.F.
14. Data reported for the two world wars are not directly comparable, and the official policy of concealing the real rate of venereal disease required that some cases were recorded as “non-specific urethritis” rather than VD. In this work Walker’s practice of adding the two figures to get a realistic total infection rate has been adopted, and where figures for “non-specific urethritis” have not been available, estimates have been arrived at by allowing the same proportions as in those cases for which both figures are available.
15. Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 520.
16. ibid., pp. 491–492.
17. ibid.
18. ibid., p. 523, cable Churchill to Curtin, December 25, 1941.
19. Gaddis, John Lewis, The United States and the Origins of the Cold War, 1941– 1947 [New York: Columbia University Press, 1972], p. 6–7.
20. Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 542.
21. ibid., p. 520.
22. ibid., p. 533.
23. In fact the United Nation’s handbook, Everyone’s United Nations, recognizes an earlier document, the Inter-Allied Declaration which was signed on June 12th, 1941, in London, as “the first of the specific steps that led to the establishment of the United Nations” That declaration noted that “the only true basis of enduring peace is the willing cooperation of free peoples in a world in which, relieved of the menace of aggression, all may enjoy economic and social security” and the signatories stated their intention “to work together, and with other free peoples, both in war and peace, to this end.” However as that very noble-sounding declaration was signed on behalf of five countries of the British Commonwealth, eight European governments in exile and the Free French just two weeks before Germany attacked Russia and while the United States and Japan were actually engrossed in discussions about their spheres of influence in the Pacific, it reads very much as part of the politicking to draw both Russia and the United States into the war against Germany. (Everyone’s United Nations [New York: UN Dept. of Public Information, 10th Edition, 1986] p. 5).
24. Churchill, Sir Winston S., The Second World War, Vol. IV The Hinge of Fate [London: Reprint Society, 1951], p. 137 and Vol III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., pp. 527–528.
25. Churchill, The Second World War Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 547.
26. ibid., p. 524.
27. Gaddis op. cit. pp. 15–16; Davis, Lynn Etheridge The Cold War Begins: Soviet-American Conflict in Eastern Europe [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1974] pp. 18–36.
28. Davis op. cit. 18–36; Gaddis op. cit., p. 15–16.
29. Gaddis op. cit. pp. 16–17.
30. See, for example, Davis, op. cit., pp. 32–37.
31. Gaddis op. cit. p. 71.
32. ibid., pp. 65, 94; Loth, Wilfried The Division of the World, 1945–1955 (London: Routledge, 1988) pp. 60–63.
33. Cornwell, John, Hitler’s Pope: The Secret History of Pius XII [London: Viking/Penguin, 1999] p. 279.
34. Yahil, Leni Holocaust: The Fate of European Jewry [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990], pp. 313–314.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³⁵ ibid., pp. 316–319, citing Adolf Hitler, Rede zum 9. Jahrestag der Machtergreifung, 30.1.1941 (Berlin, 1941), pp. 33f.
- ³⁶ Gilbert, Martin Second World War (2nd. Edition) [London: Fontana, 1990], p. 296.
- ³⁷ Toland, John Adolf Hitler [New York: Balantine, 1977] p. 964.
- ³⁸ Humani Generis Unitas, clauses 131 to 132. All references and quotations are from the full text in English translated from the Authentic and Complete (French) Text in Passelecq, Georges & Bernard Suchecky The Hidden Encyclical of Pius XI [New York: Harcourt Brace/Harvest, 1997], pp. 176–275.
- ³⁹ ibid., clause 133, first paragraph.
- ⁴⁰ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 256, quoting from H. Butler, The Sub-Prefect Should Have Held His Tongue, (ed.) R. F. Foster (London, 1990), 275.
- ⁴¹ ibid., p. 281 citing: Osborne's diary quoted in O. Chadwick, Britain and the Vatican during the Second World War (Cambridge, 1986), 205; S. Friedlander, Pius XII and the Third Reich: A Documentation, Eng. Trans. (London, 1966), 104; and ADSS, viii, 457.
- ⁴² ibid., pp. 258–259, quoting from the aide-memoire held in the Zionist Archives in Jerusalem and published by Saul Friedlander Pius XII ... Documentation. It was excluded from wartime documents later released by the Vatican.
- ⁴³ ibid., p. 280, citing F. Kerr, "French Theology: Yves Congar and Henri de Lubac", in D. Ford, (ed.) The Modern Theologians (Oxford, 1997), 112.
- ⁴⁴ Dawidowicz Lucy S. The War Against the Jews 1933–1945 [Harmondsworth: Pelican/Penguin, 1977] p. 178.
- ⁴⁵ Lewy, Guenter The Catholic Church and Nazi Germany [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1964] p. 289.
- ⁴⁶ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. IV The Hinge of Fate, op. cit., p. 138.
- ⁴⁷ Churchill later admitted that when he wrote to Curtin on March 20 to explain why he would not agree to naval deployment which Australia had requested he was already "convinced that the Japanese would not invade Australia, provided all possible preparations were made to deter, or, if need be, resist them." ibid., p. 154.
- ⁴⁸ Toland, op. cit., p. 977.
- ⁴⁹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. IV The Hinge of Fate, op. cit., pp. 181–182, letter Roosevelt to Churchill, March 11, 1942.
- ⁵⁰ Units involved in the occupation of Persia were the 8th Indian Infantry Division, the 9th Armoured Brigade, one Indian regiment of tanks, four British battalions and one regiment of British artillery.
- ⁵¹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 380.
- ⁵² Buss, Claude A. Asia in the Modern World [New York: Macmillan, 1964], p. 489.
- ⁵³ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. IV The Hinge of Fate, op. cit., p. 184, cable Cripps to Churchill, April 11, 1942.
- ⁵⁴ ibid., pp. 185–186, Roosevelt to Churchill via cable through Hopkins. Churchill dates the cable April 12, because he received it while Hopkins was with him at 3 am that morning. It was therefore despatched from Washington on the evening of the 11th.
- ⁵⁵ ibid., p. 187, cable, Churchill to Roosevelt, April 12, 1942.
- ⁵⁶ ibid., pp. 186–188.
- ⁵⁷ Buss, op. cit., p. 442–443.
- ⁵⁸ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. IV The Hinge of Fate, op. cit., p. 206, refers to General Doolittle's "bold and spectacular air attack against Tokyo itself on April 18" and says simply "This event may indeed have been a factor in determining the new Japanese policy." [Emphasis added.].
- ⁵⁹ ibid., p. 188.
- ⁶⁰ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 297.
- ⁶¹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 547.
- ⁶² ibid., p. 524.
- ⁶³ Vaksberg, Arkady, Stalin Against the Jews, trans. Antonina W. Bouis, [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994] p. 108.
- ⁶⁴ Kochan, Lionel The Jews in Soviet Russia Since 1917 [London: Oxford, 1970] p. 295.
- ⁶⁵ Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel: from the Rise of Zionism to Our Time [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1981] p. 243.
- ⁶⁶ Eventov & Rotem (Contrib.) Zionism [Jerusalem: Keter, 1973] p. 215.
- ⁶⁷ Fishman, Priscilla (Ed) The Jews of the United States [Jerusalem: Keter, 1974] p. 233.
- ⁶⁸ Laqueur, Walter (Ed) The Israel-Arab Reader 3rd Edition [New York: Bantam, 1969] p. 78.
- ⁶⁹ Laqueur, Walter A History of Zionism [New York: Schocken, 1976] p. 545.
- ⁷⁰ Laqueur, The Israel-Arab Reader, op. cit., p. 79.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁷¹ Laqueur, A History of Zionism, op. cit., p. 547.
- ⁷² Menuhin, Moshe The Decadence of Judaism in Our Time [Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1969] pp. 91, 310–315.
- ⁷³ ibid., p. 318.
- ⁷⁴ ibid., p. 91.
- ⁷⁵ ibid., p. 317.
- ⁷⁶ ibid., p. 94, citing Bentwich, Norman For Zion's Sake [Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1954] p. 252.
- ⁷⁷ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 323, 356.
- ⁷⁸ Sources: Cornwell, op. cit., p. 282, citing a letter, Osborne to Mrs. Bridget McEwan, dated June 11, 1942; and Encyclopædia Britannica CD 2000 Deluxe Edition.
- ⁷⁹ The understanding of the popes as “Successors of Christ” as opposed to “Successors of Peter” was coined by Giovanni Montini, then Undersecretary in the Vatican Secretariat of State and later Pope Paul VI, in reference to Pius XII. It was consistent with the concept of the divinity of the papacy which had been introduced by Pius XI in 1929. (See chapter 17) It was not disputed by Pius XII. Montini’s reference is quoted by Hebblethwaite, Paul VI (London, 1993), p. 181, and cited by Cornwell, op. cit., p. 270.
- ⁸⁰ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 270–271, quoting Montinni from M. Carroll, Greatness Dishonoured (Dublin, 1980), 68; and citing L. Gedda, 18 Aprile 1948: Memorie inedite dell’Artifice della Sconfitta del Fronte Popolare (Milan, 1998), 74. Pastor Angelicus is available in video by Filmoteca, Vatican City.
- ⁸¹ Catholic Almanac 1997, [Huntington: Our Sunday Visitor Inc, 1996] p. 323.
- ⁸² Robertson, Edwin H. Bonhoeffer: True Patriotism [London: Collins, 1973] p. 119.
- ⁸³ Irving, David Hitler’s War Vol I [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1977] p. 381.
- ⁸⁴ Shirer, William L. The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich [London: Pan, 1960] pp. 1207–1208.
- ⁸⁵ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 283–287.
- ⁸⁶ Shirer, op. cit., pp. 1093–1094.
- ⁸⁷ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 302.
- ⁸⁸ Tokayer, Marvin & Mary Swartz The Fugu Plan [New York: Paddington Press, 1979], pp. 217–218.
- ⁸⁹ ibid., pp. 219–220.
- ⁹⁰ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 348.
- ⁹¹ Toland, op. cit., p. 989.
- ⁹² Yahil, op. cit., p. 607.
- ⁹³ Rubinstein, William D. The Myth of Rescue [London: Routledge, 1997] p. 86.
- ⁹⁴ Australian Archives, CRS, A433, item 43/2/46, Cabinet papers, 25/5/1938, J. McEwen, Minister for the Interior.
- ⁹⁵ Gribetz, Judah, E. Greenstein & R. Stein The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994], p. 418.
- ⁹⁶ Australian Archives, CRS, A433, item 43/2/46, Cabinet papers, Memorandum from J.A. Carrodus, Secretary, Dept. for the Interior, 25/5/1938, to the Minister for the Interior.
- ⁹⁷ Australian Archives, CRS, A433, item 43/2/46, Cabinet papers, 31/1/1939, J. McEwen, Minister for the Interior.
- ⁹⁸ Australian Archives, CRS, A433, item 44/2/50, Cabinet papers, letter from Prime Minister John Curtin to Dr. I. N. Steinberg, 28/10/43.
- ⁹⁹ Lilienthal, Alfred M. The Zionist Connection. What Price Israel? [New York: Middle East Perspective, 1979] p. 36, citing Foreign Relations of the United States, Diplomatic Papers, 1942, Vol. IV, pp. 538–544.
- ¹⁰⁰ Sachar, op. cit., p. 238.
- ¹⁰¹ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 288–289.
- ¹⁰² ibid., p. 289, citing ADSS p. 689.
- ¹⁰³ ibid., pp. 289–290, citing ADSS pp. 685, 721.
- ¹⁰⁴ ibid., p. 290, quoting from ADSS p. 723.
- ¹⁰⁵ Boegner, Marc The Long Road to Unity. [London: Collins, 1970] pp. 178–179.
- ¹⁰⁶ Lewy, op. cit., p. 297.
- ¹⁰⁷ Dawidowicz, op. cit., p. 168.
- ¹⁰⁸ ibid., p. 364.
- ¹⁰⁹ Irving, Hitler’s War, op. cit., pp. 392–393.
- ¹¹⁰ Dawidowicz, op. cit., pp. 372–375.

- ¹¹¹ [The system of ghettos had been reintroduced in Poland by the Germans officially on the basis of a policy of isolating Jews from mainstream national life, but the advantages of herding them into 'holding pens' for rapid deportation overseas if agreement could be reached or to the death camps would not have escaped the Nazis' attention. As already noted above (chapter 24) the first major ghetto was established at Lodz in May 1940. The Warsaw Ghetto was sealed in September. Others followed. Jewish Councils were set up to run them in compliance with German directions and virtually all things Jewish outside the ghettos, including synagogues and schools, were destroyed. When deportation to death camps began Himmler ordered all ghettos and the remaining open Jewish communities liquidated by the end of 1942 but his program could not be met. The actual sequence was Wartheland, December 1941; Lublin, March 1942; Warsaw stage one, July 1942; Cracow, March 1943; Warsaw stage two, May 1943; Lwow, June 1943; Lodz, August 1944. [ibid., pp. 473-474].
- ¹¹² ibid., pp. 473-474.
- ¹¹³ Abramsky et.al. (Eds.) The Jews in Poland [Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1986] pp. 130-139, Inter-war Poland: good for the Jews or bad for the Jews? Contributed by Ezra Mendelsohn.
- ¹¹⁴ ibid., p. 152, Polish-Jewish relations in occupied Poland, 1939-45 Contrib. by Wladislaw Bartoszewski.
- ¹¹⁵ ibid., pp. 161-163, Relief Council for Jews, 1944-45, Contrib. by Teresa Prekerowa.
- ¹¹⁶ Laqueur, Walter The Terrible Secret p. 201.
- ¹¹⁷ O'Carroll Greatness Dishonoured [Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1980] p. 78.
- ¹¹⁸ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 272.
- ¹¹⁹ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 363.
- ¹²⁰ Shirer, op. cit., p. 1096.
- ¹²¹ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 373.
- ¹²² Graef, Hilda Devotion to the Blessed Mary [London: Burns & Oates, 1963] p. 90.
- ¹²³ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 272, citing and quoting from R. Graham, The Vatican and Communism during World War II (San Francisco, 1996), p. 94.
- ¹²⁴ Laqueur, A History of Zionism, op. cit., p. 551.
- ¹²⁵ Tokayer, op. cit., pp. 222-235, 244-252.
- ¹²⁶ ibid., pp. 246. In fact the one square mile 'Jewish District' was not exclusively a ghetto. At the time that it was declared, it actually 'housed' about 100,000 very poor Chinese, a few thousand Japanese and about 9,000 of the stateless refugees. The additional 8,000 refugees had to be fitted in by negotiation or by exchange of housing outside the ghetto district for space inside.
- ¹²⁷ Laqueur, A History of Zionism, op. cit., p. 547.
- ¹²⁸ ibid., pp. 297 f.
- ¹²⁹ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 379.
- ¹³⁰ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 272.
- ¹³¹ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 387.
- ¹³² Yahil, op. cit., pp. 357, 603.
- ¹³³ Balfour, Michael Propaganda in War 1939-1945 [London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1979], pp. 299-300.
- ¹³⁴ Laqueur, The Terrible Secret, op. cit., p. 203.
- ¹³⁵ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 268, citing AAS, Vol. 35, 1943, 23, and quoting the original in note 1.
- ¹³⁶ ibid., p. 292.
- ¹³⁷ ibid., citing the official text of the Christmas homily by Pius XII, December 24, 1942, in Italian, AAS, Vol. 35, 1943, 9ff.
- ¹³⁸ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 396.
- ¹³⁹ Dawidowicz, op. cit., p. 403, citing Y-A (the archives of the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research) coded message No. 15 sent from Warsaw, January 21, 1943, addressed to Stephen Wise of the American Jewish Congress, Nahum Goldmann of the World Jewish Congress, and George Backer, then of the AJDC.
- ¹⁴⁰ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. IV The Hinge of Fate, op. cit., p. 412.
- ¹⁴¹ Buss, op. cit., p. 487.
- ¹⁴² Rubinstein, op. cit., p. 158.
- ¹⁴³ ibid., pp. 160-165.
- ¹⁴⁴ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 398.
- ¹⁴⁵ ibid.
- ¹⁴⁶ Shirer, op. cit., gives the figures as 285,000 trapped; 49,000 evacuated; 91,000 captured; and only 5,000 returned to Germany, but the magnitude of the tragedy is still the same.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁴⁷ Shirer, op. cit., p. 1112.
- ¹⁴⁸ Dawidowicz, op. cit., p. 404, citing Y-A coded message No. 59, sent from Warsaw on 7 February, 1943, by Leon Feiner (Berezowski) and Mauricy Orzech (Janczyn).
- ¹⁴⁹ Toland, op. cit., pp. 103–105.
- ¹⁵⁰ Yahil, op. cit., pp. 404–405, citing Domarus, Max (Ed.) Hitler: Reden und Proklamationen, 1932–1945 [Munich, 1963] Vol 2, pp. 1988, 1990–1993.
- ¹⁵¹ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 196–199, citing Nathan Stoltzfus, Resistance of the Heart, [London, 1996].
- ¹⁵² Yahil, op. cit., pp. 416–417.
- ¹⁵³ Dawidowicz, op. cit., p. 405.
- ¹⁵⁴ Yahil, op. cit., p. 447, reports the use of funds received from various sources by the Polish Underground through the Council for Aid to Jews between June and October 1943 when such funds were too late to help the people of the Warsaw Ghetto but they were put to use in other directions.
- ¹⁵⁵ Yahil, op. cit., p. 417.
- ¹⁵⁶ Dawidowicz, op. cit., pp. 401–402.
- ¹⁵⁷ Sachar, op. cit., p. 241.
- ¹⁵⁸ Dawidowicz, op. cit., pp. 405–409.
- ¹⁵⁹ Bruce, George The Warsaw Uprising [London: Rupert Hart-Davis, 1972] pp. 40–41.
- ¹⁶⁰ Lewy, op. cit. p. 249.
- ¹⁶¹ ibid., pp. 249–250.
- ¹⁶² Yergin, op. cit., p. 43.
- ¹⁶³ Kimball, Warren F. The Juggler: Franklin Roosevelt as Wartime Statesman (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1991) Chapters V and VI.
- ¹⁶⁴ For discussion, see Yergin, op. cit., pp. 42–46; Loth, Wilfried, The Division of the World, 1941–1955 [London: Routledge, 1988], p. 20–22.
- ¹⁶⁵ Loth, op. cit., pp. 21–22; Yergin, op. cit., pp. 48–58; Gaddis, op. cit., p. 135 ff.
- ¹⁶⁶ Letter dated 13 November, 1942, quoted in Loth, op. cit., p. 31.
- ¹⁶⁷ Herken, Gregg The Winning Weapon (New York: Alfred A Knopf, 1980) p. 101 ff.
- ¹⁶⁸ Bruce, op. cit., pp. 22–23.
- ¹⁶⁹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 314.
- ¹⁷⁰ ibid., p. 316.
- ¹⁷¹ Gaddis, op. cit., p. 135.
- ¹⁷² Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 390.
- ¹⁷³ Wyman, David S., The Abandonment of the Jews (New York: Pantheon Books, 1984) p. 104
- ¹⁷⁴ Sachar, op. cit., p. 238.
- ¹⁷⁵ ibid., p. 238.
- ¹⁷⁶ ibid.
- ¹⁷⁷ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., pp. 21–22, Churchill's appreciation of the war situation, addressed to General Ismay for the C.O.S. Committee, January 6, 1941.
- ¹⁷⁸ Laqueur, Walter & B. Rubin (Eds.) The Israel-Arab Reader [New York: Penguin, 1984] Record of conversation between the Fuhrer and the Grand Mufti, p. 83.
- ¹⁷⁹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III The Grand Alliance, op. cit., Chapter XIV, pp. 204–215. Churchill's instructions to General Wavell in May 1941 and Hitler's Directive No. 30, May 23, 1941, indicate the nature of the crisis.
- ¹⁸⁰ Laqueur & Rubin, loc cit.
- ¹⁸¹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol IV The Hinge of Fate, op. cit., pp. 316–318 and p. 320, memo to General Auchinleck, refers to the weapons and the armoured division, but not the aircraft.
- ¹⁸² Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., pp. 336–337, refers to the diversion of the aircraft.
- ¹⁸³ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. IV The Hinge of Fate, op. cit., Chapter XXV, Decision for Torch, pp. 356–370.
- ¹⁸⁴ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 337.
- ¹⁸⁵ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. IV The Hinge of Fate, op. cit., p. 329.
- ¹⁸⁶ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 348.
- ¹⁸⁷ ibid., p. 387.
- ¹⁸⁸ ibid., pp. 392–397.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁸⁹ O'Connor, Richard The Oil Barons [Boston: Little Brown, 1972] p. 340.
- ¹⁹⁰ Arakie, Margaret The Broken Sword of Justice [London: Quartet, 1973] p. 36.
- ¹⁹¹ Letter Cicognani to Taylor, June 22, 1943, Library of Congress archives, located by the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, reported in The Washington Post, July 3, 1999, Reuters, [Source:<http://antipas.org/news/middle-east/pope-pius.html> as of October 30, 1999.]
- ¹⁹² Cornwell, op. cit., p. 247.
- ¹⁹³ Pope Pius XII Encyclical The Mystical Body of Christ [Melbourne: Australian Catholic Truth Society Record, 10 November 1958] p. 16.
- ¹⁹⁴ Matthew 5: 17–19, Jerusalem Bible Translation [London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1968] Reader's Edition.
- ¹⁹⁵ Pope Pius XII Mystical Body, op. cit., p. 18.
- ¹⁹⁶ Toland, op. cit., p. 807.
- ¹⁹⁷ Bettenson, Henry (Ed.) Documents of the Christian Church [Oxford: Oxford Uni. Press, 1963] pp. 115–116.
- ¹⁹⁸ Pope Pius XII Mystical Body, op. cit., p. 22.
- ¹⁹⁹ Neuner & Dupuis (Eds.) The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church [Bangalore: Theological Publications of India, 1978] Pope Pius XII, Mystical Body, p. 448.
- ²⁰⁰ This section of Mystici Corporis Christi is quoted from the translation in Neuner and Dupuis, op. cit., while the earlier quotations are from the translation published by the Australian Catholic Truth Society, op. cit. The emphasis in the two translations varies significantly and that from Neuner and Dupuis appears to this author to better reflect the meaning intended by the Pope in the circumstances in which the original was written.
- ²⁰¹ Pope Pius XII Mystical Body, op. cit., p. 58.
- ²⁰² Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 276–277.
- ²⁰³ Arakie, op. cit., p. 37.
- ²⁰⁴ Lilienthal, Zionist Connection, op. cit., p. 44.
- ²⁰⁵ Litvinoff, Barnett Weizmann: Last of the Patriarchs [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1976] p. 231.
- ²⁰⁶ ibid., pp. 232–233.
- ²⁰⁷ Roosevelt and Churchill had discussed the concept of unconditional surrender and while the British PM was in general agreement he sought to exclude Italy. He consulted the British war cabinet which did not share his concerns but the matter was not discussed again prior to Roosevelt's announcement.
- ²⁰⁸ Wilmot, Chester The Struggle for Europe [London: Collins, 1967] pp. 121–123.
- ²⁰⁹ ibid., pp. 127–129.
- ²¹⁰ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 266–267, drawing on material from the "Supplement to Preliminary Study on US and Allied Efforts to Recover and Restore Gold and Other Assets Stolen or Hidden During World War II", prepared by William Slany, official historian at the US Department of State. The study was published privately in 1998 by the Department of Economic, Business and Agricultural Affairs, and is cited as "Ustasha Treasury." Also cited: CIA Operational Files, October 11, 1946, cited in "Ustasha Treasury", D; and US Department of Justice, Criminal Division, Klaus Barbie and the US Government: A Report to the Attorney General of the United States.
- ²¹¹ Churchill, Sir Winston S. The Second World War, Vol. V Closing the Ring [London: Reprint Society, 1952], pp. 145–154.
- ²¹² Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 452.
- ²¹³ Reid R. W. Tongues of Conscience [London: Constable, 1969] p. 173.
- ²¹⁴ Montgomery-Hyde, H. The Atom Bomb Spies [London: Hamish Hamilton, 1980] pp. 80–81.
- ²¹⁵ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 241.
- ²¹⁶ ibid., p. 452.
- ²¹⁷ Montgomery-Hyde, op. cit. The first confirmed organized passing of classified information from physicists in Britain and the US to Russia took place about two years before Roosevelt and Churchill reached their momentous secret agreement at Hyde Park during the Quebec Conference. (p. 129) It coincided with the establishment by the British Government of a secret directorate, 'Tube Alloys' in October 1941 to coordinate all of the nuclear research which was being done independently at universities across Britain, and it was initiated not by Soviet intelligence but by Dr Klaus Fuchs, the son of a Lutheran Pastor who had joined the Quakers. Dr Fuchs became a dedicated Communist and was one of the German political refugees who fled from Germany during the Nazi purges of 1933. (p. 130) Although Soviet spying had been suspected by US intelligence it was not confirmed, nor were any people who had passed information identified until a Russian diplomat defected to Canada in September 1945, a month after the first bomb was dropped on Japan. (p. 131)
- ²¹⁸ ibid., p. 51.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- 219 ibid., p. 80.
- 220 ibid., p. 5.
- 221 Reid, op. cit., pp. 116–117.
- 222 Wilmot, op. cit., p. 662.
- 223 Reid, op. cit., pp. 183–186.
- 224 Montgomery-Hyde, op. cit., pp. 98–99.
- 225 ibid., p. 141.
- 226 Buss, op. cit., p. 498.
- 227 Zernov, Nicolas The Russians and their Church [London: SPCK, 1978] p. 164.
- 228 Walsh, op. cit., p. 526.
- 229 Irving, Hitler's War, op. cit., p. 548.
- 230 Shirer, op. cit., p. 1187.
- 231 Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 301–302, citing R. Katz, Black Sabbath [London; 1969] pp. 65, 85, 87; and O. Hacki, Pius XII [New York; 1951] pp. 192, 197.
- 232 Quotations from the Encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu of Pope Pius XII are from The Papal Encyclicals 1939–1958, Claudia Carlen IHM, [USA: McGrath/Consortium, 1981] pp. 65–80.
- 233 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 306, quoting from E. Mollhausen, La Carta Perente (Rome, 1948), 117, cited and translated in Katz, Black Sabbath.
- 234 ibid., p. 307, citing telegram from Weizsacker to Berlin, October 17, 1943, Inland II Geheim, quoted in Katz, Black Sabbath, 215.
- 235 ibid., p. 306, notes that Bishop. Hudal, rector of the German Catholic Church in Rome, later achieved fame as a key figure in assisting Nazi criminals to escape justice via Roman religious houses. He cites S. Wiesenthal, Justice Not Vengeance (London, 1989), p. 55.
- 236 ibid., pp. 302–312.
- 237 ibid., pp. 214–215, citing Teste, 836–37.
- 238 Memorandum Osborne to London, November 1, 1943; The Washington Post, July 3, 1999, Reuters, reporting documents located by the World Jewish Congress. [Source: http://antipas.org/news/middle_east/pope_pius.html].
- 239 Webster, Richard A. Christian Democracy in Italy 1860–1960 [London: Hollis & Carter, 1961] p. 118.
- 240 ibid., pp. 162–163.
- 241 Lewy, op. cit., pp. 300–302.
- 242 ibid., p. 302.
- 243 Toland, op. cit., p. 1042.
- 244 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 311.
- 245 ibid., p. 319, citing FO, 371/43869/21; quoted in O. Chadwick, Britain and the Vatican during the Second World War (Cambridge, 1986), 290.
- 246 Irving, Hitler's War, op. cit., p. 568.
- 247 ibid., op. cit., p. 577.
- 248 Toland, op. cit., p. 1055.
- 249 Toland, op. cit., citing documents from the Mullern Schonhausen Collection.
- 250 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. V Closing the Ring, op. cit., pp. 154–155.
- 251 Sachar, op. cit., p. 241.
- 252 ibid., p. 241.
- 253 ibid.
- 254 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. V Closing the Ring, op. cit., p. 238.
- 255 Yahil, op. cit., p. 608.
- 256 Australian Archives, CRS, A433, item 44/2/50, Cabinet papers, letter from Prime Minister John Curtin to Dr. I. N. Steinberg, 28/10/43.
- 257 Bowers, Tom Blind Eye to Murder (London: Andre Deutsch, 1981) pp. 81–2.
- 258 ibid., pp. 82–4.
- 259 Gaddis, op. cit., 88–89; Loth, op. cit., pp. 66.
- 260 Gaddis, op. cit., pp. 89–90; Loth, op. cit., p. 67.
- 261 Gaddis, op. cit. pp. 88–90; Kolko, Gabriel The Politics of War: The World and United States Foreign Policy 1943–1945 (New York: Random House, 1968), pp. 38–9.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- 262 Gaddis op. cit. p. 90.
- 263 Sainsbury, Keith The Turning Point (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985) pp. 21–31.
- 264 ibid., pp. 12–21, 31–36.
- 265 ibid. pp. 53–109.
- 266 Gaddis, op. cit., p. 106–7; Kolko, op. cit., p. 40; Loth, op. cit., pp. 65–66.
- 267 Sainsbury, op. cit., pp. 53–109.
- 268 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. V Closing the Ring, op. cit., pp. 230–239, discussed the change from from three power to four power talks and indicates some concern at the American proposal to make the change!
- 269 Sainsbury op. cit. p. 108.
- 270 ibid., p. 117.
- 271 Loth, op. cit. p. 21.
- 272 Gaddis, op. cit., p. 90.
- 273 Buss, op. cit., p. 472.
- 274 ibid., p. 472.
- 275 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. V Closing the Ring, op. cit., p. 259.
- 276 Buss, op. cit., p. 465.
- 277 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. V Closing the Ring, op. cit., p. 264.
- 278 ibid., p. 259.
- 279 Buss, op. cit., p. 479.
- 280 Wilmot, op. cit., pp. 139–141.
- 281 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. V Closing the Ring, op. cit., pp. 314–316.
- 282 ibid., p. 286.
- 283 Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. IV The Hinge of Fate, op. cit., pp. 644–646.
- 284 Loth, op. cit., p. 30.
- 285 The words of Roosevelt's personal assistant, Harry Hopkins. Loth, op. cit., p. 30.
- 286 Wilmot, op. cit., p. 142.
- 287 Buss, op. cit., p. 492.
- 288 ibid., p. 452.
- 289 Toland, op. cit., p. 1057.
- 290 ibid., p. 1066.
- 291 Lapide, Pinchas E. The Last Three Popes and the Jews [London: Souvenir, 1967] p. 222.
- 292 Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 509.
- 293 Sachar, op. cit., p. 238.
- 294 Arakie, op. cit., p. 38.
- 295 Shwadrان, Benjamin The Middle East, Oil and the Great Powers [New York: Praeger, 1960] pp. 319–320.
- 296 ibid., 322–323.
- 297 Lilienthal, Zionist Connection, op. cit., p. 37.
- 298 Arakie, op. cit., p. 39.
- 299 Laqueur, A History of Zionism, op. cit., p. 554.
- 300 Lilienthal, Zionist Connection, op. cit., p. 38.
- 301 Arakie, op. cit., p. 93.
- 302 Sachar, op. cit., p. 266.
- 303 Koestler, Arthur Promise and Fulfillment: Palestine 1917–1949 [London: Macmillan, 1983] p. 94.
- 304 Tokayer, op. cit., p. 254, 256.
- 305 ibid., pp. 257–258.
- 306 ibid., pp. 259–260.
- 307 ibid., p. 10.
- 308 Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 166, 203.
- 309 Sachar, Howard M. The Course of Modern Jewish History pp. 239, 374.
- 310 Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 363.
- 311 ibid., p. 509.
- 312 Cornwell, op. cit., p. 324.
- 313 ibid., p. 325.

- ³¹⁴ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 525, says deportation of Hungarian Jews began on May 15, but a change of date does not affect the significance of the situation.
- ³¹⁵ Reports of this incident differ. Lapide, op. cit., wrote that after consulting the Russians, Churchill refused. Gilbert, op. cit., wrote that Churchill supported the plan and instructed Eden to arrange it. The RAF was sceptical about losing British airmen's lives "for no purpose" and said the plan would require daylight bombing by the US. The Assistant Secretary of War, John J McCloy, then instructed that the plan be 'killed'. O'Carroll, op. cit., refers to the minutes of the Eichmann trial in Jerusalem which indicate that it was the US Secretary of State for Air who stopped the plan on the grounds of 'technical difficulties' – an exchange of notes between Churchill and the Russians.
- ³¹⁶ Lapide, op. cit., pp. 218–219.
- ³¹⁷ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 546.
- ³¹⁸ O'Carroll, op. cit., pp. 102–103.
- ³¹⁹ Cornwell, loc. cit.
- ³²⁰ ibid., citing R. Brabham, The Politics of Genocide: The Holocaust and Hungary, Vol. 2 (New York, 1981), 1068–1069, quoting from H. Fein, Accounting for Genocide (New York, 1979), 110; ADSS, x, 328; P. Lapidé, The Last Three Popes and the Jews (London, 1967), 153; and R. Brabham, The Holocaust in Hungary: A Retrospective Analysis, in Genocide and Rescue: The Holocaust in Hungary, 1944, ed. D. Cesarani (Oxford, 1997), 41.
- ³²¹ Accounts of the end of deportation also differ. According to Sachar, op. cit., deportation continued until the red Army entered Hungary. But Gilbert, op. cit., gives the number deported as 347,000 and reports that the program stopped on July 8 when Horthy, under pressure from the US, the Pope, the International Red Cross and the King of Sweden as a result of publicity about Auschwitz following the escapes, stood up to Hitler and said 'enough is enough'.
- ³²² Sachar, The Course of Modern Jewish History, op. cit., pp. 455–456.
- ³²³ Sachar, A History of Israel, op. cit., p. 239.
- ³²⁴ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 550.
- ³²⁵ Lapidé, op. cit., pp. 221–222.
- ³²⁶ Catholic Almanac 1990, p. 248.
- ³²⁷ Neuner & Dupuis, op. cit., p. 301, extracts from an address by Pope Pius XII to directors of Pontifical Mission Works.
- ³²⁸ Proposals for a third institution, the World Trade Organization, never got off the ground. Its place was taken by the more modest General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in 1948. The WTO was belatedly established in 1994.
- ³²⁹ Pollard, Robert A. Economic Security and the Origins of the Cold War, 1945–1950 (New York: Columbia University Press, 1985), p. 12.
- ³³⁰ See, for example, Paterson, Thomas G. Soviet-American Confrontation: Postwar Reconstruction and the Origins of the Cold War (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973) pp. 4–5; Loth, op. cit., pp. 22–3; Pollard, op. cit., p. 8 ff.
- ³³¹ Pollard op. cit. p. 13.
- ³³² Kolko op. cit. p. 246.
- ³³³ Paterson, op. cit., pp. 1–2; Pollard, op. cit. pp. 8–9.
- ³³⁴ Kolko, op. cit., p. 252.
- ³³⁵ ibid., p. 252; Loth, p. 23.
- ³³⁶ ibid., p. 253.
- ³³⁷ Kolko, Gabriel and Kolko, Joyce The Limits of Power: The World and United States Foreign Policy, 1945–1954 (New York: Harper and Row, 1972) p. 21.
- ³³⁸ Pollard, op. cit., pp. 198–201 notes that, along with America's traditional self-reliance in the supply of raw materials, underestimates of current reserves and overestimates of future consumption levels made the perception of post-war shortages worse than the reality. However, he also notes that the concerns were heightened for reasons of security, with the State Dept. preferring lower cost imported minerals rather than subsidized domestic production in its stockpiling programme in order to conserve domestic reserves.
- ³³⁹ Along with the issue of access to markets, the principle that raw materials supplies must be available to all nations without discrimination was a vital aspect of the United States desire to break up the Sterling bloc. One mode of expressing that desire was anti-colonialism, but of course, Its ability to take a radical position on that issue, except on an economic level, was limited by its own plans for post-war trusteeships, particularly in the Philippines. ibid., p. 260.
- ³⁴⁰ Paterson op. cit. p. 7.
- ³⁴¹ Kolko, Politics of War, op. cit., p. 253.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³⁴² The basis for US designs had been laid in the British Lend-Lease agreement of Feb 1942, Article VII of which committed the US and Britain to economic cooperation after the war through the freeing of trade and the pursuit of full employment. Two years of subsequent bilateral negotiations had seen US proposals pitted against alternative British plans. American plans had been drawn up by Assistant Secretary of the US Treasury, Harry D. White. The competing British plan had been drawn up by noted economist and Chancellor of the Exchequer, J. Maynard Keynes. Described as "thirty years ahead of its time", it was more ambitious than the White plan and foresaw many measures later adopted by the Bretton Woods powers in Rio de Janeiro in 1968. For the Americans, with an eye on Congress and the conservative US business community, it was too ambitious, introducing for the first time into international finance the idea of created money – in extremely large volumes to boot, which the Americans feared would contribute to inflationary pressures in the US. It was also too lax for the Americans on the subject of managing exchange rates. In the end, a modified version of the White Plan was submitted as the joint Anglo-American proposal. For a brief overview of the competing plans see Scammell, WC The International Economy Since 1945 (London: Macmillan, 1980) pp. 2–18.
- ³⁴³ Paterson op. cit. pp. 150–151.
- ³⁴⁴ Scammell, op. cit., p. 17; Paterson, op. cit., p. 152.
- ³⁴⁵ Pollard, op. cit., pp. 14–15; Loth, op. cit., pp. 24–25.
- ³⁴⁶ Paterson, op. cit., p. 155.
- ³⁴⁷ ibid., p. 59; Loth op. cit. p. 63.
- ³⁴⁸ Loth op. cit. pp. 25–6.
- ³⁴⁹ Pollard, op. cit., p. 18.
- ³⁵⁰ ibid., p. 155.
- ³⁵¹ ibid., p. 149, 154–155.
- ³⁵² ibid., p. 15.
- ³⁵³ ibid., pp. 34–5, 148.
- ³⁵⁴ Lichtheim, George Europe in the Twentieth Century [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1972] pp. 273–274, attributes the figure of 3,700,000 deaths of POWs in German hands to German officials; cites an estimate of other Soviet military deaths of 4,000,000, and indicates that total casualties, including civilian, may have been of the order of 20,000,000.
- ³⁵⁵ Goralski, Robert World War II Almanac 1931–1945 [London: Hamish Hamilton, 1981] p. 428, lists Soviet Union casualties as: military dead, 13,600,000; military wounded, 5,000,000; civilian dead, 7,720,000.
- ³⁵⁶ Ellis, John World War II A Statistical Survey [New York: Facts on File; 1993] p. 254, lists Soviet Union casualties as: killed and missing, 11,000,000; wounded, no figures available; Prisoners of War, c. 6,000,000; civilian casualties, 6,700,000.
- ³⁵⁷ Bruce, op. cit., p. 73.
- ³⁵⁸ ibid., pp. 37–39.
- ³⁵⁹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol V Closing the Ring, op. cit., p. 285.
- ³⁶⁰ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 566.
- ³⁶¹ Bruce, op. cit., pp. 154–155.
- ³⁶² Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 581.
- ³⁶³ Bruce, op. cit., pp. 200–207.
- ³⁶⁴ Churchill, Sir Winston S., The Second World War, Vol. VI, Triumph and Tragedy [London: Reprint Society, 1954], pp. 549–550.
- ³⁶⁵ ibid., p. 89.
- ³⁶⁶ ibid., p. 104.
- ³⁶⁷ Davis, op. cit., pp. 165–6; Kolko, op. cit., p. 263.
- ³⁶⁸ Westoby, Adam Communism Since World War II (Brighton: The Harvester Press, 1981) pp. 19–20, 28; Kolko, op. cit., pp. 85–7, 96–8.
- ³⁶⁹ Stinnett, op. cit., p. 77, citing Gordon Prange, At Dawn We Slept (McGraw Hill, 1981) p. 646.
- ³⁷⁰ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 138–141.
- ³⁷¹ Loth, op. cit. p. 17.
- ³⁷² For extensive discussion, see Kuklick, Bruce pp. 39–73; Backer pp. 32–40.
- ³⁷³ Kuniholm, Bruce Robert The Origins of the Cold War in the Near East (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1980) pp. 142–201.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³⁷⁴ Macdonald, Robert W. The League of Arab States [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1965] p. 38, footnote quoting Hull.
- ³⁷⁵ ibid., pp. 37–39.
- ³⁷⁶ ibid., Appendix A, pp. 315–318 The Alexandria Protocol.
- ³⁷⁷ Allen, Richard A. Imperialism and Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford, 1974] p. 356.
- ³⁷⁸ Arakie, op. cit., p. 41.
- ³⁷⁹ Lilienthal, Zionist Connection, op. cit., p. 38.
- ³⁸⁰ Sachar, The Course of Modern Jewish History, op. cit., p. 523.
- ³⁸¹ Laqueur, A History of Zionism, op. cit., p. 554.
- ³⁸² Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., p. 195.
- ³⁸³ ibid., pp. 200–205.
- ³⁸⁴ Wilmot, op. cit., p. 629.
- ³⁸⁵ Kimball, op. cit. p. 163–4.
- ³⁸⁶ Boegner, op. cit., p. 198.
- ³⁸⁷ ibid., p. 199.
- ³⁸⁸ O'Carroll, op. cit., p. 99.
- ³⁸⁹ Sachar, A History of Israel, op. cit., pp. 464–470.
- ³⁹⁰ ibid., pp. 247–248.
- ³⁹¹ Allen, op. cit., p. 360.
- ³⁹² ibid., p. 365.
- ³⁹³ Reid, op. cit., pp. 111–112.
- ³⁹⁴ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 613.
- ³⁹⁵ Reid, op. cit., p. 180.
- ³⁹⁶ Kuniholm, op. cit., pp. 142–201
- ³⁹⁷ Webster, op. cit., pp. 171–173.
- ³⁹⁸ Wilmot, op. cit., p. 637.
- ³⁹⁹ Cornwell, op. cit., pp. 326–327, citing P. Preston, Franco (London, 1995), p. 622.
- ⁴⁰⁰ ibid., pp. 326–328, citing AAS, Vol. 37, 1945, 10–23; and Leo XIII, encyclical Libertas, June 20, 1888.
- ⁴⁰¹ ibid., p. 328.
- ⁴⁰² ibid., op. cit., pp. 328–329.
- ⁴⁰³ Pius XI, Pope, encyclical Divini Redemptoris, English translation, [Melbourne: Australian Catholic Truth Society, 1937] Note 8, p. 4.
- ⁴⁰⁴ ibid., notes 50,31,45,46, pp. 25,15,22,23.
- ⁴⁰⁵ ibid., note 30, p. 18.
- ⁴⁰⁶ Macdonald, op. cit., p. 41.
- ⁴⁰⁷ Lilienthal, Zionist Connection, op. cit., p. 39.
- ⁴⁰⁸ Shwadran, op. cit., p. 330.
- ⁴⁰⁹ Lilienthal, Zionist Connection, op. cit., p. 39.
- ⁴¹⁰ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 632.
- ⁴¹¹ Shirer, op. cit., p. 1034.
- ⁴¹² Toland, op. cit., p. 1157.
- ⁴¹³ Shirer, op. cit., p. 1304.
- ⁴¹⁴ Toland, op. cit., p. 1160.
- ⁴¹⁵ Vago, Bela 'Romania', in McCauley, Mark [Ed.] Communist Power In Europe, 1944–1949 (London: Macmillan, 1977) pp. 112–5.
- ⁴¹⁶ Westoby op. cit. pp. 38–9.
- ⁴¹⁷ ibid., p. 38–9, 57. In Sept 1945 a US journalist from the "Christian Science Monitor" estimated that 200,000 Bulgarians had been killed in the preceding year, chiefly as acts of vengeance against the old authorities. The British estimated 40–50,000 between January and July. Included were nearly all the ministers and officials of the wartime government executed Feb 1945. Many thousands were also in prison. According to historian Hugh Thomas, the occupying Red Army played little or no direct part in this, but their presence gave the local Communists great advantage. Thomas, Hugh Armed Conflict: The Beginnings of the Cold War, 1945–46 (London: Hamish Hamilton, 1986) p. 294.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁴¹⁸ Davies pp. 42–44.
- ⁴¹⁹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., p. 302.
- ⁴²⁰ ibid., p. 303.
- ⁴²¹ ibid., p. 302.
- ⁴²² ibid., p. 304.
- ⁴²³ ibid., p. 291.
- ⁴²⁴ Clemens, Diane Shaver Yalta (New York: Oxford University Press, 1970) pp. 140–150; Laloy, Jean Yalta: Yesterday, Today, Tomorrow (Harper and Row: New York, 1988) pp. 71–72.
- ⁴²⁵ Loth op. cit. p. 7.
- ⁴²⁶ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI Triumph and Tragedy pp. 292–293.
- ⁴²⁷ Clemens op. cit. pp. 216–240 Egypt declared war against Germany in February, presumably as a consequence of Roosevelt's talks with Farouk, Turkey on February 2, Finland on March 3 and Argentina on March 27, but the eligibility requirements were modified so that certain other countries could also become founding members.
- ⁴²⁸ La Feber, Walter America, Russia and the Cold War, 1945–1984 (New York: Alfred A Knopf, 1985) p. 14.
- ⁴²⁹ Davis op. cit. pp. 174–5.
- ⁴³⁰ ibid., pp. 174–5, 360–1; Clemens op. cit. pp. 262–264.
- ⁴³¹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., p. 254.
- ⁴³² Buss, op. cit., p. 480, quoting the secret agreement in full.
- ⁴³³ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol VI Triumph and Tragedy, p. 319.
- ⁴³⁴ Churchill had expressed the same view on October 3 while addressing the Commons on the need to extend the life of that parliament to the end of the war with Germany, and alternative timings for a British general election.
- ⁴³⁵ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., p. 468.
- ⁴³⁶ Wilmot, op. cit., p. 653.
- ⁴³⁷ Quoted in Kuniholm, op. cit. p. 230.
- ⁴³⁸ ibid., p. 231.
- ⁴³⁹ Lilienthal, Zionist Connection, op. cit., p. 40.
- ⁴⁴⁰ ibid., p. 41.
- ⁴⁴¹ Loc. cit.
- ⁴⁴² Toland, op. cit., pp. 1165–1172.
- ⁴⁴³ Lilienthal, Zionist Connection, op. cit., p. 42.
- ⁴⁴⁴ Macdonald, op. cit., pp. 41–42.
- ⁴⁴⁵ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 642.
- ⁴⁴⁶ ibid., p. 649.
- ⁴⁴⁷ de Senarclens, Pierre Yalta (New Brunswick: Transaction, 1988) p. 79.
- ⁴⁴⁸ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 343 ff.
- ⁴⁴⁹ Davis op. cit. pp. 266.
- ⁴⁵⁰ ibid., p. 256–61; Vago, op. cit., p. 112–18.
- ⁴⁵¹ Davis, op. cit., pp. 261–65; Vago, op. cit., p. 118–22.
- ⁴⁵² Kimball op. cit., pp. 173 ff; Davis, op. cit. pp. 65–66; see also Churchill, Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., p. 344–5 In his memoirs Churchill claimed that the original percentages agreement "could not, and so far as I was concerned was never intended to, govern or affect the future of these wide regions once Germany was defeated." If that statement was not a disingenuous retrospective justification of the agreement in the light of subsequent events then at the very least the agreement itself was disingenuous i.e. it was an expedient way of getting Stalin to acquiesce in Britain's anti-Communist push in Greece in the hope that the Soviets could be prevented from doing the reverse in Eastern Europe, and that once it was proven that they could not be so stopped that it was acceptable to break the spirit of the agreement – even before Germany was defeated. His argument that the operation in Greece was intended to support the reestablishment of democracy is flawed by the basic fact that many of those who gained from the British operations were fascist collaborators and sympathizers, and no more democratically minded than the Greek communists. see Churchill, Triumph and Tragedy, p. 274.
- ⁴⁵³ Gaddis, op. cit., p. 162.
- ⁴⁵⁴ Kimball, op. cit., pp. 172 ff.
- ⁴⁵⁵ ibid., pp. 174–175.
- ⁴⁵⁶ Kuniholm, op. cit., p. 255.

- ⁴⁵⁷ ibid., p. 256.
- ⁴⁵⁸ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 371–73.
- ⁴⁵⁹ Calvocoressi, P., Wint, G. and Pritchard, G. Total War, The Causes and Courses of the Second World War [London: Penguin, 1989].
- ⁴⁶⁰ Davis, op. cit., pp. 203–4; Loth, op. cit., p. 84.
- ⁴⁶¹ Loth, op. cit., p. 83/
- ⁴⁶² La Feber, Walter The Origins of the Cold War, 1941–1947 (New York: John Wiley and Sons, Inc, 1971) p. 96.
- ⁴⁶³ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 359.
- ⁴⁶⁴ See Operation Sunrise.
- ⁴⁶⁵ The Yalta agreement was actually a decision to implement a prior accord between Yugoslav communist partisan leader Marshall Tito, whose forces constituted de-facto government, and the Prime Minister of the Yugoslav government in exile Dr Ivan Subasic, following which Britain recognized the new government and the US extended provisional recognition pending scheduled elections. Davis, op. cit. pp. 335–47; Alperovitz, Gar Atomic Diplomacy: Hiroshima and Potsdam (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1965) pp. 20–21.
- ⁴⁶⁶ Davis, op. cit., p. 216–8. See also Loth, op. cit., pp. 86–7
- ⁴⁶⁷ Buss, op. cit., P. 456.
- ⁴⁶⁸ Lapide, op. cit., p. 177.
- ⁴⁶⁹ Lilienthal, Zionist Connection, op. cit., p. 45.
- ⁴⁷⁰ Cornwell, op. cit., p. 317, quoted from K. Scholder, Requiem for Hitler: And Other New Perspectives on the German Church Struggle, Eng. Trans. (London, 1989), 166.
- ⁴⁷¹ Neuner & Dupuis. (Eds.) The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church [Bangalore: Theological Publications of India, 1978] Pope Pius XII, Mystical Body, p. 448.
- ⁴⁷² This section of Mystici Corporis Christi is quoted from the translation in The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church, edited by Neuner and Dupuis, op. cit., while the earlier quotations are from the translation published by the Australian Catholic Truth Society. The emphasis in the two translations varies significantly and that from Neuner and Dupuis appears to this author to better reflect the meaning intended by the Pope in the circumstances in which the original was written

Chapter 26: The Grand Design ... or ... it's my turn to play policeman

- ¹ Luard, Evan, A History of the United Nations (London: Macmillan, 1982) two Vols., Vol. 1, pp. 39, 43–44.
- ² Robertson, Charles L., International Politics Since World War II (New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1966) p. 37.
- ³ Luard op. cit. p. 58.
- ⁴ ibid., p. 60.
- ⁵ ibid., p. 59.
- ⁶ The figure of 6 million released immediately after the war was subsequently revised.
- ⁷ Ovendale, Richie Britain, The United States and the End of the Palestine Mandate (London: Beydell Press, 1989) pp. 67–9.
- ⁸ Kolko, G. The Politics of War: The World and United States Foreign Policy, 1943–5, (New York: Random House, 1968) p. 490; Paterson, T. Soviet-American Confrontation: Post-war reconstruction and the Origins of the Cold War (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973) p. 161.
- ⁹ Churchill, Sir Winston S., The Second World War, Vol VI Triumph and Tragedy [London: Reprint Society, 1954], p. 370.
- ¹⁰ Between 1941 and 1945 at least 20,000,000 Soviet citizens had lost their lives, either in the war itself or as a result of effects such as overwork or under-nourishment – more than 10% of the pre-war population and almost half of the war's total. 25 million people had lost their homes; 1,710 towns and 70,000 villages had been destroyed. The economy was near collapse: 65,000 km's of railway had been damaged, agriculture was in disarray as a result of battles on Soviet soil and German occupation, and industrial production was down considerably, despite prodigious output of tanks, guns, aircraft and other war materials. Some 31,000 factories, including major industrial centres in Kharkov, Krivoi Rog, Zaporozhie, Rostov, Odessa, Leningrad and Stalingrad, had been destroyed. Loth, Wilfried The Division of the World, 1941–1955 [London: Routledge, 1988], op. cit. p. 34; Grey, Ian Stalin, Man of History (London: Abacus, 1982) p. 426.
- ¹¹ Djilas, Milovan 'Conversations with Stalin', extract in LaFeber, Walter The Origins of the Cold War, 1941–1947 [New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 1971], p. 49.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹² Loth, op. cit., p. 39
- ¹³ See LaFeber, Walter America, Russia and the Cold War, 1945–1984 (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1985), p. 18; Loth, op. cit., p. 39 ff; Westoby, Adam Communism Since World War II (Brighton: The Harvester Press, 1981) p. 35–6; Djilas, Milovan 'Conversations with Stalin', extract in LaFeber, op. cit., p. 49.
- ¹⁴ Loth, op. cit., p. 34; LaFeber, (1985), op. cit., p. 20–21.
- ¹⁵ LaFeber, (1985), loc. cit.
- ¹⁶ Loth, op. cit., pp. 61–2.
- ¹⁷ Loth, op. cit., pp. 35–6; LaFeber, (1985), op. cit., p. 20.
- ¹⁸ Loth, op. cit., p. 554.
- ¹⁹ ibid., pp. 38–9.
- ²⁰ ibid.
- ²¹ LaFeber, (1985), op. cit., p. 30.
- ²² Westoby, op. cit., pp. 19–20, 28; Kolko (1968), op. cit., pp. 85–7, 96–8.
- ²³ Loth, op. cit., p. 46; a further reason was that, in contrast to their attitude to much of the rest of eastern Europe, the USA had consistently displayed a keen interest in retaining a democratic order in Finland throughout the war.
- ²⁴ Unfortunately, in his enthusiasm for accommodation with the Soviets, Benes showed a less enlightened attitude in his treatment of the ethnic questions which had provided the initial rationale for the conflict in the region, asking the Soviets for their support transferring Czechoslovakia's Hungarian minority and the German's of the Sudetenland. He also 'invited' them to punish Slovakian fascists who had been responsible for war against the USSR, and in addition offered them the eastern territory of Ruthenia. See Loth, op. cit., p. 44; Kolko (1968), op. cit., p. 121–7; Kusin, Vladimir essay on 'Czechoslovakia' in McCauley, Mark, [Ed.] Communist Power in Europe, 1944–1949 (London: Macmillan, 1977) p. 75.
- ²⁵ Loth, op. cit., p. 44.
- ²⁶ Davis, Lynn Etheridge, The Cold War Begins: Soviet-American Conflict in Eastern Europe (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1974), p. 192; Kolko (1968), op. cit., pp. 127–8. The British had initially opposed it on the grounds that it would interfere with Polish plans for an Eastern European confederation which they supported, and they wanted to use friendly relations with the Czechs as a reward for Soviet cooperation on Poland. Eventually, they withdrew their objections when it became clear that the confederation plan would never succeed. See above (Ch 29 p. ?).
- ²⁷ Kolko (1968), op. cit., p. 121 ff.
- ²⁸ Westoby, op. cit., pp. 39–40; Loth, op. cit., p. 46.
- ²⁹ Luard op. cit. p. 39–40.
- ³⁰ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 391–93.
- ³¹ Yergin op. cit. p. 84.
- ³² See, for example, Sherwin, Martin A World Destroyed: Hiroshima and the Origins of the Arms Race (New York: Vintage Books, 1987) pp. 146–53
- ³³ Davis, op. cit., pp. 219–20; Sherwin, op. cit., p. 155–56.
- ³⁴ Loth, op. cit., p. 87.
- ³⁵ Sherwin, op. cit., pp. 154–56.
- ³⁶ Those present included Harriman, Stettinius, Secretary of the Navy Forrestal, and Admiral Leahy.
- ³⁷ Yergin, op. cit., pp. 81–2; Sherwin, op. cit., 156–7; LaFeber, (1971), op. cit., pp. 99–100.
- ³⁸ ibid., p. 82.
- ³⁹ The official report was in fact made the next day, and adopted by the JCoS on May 10. Alperovitz, Gar, Atomic Diplomacy: Hiroshima and Potsdam (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1965) pp. 30–32.
- ⁴⁰ Sherwin, op. cit., pp. 158–9.
- ⁴¹ LaFeber, (1971), op. cit., p. 101–2.
- ⁴² Sherwin, op. cit., pp. 121–140.
- ⁴³ Herken, Gregg The Winning Weapon [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1980], pp. 13–14.
- ⁴⁴ Sherwin, op. cit., pp. 162–3; 108–112; 135–137; 167 and passim.
- ⁴⁵ ibid., pp. 163–4.
- ⁴⁶ ibid.
- ⁴⁷ Luard, op. cit. p. 40.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

48. Argentina had not met the conditions for membership. – declaring war on the Axis prior to the March 1 deadline set up by the United States to enable Latin American participation.(ibid., pp. 39–43).
49. Sherwin, op. cit., p. 170.
50. Churchill, The Second World War, Vol VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 400, 411–12.
51. ibid., pp. 397–402; Alperovitz (1965), op. cit., pp. 43–5.
52. ibid., p. 413 Churchill had argued to Roosevelt that there was a need to fortify the West's bargaining position over the as yet incomplete agreement on the zonal division of Austria, which Russia would very likely almost entirely occupy. To Truman, however, he initially put forward a different case: the need to set up the Allied Control Commission in Berlin as quickly as possible and to ensure that Germans in the British industrial zone got fed from the Russian food-producing zone.
53. Alperovitz (1965), op. cit., pp. 44–5.
54. ibid., p. 45; Churchill, Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit. pp. 414–15.
55. Alperovitz (1965), op. cit., pp. 46–7; Churchill, Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 416–7.
56. Churchill, Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., p. 416.
57. ibid., pp. 413–4.
58. ibid., pp. 407–8; Davis, op. cit., pp. 358–61.
59. Feis, Herbert, Between War and Peace, The Potsdam Conference [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1960] p. 39.
60. ibid., op. cit., p. 40–1; Churchill, Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit. pp. 442–3.
61. Feis, op. cit. 41–3.
62. Yergin, op. cit. p. 89.
63. Churchill, The Second World War, Vol VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 404–5.
64. ibid., op. cit., pp. 432–33.
65. Alperovitz, Gar The Dropping of the Atomic Bomb and the Architecture of an American Myth, p. 138.
66. Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit. pp. 456–58.
67. ibid., pp. 458–9; Kolko (1968), pp. 382–88, 411–14.
68. Gaddis, John Lewis, The United States and the Origins of the Cold War, 1941–1947 [New York: Columbia University Press, 1972], pp. 218–9; Yergin, op. cit. p. 94–5; for a version of these events more critical of Truman's role see Paterson, op. cit., pp. 53–44.
69. Yergin, op. cit., p. 93.
70. Gaddis, op. cit., pp. 221–2; Yergin, op. cit., pp. 95–6.
71. Kuklick, op. cit., p. 118–9; Yergin, op. cit., p. 96.
72. And as a result, the new approach at the same time also effectively spelled the end of the draconian Morgenthau Plan, which as yet had not been officially repudiated. Ironically, the new proposals had been agreed upon by Morgenthau's supporters, who wanted to remove any pretext which might have been used to leave significant parts of Germany's industry intact. Crucially, however, their rationale would become invalidated if and when the dismantlement process had to be abandoned, and since disagreement with the Soviets in the long term was now a virtual certainty, the likelihood of that had now also skyrocketed. Kuklick, op. cit. pp. 135–8, 123–5; Backer, op. cit. 41–2 Already more explicit moves were underway to finally ditch the Morgenthau approach. On the same day as the order to cut off Lend Lease, another decision had also been taken concerning the US Joint Chiefs of Staff directive which laid out policy for the administration of military government in Germany in the interim between VE-Day and the time when the Allies completed long range occupation plans. Known as JCS 1067, the directive had been initially formulated the previous September under the strong influence of the Morgenthau Plan, and had subsequently been the subject of fierce debate between those in Morgenthau's Treasury Department who favoured a repressive approach to Germany and others who favoured rehabilitation. By May, however, Treasury had substantially won out, but important concessions had been made which signalled the beginning of the end for Morgenthau's approach. Fearful that economic chaos could lead to political instability and communist penetration, Secretary of War Stimson, an opponent of Morgenthau's overall vision, had inserted an 'escape clause' which directed the military government to ensure the production and maintenance of goods and services required to prevent starvation or such disease and unrest as would endanger the occupying forces. Sharing Stimson's concerns, Truman when signing JCS 1067 on May 11 further made it clear that he was not opposed to modifications. See Kuklick, op. cit. pp. 86–92, 115–9; Backer, op. cit. pp. 32–40, 103–7; Gaddis, op. cit. pp. 114–31, 237.
73. Yergin, op. cit., p. 95.
74. Gaddis, op. cit., p. 211; Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., pp. 101, 106; Sherwin, op. cit., p. 189.
75. La Feber (1985), op. cit. p. 30.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁷⁶ See Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., pp. 23–26 for an account of many of these. Significantly, Alperovitz also notes that no positive documentary evidence has yet been found that demonstrates that the question of possible domestic opposition was ever a factor in calculations regarding the modification of surrender terms.
- ⁷⁷ ibid., pp. 39–40.
- ⁷⁸ ibid., pp. 40–1, 56–8.
- ⁷⁹ ibid., pp. 37–8 It is also the case, as previously noted, that the Allies eventually allowed the Emperor to retain the throne.
- ⁸⁰ ibid., pp. 42–3.
- ⁸¹ ibid., pp. 113–4. The assessment was essentially correct. In a series of meeting between May 11 and 14, the Japanese Supreme Council for the Direction of the War had decided that, “while Japan is fighting with the UK and the US, once the Soviets entered the war, Japan will face inevitable defeat; therefore, whatever happens in the war with the US and UK, Japan has to try as much as possible to prevent the Soviet Union from entering the war.” ibid. pp. 116–9.
- ⁸² Sherwin, op. cit., p. 190; Gaddis, op. cit., pp. 213.
- ⁸³ Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., pp. 145–8.
- ⁸⁴ Sherwin, op. cit., pp. 184–5; Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., p. 139–40.
- ⁸⁵ Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., p. 148; Sherwin, op. cit., p. 145.
- ⁸⁶ Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., p. 140.
- ⁸⁷ See for example Loth, Yergin, Gaddis, op. cit. For the origins of the Hopkins mission, see Sherwin, p. 184.
- ⁸⁸ See Sherwin, op. cit., pp. 178–84; Yergin, op. cit., pp. 100–102.
- ⁸⁹ Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., p. 153.
- ⁹⁰ Luard, op. cit., pp. 45–6.
- ⁹¹ Gaddis, op. cit., pp. 167–170; 227–28.
- ⁹² ibid., p. 52; LaFeber (1985), op. cit. pp. 22–3.
- ⁹³ Luard, op. cit., p. 52.
- ⁹⁴ LaFeber (1985), op. cit., p. 23.
- ⁹⁵ Luard, op. cit., p. 58–60.
- ⁹⁶ Yergin, op. cit., pp. 88–89.
- ⁹⁷ ibid., pp. 60–61.
- ⁹⁸ ibid., pp. 61–2.
- ⁹⁹ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 450–2.
- ¹⁰⁰ Yergin, op. cit., pp. 102–3; Feis (1960), op. cit., p. 97–116.
- ¹⁰¹ Yergin, op. cit., 103; Feis (1960), op. cit., pp. 97–116.
- ¹⁰² Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., p. 141.
- ¹⁰³ Feis (1960), op. cit. pp. 110–112.
- ¹⁰⁴ ibid., pp. 205–15.
- ¹⁰⁵ Quoted in Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., p. 147.
- ¹⁰⁶ ibid., pp. 45–6.
- ¹⁰⁷ ibid., pp. 54–5.
- ¹⁰⁸ ibid., pp. 51–2.
- ¹⁰⁹ Feis, Herbert The Atomic Bomb and the End of World War II (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1970) p. 48.
- ¹¹⁰ For discussion of Byrnes’ role in helping form the Committee’s conclusions, see Feis (1970), op. cit., pp. 42–43; Sherwin, op. cit., pp. 205 ff; Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., Ch 12. For more discussion of Byrnes’ attitudes and general role in atomic decision making, see Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., Chapters 15 to 17.
- ¹¹¹ A panel of industrialists associated with the bomb project gave their estimates the next day. These ranged from five to ten years, or shorter if the Soviets benefited from knowledge gained through espionage or from assistance by German scientists. On the 31st the Committee first heard from a panel of specially selected Manhattan Project scientists, including Robert Oppenheimer, who outlined the development of the atomic weapons program. Three types of bomb were described. The first, already mastered and virtually ready for use, was a Uranium-235 bomb with an estimated explosive force of between 2,000 and 20,000 tons of TNT. The second, to be tested some time in mid-July, involved enriched materials including plutonium and was expected to yield an explosive force of between 50,000 and 100,000 tons of TNT. The third, still at least three years away in Oppenheimer’s estimation, would use the second type of bomb to detonate heavy water and was believed to be capable of yielding 10 to 100 million tons of TNT. Feis (1970), op. cit., pp. 42–44.

¹¹² Sherwin, op. cit., pp. 207–10.

¹¹³ ibid.

¹¹⁴ Feis (1970), op. cit., pp. 52–56.

¹¹⁵ Gaddis, op. cit., p. 209.

¹¹⁶ Thomas, p. 326–29.

¹¹⁷ Kolko (1968), op. cit.; for Soviet actions in Germany in the same period, see McCauley, essay on Germany, in McCauley [Ed], op. cit. p. 61–2 and Loth, op. cit., p. 54.

¹¹⁸ For British attitudes to reparations, see Cairncross (ref. to be added) pp. 72–77. Central to their position, in addition to preventing a drain on their resources, was as with the Americans the desire to balance the destruction of German war potential with the need to revitalise it in aid of European and British economic recovery as well as prevent Soviet penetration. Also of concern was the need to maintain Germany's economic unity so that the deficiency in food supplies in the British zone could be met from the Soviet zone, which the 'first charge' principle also buttressed by requiring Germany to be treated as an economic unit in calculating reparations levels.

¹¹⁹ Much of the Soviets' work was destructive and haphazard, with only a quarter of dismantled equipment ever reaching Russia, much of it left outdoors and at railway sidings to rust. In addition, they had also implemented a detailed 'war booty' plan encompassing the collection of foodstuffs, animals, farm machinery and other miscellaneous goods, with special 'trophy brigades' seeing to its faithful fulfilment ever since they had entered Germany. Chotiner, p. 52–3; Backer, op. cit., 93–4.

¹²⁰ Gaddis, op. cit., p. 243; Backer, op. cit., 93–5.

¹²¹ For the origins of the story, and the manoeuvring between Britain and America for control of the operations, see in particular Tom Bowers The Paperclip Conspiracy.

¹²² Lasby, pp. 18–19. Composed of personnel trained in languages and document procedures, as well as medical and signals detachments and combat troops, the T-Forces – identified by the large red 'T' on their helmets – operated independently of ordinary combat troops and were authorized to enter targeted areas under combat conditions within a few hours after resistance ceased. By February with the Russians only forty miles from Berlin, efforts were made to streamline the awkward and time-consuming Anglo-American approach. The T-Forces were reorganized to include CIOS specialists to make on the spot assessments, and the new Combined Advance Field Teams (CAFT's) were authorised to keep pace with combat troops and advance with military spearheads. Gimbel, pp. 8–9.

¹²³ Lasby, op. cit. 22–3; Gimbel, op. cit. 6–8.

¹²⁴ For the early British lead and American efforts to counter it, see in particular Bowers, The Paperclip Conspiracy, op. cit., pp. 66–73.

¹²⁵ Churchill had barely concealed the fact that, in his view, Russia's involvement in the war was no more than a convenience to help maintain Britain's privileged position and this has been discussed at length in relation to Operation Barbarossa and the steps which Churchill took to to keep the Soviet Union in the war at a time that Stalin had twice proposed armistice negotiations (chapter 29). And in Vol VI of his memoirs, Triumph and Tragedy, p. 131, he wrote: "Another matter lay heavy on mind. I was very anxious to forestall the Russians in certain areas in Central Europe. The Hungarians, for instance, had expressed their intention of resisting the Soviet advance, but would surrender to a British force if it could arrive in time." But in spite of that he still consistently complained about Soviet lack of cooperation. The self-understanding of Britain as the fast-fading star of the amorphous Christian gel was oozing out all over!

¹²⁶ Lasby, op. cit. 21–2.

¹²⁷ Bowers, The Paperclip Conspiracy op. cit., pp. 140–2.

¹²⁸ ibid., pp. 142 ff.

¹²⁹ Lasby, op. cit. p. 28–9; Bowers, United Nations Charter op. cit., pp. 89–95.

¹³⁰ Simpson, Christopher Blowback p. 28.

¹³¹ Bowers, The Paperclip Conspiracy, op. cit., p. 105.

¹³² The whole thing was witnessed by the British, who had arrived with the CIOS squads only days after the Americans, but they were powerless to stop it. Indeed, as if to rub salt into their wounds, the Americans right from under their noses also removed 14 tons of documents valued by the German scientists at between 400 and 500 million dollars that they had buried in Goslar in the British zone only hours before the British were due to take control of the area. Bowers, The Paperclip Conspiracy op. cit. pp. 102–113; Lasby, op. cit., pp. 37–42.

¹³³ Lasby, op. cit. pp., 44–9.

¹³⁴ Bowers, The Paperclip Conspiracy, op. cit., p. 137.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹³⁵ ibid., pp. 88–9, 96, 118.; Lasby op. cit. pp. 63–6, 68–70.
- ¹³⁶ Bowers, Tom Blind Eye to Murder [London: Andre Deutsch, 1981], p. 118.
- ¹³⁷ Seven of them were American, out a paltry nineteen authorized in February by Eisenhower, each consisting of four officers and five NCO's. None of them had been with combat troops when they liberated the concentration camps. The British effort was even worse: in late April Montgomery's HQ had belatedly announced the formation of a grand total of three teams, each of four men. By VE-Day, only three men had been recruited to cover a larger population than the Americans. ibid., pp. 113–4, 125.
- ¹³⁸ Bowers, Blind Eye op. cit. p. 108. Even then such investigations were limited to those whose names appeared on the United Nations War Crimes Commission's paltry lists. A full directive did not arrive until July 8, upon which the head of the US investigative agency was forced due to lack of resources to order his teams to ignore all cases which did not involve US or concentration camp victims. ibid., p. 121.
- ¹³⁹ ibid., pp. 100–101.
- ¹⁴⁰ Ironically, at the very same time as the War Department's approach received official approval in the US, Eden had ruled out virtually identical proposals in Britain. ibid., p. 101–2.
- ¹⁴¹ ibid., pp. 102–107.
- ¹⁴² ibid., pp. 100, 107–8.
- ¹⁴³ ibid., p. 114.
- ¹⁴⁴ By May, neither the head of the British nor the American investigative Agency had yet set foot in Germany, while truckloads of documentary evidence which piled up outside the American HQ was left unsorted due to lack of manpower. ibid., pp. 120–1, 125.
- ¹⁴⁵ Theoretically, a means of identifying them existed in CROWCASS (Central Registry of War Criminals and Security Suspects) – an ambitious system using Hollerith IBM card index machines to tabulate and produce information on every member of the internment camps – but the lists it produced were virtually worthless to the war crimes investigators since they rarely had any evidence of anyone listed having committed crimes. Moreover, Allied officers running POW camps soon inferred that anyone not on the lists could be released, and with the British authorities insisting on processing their evidence in London, thus requiring a two month round trip. from Germany and back again, the long delays resulted in witnesses being officially allowed to disappear from the scene of the crime before trial got underway. ibid., pp. 117–8, 127–9. CROWCASS nevertheless proved useful in other ways – it initially assisted in the recruitment of Nazis as 'police informants', and later in their recruitment as intelligence operatives. Simpson, Blowback, op. cit. 66–7.
- ¹⁴⁶ Ovendale, op. cit., p. 74.
- ¹⁴⁷ ibid., p. 74.
- ¹⁴⁸ ibid., pp. 69–71.
- ¹⁴⁹ Feis (1960), op. cit. pp. 292–95; Kuniholm, op. cit. pp. 257–60.
- ¹⁵⁰ Kuniholm, op. cit. pp. 214–16, 270–1; Feis, (1960) op. cit. pp. 302–3.
- ¹⁵¹ Kuniholm, op. cit. pp. 249–53; Feis, (1960) op. cit. pp. 287–8; Kolko, (1972) op. cit. pp. 219–21.
- ¹⁵² Alperovitz, (1995) op. cit. pp. 58–9.
- ¹⁵³ Feis, (1970) op. cit. pp. 19–22.
- ¹⁵⁴ Alperovitz (1995), op. cit. p. 62.
- ¹⁵⁵ ibid., p. 122–23; Alperovitz (1995) op. cit. p. 227.
- ¹⁵⁶ ibid., p. 57.
- ¹⁵⁷ ibid., pp. 75–79; Feis (1970) op. cit. pp. 22–25
- ¹⁵⁸ Feis (1970), op. cit. p. 25.
- ¹⁵⁹ ibid., p. 56–58; Alperovitz (1995), op. cit. p. 174.
- ¹⁶⁰ Ovendale, op. cit., p. 64; Cohen, Palestine and the Great Powers, 1945–1948 [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1982], pp. 15–16.
- ¹⁶¹ Bauer, Yehuda, Flight and Rescue: Brichah p. 76 According to Cohen, Palestine to Israel: from Mandate to Independence (London: F. Cass, 1988), p. 56. Harrison's original mission had its origins in an initiative by Zionists in the State Department. He also suggests that it was backed by the Jewish Agency Executive.
- ¹⁶² Ovendale, op. cit., p. 71.
- ¹⁶³ Bauer, op. cit., pp. 64ff.
- ¹⁶⁴ By mid-1946 the institute had begun to buy ships, planes, jeeps and surplus arms which were stored in warehouses in the US and Europe, until they could be moved to Palestine legally at the end of the mandate. Cohen, (1982), op. cit., pp. 68.
- ¹⁶⁵ Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., pp. 232–33.

- ¹⁶⁶ ibid., pp. 232–34 ff; Feis (1970), op. cit., pp. 68–9.
- ¹⁶⁷ Aperovitz (1995), op. cit., pp. 266–69.
- ¹⁶⁸ ibid., p. 258.
- ¹⁶⁹ Gaddis, op. cit., pp. 236–38.
- ¹⁷⁰ Feis (1960), op. cit., pp. 181–183.
- ¹⁷¹ Feis (1970), op. cit., pp. 77, 80–81.
- ¹⁷² ibid., pp. 340–2.
- ¹⁷³ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 520–24; Feis (1960) op. cit. 229–33.
- ¹⁷⁴ Cairncross, op. cit., pp. 86–93; Feis (1960), op. cit., 253–56.
- ¹⁷⁵ Davis, op. cit., pp. 188–90.
- ¹⁷⁶ Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., pp. 252, 260.
- ¹⁷⁷ Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., 267–8, 305; Feis (1970), op. cit., pp. 88–89.
- ¹⁷⁸ Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., pp. 281 ff.
- ¹⁷⁹ Feis (1960), op. cit., pp. 229–33.
- ¹⁸⁰ Sudiplatsky, Victor, Special Tasks.
- ¹⁸¹ Feis (1970), op. cit., pp. 101–3; Alperovitz (1995), op. cit., pp. 384–38.

Chapter 27: We've made it ... thanks to Hitler's gentle persuasion

- ¹ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, citing Jeremy Bentham, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation [1789]
- ² Russia was not at war with Japan, neither were a number of the Latin American countries which had agreed to declare war against Germany in return for a place at the United Nations conference.
- ³ The first of the series of joint declarations was the Inter-Allied Declaration which was signed by Britain, four Commonwealth Dominions and nine European governments in exile on June 12, 1941, prior to the German invasion of Russia. The second was the Atlantic Charter which Britain and the United States issued on August 14 that year. The third was the 26-nation 'Declaration by United Nations' – the first such declaration to include the Soviet Union – which was adopted on January 1, 1942 by Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Poland, South Africa, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, the United States and Yugoslavia. Later adherents to the Declaration prior to the date of adoption of the Charter were, in order of the dates of adherence, Mexico, the Philippines, Ethiopia, Iraq, Brazil, Bolivia, Iran, Colombia, Liberia, France, Ecuador, Peru, Chile, Paraguay, Venezuela, Uruguay, Turkey, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria and Lebanon. Source: United Nations Handbook, Everyone's United Nations, tenth edition, 1986, pp. 5–7.
- ⁴ Ross, Alf, The United Nations: Peace and Progress [New Jersey: Bedminster, 1966] p. 376.
- ⁵ United Nations Handbook, 1986, op. cit., p. 327.
- ⁶ Ross, op. cit., p. 375.
- ⁷ ibid., pp. 384–385.
- ⁸ United Nations Handbook, 1986, op. cit., pp. 341–344. Trusteeship Agreements were approved as follows: British Togoland, French Togoland, British Cameroon, French Cameroon, Tanganyika (Britain), West Samoa (New Zealand), Ruanda-Urundi (Belgium), and New Guinea (Australia) on December 13, 1946; the Micronesian Pacific Islands (USA) on April 2, 1947; Nauru (Australia, New Zealand and Britain jointly) on November 1, 1947; and Somaliland (Italy) on December 2, 1950.
- ⁹ The record shows 51 founding members, but Poland, for which a place was reserved, was not able to sign until October 15, 1945, after the composition of its government had been determined.
- ¹⁰ The Philippines is a special case which calls for comment. It was nominally a self-governing Commonwealth of the United States of America and it was admitted as an original member of the United Nations in October 1945, in very peculiar circumstances. Having been mal-administered during 333 years of Spanish colonial rule when the Roman Catholic Church was the main colonial presence, the archipelago of the Philippines, (made up of eleven main islands, 350 very small ones and literally between six and seven thousand islets), was ceded to the United States as part of its spoils from the Spanish-American war in 1898. The US found that it had inherited a legacy of neglect. Elementary public education, run by the church, had only been introduced on a limited scale in 1863. A self-help reform society had been established in 1892, but when this was promptly crushed a more militant independence movement sprang up in 1896. Faced by widespread anger and embarrassment in the US at its blatant breach of the spirit of the Monroe Doctrine, the US administration made a genuine effort to move the colony towards self-government with an indigenous and locally trained civil service. Even so, it was not moving quickly enough for the Filipinos, and pressure mounted for independence. In 1933 it was agreed that a Commonwealth of the Philippines would be established in 1935 and this would be converted to full independence after a ten-year transition period in 1945.

In fact little progress had been made by 1941 when the US decision to establish a major naval base there as part of its war plan (chapter 24) ensured that it would be caught up in the Asian-Pacific war zone. What remained of the US forces surrendered in May 1942 (five months after the Japanese landing in December 1941) and the country was under direct Japanese military government for the next 16 months. Then in September 1943 the Japanese declared the country to be a republic and the previously elected parliament enjoyed some shared power with the Japanese military command and their nominee as president, even though some US supported guerilla warfare occurred across the islands. The American return landing took place a year later, in October 1944, and although the Commonwealth of the Philippines was officially reinstated, the country was run, absolutely, by the US military command. It was in that situation when it was admitted as an original member of the United Nations in October 1945. Three months later MacArthur's nominee, Manuel Roxas, was installed as president, and six months later the Commonwealth of the Philippines was proclaimed a republic with a US-style constitution and two imposed obligations. One was the lease of military and naval bases to the United States for 99 years with virtual territorial rights. The other was equal rights for US citizens with Filipinos in the exploitation of natural resources.

¹¹ In addition, Ceylon (Sri Lanka) gained independence on February 4, 1948, but it was not admitted to the United Nations until December 14, 1955.

¹² Encyclopedia Britannica CD Deluxe 2000, (Evolution of contemporary cultures: Colonial policies)

¹³ Piccigallo, Philip R. The Japanese on Trial [Austin: University of Texas, 1979] p. 6.

¹⁴ Terms of Reference of Far Eastern Commission. (Part IIA of Moscow Communiqué of the 27th December, 1945) Section II, functions, clauses A, B, C. Published in Japanese Peace Settlement [Canberra: Department of External Affairs, August 1947] p. 1.

¹⁵ Terms of Reference of Far Eastern Commission, op. cit., Section III, clause 1, p. 2.

¹⁶ Far Eastern Commission Policy Decisions, published in full in Japanese Peace Settlement [Canberra: Department of External Affairs, August 1947] listed on pp. 4–7.

¹⁷ Roling B.V.A. The Tokyo Trial and Beyond, Ed. Antonio Cassese [Cambridge: Polity/Blackwell, 1993] p. 41.

¹⁸ Woodard, William P. The Allied Occupation of Japan 1945–52 and Japanese Religions [Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1972], p. 14.

¹⁹ The final version of the Basic Post-Surrender Policy for Japan, dated June 19th, 1947, contained the simple words “To insure that Japan will not again become a menace to the peace and security of the world.” Basic Post-Surrender Policy for Japan. Part I, clause 1.a. Published in Japanese Peace Settlement [Canberra: Department of External Affairs, August 1947] p. 9.

²⁰ Latourette, op. cit., Vol. V, p. 425.

²¹ Woodard, loc. cit.

²² Ginn, John L. Sugamo Prison, Tokyo [Jefferson: McFarland, 1992] p. 15.

²³ Roling B.V.A. The Tokyo Trial and Beyond, Ed. Antonio Cassese [Cambridge: Polity/Blackwell, 1993] pp. 2–4.

²⁴ Piccigallo, op. cit., pp. 49–62.

²⁵ Definite figures are difficult to obtain. Piccigallo gives the figure 5,700 for persons accused while Ginn gives 4,200.

²⁶ Ginn, op. cit., p. 38.

²⁷ Piccigallo, op. cit., p. 27.

²⁸ ibid., pp. 214–215.

²⁹ ibid., p. 14.

³⁰ Roling, op. cit., p. 46.

³¹ Ginn, op. cit., p. 47.

³² Piccigallo, op. cit., pp. 16, 17, citing correspondence, MacArthur to COS Eisenhower, in US Department of State, Foreign Relations of the United States, 1946, (Washington DC, 1971) pp. 395–397; and US Department of State, United States Initial Post-Surrender Policy for Japan, August 29, 1945, part 2, provision 2; Edwin O. Reischauer, Japan: The Story of a Nation (New York, 1970), p. 265.

³³ Roling, op. cit., pp. 63, 81.

³⁴ Piccigallo, op. cit., p. 23.

³⁵ Roling, op. cit., p. 50.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- 36 Piccigallo, op. cit., p. 57.
 - 37 Roling, op. cit., p. 53.
 - 38 Piccigallo, op. cit., p. 22.
 - 39 Roling, op. cit., p. 56.
 - 40 ibid., p. 59.
 - 41 Ginn, op. cit., pp. 242–245.
 - 42 Roling, op. cit., p. 48.
 - 43 Ginn, op. cit., pp. 57, 87–92, 153.
 - 44 ibid., p. 244, citing Seiichi Morimura & Masaki Shimozato. The Devil's Gluttony. Published in Japan.
 - 45 Blum, William, Killing Hope [Monroe: Common Courage, 1995] p. 26, citing People's China, English-language magazine, Foreign Language Press, Peking, 17 September 1952, p. 28.
 - 46 Blum, op. cit., p. 27, citing New York Times, 9 August 1970, IV, p. 3.
 - 47 Hughes, Gary & Gerard Ryle The Hidden War Experiments [Melbourne: The Age, April 19, 1999] pp. 1,2,12–13.
 - 48 Woodard, op. cit., p. 250, citing Hirobumi Ito, Commentaries on the Constitution of Japan [Tokyo: Government Printing Office, 1899] translated by Miyoji Ito.
 - 49 ibid., p. 252, citing former Prime Minister Shigeru Yoshida, CR 22 Oct 48 WKB.
 - 50 ibid., p. 253.
 - 51 ibid., in foreword by W.K. Bunce, p. xv.
 - 52 ibid., pp. 250,251.
 - 53 ibid., p. 11.
 - 54 Meyer, Michael A. Response to Modernity. [Detroit: Wayne State University, 1988] p. 352.
 - 55 Latourette, Kenneth Scott. Christianity in a Revolutionary Age, Volume V, The Twentieth Century Outside Europe. [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969], pp. 12,13.
- Church membership and average weekly attendance in the United States of America, per cent of the population:
- | Year | 1910 | 1926 | 1940 | 1949 | 1950 | 1955 | 1959 |
|------------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|
| Membership | 40 | 45 | n.a. | 53 | 57 | 61 | 63.4 |
| Attendance | n.a. | n.a. | 37 | n.a. | 39 | 49 | n.a. |
- 56 ibid., Vol. V, p. 13.
 - 57 ibid., Vol. V, p. 11.
 - 58 Latourette, Kenneth Scott. Christianity in a Revolutionary Age, Volume IV, The Twentieth Century In Europe. [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969] pp. 403–410.
 - 59 ibid., Vol. IV, p. 410.
 - 60 ibid., Vol. IV, p. 414.
 - 61 ibid., Vol. IV, p. 415.
 - 62 ibid., Vol. IV, p. 382.
 - 63 ibid.
 - 64 ibid., Vol. IV, p. 385, citing: Boas, J. H. Resistance of the Churches in the Netherlands, [New York: Netherlands Information Bureau, 1944] p. 12.
 - 65 ibid., Vol. IV, pp. 386–393.
 - 66 ibid., Vol. IV, pp. 129–137, citing Henri Godin and Yvan Daniel, La France: Pays de Mission.
 - 67 ibid., Vol. IV, pp. 139–145.
 - 68 ibid., Vol. IV, p. 223.
 - 69 ibid., Vol. IV, p. 443.
 - 70 ibid., Vol. IV, pp. 183–184.
 - 71 ibid., Vol. IV, p. 267.
 - 72 Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, Edited & translated by Edwin H. Robertson, Christology, [London: Collins/Fount, 1978] the translator's preface, p. 20.
 - 73 ibid., p. 7.
 - 74 ibid., p. 36.
 - 75 Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, Edited & translated by Edwin H. Robertson, True Patriotism [London: Collins, 1973] p. 236.
 - 76 Bonhoeffer, Christology, op. cit., p. 28.
 - 77 ibid., p. 28.
 - 78 ibid., p. 89.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁷⁹ ibid., p. 103.
- ⁸⁰ ibid., p. 109.
- ⁸¹ Latourette, op. cit., Vol. IV, pp. 184–188.
- ⁸² ibid., Vol. IV, pp. 270–271, citing Kirchliches Jahrbuch, 1945–1948, pp. 8,15,19–29, and Hans Lilje in World Dominion, Vol. XXXV, p. 17.
- ⁸³ Hanson, E. O. The Catholic Church in World Politics [Princeton: Princeton University Press., 1990] p. 45.
- ⁸⁴ Pope Pius XII, Deiparae Virginis Mariae May 1, 1946. All references are to the English translation by the Daughters of St. Paul (St. Paul Editions, 1961), in Papal Teachings: Our Lady, selected and arranged by the Benedictine Monks of Solèsles: re-published in The Papal Encyclicals 1939–1958, compiled by Claudia Carlen IHM [Raleigh: McGrath, 1981] pp. 109–110.
- ⁸⁵ Hanson. loc. cit.
- ⁸⁶ Pope Pius XII, Christmas Allocution, December 24, 1944, Democracy – True and False. All references are to the English language translation published by The Australian Catholic Truth Society Record, June 11, 1945, [Melbourne: Advocate Press, 1945]
- ⁸⁷ Hanson, op. cit., p. 45.
- ⁸⁸ Mosley, Leonard, Dulles: A Biography of Eleanor, Allen, and John Foster Dulles and their family network. [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1978] p. 242.
- ⁸⁹ Blum, William, Killing Hope: US Military and CIA Interventions since World War II [Monroe: Common Courage, 1995] pp. 27–32; citing: Miles Copeland, Without Cloak and Dagger (New York, 1974) pp. 235–6; CIA memorandum to the Forty Committee (National Security Council) during closed hearings in 1975, leaked to the press in 1976 and published in CIA – The Pike Report (Nottingham, England, 1977) pp. 204–5; Stephen Goode, The CIA (Franklin Watts, Inc. New York, 1982) p. 45; and William R. Corson, The Armies of Ignorance: The rise of the American Intelligence Empire (The Dial Press, New York, 1977) pp. 298–9.
- ⁹⁰ Blum, op. cit., p. 31.
- ⁹¹ Pope Pius XII Evangelii Praecones June 2, 1951. All references are to the English translation by N.C.W.C., 1951, re-published in The Papal Encyclicals 1939–1958, compiled by Claudia Carlen IHM [Raleigh: McGrath, 1981] pp. 189–201.
- ⁹² Personal observation by a Swiss theologian to the author in conference at Cartigny, 1975.
- ⁹³ Latourette, op. cit., Vol IV, p. 223.
- ⁹⁴ ibid., Vol IV, pp. 223–224. Figures are given for the number of Roman Catholic priests serving as missionaries for the years 1933, 1953, and 1957, without reference to other religious who include brothers, sisters, seminarians and lay persons. For 1957 the total number of priests serving world wide is given as 10,812 of whom only 206 were reported as being from the US. But the Catholic Almanac, 1975, p. 583, lists 5,126 US missionaries, of whom 2,914 were priests, except for an unstated number of brothers and seminarians.
- ⁹⁵ Neill, Stephen. A History of Christian Missions. [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1964] p. 458. In 1958 27,733 Protestant missionaries out of a total of 43,000 world wide were from the US.
- ⁹⁶ Visser 't Hooft, contrib. chapter 16, The Genesis of the World Council of Churches, in A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1948, Ruth Rouse and Stephen Neill (Eds.) [Geneva: World Council of Churches], pp. 715–716.
- ⁹⁷ Neill, op. cit., pp. 458–459.
- ⁹⁸ The Potsdam Proclamation, from Ginn, op. cit., p. 260.
- ⁹⁹ Woodard, op. cit., p. 9.
- ¹⁰⁰ Ginn, op. cit., introduction, pp. xiii,xiv.
- ¹⁰¹ Roling, op. cit., p. 40.
- ¹⁰² Woodard, op. cit., p. 25.
- ¹⁰³ ibid., p. 241.
- ¹⁰⁴ ibid., p. 28.
- ¹⁰⁵ ibid., pp. 241,242.
- ¹⁰⁶ ibid., p. 355, citing a letter from MacArthur to Dr. Louis D. Newton, President of the Southern Baptist Convention, reported in Stars and Stripes, December 13th, 1946.
- ¹⁰⁷ ibid., pp. 49–53.
- ¹⁰⁸ ibid., pp. 54–57.
- ¹⁰⁹ ibid., pp. 22–24.
- ¹¹⁰ Responsibility for Korea was subsequently placed elsewhere and responsibility for Christian missionaries was extended beyond the matter of their return. ibid., p. 25.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹¹¹ ibid., pp. 62,63
- ¹¹² ibid., p. 62.
- ¹¹³ ibid., p. 69.
- ¹¹⁴ Piccigallo, op. cit., p. 8.
- ¹¹⁵ For the full text of the 'Shinto Directive', the full title of which is SCAPIN 448 (CIE) 15 Dec 45 (AG 000.3) Abolition of Governmental Sponsorship, support, perpetuation, control and dissemination of State Shinto (Kokka Shinto, Jinja Shinto), see Woodard, op. cit., Appendix B:5 pp. 295–298.
- ¹¹⁶ ibid., p. 322. From clause II.1.a., Memo to Chief of Staff, Shinto Directive Staff Study, 3 December 45, set out in full, pp. 322–341.
- ¹¹⁷ Lockyer, Herbert. The Man Who Changed the World [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1966] p. 298.
- ¹¹⁸ Woodard, op. cit., pp. 69–74.
- ¹¹⁹ ibid., p. 243, citing an interview with Paul Rusch of uncertain date.
- ¹²⁰ ibid., p. 245, citing Mainichi Shimbun, 30 April 1949.
- ¹²¹ ibid., pp. 303–304, Memo for Chief, CIE Section, 23 April 46, CIE Contributions to Development of Policy for Return of Missionaries to Japan.
- ¹²² ibid., pp. 245, 359 citing a letter written on official SCAP stationery, dated April 4th, 1949, reproduced as Plate IV, facing p. 242.
- ¹²³ ibid., p. 307, Cabinet Ordinance No. 325, 1950, Punishment for acts prejudicial to the Occupation Objectives.
- ¹²⁴ ibid., p. 316, The Imperial Rescript of January 1, 1946. Woodard comments on conflicting translations of the term "Akitsumi Kami" (divine) and maintains that Creemers' translation is correct: "Kami in human appearance, as usually applied to the Emperor." In his introduction, p. 10., Woodard explains 'kami' as "... a term which designates spiritual entities, forces or qualities that are believed to exist everywhere, in man and in nature. Usually without gender and often without anything akin to personality, the kami are believed to infuse the universe, and life for the devout Shintoist is lived in harmony with and in gratitude to them. In its traditional usage in Shinto the word kami (singular or plural) may be translated deity(ies), spirit(s), god(s), or divine (e.g., kamikaze divine wind), but it should never be translated God." He then says that in the interest of clarity it is better to leave the word 'kami' untranslated.
- ¹²⁵ ibid., p. 303, The Religious Division and Christianity, Excerpts from CIE Weekly Report, 2 February 1946.
- ¹²⁶ ibid., p. 27.
- ¹²⁷ ibid., pp. 243, 355, citing SCAP radio message to JCS, ZX 26123.
- ¹²⁸ ibid., p. 188.
- ¹²⁹ Japan's national sovereignty was actually restored at a Peace Conference in San Francisco in 1951. Prime Minister Yoshida as chief negotiator faced America's John Foster Dulles and representatives of 47 nations. The peace treaty was formally signed on Sept. 8, 1951, and the occupation of Japan officially ended on April 28, 1952.
- ¹³⁰ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000.
- ¹³¹ Sohyo also became increasingly anti-government and anti-American in the late 1950's and with a Marxist-socialist leaning it became influential in the Japan Socialist Party, (JSP).
- ¹³² Walker, Allan S. Clinical Problems of War, Volume I of Series 5 (Medical) in the series Australia in the War of 1939–1945 [Canberra: Australian War Memorial, 1952] pp. 264–267. The quotation is attributed to Colonel H. G. Furnell, A.D.M.S., 9th Division A.I.F.
- ¹³³ Data reported for the two world wars are not directly comparable, and the official policy of concealing the real rate of venereal disease required that some cases were recorded as "non-specific urethritis" rather than VD. In this work Walker's practice of adding the two figures to get a realistic total infection rate has been adopted, and where figures for "non-specific urethritis" have not been available, estimates have been arrived at by allowing the same proportions as in those cases for which both figures are available.
- ¹³⁴ Walker, op. cit., pp. 266–269.
- ¹³⁵ Tanaka, Yuki. Rape and War: The Japanese Experience [Melbourne: Japanese Studies Centre, Monash University, 1995] pp. 34–38.
- ¹³⁶ ibid., pp. 41–43.
- ¹³⁷ Roling, op. cit., pp. 2–4.
- ¹³⁸ ibid., p. 3.
- ¹³⁹ ibid., p. 6., report that an individual dissenting judgement, that of Justice Pal, of India, had been published in 1953, apparently on the personal initiative of the judge.
- ¹⁴⁰ ibid., p. 80

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁴¹ ibid., p. 6, citing the text of the "proclamation" of General MacArthur on the review of the tribunal's judgement, in R.H. Minear, Victor's Justice – The Tokyo War Crimes Trial, Princeton University Press, Princeton, 1973, p. 166.
- ¹⁴² Tanaka, op. cit., p. 40.
- ¹⁴³ ibid., p. 41, citing Meiko Yamada, Senryo Gun Ianfu (Comfort Women for the Occupation Forces) [Kojinsha, 1992] p. 29.
- ¹⁴⁴ ibid., p. 44.
- ¹⁴⁵ ibid., p. 40, citing Susan Brownmiller, Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape [Secker & Warburg, 1975] p. 77.
- ¹⁴⁶ ibid., pp. 44–51.
- ¹⁴⁷ Woodard, op. cit., pp. 23,24, citing an undated memo: Subj: Religion, with a handwritten notation that it is a 'report from the beginning of the Occupation to 30 October', and general orders establishing the CIE and Religious Division.
- ¹⁴⁸ Neill, op. cit., p. 464.
- ¹⁴⁹ ibid.
- ¹⁵⁰ Estimate based on figures in Catholic Almanacs for 1975 and 1990 [Huntington: Our Sunday Visitor, 1974 and 1989] pp. 581–583 and 521–522 respectively. In 1974 there were 1,845 Roman Catholic missionaries in the Far East, of whom 365 (19.8%) were in Japan. In 1989 there were 1,299 in the Far East, of whom 265 (20.4%), were in Japan. Those in Japan comprised 4.9% of the 7,418 world wide in 1974, and 4.4% of 6,001 in 1989.
- ¹⁵¹ Figures for the Protestant missions are not readily available, but according to the Catholic Almanacs for 1975 and 1990, the number of Roman Catholic missionaries serving overseas rose from 5,126 in 1956, to a peak of 9,655 in 1968, and fell steadily to 6,001 in 1989. The number serving in the Far East rose from 1,555 in 1956, to a peak of 2,470 in 1968, and fell to 1,299 in 1989. The percentage of Roman Catholic missionaries from the US serving in the Far East was fairly static at about 29% to 30% through the period 1956–1964. but from 33.3% in 1956 it then fell steadily after 1964 to 22% in 1989.
- ¹⁵² Neill, loc. cit.
- ¹⁵³ Woodard, op. cit., p. 351, Appendix G1, memo concerning a conference with General MacArthur, by W. K. Bunce, Chief, RCR Division of SCAP to the Chief, Civil Information and Education Section.
- ¹⁵⁴ Latourette, op. cit., Vol. V, pp. 425–426.
- ¹⁵⁵ Ling, Trevor. A History of Religion East and West. [London: Macmillan, 1968] p. 413. The number of registered denominations fell almost as quickly by natural attrition and mergers during the next ten years, to about 170 in 1961.
- ¹⁵⁶ Woodard, op. cit., p. 209.
- ¹⁵⁷ Latourette, op. cit., Vol V., p. 393.
- ¹⁵⁸ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000.
- ¹⁵⁹ Blum, op. cit., pp. 21–22.
- ¹⁶⁰ ibid., p. 21, citing Harry S.Truman, Memoirs, Vol. Two:Years of Trial and Hope, 1946–1953 (Great Britain, 1956) p. 66.
- ¹⁶¹ ibid.
- ¹⁶² Latourette, op. cit., Vol. V., pp. 393–396.
- ¹⁶³ Neill, op. cit., p. 467.
- ¹⁶⁴ See, for example, Encyclopaedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, United Nations, History and Development.
- ¹⁶⁵ United Nations Original Members: Pattern of Representation
- | Dominant Ethnicity | Prop. of World Pop. Rep. | Votes | Per cent | Proportion of Total World Population |
|--------------------------------------|------------------------------------|-------|----------|---|
| European & Latin American | one quarter | 39 | 76 | 35 per cent |
| Asian, African & Caribbean | one half | 12 | 24 | 65 per cent |
| Dominant Political Philosophy | | | | |
| Democratic Capitalism | | 44 | 86 | |
| Communist/Socialist | | 7 | 14 | |
| Dominant Religion | Est. per cent of World Pop. | | | |
| Christianity | 29 per cent | 39 | 76 | Incl. Lebanon with about half Christians, and half Muslims.* |
| Islam | 14 per cent | 6 | 12 | |
| Hindu | 13 per cent | 1 | 2 | India: included Muslim Pakistan at that date. |
| Buddhist, Confucian, Shinto, Tao | 18 per cent | 1 | 2 | China only |
| Animists, Tribal religions, others | 24 per cent | 1 | 2 | Liberia: strong Christian and Muslim minorities. |
| Atheistic Communism | 2 per cent | 3 | 6 | Soviet Union. Incl. Christian, Muslim, Buddhist & Jewish pops.* |
| Judaism | < 1 per cent | | | Not directly represented at that date. |
- [* The figures are distorted somewhat by the fact that the Soviet Union included both Belarus and Ukraine which together comprised 22 per cent of the Union's population but which, although under Communist government, were predominantly adherents of Christianity.]

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- Table compiled from United Nations World Population statistics and the Map of World's Religions, 4th edition [Bern: Kummerley and Frey. Based on religious statistics available from 1961–1964.]
- ¹⁶⁶ James, Lawrence, The Rise and Fall of the British Empire [London: Abacus/Little Brown, 1995] p. 431, citing Hansard, 5th series, 342, 1243, 1247.
- ¹⁶⁷ Sources of summary information include: Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from: United Kingdom, history of imperialism; India, History of British wartime strategy, Origins of the Nationalist Movement;
- ¹⁶⁸ The cabinet records of February 1940, well into the war and only weeks before he became Prime Minister, show that Churchill opposed any attempt at religious reconciliation in India. He told cabinet that he “regarded the Hindu-Muslim feud as the bulwark of British rule in India.” By refusing to consider constitutional change in India on the basis that it must be “to the detriment of matters touching the final life and safety of the State” if such an immense issue as India were put to cabinet at that time, he killed any prospect for reconciliation and guaranteed that the eventual settlement would be shaped by great violence.
- ¹⁶⁹ Sources of summary information include: Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from: Myanmar, History of the religious dilemma; Emergence of Nationalism; the impact of colonialism; the colonial economy; World War Two and after.
- ¹⁷⁰ Sources of summary information include: Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from: France, History of colonial independence movements, Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia
- ¹⁷¹ Sources of summary information include: Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from: Indonesia, History of the rise of nationalism; the Revolution; the Japanese occupation.
- ¹⁷² Neill, op. cit., p. 66.
- ¹⁷³ Oosthuizen, G. C. Post-Christianity in Africa [Grand Rapids: William B. Eerdmans, 1968] pp. 18–19, 52.
- ¹⁷⁴ Clarke, Peter, contrib. Islamic Reform in Contemporary Nigeria: Methods and Aims in Third World Quarterly, Vol. 10., No. 2, April 1998 [London: Third World Foundation for Social and Economic Studies] p. 535.
- ¹⁷⁵ Oosthuizen, op. cit., p. 18, citing Karte der Religionen und Missionen der Erde, Ed. M. Schlunk & H. Quring.
- ¹⁷⁶ Brett, Michael, Ed. and contrib., Northern Africa: Islam and Modernization [London: Frank Cass, 1973] pp. 10, 157.
- ¹⁷⁷ Aburish, Said K. The House of Saud [London: Bloomsbury, 1994] p. 155.
- ¹⁷⁸ ibid., p. 161.
- ¹⁷⁹ Shadid, Mohammed K. Contrib. The Muslim Brotherhood Movement in the West Bank and Gaza in Third World Quarterly, Vol. 10, No. 2, April 1988.
- ¹⁸⁰ Sources include: Ellis, John, World War II: A Statistical Survey [New York: Facts on File, 1993]; Goralski, Robert, World War II Almanac 1931–1945 [London: Hamish Hamilton, 1981].
- ¹⁸¹ Demography was not studied in a formal sense until about 1950 although several writers had previously contributed to the study and knowledge of population trends, notably Thomas Malthus, a clergyman cum political economist, with his Essay on the Principle of Population at the turn of the 18th/19th centuries. He predicted that as population grew according to a geometric pattern it would outstrip food production which grew according to a slower arithmetic pattern. On that basis he said that a crisis resulting in wars and famines could basically only be avoided by ‘moral restraint.’ Considering the circumstances of his time, his assessment of trends was very astute but many aspects of his conclusions and proposals for population management were negated by subsequent events and developments.
- ¹⁸² Corsa, Leslie, contrib. Chapter 14, United States: New efforts, but still not enough, in Population: Challenging World Crisis, Voice of America Forum Lectures, [Washington: US Information Service, 1969] p. 164.
- ¹⁸³ Chow, L. P. contrib. Taiwan: Island Laboratory in Population: Challenging World Crisis, Voice of America Forum Lectures, [Washington: US Information Service, 1969] p. 37.
- ¹⁸⁴ Muramatsu, Minoru, contrib. Japan: Miracle in East Asia in Population: Challenging World Crisis, Voice of America Forum Lectures, [Washington: US Information Service, 1969] pp. 15–19.
- ¹⁸⁵ Sources: Vaksberg, Arkadym Stalin Against the Jews trans. Antonina W. Bouis [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994] pp. 112–128; Kochan, Lionel (Ed.) The Jews in Soviet Russia Since 1917 [London: Oxford, 1978] pp. 295–297; and Khrushchev, Nikita, Khrushchev Remembers (trans. Strobe Talbot) [London: Sphere, 1971] pp. 227–229.
- ¹⁸⁶ Allen, Richard. Imperialism and Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford University Press, 1974] pp. 358–360.
- ¹⁸⁷ ibid., pp. 364–365.
- ¹⁸⁸ Spiegel, Steven L. The Other Arab-Israeli Conflict [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985] pp. 16–20.
- ¹⁸⁹ Lilienthal, Alfred M. The Zionist Connection. What price peace? [New York: Middle East Perspective, 1979] p. 48, citing Foreign Relations of the United States, Diplomatic papers, 1945, Vol III, pp. 716–717.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁹⁰ Churchill, Winston S., The Second World War, Vol VI Triumph and Tragedy [London: Reprint Society, 1954], pp. 520–531.
- ¹⁹¹ Lilienthal, op. cit., pp. 49–50, citing FR 1945 Vol III, pp. 727–733.
- ¹⁹² Allen, op. cit., p. 372.
- ¹⁹³ ibid., pp. 370–371.
- ¹⁹⁴ ibid., p. 368.
- ¹⁹⁵ ibid., p. 374.
- ¹⁹⁶ Spiegel, op. cit., pp. 21–25.
- ¹⁹⁷ Cohen, Palestine and the Great Powers, 1945–1948 [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1982], pp. 141–144 and Jones, p. 152.
- ¹⁹⁸ Cohen, op. cit., p. 147
- ¹⁹⁹ Jones, op. cit., p. 141
- ²⁰⁰ Cohen, op. cit., pp. 199–201; Jones, op. cit., pp. 165–168.
- ²⁰¹ Kolko, Gabriel The Politics of War: The World and United States Foreign Policy, 1943–1945 [New York: Random House, 1968] pp. 227–228.
- ²⁰² Kuniholm pp. 359–367.
- ²⁰³ ibid., p. 367.
- ²⁰⁴ ibid., p. 367–371.
- ²⁰⁵ Cohen, op. cit., pp. 158–159; Jones, op. cit., p. 159; Ovendale, op. cit., pp. 158–160.
- ²⁰⁶ Allen, op. cit., p. 377.
- ²⁰⁷ Cohen, op. cit., p. 163.
- ²⁰⁸ Jones, op. cit., p. 178.
- ²⁰⁹ Kuniholm, op. cit., pp. 374–378.
- ²¹⁰ Cohen, op. cit., p. 175.
- ²¹¹ Jones, op. cit., pp. 186–197; Ovendale, op. cit., pp. 167–170.
- ²¹² Cohen, op. cit., pp. 180–181; Sykes, pp. 364–365; Ganin, Zvi Truman, American Jewry and Israel pp. 115–117; Zionism [Jerusalem: Keter Books, 1973] pp. 253–254.
- ²¹³ Yergin p. 295.
- ²¹⁴ Cohen, op. cit., pp. 229–237
- ²¹⁵ ibid., p. 214–217, 220–223.
- ²¹⁶ Allen, op. cit., pp. 378–379.
- ²¹⁷ Cohen, op. cit., pp. 207–221; Jones, op. cit., pp. 207–229; Ovendale, op. cit., pp. 184–196.
- ²¹⁸ Cohen, op. cit., pp. 220–223.
- ²¹⁹ Jones, op. cit., p. 246.
- ²²⁰ Yergin, op. cit., p. 280; Kuniholm, op. cit., pp. 406–407.
- ²²¹ Kuniholm, op. cit., pp. 407–410; Yergin, op. cit., pp. 280–282.
- ²²² Cohen, op. cit., p. 223–227.
- ²²³ UN General Assembly document A/286, 3 April 1947, UNISPAL archives.
- ²²⁴ Gribetz, Judah, E Greenstein & R Stein. The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994] p. 487.
- ²²⁵ For more detail see Lilienthal, op. cit., pp. 59–60.
- ²²⁶ Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel from the Rise of Zionism to Our Time [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1981] p. 289.
- ²²⁷ Evensen, Bruce J. Truman, Palestine and the Press: Shaping the Conventional Wisdom at the Beginning of the Cold War [New York: Greenwood Press, 1992] pp. 54–58.
- ²²⁸ Yearbook of the United Nations 1946–47, Record of the First Special Session of the General Assembly, UNISPAL e-mail archives, pp. 42–45.
- ²²⁹ Hogan, Michael J. The Marshall Plan: America, Britain, and the Reconstruction of Western Europe, 1947–1952 [New York: Cambridge, 1987] pp. 26–34.
- ²³⁰ ibid., p. 26.
- ²³¹ Dulles, Allen, testifying as a staff member of the House Select Committee on Foreign Aid, quoted by the editor, Michael Wala in the introduction to The Marshall Plan by Allen Dulles [Providence: Berg, 1993] p. xv.
- ²³² Hogan, op., cit., p. 30.
- ²³³ UN Handbook, 1986, pp. 426–427; Ross, op. cit., p. 333; The World Trade Organization, from the Briefing Book on International Organizations, US Information Service, source, <http://www3.itu.ch/MISSIONS/US/bb/wto.html> as at

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- January 16, 2000. The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade remained in effect for 47 years, still 'provisional.' The organization and list of subordinate agreements required to administer it became bigger and bigger so that by 1968 there were 20 subordinate committees; 90 countries had signed it, and an additional 31 countries agreed to be bound by parts of it. GATT was eventually succeeded by the World Trade Organization in 1995, but controversy still rages.
- ²³⁴ Dulles, Allen W. The Marshall Plan Ed by Michael Wala [Providence, RI, USA: Berg, 1993] p. 116.
- ²³⁵ Hogan, op. cit., pp. 19, 26–27.
- ²³⁶ ibid., pp. 36–37.
- ²³⁷ ibid., pp. 37–38.
- ²³⁸ Dulles, op. cit., Michael Wala, editor in introduction, p. xvii–xxi.
- ²³⁹ Hogan, op. cit., p. 50.
- ²⁴⁰ ibid., pp. 46–49.
- ²⁴¹ Dulles, op. cit., p. 54, citing letter from Herbert Hoover to Senator Bridges reprinted in The New York Times, June 16, 1947.
- ²⁴² Gilbert, Martin, Second World War [London: Fontana/Collins, 1990] pp. 251–252.
- ²⁴³ James, op. cit., p. 486.
- ²⁴⁴ Dulles, op. cit., p. 97.
- ²⁴⁵ ibid., p. 96.
- ²⁴⁶ ibid., Wala, (Ed) in footnote 7, p. 23.
- ²⁴⁷ Hogan, op. cit., pp. 51–52.
- ²⁴⁸ ibid., p. 52.
- ²⁴⁹ ibid.
- ²⁵⁰ Dulles, op. cit., p. 31. The editor cites The New York Times, 6 October 1947, p. 3.
- ²⁵¹ Dulles, op. cit. Wala (Ed.) in introduction, p.xvi.
- ²⁵² ibid., Wala, (Ed.) in introduction, p. xv.
- ²⁵³ Hogan, op. cit., p. 445.
- ²⁵⁴ Mosley, op. cit., pp. 241–242.
- ²⁵⁵ Dulles, op. cit., See Editor's acknowledgments and preface by R.F.Marryott, President and CEO, the George C. Marshall Foundation.
- ²⁵⁶ ibid., p. 9.
- ²⁵⁷ ibid., p. 10.
- ²⁵⁸ ibid., p. 13.
- ²⁵⁹ ibid., p. 16.
- ²⁶⁰ ibid., p. 18–19.
- ²⁶¹ ibid., p. 19.
- ²⁶² ibid., p. 43, Editor's footnotes # 6,7. The term 'Herter Committee' refers to the US Congressional Select Committee on Foreign Aid which was set up under a resolution introduced by Representative Christian A. Herter to undertake an in-depth study of foreign aid. The committee was to determine the present and future requirements for relief and rehabilitation for foreign countries. It made a fact-finding mission to Europe and during the period to May 1948 when it ceased to operate it prepared 24 preliminary and supplementary reports which were revised and incorporated into its Final Report on Foreign Aid, (Washington, DC, 1948).
- ²⁶³ ibid., pp. 85–87.
- ²⁶⁴ ibid., p. 56.
- ²⁶⁵ ibid., pp. 124–125.
- ²⁶⁶ ibid., p. 118.
- ²⁶⁷ Mosley, op. cit., p. 239.
- ²⁶⁸ Dulles, op. cit., p. 124.
- ²⁶⁹ Hogan, op. cit., p. 45.
- ²⁷⁰ Dulles, op. cit., p. 23.
- ²⁷¹ ibid., p. 3.
- ²⁷² Smith, Joseph (Ed.) The Origins of NATO [Exeter: Uni. of Exeter Press, 1990] pp. 10–15, citing Alan Bullock, Ernest Bevin, Foreign Secretary 1945–51 (London, 1983) p. 526.
- ²⁷³ ibid., pp. 16–17, citing memorandum 6 April 1948, PREM 8/788, PM/48/38, PRO.
- ²⁷⁴ ibid., p. 19.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- 275 Collins, L. & Dominique Lapierre O Jerusalem! [London: Pan, 1973] p. 467.
- 276 Jones, op. cit., p. 292.
- 277 Cohen, op. cit., p. 272.
- 278 Jones, op. cit., pp. 289–290.
- 279 Cohen, op. cit., pp. 242–256, Evensen, op. cit., pp. 55–76, Sykes, op. cit., pp. 283–384, Louis, p. 440, Jones, op. cit., p. 272.
- 280 Spiegel, op. cit., p. 27.
- 281 Evensen, op. cit., p. 80.
- 282 Laqueur, Walter & Barry Rubin, The Israel-Arab Reader [New York: Penguin, 4th edition, 1984] pp. 109–110.
- 283 Allen, op. cit., pp. 381–383.
- 284 Laqueur & Rubin, op. cit., pp. 111–112.
- 285 Tessler, Mark. A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994] pp. 258–260, map 4.3.
- 286 Principal source for this brief overview of Yugoslavia: SBS World Guide, [Melbourne: Hardie Grant Books, 1998, 6th ed.] pp. 832–833.
- 287 Tessler, op. cit., p. 259.
- 288 Ovendale, op. cit., pp. 222–224.
- 289 Cohen, op. cit., pp. 278–300; Evensen, op. cit., pp. 104–105.
- 290 Ovendale, op. cit., pp. 222–224.
- 291 Ganin, op. cit., p. 128; Jones, op. cit., p. 299; Ovendale, op. cit., p. 224.
- 292 Cohen, op. cit., pp. 280–281; Ovendale, op. cit., p. 224; Evensen, op. cit., p. 105.
- 293 Cohen, op. cit., p. 281)
- 294 ibid., p. 277.
- 295 UN General Assembly, Report of the ad hoc Committee on the Palestine Question, UNISPAL e-mail archives, A/516 p. 1.
- 296 Spiegel, op. cit., p. 26.
- 297 ibid.
- 298 Sachar, op. cit., pp. 290–291.
- 299 Ovendale, op. cit., pp. 230–231.
- 300 Jones, op. cit., p. 302; Cohen, op. cit., p. 283.
- 301 Spiegel, op. cit., p. 27.
- 302 Jones, op. cit., p. 303.
- 303 Spiegel, op. cit., p. 28.
- 304 ibid., p. 30.
- 305 Tessler, op. cit., p. 262.
- 306 Lilienthal, op. cit., pp. 65–66.
- 307 Encyclopedia Britannica, Deluxe CD 2000.
- 308 Aarons, Mark & John Loftus, The Secret War Against the Jews, [Melbourne: William Heinemann, 1994] pp. 164–168.
- 309 ibid., pp. 168–170, citing: Higman, Trading with the Enemy, pp. 32–62; confidential interviews with former members of the Office of Political Coordination (OPC) who served abroad under cover of State Department Safehaven Researchers; confidential interviews with former officers of the Army Security Agency, MIS, NSA and CIA; confidential interviews with a former Zionist intelligence officer and a former Israeli diplomat. The authors note that some of the Israeli sources confirmed information which had been obtained from Western sources “only reluctantly” and that “several Israeli sources asked us not to reveal the UN episode, but we believe that it is an important part of history.”
- 310 ibid., p. 170, citing some of the same sources and noting that “corroboration came from former Zionist intelligence officers (pre-Mossad); former diplomat, Government of Israel.”
- 311 Gribetz et al., op. cit., p. 491.
- 312 Collins and Lapierre, op. cit., pp. 77–79.
- 313 Gribetz et al., op. cit., p. 493.
- 314 Sachar, op. cit., pp. 301–302.
- 315 Gribetz et al., op. cit., pp. 489–490.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³¹⁶ The extent of confusion between the White House and the State Department over the issue is illustrated by contradictory statements by recognized authors. According to Sachar, Truman had known in advance of Austin's statement and Marshall had authorised the trusteeship proposal in a formal memorandum to the delegation. But Richard Allen, Imperialism and Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford, 1974] p. 387, contends that "Astonishingly, the White House had simply not been told by the State Department of the orders sent to its UN delegation."
- ³¹⁷ Sachar, op. cit., pp. 303–304.
- ³¹⁸ Lilienthal, op. cit., pp. 78,79.
- ³¹⁹ Gribetz et al., op. cit., p. 494.
- ³²⁰ Sachar, op. cit., pp. 304–305
- ³²¹ Gribetz et al., op. cit., p. 495.
- ³²² Bilby, Kenneth, New Star in the New East [New York: Doubleday, 1950] pp. 30–31, referred to by Tessler, op. cit., p. 304.
- ³²³ Collins and Lapierre, op. cit., pp. 131–133.
- ³²⁴ ibid., pp. 97–98.
- ³²⁵ Sachar, op. cit., p. 322.
- ³²⁶ Allen, op. cit., p. 388.
- ³²⁷ Collins and Lapierre, op. cit., pp. 133–134.
- ³²⁸ Allen, op. cit., p. 389.
- ³²⁹ Tessler, op. cit., p. 291.
- ³³⁰ ibid., p. 295.
- ³³¹ ibid., p. 298, citing research by Benny Morris for The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947–1949 [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987] pp. 149–150.
- ³³² ibid., p. 300.
- ³³³ Allen, op. cit., p. 385–386.
- ³³⁴ Tessler, op. cit. p. 297, quotes the figure "roughly 400,000" from Israeli sources, while Allen, op. cit., p. 392, quotes a range of 150,000 to 300,000 from alternative Middle East and British sources.
- ³³⁵ Allen, op. cit., p. 390.
- ³³⁶ Sachar, loc. cit.
- ³³⁷ Lilienthal, op. cit., p. 80.
- ³³⁸ ibid., p. 81, citing Clifford Papers, Truman Library, Independence, Mo., and noting that Lowenthal actually sent a series of memos; two on the 7th, one on each of the 8th, 9th & 11th, and two on the 12th.
- ³³⁹ Lapide, Pinchas, in The Last Three Popes and the Jews [London: Souvenir Press, 1967] p. 282, quoting Pope Pius XII, encyclical Auspicia quaedam.
- ³⁴⁰ On October 25, 1999, Archbishop Jean Louis Tauran delivered a discourse to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Pontifical Mission for Palestine at a symposium conducted at UN headquarters, New York. He quoted from both Auspicia Quaedam and Redemptoris Nostri of April 15, 1949 sections as follows. [Source: MSANEWS, <http://msanews.mynet.net/> as at October 28, 1999.]
 1. In "Auspicia Quaedam" of 1 May 1948, the Pope asked for prayers so that in the world, tormented by the events of World War II, "at long last there may shine forth, as a gift from heaven, mutual, fraternal and complete peace among all nations and the longed for harmony among all social classes." (6) The Holy Father continued: "Let there be an end to dissensions that redound to no one's advantage. Let justice dictate resolutions of disputes that often sow the seeds of further misfortunes. Let international relations, public and private, increase and be strengthened. Let religion, the advocate of all virtues, enjoy the freedom which is its due. And let the peaceful work of men – under the auspices of justice and the divine impulse of charity -produce abundant fruits for the good of all." (7)

Then, referring in a particular way to the Holy Places, the Pope called for prayers so that "the situation in Palestine may at last be settled justly, and concord and peace may happily triumph." (8)
 2. Afterwards, in the Encyclical "Redemptoris Nostri" of 15 April 1949, Pope Pius XII invited everyone, and in the first place the Catholics of the world, to engage in the work of "persuading the rulers of nations, and those whose duty it is to settle this important question, to grant to the Holy City and its surroundings an appropriate juridical status, the stability of which can be ensured only by common agreement among the nations that love peace and respect the rights of others." (9)

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³⁴¹ Allen, op. cit., p. 393.
- ³⁴² Sachar, op. cit., p. 323.
- ³⁴³ ibid., p. 311.
- ³⁴⁴ Lilienthal, op. cit., p. 82, citing Patrick Anderson, The President's Men [New York: Doubleday, 1968] pp. 118, 119.
- ³⁴⁵ ibid., pp. 81, 82, citing George M. Elsey, FR: 1948, Vol. V, part 2, p. 976.
- ³⁴⁶ ibid., citing memorandum of conversation by Secretary of State George Marshall, FR: 1948, Vol. V, part 2, pp. 972–976, at p. 975.
- ³⁴⁷ ibid.
- ³⁴⁸ ibid., p. 83, citing Clifford, address to the American Historical association, December 28th, 1976.
- ³⁴⁹ ibid., citing Chaim Weizmann, Trial and Error [New York: Harper & Brothers, 1949] p. 477.
- ³⁵⁰ ibid., p. 84.
- ³⁵¹ Lapide, Pinchas, loc. cit., quoting Osservatore Romano, May 14th, 1948.
- ³⁵² See The Vatican Files, The Franklin D. Roosevelt Library and Museum, sourced through <http://www.fdrlibrary.marist.edu/andyc/fdr/vatican.html> as at May 25, 2000.
- ³⁵³ ibid., p. 291.
- ³⁵⁴ Lilienthal, loc. cit., citing George M. Elsey Papers, Harry S. Truman Library, Independence, Mo.
- ³⁵⁵ ibid., citing Dan Kurzman, Genesis 1948 [New York: World Publishing Co., 1970] p. 252.
- ³⁵⁶ ibid., pp. 85, 86, citing documents in the Truman Library, the Memoirs of Vera Weizmann, and FR: 1948, Vol 4, part 2, p. 1007.
- ³⁵⁷ ibid., pp. 86, 87.
- ³⁵⁸ ibid., citing FR: 1948, Vol 4, part 2, editorial note p. 993.
- ³⁵⁹ Collins & Lapierre, op. cit., p. 357.
- ³⁶⁰ Sachar, op. cit., p. 317

Chapter 28: Here comes the Messianic Age!

- ¹ Tessler, Mark A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994] p. 182. Citing Like All the Nations? (Jerusalem, 1930); quoted in Hattis, Susan Lee The Bi-national Idea in Palestine during Mandatory Times [Haifa: Shikmona, 1970] pp. 39–40.
- ² Collins, Larry & Dominique Lapierre O Jerusalem! [London: Pan, 1973] pp. 364, 395. Actually, due to an administrative error aboard the naval vessel on which he departed, Cunningham formally recognized the end of the mandate an hour early, at 11 pm instead of midnight, after false information had been spread in a bid to conceal the time of his departure.
- ³ ibid., prologue, p. xvi.
- ⁴ ibid., pp. 151, 152.
- ⁵ ibid., p. 359, saying that the vote was lost by only one, which suggests a 4–5 result with the chairman not exercising a vote, but Sachar, (Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1981] p. 311), says that the vote was lost six to four.
- ⁶ ibid., mentioning the first two, while the last two are mentioned by Tessler, op. cit., p. 270.
- ⁷ Collins and Lapierre, op. cit., p. 360.
- ⁸ ibid., p. 387.
- ⁹ Minerbi, Sergio I. The Vatican and Zionism, trans. Arnold Schwarz [New York: Oxford, 1990], p. 282., citing “L’Oriente ed il miraggio di Sion” Osservatore Romano, April 10, 1919.
- ¹⁰ Rouse, Ruth & Stephen Neill (Eds) A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948 [Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1973], Volume 1, pp. 718–719.
- ¹¹ Jacobs, Louis The Jewish Religion: a Companion [New York: Oxford, 1995] p. 274.
- ¹² Laqueur, Walter & Barry Rubin (Eds.) The Israel-Arab Reader [New York: Penguin, 1984, fourth edition] pp. 125–128.
- ¹³ Jacobs, op. cit., p. 414.
- ¹⁴ Isaacs, Ronald H. & Kerry M. Olitzky Critical Documents of Jewish History [Northvale, New Jersey: Jason Aronson, 1995] pp. 212–214.
- ¹⁵ Jacobs, op. cit., pp. 273–275.
- ¹⁶ Laqueur & Rubin, op. cit., pp. 113–122.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁷ Wordsworth Dictionary of Beliefs and Religions [Hertfordshire: Wordsworth, 1995] p. 163.
¹⁸ Taylor, Alan R. The Zionist Mind [Beirut: Institute for Palestinian Studies, 1974], pp. 96–100.
¹⁹ Tessler, op. cit. p. 163.
²⁰ Lilienthal, Alfred M. What Price Israel? [Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1953] p. 83.
²¹ ibid., p. 37.
²² Isaacs & Olitzky, op. cit., pp. 212–213.
²³ Laqueur & Rubin, op. cit., p. 34.
²⁴ Tessler, op. cit., p. 259.
²⁵ Lilienthal, Alfred M. What Price Israel? [Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1953] p. 28, citing the official survey of the Anglo-American Committee of Enquiry on Palestine, April 1946.
²⁶ ibid., p. 29, citing The Times, London, November 15, 1945.
²⁷ ibid., pp. 34–37.
²⁸ Latourette, Kenneth S. contributing Ecumenical Bearings of the Missionary Movement and the International Missionary Council in Rouse & Neill, A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948, op. cit., Vol. 1, p. 369.
²⁹ United Nations membership based on the UN's geographic classification, at the time of the Palestine Partition vote:

United Nations General Assembly: Vote to Partition Palestine, November 29, 1947.

Table 1: Actual votes cast.

Region	% of World Pop	Members	Yes	No	Abst'n	Excl'd
Europe ¹	8	16	13	1	2	—
Asia ²	45	13	1	10	1	1
North America ³	8	12	8	1	3	—
Latin America	6	10	7	0	3	—
Africa	<3	4	2	1	1	—
Oceania ⁴	<1	2	2	0	0	—
Total represented	71	57	33	13	10	1
Not represented	29	0
Total population	100	57	—	—	—	—

¹ USSR incl. European & Asian republics ² Incl. Middle East ³ Incl. Caribbean ⁴ Incl. Australia & New Zealand

Table 2: Percentage of the world population represented by the votes cast

	Yes	No	Abst'n	Excl'd	Totals
Voting results expressed as a percentage of the 57 votes cast:	58	23	17	2	100
Population:
1. approx. per cent of the UN community rep'd by the results:	28	33	38	1	100
2. approx. per cent of the world population rep'd in the votes:	20	24	27	1	72
3. approx. per cent of world population NOT rep'd in the votes:			—	28	28

Table 3: Approx. ethnic representation in the United Nations at the date of the Palestine Partition vote:

Ethnic grouping	Per cent	Votes
European & Latin American	22	41
Asia, Africa, Caribbean	50	16
Populations not represented	28	0

- ³⁰ Comparison of voting patterns at three times, to provide an assessment of the impact of Cold War politicking and United States' intervention on the vote to partition Palestine, November 29, 1947.

Region	Before Cold War & USSR change				Before US intervention				Actual votes cast, Nov. 47
	Yes	No	Abst'n	Excl.	Yes	No	Abst'n	Excl.	Yes	No	Abst'n	Excl.
Europe ¹	10	4	2	0	13	1	2	0	13	1	2	0
Asia ²	0	11	1	1	0	11	1	1	1	10	1	1
North America ³	6	2	4	0	6	2	4	0	8	1	3	0
Latin America	4	3	3	0	4	3	3	0	7	0	3	0
Africa	1	2	1	0	1	2	1	0	2	1	1	0
Oceania ⁴	2	0	0	0	2	0	0	0	2	0	0	0
Total represented	23	22	11	1	26	19	11	1	33	13	10	1

¹ USSR incl. European & Asian republics ² Asia incl. Middle East ³ Incl. Caribbean ⁴ Incl. Australia & New Zealand

³¹ UN membership analysed on the basis of the dominant faith of member countries at the date of the Palestine Partition vote:

Religion	Per cent of world pop. repre'd	Votes	%	Yes	No	Abst'n	Excl.
Christian ¹	20	39	68	27	3	8	—
Muslim	7	9	15	—	9	—	—
Hindu	16	1	2	—	1	—	—
Buddhist, Shinto, Confucian, Tao ²	22	2	3	—	—	1	1
Animist, Tribal ³	>0	1	2	1	—	—	—
Atheistic Communism ⁴	5	6	10	5	—	1	—
Jewish	>0	0	0	—	—	—	—
Total	71	5	100	33	13	10	1
Not represented	29	0

¹ Incl. Lebanon (half Muslim) & East Europe excl. the Soviet bloc ² China, Thailand ³ Liberia ⁴ Allows USSR, 2 Soviet republics, Poland, Yugoslavia & Czechoslovakia.

[The figures are distorted somewhat by the fact that the Soviet bloc included both Belarus and Ukraine which together comprised 22 per cent of the Soviet Union's population but which, although under Communist government, were predominantly adherents of Christianity, plus Poland, Yugoslavia & Czechoslovakia]

Table compiled from United Nations World Population statistics and the Map of World's Religions, 4th edition [Berne: Kummerley and Frey. Based on religious statistics available from 1961–1964.]

³² Truman, Harry S., personal diary entry for February 8, 1948, in Ferrell, Robert H. (Ed.) Off the Record: The Private Papers of Harry S. Truman [New York: Harper & Row, 1980] p. 123. The minister referred to at First Baptist Church was Rev. Russell H. Pruden. Truman was a member of the Baptist Church at Grandview.

³³ Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel from the Rise of Zionism to Our Time [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1981], pp. 320–321.

³⁴ ibid., pp. 324–327.

³⁵ ibid., p. 327.

³⁶ ibid., pp. 328–330.

³⁷ MacDonald, Robert W. The League of Arab States [Princeton NJ: Princeton University Press, 1965] pp. 118–119.

³⁸ Hacker, Louis M. The Course of American Economic Growth and Development [New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1970] p. 324.

³⁹ Sachar, op. cit., pp. 327–328.

⁴⁰ Lapide, Pinchas The Last Three Popes and the Jews [London: Souvenir Press, 1967], p. 284.

⁴¹ ibid., p. 283.

⁴² ibid.

⁴³ Allen, Richard Imperialism and Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford University Press, 1974], pp. 404–405, citing Keessing's Contemporary Archives, p. 9408.

⁴⁴ VanderKam, James C. The Dead Sea Scrolls Today [Grand Rapids: William B. Eerdmans/SPCK, 1994] pp. 3–5.

⁴⁵ ibid., pp. 6–7.

⁴⁶ Allegro, John The Dead Sea Scrolls [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1977] preface to the second edition, p. 13, citing W.F. Albright and D.N. Freedman, The Continuing Revolution in Biblical Research in Journal of Bible and Religion, XXXI, April, 1963.

⁴⁷ Ernst, Morris L. & David Loth. Sexual Behaviour and the Kinsey Report [London: Falcon, 1949] p. 15.

⁴⁸ Campbell, Patricia J. Sex Education Books for Young Adults 1892–1979. [New York: Bowker, 1979] p. 98.

⁴⁹ Kinsey, Alfred C., W. B. Pomeroy & C. E. Martin. Sexual Behavior in the Human Male [Philadelphia: Saunders, 1948] pp. 473.

⁵⁰ ibid., p. 476.

⁵¹ ibid., p. 472.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁵² Frequency of Sexual Activity in three age brackets for males who are still single after education to university level

	Adolescence to age 15	Ages 16–20	Ages 21–25 *
Least frequent	Devout Jewish	Devout Jewish	Devout Catholic
	Devout Catholic	Devout Catholic	Devout Protestant
	Devout Protestant	Devout Protestant	–
	Inactive Jewish	Inactive Catholic	Inactive Protestant
	Inactive Catholic	Inactive Protestant	Inactive Catholic
Most frequent	Inactive Protestant	Inactive Jewish	Inactive Jewish

* Insufficient numbers in survey to reliably rank 'Devout Jewish' in this age group

Source: ibid., pp. 469–472. [Composite table compiled from three published tables].

- ⁵³ Ernst & Loth, op. cit., p. 53, referring to a study of 2,000 boys in Washington by Dr. Urban H. Fleege.
- ⁵⁴ ibid., p. 40.
- ⁵⁵ ibid., p. 61.
- ⁵⁶ Kinsey et. al., op. cit., pp. 483,485.
- ⁵⁷ ibid., p. 486.
- ⁵⁸ ibid., p. 222.
- ⁵⁹ ibid., p. 224,225,392.
- ⁶⁰ Ernst & Loth, op. cit., pp. 125–142, take up Kinsey's statement and list 55 sex-related offences "culled at random from the catalogue of our (US) jurisprudence." They then set out a detailed schedule of the legislation and penalties relating to four offences, adultery, fornication, seduction and sodomy in the District of Columbia and the 48 states of the US at that time, (1948), and comment: "The variety of ways in which our State laws look at these various crimes is only equalled by the caprice of their enforcement. In four of the States, adultery is not a crime at all. In three, the adulterer may be sent to prison for five years. It would be interesting to learn whether the husbands of Tennessee or Nevada, where adultery is no crime, are any less faithful to their wives than their brothers in Vermont or Connecticut, where the penalty may be five years."
- ⁶¹ Kinsey et. al., op. cit., pp. 388–389.
- ⁶² ibid., pp. 397–405.
- ⁶³ ibid., p. 416.
- ⁶⁴ The Argus, Melbourne, May 2, 1949, p. 6.
- ⁶⁵ Gossett, Thomas F. Race: The History of an Idea in America. [New York: Schocken, 1965] p. 274.
- ⁶⁶ ibid., pp. 255–266.
- ⁶⁷ ibid., pp. 269–270.
- ⁶⁸ ibid., p. 267, quoting a 1913 issue of The Springfield [Massachusetts] Republican.
- ⁶⁹ Muller, C.J.F. [Ed.] Five Hundred Years: A History of South Africa [Cape Town: Academica, 1969] p. 429.
- ⁷⁰ Sources: ibid., p. 430; Neame, Lawrence F. The History of Apartheid: the story of the colour bar in South Africa [London: Pall Mall Press, 1962] p. 54; also Troup, Freda South Africa: an Historical Introduction [London: Methuen, 1969]; and Lapping, Brian Apartheid: a history [London: Grafton, 1986].
- ⁷¹ Scott, Ernest, A Short History of Australia [Melbourne: Oxford, 1947] pp. 305–307, 331–334.
- ⁷² Palmer, Alan, Dictionary of Twentieth Century History, [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1990] p. 267.
- ⁷³ Zernov, Nicolas The Russians and Their Church [London: SPCK, 1978] p. 164–165.
- ⁷⁴ Akiner, Shirin Islamic Peoples of the Soviet Union [London: Kegan Paul International, 1983] pp. 31–37.
- ⁷⁵ The Handbook of the World Council of Churches, 1982, p. 172, indicates that the Russian Orthodox Church had 50 million members. There is no indication of whether that figure is based on church statistics or a national census.
Akiner, op. cit., pp. 41, 45, quotes USSR census figures for 1970 and 1979 thus:
1970 population 241,720,134; Muslims 36,848,455; 15.2%. 1979 population 262,084,654; Muslims 45,544,114; 17.4%. Changes in nine years: population increase, 8.4%; Muslim increase, 23.6%.
- ⁷⁶ Gribetz, Judah, E. Greenstein & R. Stein, The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster, 1994], p. 491.
- ⁷⁷ ibid., p. 500.
- ⁷⁸ ibid., p. 499.
- ⁷⁹ Bullock, Alan, Hitler and Stalin: parallel lives [London: HarperCollins (Fontana), 1993] p. 1037.
- ⁸⁰ Pospelovsky, Dimitry V. Soviet Antireligious Campaigns and Persecutions, volume 2. [New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988] pp. 93–97.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁸¹ Kochan, Lionel, The Jews in Soviet Russia since 1917 [London: Oxford, (for the Institute of Jewish Affairs) 1978] p. 296.
- ⁸² Aarons, Mark and John Loftus, The Secret War Against the Jews [Melbourne: William Heinemann Australia, 1994] pp. 150–154.
- ⁸³ Halberstam, David, The Fifties [New York: Ballantine (Fawcett Columbine), 1993] pp. 6–9.
- ⁸⁴ ibid., pp. 8–10.
- ⁸⁵ ibid., pp. 11–19.
- ⁸⁶ Aarons, Mark & John Loftus, Rattlines [London: Mandarin, 1991] pp. 48–62.
- ⁸⁷ From data published by the WCC it is very difficult to determine a definitive pattern of membership or the involvement of particular groups of churches over the years. The presentation of data has changed from time to time; the distinction between full and associate members is not always clear; there have been mergers of member churches; a few churches have withdrawn; the definition of regions has changed; and the report of the Credentials Committee on ‘Churches Represented at the Assembly’ in 1948 was qualified because of the difficulty of determining the status of some organizations which were invited and present, and some which were invited and accepted but were not, in fact, represented. Its report lists a total of 162 organizations, of which 17 had accepted invitations but were not present, leaving in doubt their membership status, and 12 which were not member churches but had been invited on the basis of the Utrecht Constitution concerning minority churches. That leaves 133 organizations which had accepted invitations and were represented but it does not make clear whether their membership had been confirmed or was provisional. See The First assembly of the World Council of Churches: The Official Report [London: SCM, 1949] pp. 230–235.
In A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1948, Rouse & Neill, op. cit., W. A. Visser ‘T Hooft, first General Secretary of the WCC, contributing chapter 16 (The Genesis of the World Council of Churches) refers to 147 churches in 44 countries being “represented by 351 official delegates” (p. 719.) However the WCC’s website history (<http://www.wcc-coe.org/wcc/who/histor-e.html>) as at November 6th, 1998, noted that these churches “represented in some way all confessional families within the Christian world, except the Roman Catholic Church” and does not clarify the question of membership, and the list of current member churches includes 135 whose membership dates from 1948.
- ⁸⁸ For purposes of identifying churches as ‘white-dominated’ the writer has grouped the churches listed as in Europe, North America, Australia and New Zealand, plus the three Dutch Reformed churches in South Africa which withdrew their membership in the early 1960s over the issue of Apartheid. The ‘non-white-European’ churches include all others in Africa plus those in Asia, Latin America, the Caribbean, the Pacific and two in North America which are specifically Afro-American.
- ⁸⁹ Visser ‘T Hooft, contrib. The Genesis of the World Council of Churches in Rouse & Neill, op. cit., p. 722.
- ⁹⁰ The First Assembly of the World Council of Churches: The Official Report [London: SCM, 1949] p. 30, extracts from an address by Dr. Visser ‘T Hooft.
- ⁹¹ ibid., p. 37.
- ⁹² ibid.
- ⁹³ Ranelagh, John, CLA: A History [London: BBC Books, 1992] p. 41.
- ⁹⁴ An Empire of Their Own.
- ⁹⁵ WCC First Assembly: The Official Report, op. cit., p. 38.
- ⁹⁶ ibid., pp. 37–38.
- ⁹⁷ Visser ‘T Hooft contrib. chapter 1, The General Ecumenical Development since 1948, in volume II, A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1949–1968, Harold E. Fey (Ed.), [Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1993], pp. 22–23.
- ⁹⁸ WCC First Assembly: The Official Report, op. cit., pp. 34–35.
- ⁹⁹ ibid., pp. 64–66.
- ¹⁰⁰ Bernadotte, Count Folke, Progress Report of the United Nations Mediator on Palestine, General Assembly Official Records: Third Session Supplement No. 11 (A/648), 16 September, 1948, Part I (Introduction) clause 3.
- ¹⁰¹ Mosley, Leonard Dulles: A Biography of Eleanor, Allen, and John Foster Dulles and their family network [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1978] pp. 98–98.
- ¹⁰² WCC First Assembly: The Official Report, op. cit., Lists of delegates and consultants with section and committee memberships identified, pp. 236–259.
- ¹⁰³ ibid., pp. 160–161.
- ¹⁰⁴ ibid., pp. 161–164.

- ¹⁰⁵ ibid., pp. 153–156.
- ¹⁰⁶ ibid., pp. 146–148.
- ¹⁰⁷ ibid., pp. 97–99.
- ¹⁰⁸ ibid., pp. 95–96.
- ¹⁰⁹ ibid., pp. 96.
- ¹¹⁰ ibid., p. 115.
- ¹¹¹ Bernadotte, Count Folke, Progress Report of UN Mediator on Palestine, op. cit. Annex III, Flight log.
- ¹¹² ibid., Part I (Introduction) clauses 4,5,8,; Part II (Basic Factors) clauses 1,8,9.
- ¹¹³ ibid., Part III (Resume of the negotiations) clause 9 (8).
- ¹¹⁴ Allen, op. cit., pp. 406–407.
- ¹¹⁵ Tessler, op. cit., p. 274.

Chapter 29: What has happened to the Messianic Age?

- ¹ Vaksberg, Arkady, Stalin Against the Jews [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994] pp. 166–169.
- ² ibid., pp. 184–186.
- ³ Kochan, Lionel [Ed.] The Jews in Soviet Russia since 1917 [London: Oxford University Press, 1978] p. 124.
- ⁴ Vaksberg, op. cit., p. 185.
- ⁵ Lapidé, Pinchas The Last Three Popes and the Jews [London: Souvenir Press, 1967] p. 284.
- ⁶ Mosley, Leonard, Dulles: A Biography of Eleanor, Allen, and John Foster Dulles and Their Family Network [London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1978] p. 215.
- ⁷ Gribetz, Greenstein and Stein The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Touchstone, 1994] p. 500.
- ⁸ Ferrell, Robert E. Off the Record: The Private Papers of Harry S. Truman [New York: Harper & Row, 1980] p. 150.
- ⁹ Meyer Michael A. Response to Modernity [Detroit: Wayne State University, 1995/Oxford University Press, 1988] p. 346.
- ¹⁰ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from “Australia, History of, (Strains of modern radicalism; the Aborigines; and pre-history)”.
- ¹¹ Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission, Bringing Them Home, Report to the Commonwealth of Australia Attorney General [Sydney: Sterling Press, 1997] cited as Bringing Them Home, p. 39, citing Bickford, Anne, 1988: ‘Contact History: Aborigines in New South Wales after 1788’, No. 1, Australian Aboriginal Studies, p. 57.
- ¹² ibid.
- ¹³ ibid., p. 40, citing Learning from the Past, 1944: prepared by Gungil Jindibah Centre for the NSW Department of Community Services (Southern Cross University, Armidale) p. 14.
- ¹⁴ ibid., p. 42, citing Goodall, Heather, Invasion to Embassy (Allen & Unwin, St. Leonards, 1996) p. 124.
- ¹⁵ ibid., p. 30, citing Buti, Tony ‘They Took the Children Away’ Vol. 20, No. 1, Alternative Law Journal/Vol. 3, No. 72 Aboriginal Law Bulletin, 1995, p. 35.
- ¹⁶ ibid., pp. 32–33, citing Bell, James H. 1964: ‘Assimilation in NSW’, in Marie Reay (ed) Aborigines Now: New Perspectives in the Study of Aboriginal Communities (Angus & Robertson, London) p. 68.
- ¹⁷ ibid., p. 32.
- ¹⁸ ibid., p. 34, citing work by John Bolby for the World Health Organization and quoted in Keen, Susan, 1995: ‘The Burnside Homes for Children: An Overview of their Social History 1911–1980’, Vol. 48 No. 1 Australian Social Work pp. 30–36.
- ¹⁹ ibid., pp. 34–35, citing Hasluck, Paul, 1953, Native Welfare in Australia (Patterson Brokenshaw, Perth) pp. 9 and 15.
- ²⁰ Burrow, J. W. Introduction to The Origin of Species [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1977] pp. 20–21.
- ²¹ Encyclopaedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from “Creation by a Supreme Being”.
- ²² Peters, Ted, contrib. ‘Theology and Natural Science’ in David F. Ford (Ed.) The Modern Theologians [Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1997] p. 649.
- ²³ Allen, Richard Imperialism and Nationalism in the Fertile Crescent [New York: Oxford University Press, 1974] pp. 410–411.
- ²⁴ ibid., p. 412, citing Keesings, pp. 9743, 9745.
- ²⁵ ibid., p. 414, citing Keesings, p. 9829.
- ²⁶ ibid.
- ²⁷ ibid., p. 416.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ²⁸ Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1981] pp. 116, 135–136.
- ²⁹ Lapidé, op. cit., p. 286.
- ³⁰ ibid.
- ³¹ Minerbi, Serio I., trans. Arnold Schwarz The Vatican and Zionism [New York: Oxford University Press, 1990] p. 93.
- ³² ibid., p. 161–162, citing E. Buonaiuti, Pellegrino di Roma, la generazione dell'esodo [Rome: 1945].
- ³³ ibid., pp. 22–24, citing a report by Belgium's representative at the Vatican, Van Den Heuvel, to Foreign Minister Hymans, February 4th, 1918, no. 46/16, ABRE, St. Siege 1918.
- ³⁴ ibid., p. 131.
- ³⁵ ibid., citing Van Den Heuvel, to Foreign Minister Hymans, March 6th, 1919, no. 57/26, ABRE, St. Siege 1919–20.
- ³⁶ ibid., p. 169, citing Weizmann, Trial and Error, vol. 2, pp. 285–286. The meeting apparently took place on April 20th, 1922.
- ³⁷ ibid., p. 133, citing Monti to Foreign Minister Sonnino, March 29th, 1919, ASME file 1571.
- ³⁸ ibid., p. 63, 67–80.
- ³⁹ Tessler, Mark, A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994] p. 202, citing Zalman Abramov, Perpetual Dilemma: Jewish Religion in the Jewish State [Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh, Dickinson University Press, 1976, p. 164].
- ⁴⁰ Jacobs, Louis The Jewish Religion: a Companion [New York, Oxford University Press, 1995] p. 442.
- ⁴¹ Lapidé, op. cit., p. 287.
- ⁴² Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 183.
- ⁴³ Minerbi, op. cit., p. 62.
- ⁴⁴ ibid., p. 101, citing Herzl, Diaries, p. 1606, entry for January 27th, 1904, refers to Pope Pius X querying whether the Zionists had given any thought to rebuilding the Temple and renewing the sacrificial services in the ancient way.
- ⁴⁵ Gribetz et. al., op.cit., p. 495.
- ⁴⁶ Meyer, op. cit., pp. 346–347.
- ⁴⁷ ibid., pp. 356–358.
- ⁴⁸ ibid., p. 360, citing: CCARY (Central Conference of American Rabbis Yearbook), 56 (1946): 231; Will Herberg, Judaism and Modern Man (New York, 1951); and noting a number of essays by other writers which were in the same vein as Herberg's views.
- ⁴⁹ ibid., p. 362.
- ⁵⁰ ibid., p. 363, citing: Liberal Judaism, July 1946, p. 42, noting that an early use of the term "Holocaust" occurs in ibid., June-July 1948, p. 53; and quoting Polish from CCARY, 63 (1953): 429.
- ⁵¹ Yahil, Leni The Holocaust [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990] pp. 362–363.
- ⁵² Meyer, op. cit., p. 364.
- ⁵³ ibid., pp. 364–365.
- ⁵⁴ Ochs, Peter contributing 'Judaism and Christian Theology' in David F. Ford (Ed.) The Modern Theologians [Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1997] p. 608.
- ⁵⁵ ibid., citing Rosemary Ruether, Faith and Fratricide: The Theological Roots of Antisemitism [New York, 1974].
- ⁵⁶ ibid.
- ⁵⁷ ibid., quoting Frei, Hans "The 'literal reading' of the biblical narrative in the Christian tradition: Does it stretch or will it break?" In Frank McConnell (ed.), The Bible and the Narrative Tradition (New York and Oxford, 1986); pp. 73–4.
- ⁵⁸ ibid., quoting Lindbeck, George, The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age (Philadelphia, 1984), p. 164.
- ⁵⁹ Herderlijk Schrijven van de Generale Synode der Nederelandse Hervormde Kerk, Betreffende de Rooms – Katholieke Kerk, Boekencentrum N.V. 'S-Gravenhage, 23 Maart 1950. Notes by courtesy: Reformed Theological College, Geelong.
- ⁶⁰ Latourette, Kenneth Scott Christianity in a Revolutionary Age Volume IV The Twentieth Century in Europe [Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1969] pp. 388.
- ⁶¹ Pius XII, Pope. Encyclical Humani Generis, English translation, N.C.W.C., 1950, in The Papal Encyclicals 1939–1958, compiled by Claudia Carlen IHM [Raleigh: McGrath, 1981] pp. 175–183.
- ⁶² Latourette, op. cit., Vol. IV, p. 114.
- ⁶³ Lilienthal, Alfred M. The Zionist Connection. What Price Peace? [New York: Middle East Perspective, 1979] p. 91, citing US Foreign Policy, Compilation of Studies prepared under the direction of Committee on Foreign

NOTES TO VOLUME III

Relations, United States Senate, Pursuant to S Res 335, 85th Congress and S Res 31 and S Res 250, 86th Congress, (Washington: US Government Printing Office, 1960) Study No. 13 of June 9, 1960, pp. 1308–9.

⁶⁴ ibid., p. 92, citing FR: 1949, The Near East, South Asia, and Africa, Vol. VI (Washington, DC: 1971), p. 1074.

⁶⁵ ibid., citing FR: p. 1107.

⁶⁶ ibid., citing FR: p. 1110.

⁶⁷ ibid., p. 93.

⁶⁸ ibid., citing William Eddy, FDR Meets Ibn Saud (New York: American Friends of the Middle East, 1954) p. 37.

⁶⁹ Meyer, op. cit., p. 362 & 364.

⁷⁰ Allen, op. cit., pp. 417–418, citing Keesings, pp. 9749, 9829, 10100, 10101, and a UN report of April 1949.

⁷¹ Sachar, op. cit., p. 359. Weizmann, architect of the Balfour Declaration, was promptly confirmed as President by the Knesset following the first general elections. He is said to have been disappointed at the honorific nature of his office and to have referred to himself as “a prisoner in Rehovot.”

⁷² Tessler, op. cit., p. 268, citing the American Jewish Yearbook, 1947–48 as his source, provides figures for the estimated Jewish population of Europe, including the Soviet Union, in 1939 and 1947, by country. The totals were: 1939, 9,739,200; 1947, 3,920,100. The Jewish population in 1939 of countries in Europe which were not occupied is therefore, by deduction, 810,200.

⁷³ Barnavi, Eli (Gen. Ed.) A Historical Atlas of the Jewish People [London: Kuperard, 1994] pp. 232–233, 240–241.

⁷⁴ ibid., p. 240.

⁷⁵ Laqueur, Walter and Barry Rubin The Israel–Arab Reader [New York: Penguin, 4th Edition, 1984] p. 144, quoting Abba Eban, Israeli Ambassador to the United Nations, 1957.

⁷⁶ ibid., pp. 140–164.

⁷⁷ Barnavi, op. cit. p. 241.

⁷⁸ Percentage of world Jewish population by region:

Year >> Region	1939	1945	1948	1950	1970	1989	1989 B	1991 [G]	2000
1 Palestine	2.8		5.7
Israel		9.7		29.0	[28.0]	31.2	28.6
2 United States		45.5		43.5	47.3		[45.1]		32.1
Canada				1.7			[2.3]
United States + Canada	28.9		45.5			45.5		46.9
Americas [All, N & S]				45.2			[50.7]
3 Western Europe	7.8		9.0					8.1
European Union						8.0
Eastern Europe	32.6
Soviet Union	18.7					10.7	[10.3]		15.7
East Europe + Soviet Union			23.2					9.1
Total Europe	59.2		32.2	30.9		18.7	[19.3]	17.2
4 North Africa	3.2		5.0					0.1
Africa [All]				6.1			[1.1]
Asia	2.2		5.7	2.3			[0.3]	0.3
5 Other populations not incl. in regions for each ‘year’	3.7	54.5	5.9	5.8	52.7	6.8	[0.6]	4.3	23.6

Sources:

The table is prepared from the nearest comparable figures for world and US Jewish populations and is based on, or computed from, data in Barnavi, op. cit. and Fishman (Ed., The Jews of the United States). A common basis is not used in these references for the presentation of data in all cases. Data is given for the USA separately in some instances and for the USA and Canada together in other instances. Similarly, data for the Soviet Union is shown separately in some instances and with Eastern Europe in others, and figures for Western Europe have been superseded by figures for the European Union in more recent instances.

⁷⁹ Years 1939, 1948 and 1991: Barnavi, op. cit., pp. 194–195.

Year 1950: Gribetz et.al., op. cit., p. 509.

⁸⁰ Year 1989B: Barnavi, op. cit. p. 278.

⁸¹ Year 1989G: Gribetz et.al., op. cit. p. 709.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

Year 2000: Encyclopaedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Diaspora".

The population of persons classed as Jews in Russia in 1939 was 3,020,000. By the 1959 census the number had fallen to 2,267,800 of whom 2,047,000 were within the 1939 boundaries. [Kochan, Lionel (Ed.) The Jews in Soviet Russia since 1917, Southampton: Camelot, 1978, p. 147.] * On the basis of that census the percentage of the world's Jews in the Soviet Union in 1959 is estimated at 18% but the figures cannot be regarded as reliable because of changed boundaries, changed definition of the term 'Jew' for purposes of nationality within the Soviet Union, and the pressures of the war and post war crisis years on those who had declared themselves to be Jews. After emigration restrictions were eased from the 1970s the Jewish population fell dramatically both as a percentage of the Russian population and as a percentage of the world Jewish population, in line with population decreases from 2,267,800 in 1959, to 1,449,150 in 1989 and 1,254,400 in 1990. [Barnavi, op. cit., p. 273.] *An estimate of 2,000,000 is given for the number of Jews in the Soviet Union in 1947 by Tessler, op. cit., p. 268, citing the American Jewish Year Book, 1947-48.

⁷⁹ Allen, loc. cit. These numbers total 965,000 which is greater than the estimate for refugees in care in June. This appears to be accounted for by persons living privately and therefore not included as "in care".

⁸⁰ Laqueur & Rubin, op. cit., pp. 125-127.

⁸¹ Gribetz et al., op. cit., p. 483., and Barnavi, op. cit., two references, pp. 240, 268-269. It appears that about 400,000 Jews from Eastern Europe chose refuge, or exile, in distant Russian labour camps following the occupation of Poland and that about 200,000 of them were Polish by nationality. After the war the Polish Government encouraged them to return and in 1946 about 154,000 opted for repatriation. However unidentified elements sought to disrupt the resettlement program and a series of pogroms peaked with an incident at Kielce in July in which 42 persons were killed. There are several alternative views of the possible motive behind the pogroms. One is that they were initiated by supporters of the new government who wished to besmear pre-Communist Poland in the eyes of the world. Another is that anti-Communists reacted against large numbers of Jews who returned with the Red Army and supported the new Communist regime. But yet another is that Zionists who were eager to encourage their Jewish colleagues to migrate to Palestine rather than to resettle in Poland and who therefore wanted to see the failure of the Polish resettlement plan, stimulated a touch of anti-Semitism which quickly got out of hand. Gribetz notes that the Poles "were aroused by rumours of the Jewish abduction of Christian children for ritual purposes." In any case, the incidents triggered a further flood of Jewish refugees into DP camps and into the escape routes to Palestine via southern Europe and it is estimated that about 100,000 of the Jews who returned from Russia left in that flood. The Kielce incident occurred within weeks of the arrest of about 2,500 Jews in connection with a major British army search for arms caches in Palestine which was followed by the bombing by the Irgun Group of the King David Hotel which housed the British Military Headquarters and in which 92 persons were killed.

⁸² Sachar, op. cit., p. 395.

⁸³ Barnavi, op. cit., p. 241.

⁸⁴ Sachar, loc. cit.

⁸⁵ ibid., p. 396.

⁸⁶ The US had pressed for the repatriation of 200,000 to 300,000 Palestinians. Tessler, op. cit., pp. 313-314.

⁸⁷ Allen, op. cit., p. 423.

⁸⁸ Sachar, loc. cit.

⁸⁹ Figures for 1939 from Sachar, op. cit., pp. 396-397. Other data from Barnavi, op. cit., pp. 194-195.

⁹⁰ A large proportion of the Jewish population in Syria and Lebanon had already migrated to Europe, the Americas or Egypt from where many subsequently also made the journey to Israel when circumstances in Egypt turned against them. In addition to Operation Magic Carpet (the Yemen) and Operation Ali Baba (Iraq) which are described separately, major migrations arranged or facilitated in some way by the Jewish Agency included nearly 30,000 persons from Lybia between 1949 and 1951; 33,000 from Turkey between 1948 and 1950; 39,000 from Iran between 1948 and 1956; and two waves from Egypt, the first in 1949 and the second in 1956 as a consequence of the Suez Canal crisis. Source: Sachar, op. cit., chapters xiv and xviii.

⁹¹ ibid., pp. 397-398.

⁹² Allen, op. cit., p. 424, suggests that the Jewish community in the Yemen may have been the oldest in the Diaspora.

⁹³ Laqueur & Rubin, op. cit., p. 128, document 27, use the translation "acts against the Jewish nation"; while Ronald H Isaacs. & Kerry M. Olitzky use the translation "is engaged in an activity directed against the Jewish

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- people.” (see p. 215, document 48 in Critical Documents of Jewish History [Northvale, New Jersey: Jason Aronson, 1995]. The condition that an applicant may be barred by virtue of a criminal past or being a person who is likely to endanger public welfare was added by amendment in 1954.
- ⁹⁴ This anomaly was not challenged successfully in court until 1998 when Judge Moshe Ravid of the Jerusalem District Court ruled that an Israeli citizen who had been charged with murder in the United States could be extradited to that country to stand trial because his citizenship was a consequence of his father having gained Israeli citizenship under the Law of Return but he, personally, had no other substantial connection with Israel and travelled to Israel on a US passport. Sources: Ze’ev Segal, A new definition of citizenship, and Moshe Reinfeld, Court rules that teen murder suspect can be extradited to the U.S., Ha’aretz English Edition Internet News, September 7, 1998.
- ⁹⁵ Laqueur & Rubin, loc. cit., clause 3 (a).
- ⁹⁶ ibid., clause 4.
- ⁹⁷ Jacobs, op. cit., p. 285.
- ⁹⁸ Tessler, op. cit., p. 310.
- ⁹⁹ Sachar, op. cit., p. 398.
- ¹⁰⁰ Said, Edward The Question of Palestine [New York: Vintage, 1980] p. 13, citing Theodor Herzl Complete Diaries [New York: Herzl Press, 1960] Vol. I, p. 88.
- ¹⁰¹ ibid., pp. 99–100, citing Joseph Weitz, My Diary and Letters to the Children [Tel Aviv: Massada, 1965] Vol II, pp. 181–182.
- ¹⁰² Sachar, op. cit., pp. 427–439.
- ¹⁰³ ibid., pp. 354–356.
- ¹⁰⁴ ibid., p. 357.
- ¹⁰⁵ ibid., p. 367.
- ¹⁰⁶ ibid., p. 67.
- ¹⁰⁷ Tessler, op. cit., p. 201.
- ¹⁰⁸ Sachar, op. cit., p. 362.
- ¹⁰⁹ ibid., pp. 361–362.
- ¹¹⁰ Allen, op. cit., p. 435.
- ¹¹¹ Sachar, op. cit., pp. 371–372.
- ¹¹² Allen, op. cit., p. 416.
- ¹¹³ Tessler, op. cit., p. 329, citing Oesterreicher, ‘An open letter’, in Oesterreicher and Sinai, p. 251.
- ¹¹⁴ Sachar, op. cit., p. 301.
- ¹¹⁵ Allen, op. cit., p. 428.
- ¹¹⁶ El-Khawas, Mohamed & Samir Abed-Rabbo American Aid to Israel [Brattleboro, Vermont: Amana, 1984] p. 27, citing Samir A Rabbo, American Aid to Israel: a ‘Patron-Client’ Relationship, The Search, Vol. 1, No. 1, Winter 1980, p. 25.
- ¹¹⁷ Tables published in El-Khawas, op. cit., and attributed to the US Agency for International Development, Bureau for Program Policy and Coordination, list loans and grants only for the years 1949 forward. The only item listed for the years 1949–1952 inclusive is economic assistance grants, $86.5 million. However Sachar, op. cit., p. 409, states: “It was ironic, too, that Israel’s very military success in the War of Independence eased the pressure on Jewish sympathizers abroad to match their unprecedented donations of 1948. A $100 million loan from the United States Export-Import Bank provided some hope of relief, but it was hardly adequate to raise the nation’s standard of living.”
- ¹¹⁸ Collins, Larry & Dominique Lapierre O Jerusalem [London: Pan, 1973] pp. 148–153.
- ¹¹⁹ Sachar, op. cit., p. 426.
- ¹²⁰ ibid., pp. 372–373.
- ¹²¹ Gribetz et al., op. cit., p. 519.
- ¹²² Sachar, op. cit., p. 246. [According to Sachar the payments were to be over a period of twelve years].
- ¹²³ Ranelagh, John, CIA: A History [London: BBC Books, 1992] pp. 15–26.
- ¹²⁴ Stinnett, Robert B., Day of Deceit [New York: Free Press/Simon & Schuster, 2000] pp. 2–3.
- ¹²⁵ Ranelagh, op. cit., p. 27.
- ¹²⁶ ibid., pp. 30–31.
- ¹²⁷ ibid., p. 34.
- ¹²⁸ ibid., p. 35.
- ¹²⁹ ibid., p. 36.
- ¹³⁰ Mosley, op. cit., pp. 237–238.
- ¹³¹ Ranelagh, op. cit., p. 41.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹³² Baylis, John, contrib. "Britain and the Formation of NATO" in Smith, Joseph, (Ed.) The Origins of NATO [Exeter: University of Exeter, 1990] p. 21.
- ¹³³ Mosley, op. cit., p. 236.
- ¹³⁴ Baylis, op. cit., citing various Foreign Office records including Telegram no. 1932, 17 February 1949, FO 371/79226, Z 1584/1074/72G, PRO. The italics are by Baylis.
- ¹³⁵ The founding members of NATO were the United States, Britain, Belgium, France, The Netherlands, Luxembourg, Italy, Portugal, Denmark, Iceland, Norway and Canada.
- ¹³⁶ Ranelagh, op. cit., p. 41.
- ¹³⁷ Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 183.
- ¹³⁸ Hanson, Eric O. The Catholic Church in World Politics [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1990] p. 9.
- ¹³⁹ Pius IX, allocution Singulari Quadam, in Neuner, J. & J. Dupuis, (Ed.s) The Christian Faith in the Doctrinal Statements of the Catholic Church [Bangalore: Theological Publications in India, 1978] p. 217.
- ¹⁴⁰ Pius IX, encyclical Quanto conficiamur moerore, 1863, Neuner & Dupuis, loc. cit.
- ¹⁴¹ Leo XIII, Encyclical on Socialism, Quod Apostolici Muneris, December 28, 1878. Source: Documents of the Catholic Church; <http://www.newadvent.org/docs/le13qm.htm>.
- ¹⁴² Pius XI, encyclical Quadragesimo Anno, May 1931, Neuner & Dupuis, op. cit., p. 279.
- ¹⁴³ Pospelovsky, Dimitry V. Soviet Anti-Religious Campaigns and Persecutions Volume 2 [New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988] pp. 93–97. Reference has already been made in chapter 28 to the closure of some Orthodox Churches in the Crimea at this time, but that was for other reasons.
- ¹⁴⁴ Catholic World News Briefs for August 4, 2000. E-mail subscription service.
- ¹⁴⁵ Ranelagh, op. cit., p. 42.
- ¹⁴⁶ Blum, William, Killing Hope [Monroe, Maine: Common Courage Press, 1995] p. 23, citing: hearings held in executive session before the US Senate Foreign Relations Committee during 1949–50; Economic Assistance to China and Korea 1949–50, testimony of Dean Acheson, p. 23; made public January 1974 as part of the Historical Series; and Barbara W. Tuchman, Stilwell and the American Experience in China 1911–45 (New York, 1972) p. 676.
- ¹⁴⁷ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, entry for "The Chinese Civil War", notes that: "Corrupt officers also sold vast numbers of US weapons to the enemy and siphoned off much of the $2,000,000,000 in US aid in personal fortunes." It does not attempt to quantify the "vast numbers" or the amount of cash siphoned off, and it is therefore reasonable to assume that the allowance for goods "siphoned off" by "corrupt officers" includes the materials taken with them by the divisions which defected en masse to the Communist forces. It would not, in that case, be in the same category as corruptly acquired personal wealth.
- ¹⁴⁸ Blum, op. cit., p. 23. Note 15: In 1992 the Taiwan government admitted that its army had killed an estimated 18,000 to 28,000 native-born Taiwanese in the 1947 massacre. (Los Angeles Times, 24 February 1992).
- ¹⁴⁹ ibid., p. 23, quoting from Felix Greene, A Curtain of Ignorance (New York, 1964).
- ¹⁵⁰ ibid., citing William Manchester, American Caesar: Douglas MacArthur 1880–1964 (London, 1979) p. 535.
- ¹⁵¹ Neill, Stephen, A History of Christian Missions [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1964] p. 467.
- ¹⁵² Catholic Almanac 1997, p. 338.
- ¹⁵³ Blum, op. cit., p. 23, citing Foreign Relations of the United States, 1949, Vol. III, The Far East: China. (US Government Printing Office, Washington 1978), passim between pp. 357 and 399; 768; 779–780. Blum notes that publication of this volume in the State Department's series was held up precisely because it contained the reports about Chou En-lai's request. (San Francisco Chronicle, 27 September 1978, p. F-1).
- ¹⁵⁴ ibid., p. 24.
- ¹⁵⁵ Dulles, op. cit., p. 19.
- ¹⁵⁶ Executive Order 12333 -United States intelligence activities, Part 1., clause 1.8 The Central Intelligence Agency. (e). Source: <http://www.cia.gov/cia/information/eo12333.html> as at August 4, 2000.
- ¹⁵⁷ About CIA: Frequently Asked Questions. Source: http://www.cia.gov/cia/public_affairs/faq.html as at August 4, 2000.
- ¹⁵⁸ New York Times, 25 April 1966, p. 20, cited by Blum., op. cit.
- ¹⁵⁹ Burma: David Wise and Thomas Ross, The Invisible Government (New York, 1965, paperback edition), pp. 138–44; Joseph Burkholder Smith, Portraits of a Cold Warrior (New York, 1976), pp. 77–8; New York Times, 28 July 1951; 28 December 1951; 22 February 1952; 8 April 1952; 30 December 1952; Opium: Christopher Robbins, Air America (US, 1979) pp. 84–7; cited by Blum, op. cit.
- ¹⁶⁰ ibid., p. 24.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁶¹ ibid., p. 123; citing Hans Askenasy, Are we all Nazis? (Lyle Stuart, Secaucus, N.J., 1978) p. 64.
- ¹⁶² ibid.
- ¹⁶³ On December 3, 1854, the British colonial authorities ordered police and soldiers to surround a hastily built stockade and to 'quell' a relatively small rebellion by 150 miners within it in the Ballarat gold fields in Victoria. It was to become the most celebrated rebellion in Australian history. It had been brewing for some time and was the outcome of long-standing grievances held by the miners over exorbitant prospecting-license fees, brutal police procedures for collecting fees, lack of electoral representation in the Legislative Council, and the prohibition of prospecting on crown lands.
- ¹⁶⁴ Blum, op. cit., p. 48, citing Shirley Hazzard, Countenance of Truth: The United Nations and the Waldheim Case (New York, 1990) pp. 13–22; and Trygve Lie, In the Cause of Peace (New York, 1954) p. 389, in which Lie states that it was he who initiated this practice.
- ¹⁶⁵ Jessop, Philip C., radio address of April 13, 1950, reprinted in The Department of State Bulletin, 24 April 1950, p. 627, quoted in Blum, op. cit., p. 46.
- ¹⁶⁶ The treaty, agreed in advance, was signed in San Francisco by Japan and 48 other nations in 1951.
- ¹⁶⁷ Mosley, op. cit., pp. 248–251.
- ¹⁶⁸ There is no reference in the official report of the assembly to Syngman Rhee being present in any capacity at the first Assembly of the World Council of Churches in Amsterdam in 1948. Neither is there any reference to him in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1968 [in two volumes, Eds. Ruth Rouse, Stephen Neill and Harold E. Fey, (Geneva: WCC, 1993)]. There is no provision for 'membership' of the World Council of Churches in the sense which Mosley's reference might suggest and, although the author has not sought to clarify this point with the WCC, it is therefore assumed that his role had been that of a delegate or a consultant to committees or consultations of the council while it was in process of formation.
- ¹⁶⁹ Mosley, op. cit., p. 256. Mosley notes as follows. The account of Foster Dulles' s activities in the State Department under Dean Acheson comes from several sources: conversations with Luke Battle, George Kennan's Oral History in the Princeton Papers, John Allison's Oral History, George V. Allen's Oral History, Allen Dulles' Oral History (all in the Princeton Papers), and talks with Eleanor Dulles.
- ¹⁷⁰ Published figures vary so widely that it is not clear exactly what the balance of forces was at the outbreak of war, but one report suggests that North Korea had 147,000 troops (about 11 divisions), reasonably well equipped, including a proportion trained in either China or the Soviet Union, with 150 Soviet advisers to each division, say 1,650 total. This was significantly higher strength than the forces cited for South Korea: about 98,000 troops (seven divisions), less well equipped, with a total of 500 US advisers. [Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Korea: History of the Korean War"].
- ¹⁷¹ Blum, op. cit., pp. 46–47, citing John Gunther, The Riddle of MacArthur (London, 1951), pp. 151–2; and referring to a number of other sources.
- ¹⁷² ibid., pp. 48–49, citing New York Times, June 25, 1950; Joseph C. Goulden, Korea: The Untold Story of the War (New York, 1982) pp. 87088; I.F. Stone, The Hidden History of the Korean War (New York, 1952) pp. 75, 77–78; the full text of the Security Council resolution of July 7, 1950 as published in the New York Times, July 8, 1950, p. 4.
- ¹⁷³ ibid., p. 49, quoting from Dwight Eisenhower, The White House Years: Mandate for Change, 1953–1956 (New York, 1963) p. 340.
- ¹⁷⁴ Mosley, op. cit., p. 258.
- ¹⁷⁵ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "International Relations: the Korean War".
- ¹⁷⁶ ibid.
- ¹⁷⁷ Mosley, op. cit., pp. 290–306, indicates that there was much competition and political lobbying ("infighting") for the post at the CIA and that Allen's appointment was not finally decided until some time after Eisenhower's election. But John Foster appears to have had an understanding some time before the election that the State Department would be his, and he had some influence in Eisenhower's decision in favor of his brother for the CIA.
- ¹⁷⁸ ibid.
- ¹⁷⁹ ibid., pp. 305–306. Mosley says that paragraph was drafted by Dulles in a blatant gesture to win the approval of the influential Senator William Knowland, "a perfervid supporter of Chiang Kai-shek." Averell Harriman, (an elder statesman of the Democratic Party, former ambassador to Britain, the USSR, Secretary for Commerce, and later Governor of New York), said it seemed to him "a tragically unwise thing to do" and that "Chiang could make difficult our relations with mainland China as time went on, and I thought this was the first and perhaps the worst mistake Foster Dulles made".

NOTES TO VOLUME III

¹⁸⁰ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "China: History of reconstruction and consolidation 1949-52".

¹⁸¹ ibid., from "Syngman Rhee".

¹⁸² Reliable figures for casualties during the Korean War are also hard to locate. For example, the Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000 gives two sets of figures, plus other references, which do not correspond. This table has figures from: line A, 'Korea, History of Armistice and Aid;' line B, 'Korean War;' line C, 'United States, History of the Korean War.' [LIA = Lost in Action]

A: Casualties: Korean War

Grand Total	SK Civilian	SK Non-civ	Com.Civilian	Com.Non-civ	US: LIA	SK: LIA	UN: LIA	China: LIA	NK: LIA
4,000,000	1,000,000	313,000	1,000,000	1,500,000	33,629	47,000	3,194	900,000	520,000

B: Deaths: Korean War

Grand Total	US: Total	SK: Total	UN: Others	China: Total	NK: Total
2,854,000	54,000	1,300,000	smaller No	1,000,000	500,000

C: US Casualties, Korean War

Only US given	US: Total
	142,000

¹⁸³ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "China: History of Reconstruction and Consolidation 1949-52". Regulations for the Suppression of Counter-revolutionaries (February 20, 1951) authorized police action against dissident individuals and suspected groups. A campaign against anti-Communist holdouts, bandits, and political opponents was also pressed. Greatest publicity attended Peking's dispatch of troops to Tibet at about the same time that it intervened in Korea. The distinctiveness and world reputation of the Tibetan culture was to make this a severe test of Communist efforts to complete the consolidation of their power. In 1959, after a period of sporadic clashes with the Chinese, the Tibetans rose in rebellion, to which Peking responded with force.

Under the Agrarian Reform Law (June 1950) the property of rural landlords was confiscated and redistributed, which fulfilled a promise to the peasants and smashed a class identified as feudal or semi-feudal. The property of traitors, "bureaucrat capitalists" (especially the "four big families" of the Nationalist Party [KMT], the K'ungs, Soongs, Chiangs, and Ch'ens), and selected foreign nationals was also confiscated, helping end the power of many industrialists and providing an economic basis for industrialization. Programs were begun to increase production and to lay the basis for long-term socialization.

These programs coincided with a massive effort to win over the population to the leadership. Such acts as a marriage law (May 1950) and a trade-union law (June 1950) symbolized the break with the old society, while mass organizations and the regime's "campaign style" dramatized the new.

Beginning in 1951, the revolutionary agenda of the Communists began to be felt in the cities. A Suppression of Counter-revolutionaries campaign dealt violently with many former leaders of secret societies, religious associations, and the KMT in early 1951. In late 1951 and early 1952, three major political campaigns brought the revolutionary essence of the CCP home to key urban groups. The Three Antis campaign targeted Communist cadres who had become too close to China's capitalists. The Five Antis campaign aimed at the capitalists themselves and brought them into line on charges of bribery, tax evasion, theft of state property and economic information, and cheating on government contracts. And the Thought Reform campaign humbled university professors and marked a turning point in the move from Western to Soviet influence in structuring China's university curriculum.

In spite of the Soviet Union's unwillingness to provide all the military support which China wanted, and in spite of efforts by the United States to drive a wedge between them, The Soviet Union made available a smaller developmental loan in 1954. Equipment and technical aid was supplied for a large number of industrial projects and the Soviet Union also played a major role in Chinese foreign policy, and at that stage China accepted Moscow's leadership in the international Communist movement. Coordinating its efforts with Stalin, Peking supported revolutionary activity throughout Asia and opposed compromise with neutralist regimes.

¹⁸⁴ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "International Relations, the Korean War".

¹⁸⁵ The list of principal scientists whose work enabled the development of the bomb, or who actually worked on its development in the belief that its purpose was to end Hitler's Nazi regime, and the Second World War, with a single strike, or who, having realized what had been unleashed at Hiroshima and Nagasaki became committed anti-nuclear warriors is enormous, but three key persons stand out: Albert Einstein, Robert Oppenheimer and Marcus Oliphant.

¹⁸⁶ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "John Foster Dulles, Assessment".

¹⁸⁷ Visser 'T Hooft, W.A.[Ed.] The First Assembly of the World Council of Churches [London: SCM Press, 1949] p. 38.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ¹⁸⁸ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State".
- ¹⁸⁹ The Information Department of the CPC, Statutes of the Christian Peace Conference [Prague: CPC, 1978] p. 2.
- ¹⁹⁰ Visser 'T Hooft, loc. cit.
- ¹⁹¹ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Joseph Stalin, an assessment".
- ¹⁹² Gilbert, Martin, Second World War, [London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1989] p. 241.
- ¹⁹³ Gilbert, Martin, Churchill: A Life [London: Minerva, 1982] pp. 381–382.
- ¹⁹⁴ ibid., pp. 389–390.
- ¹⁹⁵ ibid.
- ¹⁹⁶ ibid., pp. 392–393.
- ¹⁹⁷ ibid., p. 395.
- ¹⁹⁸ ibid., p. 403.
- ¹⁹⁹ Buss, Claude A Asia in the Modern World [London: Collier/Macmillan, 1964] p. 342
- ²⁰⁰ Gilbert, Churchill: A Life, op. cit., p. 405.
- ²⁰¹ Kochan, op. cit., pp. 119–120.
- ²⁰² Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., pp. 217–219.
- ²⁰³ Bullock, Alan. Hitler and Stalin: Parallel Lives [London: HarperCollins/Fontana, 1993], p. 788, citing Volkogonov, D.A., Stalin: Triumph and Tragedy, trans. Harold Shukman [London, 1991] pp. 412–413; and referring to statements by Mikoyan, Khrushchev and Stramenov.
- ²⁰⁴ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., pp. 241–244.
- ²⁰⁵ Bullock, op. cit., p. 792, indicates that there is confusion over whether this was a second approach for an armistice or whether there was only one approach, reported by different sources to have been made on different dates. However the two reports involve different people. The October report is based on the personal account of General Zhukov who had been sent to take command of the south western front shortly after the invasion and was not recalled to Moscow until October. It therefore appears most likely that two separate approaches were made.
- ²⁰⁶ Gilbert, Second World War, op. cit., p. 241.
- ²⁰⁷ Sachar, op. cit., p. 229.
- ²⁰⁸ Churchill, Winston S. The Second World War, Volume III, The Grand Alliance [London: Reprint Society, 1950], p. 492.
- ²⁰⁹ ibid., pp. 492–493, quoting from Eden's dispatch of January 5, 1942.
- ²¹⁰ This was the first time that Churchill used the expression "an iron curtain" but it appealed to him. He next used it, with devastating effect, in March 1946. See a later diary entry for that date.
- ²¹¹ Churchill, Winston S The Second World War, Vol. VI, Triumph and Tragedy [London: Reprint Society, 1954] pp. 457–458.
- ²¹² ibid., p. 460.
- ²¹³ ibid., p. 462.
- ²¹⁴ ibid., p. 320, reproducing his telegram to the dominion prime ministers from Yalta, July 5, 1944.
- ²¹⁵ In the Cairo Declaration, Dec. 1, 1943, the United States, Britain and China, pledged independence for Korea "in due course." The vagueness concerned Korean provisional government leaders in Chungking and they requested an interpretation from the US. They received no answer. Later, at Yalta in February 1945, Roosevelt proposed to Stalin that Korea should be governed under a four-power joint trusteeship involving the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union and China. Stalin agreed in principle, but no formal agreement was reached. Then at Potsdam in July 1945, when U.S. military leaders insisted on encouraging Soviet entry into the war against Japan, Soviet military leaders asked their U.S. counterparts about invading Korea, with which the Soviet Union shares a 30 mile common border, and the Americans replied that such an expedition would not be practicable for them until after a successful landing had taken place on the Japanese mainland. The ensuing Potsdam Declaration included the statement that "the terms of the Cairo Declaration ... shall be carried out." On August 8 the Soviet Union agreed to enter the war against Japan and pledged its support for the independence of Korea where its forces went into action the following day, landing at the northern tip of Korea adjacent to their own border, at the same time that they moved into Manchuria from Soviet territory. The General Order No. 1, drafted on August 11 by the US for Japanese surrender terms in Korea, provided for Japanese forces north of latitude 38 N (the 38th parallel) to surrender to the Soviets and for those south of that line to - surrender to the Americans. Stalin raised no objection and Soviet forces did not attempt to move further south although they had ample opportunity to do so. It was not until a month later that American troops landed in southern Korea, on September 8, and received the Japanese surrender in Seoul next day. There were then two zones – northern and southern – as the Soviets had taken steps to secure the 38th parallel. Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from History of the Division of Korea.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ²¹⁶ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. VI, Triumph and Tragedy, op. cit., pp. 506 & 509.
- ²¹⁷ ibid., p. 509.
- ²¹⁸ Daniels, Robert V. A Documentary History of Communism, Volume 2, Communism and the World, [Hanover: University Press of New England, 1984] pp. 135–137, 295–297.
- ²¹⁹ Loth, Wilfred, The Division of the World, 1945–1955 [London: Routledge, 1988] p. 106.
- ²²⁰ Kuniholm, Bruce Robellet, The Origins of the Cold War in the Near East: Great Power Conflict and Diplomacy in Iran, Turkey and Greece, [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1980] pp. 311–312.
- ²²¹ Paterson, Thomas G. Soviet-American Confrontation: Postwar Reconstruction and the Origins of the Cold War [Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1973] pp. 50–52.
- ²²² ibid.
- ²²³ It is impossible to arrive at an accurate figure because of the very approximate nature of some statistics, and the timing of boundary and political changes, but the author's best calculation from UN population statistics is 34 per cent.
- ²²⁴ Goralski, Robert, World War II Almanac 1931–1945 [London: Hamish Hamilton, 1981] pp. 425, 428, citing R. Ernest Dupuy, World War II: A Compact History.
- ²²⁵ Churchill, The Second World War, Vol. III, The Grand Alliance, op. cit., p. 25
- ²²⁶ ibid., p. 27.
- ²²⁷ ibid., p. 36.
- ²²⁸ ibid., pp. 492–493, quoting his own memo to the Lord Privy Seal dated December 20, 1941.
- ²²⁹ ibid., p. 286, citing an Oxford English Dictionary definition.
- ²³⁰ Federation of American Scientists, About FAS, source: <http://www.fas.org/about.htm> as at August 21, 2000.
- ²³¹ Stone, Jeremy J., President, Federation of American Scientists, 1970–2000, currently President, Catalytic Diplomacy, personal correspondence, August, 2000.
- ²³² United States Atomic Energy Commission, In the Matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer: Transcript of Hearing before Personal Security Board [Cambridge, Massachusetts: The MIT Press, 1971] p. 6. Extract from letter to Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer from K.D. Nichols, General Manager, US Atomic Energy Commission, dated December 23, 1953.
- ²³³ Stone, op. cit., The FBI's surveillance of FAS became known to the Federation when it applied to the FBI under the Freedom of Information Act many years later
- ²³⁴ Ranelagh, op. cit., p. 44.
- ²³⁵ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "History of Poland; World War II".
- ²³⁶ ibid. The Polish search for some 15,000 missing men had previously met with a Soviet profession of complete ignorance as to their fate. Stalin accused the Sikorski government – which had asked the International Red Cross to investigate – of complicity in Nazi propaganda and severed diplomatic relations with the government in exile. Only in 1992 did post-Communist Moscow publicly acknowledge its guilt and furnish to Warsaw documents, which also indicated the locations of other mass executions.
- ²³⁷ Eden, Anthony, Full Circle [London: Cassell, 1960] p. 225.
- ²³⁸ Tessler, op. cit., p. 337.
- ²³⁹ Eden, op. cit., pp. 230, 232.
- ²⁴⁰ Tessler, loc. cit.
- ²⁴¹ ibid., p. 338. Quotation attributed to Colonel Nasser in Robert St. John, The Boss: The Story of Gamal Abdel Nasser [New York: McGraw-Hill, 1960], p. 36.
- ²⁴² ibid., citing Mahmoud Riad, The Struggle for Peace in the Middle East [London: Quartet Books, 1981] p. 7.
- ²⁴³ ibid., p. 339.
- ²⁴⁴ Blum, op. cit., p. 65.
- ²⁴⁵ Eden, op. cit., pp. 247–249.
- ²⁴⁶ ibid., p. 256.
- ²⁴⁷ Blum, op. cit., pp. 65–66.
- ²⁴⁸ ibid., p. 66.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ²⁴⁹ Tessler, op. cit., p. 334, citing Fred J. Khouri, The Arab-Israeli Dilemma [Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1985] p. 207.
- ²⁵⁰ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000; from "Intelligence in the former Soviet Union" and "KGB".
- ²⁵¹ Boyle, Francis, "Obituary for Igor P. Blinschchenko, LLD" [Ohio: MSANNEWS, 2000] source: e-mail news service, msanews@msanews.mynet.net on August 17, 2000. Boyle related an exchange during a lecture in the Soviet Union in August 1989].
- ²⁵² Tessler, op. cit., p. 343.
- ²⁵³ ibid., pp. 341–342.
- ²⁵⁴ Lloyd, Selwyn Suez, 1956 [London: Coronet/ Hodder & Stoughton, 1978] p. 24.
- ²⁵⁵ Pratt, loc. cit., citing C.I.D./310th meeting, 17 February 1938. Cab.2/7; Chiefs of Staff, 'Defence of Egypt.' C.O.S. 686, 14 February 1938, enclosure in C.P. 41(38). Cab 24/275.
- ²⁵⁶ Lloyd, op. cit., p. 25, quoting Churchill's remarks from Hansard for July 28, 1954.
- ²⁵⁷ ibid., p. 35.
- ²⁵⁸ ibid., p. 42.
- ²⁵⁹ Tessler, op. cit., p. 335.
- ²⁶⁰ ibid., p. 345.
- ²⁶¹ ibid., p. 347, citing an article in Ha'aretz on April 17, 1964; quoted in Yair Evron, The Middle East: Nations, Superpowers and Wars [New York: Praeger, 1973] p. 45; and noting also Terence Robertson, Crisis: The Inside Story of the Suez Conspiracy [New York: Athenaeum, 1965] and Calvocoressi, pp. 61–62.
- ²⁶² ibid., p. 340, 342.
- ²⁶³ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "The Bandung Conference".
- ²⁶⁴ Lloyd, op. cit., pp. 35 & 26.
- ²⁶⁵ Lloyd, op. cit., p. 27.
- ²⁶⁶ ibid.
- ²⁶⁷ Tessler, op. cit., p. 348.
- ²⁶⁸ The expression was gaining currency at that time as a result of French commentators using the term 'tiers monde' to refer to the economically 'developing countries' of Asia, Africa, and Latin America in order to distinguish them from the Capitalist and Communist blocs. Some commentators also used it to distinguish between the 'Old World' of Europe, the 'New World' of the United States and other white settler dominated advanced economies, and 'the rest.'
- ²⁶⁹ Blum, op. cit., p. 85, citing US Mutual Security Act of 1955, Sections 142 (a) (4) and 413.
- ²⁷⁰ During the late 1950s, after the US Mutual Security Act 1955 was in place, economic aid averaged about $1.6 billion per year, compared with about $2.1 billion in military aid to "friendly regimes." Source: Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Decolonization and Development".
- ²⁷¹ Blum, op. cit., p. 85, citing: Declassified Documents Reference System: 1992 volume: document no. 2326, 10 May 1955; no. 2663, 21 September 1955; no. 2973, 9 January 1956; no. 2974, 16 January 1956. With the exception of no. 2663, all the documents bear the heading of the Operations Coordinating Board, a subcommittee of the NSC which coordinated covert activities.
- ²⁷² Blum, op. cit., p. 86, citing ibid., 1993 volume: document no. 2953, 14 December 1955, p. 4.
- ²⁷³ Karnow, Stanley, Vietnam: A History. [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1984] p. 204.
- ²⁷⁴ Eden, op. cit., p. 307.
- ²⁷⁵ The countries admitted in the previous 10 years were: Afghanistan, Iceland, Sweden, Thailand, Pakistan, Yemen, Myanmar, Israel and Indonesia. Those admitted in 1955 were: Albania, Austria, Bulgaria, Cambodia, Finland, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Jordan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Libya, Nepal, Portugal, Romania, Spain and Sri Lanka.
- ²⁷⁶ Eden, op. cit., pp. 419–420.
- ²⁷⁷ Lloyd, op. cit., p. 28.
- ²⁷⁸ ibid., p. 29.
- ²⁷⁹ Tessler, op. cit., p. 347.
- ²⁸⁰ Sachar, op. cit., p. 484.
- ²⁸¹ Eden, op. cit., pp. 342–343.
- ²⁸² O'Connor, Richard The Oil Barons [Boston: Little Brown, 1972] p. 340.
- ²⁸³ Aburish, Said K. The House of Saud [London: Bloomsbury, 1994] p. 155.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ²⁸⁴ ibid., op. cit., p. 161.
- ²⁸⁵ Shadid, Mohammed K. Contrib. The Muslim Brotherhood Movement in the West Bank and Gaza in Third World Quarterly, Vol. 10, No. 2, April 1988.
- ²⁸⁶ Eden, op. cit., pp. 342–343.
- ²⁸⁷ ibid.
- ²⁸⁸ Lebanon has a diverse population of Christians, Muslims and people of other religions. The constitution which took effect in 1943 was quite deliberately set up, under French influence, with a National Covenant which ensured that, at that time, the president was a Christian and the prime minister a Muslim. That relationship was based on the fact that the 1932 census had shown Lebanon's population to be 55 per cent Christian – the highest percentage of Christians in any Middle Eastern country – but the present population is estimated to be 75 per cent Muslim and 25 per cent Christian. The country is a member of the Islamic Conference.
- ²⁸⁹ Eden, op. cit., p. 343.
- ²⁹⁰ Lloyd, loc. cit.
- ²⁹¹ ibid., p. 9.
- ²⁹² ibid., p. 10.
- ²⁹³ ibid., p. 12.
- ²⁹⁴ ibid., p. 24.
- ²⁹⁵ ibid., pp. 31,35, Lloyd wrote: "Although it was we who had advised Azhari to declare for independence, not surprisingly we got no credit for this from Radio Cairo. Publicly Nasser tried to pretend that it had happened as a result of an Egyptian initiative. Privately he described it as a British plot." (p. 31) Then: "In the Sudan, the plan of letting Sudanese nationalism and Egyptian imperialism meet head-on had been successful. I had thought the result would be an independent and friendly Sudan. This, in fact, happened." (p. 35) Those statements certainly suggest a plot; a variation on the old 'divide-and-rule' theme; and no consideration of the consequences of that attitude for the two countries involved a few years ahead.
- ²⁹⁶ ibid., p. 19.
- ²⁹⁷ ibid., p. 19.
- ²⁹⁸ ibid., pp. 34–35. The order was discovered after the Sinai-Suez War by Israeli forces in an Egyptian command post which had been overrun.
- ²⁹⁹ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Khrushchev".
- ³⁰⁰ Eden, op. cit., p. 347.
- ³⁰¹ ibid., p. 350.
- ³⁰² ibid., pp. 350–353.
- ³⁰³ Lloyd, op. cit., 59–61.
- ³⁰⁴ ibid., pp. 68, 69.
- ³⁰⁵ Eden, op. cit., pp. 356–357.
- ³⁰⁶ ibid., p. 358.
- ³⁰⁷ ibid., pp. 358–359.
- ³⁰⁸ ibid., p. 363.
- ³⁰⁹ Sachar, op. cit., p. 485.
- ³¹⁰ Lloyd, op. cit., p. 67.
- ³¹¹ ibid., p. 67–69.
- ³¹² Sachar, op. cit., p. 489.
- ³¹³ Blum, op. cit., p. 86, citing Wilbur Crane Eveland, Ropes of Sand: America's Failure in the Middle East [New York: W.W. Norton, 1980] pp. 122, 182.
- ³¹⁴ ibid., citing Eveland, Ropes of Sand, op. cit., pp. 122, 182.
- ³¹⁵ Blum, loc. cit., citing Patrick Searle, The Struggle for Syria: A Study of Post-War Arab Politics, 1945–1958 [London, 1965] pp. 283–306; Eveland, op. cit., pp. 135, 169–173.
- ³¹⁶ See also Lloyd, op. cit., p. 56. Lloyd outlines a discussion with Prime Minister Nuri es-Said and the Crown Prince in Baghdad on March 10, during which Nuri told him to make sure that Turkey did not invade Syria and that "the Israelis should not attempt to improve their position" while Iraq organized "a movement against it by elements in Syria more friendly to Iraq and the West."
- ³¹⁷ ibid., p. 54.
- ³¹⁸ ibid., p. 71.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³¹⁹ ibid., p. 70, quoting Robert Murphy, US Deputy Undersecretary of State, and citing Muhammad Heikal, Nasser: The Cairo Documents (known as the 'Heikal Papers') [New English Library, 1972].
- ³²⁰ ibid., p. 73.
- ³²¹ Sachar, op. cit., p. 488.
- ³²² Lloyd, op. cit., pp. 141–142. Lloyd quoted Wedgwood Benn's argument, but sought to show that it was ill-founded.
- ³²³ Eden, op. cit., pp. 427–428. Telegram, Eden to Eisenhower, July 27, 1956.
- ³²⁴ ibid.
- ³²⁵ ibid., p. 436.
- ³²⁶ Sachar, op. cit., p. 489.
- ³²⁷ Eden, op. cit., p. 444.
- ³²⁸ Lloyd, op. cit., p. 112, quoting from Menzies' broadcast of August 13, 1956.
- ³²⁹ ibid., quoting from his own broadcast on August 14, 1956.
- ³³⁰ On July 30, 1941, when Eden advised the Commons of "the signature of the Soviet-Polish Agreement of today" he chose his words very carefully and read a note addressed to the Polish government which referred to the Anglo-Polish mutual assistance agreement of August 25, 1939, and said the British government had entered into an undertaking towards the Soviet Union "which affects the relations between that country and Poland." The note also said, without any reference to Germany, that the British government "do not recognize any territorial changes which have been effected in Poland since August 1939." He then referred specifically to the first paragraph of the Soviet-Polish Agreement concerning territorial changes under the Soviet-German treaties as "having lost their validity." The implication was that while Britain expected the postwar reinstatement of Poland with its prewar boundaries, Russia was agreeing only that the treaty boundaries were not valid. Russia was not agreeing that the prewar boundaries were valid. Neither was Britain agreeing to guarantee those boundaries. Eden was at pains to make that clear. His concluding remark was: "The exchange of Notes which I have just read to the House does not involve any guarantee of frontiers by His Majesty's Government." [Emphasis added].
- ³³¹ The committee consisted of representatives of Australia*, Ethiopia, Iran, Sweden and the United States*. The other countries which agreed to the proposal were Denmark*, France*, Federal German Republic, Iran, Italy*, Japan, the Netherlands*, New Zealand*, Norway, Pakistan, Portugal*, Spain* and Turkey. Of the four Asian countries, one, Iran, was an oil producing member of the Baghdad Pact; one, Pakistan, was a non-oil-producing member of the Baghdad Pact whose oil did not come through the canal; a third, Japan, was a major trading nation and it was tied by the peace treaty to US foreign policy but its oil did not come through the canal; and the fourth, Turkey, drew its oil from the eastern Mediterranean and not through the canal, but it was also another member of the Baghdad Pact. Ethiopia was the token aid-dependent East African country, but its oil did not come through the canal. Australia and New Zealand were compliant members of both the Commonwealth and SEATO, but their oil did not come through the canal and their shipping distance increase was only 15 per cent for Australia and 12 per cent for New Zealand, with no canal fees to pay. This left the 10 European powers and the United States as the ones significantly affected by a closure of the canal. The additional five countries which attended the conference but declined to support the move against Egypt were: Spain, India, Indonesia, Sri Lanka and the Soviet Union*. [An asterisk (*) indicates that the country was, at the time of the Suez Crisis, a colonial power either by governing annexed territories or by virtue of a UN Trusteeship].
- ³³² Blum, op. cit., pp. 86–87, citing, for the 1956 plot and background: Eveland, op. cit., chapters 11–20; New York Times, 10 April 1956; 17 October 1956.
- ³³³ Lloyd, op. cit., p. 124, quoting from message Eisenhower to Eden, September 2, 1956, received by Eden on September 3. Eden, in Full Circle, op. cit., made reference to it and set out his reply but did reproduce Eisenhower's message in full. Eisenhower did so as Appendix C in his memoirs.
- ³³⁴ Wilmot, Chester The Struggle for Europe [London: Collins, 1967], p. 635.
- ³³⁵ Sachar, op. cit., p. 487.
- ³³⁶ Lloyd, op. cit., p. 129, citing Robert Menzies, Afternoon Light: Some Memories of Men and Events [Australia: Cassell, 1967].
- ³³⁷ ibid., pp. 129–130.
- ³³⁸ Eden, op. cit., pp. 465–467.
- ³³⁹ ibid., p. 465.
- ³⁴⁰ ibid., pp. 474–476.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³⁴¹ ibid., pp. 469–471, with quotations from a letter, Menzies to Eden, written after Menzies returned to Australia, which is reproduced on pp. 470–473, and in which Menzies purports to quote verbatim from a conversation which he had with Nasser.
- ³⁴² ibid., p. 445.
- ³⁴³ ibid., pp. 498–499.
- ³⁴⁴ ibid., pp. 498–499.
- ³⁴⁵ ibid., pp. 500–501.
- ³⁴⁶ Sachar, op. cit., p. 490.
- ³⁴⁷ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from “History of Egypt, the King and Ideology.”
- ³⁴⁸ The date for the first confirmed Christian presence is given as the second quarter of the second century (c.125–150 CE) by Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from “History of Egypt, Society, Religion and Culture” but the Oxford Concise Dictionary of the Christian Church notes, p. 14, that the foundation of the church in Alexandria is traditionally ascribed to the Apostle Mark. On that basis the earlier date was used in chapter I, (Growing pains). However Stephen Neill, A History of Christian Missions, [Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1964] p. 25, also makes reference to that tradition, qualifying it by noting: “but for this there is no historical evidence.”
- ³⁴⁹ In due course the church at Rome included Wisdom in its canon of Biblical books and it continued to freely refer to Philo’s works, and that was the situation at the time of the Reformation. Subsequently the Roman Catholic Church has retained the Book of Wisdom in its Biblical Canon, but the Reformed Churches have deleted it, although it is included in some Reformed editions of the Apocrypha, such as the Oxford Annotated Apocrypha [New York: Oxford, 1973] published for the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America.
- ³⁵⁰ These paragraphs include material from Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from “Egypt, History of the Advance of Christianity.”
- ³⁵¹ Eden, op. cit., pp. 510–511.
- ³⁵² ibid., pp. 512–513.
- ³⁵³ Sachar, op. cit., p. 491.
- ³⁵⁴ Blum, op. cit., p. 87.
- ³⁵⁵ ibid.
- ³⁵⁶ Lloyd, op. cit., p. 177.
- ³⁵⁷ ibid., p. 188.
- ³⁵⁸ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from “Hungary, History of the Revolution of 1956”.
- ³⁵⁹ Lloyd, op. cit., pp. 188–190.
- ³⁶⁰ ibid., p. 188. The group briefed was: Sir Anthony Eden, Prime Minister; Mr. R.A. Butler, Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons; Mr. Harold Macmillan, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Mr. Antony Head, Minister for Defence; and Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, Foreign Secretary.
- ³⁶¹ ibid., pp. 188–190.
- ³⁶² Sachar, op. cit., p. 494.
- ³⁶³ Blum, op. cit., p. 87.
- ³⁶⁴ Sachar, op. cit., p. 497.
- ³⁶⁵ Eden, op. cit., pp. 526–527.
- ³⁶⁶ ibid., p. 525.
- ³⁶⁷ ibid., pp. 525–526.
- ³⁶⁸ ibid., p. 526.
- ³⁶⁹ Lloyd, op. cit., pp. 201–202, quoting Richard Nixon and citing Finer, Dulles over Suez, p. 397. Eden quoted the same speech in Full Circle, op. cit., p. 541.
- ³⁷⁰ ibid., p. 206.
- ³⁷¹ Eden, op. cit., pp. 552–561, for discussion on some exchanges between Eden and Eisenhower.
- ³⁷² Lloyd, op. cit., p. 209, says that Eisenhower’s call to Eden was at 1.43 pm, after the decision for a cease fire had been taken, but he refers to a claim by Pineau that earlier calls had been made.
- ³⁷³ ibid., pp. 210–211.
- ³⁷⁴ Eden, op. cit., p. 557. Eden gives the figures as $57 million in September, $84 million in October and $279 million in part November, total $420 million for the period. The $279 million represented 15 percent of the total, so that assuming stability in other movements, those figures, together, represent about 23 percent of Britain's total reserves. In essence it was a repeat of the reserves crisis at the beginning of the Second World War. Lloyd, op. cit., p. 222 quotes Macmillan as telling the Commons on November 12 that the losses from reserves had been $ 328 million for the three months to the end of October, before the run on Sterling was anywhere near its peak.

³⁷⁵ Eden, op. cit., p. 561.

³⁷⁶ ibid., pp. 561, 563, 567.

³⁷⁷ ibid., p. 557.

³⁷⁸ ibid., pp. 577, 578.

³⁷⁹ Lloyd, op. cit., p. 42.

³⁸⁰ Basic Facts About the United Nations [New York: UN Dept. of Public Information, 1995] p. 236.

³⁸¹ Eden, op. cit., p. 584.

Chapter 30: Embargo! Not for want of warnings. New order or disorder?

1 Eden, Anthony, Full Circle, [London: Cassell, 1960] p. 575.

2 Kruger, H. contributing "The Life and Activities of the World Council of Churches" chapter 2, in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517-1968, Vol II, The Ecumenical Advance, 1948-1968, Ed. Harold E. Fey. [London: SPCK for the WCC, 1993] pp. 33-34.

3 Visser 't Hooft, W.A. (Ed.), The Evanston Report: The Second Assembly of the World Council of Churches 1954 [London: SCM Press, 1955] pp. 74-79.

4 Statement on the Hope of Israel, submitted by 24 delegates to the Second Assembly of the World Council of Churches following the decision to delete all reference to Israel from the Assembly's formal statement: "In view of the decision of the Assembly on Friday to omit any reference to the Hope of Israel in its Statement on the Main Theme, we feel it our duty of offer an explanation of our convictions in the hope that it will help towards closer understanding with those from whom we differed.

Our concern in this issue is wholly biblical and is not to be confused with any political attitude towards the State of Israel.

We believe that Jesus Christ is the Saviour of all mankind. In Him there is neither Jew nor Greek, but we also believe that God elected Israel for the carrying out of His saving purpose. Jesus Christ as Man was a Jew. The Church of Jesus Christ is built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, all of whom were Jews, so that to be a member of the hope in Jesus Christ. Jesus, the Messiah of Israel, was accepted by Gentiles but rejected by His own people. Nevertheless God is so gracious and mighty that He even makes the crucifixion of His Son to be the salvation of the Gentiles (Rom. 11:11). Whether we are scandalized or not, that means that we are grafted into the old tree of Israel (Rom. 11:24), so that the people of the New Covenant cannot be separated from the people of the Old Covenant.

The New Testament, however, speaks also of the "fullness" of Israel, when God will manifest His glory by bringing back His "eldest son" into the one fold of His grace (Rom. 11:12-36; Matt. 23:29) This belief is an indispensable element of our one united hope for Jew and Gentile in Jesus Christ. Our hope in Christ's coming victory includes our hope for Israel in Christ, in His victory over the blindness of His own people. To expect Jesus Christ means to hope for the conversion of the Jewish people, and to love Him means to love the people of God's promise.

In view of the grievous guilt of Christian people towards the Jews throughout the history of the Church, we are certain that: the Church cannot rest until the title of Christ to the Kingdom is recognized by His own people according to the flesh." [Findings of the Pre-Evanston Conference of the American Committee on the Christian Approach to the Jews, at Lake Geneva, 8-11 August 1954.]

"We cannot be one in Christ nor can we truly believe and witness to the promise of God if we do not recognize that it is still valid for the people of the promise made to Abraham. Therefore we invite all men to join with us in praising and magnifying that God who "concluded them all in unbelief that He might have mercy upon all" (Rom. 11:32)."

⁵ Quoted in the statement of the 24 from the findings of the Pre-Evanston Conference of the American Committee on the Christian Approach to the Jews, at Lake Geneva, 8-11 August 1954.

⁶ Hanson, Eric O. The Catholic Church in World Politics [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1990] p. 45.

⁷ Catholic Almanac 1975, p. 183.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁸ Stourton, Edward, Absolute Truth: The Catholic Church in the World Today [London: Penguin/Viking, 1998] See chapter 3, "Quietly and with power," for discussion on the politicking over the Declaration on Religious Liberty.
- ⁹ ibid., pp. 12–13.
- ¹⁰ Seymour, Ian, OPEC: Instrument of Change [London: Macmillan, 1980] pp. 19–21.
- ¹¹ ibid., pp. 23–34.
- ¹² ibid., p. 34, citing Petroleum Week, May 6, 1960.
- ¹³ China's "Great Leap Forward" plan was introduced with a great fanfare, but it was badly mismanaged and led to large scale industrial and infrastructure failures and, over three years, worsening famine.
- ¹⁴ Sources for these notes on the further progress of the Cold War include Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Cold War History" and other references.
- ¹⁵ Eden, op. cit., p. 423. Eden refers to "exceptional barbarity" in the widespread and degrading massacre of King Faisal, his family, ministers and friends, saying: "The naked bodies of the former Regent and of Nuri es-Said were dragged through the streets of Baghdad amid scenes of unmentionable beastliness. A British officer was shot within the Embassy. Three Americans were torn to pieces by the mob, with faint protest by their government."
- ¹⁶ Blum, William Killing Hope [Monroe, Maine: Common Courage Press, 1995] p. 87, cites Declassified Documents Reference System, 1985 volume, document no. 283, March 1957, for the quotation: "The British are believed to favor active stimulation of a change in the present regime in Syria, in an effort to assure a pro-Western orientation on the part of future Syrian governments. ... The United States shares the concern of the British Government over the situation in Syria." And in Full Circle, op. cit., Eden does not conceal his feelings that a change of government would be an advantage to Britain.
- ¹⁷ Blum, op. cit., pp. 86–87.
- ¹⁸ Seymour, op. cit., p. 35–36, citing Petroleum Week, December 9, 1960.
- ¹⁹ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Bay of Pigs Invasion."
- ²⁰ Up to that date Britain exercised protectorate suzerainty over each of Kuwait (from 1899), Bahrain (1835), Qatar (1869 treaty/1916 protectorate), and the group of emirates and sheikhdoms which later constituted the United Arab Emirates (1820). The others did not gain their independence for another ten years, in 1971.
- ²¹ The foundation of the autonomous sheikhdom of Kuwait dated from 1756, when the settlers decided to appoint a sheikh from the Sabah family. During the 19th century Kuwait developed as a thriving, independent trading community which made it liable to attempts at annexation. Toward the end of the century one ruler, 'Abd Allah II (reigned 1866–92), began moving Kuwait closer to the Ottoman Empire for protection, although he did not formally place his ill-defined territory under Ottoman rule. However a subsequent ruler, Mubarak, not favouring subjugation to either the Ottoman Empire or a neighbouring Arab state, cultivated a close relationship with Britain which led to a treaty in 1899 under which it was granted that Britain controlled Kuwait's foreign affairs and defence. On the outbreak of World War I, its status was changed to that of a British protectorate. Subsequently, at the Conference of Al-Uqayr in 1922, Britain negotiated the Kuwait-Saudi border, with substantial territorial loss to Kuwait. A separate memorandum the next year was drawn up to define the border with Iraq based on an unratified 1913 convention. A so-called 'Neutral Territory' was designated at the junction of the Saudi Arabian, Iraqi and Kuwaiti borders in which control, rights and potential resource sharing arrangements were ill-defined. Subsequently Iraq placed its first formal claim to the territory of Kuwait in 1938 – the year that oil was discovered in the sheikhdom. It was generally considered that Iraq's claim, based on overall responsibility for the area by the Ottoman Empire, was very vague and historically of doubtful validity. However after the rejection of its major claim, Iraq continued to lay claim to the strategic islands of Bubiyan and Al-Warbah which dominated access to its waterways and oil facilities. In 1963 the regime then ruling Iraq formally recognized both Kuwait's independence and, subsequently, its borders, but it continued to press for access to the critical islands. [Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "History of Kuwait"].
- ²² Visser 't Hooft, W.A. (Ed) The New Delhi Report: The Third Assembly of the World Council of Churches 1961 [London: SCM, 1962] pp. 262–291.
- ²³ Visser 't Hooft, W.A. Contrib. "The Genesis of the World Council of Churches" in A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517–1968, Vol. I, 1517–1948 [London: SPCK for the WCC, 1993] pp. 715–716; Newbigin, Leslie Contrib. "Mission to Six Continents" in ibid., Vol. II, 1948–1968; Edwards, David L. Contrib. "Signs of Radicalism in the Ecumenical Movement" in ibid., Vol. II, 1948–1968, p. 385.
- ²⁴ Visser 't Hooft, W.A. (Ed) The New Delhi Report, op. cit., pp. 152–159, Appendix II, p. 426.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ²⁵ ibid., p. 148.
- ²⁶ Khrushchev, Nikita, Khrushchev Remembers (trans. Strobe Talbot, commentary Edward Crankshaw) [Aylesbury, Bucks: Sphere, 1971] pp. 455–462. Khrushchev discussed Cuba in some detail. He wrote: “The Americans had surrounded our country with military bases and threatened us with nuclear weapons, and now they would learn just what it feels like to have enemy missiles pointing at you; we’d been doing nothing more than giving them a little of their own medicine. And it was high time America learned what it feels like to have her own land and her own people threatened. We Russians have suffered three wars over the last half century: World War I, the Civil War, and World War II. America has never had to fight a war on her own soil, at least not in the last fifty years. She’s sent troops abroad to fight in two World Wars – and made a fortune as a result.” He also noted that the Soviet Union had been installing missiles on Cuba for some time before the United States became aware of it; that they had installed enough missiles “to destroy New York, Chicago, and the other huge industrial cities, not to mention a little village like Washington;” and that he regarded the Cuban adventure as “a great victory ... [because] ...we had been able to extract from Kennedy a promise that neither America nor any of her allies would invade Cuba. ... If Cuba had not undergone this ordeal, it’s very likely the Americans would have organized an invasion to liquidate Cuba’s Socialist way of life.”
- ²⁷ Hanson, op. cit., pp. 10–11, citing Flamini, Pope, Premier, President, pp. 66–67.
- ²⁸ All extracts from the opening address of Pope John XXIII at Vatican II are from the New Advent Internet service, <http://www.rc.net/rcchurch/vatican2/j23open.txt>.
- ²⁹ Stourton, op. cit., p. 37.
- ³⁰ ibid.
- ³¹ ibid., p. 38.
- ³² ibid., p. 39.
- ³³ ibid., pp. 39–40.
- ³⁴ Jack, Homer A. WCRP: A History of the World Conference on Religion and Peace [New York: WCRP, 1993] pp. 31–35.
- ³⁵ Robinson, John A.T. Honest to God [London: SCM, 1963] p. 7.
- ³⁶ Gossett, Thomas F. Race: The History of an Idea in America [New York: Schocken, 1965] pp. 458–459.
- ³⁷ ibid., pp. 454–455.
- ³⁸ Stourton, op. cit., p. 33.
- ³⁹ Sacrosanctum Concilium (The Constitution of the Sacred Liturgy) Source: New Advent Internet Service, <http://www.rc.net/rcchurch/vatican2/liturgy.asc>.
- ⁴⁰ Tessler, Mark A History of the Israeli–Palestinian Conflict [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994], p. 373.
- ⁴¹ Lumen Gentium (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church) Source: New Advent Internet Service, <http://www.rc.net/rcchurch/vatican2/lumen.gen>. Internal references have been deleted.
- ⁴² All extracts from Nostra Aetate are from: New Advent Internet Service, <http://www.rc.net/rcchurch/poppes/paul6/p6closin.txt> Internal references have been deleted.
- ⁴³ Pope Paul VI, Closing address and Liturgy, Fourth Session of the Second Vatican Council, December 8, 1965. Source: New Advent Internet Service, <http://www.rc.net/rcchurch/vatican2/lumen.gen>. Internal references have been deleted.
- ⁴⁴ Tessler, op. cit., p. 387.
- ⁴⁵ ibid., p. 392, citing Richard B. Parker, The Politics of Miscalculation in the Middle East [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993] p. 74.
- ⁴⁶ ibid., pp. 378–396.
- ⁴⁷ Gribetz, Judah, E. Greenstein & R. Stein The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster/Touchstone, 1994] p. 586.
- ⁴⁸ Tessler, op. cit., p. 393.
- ⁴⁹ Laqueur, Walter & Barry Rubin [Eds.] The Israel-Arab Reader: A Documentary History of the Middle East Conflict [New York: Viking Penguin/Pelican, 1984]. Nasser’s speech to the Egyptian National Assembly is reproduced in full on pages 185–189.
- ⁵⁰ Tessler, op. cit., p. 393.
- ⁵¹ ibid., pp. 395–396, citing Yoman Peri, Between Battles and Ballots: Israeli Military in Politics [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983] pp. 244 ff., and referring also to Nadaf Safran, From War to War: The Arab-Israeli Confrontation, 1948–1967 [New York: Pegasus, 1969] p. 315.
- ⁵² Gribetz, et. al., loc. cit.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ⁵³ ibid., p. 587.
- ⁵⁴ Tessler, op. cit., p. 397, citing Peri, op. cit., p. 250.
- ⁵⁵ ibid., p. 331, and personal discussions in Israel in 1975.
- ⁵⁶ Gribetz, et. al., op. cit., p. 594.
- ⁵⁷ El-Khawas, Mohamed & Samir Aded-Rabbo, American Aid to Israel: Nature and Impact [Brattleboro, Vermont: Amana Books, 1984] pp. 34–35.
- ⁵⁸ Brockway, Allan & Paul van Buren, Rolf Rendtorff, Simon Schoon (Commentaries) The Theology of the Churches and the Jewish People: Statements by the World Council of Churches and its member churches [Geneva: WCC, 1988] The Commission Report is set out in full on pp. 13–28.
- ⁵⁹ ibid., p. 19.
- ⁶⁰ ibid., pp. 27–28.
- ⁶¹ Meyer, Michael A. Response to Modernity: A History of the Reform Movement in Judaism [Detroit: Wayne State University, 1995], pp. 348, 364.
- ⁶² ibid., p. 368.
- ⁶³ ibid., pp. 366–367.
- ⁶⁴ Goodall, Norman (Ed.) The Uppsala Report 1968: Official Report of the Fourth Assembly of the World Council of Churches [Geneva: WCC, 1968] pp. 187–188.
- ⁶⁵ ibid., p. 189.
- ⁶⁶ The Avalon Project, 1996. William C. Fray and Lisa A. Spar, Co-Directors. The Palestine National Charter. Source: the web site of The Avalon Project at the Yale Law School.
- ⁶⁷ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from “Suppression of Reform in Czechoslovakia.”
- ⁶⁸ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from “Liberation Theology” and “Helder Pessoa Camara.”
- ⁶⁹ Catholic Almanac 1997, p. 317. “On Certain Aspects of the Theology of Liberation” was issued on September 3, 1984. “On Christian Freedom and Liberation” was issued on April 5, 1986.
- ⁷⁰ Gribetz, et. al., op. cit., p. 593.
- ⁷¹ Tessler, op. cit., pp. 446–447, citing Abba Eban, An Autobiography [New York: Random House, 1977] p. 463.
- ⁷² ibid., p. 453.
- ⁷³ ibid., p. 461., citing Henry Kissinger, The White House Years, [Boston: Little, Brown, 1979] pp. 595–596.
- ⁷⁴ ibid., p. 448, citing David A. Korn, Stalemate: The War of Attrition and Great Power Diplomacy in the Middle East, 1967–1970 [Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1992] p. 161; and William B. Quandt, Decade of Decisions: American Policy toward the Arab-Israeli Conflict, [Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977] p. 91.
- ⁷⁵ ibid., citing Yitzhak Rabin, The Rabin Memoirs [Boston: Little, Brown, 1979] p. 162.
- ⁷⁶ ibid.
- ⁷⁷ ibid., p. 446.
- ⁷⁸ ibid., p. 449.
- ⁷⁹ United States Cabinet Task Force on Oil Import Control, The Oil Import Question: A Report on the Relationship of Oil Imports to the National Security [US Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C., February 1970].
- ⁸⁰ ibid., clause 209.
- ⁸¹ ibid., clause 210.
- ⁸² ibid., clause 211.
- ⁸³ ibid., clause 212.
- ⁸⁴ ibid., clause 213, a, b, c.
- ⁸⁵ ibid., clause 214.
- ⁸⁶ ibid., clause 215.
- ⁸⁷ ibid., clause 215 a.
- ⁸⁸ ibid., clause 215 b.
- ⁸⁹ ibid., clause 219.
- ⁹⁰ ibid., clause 220, 221, 222.
- ⁹¹ ibid., clause 224 c.
- ⁹² ibid., clause 226.
- ⁹³ The Separate Report, printed together with the main report, The Oil Import Question was signed by Walter J. Hickel, Secretary of the Interior; Maurice H. Stans, Secretary of Commerce, and John N. Nassikas, Chairman, Federal Power Commission

⁹⁴ The Relationship between United States Petroleum Production and Consumption, ME Petroleum Production and US Military Aid to Israel

Years:	1969	1970	1971	1972	1973	1974	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980
1. USA Crude Production	3.363	3.517	3.453	3.455	3.360	3.210
2. USA Crude Production					3.995	3.818	3.647	3.588	3.575	3.763
3. USA Total Cons	5.159	5.371	5.534	5.990	6.317	6.069	5.957	6.384
4. ME Crude Production	4.290	4.740	5.602	6.233	7.334	7.528
5. ME Crude Production					7.538	7.729	6.165	7.862	7.970	7.487
6. US Military Aid: Israel	0.085	0.03	0.545	0.3	0.308	2.483	0.3	1.7	1	1	4	1

Notes: (Rows 1 to 5: Trillion barrels)

Row 1, Data for years 1969–1974: Petroleum Economist, April 1975, p. 160. Figures were constantly being revised.

Row 2, Revised data for years 1973–1974 and, Petroleum Economist, March 1979, p. 131.

Row 3, Total US Consumption; Data for years 1969–1974, Petroleum Economist, June 1975, p. 240. Data for years 1975–1976, Petroleum Economist, October 1977, p. 419.

Data for the Middle East are the totals for Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Iran, Oman, Iraq, Qatar & Abu Dhabi.

Row 4, Data for years 1969–1974; Petroleum Economist, April 1975, p. 160.

Row 5, Revised data for years 1973–1974, Petroleum Economist, March 1979, p. 131

Row 6, Source: El-Khawass, & Samir, loc. cit., Table 2. Total of grants and loans, in billions of dollars at 1983 dollar equivalent.

⁹⁵ Blum, op. cit., pp. 206–215.

⁹⁶ ibid., p. 215, citing Interim Report: Alleged Assassination Plots Involving Foreign Leaders, The Select Committee to Study Government Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities (US Senate) 20 November 1975, p. 227.

⁹⁷ Tessler, op. cit., pp. 460–462.

⁹⁸ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from “End of the Vietnam War.” The quantity of bombs per person and by unit area are computed on the basis of bombing being directed at one half of the land area and population of Vietnam as at the end of the war. Totals were: land area, 129,000 square kilometres; population, 50 million.

⁹⁹ SBS World Guide 1998 [South Yarra, Victoria: HGB, 1998] p. 150.

¹⁰⁰ Tessler, op. cit., pp. 472–474.

¹⁰¹ ibid., p. 476.

¹⁰² The basis on which petroleum production and consumption data is collected and published is such that there are significant variations in data published from one source to another. Some data is published as ‘provisional’ and then ‘revised’ data is published later. In addition the reporting methods are such that it is very difficult to reconcile one section of the data with another. Thus, the data for domestic crude, imported crude, imported refined product, exports, and stock on hand do not tally. In particular, calculations for US domestic crude oil production as a percentage of total ‘new supplies’ do not produce the same answer as calculations for domestic crude oil as a percentage of total domestic demand. However, to appreciate the place of domestic crude production in the overall supply pattern, it is necessary to refer to both figures. To produce these tables and graphs the author has relied on data published by the Petroleum Economist which is a reliable and authoritative source.

¹⁰³ USA Petroleum: Changes in Production and Demand pattern, 1966–1970 (Thousand barrels)

	Domestic Demand	Annual Increase %	Domestic Crude	Annual Increase %	Percentage Dom. Crude
1966	4410796		3027763		68.64
1967	4584526	3.94	3215742	6.21	70.14
1968	4901789	6.92	3329042	3.52	67.91
1969	5159776	5.26	3363832	1.05	65.19
1970	5371333	4.10	3517450	4.57	65.49
Increase over 5 years		21.78		16.17
Change in 2-yr. ave. Dom. Crude %					-4.05

Source: Petroleum Economist, March 1976, p. 120.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

¹⁰⁴ USA Petroleum (Thousand Barrels)

	1970	1970	1970	1973	1973	1973	1974	1974	1974
Percentage of:	New stock		New stock		New stock
Domestic Crude Production	3517450	74.12	63.55	3360903	60.50	53.20	3199328	59.86	52.71
Crude Imports	483293	10.18		1183996	21.31		1269155	23.75
Product Imports	745008	15.70	25.88	1009992	18.18	39.50	876432	16.40	40.15
Total Imports	1228301	25.88		2193988	39.50		2145587	40.14
Total New Supplies (Dom.+Imp.)	4745751	100.00	89.43	5554891	100.00	92.70	5344915	100.00	92.86
Crude Exports	4991			697			1074
Product Exports	89252			83515			79417
Total Exports	94243			84212			80491
Total Supplies Moving	4839994			5639103			5425406
Domestic Motor Gasoline	2111349			2436156			2386177
Domestic Kerosene	357326			386322			345781
Domestic Lubricants	49733			59171			56670
Domestic Dist. Fuel Oil	983400			1128714			1072812
Domestic Resid. Fuel Oil	814773			1030177			957811
Total, Specified Products	4316581			5040540			4819251
Domestic Unspecified	1218142			1276763			1250220
Total Domestic Demand	5534723			6317303			6069471
Stocks Crude	276367			242478			265020
Stocks Unfinished	98989			99154			106031
Stocks Finished	635459			658840			695045
Total Stocks	1010815		18.26	1000472		15.84	1066096		17.56
Total Supplies Moving + Stocks	5850809			6639575			6491502

Source: Petroleum Economist, March 1976, p. 120.

¹⁰⁵ Domestic crude oil production, USA, in thousand barrels: 1966, 3,027,763; 1970, 3,517,450 (peak months, October-November); 1975, 3,052,721. Petroleum Economist, March 1976, p. 120.

¹⁰⁶ An expression used in discussion with the author by a senior Saudi Arabian civil servant in Jeddah, December 1975.

¹⁰⁷ Britain's petroleum supplies were drawn as follows: all Arab countries 71 per cent (including Kuwait 23 per cent, Saudi Arabia 20 per cent, Libya 14 per cent, The United Arab Emirates 5 per cent, Qatar 4 per cent, Iraq 3 per cent, others including Algeria, Egypt, Oman and Tunisia 2 per cent between them); Iran 13 per cent, Nigeria 10 per cent, Venezuela 5 per cent; and other countries 1 per cent.

¹⁰⁸ Personal conversation with an executive of BP, November 1975.

¹⁰⁹ Latin America, (weekly political and economic report), February 8, 1974, p. 46.

¹¹⁰ Latin America, February 8, 1974, p. 46.

¹¹¹ Latin America, December 12, 1975, pp. 389/91.

¹¹² Latin America, May 3, 1974.

¹¹³ Latin America, May 10, 1974, pp. 137/138.

¹¹⁴ Latin America, May 331, 1974, p. 161.

¹¹⁵ Jost, John, quoting the former Minister for Minerals and Energy, Rex Connor, in an interview reported in The National Times, August 29–September 3, 1977, p. 4.

¹¹⁶ The National Times, March 21 to 27, 1982, p. 12.

¹¹⁷ ibid.

¹¹⁸ Paton, David M., [Ed.] Breaking Barriers: Nairobi 1975, the official report of the Fifth Assembly of the WCC [London: SPCK & Eerdmans, Grand Rapids, 1976] p. 99.

¹¹⁹ The joint communique issued by Presidents Ford and Marcos in Manila on December 7 1975 said, in part, "... they agreed that the military bases used by the US in the Philippines remain important in maintaining an effective United States presence in the Western Pacific in support of these mutual objectives." It went on to note that President Marcos had indicated that no foreign ground troops would be accommodated in the Philippines.

¹²⁰ "... if ... the US was planning to use the Omega system for military purposes with the Soviet Union as its principal target ... it would be a simple matter to build transmitters on Guam and Samoa, thus giving excellent coverage of the Indian and North Pacific Oceans from where its missiles would be launched. No negotiations with

- foreign nations would be necessary, and yet all suggested US military aims could be achieved." (Omega Navigational Institute, Report from the Joint Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence, p. 84).
- ¹²¹ Report of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Foreign Affairs and Defence in May, 1973, pp. 106–107.
- ¹²² ibid., p. 107.
- ¹²³ Advice to the author from a senior Saudi Arabian official in Jeddah, December 1975.
- ¹²⁴ Blum, Killing Hope, pp. 340–348.
- ¹²⁵ Hanson, Eric O. The Catholic Church in World Politics [Princeton: Princeton Uni. Press, 1990] pp. 234–235, citing AP from Jerusalem, September 14, 1982, in New York Times (NYT), September 13, 1982; NYT, September 14, 1982; NYT September 16, 1982.
- ¹²⁶ Hanson, op. cit., p. 338.
- ¹²⁷ Hanson, op. cit., pp. 338–339.
- ¹²⁸ Hanson, op. cit., pp. 346–347.
- ¹²⁹ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Iran-Contra Affair."
- ¹³⁰ SBS World Guide 1998, p. 623.
- ¹³¹ ibid., p. 625.

Chapter 31: To God be the Glory!

- ¹ Matthew 1:17.
- ² Matthew 2:1, and Luke 1:5.
- ³ Burrow J.W. Introduction to The Origin of Species [Harmondsworth: Penguin/Pelican, 1977] pp. 20–21.
- ⁴ The New Spectator, Vol. 4, No. 20, October 23, 1974, carries a report of a debate on this matter in the annual assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Victoria. At the time the author was circulating papers on the oil embargo and the new relationships within the churches of Victoria.
- ⁵ An expression used in discussion with the author by a senior Saudi Arabian civil servant in Jeddah, December 1975.
- ⁶ Camilleri, Joseph A., Kamal Malhotra and Majid Tehranian, [Project Directors] Reimagining the Future: towards democratic governance [Bundoora, Victoria: La Trobe University Department of Politics, 2000] p. 2.
- ⁷ Camilleri, et.al., p. 81.
- ⁸ An indication of the religio-ethnic mix in Yugoslavia in recent years.

It is impossible to keep up with the ebb and flow of religio-ethnic populations in Yugoslavia, but this compilation seems to be a reasonable estimate for the population status prior to the breakup.

Unit	Orthodox	Catholic	Muslim	Other	Total Pop.
Yugoslavia (Total)	65%	4%	19%	12%	10.6 m
Montenegro (State)	mostly	?	?	?	0.6 m
Serbia (State Total)	66%	?	?	?	9.9 m
Prov. of Kosovo	?	?	90%	?	2.0 m
Prov. of Vojvodina	mostly	?	?	?	2.0 m
Bosnia and Herzegovina	31%	17%	44%	8%	4.4 m
Croatia	12%	79%	1%	8%	4.8 m
Macedonia	mostly	few	some	?	1.9 m

- ⁹ Ethnic self-understanding and religio-national ambitions have remained unchanged. Each community can point to periods of oppression by the others and can justify their territorial ambitions on the same basis. Their political leaders have been no different to those elsewhere. Whether they have been believers or not, they have been expert at manipulating confessional interests. The deposed President, Milosevic, provides an excellent illustration. A dedicated Communist and therefore, by common acceptance, an atheist, he has exploited the support of the Serbian Orthodox Church and its special status in such a manner that Serbian Nationalism and Serbian Orthodoxy have become virtually inseparable – almost synonymous. The church has taken full advantage of that situation and the state apparatus was therefore able to represent the state as above reproach in any of its repressive programs, and even minority Christian communities, including the Methodist Church of Yugoslavia, put the blame for the war on "part of the Albanian population (which) wanted to achieve a number of privileges and constitute an ethnically pure province of Kosovo." [Dedic, Abdullah, "The Muslim Predicament in Yugoslavia: An Impression," Journal: Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs, Vol. 8 No. 1 January 1987.]

¹⁰ An overview of the period from the Serbian Academy's 'Memorandum 1986' to 1996.

The Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences' "Memorandum 1986" claimed that:

"In less than fifty years, over two successive generations, the Serbian nation has been exposed to such severe trials – twice exposed to physical extermination, to forced assimilation, to religious conversion, to cultural genocide, to ideological indoctrination, and to the denigration and renunciation of their own traditions beneath an imposed guilt complex, and thereby disarmed intellectually and politically, that they could not but leave deep spiritual wounds that cannot be ignored as this century of the great technological takeoff draws to a close. ...

"But the greatest calamity is the fact that the Serbian nation does not possess a state like all of the other nations. True, the first article of the Constitution of the Socialist Republic of Serbia contains a provision to the effect that Serbia is a state, but the question immediately arises: What kind of a state is one that lacks authority within its own territory and lacks the means to protect the personal property of its citizens, to prevent genocide in Kosovo, and to prevent the emigration of Serbs from their ancient homeland? ...

"The autonomous provinces must become true integral parts of the Republic of Serbia by (the constitution) granting them a degree of autonomy that would not destroy the integrity of the Republic and would make it possible to act in the common interests of the wider community."

With that Memorandum the Academy was simply restating in somewhat less provocative language and without some of the details for its implementation, a strategy spelled out by one of its former directors, Vosa Cubrilovic, on March 7, 1937. A professor of history at Belgrade University at the time, Cubrilovic presented his plan for "The Expulsion of the Albanians" to the Serbian Cultural Club. In terms comparable to those used later by Hitler about the Jews, but going even further than any of Hitler's public pronouncements up to that time, he proposed the total expulsion of all Kosovar Albanians, preferably to either Albania or Turkey, saying that if there were any objections the Albanian government should be told that "we shall stop at nothing to achieve our final solution to this question." Steps to "create a suitable psychosis" were to include bribing and threatening the Albanian clergy; propaganda; coercion by the state apparatus with ruthless police powers, fines and imprisonment; refusal to recognize old land deeds; withdrawal of permits to practice a profession; dismissal from state, private or public office; 'destruction' of clergy and cemeteries; distribution of weapons to "our colonists" for use in such programs as "a tide of Montenegrins ... launched from mountain pastures," and much more.

But given the turmoil in interfaith relations in Eastern Europe and the adjacent Middle East over an extended period it is no surprise that by the mid 1980's the Serbs had other examples to follow. In 1984 neighbouring Bulgaria began an official campaign to 'integrate' its Muslim minority, most of whom were of Turkish origin, in the majority Bulgarian society by forcing them to adopt Bulgarian names and, unless they preferred to emigrate, to adopt Orthodox Christianity. A very unusual tactic for a Communist state to adopt. The program was accelerated in June 1989 and within three months 300,000 Muslims had been expelled, mainly to Turkey, and there had been some deaths. But there had also been a coup by the Foreign Minister against the head of state and a purge of the Bulgarian Communist party to rid the government of those who had been responsible.

It was about that time that Slobodan Milosevic embarked on his plan for ethnic warfare, reportedly saying that "we will send all the Muslims back to Mecca." Yugoslavia's troubles compounded rapidly. Civil war erupted in Croatia in 1991 and for eight years the complex of republics, states and provinces has known little other than tears and turmoil. The United Nations, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, NATO, an assortment of member countries and their armies (including those from eleven Arab and nine European Union countries), Non Government Organizations and church councils have sought to intervene, to negotiate and to impose an assortment of settlements, but the "ethnic cleansing" with population displacement and slaughter continued.

In March 1992 a referendum on the question of independence in Bosnia was boycotted by the Serbian minority who then declared their own republic in April; the United Nations admitted Bosnia-Herzegovina in May and applied sanctions against Serbia shortly after; the program of ethnic cleansing in which both Croats and Bosnians were replaced by Serb settlers began in that region in July; the Vance-Owen proposal for ten provinces (three each for the Muslims, Croats and Serbs and one mixed) was published in October as one of a number of peace plans in quick succession; an international conference held in Istanbul in April 1994 called for condemnation of Serbian aggression against its Muslim population; a new constitution for Bosnia-Herzegovina was introduced in 1995 and 15,000 fighters from Saudi Arabia and Iran who went to the support of the embattled Bosnians were forced out by United States pressure. On October 14, Velika Srbija, the Greater Serbia Journal, Belgrade, published a lengthy statement by the Serb Deputy Prime Minister, Voislav Seselj setting out a blueprint for Cleansing Kosovo. It was very ominous indeed. Then the Dayton Peace Accord, to be enforced by 60,000 IFOR troops, was signed in December.

In spite of the Holbrooke-Milosevic talks in February 1996 the program of oppression against the Muslims – always referred to as “Ethnic Albanians” – backed up by propaganda in which some Orthodox clergy were involved, continued. In March a consortium of eleven Arab and nine European Union countries agreed to arm the Bosnian Federal Army to offset the power of the well-armed Serbian army – the fourth biggest in Europe, and a few weeks later mass graves of 8,000 Bosnian Muslims were discovered.

¹¹ Some steps taken by, or influencing, the World Council of Churches position since 1977 and during the Kosovo Crisis.

In September 1977: Acknowledging the enormous task of reconciliation across the entire Christian Church, the tensions within the Ecumenical Movement and the enormity of tasks before it in the inter-faith field, the Central Executive of the World Council of Churches adopted a far reaching policy statement entitled ‘Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the World Council of Churches’.

The strains were such that a high-level Orthodox meeting at Thessaloniki from April 29–May 2, 1998: recommended that at the Assembly (in December) the Orthodox Churches’ delegates should not participate in common prayers and Assembly worship and should vote only on matters of special interest to the Orthodox. It also considered a proposal for the establishment of a Special Theological Commission with members drawn from both ‘wings’ of the Council in an effort to resolve some of the matters in dispute between the Orthodox and the Reformed Churches.

Shortly after, at a pre-assembly meeting from May 7–13: Acknowledging the proposal to establish a Special Commission, the Eastern Orthodox Churches debated whether to remain members of the World Council of Churches and active in the Ecumenical Movement because of the gulf between them and the Reformed member churches, the lack of support which they believed they were receiving, the difficulty they had in influencing decisions or programs of the Council, and disagreement over a number of theological issues.

Also in May: a Catholic-Islamic Commission was established at the Vatican, jointly chaired by Cardinal Arinze and a Sheik from Al-Azhar University, Cairo. [A Catholic-Muslim Council had been established in Poland in 1997.]

October 14: The WCC welcomed Serbia’s partial agreement to the UN terms for the withdrawal of its troops from Kosovo.

November 27: The Bulgarian Orthodox Church advised of its withdrawal from the WCC.

December 3: The WCC’s Eighth Assembly opened in Harare.

December 4: General Secretary Konrad Raiser proposed the establishment of an international Forum of the Churches which would widen the Ecumenical Movement to churches and organizations beyond the membership of the WCC.

December 12: The WCC formally resolved to establish a Commission on Participation of Orthodox Churches.

December 28–29: The Holy Synod of the Russian Orthodox Church agreed to maintain its membership of the WCC, pending the outcome of the work of the Special Commission in which it would participate fully, but at a reduced level.

March 16–18, 1999: A Summit meeting of Kosovo’s religious leaders, the first ever, was convened by the US-based Interfaith Appeal of Conscience Foundation in an effort to find a solution to the crisis without the need for NATO intervention. Leaders of the Serbian Orthodox, Roman Catholic and Muslim communities and a representative of the WCC participated.

March 24: Acting on the basis that Yugoslavia had refused to sign the Rambouillet Agreement and that negotiations had therefore reached the end of the track, even though many observers believed that for Yugoslavia to sign it was tantamount to surrendering national sovereignty and that there was still room for negotiation, NATO began its bombing campaign. The Russian Orthodox Church immediately expressed its support for Serbia and its sister Orthodox Church.

Next day March 25: The WCC addressed a pastoral letter to member churches in Yugoslavia expressing solidarity with them and regret at the failure to reach a negotiated settlement. Over the next week (notably March 29 and 31) a series of appeals were made by the major peak Christian organizations, [the WCC, the Council of European Churches (CEC), the Lutheran World Federation (LWF) and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC)], for the bombing to be ended to enable a renewal of the political peace process. But then, with a distinct change of emphasis, on April 13: the Vatican issued a statement that Catholic Albanians in Kosovo (as opposed to “ethnic” Albanians) were being treated “quite normally” by the Serbian authorities. That apparently meant that everything was OK!

NOTES TO VOLUME III

April 15: that group plus the World Methodist Council (WMC), the Baptist World Alliance (BWA) and the Anglican Communion representative issued a joint statement noting the humanitarian crisis caused by the Serbian acts of ethnic cleansing against “ethnic Albanians” in Kosovo. Even so, there was no mention of the terms Islam or Muslim. Only “ethnic Albanians”.

The WCC was in a bind and it was having difficulty camouflaging the fact that many Western European Churches were angered by the Serbian Orthodox Church’s apparent continuing support for the Serbian nationalist cause. If it moved strongly to support the Muslims in Kosovo and elsewhere against the Serbian campaign it would clearly antagonize the Eastern Orthodox Churches and place its conciliatory moves within the Council, and the future of the Special Theological Commission, in jeopardy. On the other hand, if it did not recognize the actuality of slaughter and expulsion of the Muslim communities, make every effort to intervene to stop it, and act to support the Muslims, then it would be seen as an ineffective dialogue partner and the years of painstaking work to improve Christian-Muslim relations and to strengthen the inter-faith movement generally would be undermined. Thus the three-way relationship within the wider Christian Church between the Orthodox Churches, the Vatican, outside the Council, and the WCC was under great stress.

Over the next two days April 16–17: a high-level Ecumenical delegation made pastoral visits to the Serbian Orthodox Church and the Roman Catholic Church in Belgrade and the three Reformed Churches in Novi Sad. It was noted that the visits were being made at a time of great crisis which will have serious implications for intra-European Ecumenical relations, especially between East and West. The report of the visits noted especially that the Serbian Orthodox Church had welcomed the actions and support of the Roman Catholic Church. It also noted that the Serbian Church supported cantonization in Kosovo with guarantees for minorities, but within Yugoslavia.

In quick succession: in Germany the Churches were criticised for failing to oppose the NATO bombing and thereby showing their solidarity with the Serbian Christians, and the Russian Patriarch visited Belgrade to do just that and to call for a “just peace” in Kosovo. And while the Methodist Church in Yugoslavia blamed the Muslims for the war because they wanted their autonomy back, American Muslims and Jews joined with Christians in a joint delegation to seek the release of three captured US servicemen.

Then on May 5: the Catholic Bishops shifted ground from the rest of the church – there must have been talks going on in the Catholic-Islamic Commission in the Vatican – and expressed support for the refugees and sympathy with the NATO bombing. The President of the Council of Catholic Bishops’ Conferences said the church felt unity with all men and women and particularly the Muslims who were the victims of the suffering (while the rest of the churches were sticking to “ethnic Albanians”) ... and received threats for his trouble.

May 26–26: With the war dragging on and masses of Muslims in Kosovo being converted into refugees, an Ecumenical Consultation was held in Budapest, Hungary, at which the Catholic Bishops’ Conferences of Europe was also represented. In its report the WCC was again at pains to stress that it was not a religious war and, in line with virtually all Western media reporting, it used the expression “ethnic cleansing” to describe the slaughter and forced refugee marches, and its references to Christians reaching out to assist Muslim refugees seemed rather laboured.

A few days later, May 31: the head of the Greek Orthodox Church condemned the NATO bombing and said the West thinks that civilization ends where the Orthodox Church begins. Then, on June 3: came the first signs of an admission from the Serbian Orthodox Church that it had actually supported the Serbian forces in the Bosnian war, but there was no reference to the war in Kosovo and, on the same day, Russian church officials repulsed moves by the Pope to arrange a visit to Russia.

Immediately after the NATO bombing stopped, the Serbian Church expressed concern that its holy sites in Kosovo were to be left ‘unprotected’ after the withdrawal. That meant, in effect, that they were in areas to be controlled by the Kosovo forces and may be subject to retaliation. In fact they were not, in spite of the fact that mosques of major significance had been razed by Serbian forces.

¹² World Council of Churches Press Update, e-mail service, October 2, 2000, “New input from Eastern Europe to WCC staff.”

¹³ An indication of the impact of the Kosovo crisis on the Muslim communities in the United States and Canada. There was strong criticism of both the timing of President Clinton’s decision to commit the US/NATO forces to war (because it helped to camouflage some of his domestic troubles) and his choice of a block-buster air campaign which had no hope of preventing the destruction of Kosovo but which left Russia unable to negotiate direct access to the Adriatic ports through a fragmented Yugoslavia now under NATO domination. But to offset that there was relief and gratitude within the Muslim community that at last the US was going to the rescue of a battered Muslim minority instead of wielding the big stick to suppress it. Support for Clinton climbed at a time when he desperately needed it.

The Kosovo refugee crisis encouraged the establishment of a range of new Muslim fund raising, welfare, lobbying and support groups. It led to support for the McConnell-Lieberman Senate Bill to provide $US25 million in arms for the KLA and also led to the mobilization of public support for NATO's air strikes against the Serbs. It stirred up latent Muslim resentment at a long history of Christian-European hatred of Muslims and manipulation of the Balkans to suit the plans of the Great Powers, and it encouraged the establishment of a number of additional Internet web sites for educational and lobbying purposes. It also encouraged attendance at mosques; pride in acknowledging or proclaiming Muslim belief; and, at a very practical level, it stimulated moves towards the adoption of an international charter for Muslim Activists. It accelerated a drive for the elimination of discrimination against Muslims in the US legal system, in education, in public service employment, in commerce and in exploitative advertising, and anti-discrimination groups gained a series of quite spectacular victories in quick succession. These involved, notably, media companies, a fast food chain and other food companies, and employment in security classified government positions.

But in the interfaith arena a new clout is also apparent. The Canadian Council of Churches was sharply rebuked for its rather simplistic call for an end to the bombing in Serbia. It was told that its appeal should have been directed at Serbia to stop the genocide, and meetings were promptly held between Canadian Muslim leaders and Council officials to set the matter right.

¹⁴ Jacobs, Louis The Jewish Religion: A Companion [Oxford: Oxford, 1995] p. 571.

¹⁵ Mark 16:16 Jerusalem translation.

¹⁶ Critical factors to note in the development of the trouble in the triangle:

A: in linking the church to the conduct and fortunes of the White West:

1. Constantine's manipulation of the young church to gain power.
2. The adoption of the Athanasian Creed, the resulting denigration of the rest of the world and the church's ultimate isolation because of it.
3. The Papal Bull Rominus Pontifex which helped shape the headlong European colonial rush, and the concepts of 'the White Man's Burden' and 'Protector of the Faith'.
4. The deliberate use of incidents involving the church to justify military occupation or intimidation and exploitation of numerous countries including Scandinavia, the principality of Russia, numerous territories of Latin America and Africa, Indo China (Napoleon III), China (Britain) and Japan (Britain and the US). The list goes on.
5. The dubious collaboration between the Protestant churches of America and its houses of commerce in the evolution and promotion of the Protestant Work Ethic in the face of the challenge of Marxism.
6. A whole rash of papal encyclicals but notably those of 1926, Rerum Ecclesiae, promoting commercial support for Catholic missions in China; 1933, Casti Connubi, which laid down acceptable social and moral conduct in such strait-jacket terms that the world revolted before a generation was past; and 1938, Divini Redemptoris, which linked an irrational condemnation of Communism with a theological justification for Capitalism and tied the church more tightly than ever before to the conduct of the Western world, whether it was responsible and uplifting or totally corrupting and exploitative.
7. The coincidental campaign for temporal power and political concordats which plumbed new depths with the signing of the Lateran Treaty and both the Italian and German concordats which blessed with respectability degrading conduct and programs which, like those of the Holy Roman Empire, were in total contradiction of the teachings of He whom the church claimed to represent.
8. US policy, spearheaded by MacArthur, under which Japan was to be Christianized to provide a political bulwark against Communism.

B: in linking Judaism into that White Western relationship to form the 'North' in spite of the church's history of rampant anti-Semitism:

1. The destruction of the Khazar Khanate.
2. The Balfour Declaration in which the Jewish community was used as a pawn in Britain's bid for political and economic advantage.
3. America's assumption of the role of an umbrella for Zionism for its own political and economic advantage when Britain reneged on the Balfour Declaration.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

C: in the evolution of Islam and its linking with the 'South' in opposition to the 'North':

1. The development of a system of creeds and doctrines not consistent with the messages of Yahwism and the Gospel and the abuse of the church's role which were a trigger for:
 2. The prophetic ministry of Muhammad and the mission, no less incumbent upon him than upon the people of Judaism and Christianity, to convey the message of Yahweh, including the Gospel, throughout the world.
 3. The church's rejection of that mission and, subsequently, its concurrent oppression of Judaism and bid to eliminate Islam through the crusades.
 4. The prophetic ministry of the Jewish scholar, Maimonides.
 5. The Balfour Declaration coupled with the McMahon Letter.
 6. The confirmation of prophecies of both Muhammad and Maimonides through the parody of Hitler's Mein Kampf, and the consequent assumption of dominant-nation status by the United States.
 7. The establishment of the State of Israel and policies adopted by the United States as a consequence of pursuing both its Zionist-umbrella role and its want to maintain its dominant-nation status.
- ¹⁷ Tessler, Mark, A History of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, [Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994] pp. 508–510, citing extracts from Sadat's speech in Laqueur & Rubin, pp. 592–601.
- ¹⁸ Tessler, op. cit., pp. 510–511.
- ¹⁹ Tessler, op. cit., p. 523.
- ²⁰ UN Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, "Information Note." Source: United Nations web site, file: \UN Committee on Palestinian Rights CPR_DPR.ht as at October 7, 2000.
- ²¹ Middle East Policy Statement adopted by the Governing Board, National Council of Churches of Christ in the USA, November 6, 1980, 475 Riverside Drive, New York, NY 10115, pp. 4–5, 11.
- ²² Tessler, op. cit., pp. 600–602, citing: Ronald Reagan's address to the American people, September 1, 1982, in the New York Times, September 2, 1982; and noting that it is reprinted in Laqueur & Rubin, pp. 656–663.
- ²³ Laqueur, Walter, & Barry Rubin (Eds.) The Israel-Arab Reader: A Documentary History of the Middle East Conflict, [New York: Viking-Penguin, 1984] pp. 656–663, Speech by President Ronald Reagan: "The Reagan Plan," (September 1, 1982)
- ²⁴ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Ronald W. Reagan."
- ²⁵ Tessler, op. cit., p. 604, quoting from the Israeli Government communique, September 2, 1982, which was reprinted in the New York Times, September 3, 1982.
- ²⁶ Tessler, op. cit., pp. 604–605.
- ²⁷ ibid., pp. 607–608.
- ²⁸ Laqueur, Walter, & Barry Rubin (Eds.) The Israel-Arab Reader: A Documentary History of the Middle East Conflict, [New York: Viking-Penguin, 1984] pp. 663–664, "The Final Statement of the Twelfth Arab Summit Conference, September 9, 1982". (The summit had convened in Fez, Morocco, on November 25, 1981, and resumed after adjournment on September 6, 1982.)
- ²⁹ Tessler, op. cit., pp. 590–592.
- ³⁰ ibid., p. 618.
- ³¹ ibid., pp. 633–636.
- ³² ibid., pp. 660–662.
- ³³ ibid., p. 720, citing the "Husayni Document," reprinted in Peretz, Don, Intifada: the Palestinian Uprising [Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1990] pp. 204–207.
- ³⁴ That denial was in contravention of Article 105 of the United Nations Charter which says: "Representatives of the Members of the United Nations and officials of the Organization shall similarly enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connexion with the Organization." Arafat's attendance was in connection with his responsibilities in Jordan, a founding member of the United Nations. In addition, the United States had quite specifically agreed at the time that the world body accepted its invitation to site UN headquarters in New York that it would not deny transit right to anyone having legitimate reason to visit the UN's extraterritorial site.
- ³⁵ B'Tselem, The Israeli Information Center for Human Rights in the Occupied Territories; source: http://www.btselem.org/Files/site/e_about.asp "About B'Tselem" as at October 7, 2000.
- ³⁶ Gribetz, Judah, Edward L. Greenstein & Regina Stein, The Timetables of Jewish History [New York: Simon & Schuster/Touchstone, 1994] p. 714.
- ³⁷ Tessler, op. cit., pp. 730–734.

NOTES TO VOLUME III

- ³⁸ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "History of Iraq: Restructuring the Ba'th regime."
- ³⁹ Tessler, op. cit., p. 737, and Gribetz et. al., p. 719, list 12, as endorsing the request. Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "The Arab League," lists eleven, omitting Oman.
- ⁴⁰ Advice received in personal conversations with Saudi Arabian personnel.
- ⁴¹ Gribetz, et. al., op. cit., pp. 721–722.
- ⁴² Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Persian Gulf War."
- ⁴³ Garamone, Jim, American Forces Press Service. Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, April 10, 2000, source: www.defenselink.mil:80/news/Apr2000/n04102000_20004101.html as at October 9, 2000.
- ⁴⁴ Perry, William J., "The Risks if we would be free." Defense Viewpoint: American Forces Information Service, Volume 11, No. 77, source: www.defenselink.mil:80/speeches/1996/s19960806-perry.html as at October 10, 2000
- ⁴⁵ Perry, William J., "Combating Terrorism in Saudi Arabia." Defense Viewpoint: American Forces Information Service, Volume 11, No. 59, source: www.defenselink.mil:80/speeches/1996/s19960709-perry.html as at October 10, 2000
- ⁴⁶ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "History of Post-Soviet Russia."
- ⁴⁷ Encyclopedia Britannica Deluxe CD 2000, from "Year in Review 1994: Biography, Dzhokhar Dudayev."
- ⁴⁸ Third Ministerial Meeting of the Group of 77. The Manila Declaration and Programme of Action. [UNCTAD, Proceedings of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, Fourth Session, Nairobi, 5–31 May 1976, Vol. 1, Report and Annexes (New York: United Nations, 1977), pp. 109–132, originally issued as 77/MM (III)/49 of 7 February, 1976.]
- ⁴⁹ Dollar, David & Aart Kraay, Economic Growth Research, Growth Is Good for the Poor, (abstract) The World Bank Group, source: <http://www.worldbank.org/research/growth/absddolakraay.htm> as at September 14, 2000.
- ⁵⁰ WCC Press Update: Geneva 2000: Joint statement: NGO's ask UN to Withdraw Endorsement of "A Better World For All, 28 June, 2000 NGOs
- ⁵¹ For a concise discussion of the Tobin Tax see Camilleri, et.al., p. 43.
- ⁵² Aruri, Naseer, The Rationale for US Military Intervention After the Cold War, Naseer Aruri.htm as at October 7, 2000.
- ⁵³ Institute for Public Accuracy, Washington DC, "Revolution in Yugoslavia," <http://www.accuracy.org> source, MSANEWS, October 5, 2000.
- ⁵⁴ WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES: MEMBERSHIP PATTERN by number of churches.
- | Number of churches by region | 1948 | 1954 | 1961 | 1968 | 1975 | 1981 | 1991# | 1998 |
|--|-------------|-------------|-------------|-------------|-------------|-------------|--------------|-------------|
| Europe, Nth. Am.*, ANZ, | | | | | | | | |
| DR in Sth.Af.Region 1 | 102 | 104 | 108 | 123 | 129 | 128 | 137 | 146 |
| Africa (excl. DR in Sth. Af.) Region 2 | 4 | 7 | 18 | 32 | 50 | 56 | 66 | 75 |
| Asia (excl. ANZ) Region 3 | 16 | 18 | 22 | 29 | 42 | 49 | 54 | 58 |
| Other: ME, Lat. Am., | | | | | | | | |
| Caribbean, Pacific + Region 4 | 13 | 15 | 23 | 33 | 47 | 52 | 59 | 66 |
| Regions 2, 3, 4 combined 3 | 3 | 40 | 63 | 94 | 139 | 157 | 178 | 199 |
| Total Member Churches Total | 135 | 144 | 171 | 217 | 268 | 285 | 315 | 345 |
- *Excl. Afro. Am. +Afro. Am.
- # Est. by ave. 1981 & 1998

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

This index is provided for information only. Page numbers refer to the printed 2000 edition.

- Abbasids, 173, 285
- Abraha, General, 122
- Abraham, 4
- Abrahamic faiths, partners, 135
- Abu Bakr, 151
- Abyssinia (Ethiopia), 720
- Abyssinia, Negus of, 120
- Achnacarry Agreement*, 706
- Act of Uniformity, 425
- Adler, Felix, 443
- Aedesius, 60
- Africa, 277, 476
- Agrippa I, 8
- Agrippa II, 8
- Agudas Yisrael, 654
- Ahmadiya movement, 505
- Ahura Mazda, 26
- Akbar, 281
- Al Aqsa Mosque, 727
- Alaric, 83
- Albert, Prince of Brandenburg, 246
- Albigensian Heresy, 220
- Alexander I, Russia, 346, 393
 - Pale of settlement, 343
- Alexander II, Russia, 409
 - abolition of serfdom, 412
 - assassination, 435
- Alexander III, Russia, 436
- Alexander the Great, 12
- Alfieri, Count Vittorio, 336
- Alkalai, Judah, 453
- All Russian Soviet Congress, 525
- Allen, Gary
 - None Dare Call it Conspiracy*, 555
- Alliance Insurance Group, 360
- Alliance Israelite Universelle, Paris, 433
- Alliance of Reformed Churches, 495
- Allied Supreme War Council
 - reparation demands, 606
- Almaden mercury mines, 731
- Almohades, 185
- Ambrose, 80
- America. See also United States
- American Civil Liberties Union, 620
- American Civil War, 351
- American immigration policy, 619
- American Indians
 - Cherokee, forced removal, 463
 - Sauk slaughter, 463
 - scalp bounty, 463
 - slaughter of, 462
- American Jewish Congress, 655
- American War of Independence, 329
- Amir Abdullah
 - King of Iraq, 690
 - ruler of Transjordan, 691
- Amis des Noirs, 352
- Anabaptist, 273
- Anastasius, 104
- Anglican Lambeth Conference, 495
- Anglo-German Naval Treaty, 719
- Anglo-Italian agreement, 779
- Anglo-Jewish Association, 433
- Anglo-Persian Oil Company, 489, 691
- Anglo-Saxons, 165
- Anne, Russia, 307
- Anschluss, 771, 773
- Anti-Comintern Pact*, 736, 761
- anti-Communist agitators
 - course, 601
- anti-Semitism, 47, 434, 572
- anti-Trinitarian movements, 497
- anti-Zionist persecution, 663
- Antoinette, Marie, 330
- Antonius Pius, 21
- Apollinarius, 67
- Apologetics, 647
- Apostles' Creed, 23
- Aquinas, Thomas, 208
 - death of, 213
 - Summa Theologiae*, 210
- Arab Club, 578
- Arab rebellion, 759
 - renewal, 794
 - second, 662, 726
- Archbishop of Canterbury, 760
- Ardashir I, 26
- Argentina
 - Jewish immigration, 436
- Arian controversy, 568
- Arians, 25, 127
- Arius, 32
- Ark of the Covenant, 118, 142
- Arlosoroff, Chaim, 655
- Armenian Apostolic Church, 431
- Armenian genocide, 693
- Arminius, Jacobus, 294
- Armitage Smith Agreement*, 691
- Arnold, Thomas
 - Principles of Church Reform*, 493
- Ascher, Saul, 384
 - Leviathan*, 384
- Asding V, 68
- Ash Wednesday, 114
- Assembly of Delegates (Asefat Hanivharim), 577
- Assembly of Israel (Knesset Israel), 577
- Atahualpa, 276
- Ataturk, 693
- Athanasian Creed, 35, 47
- Athanasius, 32, 568
- Attila, 96
- Attlee, Clement, Deputy leader, Labour Party, UK, 717
- Augustine, 6, 69, 77
 - City of God*, 84, 88
 - Confessions*, 87
 - death of, 87
 - Enarrations on the Psalms*, 87

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

- Literal Commentary on Genesis*, 87
- Manichees, 79
- On the Trinity*, 87
- Aurelius, 81
- Australia
 - Aboriginal people, 350
 - blackbirding, 350
 - White Australia Policy, 350
- Australian air force, 799
- Austria, 392
 - annexation of Turkish provinces, 506
 - Patent of Toleration, 331
 - ultimatum from Hitler, 771
- Avars, 110
- Avignon papacy, 227
- Axis Accord*, 736
- Aztecs, 250, 276
 - destruction of empire, 244
- B'nai B'rith, 655
 - Anti-Defamation League, 683
- Bab, the, 445
- Babism, 505
- Bacon, Sir Francis, 294
- Baeck, Rabbi Leo, 684
- Baha'i Movement, 444
- Baha'ism, 505
- Baha'u'llah, 445
- Bahrain, 488
- Balboa, 275
- Balfour Declaration, 523, 539, 577, 687
- Balfour, Arthur James, 523, 688
- Balkan League, 506
- Balkans, 409, 430, 747
- Ball, Sir Joseph, 718
- Bank of England
 - Anglo-Japanese financial collaboration, 790
- Bantu, 476, 478
- Banu Hanifa, 120
- baptism, 283
- Baptist Confessions of Faith, 299
- Baptist World Alliance, 496
- Bar Kozibah, 187
- Bar Mitzvah, 387
- Barnabas, 7
- Barth, Karl, 510, 570
 - Barmen Confession*, 650
 - Church Dogmatics*, 650
 - Doctrine of the Word of God*, 670, 756
- Basil III, Russia, 305
- Bastille, storming of, 332
- Battle of Bu'ath, 149
- Battle of Navarino, 403
- Battle of the Ditch, 150
- Bechuanaland, Protectorate of (Botswana), 482
- Becket Thomas, 219
- Bedouins, 106
- Beit, Alfred, 480
- Belloc, Hilaire, 754
- Benedict, 106
- Benes, President of Czechoslovakia
 - pressure from Hitler, 780
 - resignation, 803
- Benezet, 352
- Berlin, 388
- Bernstein, Herman
 - The History of a Lie*, 606
- Berthier, General, 338
- Bertram, Cardinal
 - catalogue of protest, 657
- Berulle, Cardinal of France, 293
- Besht, See Israel ben Eliezer
- Beth Elohim, 440
- Bible
 - Protestant translation, 402
 - status, 421
- Biblical inerrancy, 4, 25, 421
- bills of exchange, 359
- Bismarck
 - chancellor, 429, 434
 - rep. Diet of Frankfurt, 411
- Black Death, 109, 223
 - massacre of Jews, 224
- Black Shame, 606
- Bloody Sunday, 458
- Blumberg, Germany, 728
- Board of Delegates of American Israelites, 433
- Boas, Franz, 620
- Boers, 476
 - Treks, 478
 - War, 482
- Boleslav, King, 217
- Boleyn, Anne, 258
- Bolshevik platform
 - equality for all, 525
- Bolshevik revolution, 512, 522, 525
- Bolshevism, 558
- Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, 572
 - The Church and the Jewish Question*, 649
- Boniface, 86, 169
- Book of Common Prayer*, 425
- Booth, William, 497
- Bosnia, 506
- Bosphorus/Dardanelles trade route, 408
- Boston tea party, 323
- boundaries, post Great War, 560
- Boxer Rebellion, 486
- Boxer sect, 487
- Briand, French Foreign Minister 623
- bride of Christ, 93
- Bristol, Retired Admiral Mark, 694
- Britain
 - abolition of the slave trade, 355
 - Appeasement policy, 670
 - Christianizing, 164
 - conscription, 517
 - control of the Suez Canal, 515
 - oil interests in Iraq, 515
 - perilous position, 799
 - pressure on Czechs, 796
 - pro-Nazi propaganda, 796
- Brith Shalom, 703
- British blockade (1796)
 - Buenos Aires, 356
- British Chiefs of Staff (COS), 715
- British Commonwealth of Nations, 711
- British East India Company, 470
- British Petroleum, 707
- British White Paper on Defence, 717
- British-Irish Trade Agreement*, 712, 766
- Bruning, Heinrich, 625
- Buber, Martin
 - Christian-Jewish dialogue, 703
- Bubonic plague. See Black Death
- Buchanan, James, US president, 433
- Buckler, Francis William
 - The Oriental Despot*, 566
 - The Re-emergence of the Arian Controversy*, 566
- Buddha, Siddhartha Gautama, 102
- bull fighting, 245
- Burma, split from India, 749
- Burmah Oil Company, 489
- Byzantine Empire, 103
- Cabral, 244
- Cadogan, Sir Alexander
 - replaces Vansittart, 763
- Calicut, 244
- Caligula, 8
- Calixtus, Georg
 - modified Jewish liturgies, 381
- Calonne, 331
- Caltex, 708
- Calvert, George, Baron of Baltimore, 328
- Calvin, Jean. See Calvin, John
- Calvin, John, 257
 - biography, 262
 - Defence of the Orthodox Faith concerning the Holy Trinity*, 266
 - Doctrine of the Trinity, 266
 - The Institutes of the Christian Religion*, 260, 264
- Caro, Joseph, 242
- Carthage, 71

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

- Cartwright, Thomas, 293
 Casement, Roger, execution of, 766
 Catherine, Russia, 307
 Catholic Emancipation Act, 424
 Catholic Irish voter factor, 367
 Caudillos, 378
 celibacy, 31
 Central Conference of American Rabbis, 445
 Central Jewish Consistory for France, 386
 Central Union of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith (CV), 651
 CFR. See Council on Foreign Relations
 Ch'ing dynasty, 473
 Chamberlain, Houston
 Foundations of the Nineteenth Century, 616
 Chamberlain, Neville, 751, 774
 Chancellor of the Exchequer, 716
 Charlemagne, 105
 Charles I, of England, 298
 Charles II, of England, 298
 Charles V, Emperor, 258
 Charles X, king of France, 372
 Charleston Constitution, 440
Charleston Creed, 440
 Chemical Foundation, 622
 Chiang Kai-shek, 581, 584, 715
 kidnapped, 737
 Ch'in Shih Huang Ti, 102
 China, 418
 Catholic Church, 221
 National Christian Council, 579 reconstruction, 473
 seeks British loan, 782
 Chinese bishops, 584
 Chinese Communist Party, 581
 Chosroes II, 113
 Chou En Lai, 584
 Christ. See Jesus
 Christian Democracy, 372
 Christian Science movement, 497
 Christian Socialist Workingmen's Union, 434
 Christian tribes (Hijaz), 122
 Christian Unity, prayer weeks, 494
 Christians, 8
 expulsion from synagogues, 11
 Christology, 8, 672
 church and state, 329
 Church Missionary Society (CMS), 402
 Church of England, 259
 Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. See Mormons
 Church, The, 804
 Churchill, Winston, 719, 748, 774
 First Lord of the Admiralty, 489
 Civil Constitution of the Church, 333 civil riots in France and England, 225
 Clemenceau, 689
 Cleopatra, 74
 Clerical Subscriptions Act, 425
 Cliveden set, 765
 Clovis, 104
 CMS. See Church Missionary Society
 Cockett, Richard
 Twilight of Truth, 718
 Code Napoleon, 341
 Code of Canon Law
 infallibility, 255
Code of Jewish Law. See Torah, Mishneh
 Cohen, Sam, 642 collectives, 666
 Colloquy of Marburg, 262
 colonial concessions to Hitler, 763
 Columban-the-Younger, 168
 Columbus Platform, 683
 Columbus, Christopher, 242
 Commissariat for Jewish Affairs, 662
 Commission on the Responsibility of the Authors of the War and the Enforcement of Penalties, 553
 Commonwealth trade preferences, 711
 Communism, 579, 677
 Communist International Congress, Third, 601
 Communist League, 374
 Communist Party, US, 661
 Concert of Europe, 347
 Confederates, 414
 Conference of Berlin division of Africa, 481
 Conference of Ratisbon 1541, 270
 Confucianism, 102
 Confucius, K'ung Fu-tzu, 102
 Congo mission, 242
 Congregation for the Eastern Churches, The, 521
 Congress of Berlin, 431
 Congress of Vienna, 342, 477
 Connellsville, coal deposits, 461
 Conquistadores, 275
Consensus Tigurinus, 266
 Consistory, 386, 387
 Consolidated Goldfields, 482 conspiracy of silence, 740, 767
 BBC muzzled, 773
 UK press, 718
 Constantine, 25, 28, 30, 49, 53
 baptism, 57
 Constantinople, 56
 fall of, 237
Constantinople Agreement, 686
 Continental Congress, First, 324
convivencia, Spain, 233
 Cooper, Alfred Duff
 Secretary of State for War, 724
 Copernicus, Nicolaus, 288
 Copts, 402
 Corn Laws, 400
 Cornwallis, Lord land tenure system, India, 470
 Cortes, Hernan, 276 conquest of Mexico, 245
 COS. See British Chiefs of Staff
 Cossack uprising, 314
 Coughlin, Fr. Charles, 734
 Council of Antioch, 62
 Council of Arles, 31
 Council of Chalcedon, 97
 Council of Hippo, 68
 Council of Nicaea, 33
 Council of Sirmium, 63
 Council of the Four Lands, 384
 Council of the Land of Lithuania, 384
 Council of the Three Estates arrest of Boniface III, 222
 Council of Trent, 271, 421
 Council on Foreign Relations (CFR.), 555 counter-reformation, 272
 Court Jews, 382
 Covenant of Sinai, 139, 141
 Craigie, Sir Robert, Japanese Ambassador, 740
 Crane, Charles, 688 creation, dating of, 423
 Credit Mobilier, 411
 Creed of Nicaea, 34
 Creed of the Dedication, 62
 Crimean War, 399
 Crimean war loans by Rothschilds, 411
 Croats, 560
 Cromwell, Oliver, 298
 crusades, 122, 203
 Cubrilovic, Professor Vosa
 final solution, 747
 CV. See Central Union of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith, 651
 Cyril of Alexandria, 93
 D'Abernon, Lord, 592
 D'Arcy, William Knox, 488
 D'Israeli, Isaac, 393
 da Gama, Vasco, 244, 280
 Dacca weaving industry mutilation of workers, 472
 Dagobert, 117

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

- Danzig. See Gdansk
dar al-islam, 148, 232, 504
Dardanelles, 431
Darwin, Charles, 363, 423
 The Descent of Man, 212
 The Origin of Species, 25, 212, 420, 423
Dawes Plan, 623
Dawson, Geoffrey
 Times editor, 719
de Almagro, Diego, 276
De Beers Consolidated Mines and Goldfields of South Africa Ltd., 364 De Beers Consolidated Mines Ltd., 480
de Gobineau, Count Arhur
 Essay on Inequality of Races, 616 de Lamennais, Felicite Robert, 362
de Lesseps, Ferdinand
 Suez canal, 409
de Miranda, Francisco, 357
de Reuter, Baron Julius, 485 de Rothschild. See Rothschild Declaration of American Independence, 318
Declaration of the Rights of Man, 332
Declaration of Utrecht, 496
Decree for the Registration of Jewish Property, 780
Defence Requirements Committee (DRC), 715
Defender of the Faith, 258
Del Cano, 275
Denmark, 354
Desburquois, Fr. Gustave, France, 787
Descartes, Rene, 296
 Principles of Philosophy, 297
Detering, Sir Henry (Shell Oil), 668 diamonds, death penalty, 480
Diaz, route to India, 242
Dictatorship of the Proletariat, 666
Diet of Soissons, 173
Diet of Speyer, 261
Diet of Worms, 261
Dimitrijevic-Apis, Colonel founder Black Hand, 506
Diocletian, persecution of Christians, 27
Directory, 335
Disraeli, Benjamin founder, British Conservative Party, 393 prime minister, 393
Divine Representative, 590
Divine Right of Kings, 328
Donatists, 31, 62, 81
Drake, E.L., 461
DRC. See Defence Requirements Committee
Drexler, Anton, 602
Dreyfus, Alfred, 437, 602
 Dreyfus conspiracy file, 438
Dulles, Allen, 694
Dunant, Henri, 499
Dutch East India Company, 476
Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, 425
Ecthesis, 161
Ecumenical Council, Sixth, 162
ecumenical movement
 Vatican opposition, 756
Ecumenism, 493
Eden, Anthony, 724
 biography, 767
 resignation, 767
Edict of Nantes
 Huguenot freedom of worship, 272
Edict of Religious Toleration, 76
Edict of Restitution, 272
Edict of Toleration, 30
Edict of Unity, 83
Edinburgh World Missionary Conference, 501 Editors' Law, 657
education, 367
Edward VIII, King of England, 728 abdication, 738
Egypt, independence, 695
Eichmann, Adolf, 667 visits Palestine, 759
Einstein, Albert, 652
Eire, Democratic State of proclamation (1937), 765
Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, 436
Elijah ben Solomon, 315
Elijah, Gaon of Vilna, 383
Elisavetgrad massacre, 435
Elizabeth I, England, 272, 291
Elizabeth, Russia, 307
Emancipation for Jews, 340
Empire Francoi, 429
Empress of India, 471
Enabling Act, 640
Enfield rifle, 471
Engels
 Dialectics of Nature, 370
Enlightenment
 European, 297
 Jewish. See Haskalah
Entente Cordiale, 488 environmental exploitation, 462
Episcopal Commission, 565
Erasmus, Desiderius
 Handbook for the Christian warrior, 245
Esterhazy, Major F.W., 437
Ethiopian Church, 122
eugenics, 582
Eugenics Record Office, 611, 617
Evangelical Alliance, 493
Evian Conference, 788
exchange control, 360 execution of the insane, 629
Exxon, 707
Ezekiel, 102
Factories Act, 375
Faisal crowned king of Iraq, 690
 Prince, 687
Faith Movement of German Christians, 648
Falloux, Frédéric-Alfred-Pierre
 Falloux Law, 368
Farben, I.G., 636
Fascist Conspiracy of the Hooded Men, 734
Fascist Party, 613
Fascists
 dictatorship, 574
Faulhaber, 657
Feast of Christ the King, 592
Feast of the Epiphany, 592
Feasts, 94
Federal Council of Churches in the United States, 496, 620
Feng Yu Hsiang, 580
Ferdinand, Aragon, 240
Ferdinand, Archduke Francis assassination of, 507
Ferdinand, Holy Roman Emperor, 269
final solution, 602
First National Council of the Chinese (Catholic) Church, 581
Fisher, John, Bishop of Rochester, 259
Flagellants, 224
Florus, 9
Focus Group, The, 748
FOND. See Foreign Office News Department
Ford, Henry
 Jew controlled movies, 467
Foreign Office News Department (FOND), 718
Formstecher, 390
fortress America, 559
Fox, George, 299
France, 406
 grand monarchy, 330
 Paris Commune uprising, 429
 Suez canal, 406
Frances II, Holy Roman Emperor, 334

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

- Franco Prussian War, 428
- Franco, General Francisco,
 - Spain, 669, 731
- Frankel, David, 386
- Free Corps Force, 604
- Freemasonry, 336
- French Revolution, 334
- Friedlander, David, 388
- Friends of Israel, 572
 - suppression, 576
- Frumentius, 60
- Fuad I, Egypt, 695
- Fulda Bishops' Conference, 634, 675

- Gaekwar, Maharaja of Baroda, 732
- Galerius, 28
- Galileo Galilei, 297
- Gallipoli, 514
- Galton, Francis
 - Hereditary Genius*, 617
- Gandhi, Mahatma, 712
 - ambulance corps, 486
- Garibaldi, 374, 426
 - enters Rome, 428
- Gdansk, 557
- Geiger, Rabbi Abraham, 371, 443
- Gemelli, Father Agostino, 511
- General Council of the Catholic Church, 230
- General Syrian Congress, 689
- Genesis, Book of, 422
- Geneva Convention (1864), 552
- Genghis Khan, 207
- Genseric, 87
- George III, King, 323
- George V, King of England, 609
- George VI, King of England, 739
- Gepids, 112
- German Concordat, 429, 435
- German navy, 668
- German patents, 622
- German rearmament, 715
- German Workers' Party, 602
- Germany, 491
 - Centre Party, 594
 - Kulturkampf, 429
 - Landeskirchen*, 562
 - reparations, 710
 - theology of imperialism, 510
 - unconditional surrender, 548
 - war with Serbia, 508
- Geserd, 664
- Gestapo, 667
- Ghassan, Prince of, 120
- Ghetto Nuovo, 312
- ghettos, 341
 - Catholic North American, 366
- Ghurids, 286
- gladiators
 - games, 50
- revolt, 73
- Gnosticism, 6, 14
- Gnostics, 254
- Goebbels, 652
- Goethe, Johann, 361
- Gog and Magog, 139, 188, 807
- Golden Horde, 233
- Gore, Major Ormsby, 609
- Göring, Hermann, 717, 728
- Gospel of John, 37
- Gospels
 - dating, 11, 15
- Goths, 65
- Government of India Act, 713
- Granada
 - fall of, 242
- Grandfather legislation, 617
- Grant, Madison
 - The Passing of the Great Race*, 618
- Gratian, 65
- Great Depression, 622
- Great Wall of China, 102
- Great War, the, 510
- Greek Orthodox Church, 220
- Gregory
 - the Illuminator, 27
- Grindelwald Conferences, 496
- guillotine, 335
- Gundlach, Fr. Gustav, Germany, 787
- Gutenberg
 - press, 239

- Ha'avara*. See Transfer Agreement
- HAC. See Higher Arab Command
- Haec Sancta*, 229
- Hague Conventions, 553
- Haj Amin al Hussein, Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, 691, 697, 704
- Hamburg Temple, 389
- Hammerton Treaty
 - slaves, 479
- Hannibal, 71
- Hanseatic League, 223
- Hasidism, 382
- Haskalah, 315, 383
- Hastings, Warren, 470
- Hebrew Language Committee, 436
- Henry VIII, England, 258
- Heraclius, 119
- heresy, 253
- Hermogen, Bishop, 504
- Herod, 8
- Herzegovina, 506
- Herzl, Theodore, 438, 445, 452
 - Der Judenstaat*, 448
- Hess, Moses
 - Rome and Jerusalem*, 454
- Higher Arab Committee
 - general strike, 727

- Hijaz Arabs, 122
- Hijra, 148
- Hilfsverein der deutschen Juden, 433
- Hindenberg, Marshall, Germany's Chief of Staff, 547
- Hinduism, 6, 469
- Hirsch, 390
- Hitler, Adolf, 695
 - absolute power, 770
 - biography, 595
 - chancellor, 635
 - Evian Conference, 792
 - Mein Kampf*, 192, 562, 743
 - sources of ideas, 616
 - Messianic vision, 600
 - plot against, 795
 - temporary blindness, 599
- Hoare, Samuel, UK, 721
- Hoare-Laval plan, 724
- Hobbes, Thomas, 297
- Hoffman, Melchior, 257
- Holdheim, Samuel, 371
- Hollywood anti-Nazi League, 661
- Holmes, Major Frank
 - Arabian concession, 698
- Holocaust, 147
- Holy Alliance, 346
- Holy Roman Empire, 168, 214
 - dissolution, 344
- Holy Spirit, 35
- Holy Year Missionary Exhibition, 581
- Homestead Act, 464
- Hong Kong, 473
- Honorius, 52
- Hore-Belisha, Minister, British Cabinet, 770
- Hormuz, 280
- Hottentots in police corps, 477
- House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC), 658
- House of Commons 'Lobby political journalists, 718
- Hovevei Zion, 445
- HUAC. See House Committee on Un-American Activities
- Hughes, William Australian Foreign Minister, 784
- Huguenots, 271, 476
- humanism, 294
- Huns, 65, 511
- Huss, John, 229
- Hussites, 230
- Hutter, Jacob, 257
- Huxley, Thomas H., 424

- Ibn Saud, 697
 - King of Saudi Arabia, 705
- Ignatiev, General, Russian mediator, 474

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

- Ignatius
 - Letter to the Smyrnans, 23
- Immaculate Conception
 - Crimean war, 409
- Imperial Conference, Britain, 748
- Importance of Anglo-Japanese Friendship, The, 724
- Incas
 - destruction of empire, 244
- India, 280
 - reconstruction, 468
- Indian Mutiny, 468
- Indian National Congress, 712
- Indo China, 420
- indulgences, 246
- Industrial Revolution, 348
- Inquisition, 343
 - in Castile, 236
 - into Heresy, Roman, 270
 - Spanish, 240
- Institute for the Study of the Social Consequences of War
 - training of revolutionaries, 512
- Inter-Church Conference on Federation, 501
- International Congregational Council, First, 496
- International Missionary Conference, 566, 682, 700
- Tambaram, 732
- International Missionary Council, 573, 576
- IPC. See Iraq Petroleum Company
- Iraq Petroleum Company (IPC), 705
- Ireland
 - collaboration with Germany, 516
- Irenaeus, 253
 - Against the Heresies*, 23
- Irish Free State, 712
- Irish Republican Army
 - outlawed, 765
- Isabella, Castile, 240
- Islam, 4, 117, 121, 337, 504
 - division, 159, 197
 - Mongol conversion, 207
 - Shi'ite, 160
 - Sunni, 160
- Israel ben Eliezer (Besht), 382
- Israel, State of, 145, 384, 450
- Istanbul, 242
- Italian Concordat*, 622
- Italian Provinces
 - uprising, 73
- Italy
 - invasion of Abyssinia, 669, 720
 - invasion of Libya, Holy war, 502
- Ivan III, Russia, 305
- Ivan IV (The Terrible), 301
- Jabneh yeshiva, 10
- Jackh, Ernest, 492
- Jacobin coup d'etat, 338
- Jacobson, Israel, 386
- James Mayer de Rothschild Hospital (Palestine), 411
- Jansenists, 293
- Japan, 414, 713
 - Civil war, 416
 - occupation of Manchuria, 669
 - seals borders, 415
 - Treaty of London, 514
 - war with Germany, 509
- Japanese immigration
 - total US ban, 714
- Japanese residents
 - US discrimination, 714
- Jay Treaty (1796), 355
- Jefferson, Thomas, 318
- Jehovah's Witnesses, 497, 565, 634
- Jenner, Edward
 - smallpox, 373
- Jerome, 6
- Jerusalem, 3, 134
 - focus for Judaism, 426
 - occupation of, 525
 - siege of, 9
- Jesuits, 282, 289, 419
 - demise, 311
 - re-establishment, 343
 - South America, 377
 - Thailand, 301
- Jesus, 5, 76, 127, 578
 - Christ, 4
 - Son of God, 7
 - Word, 38
- Jew Bill, The, 439
- Jewish Charter
 - Boleslav, 218
- Jewish Film producers, 467
- Jewish question, 447
 - the Great War, 514
- Jewish Question, 650
- Jewish Reform Congregation of Berlin, 392
- Jewish Religious Union, 684
- Jewish revolt, 9
- Jewish State, 144, 448, 587
- Jewish Territorial Association, 493
- Jews, 96, 432, 492
 - acculturation, 391
 - BiraBidzhan, 664
 - Conference in Philadelphia, 441
 - Conference of Cleveland, Ohio, 441
 - definition, 660
 - emancipation, 370
 - expulsion from England, 222
 - expulsion from Spain and territories, 242
 - Faith not nationality, 341
 - financial empires, 313
 - financiers, 220
 - integration, 341
 - national home, 447
 - pawnbroking, 220
 - Poland, 385
 - return to Palestine, 405
 - Russian, 662
 - serfdom, 307
 - surnames, 340
 - terror campaign against, 641
- Jinnah, Muslim leader, India, 778
- Joan of Arc, 605
- Jochanan ben Zakkai, 10
- John, King
 - pope's vassal, 219
- Johnson Debt-Default Act, 725
- Joint Boycott Council, US, 661
- Joseph II of Austria
 - Toleranzpatent*, 315
- Josephus, 10
- Jovian, 64
- Jubilee and Holy Year
 - plague, 236
- Judaism, 6
 - Ashkenazim, 380
 - Conservative stream, 380
 - evolution of, 372
 - extent, 29
 - in Khazar Khanate, 183
 - Orthodox stream, 380
 - reform movement, 380
 - Reform stream, 380
 - Sephardim, 380
- Judaizers, 305
- Judham, 122
- Julian, 60
- Julius Caesar, 74
- jurors, 333
- justification, 134
- Justinian, 108
- Kabbalah, 314
 - Sefer ha Zohar, 314
- Kant, Immanuel, 386
- Karl, Emperor of Austria, 547
- Kartashev, Professor Anton
 - religious liberty, 541
- Kavadh, 119
- Kellog, US Sec. of State, 623
- Kellog-Briand Pact, 623
- Khadijah, 123
- Khagan Bulan, 183
- Khalid, 157
- Khanate of Baku
 - oil, 401
- Khazar Khanate, 113, 182

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

- Kilwa (Tanganyika), 280
 Kimberley diamonds, 480
 King, Dr. Henry, 688
 King/Grane report, 689
 Kitchener, Lord, 510, 697
 Knatchbull-Hugessen, Japanese
 Ambassador, 757
 Knights Templars, 222
 Knox, John, 298
 Komzit, 665
 Kook, Rabbi Avraham Yitzhak
 Hacohen, 457
 Koran. See Qur'an
 Korea
 Emperor abdicates, 714
 Japanese annexation, 714
 Ku Klux Klan, 466
 re-establishment, 617
 Kulturkampf, 429
 Kurds, 491
 Kuwait, 488
- LaFarge, Fr. John, 798
Interracial Justice, 786
 Lansing, US Secretary of State
 Robert, 553
 Lateran Council
 Third, 219
 Fourth, 217
 Fifth, 245
Lateran Treaty, 575, 589
 Latin America
 independence, 378
 rape of, 275
 Lausanne Conference, 695
 Lavatar, Johann Caspar, 383
 Law Against the Overcrowding of German Schools, 653
 Law Concerning Admission to the Legal Profession, 653
 Law for the Protection of German
 Blood and German
 Honour, 660
 Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, 652
 Law of Teruel, 186
 League of Nations, 539, 549
 League of the Virtuous, The, 123
Lebensraum, 748
 Ledochowski, Wladimir, 681
 Superior General of the Jesuit order, 786
 Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm, 297
 Lenin, Vladimir Ilyich Ulyanov, 520 peace appeal, 542
 Lenoir, Etienne
 gas driven engine, 483
 Leo III, Emperor, 170
 Leo IV, Emperor, 174
 Leopold, Austria, 334
- Lex Salica, 105
 Lilienthal, Rabbi Max, 394
 Lincoln, Abraham, 365 emancipation of slaves, 466 recolonization, 466
 Literary Society, 578
Lives of the Saints, 95
 Livingstone, Dr. David, 479
 LJS. See London Jews Society
 Lloyd-George, David, 374, 689
 Chancellor of the Exchequer, 516
 LMS. See London Missionary Society
 Locke, John
Essay Concerning Human Understanding, 302
 Logos, 12, 39
 Lombards, 112
 London Jews Society (LJS), 402
 London Missionary Society
 (LMS), 402, 477
 Louis II, king of Barvaria, 376
 Louis IX, France, 207
 Louis Philippe, king of France, 373
 Louis XIII, of France, 299
 Louis XVI, France, 329 execution of, 335
 Louis, King of France, 226
 Lowenstamm, 389
 Loyola, Ignatius, 289
The Book of Spiritual Exercises, 290
 Ludendorff, General, 598
 Lueger, Karl, 596
 Luftwaffe, 668
 air parity with UK, 717
 Lunn, Henry
Review of the Churches, 496
 Luther, Martin, 290
An Appeal to the Ruling Class of German Nationality, 261
 biography, 259
Ninety-five theses, 247
The Freedom of a Christian, 261
The Pagan Servitude of the Church, 258, 261
 Lutheran Confession of faith, 262
 Lutheran World Federation, 496
- Ma'rib dam, 122
 MacDonald, Ramsay, UK PM, 702
 Maginot Line, 741
 Magna Carta, 278
 Magnes, Dr. J.L., 732
 Mahatma Gandhi, 374
 Mahmud, 232
 Maimonides, 139, 147, 184, 383, 807
Book of the Commandments, 186
Commentary on the Mishnah, 186
Guide of the Perplexed, 193
- The Law of Kings and Their Wars*, 610
Thirteen Articles of Faith, 440
 Maisky, Ivan, Soviet
 Ambassador, 798
 Mali, 278
 Malthus, Robert, 423
The Principle of Population as it affects the Future Improvement of Society, 353
 Mameluke. See Mamluks
 Mamluks, 216, 337
 Manes, 6, 27
Manifesto of the Italian Race, 790
 Mannheimer, Isaac, 392
 Manoel, Portugal, 243
 Mao Tse-tung, 715
 Marcion, 22
 Marialis Cultus, 24
 Mariology, 129, 401
 Marius professional army, 73
 Marks, David Woolf, 393
 Marsiglio
Defensor Pacis, 226
 Martin of Tours, 106
 Marx, Karl, 363, 368, 597 human relation to nature, 369
Manifesto, 374
 Marxism, 540
 Mary bodily assumption, 107 elevation of, 195
 immaculate conception, 195,
 292
 Mother of God, 43
 Queen of Heaven, 44
 veneration of, 43
 Mary Stuart, 292
 Mary Tudor, Queen, 259 master race, 597
 Maurice, 114
 Max, Prince of Baden, 547, 599
 May Laws, 436
 Mayer, Louis B., 658
 Mayflower, 294
 Mayr, Captain Karl, 601
 Mazarin, Cardinal Jules, 299
 Mazzini, Guiseppe, 362, 374
 MCA. See Muslim Christian Association
 McMahon letter, 515
 Mecca, 106, 115, 134
 focal point for Islam, 699
 Medina, 117
 Meiji, Emperor, 417
Mein Kampf. See Hitler, Adolf
Memorandum of Principles, 707
 Mendelssohn, Moses, 315
Jerusalem, 315, 383

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

- Menorah Society, US, 683
 Menzies, Robert, Attorney General, Australia, 784 messiah, 127, 314
 Messianic Age, 383, 457, 527
 messianism, 389
 Methodist Ecumenical Conference, 495
 Metternich Prince, Austria, 347
 Mexico, 413
 Middle East, 686
 Miklas, Austrian President, 771
 Mill, John Stewart
 Principles of Political Economy, 374
 Mishna, 21
 Mithraism, 24
 Mombasa, 280
 Mongols, 216
 Monophysite rebellion, 103
 Monophysites, 122, 127
 monothelism, 161
 Montagu, Lily, 683
 Montefiore, Moses, 360, 405
 Moravian Church, 231
 More, Sir Thomas, 259
 Mormons, 497
 Mortara, Edgardo, 432
 Moscow, 234
 Rome of the East, 238
 Moses, 102
 Mott, Dr John R., 499
 Mozambique, 280
 Mu'tazilites, 200
 Muhammad, 116, 127, 806
 biography, 123
 Christ's virgin birth, 128
 Jesus' delegated authority, 129 judgement, 131 messages to kings, 119 ministry, 124
 resurrection, 129 status of Mary, 129
 total submission, 133
 Muhammad Abduh, 704
 Muhammad Ali
 Pasha of Egypt, 406
 Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab, 504
 Muhammad ibn Qasim, General, 231
 Muhammad V, Sultan, of Turkey, 490
 Muir, William
 Life of Muhammad, 504
 Munich Agreement, 803
 Munro, Sir Thomas, 470
 Munzer, Thomas, 257, 290
 Muratorian Canon, 23
 Muslim Brotherhood, 704
 Muslim Christian Association (MCA), 578
 Muslim Conference, Jerusalem (1931), 704
 Muslim invasion of India, 231
 Muslim League, India, 504, 505
 Mussolini, Benito, 559, 573, 613
 mustard gas, 548
 Nanak, 469
 Nanking
 fall, 763
 Napoleon Bonaparte, 336, 380
 defeat at La Rothiere, 342
 First Consul of France, 338
 Islam, 337
 president of the Italian Republic, 340 religious tolerance, 338 revocation of emancipation law, 353
 Waterloo, 342
 Napoleon, Louis, 368
 President of France, 374 nation of shopkeepers, 511
 National Assembly, 332
 National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 620
 National Conference of Christians and Jews, 620
 National Council (Va'ad Leumi), 577
 National Library in Jerusalem, 436
 National Socialist German Workers' (Nazi) Party. See Nazis national strike
 Berlin, 598
 native priests, 582
 Navaho, 463
 Navigation and Trade Acts enumerated goods, 320
 Nazi boycott movement, Poland, 651
 Nazis, 603
 Nazis' Racial Policy Office, Milan, 785
 Necker, 330
 Negroes
 disenfranchised, 619
 Nehru, Hindu leader, India, 778
 Nelson, Horatio, 337
 Copenhagen Harbour battle, 354
 Nestorian Church, 94, 122, 123, 127, 281
 Neutrality Act, USA, 720
 New Deal, 639
New Jewish Statute (1835), 372
 Newton, John
 slaver turned clergyman, 352
 Newton, Sir Isaac, 302
 Nicene Creed, 36
 Nicholas I, Russia, 400 restriction of Jewish rights, 372
 Nicholas II, Russia, 458
 Niemoller, Martin, 650
Night Journey. See Qur'an
 Night of the Long Knives, 675
 Nikon, 306
 Nobel, Alfred, 446
 North America, 320
 North China famine, 580
 North Vietnam, 419
 Numidia, 70
 Nuremberg Laws, 660
 Obadiah, 183
 Octavian
 Caesar Augustus, 75
 Odoacer, 98
 Oil. See petroleum oil blockade, 517
 oil embargo against Italy, 725
 Old Catholic Church, 429
 Oldham, Bishop, 683
 Oleg
 Principality of Russia, 180
 Olga, Princess of Russia, 181
 OPEC. See Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries opium war, 473
 Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), 708
 Origen, 25
 Orthodox Church, 410
 Otto I, 180
 Ottoman Empire, 301, 506, 560
 Owen, Robert, 375
 Pacelli, Eugenio, 591, 624
Pact of Steel, 784
 Pact of 'Umar, 166
 Palestine, 642
 mandated to Britain, 588
 Martial Law, 735
 partition, 738, 753
 settlement, 459
 Palestine Arab Executive, 578
 Palestine Land Development Co., 492
 Paley, William
 Bridgewater Treatises, 423
 Natural Theology, 423
 pallium, 226
 Pan Islamic revival, 515
 Pan-Germanism, 596
 papal court removal to Avignon, 222

- Papal documents
A Quo Primum, 308
Bull of excommunication against Freemasons, 343
Capitulatio de partibus Saxoniae, 175
Casti Connubii, 626
Corpus Juris Civilis, 170
Decree of Pope St. Damasus, 68
Divini Illius Magistri, 626
Divini Redemptoris, 677, 742
Exsurg Domine, 261
Humani Generis Unitas, 787
Mirari vos, 362
Mit Brennender Sorge, 674, 742
Mortalium Animos, 575, 622
Non abbiamo bisogno, 632
Nos es mvy, 677
Oath Against the Errors of Modernism, 500, 647
Quas Prima, 592
Rerum Ecclesiae, 582, 624
Rominus Pontifex, 240
Syllabus of Errors, 425
 papal infallibility, 368
Turbato Corde, 221
papal infallibility, 427
Papal Note, 585
papal states, 362
Parousia, 14
Pascal, Blaise, 297, 300
Passfield White Paper, 659 patents, 483
Patrick, 164
Paul, 5, 6, 13
Peace of Amiens, 340
Peace of Augsburg, 270
Peace of Bologna, 336
Peace of London, 506
Peace of Paris, 431
Peace of Westphalia, 272
Peace without Victory, 514 peasant proprietorship, 375
Peasants' Revolt, 257, 261
Peel Report, 738, 752
Peel, Lord, 662, 736
Peiping (Peking)
 fall, 763
Pelagius
 Pelagian heresy, 84 penance, 25, 167
Penn, William, 299
people of the book, 21, 132
Perry, Commodore arrival in Edo, 416
Persia, 113
 British control, 690
Peru, 276
Peter the Great, Russia, 304
Peter's Pence, 171 petrol driven vehicles, 483 petroleum, 484, 686
 Ontario, 461
 Pennsylvania, 461
 Rumania, 460
 Saudi Arabia, 708
 synthetic gasoline, 636
 Trinidad, 461
 Turkey, 514
Philby, H St. J., 705
Philby, Jack
 Socal and IPC, 707
Philby, Kim, double agent, 707
Philip II of France, 205
Philip IV, King of France, 222
Philip, Rev. Dr. John, 477
Philo, 12, 13
Picquart, Colonel Georges, 438
Pilgrim Fathers, 288
Pilsudski, Marshal, 559, 592
Pinsker, Leon, 445
 Autoemancipation, 453
Pippin, 172
Pitt, William, 339
Pittsburgh Platform, 443, 495
Platonism, 12
Poitiers battle, 171
Poland, 309, 591
 partition, 384
 religious tolerance, 217
 Republic of, 592
Polish concordat, 592 polygamy, 381
Pompey, 3, 74
Pope, 270
 adoption of title, 57
 Agatho, 162
 Alexander V, 228
 Alexander VI, 243
 Alexander VII, 301
 Benedict XIV, 254, 308
 Benedict XV, 212, 521, 565, 608
 Boniface III, 222
 Celestine I, 165
 Clement IV, 221
 Clement VII, 228
 Clement XIV, 311, 312
 Eugene IV, 234
 Felix III, 104
 Felix V, 234
 Gelasius I, 104
 Gregory, 106
 Gregory III, 171
 Gregory XI, 227
 Gregory XIII, 272, 293
 Gregory XVI, 362
 Honorius, 161
 Honorius IV, 221
 Innocent III, 218
 Innocent X, 300
 John XXII, 226
 John XXIII, 229
 Julius II, 244, 258
 Leo X, 245
 Leo XII forbids vaccination, 373
 Leo XIII, 429, 435
 Martin I, 161
 Martin V, 230
 Nicholas II, 181
 Nicholas V, 287
 Paul III, 312
 Paul IV, 271, 312
 Pius IX, 425
 Pius V, 271
 Pius VI, 336, 338
 Pius VII, 339
 Pius X, 456, 500
 Pius XI, 418, 586
 change of heart, 786
 Evian Conference, 791
 Sixtus IV, 241
 Stephen II, 173
 Urban IV, 218
 Urban VI, 227
 Vigilius, 111
 Zachary, 172
 Zozimus, 164
pope-in-exile, Pius VII, 339
Portugal, King of, 240
Portuguese colonization, 239
potato famine, 366
Power of the Keys, 265
predestination, 136, 295
Prepared Table of Hebrew Law
 Shulhan Arukh, 242 press barons, 765
press officer, 718
Printing
 China, sixth century, 238
Proclus, 92 prohibition, 639 prophecy, 608, 806
Protestant churches public relations jobs, 465
Protestant League, 268
Protestant work ethic, 349
Protocols of the Elders of Zion, 144, 458, 606
Prussian state concordat, 624 psychological war, 538
Public hospitals, 405
Punic Wars, 71
purgatory, 26, 114
Puritans, 294
Quakers. See Society of Friends
Quebec, 324

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

- Quebec Act, 323
- Qur'an, 121
 interpretation, 126
 Night Journey, 135, 448, 610
 sura 17:8, 685
The Cave, 191
- Rabbi of Friedberg
 Hayyim ben Bezalel, 381
- Ramanuja, 469
- Rambam, The. See Maimonides
- ransom of Christians, 367
- Rasputin, Grigory, 503
- Ravenna, 68
- Reason, 296
- rebellion
 Sicily, 374
- Reconstruction Ministry, 560
- Red Cross, 552
- Red Sea route, 337
- Reformation, 226
 power base, 256
 start of, 247
- Reformed Church, Germany, 647
- Reformed Society of Israelites, 440
- refugees
 German Catholic, 366
 Russian, 437
- Reich Chambers of Culture, 657
- Reich Church (Reichskirche), 649
 sterilisation laws, 645
- Reich Citizenship Law, 660
- Reich Concordat*, 640 secret annex, 645
- Reich, Second, 429
- relations, God to Man, 567
- Renaissance, 287
- Revelation of John, 190
- Revolutionary Tribunal, 335
- Reza Khan, Colonel minister for war, 692
- Rhinelands, 206
 German reoccupation, 725
 re-occupied, 668
- Rhodes, Cecil John, 364, 480, 556
- Ribbentrop
 German Ambassador, 763
- Richard, Lion heart, 205
- Right to Life, 679
- Rio Tinto copper mines, 731
- Risorgimento, 337, 426
- Robespierre, 335
- Rockefeller, John D., 485
- Rohm, Ernst, 603
- Roman Catholic Church
 state church, Italy, 591
 US social issues, 621
- Rome, 15, 455
 Christian community, 20
 eternal city, 89
- Rome/Byzantium split, 103, 196
- Roosevelt, Eleanor, 638
- Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, 637
- Rosebury, Lord, 556
- Rosenberg, Alfred, 603
- Rosicrucianism, 296
- Rosmini, Antonio, 374
- Rothschild, Amschel, 361
- Rothschild, Baron Louis, 729, 774
- Rothschild, Carl, 363
- Rothschild, Lionel, 364
 Liberal Cand., London, 398
- Rothschild, Major James, 609
- Rothschild, Nathan, 358 industrial growth, 363
- Rothschild, Salomon, 362
- Round Table, The, 555
- Rousseau, Jean Jaques
A Discourse on the Sciences and the Arts, 324
Emile, 324
- Royal Dutch Shell, 490, 707
- Ruhr basin, occupation, 562
- Runciman, Lord, President, Board of Trade, 792
- Ruppin, Arthur, 492
- rural and urban reform,
 US, 639
- Russell, Lord, 425
- Russia, 221, 303, 400, 435, 436, 458, 520
 closes places of worship, 682
 Comintern, 552
 Jewish revival, 372 marriage and family law, 679 police state, 633 reconciliation, 682 religious mysticism, 503 sanctity of life, 679 support for Czechs, 780
 Three Power plan, 798
- Russian Orthodox Church, 541
- Russian Revolution, 520
- Russo-Turkish War, 431
- Ryobu, 417
- Sa'id 'Abd al-Fattah al-Imam in Berlin, 762
Saadebad Pact, 760
- Saar, annexation, 667
- sacrament, 421
- Saladin, 204
- Salazar, Antonio, Premier of Portugal, 730
- Sale, George translator of Qur'an, 120
- Salonika, 242
- Salt Lake City, Utah, 497
- Salvation Army, 497
- Samuel, 148
- Samuel, Sir Herbert, 588 leader, Liberal Party, UK, 717
- San Remo Conference, 588
- Sanford, Elias, 496
- Sanger, Margaret sex education, 627
- Sanhedrin
 French, 341
 Napoleon's Great, 385
- Santo Dominigo bishopric, 245
- Sanusi Brotherhood, 503
- Savior-God, 11
- Savonarola, Jerome, 244
- Savoy Declaration of Faith and Order, 299
- Sayyid 'Ali Muhammad Shirazi, 445
- Sayyid Ahmad, Sheikh, 503
- Sayyid Ahmed Khan
Essays on the Life of Muhammad, 504
- Sayyid Zia edDin Tabatabai, 692
- Schopenhauer, Arthur, 376
- SCM. See Student Christian Movement
- Second (Baptist) Confession, 422
- secret treaties published, 542
- Selden, George four-stroke engine, 483
- Seljuks, 232
- Senate Munitions Committee, 720
- Seneca, 6
- September massacre, 334
- Serbia, 506
- Serbo-Turkish War, 431
- Serbs, 560
- Sergius, 161
- Servetus, Michael
 Doctrine of the Trinity, 266
- Seven Years War, 321
- Shabbateanism, 314
 Shabbetai Zevi, 382
- Shaftsbury, Earl of, 405
- Sharp, Granville, 352
- Shell. See Royal Dutch Shell
- Sherman Anti Trust Act, 486
- Shinto, 713
 new state religion, 417
- Shirer, William L.
The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich, 780
- Siege of Sebastopol, 409
- Sigismund
 King of Germany, 229
- Sikh religion, 469
- Silver, Rabbi Hillel, 657
- Simon, Sir John, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 716
- Sinn Fein, 765
- Sino-Japanese clash (1937), 757
- Sisebut, 117

- slave rulers, 286
- slaves, 282
 - African, 283
 - baptism, 283
 - last slave caravan (1929), 365
 - rebellion at Basra, 354
 - revolt of mulattos and freed slaves, St. Domingue, 352
 - slave trade, 350
 - slave uprising, St. John, 351
- SMC. See Supreme Muslim Council
- Smith, Adam, 352
 - An Inquiry into the nature and causes of the Wealth of Nations*, 325
 - The Theory of Moral Sentiments*, 326
- Society for Culture and the Scientific Study of the Jews, 388
- Society for the Abolition of Slavery, 352
- Society of Friends
 - Chief Principles of the Society of Friends*, 299
 - exclusion of slavers, 366
- Society of Jesus. See Jesuits
- Sodalitium Pianum, 502
- Soderblom, Archbishop Nathan, 564
 - Movement for International Friendship, Reconciliation, Life and Work, 569
- soil conservation, US, 638
- Sokolow, Nahum, 652
- Songhai Kingdom, 280
- Sorskii, Nil, 305
- South America, 377
 - migration, 378
- Soviet Union. also see Russia
 - anti-Zionist campaign, 664
- Spain, 430
 - civil war, 669, 730
 - republic, 720
- Spartacists, 598
- Spartacus
 - revolt of gladiators, 74
- special trade committee, 751
- Spinoza, Benedict (Baruch), 297, 390
- St. Peters
 - reconstruction, 245
- Stalin, Joseph, 579
 - purges, 633
- Stamford-Binet scales of intelligence, 617
- Standard Oil Company, 465, 485, 687
 - 50 yr concession, Persia, 692
 - later Exxon, 705
- Statute of Westminster*, 711
- Steinhardt, Rabbi Menahem Mendel
 - Words of a letter*, 386
- Steinheim, 390
- sterilization, 629
- sterilization laws, 620
- Stewart, Rev. James
 - Hints for a General Union of Christians for prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit*, 493
- Stilicho, 68
- Stoicism, 6
- Strakosch, Sir Henry, 777
- Strauss, David
 - validity of Gospels, 391
- Stresa Front, 717
- Stuart, Mary, 292
- Student Christian Movement, 498
- Sturm-Abteilung, 603
- submarine warfare, 519
- Suez Canal Company, 409
- Sulaiman, 170
- Sulamith*, 386
- Sun Yat Sen, Dr., 581
- Supreme Muslim Council (SMC), 578, 727
- Sviatoslav, 181
- swastika, 595
- Switzerland, neutrality, 342
- Sykes-Picot Agreement, 515, 686
- syncretism, 12, 22
- Synod of Dort, 295
- Tai-tsung, 158
- Talleyrand, 342
- Talmud, 11, 383
 - Babylonian, 108
- Tang Dynasty, 158
- Tea Act, 323
- Ten Commandments, 142
- Tenochtitlan
 - destruction, 276
- Tertullian, 630
- Test Act, 424
- Tetzl, Johann, 247
- Teutonic Knights, 234
- Thailand, 419
- Theodoric, 104
- Theodosius II, 93
- Theosophical Society, 497
- Theotokos, 43, 91
- Thirty Years War, 272
- Thule Society, 602
- Tikhon, Metropolitan of Moscow, 542
- Times*
 - credibility, 729
 - voice of the British government, 757
- tobacco, 473
- Toledo Statute, 237
- Torah, 142
- Mishneh, 186
- trade routes, ocean, 239
- trade treaties, with Russia, 561
- Transfer Agreement, 735, 769
 - banking and trading house, 661
 - Ha'avara, 656
- transubstantiation, 114
- Trdat III, of Armenia, 431
- Treaty of Brest Litovsk, 591
- Treaty of Locarno, 711
- Treaty of London, 406, 512
- Treaty of Nanking, 473
- Treaty of Riga, 592
- Treaty of Saigon, 420
- Treaty of Sevres, 559, 690
- Treaty of the Scheldt, 335
- Treaty of Tordesillas, 243
- Treaty of Unkiar Skelessi, 404
- Treaty of Versailles, 549, 556
- Trinitarian doctrine, 24, 25, 32, 127, 421, 568, 671
- Trinitarians, 65
- Trotsky, Leon, 521
- Turgot, 330
- Turkey
 - Abolition of Caliphate, 696
- Turkish Petroleum Company, 490
 - See* Iraq Petroleum company, 705
- 'Udhra, 122
- Uganda
 - Civil war, 458
 - Jewish State, 456
- Ultramontaniam, 418, 426
- 'Umar ibn al-Khattab, Caliph, 153
- unification of Ireland and Britain, 339
- Union of [Eastern European] Orthodox Rabbis, US, 683
- Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 442, 495
- Union of Liberal Religious Jews in Holland, 684
- Union of Utrecht, 496
- Unitarian, 94, 310
- Unitarian churches, 671
- United States, 339, 439. See also
 - America
 - arms sales, 758
 - Civil War, 414, 424
 - dispatch of troops, 526
 - interests, 517
 - Judaic reform, 439
 - KnowNothing Party, 377
 - New Israel, 468
 - oil companies, 516
 - race hatred, 466
 - recognition of Soviet Union, 639
 - refugees
 - Irish Catholic, 366

INDEX TO VOLUME I & II

- resumption of refugee admissions, 789
- war with Germany, 520
- US Northwest Territory Ordinance*, 463
- usury, 219
- Va'ad Leumi. See National Council
- Valentinian III, 86
- Valignano, Allessandri, 415
- Van Asseldonck, Fr. Anton, 572
- Vandals, 84
- Vansittart, Sir Robert
 - Foreign Office, 719
- Vatican, 4, 338, 343, 502, 525, 573
 - Concordat with Italy, 585
 - moral approval of Hitler's policies, 645
 - power politics, 612
 - Sistine Chapel, 244
 - slavery, 367
- Vatican Council, first, 23, 427
- Vatican Council, second, 421
- Victor Emmanuel III, Italy, 456, 573
- Victoria, Queen, of England, 471
- Vienna, 362
- visionaries, 604
- Vitkowitz
 - German offer to buy Works, 782
 - Iron and steel works, 729
- Vladivostok, 474
- Volksicher Beobachter*, 605
- Voltaire (Francois Marie Arouet), 324
- von Harnack, Adolf, 511
- von Papen, Franz, 634
- von Schuschnigg, Kurt,
 - Austria, 716
 - house arrest, 773
- von Sebottendorff, Rudolf Freiherr, 602
- Wagner, Richard
 - composer, 376
 - Ring Cycle, 510
- Wahhabis, 697
- Wahhabism, 504
- Wailing Wall, ownership, 702
- Wali Allah, Shah, 504
- Wall Street crash, 701, 706
- Wallace, Alfred, 423
- war crimes, 552
- Warner, Harry, 468
- Washington, George, 323
 - first president, USA, 327
- WASP. See WhiteAnglo-Saxon Person
- Watchtower Society, The. See Jehovah's Witnesses
- Watchtower, The*, 498
- Wayland, Rev. Francis
 - The Elements of Political Economy*, 465
- WCC. See World Council of Churches
- Webb, Sidney (Lord Passfield), 702
- Weimar Republic, 563, 600
- Weizmann, Dr. Chaim, 516, 688
 - synthetic cordite, 524
- Wesley, John, 309, 352
- Wesseley, Naftali Herz, 383
- West Indies, 242
- Westfield Committee, 755
- Westminster Confession, 298, 422
- Westphalia, 386
- Weygand, General, 592
- whaling, 460
- Wilberforce, William, 352
- Wilfrid of York, 168
- William I, Germany, 429
- William of Ockham, 226
- William the Conqueror, 278
- William, Prince of Hesse-Cassel, 354
- Wilson, US. President, 516, 538
- Wirth, Chancellor, 611
- Wisdom, 12
- Wisdom of Solomon, 12
- Wise, Isaac Mayer, 441
- Wise, Rabbi, 657
- Wittenberg, 257
- Witwatersrand gold, 482
- Wolf, German Consul
 - Heinrich, 642
- Wolf, Joseph, 386
- Wolsey, Thomas, 258
- women's suffrage, 638
- Woodhead Commission, 778
- Woodhead, Sir John, 772
- working hours, maximum, US, 638
- workmen's compensation, US, 638
- World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches, 564
- World Conference on Faith and Order, 564, 566, 572
- World Conference on Life and Work, 572
- World Congress of Faiths, 731
- World Council of Churches, 40, 501, 569, 676, 755, 783, 797
- World Gold Standard, 639
- World Presbyterian Alliance, 495
- World Union for Progressive Judaism (WUPJ), 683
- World Zionist Organization, 450, 492, 652, 653
 - Twentieth Congress, 758
- World's Parliament of Religions, 499
- World's Student Christian Federation, 499
- Wright brothers, 484
- Wu Peifu, 580
- WUPJ. See World Union for Progressive Judaism
- Wycliffe, John, 229
- WZO. See World Zionist Organisation
- Xavier, Francis, 281
- Yahwism, 12
- Yellow Peril, 585
- YMCA. See Young Mens' Christian Association
- Young Men's Christian Association, 498
- Young Plan*, 711
- Younghusband, Sir Francis, 732
- Yugoslavia, 747
- Zaddik (Rebbe), 382
- Zealots, 8
- Zeno, 104
- Zionism, 382, 447, 683, 685
- Zionist Congress
 - First, 448, 452
 - Sixteenth, 702
 - Seventeenth, 703
- Zionist Federation of Britain, 516
- Zionist Federation of Germany (ZvFD), 652
- Zionist Organization, 688
- Zionist settlement, 492
- Zionist State of Israel, 666
- Zohar, 383
- Zoroastrianism, 6, 26
- Zunz, Leopold
 - Judaism as a science, 371
- ZvFD. See Zionist Federation of Germany
- Zwingli, Ulrich, 257

INDEX TO VOLUME III

This index is provided for information only. Page numbers refer to the printed 2000 edition.

- Abandoned Areas Ordinances, 1517, 1585
- Abdullah Al-Tariki, Saudi Arabian minister, 1723
- Abdullah, King, 1532
- Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Commission, 1559
- Aborigines Protection Board, 1557
- Acheson, Dean, 1457, 1460
 - Secretary of state, US, 1596
- Acheson-Lilienthal Report, 1471
- Achille Lauro*, hijacking, 1863
- active nonalignment, 1681
- AFC. = America First Committee
- Afghanistan, 1821
- African National Congress, 1721
 - banned, 1737
- Afro-American oppression, 1575
- Albright, Madeleine, US Sec. of State
 - invitations to Arabs & Muslims, 1851
- Aleksei II, Patriarch
 - Russian Orthodox, 1598
- Alexandria Protocol*, 1288
- Alexius, Patriarch of Russia, 1396
- Alfonzo, Perez, Venezuelan oil minister, 1723
- Algeria
 - independence, 1737
- Allende, Salvadore, Chilean President, 1780
 - killed, 1783
- Allied war crimes investigations units, 1349
- alternative scenarios for WW2, 1626
- America First Committee (AFC), 1083, 1104
- American Council for Judaism, 1215
- American Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA), 1460
- American Jewish Committee
 - UN consultant, 1323
- American Jewish Conference, 1252
- American Jewish Congress
 - UN consultant, 1323
- American Joint Distribution Committee, 1085
- American oil industry, 1772
- American Volunteer Air Force, China, 1159
- American Zionist Emergency Council, 1352
- ANC. = African National Congress
- Anderson, Capt. Walter S.
 - US Naval Intelligence, 1092
- Anglo-American arms supply mission, 1154
- Anglo-American Committee, 1448
- Anglo-Burmese wars, 1431
- Anglo-Egyptian Treaty, 1451
- Anglo-French forces
 - UN call for withdrawal, 1714
- Anglo-Japanese trade alliance discussion, 974
- Anglo-Russian weapons agreement, 1254
- Angola
 - proclaimed a republic, 1798
- Anti-boycott Office, 1589
- anti-Hitler movement, 1270
- Anti-Nazi Council (ANC), 1028
- Anti-Nuclear Movement, 1651
- anti-trust laws
 - exemptions, 1786
- ANZUS Treaty
 - NZ exclusion, 1824
- Aoun, General, 1871
- Apartheid, 1518
 - crime against humanity, 1782
- legislation repealed, 1825
- Arab Cooperation Council, 1866
- Arab Higher Command, 1487
- Arab League, 1484, 1486, 1589
 - emergency session, 1870
- Arab Legion, 1677
- Arab Liberation Army, 1483
- Arab question, 1229
- Arab Socialist Resurrectionist Party (ASRP), 1667
- Arab states
 - lack of cohesion, 1486
- Arab States Conference, Cairo
 - Alexandria Protocol*, 1288
- Arabs
 - aims, 1051
- Arafat, Yasir, 1780, 1854
 - meets Pope, 1822
- Aramco, 1484
- Arita Hachiro
 - Japanese Foreign Minister, 911
- Arita-Craigie Agreement, 952
- armistice
 - Korean War, 1617
- arms embargoes circumvented, 1485
- arms race, 1255, 1470
- Armstrong, Neil
 - giant leap for mankind, 1765
- Arya Samaj, 1428
- ASRP. See Arab Socialist Resurrection Party
- Assembly of Cardinals and Archbishops, 1394
- Association of Shinto Shrines, 1408
- Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, 1400, 1573
- Aswan High Dam, Egypt, 1668
- Athanasian Creed, 1699
- Athanasius, 1699
- Atlantic Charter, 1055, 1143

- Atlee, Clement, UK PM, 1361 atomic bomb, 954, 1331
 final test, 1340
 joint development, 1253 atomic explosion, first, 1358 atomic research secrecy, 1300 atomic weapon monopoly, 1242
Attlee Plan
 Arab resettlement, 1292
 Aung San, 1433
 assassination, 1434
 Auschwitz
 destruction of evidence, 1298
 first death camp, 1142
 Austin, Ambassador Warren, 1484
 Australia
 Aboriginal relations, 1557 bases for US operations, 1196 forced child removal, 1558 geographic location, 1814
 Jewish migration policy, 1221 mineral resources, 1814 political relationships, 1814
 Terra Nullus, 1586
 transit base to Asia, 1814
 Australia, New Zealand, US treaty
 (ANZUS), 1655
 Australian Army
 testing US and UK drugs, 1387
 Australian Assistance Plan, 1808
 Australian Jewish Welfare
 Association, 1221
 Australian Labour Party, 1559
 Australian Volunteers Abroad
 (1950), 1847
 Austrian State Treaty, 1621
 AZEC, 1459

 B'nai B'rith, 1086
 B'Tselem, 1866
 Ba Maw, PM, Burma, 1433
 bacteriological weapons
 US use in Korea, 1387
 Badoglio, Marshall, Italy, 1252
 Baghdad Pact, 1665, 1725
 Bagration, Operation, Russia, 1278
 Balfour Declaration, 1509
 Balkans, 1874
 Bandung Conference, 1663
 Banerjee, Surendranath, 1428
 Bangladesh, 1431
 Banka Island massacre, 1196
 Barbie, Klaus, Gestapo,
 Lyons, 1253
 Barmen Confession, 988
 Barth, Karl, 1397
 Batista, Fulgencio, Cuba, 1721

 Battle of Britain, 1083
 Bay of Pigs invasion, 1728
 Bayat, Morteza, PM, Iran, 1293
 Beck, General Ludwig conspirators against Hitler, 1006
 Becquerel, Antoine, 916
 Bede, 1831
 BEF = British Expeditionary Forces
 Begin, Menachem, 1591, 1754
 Irgun member, 1273
 Israeli PM, 1820
 Belgian Congo, 1737
 Belgium
 German occupation, 1031
 Ben Gurion, David, 1500 offensive against Arabs, 1485
 Bennett, John Sterndale, 1084
 Bentham, Jeremy
 Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation, 1367
 Berbera base, Somalia, 1817
 Bering, Vitus Jonassen, 1379
 Berit (Covenant), 1570
 Berlin
 airlift, 1537 blockade, 1472
 bombed, 1081
 opens, 1825
 Berlin Wall, 1728
 Bernadotte, Count Folke
 assassinated, 1549
 Israeli-Arab mediator, 1515
 Bevin, Ernest
 UK Foreign Min., 1361
 UK Foreign Sec., 1458, 1472
 Biafran Civil War, 1754
 Bidault, Georges, French Foreign
 Min., 1464, 1474
 Big Bang theory, 1560
 Big Three, 1319
 Biltmore Conference, US
 Zionist Conference, 1215
 Biltmore Program, 1216 birth rate
 post-war boom, 1442
 Black Codes, Sth. Carolina, 1525
 Black Panther Movement, 1761
 Blackstone, Sir William
 Commentaries, 1367
 Bliss, Kathleen
 Christian News-Letter, 1542 blitz, 1082
 blood for goods, 1276 blood money, 1591
 Blue Division, Spain, 1631
 Blue Jacket
 British decrypting service, 926

 Blum, Leon, France, 1436
 Boegner, Pastor Marc, 1076, 1382
 The Long Road to Freedom, 1224
 Boff, Leonardo, 1767
 Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, 1219
 Letters from Prison, 1397
 Book of Common Prayer rejection by parliament, 1291
 Bosnia-Herzegovina
 admission to UN, 1874
 Bosnian Muslims
 mass graves, 1876
 Bourguès-Maunoury, Interior
 Minister, France, 1685
 Boycott Coordinating Office, 1589
 boycotts against Germany, 1054
 Brandeis University, US, 1568
 Brazil, 1803
 Bretton Woods, 1278
 Brezhnev, Leonid, 1741
 Britain, 1799
 breaks Italian codes, 1110
 declaration of war, 967 detonates atomic bomb, 1614 financial crisis, 1017
 Labour Party, 1292 refusal to accept Jewish refugees, 1185
 religious relations policy, India, 1235 sanction bombing of Japan, 1356 severs relations with Japan, 1179
 war aims, 1054
 British Council of Churches, 1392
 British mandate, termination of,
 1500
 British raj, 1429
 British-Irish crisis, 1768
 Buber, Martin
 The Prophetic Faith, 1568
 Buchenwald experiments, 1181
 Budapest
 Soviet tanks enter, 1711
 Budi Utomo, Indonesia, 1437
 Bulganin, Marshall, 1668
 visits London, 1680
 Bulgaria
 purge, 1300
 Bultmann, Rudolf, 1397
 Bunche, Dr. successor to Bernadotte, 1563
 Bund Neues Vaterland, 919
 Buonaiuti, Father Ernesto, 1565
 Burma, 1431
 British annexation (1886), 1432
 Chinese Nationalist troops, 1600 granted independence, 1256

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- independence(1948), 1434
- railway, 1212
- Road closure, 1073
- Burma Independence Army (BIA), 1433
- Byrnes, James F, Sec. of State, 1344
- Cabinet Committee on Palestine partition plan, 1261
- Cairo Conference, 1267
- Câmara, Archbishop Helder, of Brazil, 1766
- Camp David, 1726, 1820, 1854
- Canada, 1787
- Canaris, Admiral
 - German Chief of Secret Police, 1117
- Cape Coloured, 1528
- Carmel College, Britain, 1568
- Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1735
- Carter, Jimmy, US President, 1854
- Casablanca Conference, 1233
- Castro, Fidel, 1721
 - expropriated refineries, 1722
- Catholic Action Movement, France, 1394
- Catholic Grail (1947), 1847
- Catholics
 - forbidden to join Communist Party, 1567, 1597
- Caydiid, General Maxamed Farax, Somalia, 1829
- CEEC. See Committee on European Economic Cooperation
- CENTO, 1725. See Central Treaty Organization
- Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), 1470, 1595
 - foreign interventions, 1889
 - monetary support, Italian elections, 1404
 - pilots ferry opium and heroin, 1603
- Central Intelligence Agency Act, 1599
- Central Treaty Organization (CENTO)
 - was SEATO, 1621
- Central Union of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith (the CV), 1053
- Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, 1881
- Charter of the United Nations, 1372
- Chase National Bank
 - loan to Germany, 977
- Chechnya, 1876
- Chelmno, Poland
 - gas chambers, 1180
- Chernobyl
 - disaster, 1824
 - nuclear reactors, 1471
- Chetniks, Serbia, 1477
- Chiang Kai-shek, 1266
 - decline in power, 1423
 - regime collapse, 1599
 - requests alliance, 1099
- Chicoms (Chinese Communist forces), 1603
- China
 - enters Korean War, 1615
 - first nuclear test, 1741
 - Gang of Four, 1820
 - Great Leap Forward, 1724
 - nuclear arsenal, 1725
- Chinats (Chinese Nationalist forces), 1603
- Christian
 - definition of, 1541
- Christian Frontier Council, 1393
- Christian names, imposition of, 1440
- Christian Peace Conference (CPC), 1544, 1623
- Christian Reconstruction of Japan, 1408
- Christianity in China, 1422
- Christian-Jewish relations, 1547
- Christians in Japan, 1421
- Christology, 1398
- Churchill, Winston, 1628
 - appeal for help, 1031
 - biography, 1025
 - first broadcast, 1033
 - reappointed to ministry post, 966
- CIA. See Central Intelligence Agency
- CIE. = Civil Information and Education Section
- Civil Information and Education Section (CIE), 1408
- Civil Liberties Directive*, 1408
- Civil Rights Act (1963), 1736
- Civil Rights Act, (1875), 1526
- Civil Rights riots (1919), 1527
- civil society organizations (CSOs)
 - Taxation disincentives, 1847
- Clark Kerr
 - British Ambassador, China, 911
- Clay, General Lucius
 - Cin C, European Command, US, 1467
- Clayton, US Undersec. of State, 1465
- Cleansing Kosovo, 1876
- Clifford, Clark
 - Special Counsel, 1490
 - US Special Assistant, 1447
- Clifford/Else paper, 1452
- Cochin-China, 1434
 - South Vietnam, 1437
- Code de l'indigenat*, 1441
- Code of Canon Law, 1738
- coercion in UN, 1512
- coercive transport of labour, 1527
- COI. See Coordinator of Information, US
- Cold War, 1255, 1379, 1511
 - end of, 1828
- collectives, Russia, 1369
- Collins, General J. Lawton
 - in Hanoi, 1663
- colonial authority waning, 1715
- Colonial Development Act, 1427
- Colonial policy, 1425
- Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee (CIOS), 1348
- comfort houses, 1196
 - for Allied occupiers of Japan, 1418
- Comfort Women, Japan, 1415
- Cominform, 1466
- Committee for German Jews, 1086
- Committee for the Preparation of Korean Independence (CPKI), 1607
- Committee of National Liberation (CLNAI) Italy, 1259
- Committee on European Economic Cooperation (CEEC), 1465
- Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, 1034
- Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), 1828
- communication advances, 1444
- Communism, 1283
 - appeal of, 1543
- Communist Manifesto, 1369
- Communist National Council of the Homeland (KRN)
 - Polish govt. in Moscow, 1282
- Communist Party of Syria, 1667
- concentration camps
 - Buchenwald, 907
 - Dachau, 907
 - Sachsenhausen, 907
- Conference of Jewish Communities in the Far East, 1087
- Congress of the World Zionist Movement, 21st., 960
- conspiracy of silence, 1045

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- Papal, 996
 - private newsletters begun, 910
 - containment policy by US
 - toward Soviet Union, 1640
- Contras, US-backed rebels, 1823
- Coordinator of Information (COI), 1593
- Coral Sea battle, 1211
- Council for Aid to Jews, Poland, 1226
- Council for Orthodox Church Affairs, 1396
- Council of Christians and Jews, UK, 1208
- Council of Nicaea, 1699
- Council of Thirteen, 1491, 1501
- Council on Foreign Relations, 1463
- Councils of Christians and Jews, 1571
- Covenant of Sinai, 1502, 1570
 - covenant theology, 1569
- CPKI. See Committee for the Preparation of Korean Independence
- Craigie, Sir Robert, British Amb. to Japan, 1073
- Creech-Jones, Colonial Sec. UK, 1479
- Crimean Jewish settlement plan, 1445
- crimes against peace, 1418
- Cripps, Sir Stafford
 - Amb to Russia, 1095
 - to India, 1209
- Cuban Missile Crisis, 1730
- Cunningham, Sir Alan, UK High Commissioner to Palestine, 1483, 1487, 1500
- Currency Transfer Tax (CTT), 1883
- Curtin, John, PM of Australia, 1203, 1262
- CV. = Central Union of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith
- Cyprus
 - attempted coup, 1801
- Czechoslovakia, 1824
 - invasion orders, 942
 - President Benes, 1328
- Dahlerus, Birger, Germany's intermediary, 959
- Damaskinos, Archbishop, Regent of Greece, 1297
- Danin, Ezra, 1490
- Darwin
 - Japanese attack, 1208
- Davies, Joseph, US Amb. to Russia, 1340
- Dayan, General Moshe, 1692, 1754, 1854
 - Chief of Staff, 1661
- Dayton Peace Accord, 1876
- de Dekker, L.P.J., Dutch Amb. to Latvia, 1090
- De Gasperi, Alcide, Prime Minister, Italy, 1403
- de Gaulle, Charles
 - French President, 1736
 - General, 1068
- de Klerk, F.W. President. Sth Africa, 1825
- Dead Sea Scrolls, 1518
- Declaration of Humanity, 1412
- Declaration of Principles, 1874
- Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, 1368
- Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, 1716
- decolonization, 1372, 1375
- Dedic, Abdullah, 1850
- Defence of India bill, 967
- Deir Yassin Massacre, 1488
- demilitarization of Japan
 - never to re-arm, 1413
- Denmark
 - German occupation, 1023
 - protection of Jews, 1259
- Depression, 1369
- Dewey, Thomas E. US, 1285
- diary of WW2, 1634
- Diaspora, 1538
- Diego Garcia, 1816
- Disarmament Summit, Geneva, 1668
- Doenitz, Admiral
 - Hitler's successor, 1335
- Domino Theory, 1314, 1601
- Donovan, William, 1592
- Doumer, Paul, GG, Indochina, 1434
- Dragonovic, Fr. Krunoslav
 - Croatia, 1253
- Drobes Plan, 1855
- Drought, Fr. James, 1103
- drug scene, 1769
- Du Bois, W.E.B., 1526
- Dubcek, Alexander, of Czechoslovakia, 1766
- Dudayev, Premier of Chechnya, 1876
- Dulles, Allen W., 1593
 - Director of CIA, 1542
 - Office of Strategic Services, 1463
 - The Marshall Plan*, 1466
- Dulles, John Foster, 1621
 - dies, 1725
 - US Sec. of State, 951, 1542
 - visit to Syngman Rhee, 1610
- Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, 1285
- Dunera*, 1387
- Dunera Scandal, 1081
- Dunkirk, evacuation, 1035
- Dutch Catholic Party, 1394
- Dutch East Indies, 1437
- Dutch Reformed Church, Sth Africa, 1529
- EAC. = European Advisory Committee
- East Timor, Portuguese, 1798
- ECA. See American Economic Cooperation Administration
- economic imperialism, 1829
- Economic Survey for 1947., 1456
- Ecumenical Committee for Refugees, Geneva, 1208
- ecumenical movement, 1505
- Eddy, William
 - Special Assistant, Sec. of State, US, 1478
- Eden, Anthony
 - reappointed to ministry post, 966
- Education Act of 1944, 1392
- Egypt, 1451, 1697
 - aid from Soviets, 1771
 - Black Saturday, 1655
 - one party Islamic Socialist State, 1682
- Einstein, Albert
 - biography, 917
 - letter to Roosevelt, 979
- Eisendrath, Rabbi Dr. Maurice, 1735
- Eisenhower, Dwight D.
 - increased majority, 1713
 - Middle East Doctrine, 1717
 - Republican nomination, 1615
 - threat to use nuclear weapons in Korea, 1615
- El Alamein, 1229
- El Alamein, Battle of, 1245
- Emergency Measures for Jewish People, Japan, 1220
- Epstein, Eliahu, Jewish Agency, 1492
- Epstein, Jacob
 - Introduction to the Original Text of the Mishnah*, 1568
- Establish Hitler's plan to exterminate the Jews in Europe, 1230
- ethnic cleansing, 1874

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- European Advisory Commission (EAC), 1264
- European Defence Community (EDC), 1622
- European Union, 1828
- Evacuation Council, Russia, 1123
- Evangelical Church in Germany (the EKD), 1399
- Evatt, Dr. H. V., 1813
- Executive Order 12333 (1981), 1602
- Exodus* 1947
 - renamed from President Warfield, 1474
- expanding universe theory, 1560
- extermination centres, 1217
- Eytan, Walter, Israeli Foreign Min., 1516
- Ezekiel, 1366
- Ezra (emigration) Society in Germany, 1086
- family law, Russia, 1281
- Far Eastern Advisory Commission (FEAC), 1380
- Far Eastern Commission (FEC), 1380
- Far Eastern Jewish Council, 1087
- Farben, I.G.
 - synthetic rubber, 982
- Farouk, King of Egypt, 1119
 - overthrown, 1656
- Fatah, 1862
- Fatima, Lady of, Portugal, 1227
- Faure, Edgar
 - Premier, France, 1670
- FBI. See Federal Bureau of Investigation
- Feast of the Immaculate Heart of Mary*, 1277
- FEC. = Far Eastern Commission
- Jedayeen*, Palestinian commando groups, 1659
- Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), 1595
- Federal Republic of Germany, 1473
- Federation of American Scientists, 1649
- Federation of Lay Training Centres, Holland, 1394
- FEJC. = Far Eastern Jewish Council
- Fermi, Enrico, 940
- feudalism, abolition, 1368
- Final solution, 1218
- Finland
 - French support, 1012
 - Paasikivi government, 1328
 - rejection of Nazi demands, 1259
 - relations with Vatican, 1041
 - Russian invasion of, 1011
- first charge principle, 1337
- Fischer, Gov. General, Warsaw, 1226
- fissionable materials monopoly, 1242
- Five Ministers' Conference, 1088
- floating property, 1366
- Flower Power generation, 1769
- FO. = Foreign Office, British
- Focus, The, 1028
- Foreign Office, British
 - peace initiative, 1069
- Forrestall, James
 - Defence Secretary, 1484
 - US Sec. for Navy, 1441, 1671
- four policemen of the world, 1241
- Four Power Declaration, 1264
- France
 - fall of, 1068
 - nuclear bomb, 1726
- Francis Cromie, Capt. Francis, 1629
- Franco-German armistice, 1040
- Frank, Dr. Hans, 971
- Fraser, Malcolm
 - appointed caretaker PM, 1811
- Free Germany movement, 1270
- Free Papua Movement (OPM), 1768
- Freeland League for Jewish Territorial Colonization
- Jews in Australia plan, 1222
- Frei, Hans, 1572
- Freire, Paulo
 - Pedagogy of the Oppressed, 1782
- French fleet
 - sinking of, 1070
- Fugu Plan, 1085
- Fuhrer Order on the Final Solution*
 - need for secrecy, 1140
- Fundamental Law of Education, Japan, 1415
- Galician Uniate Church, 1396
- Gandhi, Mohandas
 - Karamchand(Mahatma), 1428
 - assassination of, 1430
- Garnow-Alpher theory
 - Big Bang theory, 1562
- gas chambers
 - allied media silence, 1223
- Gasparri, Cardinal, 1566
- GATT. See General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade
- Gaza, 1784
- Gehlen, General Reinhard, 1594
- General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade(GATT), 1461
- General Arab Congress, Cairo, 1309
- General Assembly, UN, 1485
- German army surrender
 - Paris, 1285
- German Protestant Churches, 1397
- German-Rumanian Trade Agreement, 948
- German-Soviet Border and Friendship Treaty, 984
- German-Soviet Pact*, 957
- German-Soviet Trade Treaty, 956
- Germany
 - Allied Control Council, 1347
 - Allies post-war plans, 1302
 - attacks US shipping, 1181
 - declares war on US, 1181
 - nuclear technology, 1293
 - post-war, 1268
 - reparations, 1302
 - unconditional surrender, 1336
- Gerstein, Kurt
 - supplier, hydrogen-cyanide, 1231
- ghetto
 - Hongkew, 1229
- ghetto residents
 - fight for their lives, 1225
- Gibraltar, 1099
- Gilbert, Martin
 - Churchill A Life*, 1628
- Glasgow, George
 - Diplomacy and God*, 1194
- Glasnost, 1822
- Global Christian Forum, 1894
- Global Governance Reform Project
 - Reimagining the Future*, 1848
- Glubb, General
 - Commander, Arab Legion, 1677
- Gog and Magog
 - Order of battle, 1190
- Golden Triangle opium barons, 1603
- Golkar, 1725
- Gombos, Gyula, PM, Hungary, 1650
- Gomulka, 1704
 - released from prison, 1685
- Gorbachev, Mikhail, 1825
 - house arrest, 1827
 - Nobel Peace Prize, 1826
 - President USSR, 1822
- Government of India Act, 1427
- Grand Alliance, 1200
- grandfather laws, 1526
- Grael, Rev. John, 1474

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- Greater East Asia Conference,
Tokyo
Declaration of Principles, 1269
- Greater East Asian Co-Prosperty Sphere, 1077, 1232
- Greece, 1099
civil war, 1294
- Greek Communist Party (KKE),
1353
- Greek Orthodox Church, 1396
- Gregory of Nazianzus, 1366
- Grew, Joseph
Undersec. of State, 1344
US Amb. to Japan, 1158
- Gromyko, Andrei, Russia, 1459
- Grotius, Hugo
On the Law of Prize and Booty,
1366
- Ground Launched Cruise Missiles
(GLCMs), 1821
- Group of 77, 1740, 1809
Manila Declaration, 1880
- Groves, General Leslie
Manhattan Project, 1228
- Grynszpan, Hershel, 911
- Guadalcanal, US landings, 1220
- Guatemala, 1663
- Guevara, Ernesto (Che), 1721
- Gulf Cooperation Council, 1857
- Gulf War, 1826
- Gutiérrez, Gustavo, 1767
- H.M.G. = His Majesty's Government
- Habitat (1970s), 1847
- Hacha, President, Czech., 944
- Ha-Entsiglopedya* (Jewish and Israeli encyclopaedia), 1568
- Haganah
assists British army, 1118
- Hahn, Otto, 916
- Haig, Alexander, US Sec. of State, 1858
- Hamas, 1864
- HaPoel HaMizrachi, 1587
- Hara, Yoshimichi
Privy Council, Japan, 1158
- Harbin experiments, 1386
- Harriman, Averill, US Amb. to Moscow, 1313
- Harrison, Earl G. US investigator, 1447
- Hashomer Hatzair (Young Watchman)
Zionist kibbutz, 1229
Hasluck, Paul, Australian Min.
for Territories, 1559
- Hassan al-Bakr, Ahmad, Pres. of Iraq, 1856
- Hassan II, King of Morocco, 1769, 1854
- Havana Charter, 1461
- Heath, Edward, UK PM, 1799
- Hegel, Georg W.F., 1368
- Henderson, Sir Neville
Amb. to US, 1448
British Ambassador to Germany, 959
- Herzl, Theodore, 1585
- Hess, Rudolf
peace flight to Britain, 1115
- Heydrich, Reinhard, 971 measures to expel Jews, 925 shot, 1217
- Hezbollah
rocket attacks, 1874
Hidden Encyclical. = Humani Generis Unitas
- Higashikuninomiya, PM of Japan,
1418
- Higher SS and Police Leader
(HSSPF), 1007
- Hilfswerk, 1399
- Hilddring, General
US delegation to UN, 1479
- Hillenkoetter, Rr. Admiral Roscoe, 1595
- Himmler, Heinrich, 1141
final solution, 1270
- Hinsley, Cardinal, UK, 1226
- Hirohito, Emperor, Japan
Imperial Rescript, 1412
instruction to terminate war, 1208
- Hitler Youth Movement
members drafted, 1234
- Hitler, Adolf
aims, 1050
assassination attempt, 1008, 1281 atrocities in Russia, 1185 expected an armistice, 1063 final peace offer, 1081 his vision, 1260 invasion of Yugoslavia and Greece, 1111
looks to India, 1108 plan to invade Russia, 1110 suicide, 1316
- Hlond, Cardinal, Poland, 971
- Hluttaw* (Place of Release), Burma, 1431
- Ho Chi Minh, 1435, 1603, 1668
- Hoare, Samuel
Lord Privy Seal, Britain, 970
- Hodge, General, US, 1608
- holding pens, 1098
- Holland
German German occupation,
1031
Holst, Johan Jorgen
Norwegian Foreign Min., 1874
Hoover, President Herbert, 1614
Hopkins, Harry speaks to Marshall Stalin, 1343
Horthy, Admiral Miklos, 1650
Regent of Hungary, 1276
Hromadka, Prof. Josef, 1542, 1623
HSSPF. = Higher SS and Police
Leader
Hull, US Sec. State Cordell, 1086, 1108 human guinea pig biological warfare experiments, 1386
Human rights, 1503
Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission, 1559
Hungarian Jewish Rescue
Committee, 1276
Hungarian Jews murdered, 1277
Hungary, 1705
free elections, 1825
General Bela Miklos, 1329 limited deportation of Jews, 1275
Husayni Document, 1865
Hussein, King of Jordan, 1589 war against PLO, 1780
Hussein, Saddam, President, Iraq,
1388, 1856
Hydrogen bomb, 1255
Ibn Husayn, Abdullah, Emir of Transjordan, 1486
Ibn Saud, 1441
ICBMs. = Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles
Iceland
British occupation, 1026
ICI human guinea pig trials, 1387
Ickes, H.L.
Petroleum Admin for War, 1251
IDF. = Israel Defence Force
IGC. = Inter-Governmental Committee for Refugees
Ihud, 1217
IJA. = Imperial Japanese Army
IMC. = International Missionary Conference
Imperial Japanese Army (IJA), 1040
IMT. = International Military Tribunal
incurable patients euthanased, 1014

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- India, 1451
 - Bengal army mutiny, 1427
 - civil war, 1430
 - demands independence, 1211
 - first nuclear test, 1809
 - railway network, 1428
 - UK-US tension, 1209
 - universities established, 1428
- Indian Association of Calcutta, 1428
- Indian Independence Act, 1430
- Indian land title*, USA, 1368
- Indian National Conference (1883), 1428
- Indische Partii, 1437
- Indochina, 1434
- Indochina War, First, 1437
- Indochinese Communist Party, 1436
- Indochinese Union, 1434
- Indonesia, 1815
 - Communist Party (PKI) slaughtered, 1747
 - independence, 1437
 - nationalized oil concessions, 1723
 - production-sharing principle, 1751
 - United States of, 1439
- Industrial Objectives subcommittee, UK, 1348
- Inoue, Shigeyoshi, Admiral commander, Japanese Fourth Fleet, 1175
- Institute for Public Accuracy, 1889
- Inter-American Commission for Territorial Administration, 1075
- Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee, 1075
- Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles (ICBMs), 1620, 1729
- Interfaith Appeal of Conscience Foundation, 1877
- Inter-Governmental Committee for Refugees (I.G.C.), 1056
- intergovernmental commodity organizations, 1808
- International Committee of Catholic Charities, 1400
- International Committee on the Christian Approach to the Jews, 1510
- International Military Tribunal (IMT), 1383
- International Military Tribunal for the Far East, 1418
- International Missionary Conference
 - Tamaram, India, 921
- International Monetary Fund, 1278
- International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War, 1821
- International Prosecutions Section (IPS), 1383
- International trade agreements and treaties. Appendix B
- intifada, 1864
 - renewal, 1878
- IPC pipeline from Iraq blown up, 1713
- IPS. = International Prosecutions Section
- Iran, 1451, 1821
 - royalty crude, 1751
- Iran-Contra Affair, 1823
- Iranian Communist Party (The Tudeh), 1659
- Iraq, 1787
 - coup, 1725
 - emigrating Jews, property forfeited, 1584
 - invasion of Kuwait, 1868
 - nuclear reactor, 1865
 - oil pipeline closed, 1112
 - sanctions by Security Council, 1869
- Iraq-Iran War, 1821, 1825
- Irgun
 - Zionist extremists, 1273
- Irian Jaya, 1737
- iron curtain, 1336
- Isaac, Jules
 - Jesus and Israel*, 1568
- Isacson, Leo, 1490
- Ishii, General Shiro
 - Harbin experiments, 1386
 - research papers deal, 1386
- Islam, 1699
 - in Russia, 1534
- Islamic banking system, 1882
- Islamic Conference, 1891
- Islamic Resistance Movement, 1864
- Isma'il Pasha, 1672
- Ismail Safwat Pasha, General, 1483
- Israel, 1700
 - attacks Arab targets, 1754
 - bombing raids on Egypt, 1771
 - Establishment of State, 1501
 - UN membership, 1564
- Israel and the Covenant, 1555
- Israel Defense Force, 1858
- Israel, State of
 - central fact of the Christian Era, 1849
 - establishment, 1759
 - proclaimed, 1493
- Israel/Arab war
 - resupply, 1793
- Israeli War, 1514
- Israel-Iraq Armistice Agreement, 1582
- Italy
 - armistice, 1256
 - declaration of war, 1036
 - on Allied side, 1257
- Iwo Jima falls, 1314
- IZL. = National Military Organisation
- JAC. = Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee
- Jack, Rev. Dr. Homer A., 1735
- Jamshedpur, steel production, 1429
- Japan, 1814
 - aims, 1050
 - attempts to talk peace, 1220
 - Declaration of war, 1175
 - demilitarization of, 1413
 - economic reform, 1414
 - expels Christian missionaries, 972
 - land tenure reform, 1413
 - Ministry of Labour, 1415
 - new constitution imposed, 1413
 - occupation of Hainan Is., 940
 - peerage dissolved, 1413
 - refuge for Jews, 1259
 - religious denominations, 1421
 - trade relations with US, 1143
 - trade unions, 1415
 - war decision, 1158
- Japanese Ministry of Education, 1406
- Jarring, Gunnar, US envoy, 1772
- Jehovah's Witnesses, 1391
- Jerusalem, 1812
 - declared Israeli capital, 1581
 - Internationalized zone, 1487
- Jewish Agency
 - infiltration of UK intelligence, 1488
- Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (JAC), Russia, 1215
- Jewish Brigade Group, 1283
- Jewish Combat Organization (ZOB)
 - ghetto defence, 1233
- Jewish community
 - Iraq, 1582
- Jewish National Homeland in Palestine, 1271
- Jewish Question, 1085

INDEX TO VOLUME III

Jewish State, 1499
 Jewish State in Manchukuo, 1274
 Jews, 1749
 British army, 1043
 Croatia, 1150
 definition of, 1207 destruction of Warsaw ghetto, 1238 escape via Kobe, 1103 food rations, Poland, 1024 harrassment in Italy, 912 passports marked J, 908 support for Britain, 973 swap for Nazi prisoners plan, 1239
 wives demonstrate in Berlin, 1239
 JIC. = Joint Intelligence Committee
 Jinnah, Mohammad Ali, India, 1210, 1429
 Johnson, Lyndon, US President, 1736
 Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC), 1107, 1126
 Joliot-Curie, Frederic, 1651
 Jordan
 PLO, 1780
 Juan Carlos, King of Spain visits Israel, 1875

 Kagoshima destruction, 1389
 Kaigun Ango codes, Japan, 1286
 Kairos Document, Sth. Africa, 1823
 Kaiser Wilhelm Institute, 917
 kamikaze, 1338
 Kant, Immanuel, 1368
 Kappler, Major Herbert ordered to arrest Italian Jews, 1256
 Karmal, Babrak, 1821
 Kasemann, E., 1397
 Kauder, Richard spy network 'Max', 1536
 Kaufman, Dr. Abraham, 1087
 Kennan, George, 1613
 Kennedy, John F., 1723
 assassination, 1736
 Kennedy, Senator Robert
 assassination, 1761
 Kerr, Clark, US Amb. to China, 1102
 Kerr, Sir John, Australian Gov.-Gen. dismissed Whitlam, 1811
 KGB downgraded, 1823
 Russian security and intelligence service, 1660
 Khabarovsk

Russian war trials, 1385
 Khemlani Loans Affair, 1811
 Khomeini, Ayatollah, 1740, 1821, 1855
 Khrushchev, Nikita, 1123, 1659, 1730 condemns Stalin's rule, 1677
 visits London, 1680
 Khuzestan, 1856
 Kim Il-sung, 1608
 Kimmel, Admiral
 Cmdr., Pacific Fleet, 1106
 demotion, 1181
 Kindermann, Dr. Karl, 1274
 King, Martin Luther, 1676, 1736
 assassination, 1761
 Kinsey
 Comfort Women, 1523
 Kinsey Report, 1518
 Kissinger, Henry, 1767
 Kitchener, General to conquer Sudan, 1673
 Kleist plan, 1308
 Kleist, German intermediary concentration camp inmates for an armistice, 1308
 Knesset, 1587
 Israeli assembly, 1564
 Knorr, Nathan H.
 Watchtower Society, 1237
 Knox, US Sec. Navy, 1108
 Koestler, Arthur
 Promise and Fulfilment: Palestine 1917-1949, 1568
 Kokutai Cult, 1390
 Konoye, Prince
 Japanese Prime Minister, 1143
 Korea, 1605, 1815
 comfort women, 1606
 People's Democratic Republic of, 1609
 Republic of, 1609
 Korean Provisional Government (KPG), 1605
 Korean Restoration Army, 1606
 Korean War, 1583, 1605
 Kosovo religious leaders summit meeting, 1877
 Kosovo crisis impact on Muslims. endnote Ch31:13
 Kostunica, 1889
 Kosygin, Aleksei, 1741
 Kota Bharu.
 British base, 1177
 KPG. See Korean Provisional Government

Kraemer, Professor Hendrick
 The Christian Message in a non-Christian World, 923
 Kristallnacht, (Crystal Night), 911
 Ku Klux Klan, 1526
 Kurusu Saburo, Japan former Amb. to Germany, 1159
 Kuwait
 annexation, 1869
 development aid funds, 1751
 independence, 1728

La Patria destroyed, 1096
 La Pira, Giorgio, Florence Uni., 998 Land of Israel Movement, 1756 land rights indigenous Australian, 1809 land tenure, 1365
 colonial acquisition, 1370 communal, 1370
 Landis, James, Director of Economic Operations, M. East, 1298
 Lange, NZ PM limits on nuclear wepons, 1824
 Latin America, 1802
 Act of Chapultepec, 1341
 Latin American Catholic Bishops' Conference, 1766
 Lavon, Israeli Defence Minister, 1661
 Law of Return, Israel, 1583
 Law, Bonnar
 Deputy PM, UK, 1629
 League of Arab States, 1288
 League of Nations International Committee on Intellectual Cooperation, 919 Lebanon
 independence, 1342
 Leclerc, General Jean, 1603
 lectionary, 1574
 Lefebvre, Archbishop Marcel, 1738
 Lend Lease, 1099
 loans to Saudi Arabia, 1246
 Lend Lease Act, 1104 to China, 1114
 Liberal Democratic Party (LDP)
 Japan, 1415
 Liberation Theology Movement, Brazil, 1766
 Libya, 1786
 Lie, General Trygve
 US Secretary General, 1609 limited nuclear war (LNW) contradiction of terms, 1665
 Lindbeck, George, 1572
 Lithuania

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- Baltic Republic of, 1826
- slaughter, 1127
- Soviet occupation, 1039
- Lloyd, Selwyn
 - Minister for Defence, UK, 1662
- Lodge, Sen. Henry Cabot, 1526
- London
 - bombed, 1081
- London Conference on Jewish settlement, 1450
- Lothian, Lord
 - British Amb. to USA, 1101
- Louis-Germain, Rabbi, 1569
- Lowenthal, Max, 1490
- Lozovsky, Solomon, JAC chief, 1215
- Lublin plan, 1010
- Luxembourg Treaty*, 1292
- Lynch-Law, 1527
- Maastricht Treaty, 1828
- MacArthur, General Douglas, 1208
 - Commander, Korean War, 1613
 - Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers (SCAP), 1379
- MacDonald, Malcolm, UK Colonial Sec., 1427
- Macmillan, Harold, 1671
- Madagascar, 1079
- Magnes, Judah L., 1216, 1499
- Mahdi, the. See Muhammad Ahmad
- Maimonides, 1483, 1699
- Malan, Daniel, S. African PM, 1525
- Malaysia, 1815
- Maléter, General Pál, 1711
- Malik, Jacob, Russian Amb. to Tokyo, 1315
- Mallet, Sir Victor, 1081
- Manchukuo. = Manchuria
- Manchuria, 1087
- Mandela, Nelson, 1721
 - freed, 1825
 - life imprisonment, 1740
- Manhattan Project, 1228
- Manila slaughter, 1309
- Mao Tse-tung, Chairman
 - Cultural revolution, 1751
- Marcel, Gabriel, 1573
- Mariology, 1227
- Marshall Plan, 1460
- Marshall Plan, The*
 - by Allen W. Dulles, 1466
- Marshall, General George
 - China cease-fire, 1423
 - Secretary of State, 1485
 - US Army Chief of Staff, 1108
 - massive retaliation policy, US, 1660
- Matsuoka, Japanese Foreign Minister, 1077, 1090, 1110
- MAUD Committee, 985
- Mauritius
 - concentration camps, 1095
- McCarthy Era, 1537
- McCarthy, US Senator
 - censured, 1663
- McCarthyism, 1604
- McCollum plan, 1092
- McCollum, Lt. Comdr. Arthur, 1092
 - Far East naval intelligence, 1020
- McFarlane, Robert C., head NSC, 1823
- McLean Greeley, Dr. Dana, 1735
- McMahon, William, Australian PM, 1816
- McNamara, Robert US Sec. of Defence, 1739
- Meiji Constitution, 1389
 - replaced, 1413
- Meir, Golda, 1490, 1500, 1550, 1682, 1768. = Meyerson, Golda
- Amb. to Russia, 1536
- Meisinger, Joseph, Gestapo
 - pressure on Japan re Jews, 1220
- Memel annexation, 946
- Menzies, Col. Stewart, 1592
- Menzies, Robert, 1686
- Messianic Age, 1504, 1700
- Metaxas, General, Greek premier, 1099
- MEW. =Ministry of Economic Warfare
- Mexico, 1804
- Michael, King of Romania, 1284
- Middle East, 1116, 1307, 1445, 1752
 - riots, 1273
- Midway, Battle of, 1212
- Mikhoels, 1550
- Mikolajczyk, Polish PM in exile, 1290
- Milice, France, 1243
- Military Service Act
 - agent in industrial dispute, 1629
- Millenarian cults, 1831
- Milosevic, Slobodan, President of Serbia, 1826, 1889
- Mindszenty, Cardinal József, 1650
- Ministry of Economic Warfare (MEW), 975
- Ministry of Information, Britain, 967, 1044
- Ministry of People's Enlightenment and Propaganda, 1044
- Mission to the Nation, 1395
- Mizrachi, 1587
- Mohilever, Rabbi Samuel, 1587
- Molotov, Soviet Foreign Min., 1315
- Moltmann, Jurgen, 1397
- Montgomery Improvement Association, 1676
- Montgomery, Field Marshall, 1229
 - Chief of imperial general staff, UK, 1455
- Moose, James, Jr.
 - US Amb. To Syria, 1682
- Moral Rearmament Movement (MRA), 1393
- Moravian Church, 1399
- Morgenthau Jr., Henry
 - US Treasury Secretary, 924
- Morgenthau Plan, 1286
- Morimura, Chancellor
 - Japanese intelligence Pearl Harbour, 1150
- Morocco, independence, 1680
- Morrison-Grady Committee, 1449
- Mosaddeq, Mohammad
 - Premier, Iran, 1654
- Moscow
 - seige of, 1156
- Moses, Dr. Siegfried, 1292
- Mott, John R, 921
- Mount Scopus, Australia, 1568
- Mountbatten, Lord Louis
 - Viceroy (1947), 1430
- Moyne, Lord
 - assassination in Cairo, 1292
- Mubarak, Hosni, Egyptian President, 1865
- Mufti of Jerusalem, 1486
- Muhammad, 1699, 1749
- Muhammad Ahmad, the Mahdi, 1673
- Multilateral Agreement on Investments (MAI), 1881
- Murray Hill Area
 - fissionable materials monopoly, 1242
- Muslim Brotherhood, 1671, 1864
- Muslim League, India, 1078, 1429
- Muslims, 1749
- Mussolini, Benito, 1094
 - dismissal, 1252
 - executed, 1315
- Mutual Assistance Agreement Britain and Russia, 1135
- mutual assured destruction (MAD), 1739
- Mutual Security Act (1955) US, 1667
- Myanmar. = Burma
- Mylai, Vietnam, massacre, 1767

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- Naffah, Fuad, Lebanese Foreign Min.
visit to Latin America, 1803
- Nagy, Imre, 1705
- Nam Dinh, textile factory, 1435
- Narvik
British blockade, 1023
- Nasser, Gamal Abdel, 1622, 1675, 1684, 1755
closes Strait of Tiran, 1753
- National Aboriginal Consultative Committee, 1559
- National Association for the Advancement of Coloured Peoples (NAACP), 1526, 1736
- National Catholic Rural Movement, 1395
- National Catholic Social Movement, 1395
- National Catholic War Council, 1016
- National Conference of Catholic Bishops, 1016
- National Council of Churches of Christ, 1856 criticized Bush, 1872
- National Defense Advisory Commission, 1069
- National Institute of Economic and Social Research, 1045
- national leaders, culpability, 1388
- National Liberation Front (EAM), Greece, 1284
- National Military Organization (IZL), 970
- National Security Bill, 1595
- National Security Council (NSC), 1595
- National Unionist Party (NUP), 1675
- National Urban League, 1526
- Nationalist China, 1425
- Native Welfare Conference, 1559
- NATO
war with Serbia, 1851
- Nehru, Jawaharlal
PM of India, 1664
- Nehru, Pandit
Congress president, India, 1210, 1430
PM of India, 1430
- Neibuhr, Reinhold, 1569
- Netanyahu, Benyamin, 1875
- Netherlands Reformed Church, 1393 statement of beliefs and practises, 1572
- Netherlands-Indonesian Union, 1439
- New Deal, 980
- New International Economic Order (NIEO), 1809, 1880
- New Order in East Asia, 910
- New Zealand, 1810
- Ngo Dinh Diem, 1668
- Nicene Creed, 1699
- Niemoller, Martin, 1397
- Nigeria
coups, 1751
- Night Journey*. See Qur'an
- Niles, David, US, 1447
- Nixon Doctrine, 1768
- Nixon, Richard, US President, 1767 violent protests in Caracas and Lima, 1663
- Nomura, Kichisaburo
Japanese Amb. to US, 1148
- non-governmental organizations (NGOs)
Taxation disincentives, 1847
- Normandy landing, 1098
- Norodom, King, Cambodia, 1434
- North Atlantic Pact, 1472
- North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), 1621
- North Korean Central Bureau of the Communist Party, 1608
- Norway
naval invasion, 1023
- NSC. See National Security Council
- nuclear arms
political domination, 1137
- Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NNPT), 1762
- nuclear submarines, 1471
- Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, 1736
- nuclear-powered vessels, 1817
- NUP. See National Unionist Party
- Nuremberg War Crimes Trials, 1142, 1383
- Nuri es-Said, 1671
- OAPEC. = Organisation of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries
- OAPEC aid, 1792
- OAS, 1736
- OEEC. = Organization for European Economic Cooperation
- Office of Scientific Research and Development atomic bomb development, 1176
- Office of Strategic Services (OSS), 1593
- oil embargo (1973), 1553, 1785
- Okinawa occupied, 1314
- Omega system, 1817
- One hundred authors against Einstein*, 920
- OPEC. = Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries
- Open Door, 1279
- Operation Ali Baba, 1582
- Operation Barbarossa, 1121, 1631 invasion of Russia, 1104
- Operation Desert Sabre, 1872
- Operation Desert Storm, 1826, 1872
- Operation Eagle
German air-offensive against Britain, 1079
- Operation Magic Carpet, 1581
- Operation Overlord, 1278 cross-channel invasion, 1269
- Operation Sea Lion, 1079
- Operation Sunrise., 1463
- Operation Typhoon, 1627
- Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD)
Multilateral Agreement on Investments, 1881
- Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC), 1460, 1537
- Organization of African Unity (OAU), 1737, 1794
- Organization of American States, 1075
- Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries (OAPEC), 1759
- Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), 1726
- Organization of the Islamic Conference, 1769, 1781
- Osborne
British Amb. to Italy, 1207, 1258
- Osiraq reactor devastated, 1858
- Oslo talks, 1874
- OSS. See Office of Strategic Services, US
- Ottoman victory against Serbs at Kosovo, 1850
- OXFAM, 1846
- Pacelli, Eugenio
elected Pope Pius XII, 941
- Pacific carve-up, 1305
- Pacific Fleet
decoy, 1109
- Pacific Trading Company, 1089
- Packard, Vance
Waste Makers, The, 1724

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- Pact of Rio, 1649
- paedophilia in institutions, 1524
- Palestine, 1356, 1474, 1873
 - incorporated into Jordan, 1555
 - partition plan, 1450
 - precedent for others, 1455
 - UN approval of partition, 1483
- Palestine Conciliation Commission, 1586
- Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), 1564, 1740, 1856
 - relations with Jordan, 1780
- Palestine Regiment, 1084
- Palestinian National Charter, 1763
- Pan American Highway, 1075
- Pan-African Congress
 - banned, 1737
- Pankhursts, womens suffrage, 1443
- Papal documents
 - Ad Apostolorum Principis*, 1721
 - Ad Caeli Reginam*, 1663
 - Ad Sinarum Gentem*, 1663
 - Auspicia quaedam*, 1490, 1519
 - Capitulatio de partibus Saxoniae*, 1113
 - Casti Connubii*, 1520
 - Darkness over the Earth. = Summi Pontificatus*
 - Deiparae Virginis Mariae*, 1400
 - Dignitatis Humanae*, 1734
 - Divino Afflante Spiritu*, 1257
 - Evangelii Praecones*, 1405
 - Fulgens Corona*, 1659
 - Humani Generis Unitas*, 927, 990, 1573
 - In Multiplicibus Curis*, 1551
 - In Redemptoris Nostri*, 1564
 - Index librorum prohibitorum*, 1565
 - Laetamur Admodum*, 1710
 - Lamentabili*, 1561
 - Luctuosissimi Eventus*, 1707
 - Meminisse Juvat*, 1721
 - Motu proprio Quotidianis precibus*, 1400, 1738
 - Munificentissimus Deus*, 1654
 - Mystici Corporis Christi*, 1248, 1316
 - Nostra Aetate*, 1749
 - Oath Against the Errors of Modernism*, 916, 1561
 - Orientales Ecclesias*, 1657
 - Pacem Dei*, 1568
 - Pascendi*, 1561
 - Sacerdotalis Caelibatus*, 1751
 - Sacra Virginitas*, 1660
 - Sertum Laetitiae*, 1002
 - Summi Pontificatus*, 988
 - Unam Sanctam* (1302), 1249
 - Unitatis Redintegratio*, 1745
- papal enthronement, 943
- papal neutrality, 971, 999
- papal peace initiative, 1004
 - Papandreou, M., Greece, 1284
- Paris
 - air bombardment, 1035
- Paris Mission, 1394
- Partai Komunis Indonesia, 1437
- Partai Nasional Indonesia (PNI), 1381, 1438
- Partisans, 1477
- partition, India-Pakistan, 1430
- Pasha, Nahhas, Premier, Egypt, 1288
- Passover, 1570
- Patterson, Robert P., Marshall Plan, 1466
- Pauley, Edwin
 - Reparations commission, 1337
- Paulus, General
 - surrender to Russia, 1236
- Pavelic, Ante, Ustashe leader, 1112
- Pax Christi (1945)
 - development aid, 1847
- PCI = Vietnamese Communist Party
- Peace Movement, 1651
- Peaceful Coexistence, 1666
- Pearl Harbour, 1100, 1105
 - files still classified, 1180
 - under attack, 1178
- people of the book, 1699
- People's Council, (Volksraad), 1437
- People's Executive Committee of South Hamgyong Province, 1607
- People's National Army of Liberation (ELAS), Greece, 1284
- People's Republic of China
 - expulsion of missionaries, 1600
- Peres, Shimon, Israel, 1685
- Perestroika, 1822
- Perry, Commodore, 1389
- Perry, William J., US Defence Sec., 1873
- petrochemicals industry, 982
- petroleum
 - ban on export, 1758
 - depressing oil prices, 1868
- Petroleum Administrator for War, 1251
- Petroleum Reserves Corporation (PRC), 1251
- Petroleum War Industry Council, 1272
- Phalange Party, massacre, 1862
- Philby, H. St. John
 - plan for Jewish settlement, 1244
- Philby, Jack, 975
- Philippines, 1801, 1815
 - independence, 1267
- Philippines National Oil Company, 1802
- Pignatelli-Aragona, Principessa Enza, 1257
- Pilgrim Fathers, 1296
- Pinochet, General Augusto, 1388, 1783
- Poland, 1310, 1762
 - elimination of Intelligentsia, 978
 - German invasion of, 964
 - government recog. by US and UK, 1343
 - partition plan, 961
 - Riga Line boundaries of 1920, 1242
 - Russian invasion of, 971
 - Solidarity, 1781
 - uprising, 1282
- Polish question, 1300
- Polish, Rabbi David, 1570
- Political War Executive (PWE), UK, 1230
- Polycarp, Archbishop, Ukraine, 1396
- Pontifical Commission of Assistance, 1400
- Pope
 - Benedict XV, 1568
 - John Paul II, 1598
 - meets Arafat, 1822
 - John XXIII, 1722
 - Paul VI, 1735
 - Pius XI
 - death, 927
 - Pius XII
 - death of, 1721
 - Five Points for Peace, 1015
 - no coloured troops in Rome, 1260
 - Pastor Angelicus*, 1217
 - sponsors Christian Democrats, 1294
 - the movie, 1217
 - wartime stance, 1001
- Popular Republican Movement (M.R.P.), 1394
- Population Institute (1969), 1847
- Portugal concordat, 1000
- Portuguese Azores Islands, 1796
- post-war order, 1318, 1363
- Potsdam, 1357
- President Warfield*, ferry, 1460
- President's Advisory Committee on Uranium, 983
- Press and Censorship Office, Britain, 967
- Prince Paul, Yugoslavia, 1110

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- Prince Sultan Air Base, 1872
 Program to Combat Racism (PCR), 1781
 Progressives, Israel, 1587 promised land, 1499 propaganda war, 1044, 1195
 Red Threat, 1197
 Yellow Peril, 1195
 Prophecies of St. Malachy, 1218 public opinion polling, 1045
Punishment for War Crimes, 1196
 Purple Machine
 breaking Japanese code, 1106
 PWE. = Political War Executive, UK

 Quakers development aid, 1846
 Quebec Conference, 1253
 Quisling, Vidkun
 Norway, puppet govt., 1024
 Qur'an
 Night Journey, 1183, 1483, 1502

 Rabbinical Courts, 1588
 Rabin, Yitzhak, Israeli PM, 1874
 Racial Discrimination (1969), 1847 radar, 1083
 Rainbow Warrior sunk by French, 1823
 Rajk, Laszlo, Hungary, 1683
 Rambouillet Agreement, 1877
 Rape in war, 1196
 rape, by Allied troops, 1416
 Rashid Ali
 seizure of British air base, 1115
 RCA. = Radio Corp. of America
 RCC. See Revolutionary Command Council
 Reagan, Ronald, US President, 1821 initiatives, 1859
 Reconstruction Finance Corporation (RFC), 1038
 Recreation and Amusement Association (RAA), Japan Allied use, 1418
 refugees, 925, 1574
 Jewish, 1576
 Palestinian, 1767
 Reines, Rabbi Isaac Jacob, 1587
 Religious Corporations Ordinance, 1412 religious self-understanding, 1390 reparation, 1380
 Reparations Treaty (Shilumim Agreement), 1591
 Resist America, Aid Korea campaign, China, 1618
 Resource trading proposal.
 Appendix A

Restatement of the Law of Property in the United States, 1369
 Returned Servicemen's Settlement Scheme, 1558
 Revolutionary Command Council (RCC), 1656, 1675
 RFC. = Reconstruction Finance Corporation
 Ribbentrop, Foreign Minister, 909
 Ridgway, General Matthew replaces MacArthur in Korea, 1615
 Robeson, Paul, 1575
 Robinson, Bishop John
 Honest to God, 1735
 Rochefort, Lt. Commander Joseph head of Station H, 1020 Rockefeller, Nelson
 blackmailed, 1482
 Roman Catholic Church
 post-war Germany, 1396
 Rome
 Allied bombing, 1252
 Romero, Archbishop Oscar
 Arnulfo, of El Salvador, 1767
 Rommel, Field Marshall, 1281
 Roncalli, Angelo, papal nuncio, Istanbul, 1276
 Rontgen, Wilhelm, 916
 Roosevelt, Kermit, 1657
 Roosevelt, Theodore
 death of, 1314
 post-war strategy, 1305
 Rotary International estab. Chigago (1905), 1846
 Rotta, Angelo, papal nuncio plea for Jews, 1276
 Rumania, 1310
 Rusk, Dean, US Sec. of State, 1753
 Russell, Lord Bertrand, 916
 Russia. See also Soviet Union attacks Japanese Army, 957 reactor for peaceful use, 1255 war against Japan, 1343
 Russian Federation, 1875
 legal successor to USSR, 1828
 Russian Orthodox Church, 1395
Russian-Japanese Pact, 1113

 Sachs, Alexander, 979
 Sadat, Anwar, President of Egypt, 1820, 1854
 SAG. See Security and Armaments Group
 Saito, Japanese Amb. to Moscow, 1315
 Salazar, Dr.
 Portugese Premier, 1147
 Salivahana era, 1830

 Sambetsu Kaigi, Japanese trade union, 1415
 Sandinista govt., Nicaragua, 1823
 Sandstrom, Emil
 UNSCOP chairman, 1474
 sanitation squads, 976
 Sarasvati, Swami Dayananda, 1428
 Sarekat Islam, 1437
 Sarin nerve gas, 1387
 Saud, King of Saudi Arabia, 1670
 Saudi Arabia
 loan from oil company, 1120
 oil potential, 1271
 Save the Children (1919), 1846
 Schacht
 president, Reichsbank, 915
Schacht Plan, 914
 Schiff, Jacob, Jewish banker, 1086
 Schlesinger, James, US Sec. of Defence, 1809
 Schmaus, Michael, 1573
 Schoenfeld, Dr. Hans, 1219
 Schweitzer, Dr. Albert, 1735 scientists relocated to West, 1349
 SCUC. See Suez Canal Users Club
 SEATO. See South East Asian Treaty Organization
 Secret Intelligence Service (SIS), UK, 1592
 Security and Armaments Group (SAG), 1463
 Security Council, UN, 1485 segregated school system, 1768
 Sekiguchi, Colonel Tsugio
 armistice offer, 1274
 Separate Report on the Oil Import Question, 1775
 Sephardim, Israel, 1587
 Serbia
 war with NATO, 1851
 Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences
 Memorandum 1986, 1850
 Sergius, Patriarch of Russia, 1396
 Servants of Christ the King, 1393 Service Civil International (1920), 1846
 sex education, 1199, 1524
 Seyss-Inquart, Artur, 1009
 Shaka Era, 1830
 Shari'a, 1892
 Sharon, Ariel
 visit to Temple Mount, 1877
 Shawkat, Naji, 1071
 Shertok, Moshe, Israeli foreign Minister, 1489
 Shibata, Mitsugi, V-Consul warns Jews, 1220

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- Shigemitsu, Japanese Amb. to Britain, 1082, 1108
- Shinto
 - Official Status Abolished, 1408
- Shinto Directive, 1390
- Shultz, George, 1858
- Sihanouk, Prince Norodom, 1437
- Singapore, 1815
 - extent of British defence, 972
- Sino-Japanese Treaty, 1266
- Sino-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance, 1604
- SIS. See Secret Intelligence Service, UK
- Six Day War, 1755
- smear campaign
 - against Communists, Italy, 1404
- Smith, General Walter Bedell
 - appointed DCL, 1652
- Smith, Ian, of S. Rhodesia, 1748
- Sobrinho, Jon., 1767
- social recovery, US, 980
- Society of Friends (Quakers), 1391
- Socony Vacuum Company, 1484
- Sohyo, Japanese trade union, 1415
- Soka Gakkai, Japan, 1421
- Sonnenborn Institute, 1357
- Sorge, Richard, Soviet master spy, 1110
- South Africa, 1820
 - annexes Namibia, 1583
 - Apartheid government, 1556
 - declares war, 968
 - homelands, 1655
 - proclaimed a republic, 1737
 - Sharpsville, 1737
- South African Supreme Court
 - over-ridden re Apartheid decision, 1655
- South East Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO), 1621, 1663
- South Korea
 - attacks N. Korea, 1612
- Southern Rhodesia, 1748
- Soviet codes
 - copied by OSS, 1594
- Soviet Information Bureau (Sovinformburo), 1215
- Soviet security police (NKVD), 1300
- Soviet Union. See also Russia
 - A-bomb tested (1949), 1255
 - aims, 1050
 - armed forces purges, 1130
 - British aid promise, 1134
 - end of, 1828
 - expelled from League of Nations, 1013
 - invasion of Poland, 971
 - multi-party elections, 1825
 - post-war buffer zone, 1325
 - post-war territorial demands, 1200
 - push for decolonization, 1716
 - revival of religious practice, 1133
- Soviet-Japanese Agreement*, 971
- Soviet-Polish Agreement*, 1138
- Soweto, 1820
- Spain, 1079
- Spain concordat, 1000
- Spanish Sahara, 1762
- Special Annex on the extermination of the Jews*, 1231
- Spellman, Cardinal, New York, 1006
- Spiritual Centre society (Merkaz Ruchani), 1587
- Spraty Islands, 946
- Sputnik I, 1724
- Stalin, Joseph, 942
 - absolute power, 1130
 - death of, (1953), 1660
 - harassment of Catholic and Uniate Churches, 1598
 - ignores intelligence reports, 1121
- Stalingrad occupied, 1228
- Standard Oil, 1246
 - an enemy national, 1482
 - oil to Nazis, 977
- Star Wars, 1822, 1859
- Stark, US Chief of Naval Operations, 1108
- START treaty, 1825
- State Defence Committee (GOKO), Russia, 1126
- Stern Group, 1549
- Stettinius, Edward, US Sec. of State, 1294, 1315
- Stimson, Henry L.
 - chairman, Marshall plan, 1466
 - US Sec. War, 1108
- Stockholm Appeal, 1651
- Stolen Generation
 - national apology, 1559
- Strassman, Fritz, 916
- Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT), 1768
- Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT I), 1782
- Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT II), 1821
- Strategic Defence Initiative, 1822
- Strijdom, J.G. S. Africa, 1721
- Student Christian Movement, 1393
- Study and Analysis of Introducing Jewish Capital, 1089
- submarine cable (1871), 1444
- Sudan
 - votes for independence, 1672
- Suez Canal, 1675
 - nationalization, 1684
- Suez Canal Company
 - sieged by Egypt, 1684
- Suez Canal Users' Club (SCUC), 1691
- Suez Crisis, 1622, 1683
- Sugihara, Senpo, Japanese Consul in Kovno, 1090
- Sukarno, 1437
 - President of Indonesia, 1725
 - regime falls, 1747
- supreme being, belief in, 1562
- Supreme People's Assembly, Nth. Korea
 - national constitution, 1609
- Surface to Air Missiles (SAMs), 1747
- surveillance of Soviet Union by CIA, 1599
- Suzuki, Admiral, Japanese Premier, 1314
- Switzerland
 - closed to Jews, 907
- Syngman Rhee, 1604, 1606
- Synod of Dort, 1366
- Syria, 1666
 - coup, 1687
 - independence, 1342
 - joint invasion of, 1120
- Szilard, Leo, 940
- Taiwan (Formosa) massacre, 1599
- Takahashi, Baron, Bank of Japan, 1086
- Tamura, Mitsuzo, 1090
- Taylor, Myron C., 1124
 - appeal to pope, 1223
 - Spec. Rep. to Vatican, 1014
- Technical Industrial Intelligence Committee, US (TIIC), 1348
- technology, 1443
- Tel Aviv, 1500
- Templer, Sir Gerald
 - Imperial general Staff, UK, 1672
- Texas Oil Company, 1246
- T-Forces, 1348
- Thailand, 1801
 - war with French, 1101
- Thakin ('Master') movement, Burma, 1432
- Thanh Nien
 - Vietnamese nationalist movement, 1436
- Third World War rumours, 1712
- thirty-eighth parallel, 1607

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- Three-power military-political commission, 1263
- Tilak, Bal Gangadhar, 1428
- Tillich, Paul, 1397
- Tito, Marshal, Yugoslavia, 1284
 - Partisan leader, 1477
- Tobruk
 - taken by Rommel, 1244
- Tochnit Dalet* (Plan D), 1489
- Toffler, Alvin
 - Future Shock*, 1769
- Togo, Shigenori
 - Japanese Foreign Minister, 1157, 1315
 - statement to Japanese Imperial Conference, 1170
- Tojo
 - Prime Minister, Japan, 1156
 - War Minister, Japan, 1156
- Tokuda, Medical Captain
 - Hisachiki, 1386
- Tokyo
 - bombed by US, 1211, 1310
- Tokyo trials, 1383
- Tonkin Gulf, 1083
- Transit bases
 - Asia, 1814
 - Australia, 1814
- Transjordan
 - sovereign kingdom, 1449
- Treaty of Brussels, 1472
- Treaty of Chapultepec, 1649
- Treaty of Waigani, 1810
- Treblinka, 1570
- Trieste Agreement, 1621
- Trieste surrender, 1334
- Trinitarian doctrine, 1184, 1571, 1810
- Tripartite Pact, The, 1085
- triple divide (Yugoslavia), 1849
- Trouble in the Triangle,
 - development. endnote Ch31:16
- Truman Doctrine, 1457
- Truman, Harry, President USA, 1314, 1447
- Tudeh, the. See Iranian Communist Party
- Tunku Abdul Rahman, 1815
- Turkey, 1800
 - US arms support, 1453
- Tutu, Bishop Desmond, 1820
- two Chinas problem, 1599
- Two-Ocean Navy Expansion Act, 1075
- Tzarapkin, Soviet delegate to UN, 1480
- U Nu, 1433
- U-2 spy plane, 1726
- Ugly Americans, 1666
- Ukraine
 - slaughter, 1127
- Ultramontanism, 1400
- 'Umar I
 - universal dating, 1831
- Ummah Party, 1675
- UN Charter
 - Article 51, 1341
 - Trusteeship Council, 1342
- UN Genocide Convention, 1559
- UN Monetary and Financial Conference, 1278
- UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), 1583
- UN Truce Commission, 1516
- UN trusteeship of Palestine, 1485
 - unconditional surrender*
 - Allied policy, 1233
- United Nations General Assembly
 - sovereignty of states over natural resources, 1804
- United Nations Organization, 1285, 1318, 1340
 - admits People's Rep. of China, 1781
 - bribery and coercion, 1481
 - dominant religion, 1424
 - ethnicity, 1424
 - overrules US veto, 1781
 - Palestine question, 1456
 - political orientation, 1424
 - reconvene in Geneva, 1866
 - Security Council, 1303
 - Special Session, 1459
- United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA), 1244
- United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), 1459, 1474
- United Nations War Crimes Commission, 1351
- United Religious Front, 1587
- United States
 - A-bomb tested (1945), 1255
 - aims, 1051
 - aircraft production, 1075
 - biggest naval power in Mediterranean, 1452
 - credits to China, 916
 - declares war against Japan, 1181
 - dependence on foreign oil, 1794
 - dip. relations with Vatican, 1822
 - domestic race relations, 1557
 - embargoes on Japan, 1085, 1137
 - H-bomb test, 1657
 - manipulation of countries, 1602
 - massive economic sanctions, 1889
 - Permanent Bases, 1869
 - post-war demands of Britain, 1203
 - presidential election, 1551
 - relationship with Australia, 1203
 - ultimatum to Japan, 1168
- Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1555
- University Act, Burma, 1432
- UNRRA. = United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration
- UNSCOP. = United Nations Special Committee on Palestine
- Uruguay, 1803
- US hostage crisis, 1821
- US Peace Corps
 - politicized volunteer org., 1847
- US-Israeli Alliance, 1552
- Ustashe, 1478
 - ethnic cleansing of Croatia, 1112
- V-1 pilotless rocket bomb, 1278
- V-2 rocket construction complex, 1349
- Va'ad Le'umi, Israel, 1564
- Vance-Owen negotiators, 1874
- Vansittart, Sir Robert, 1091
- Vatican, 1125
 - aim to destroy Communism, 1021
 - anti-Semitic reports, 1207
 - anti-Semitism, 1565
 - bans Jewish authors, 1568
 - dip. relations with US, 1822
 - diplomatic recognition of Ustashe regime, 1185
 - Fascist bombing, 1270
 - inaction, 1240
 - interest in Jerusalem, 1492
 - objection to euthanasia procedures, 1149
 - opposed to Ecumenism, 1530
 - peace initiative, 1070
 - plot against Hitler, 1014
 - silence, 1219, 1235
 - tacit approval of exterminations, 1259
 - transfer Gold to US, 1031
 - war aims, 1052
- Vatican City in Jerusalem, 1492
- Vatican II, 1731, 1741, 1748
- Vatican Secretariat for Christian Unity, 1731
- venereal disease
 - Allied troops, 1416

INDEX TO VOLUME III

- Venezuela, 1804
- Versailles Peace Conference, 1436
- Vichy France, 1076
- Vietminh, 1436, 1605
- Vietnam
 - Democratic Republic of, 1436
 - exploitation, 1434
 - French defeated by Vietminh, 1664
- Vietnam War, 1741
- Vietnam War protests, 1769
- Vietnamese Communist Party (PCI), 1436
- Vikrama era (Jains), 1830
- Visser 't Hooft, W.A., 1399
- Vladivostok
 - British blockade, 1022
- Von Braun, Werner, 1349
- von Pufendorf, Samuel
 - Of the Power of the Christian Religion in Relation to the Life of a Citizen*, 1367
- Wallace, Governor George C., 1736
- Wallace, Henry, 1490
- Walsh, Bishop James, 1103
- Walsh-Drought Reports*, 1103
- Wang Ching-wei, 1266
 - Premier, Japanese occupied China, 1232
- Wang Ching-wei Plan*, 1237
- Wannsee Conference
 - final solution, 1205
- War Bonds, 1280
- War Crimes Declaration, 1262
- War Refugee Board, US, 1292, 1574
- Warhaftig, Zorach
 - Jewish refugee issue, 1120
- Warsaw ghetto, 1097
- Warsaw Pact, 1665
- Washington Conference of Theoretical Physics, Fifth, 926
- WASP. = White Anglo-Saxon Protestant
- water, 1366
- Wavell, Field Marshal Lord
 - Viceroy of India, 1429
- Wealth Tax Act, 980
- weighted resource trading scheme, 1883
- Weissauer, Ludwig, 1081
- Weitz, Joseph, 1585
- Weizmann Institute of Science, Israel, 1568
- Weizmann, Dr. Chaim, 1484
- Weizsacker, German Amb. to Italy, 1257
- West German government, 1472
- West Irian, 1439
- Western Wall surrendered, 1515
- Westmoreland, General, 1761
- White Anglo-Saxon Protestants (WASP), 1182
- White Australia Policy, 1195, 1395, 1527
- White Flag League, 1674
- white man's burden, 1426
- Whitlam, Gough, Australian PM, 1559, 1810
- Widening Gap, The, 1778
- Windsor, Duke of
 - visits Germany, 1072
- Wingate, Gov. General, Sudan, 1673
- Winterton, Lord, 1056
- Wisdom, Book of, 1698
- Wise, Stephen, 1089
- wives of Jews
 - demonstrate in Berlin, 1239
- WJC. = World Jewish Congress
- Wojtyla, Karol (Pope John Paul II), 1734
- Wolff, Karl Friedrich Otto
 - order to occupy Vatican, 1256
- SS Commander, Italy, 1313
- Wolfson
 - Philo: Foundations of Religious Philosophy in Judaism, Christianity and Islam*, 1568
- women in the workforce, 1369
- Women's Central Organizing Committee of the Australian Labor Party, 1524
- Women's Liberation Movement, 1443
- Woodstock festival, 1769
- Woon-hyung Lyuh, 1607
- working mothers, 1443
- World Bank, 1278
- World Conference on Religion and Peace, 1735, 1824
- Nairobi, 1984, 1883
- World Council of Churches, 1291, 1399, 1541, 1759
- First Assembly, 1518
- Israel, 1720
- Kosovo crisis. endnote Ch31:11
- Membership pattern. endnote Ch31:54
- Third Assembly, 1728
- World Council of Churches
 - Refugee Service, 1846
- World Council of Churches,
 - Special Commission of appointment of staff from Eastern Europe, 1850
 - theological conflicts, 1850
- World Islamic Congress, 1589, 1658
- World Jewish Congress (WJC)
 - Atlantic City, 1292
- World Muslim League, 1891
- world outlaws, 1263
- World Trade Organization, 1808
- World Union for Progressive Judaism (WUPJ), 1569
- World Wildlife Fund for Nature, 1847
- WUPJ. = World Union for Progressive Judaism
- Wye River Accords, 1877
- Xavier, Francis, Japan, 1389
- Yalta Conference, 1299
- Yamamoto, Admiral Koshiro
 - Japanese Naval Minister, 1100
- Yamashita, General
 - show trial and execution, 1383
- Yeltsin, Boris, President USSR, 1826
- Yemeni civil war, 1740
- Yi Tong-hwi, Premier, 1606
- YMCA, 1393
- Yom Kippur War, 1553, 1761, 1783
- Yoshida, Shigeru (1946-47)
 - Japan PM, 1413
- Young Men's Buddhist Association (YMBA) Burma, 1432
- Youth Aliyah, 1053
- Youth Peace Corps, 1723
- Yugoslav partition plan, 1112
- Yugoslavia
 - Soviet embargo, 1472
 - triple divide, 1849
- zaibatsu, 1415
- Zhou Enlai
 - PM, China, 1664
- Zhukov, General
 - Russian Commander in Chief, 1174
- Zikman, Lew, 1089
- Zionism
 - aims, 1051
- Zionist Federation of Germany (ZFD), 1053
- Zionist lobbyists, USA elections, 1447
- Zionist Movement
 - influence US presidential elections, 1575
- Zionist terrorist attacks, 1448
- Zyklon B pesticide
 - death camp use, 1142

In 1975, while Australia was going through the trauma of a constitutional crisis, Ian Fry was travelling the Middle East, researching some of the issues involved in the trouble in the triangle.

He was on his way home after a Consultation on the Crisis in the Middle East at the World Council of Churches, in Geneva, and the WCC's Fifth Assembly, in Nairobi, and he was eager to canvas the possibility of religious leaders and scholars from each of the Abrahamic religions working together to reassess the Messianic beliefs which divided them.

A former lay preacher and elder, he has been active in the life of the Uniting Church in Australia and a range of its assemblies, synods and commissions, but his views are not at all conventional and he was soon drawn into inter-faith consultation.

He has taken part in assemblies of the World Conference on Religion and Peace, and Islam and the West as well as the World Council of Churches.

An agriculturist by training, he left the chemical industry to join the Presbyterian Board of Local Mission. He later turned to journalism, edited suburban newspapers in Melbourne, served as an Australian Volunteer in Papua New Guinea, and established a provincial community newspaper in Milne Bay Province. On the strength of that he was appointed general manager of a national newspaper group. He returned to Melbourne in 1966 to complete Trouble in the Triangle.